Principles, Definitions and Model Rules of European Private Law

Draft Common Frame of Reference (DCFR)

Prepared by the Study Group on a European Civil Code and the Research Group on EC Private Law (Acquis Group)
Based in part on a revised version of the Principles of European Contract Law

Edited by Christian von Bar, Eric Clive and Hans Schulte-Nölke and
Hugh Beale, Johnny Herre, Jérôme Huet, Matthias Storme, Stephen Swann, Paul Varul, Anna Veneziano and Fryderyk Zoll

Table of contents

Introduction

General

1. DCFR and CFR distinguished
2. Revision of the interim outline edition
3. Paperback and hardcover editions of the final DCFR
4. An academic, not a politically authorised text
5. About this Introduction

The purposes of the DCFR

6. A possible model for a political CFR
7. Legal science, research and education
8. A possible source of inspiration

Contents of the DCFR

9. Principles, definitions and model rules
10. Meaning of ‘principles’
11. Fundamental principles
12. The approach taken to fundamental principles in the Interim Outline Edition
13. The approach taken in the Principes directeurs
14. Lessons learned from the Principes directeurs
15. Underlying principles
16. Overriding principles
17. Protection of human rights
18. Promotion of solidarity and social responsibility
19. Preservation of cultural and linguistic diversity
20. Protection and promotion of welfare
21. Promotion of the internal market
22. Freedom, security, justice and efficiency
23. Definitions
24. Model rules
25. Comments and notes

Revision of the interim outline edition

26. Overview
27. Book I
28. Book II

29. Book III
30. Book IV
31. Books V-VII
32. Books VIII-X
33. Definitions

The coverage of the DCFR

34. Wider coverage than PECL
35. Specific contracts
36. Non-contractual obligations
37. Matters of movable property law
38. Matters excluded
39. Reasons for the approach adopted
40. Contract law as part of private law

Structure and language of the DCFR model rules

41. Structure of the model rules
42. Mode of numbering the model rules
43. Ten books
44. Books II and III
45. Contracts and obligations
46. Contractual and non-contractual obligations
47. Language
48. Accessibility and intelligibility

How the DCFR relates to PECL, the SGECC PEL series, the Acquis and the Insurance Contract Group series

49. Based in part on the PECL
50. Deviations from PECL
51. Examples
52. Input from stakeholders
53. Developments since the publication of the PECL
54. The PEL series
55. Deviations from the PEL series
56. Improvements
57. The Acquis Principles (ACQP)
58. Principles of European Insurance Contract Law

How the DCFR may be used as preparatory work for the CFR

59. Announcements by the Commission
60. Purposes of the CFR
61. Green Paper on the Review of the Consumer Acquis
62. Draft proposal for a Directive on consumer contractual rights
63. Improving the existing and future acquis: model rules
64. Improving the acquis: developing a coherent terminology
65. No functional terminology list without rules
66. Coverage of the CFR
67. Consumer law
68. Revision of the acquis and further harmonisation measures
69. Terms and concepts referred to in Directives
70. When in doubt, topics should be included
71. Essential background information
72. Good faith as an example
73. Presupposed rules of national law
74. DCFR not structured on an ‘everything or nothing’ basis

Developments after this edition

75. Full version of the DCFR
76. Consumer credit contracts not covered
77. Evaluating the DCFR
78. CFR
79. Square brackets
80. The CFR as the basis for an optional instrument

General

1. DCFR and CFR distinguished. In this volume the Study Group on a European Civil Code (the 'Study Group') and the Research Group on Existing EC Private Law (the 'Acquis Group') present the revised and final academic Draft of a Common Frame of Reference (DCFR). It contains Principles, Definitions and Model Rules of European Private Law. Among other goals, its completion fulfils an obligation to the European Commission undertaken in 2005. The Commission´s Research Directorate-General funded part of the work. One purpose of the text is to serve as a draft for drawing up a 'political' Common Frame of Reference (CFR) which was first called for by the European Commission's 'Action Plan on A More Coherent European Contract Law' of January 2003.[1] As is explained more precisely below, the DCFR and the CFR must be clearly distinguished. The DCFR serves several other important purposes.

2. Revision of the interim outline edition. A year ago, the DCFR was published for the first time in an interim outline edition.[2] This edition is a revision in three main ways. First, the interim edition did not contain model rules in Book IV on loan contracts and contracts for donation, nor in Books VIII to X on acquisition and loss of ownership in goods, on proprietary security rights in movable assets, and on trusts. They have now been included. Secondly, one of the purposes of publishing an interim edition was to provide an opportunity for interested parties to comment on the draft and make suggestions for improvement. The public discussion of the interim outline edition prompted the research groups to revise at various places the text which had already been published. The research groups are grateful to all who have taken part in that critical evaluation, whether in publications, at conferences or in personal correspondence, and who have contributed to the improvement of the text. Naturally, not all the suggestions we received have been acted upon: some, for example, advocated solutions which had already been rejected after full discussion by the Study Group or the Acquis Group. But many suggestions for improvement have been gratefully adopted. Further revisions resulted from our own further reflections and discussions, the results of the research conducted by the evaluative teams in the network and the conclusions which we drew from the process of translating the first three Books into French.[3] That applies in particular to Books I-III, but is not confined to them. (For more details, see paras 26-33). Thirdly, this revised edition contains an additional self-contained section in which we set out four underlying principles underpinning the DCFR. This draws on the Principes directeurs du droit Européen du contrat, the subject-matter of an independent research project, which published its output in 2008.[4] The conclusions of the economic impact group, which analysed particular rules of the DCFR from an economic perspective, were also made available to us.

[1] COM (2003) final, OJ C 63/1 (referred to below as Action Plan).

[2] von Bar/Clive/Schulte-Nölke and Beale/Herre/Huet/Schlechtriem/Storme/Swann/Varul/Veneziano/Zoll, Principles, Definitions and Model Rules of European Private Law. Draft Common Frame of Reference (Munich 2008).

3. Paperback and hardcover editions of the final DCFR The European Commission received in December 2008 the material published here along with an explanatory and illustrative commentary on each model rule. The Commission has also received the extensive comparative legal material which has been gathered and digested in the past years. The entire work will be published in hardcover book form later in the year. At the same time we considered that the publication of a compact and inexpensive second paperback edition would help promote the wider dissemination and discussion of these texts. The complete edition is voluminous. It will invite study at one's desk at home or in the office, but it will be too bulky to pack into luggage taken to meetings or conferences. That is another reason for also publishing a second edition in outline form, essentially Articles only.

4. An academic, not a politically authorised text. It must be stressed that what we refer to today as the DCFR originates in an initiative of European legal scholars. It amounts to the compression into rule form of decades of independent research and co-operation by academics with expertise in private law, comparative law and European Community law. The independence of the two Groups and of all the contributors has been maintained and respected unreservedly at every stage of our labours. That in turn has made it possible to take on board many of the suggestions received in the course of a large number of meetings with stakeholders and other experts throughout the continent. The two Groups alone, however, bear responsibility for the content of this volume. In particular, it does not contain a single rule or definition or principle which has been approved or mandated by a politically legitimated body at European or national level (save, of course, where it coincides with existing EU or national legislation). It may be that at a later point in time the DCFR will be carried over at least in part into a CFR, but that is a question for others to decide. This introduction merely sets out some considerations which might usefully be taken into account during the possible process of transformation.

---

[3] By Professor Jacques Ghestin (Paris); published at http://www.fondation-droitcontinental.org/Documents/Traduc-vBar-livre%20I-II-III-%2008-2008.doc.

[4] Fauvarque-Cosson/Mazeaud and Wicker/Racine/Sautonie-Laguionie/Bujoli (eds.), Principes contractuels commun. Projet de cadre commun de référence (Paris 2008); Fauvarque-Cosson/Mazeaud and Tenenbaum, Terminologie contractuelle commune. Projet de cadre commun de référence (Paris 2008). These studies have also been published in English: European Contract Law. Materials for a Common Frame of Reference: Terminology, Guiding Principles, Model Rules. Produced by Association Henri Capitant des Amis de la Culture Juridique Française and Société de Législation Comparée. Edited by Fauvarque-Cosson and Denis Mazeaud. Prepared by Racine, Sautonie-Laguionie, Tenenbaum and Wicker (Munich 2008).

5. About this Introduction. This introduction explains the purposes pursued in preparing the DCFR and outlines its contents, coverage and structure. It describes the amendments to the 2008 interim edition and elucidates the relationship between the DCFR and the publications which have already appeared or will appear in the course of the preparatory work. Finally, it sketches out how the DCFR might flow into the development of the CFR.

The purposes of the DCFR

6. A possible model for a political CFR. As already indicated, this DCFR is (among other things) a possible model for an actual or 'political' Common Frame of Reference (CFR). The DCFR presents a concrete text, hammered out in all its detail, to those who will be deciding questions relating to a CFR. A 'political' CFR would not necessarily, of course, have the same coverage and contents as this academic DCFR. The question of which functions the DCFR can perform in the development of the CFR is considered under paragraphs 59-74 of this introduction.

7. Legal science, research and education. However, the DCFR ought not to be regarded merely as a building block of a 'political' Common Frame of Reference. The DCFR will stand on its own and retain its significance whatever happens in relation to a CFR. The DCFR is an academic text. It sets out the results of a large European research project and invites evaluation from that perspective. The breadth of that scholarly endeavour will be apparent when the full edition is published. Independently of the fate of the CFR, it is hoped that the DCFR will promote knowledge of private law in the jurisdictions of the European Union. In particular it will help to show how much national private laws resemble one another and have provided mutual stimulus for development - and indeed how much those laws may be regarded as regional manifestations of an overall common European legacy. The function of the DCFR is thus separate from that of the CFR in that the former serves to sharpen awareness of the existence of a European private law and also (via the comparative notes that will appear in the full edition) to demonstrate the relatively small number of cases in which the different legal systems produce substantially different answers to common problems. The DCFR may furnish the notion of a European private law with a new foundation which increases mutual understanding and promotes collective deliberation on private law in Europe.

8. A possible source of inspiration. The drafters of the DCFR nurture the hope that it will be seen also outside the academic world as a text from which inspiration can be gained for suitable solutions for private law questions. Shortly after their publication the Principles of European Contract Law (PECL)[5], which the DCFR (in its second and third Books) incorporates in a partly revised form (see paragraphs 49-53), received the attention of many higher courts in Europe and of numerous official bodies charged with preparing the modernisation of the relevant national law of contract. This development is set to continue in the context of the DCFR. It will have repercussions for reform projects within the European Union, at both national and Community law levels, and beyond the EU. If the content of the DCFR is convincing, it may contribute to a harmonious and informal Europeanisation of private law.

Contents of the DCFR

9. Principles, definitions and model rules. The DCFR contains 'principles, definitions and model rules'. The title of this book thus follows the scheme set out in the European Commission's communications (referred to below in paragraph 59) and in our contract with the Commission. The notion of 'definitions' is reasonably clear. The notions of 'principles' and 'model rules', however, appear to overlap and require some explanation.

10. Meaning of 'principles'. The European Commission's communications concerning the CFR do not elaborate on the concept of 'principles'. The word is susceptible to different

---

[5] Ole Lando and Hugh Beale (eds.), Principles of European Contract Law Parts I and II. Prepared by the Commission on European Contract Law (The Hague 1999); Ole Lando, Eric Clive, André Prüm and Reinhard Zimmermann (eds.), Principles of European Contract Law Part III (The Hague, London and Boston 2003). Translations are available in French (Principes du droit européen du contract. Version française préparée par Georges Rouhette, avec le concours de Isabelle de Lamberterie, Denis Tallon et Claude Witz, Droit privé comparé et europeéen, vol. 2, Paris 2003); German (Grundregeln des Europäischen Vertragsrechts, Teile I und II, Kommission für Europäisches Vertragsrecht. Deutsche Ausgabe von Christian von Bar und Reinhard Zimmermann, München 2002; Grundregeln des Europäischen Vertragsrechts Teil III, Kommission für Europäisches Vertragsrecht. Deutsche Ausgabe von Christian von Bar und Reinhard Zimmermann, München 2005); Italian (Commissione per il Diritto Europeo dei Contratti. Principi di Diritto Europeo dei Contratti, Parte I & II, Edizione italiana a cura di Carlo Castronovo, Milano 2001; Commissione per il Diritto Europeo dei Contratti. Principi di Diritto Europeo dei Contratti, Parte III. Edizione italiana a cura di Carlo Castronovo, Milano 2005) and Spanish (Principios de Derecho Contractual Europeo, Partes I y II. Edición española a cargo de Pilar Barres Bennloch, José Miguel Embid Irujo, Fernando Martínes Sanz, Madrid 2003). Matthias Storme translated the articles of Parts I-III into Dutch (Tijdschrift voor privaatrecht 2005, 1181-1241); M.-A. Zachariasiewicz and J. Bełdowski translated the PECL articles of Parts I and II (Kwartalnik Prawa Prywatnego 3/2004, 814-881) and J. Bełdowski and A. Kozioł the articles of Part III (Kwartalnik Prawa Prywatnego 3/2006, 847-859) into the Polish language, Christian Takoff Parts I-III (Targovsko pravo 1/2005, 15-85) into the Bulgarian language.

interpretations. It is sometimes used, in the present context, as a synonym for rules which do not have the force of law. This is how it appears to be used, for example, in the 'Principles' of European Contract Law (PECL), which referred to themselves in article 1:101(1) as 'Principles … intended to be applied as general rules of contract law in the European Union' (italics added). The word appears to be used in a similar sense in the Unidroit Principles of International Commercial Contracts.[6] In this sense the DCFR can be said to consist of principles and definitions. It is essentially of the same nature as those other instruments in relation to which the word 'principles' has become familiar. Alternatively, the word 'principles' might be reserved for those rules which are of a more general nature, such as those on freedom of contract or good faith. In this sense the DCFR's model rules could be said to include principles. However, in the following paragraphs we explore a third meaning.

11. Fundamental principles. The word 'principles' surfaces occasionally in the Commission communications mentioned already, but with the prefix 'fundamental' attached. That suggests that it may have been meant to denote essentially abstract basic values. The model rules of course build on such fundamental principles in any event, whether they are stated or not. There can be no doubt about their importance. Private law is one of those fields of law which are, or at least should be, based on and guided by deep-rooted principles. To some extent such fundamental principles are a matter of interpretation and debate. It is clear that the DCFR does not perceive private law, and in particular contract law, as merely the balancing of private law relations between equally strong natural and legal persons. But different readers may have different interpretations of, and views on, the extent to which the DCFR suggests the correction of market failures or contains elements of 'social justice' and protection for weaker parties.

12. The approach taken to fundamental principles in the Interim Outline Edition. In the Introduction to the Interim Outline Edition we asked readers to consider whether it would be useful to include in the DCFR a separate part containing a statement of basic principles and values underlying the model rules. We suggested that this part could possibly be formulated as recitals, i.e. an introductory list of reasons for the essential substance of the following text, or in a discursive preface. To give some idea of what a statement of underlying principles might look like, primarily in relation to contract law, some possible fundamental principles were outlined.[7] The statement of principles in the Interim Outline Edition listed no fewer than fifteen items – justice; freedom; protection of human rights; economic welfare; solidarity and social responsibility; establishing an area of freedom, security and justice; promotion of the internal market; protection of consumers and others in need of protection; preservation of cultural and linguistic plurality; rationality; legal certainty; predictability; efficiency; protection of reasonable reliance; and the proper allocation of responsibility for the creation of risks.[8] These were not ranked in any order of priority. It was stressed that the principles would inevitably conflict with each other and that it was the function of the model rules to find an appropriate balance.[9] Feedback was mixed. Some commentators welcomed the express mention of non-mercantile values like human rights and solidarity and social responsibility. Others expressed doubts as to the practical value of such a large, diverse and non-prioritised list. There were powerful calls for full account to be taken of the work done on governing principles by the Association Henri Capitant and the Société de législation comparée[10] as part of the 'CoPECL Network of Excellence' working on the CFR project.[11] To that we now turn.

[6] Unidroit Principles of International Commercial Contracts 2004 (Rome 2004), Preamble (Purpose of the Principles) paragraph (1): "These Principles set forth general rules for international commercial contracts".

13. The approach taken by the Principes directeurs. The Association Henri Capitant and the Société de législation comparée[12] published their Principes directeurs du droit européen du contrat early in 2008. We will refer to these as the Principes directeurs to distinguish them from the principles we later discuss. The evaluative group charged with this project approached their task by distilling out the main principles underlying the Principles of European Contract Law, and comparing them with equivalent principles from a number of national systems and international and European instruments.[13] They identified three main principles – liberté contractuelle, sécurité contractuelle et loyauté contractuelle – contractual freedom, contractual security and contractual "loyalty" – each with sub-principles. The word "loyalty" is within quotation marks because it does not fully capture the French word loyauté in this context. The key elements are good faith, fairness and co-operation in the contractual relationship. Loyauté comprises a duty to act in conformity with the requirements of good

---

[7] See IOE Introduction at paragraphs 23-36.
[8] See IOE Introduction at paragraphs 22 and 35.
[9] IOE Introduction paragraph 23.
[10] See note 4 above.
[11] Joint Network on European Private Law (CoPECL: Common Principles of European Contract Law), Network of Excellence under the 6th EU Framework Programme for Research and Technological Development, Priority 7 – FP6-2002-CITIZENS-3, Contract N° 513351 (co-ordinator: Prof. Hans Schulte-Nölke, Osnabrück).
[12] The Principes form part of the book cited in note 4 above.
[13] The national systems used were mainly the Dutch, English, French, German, Italian and Spanish. The international instruments used (in addition to the PECL) were mainly the UN Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG), the Unidroit Principles on International Commercial Contracts (2004) and the draft European Code of Contract produced by the Academy of European Private Law based in Pavia.

faith and fair dealing, from the negotiation of the contract until all of its provisions have been given effect, a prohibition on using contractual rights and terms in a way which does not respect the objective that justified their inclusion in the contract and a duty to co-operate so far as necessary for the performance of the contractual obligations: it also requires a party not to act in contradiction of prior declarations or conduct on which the other party might have legitimately relied.[14] The principles and sub-principles were expressed in eleven draft Articles drafted in such a way as to be suitable for insertion in one block at the beginning of model rules. The approach adopted by the evaluative group is very attractive. The principles are expressed in an elegant, resonant and focussed way. They are backed up by persuasive analysis and discussion. However, we think that the approach, and to some extent the substance, has to be slightly different for the purposes of the DCFR. There are two reasons for this. First, the Principes directeurs relate only to contract law. For the purposes of the DCFR a statement of underlying principles has to be wide enough to cover also non-contractual obligations and aspects of property law. Secondly, it does not seem appropriate to incorporate the governing principles as a block of actual model rules at the beginning of the DCFR. They function at a different level. They are a distillation from the model rules and have a more descriptive function. They sometimes overlap and often conflict with each other. Almost all of the sub-principles, it is true, have direct counterparts in Articles of the DCFR but those Articles appear in, and are adapted to, particular contexts where they may be subject to qualifications and exceptions. It would weaken the DCFR to extract them and put them in one group at the beginning: it would clearly be undesirable to duplicate them. Moreover those Article are by no means the only ones which reflect and illustrate underlying principles. A discursive approach seems more appropriate for an introductory statement of principles of this type. This was the clear preference of the Compilation and Redaction Team and the Co-ordinating Committee of the Study Group when they discussed this matter in April and June 2008.

14. Lessons learned from the Principes directeurs. Nonetheless lessons can be learned from the Principes directeurs. The most important is that the many fundamental principles listed in the introduction to the Interim Outline Edition can be organised and presented in a more effective way. A small group of them (corresponding to some extent to those identified in the Principes directeurs) can be extracted and discussed at greater length. These are the principles which are all-pervasive within the DCFR. They can be detected by looking into the model rules. They are underlying principles. They furnished grounds for arguments about the merits of particular rules. The remaining principles mentioned in the introduction to the Interim Outline Edition are generally of a rather high political nature. They could be said to be overriding rather than underlying. Although some of them are strongly reflected in parts of the DCFR, they are primarily relevant to an assessment from the outside of the DCFR as a whole. Before commenting briefly on these two categories of principles we note only that another lesson to be learned from the Principes directeurs is that there are different ways of dealing with fundamental principles in an instrument like the DCFR. It will be for others to decide how if at all to deal with fundamental principles in an official CFR. One obvious technique would be to use recitals, but the form and content of these would depend on the form and content of the instrument. It would be premature to adopt that technique here.

[14] Op. cit fn 4 above at p. 198.

15. Underlying principles. For the broader purposes of the DCFR we suggest that the underlying principles should be grouped under the headings of freedom, security, justice and efficiency (rather than liberté contractuelle, sécurité contractuelle et loyauté contractuelle as in the Principes directeurs). This does not mean that the principle of contractual "loyalty" is lost. To a large extent it is covered by the wider principle of justice, without which many of the rules in the DCFR cannot be satisfactorily explained. To some extent it is simply an aspect of contractual security viewed from the standpoint of the other party.[15] One party's contractual security is increased by the fact that the other is expected to co-operate and act in accordance with the requirements of good faith and fair dealing. Nothing is more detrimental to contractual security than a contractual partner who does not do so: a cheating and untrustworthy partner, and even an unco-operative partner, may be worse than no partner at all. The heading of efficiency is added because, although this is often an aspect of freedom (freedom from unnecessary impediments and costs), it cannot always be accommodated under one of the other headings. These four principles of freedom, security, justice and efficiency are developed and illustrated at length in the section on underlying principles which immediately precedes the model rules.

16. Overriding principles. Into the category of "overriding principles" of a high political nature we would place the protection of human rights, the promotion of solidarity and social responsibility, the preservation of cultural and linguistic diversity, the protection and promotion of welfare and the promotion of the internal market. Freedom, security, justice and efficiency also have a role to play as overriding principles. They have a double role: the two categories overlap. So they are briefly mentioned here too as well as being discussed at greater length later.

[15] This overlap is recognised by the Principes directeurs themselves. See Article 0:201, alinea 2.

17. Protection of human rights. The DCFR itself recognises the overriding nature of this principle. One of the very first Articles provides that the model rules are to be read in the light of any applicable instruments guaranteeing human rights and fundamental freedoms.[16] However, this is an overriding principle which is also reflected quite strongly in the content of the model rules themselves, most notably in the rules on non-discrimination in Books II and III[17] and in many of the rules in Book VI on non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another.[18] These rules could also be seen, of course, as examples of rules which foster justice and preserve and promote security. Principles overlap as well as conflict.

18. Promotion of solidarity and social responsibility. The promotion of solidarity and social responsibility is generally regarded as primarily the function of public law (using, for example, criminal law, tax law and social welfare law) rather than private law. However, the promotion of solidarity and social responsibility is not absent from the private law rules in the DCFR. In the contractual context the word "solidarity" is often used to mean loyalty or security. It is of great importance to the DCFR. The principle of solidarity and social responsibility is also strongly reflected, for example, in the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs, which try to minimise disincentives to acting out of neighbourly solidarity.[19] It is also reflected in the rules on donation, which try to minimise disincentives to charitable giving (an expression of solidarity and social responsibility which was at one time all-important and is still extremely important).[20] Moreover some of the rules in Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another protect against types of behaviour which are harmful for society in general.[21] Many of these rules could also be regarded as examples of rules which promote security.

19. Preservation of cultural and linguistic diversity. Nothing could illustrate better the point that fundamental principles conflict than the juxtaposition of this item with the preceding one and the two following ones. In a pluralistic society like Europe it is manifest that the preservation of cultural and linguistic diversity is an all-important principle, vital to the very

[16] I.–1:102(2).
[17] See II.–2:101 to II.–2:105 and III.–1:105.
[18] See, in particular, VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss); VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy) and VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property and lawful possession).
[19] Book V.
[20] Book IV, Part H.
[21] VI.–2:209; see also VI-3:202, VI-3:206 and VI.–5:103.

existence of the Union. But where a particular aspect of human life has not only a cultural content but also a strong functional content, this principle may conflict with the principles of solidarity, the protection and promotion of welfare and the promotion of the internal market. Private law is a prime example. Within the rules of the DCFR itself there are some reflections of the principle of respect for cultural and linguistic diversity.[22] However, the impetus for the DCFR in its present form and for its present purposes came from, on the one hand, recognition of cultural and linguistic diversity and, on the other, concerns about the harmful effects for the internal market (and consequently for the welfare of European citizens and businesses) of an excessive diversity of contract law systems. The CFR project is not an attempt to create a single law of the whole of Europe. Rather, the purpose of the CFR as a legislator's guide or toolbox is to enable the meaning of European legislation to be clear to people from diverse legal backgrounds. Moreover, existing cultural diversity was respected by the participation on an equal footing of lawyers from all European legal cultures in the preparation of the DCFR and by the serious attempt to reflect, as far as possible, all legal systems of the EU Member States in the Notes. This resulted in unity out of diversity, at a soft-law level. Linguistic diversity will be respected by ensuring that the DCFR is translated as soon as possible into as many European languages as possible.

20. Protection and promotion of welfare. The Interim Outline Edition referred to "economic welfare" but there is no reason to confine this principle to only one aspect of welfare. This principle embraces all or almost all the others. The whole purpose and raison d'être of the DCFR could be said to derive from this principle. If it does not help to promote the welfare of the citizens and businesses of Europe – however indirectly, however slowly, however slightly – it will have failed. Although all-embracing, this principle is too general to be useful on its own.

21. Promotion of the internal market. This principle is really a sub-head of the last. The most obvious way in which the welfare of the citizens and businesses of Europe can be promoted by the DCFR is by the promotion of the smooth functioning of the internal market. Whether this is just by improving the quality, and hence the accessibility and usability, of present and future EU legislation or whether it is by the development of one or more optional instruments are political decisions.

[22] See e.g. II.–1:104(2) (potential applicability of local usages); II.–3:102(2)(c) and (3) (language used for communication when business is marketing to consumers); II.–9:109 (language to be used for communications relating to the contract); IV.A.–6:103(1)(e) (language for consumer guarantee document); IX.–3:310(1)(d) (language to be used for declaration to proposed European register of proprietary security); IX.–3:319(2) (language to be used for request to secured creditor for information about entry in register) and IX.–7:210(3) (language to be used for a type of notice by secured creditor).

22. Freedom, security, justice and efficiency. As underlying principles within the DCFR, these will be discussed and developed later. They also have a role to play as overriding principles for the purposes of assessment from the outside. The DCFR as a whole falls to be assessed very largely by the criterion of how well it embodies and balances these principles. At the level of overriding political principles, reference may also be made to the EU specific aims of establishing an area of freedom, security and justice and promoting the free movement of goods, persons, services and capital between the Member States. If the political will were there, the DCFR could make a contribution to the achievement of these aims.

23. Definitions. 'Definitions' have the function of suggestions for the development of a uniform European legal terminology. Some particularly important concepts are defined for these purposes at the outset in Book I. For other defined terms DCFR I.–1:108 provides that 'The definitions in the Annex apply for all the purposes of these rules unless the context otherwise requires.' This expressly incorporates the list of terminology in the Annex as part of the DCFR. This drafting technique, by which the definitions are set out in an appendage to the main text, was chosen in order to keep the first chapter short and to enable the list of terminology to be extended at any time without great editorial labour. The substance is partly distilled from the acquis, but predominantly derived from the model rules of the DCFR. If the definitions are essential for the model rules, it is also true that the model rules are essential for the definitions. There would be little value in a set of definitions which was internally incoherent. The definitions can be seen as components which can be used in the making of rules and sets of rules, but there is no point in having components which are incompatible with each other and cannot fit together. In contrast to a dictionary of terms assembled from disparate sources, the definitions in the Annex have been tested in the model rules and revised and refined as the model rules have developed. Ultimately, useful definitions cannot be composed without model rules and useful model rules can hardly be drafted without definitions.

24. Model rules. The greatest part of the DCFR consists of 'model rules'. The adjective 'model' indicates that the rules are not put forward as having any normative force but are soft law rules of the kind contained in the Principles of European Contract Law and similar publications. Whether particular rules might be used as a model for legislation, for example, for the improvement of the internal coherence of the acquis communautaire is for others to decide.

25. Comments and notes. In the full edition the model rules will be supplemented by comments and notes. The comments will elucidate each rule, will often illustrate its application by means of examples, and will outline the critical policy considerations at stake. The notes will reflect the legal position in the national legal systems and, where relevant, the current Community law. International instruments such as the UN Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG) and the Unidroit Principles of International Commercial Contracts 2004 are also mentioned where appropriate. How the notes were assembled is described in the section on the academic contributors and our funders.

Revision of the interim outline edition

26. Overview. This final edition of the DCFR deviates in a number of respects from the Interim Outline Edition of 2008. We referred earlier to the new Books that are included and to the statement of principles which underlie the model rules, now placed in a separate section between this introduction and the model rules. Here we mention some of the more detailed changes to the Articles published in the Interim Outline Edition. One general change has been the elimination of a number of redundant provisions. Another general change has been the expansion of the expression "goods and services" in a number of acquis-based provisions to include assets other than "goods" in the narrow sense of corporeal movables in which the word is defined in the DCFR. Finally, the catalogue of definitions has been revised and added to, with material which was misplaced there either expunged or, on occasion, upgraded to the model rules. Here we have frequently taken up points made in public discussion of the text. Although it would be excessive to give details of every drafting or editing change made since the publication of the Interim Outline Edition, a few of the more significant changes will now be mentioned.

27. Book I. The main changes here are the inclusion of some provisions taken from elsewhere in the Interim Outline Edition. Of particular note is I.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing). Paragraph (1) is a more developed version of a definition which formerly appeared only in the Annex of definitions. It is included here because of its importance. Paragraph (2), on inconsistent actings, has been inserted following a recommendation by the evaluative group formed by the Association Henri Capitant and the Société de Législation Comparée. The text of the former Annex 2 (Computation of time) has been integrated into Book I: see I.–1:110.

28. Book II. The definition of "contract" in II.–1:101(1) has been shortened. It now refers to "an agreement which is intended to give rise to a binding legal relationship or to have some other legal effect." The definition formerly contained additional words designed to cater for the case where there was no subjective intention but an agreement was carved out of what the parties said or did. However, that point is sufficiently provided for by a later Article (II.–4:102) and does not need to be repeated here. There is a similar change in the definition of "juridical act" in II.–1:101(2). The earlier definition had been criticised by commentators on the ground that it did not make the element of intention necessary and was therefore too wide. Again, the point that intention may have to be objectively ascertained is sufficiently covered by a later Article (II.–4:302). A reference to the rules on good faith and fair dealing in II.–1:102 (Party autonomy) gave rise to confusion and has been deleted. The words "promise or undertaking" formerly in II.–1:103 (Binding effect) were criticised as unnecessary duplication. "Undertaking" alone is now used. A new paragraph (3) has been added to II.–1:106 (Form). This generalises a rule which originally appeared in the Chapter on donation. There are numerous changes in Chapter 3 in particular with regard to information duties, which reflect further work done by the Acquis Group and also react to many comments received. Of particular note is the provision on specific duties for businesses marketing to consumers (II.–3:102), where paragraph (1) has been reformulated in order to reflect the underlying acquis more closely. The provisions on sanctions for breach of information duties have been refined and a new Article (II.–3:501) on liability for damages for breach of a duty imposed by Chapter 3 has been included. The contra proferentem rule in II.–8:103 has been modified and expanded, following a suggestion by the evaluative group formed by the Association Henri Capitant and the Société de Législation Comparée.

29. Book III. A new generalised provision on tacit prolongation (III.–1:111) has been inserted, again following a suggestion by the evaluative group formed by the Association Henri Capitant and the Société de Législation Comparée. A new paragraph (3) has been inserted in III.–2:102 (Time of performance) on the recommendation of the Acquis Group and a new Article has been inserted (III.–3:205) to make it clear that when a supplier replaces a defective item the supplier has a right and an obligation to take back the replaced item. Some minor adjustments have been made to the rules on the effects of termination for non-performance of contractual obligations (Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 3). New rules on interest in commercial contracts have been inserted on the recommendation of the Acquis Group (III.–3:710 and III.–3:711). In Chapter 5 the rule on the requirements for an assignment (III.–5:104) has been modified to bring it into line with the equivalent rule in the Book on the transfer of ownership of corporeal movables and, for the same reason, a new Article has been added on the effects on an assignment of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation (III.–5:118). The rule on the effect of a contractual prohibition of assignment (III.–5:108) has been firmed up and part of it removed and generalised in a new rule on competition between an assignee and an assignor receiving the proceeds of performance (III.–5:122). Chapter 5 has been expanded by the inclusion of Articles on the substitution or addition of a new debtor in such a way that the original debtor is not discharged (Chapter 5, Section 2). A new Article has been added to enable a principal to take over the rights of an agent against a third party if the agent becomes insolvent (III.–5:401) and to give the third party, in such a case, an option to hold the principal liable for the agent's obligations under the contract ((III.–5:402). These rules will be particularly relevant in cases of so-called indirect representation where the agent contracts in the agent's own name. As a consequence of some of these changes Chapter 5 has been renamed "Change of parties". The Article on the requirements for set-off (III.–6:102) has been redrafted after it was drawn to our attention that there was a difference in substance between the English and French texts in PECL, and it has been expanded to make it clear that the rights being set off against each other must both be available for that purpose, and not for example frozen on the application of an arresting creditor. And, finally, two of the Articles on prescription (III.–7:302 and III.–7:303) have been slightly expanded partly to take account of developments in relation to mediation.

30. Book IV. The main change in Book IV has been the elimination of redundant or overlapping provisions, including some provisions which repeated the substance of rules already found in Books II or III. The presence of these redundant provisions had been rightly criticised by commentators on the Interim Outline Edition. Most of these provisions had a proper role to play in the self-standing PEL Books in order to complete the picture but are unnecessary in the DCFR. In a few cases, new or revised rules in earlier Books (e.g. on tacit prolongation and interpretation against the dominant party) enabled provisions in Book IV which were formerly necessary to be now deleted. A slight adjustment has been made in IV.A.–2:305 (Third party rights or claims in general) in order to bring the text into line with the agreed policy as expressed in the comments. Several changes have been made in the Chapter on mandate. These were made partly to make it more clear that the chapter applies not only to contracts for the conclusion of a contract for the principal but also to contracts, for example with estate agents or brokers of various kinds, for the negotiation or facilitation of a contract to be concluded by the principal and, given that scope, partly in the interests of more precise terminology. For example, an estate agent with authority to negotiate but not conclude a contract for the principal is more accurately described as an "agent" than as a "representative", which was the word used in the Interim Outline Edition.

31. Books V-VII. Only minor drafting changes have been made in these Books.

32. Books VIII-X. Books VIII, IX and X were prepared in the same manner as the other books of the DCFR on the basis of deliberation in working teams, advisory councils and plenary meetings. However, for reasons primarily of time, the Compilation and Redaction Team was not able to give these books the same complete scrutiny as it was able to bestow on the others.

33. Definitions. Some helpful comments were received on the Annex of definitions. As a result, some definitions which had been inserted primarily as drafting aids rather than to elucidate the meaning of a term or concept have been deleted. This has sometimes meant using a few more words than before in some Articles. A few definitions have been changed in the interests of greater clarity or precision. A few terms which were defined only in the Annex in the Interim Outline Edition have now, because of their importance, been moved to the text of the model rules. The list of definitions still contains definitions taken from, or derived from, the model rules as well as some definitions which, because of their generality, do not have a natural home in any one model rule. This makes for a mixed list but the purpose is simply the convenience of the reader. Where a definition is taken or derived from an Article in the model rules a cross-reference to that Article has been added. Again this responds to a useful suggestion made by commentators.

The coverage of the DCFR

34. Wider coverage than PECL. The coverage of the PECL was already quite wide. They had rules not only on the formation, validity, interpretation and contents of contracts and, by analogy, other juridical acts, but also on the performance of obligations resulting from them and on the remedies for non-performance of such obligations. Indeed the later Chapters had many rules applying to private law rights and obligations in general – for example, rules on a plurality of parties, on the assignment of rights to performance, on set-off and on prescription. To this extent the Principles went well beyond the law on contracts as such. The DCFR continues this coverage but it goes further.

35. Specific contracts. The DCFR also covers (in Book IV) a series of model rules on so-called 'specific contracts' and the rights and obligations arising from them. For their field of application these latter rules expand and make more specific the general provisions (in Books I-III), deviate from them where the context so requires, or address matters not covered by them.

36. Non-contractual obligations. The DCFR also covers other private law rights and obligations within its scope even if they do not arise from a contract. It covers, for example, those arising as the result of an unjustified enrichment, of damage caused to another and of benevolent intervention in another´s affairs. It also covers obligations which a person might have, for example, by virtue of being in possession of assets subject to proprietary security or by virtue of being a trustee. It thus embraces non-contractual obligations to a far greater extent than the PECL. It is noted below (paragraphs 44-46) that Book III contains some general rules which are applicable to all obligation within the scope of the DCFR, whether contractual or not. The advantage of this approach is that the rules in Book III can be taken for granted, or slightly modified where appropriate, in the later Books on non-contractual matters. The alternative would be an unacceptable amount of unnecessary repetition.

37. Matters of movable property law. The DCFR also covers some matters of movable property law, namely acquisition and loss of ownership, proprietary security, and trust law. They form the content of Books VIII, IX and X and are published here for the first time.

38. Matters excluded. DCFR I.–1:101(2) lists all matters which are excluded from its intended field of application. These are in particular: the status or legal capacity of natural persons, wills and succession, family relationships, negotiable instruments, employment relationships, immovable property law, company law, and the law of civil procedure and enforcement of claims.

39. Reasons for the approach adopted. The coverage of the DCFR is thus considerably broader than what the European Commission seems to have in mind for the coverage of the CFR (see paragraph 59 below). The ‘academic’ frame of reference is not subject to the constraints of the ‘political’ frame of reference. While the DCFR is linked to the CFR, it is conceived as an independent text. The research teams began in the tradition of the Commission on European Contract Law but with the aim of extending its coverage. When this work started there were no political discussions underway on the creation of a CFR of any kind, neither for contract law nor for any other part of the law. Our contract with the Research Directorate-General to receive funding under the sixth European Framework Programme on Research reflects this; it obliges us to address all the matters listed above. The relatively broad coverage of the DCFR may be seen as advantageous also from a political perspective. Only a comprehensive DCFR creates a concrete basis for the discussion of the coverage of the political CFR and thereby allows for an informed decision of the responsible political institutions.

40. Contract law as part of private law. There are good reasons for including more than rules on general contract law in the DCFR. These general rules need to be tested to see whether or in what respect they have to be adjusted, amended and revised within the framework of the most important of the specific contracts. Nor can the DCFR contain only rules dealing with consumer contracts. The two Groups concur in the view that consumer law is not a self-standing area of private law. It consists of some deviations from the general principles of private law, but it is built on them and cannot be developed without them. And 'private law' for this purpose is not confined to the law on contract and contractual obligations. The correct dividing line between contract law (in this wide sense) and some other areas of law is in any event difficult to determine precisely.[23] The DCFR therefore approaches the whole of the law of obligations as an organic entity or unit. Some areas of property law with regard to movable property are dealt with for more or less identical reasons and because some aspects of property law are of great relevance to the good functioning of the internal market.

Structure and language of the DCFR model rules

41. Structure of the model rules. The structure of the model rules was discussed on many occasions by the Study Group and the joint Compilation and Redaction Team. It was accepted from an early stage that the whole text would be divided into Books and that each Book would be subdivided into Chapters, Sections, Sub-sections (where appropriate) and Articles. In addition the Book on specific contracts and the rights and obligations arising from them was to be divided, because of its size, into Parts, each dealing with a particular type of contract (e.g. Book IV.A: Sale). All of this was relatively uncontroversial.

42. Mode of numbering the model rules. The mode of numbering the model rules corresponds in its basic approach to the technique used in many of the newer European codifications. This too was chosen in order to enable necessary changes to be made later without more than minor editorial labour. Books are numbered by capitalised Roman numerals, i. e., Book I (General provisions), Book II (Contracts and other juridical acts), etc.

[23] See, in more detail, von Bar and Drobnig (eds.), The Interaction of Contract Law and Tort and Property Law in Europe (Munich 2004). This study was conducted on behalf of the European Commission.

Only one Book (Book IV (Specific contracts and rights and obligations arising from them)) is divided into Parts: Part A (Sale), Part B (Lease of goods), etc. Chapters, sections (and also sub-sections) are numbered using Arabic numerals, e.g. chapter 5, section 2, sub-section 4, etc. Articles are then numbered sequentially within each Book (or Part) using Arabic numerals. The first Arabic digit, preceding the colon, is the number of the relevant chapter. The digit immediately following the colon is the number of the relevant section of that chapter. The remaining digits give the number of the Article within the section; sub-sections do not affect the numbering. For example, III.–3:509 (Effect on obligations under the contract) is the ninth Article in section 5 (Termination) of the third chapter (Remedies for non-performance) of the third book (Obligations and corresponding rights). It was not possible, however, to devise a numbering system that would indicate every subdivision of the text without the system becoming too complicated to be workable. One cannot see from the numbering that III.–3:509 is the first Article within sub-section 3 (Effects of termination).

43. Ten books. To a large extent the allocation of the subject matter to the different Books was also uncontroversial. It was readily agreed that Book I should be a short and general guide for the reader on how to use the whole text – dealing, for example, with its intended scope of application, how it should be interpreted and developed and where to find definitions of key terms. The later Books, from Book IV on, also gave rise to little difficulty so far as structure was concerned. There was discussion about the best order, but eventually it was settled that this would be Specific contracts and rights and obligations arising from them (Book IV); Benevolent intervention in another´s affairs (Book V); Non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another (Book VI); Unjustified enrichment (Book VII); Acquisition and loss of ownership in movables (Book VIII); Proprietary security rights in movable assets (Book IX) and Trust (Book X). An important argument for putting the rules on specific contracts and their obligational effects in a Book of their own (subdivided into Parts) rather than in separate Books is that it would be easier in the future to add new Parts dealing with other specific contracts without affecting the numbering of later Books and their contents.

44 Books II and III. The difficult decisions concerned Books II and III. There was never much doubt that these Books should cover the material in the existing Principles of European Contract Law (PECL, see paragraph 8 above and paragraphs 49-53 below) – general rules on contracts and other juridical acts, and general rules on contractual and (in most cases) other obligations – but there was considerable difficulty in deciding how this material should be divided up between and within them, and what they should be called. It was only after decisions were taken by the Co-ordinating Group on how the key terms ‘contract’ and ‘obligation’ would be used in the model rules, and after a special Structure Group was set up, that the way forward became clear. Book II would deal with contracts and other juridical acts (how they are formed, how they are interpreted, when they are invalid, how their content is determined and so on) while Book III would deal with obligations within the scope of the DCFR – both contractual and non-contractual – and corresponding rights.

45. Contracts and obligations. A feature of this division of material is a clear distinction between a contract seen as a type of agreement – a type of juridical act – and the legal relationship, usually involving reciprocal sets of obligations and rights, which results from it. Book II deals with contracts as juridical acts; Book III deals with the obligations and rights resulting from contracts seen as juridical acts, as well as with non-contractual obligations and rights. To this extent a structural division which in the PECL was only implicit is made explicit in the DCFR. Some commentators on the Interim Outline Edition called for a simpler structure more like that of the PECL, one which, at least in relation to contracts and contractual obligations, would follow a natural “chronological” order. However, it has to be noted that the DCFR does in fact follow such an order. It begins with the pre-contractual stage and then proceeds to formation, right of withdrawal, representation (i.e. how a contract can be concluded for a principal by a representative), grounds of invalidity, interpretation, contents and effects, performance, remedies for non-performance, plurality of debtors and creditors, change of parties, set-off and merger, and prescription. This is essentially the same order as is followed in the PECL. The only difference is that the DCFR inserts a break at the point where the rules cease to talk about contracts as agreements (formation, interpretation, invalidity, contents and effects etc.) and start to talk about the rights and obligations arising from them. At this point a new Book is begun and a new Chapter on obligations and corresponding rights in general is inserted. It is not an enormous change. It hardly affects the order or content of the model rules. And it is justified not only because there is a difference between a contract and the rights and obligations arising out of it, and it is an aid to clarity of thought to recognise this, but also because it is useful to have the opening Chapter of Book III as a home for some Articles which are otherwise difficult to place, such as those on conditional and time-limited rights and obligations. To eliminate the break between Books II and III would be a regrettable step backwards for which it is difficult to see any justification.

46. Contractual and non-contractual obligations. A further problem was how best to deal with contractual and non-contractual obligations within Book III. One technique which was tried was to deal first with contractual obligations and then to have a separate part on non-contractual obligations. However, this proved cumbersome and unsatisfactory. It involved either unnecessary repetition or extensive and detailed cross-references to earlier Articles. Either way the text was unattractive and heavy for the reader to use. In the end it was found that the best technique was to frame the Articles in Book III so far as possible in general terms so that they could apply to both contractual and non-contractual obligations. Where a particular Article applied only to contractual obligations this could be clearly stated, see III.–1:101 ("This Book applies, except as otherwise provided, to all obligations within the scope of these rules, whether they are contractual or not…"). For example, the rules on termination can only apply to contractual obligations (see III.–3:501(1) (Scope and definition)); the same is true for III.–3:601 (Right to reduce price) (the restriction on the scope of application follows from the word "price") and III.–3:203 (When creditor need not allow debtor an opportunity to cure) paragraph (a), the wording of which limits its application to contractual obligations. It need hardly be added that if a CFR were to be confined to contracts and contractual obligations it would be a very easy matter to use the model rules in Book III for that purpose. Most of them would need no alteration.

47. Language. The DCFR is being published first in English. This has been the working language for all the Groups responsible for formulating the model rules. However, for a substantial portion of the Books (or, in the case of Book IV, its Parts), teams have already composed a large number of translations into other languages. These will be published successively, first in the PEL series (see paragraphs 54-56 below) and later separately for the DCFR. In the course of these translations the English formulation of the model rules has often itself been revised. In autumn 2008 the Fondation pour le droit continental (Paris) published a translation of the first three Books of the DCFR (in the version of the interim outline edition).[24] A Czech translation of the interim outline addition appeared shortly afterwards.[25] The research teams are intent on publishing the model rules of the DCFR as quickly and in as many languages as is possible. However, the English version is the only version of the DCFR which has been discussed and adopted by the responsible bodies of the participating groups and by the Compilation and Redaction Team.

48. Accessibility and intelligibility. In the preparation of the DCFR every attempt was made to achieve not only a clear and coherent structure, but also a plain and clear wording. Whether the model rules and definitions are seen as a tool for better lawmaking or as the possible basis for one or more optional instruments it is important that they should be fit for their purpose. The terminology should be precise and should be used consistently. The word "contract" for example should be used in one sense, not three or more. The terminology should be as suitable as possible for use across a large number of translations. It should therefore try to avoid legalese and technicalities drawn from any one legal system. An attempt has been made to find, wherever possible, descriptive language which can be readily translated without carrying unwanted baggage with it. It is for this reason that words like "rescission", "tort" and "delict" have been avoided. The concepts used should be capable of fitting together coherently in model rules, whatever the content of those model rules. The text should be well-organised, accessible and readable. Being designed for the Europe of the 21st century, it should be expressed in gender neutral terms. It should be as simple as is consistent with the need to convey accurately the intended meaning. It should not contain irrational, redundant, or conflicting provisions. Whether the DCFR achieves these aims is for others to judge. Certainly, considerable efforts were made to try to achieve them.

[24] By Professor Jacques Ghestin, see fn. 3 above.
[25] By a team led by Professor Přemysl Raban, published in Karlovarská Právní Revuei 2/2008, 1-222.

How the DCFR relates to PECL, the SGECC PEL series, the Acquis and the Insurance Contract Group series

49. Based in part on the PECL. In Books II and III the DCFR contains many rules derived from the Principles of European Contract Law (PECL). These rules have been adopted with the express agreement of the Commission on European Contract Law, whose successor group is the Study Group. Tables of derivations and destinations will help the reader to trace PECL articles within the DCFR. However, the PECL could not simply be incorporated as they stood. Deviations were unavoidable in part due to the different purpose, structure and coverage of the DCFR and in part because the scope of the PECL needed to be broadened so as to embrace matters of consumer protection.

50. Deviations from PECL. A primary purpose of the DCFR is to try to develop clear and consistent concepts and terminology. In pursuit of this aim the Study Group gave much consideration to the most appropriate way of using terms like 'contract' and 'obligation', taking into account not only national systems, but also prevailing usage in European and international instruments dealing with private law topics. One reason for many of the drafting changes from the PECL is the clearer distinction now drawn (as noted above) between a contract (seen as a type of agreement or juridical act) and the relationship (usually consisting of reciprocal rights and obligations) to which it gives rise. This has a number of consequences throughout the text.

51. Examples. For example, under the DCFR it is not the contract which is performed. A contract is concluded; obligations are performed. Similarly, a contract is not terminated. It is the contractual relationship, or particular rights and obligations arising from it, which will be terminated. The new focus on rights and obligations in Book III also made possible the consistent use of 'creditor' and 'debtor' rather than terms like 'aggrieved party' and 'other party', which were commonly used in the PECL. The decision to use 'obligation' consistently as the counterpart of a right to performance also meant some drafting changes. The PECL sometimes used 'duty' in this sense and sometimes 'obligation'. The need for clear concepts and terminology also meant more frequent references than in the PECL to juridical acts other than contracts. A juridical act is defined in II.–1:101 as a statement or agreement which is intended to have legal effect as such. All legal systems have to deal with various types of juridical act other than contracts, but not all use such a term and not all have generalised rules. Examples of such juridical acts might be offers, acceptances, notices of termination, authorisations, guarantees, acts of assignment, unilateral promises and so on. The PECL dealt with these by an article (1:107) which applied the Principles to them 'with appropriate modifications'. However, this technique is a short-cut which should only be used with great care and only when the appropriate modifications will be slight and fairly obvious. In this instance what modifications would be appropriate was not always apparent. It was therefore decided, as far back as 2004, to deal separately with other juridical acts. Some commentators on the Interim Outline Edition have ascribed a significance to this modest functional decision which it certainly did not have in the eyes of the drafters.

52. Input from stakeholders. Other changes in PECL articles resulted from the input from stakeholders to the workshops held by the European Commission on selected topics. For example, the rules on representation were changed in several significant respects for this reason, as were the rules on pre-contractual statements forming part of a contract, the rules on variation by a court of contractual rights and obligations on a change of circumstances and the rules on so-called 'implied terms' of a contract. Sometimes even the process of preparing for stakeholder meetings which did not, in the end, take place led to proposals for changes in PECL which were eventually adopted. This was the case, for example, with the chapter on plurality of debtors and creditors, where academic criticism on one or two specific points also played a role.

53. Developments since the publication of the PECL. Finally, there were some specific articles or groups of articles from the PECL which, in the light of recent developments or further work and thought, seemed to merit improvement. For example, the PECL rules on stipulations in favour of third parties, although a considerable achievement at the time, seemed in need of some expansion in the light of recent developments in national systems and international instruments. The detailed work which was done on the specific contracts in Book IV, and the rights and obligations resulting from them, sometimes suggested a need for some additions to, and changes in, the general rules in Books II and III. For example, it was found that it would be advantageous to have a general rule on 'mixed contracts' in Book II and a general rule on notifications of non-conformities in Book III. It was also found that the rules on 'cure' by a seller which were developed in the Part of Book IV on sale could usefully be generalised and placed in Book III. The work done on other later Books also sometimes fed back into Books II and III. For example, the work done on unjustified enrichment showed that rather more developed rules were needed on the restitutionary effects of terminated contractual relationships, while the work on the acquisition and loss of ownership in movables (and also on proprietary security rights in movable assets) fed back into the treatment of assignment in Book III. Although the general approach was to follow the PECL as much as possible there were, inevitably, a number of cases where it was found that small drafting changes could increase clarity or consistency. For example, the PECL sometimes used the word "claim" in the sense of a demand based on the assertion of a right and sometimes in the sense of a right to performance. The DCFR uses "claim" only in the first sense and uses a "right to performance" where this is what is meant. Again, the PECL referred sometimes to contract "terms" and sometimes to contract "clauses". The DCFR prefers "terms", which has the advantage of applying with equal facility to written and non-written contracts.

54. The PEL series. The Study Group began its work in 1998. From the outset it was envisaged that at the appropriate time its results would be presented in an integrated complete edition, but it was only gradually that its structure took shape (see paragraphs 41-46 above). As a first step the tasks in the component parts of the project had to be organised and deliberated. The results are being published in a separate series, the 'Principles of European Law' (PEL). To date six volumes have appeared. They cover sales,[26] leases,[27] services,[28] commercial agency, franchise and distribution,[29] personal security contracts,[30] and benevolent interventions in another´s affairs.[31] Further books will follow (in 2009 and 2010) on the law regarding non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another, on unjustified enrichment law, on mandate contracts and contracts of donation, and all the subjects related to property law. The volumes published within the PEL series contain additional material which will not be reproduced in the full DCFR, namely the comparative introductions to the various Books, Parts and Chapters and the translations of the model rules published within the PEL series. The continuation of the PEL series will also enable the publication of the full edition of the DCFR independently of whether all gaps in the compilation and editing of the comparative legal material can actually be filled in time.

[26] Principles of European Law. Study Group on a European Civil Code. Sales (PEL S). Prepared by Ewoud Hondius, Viola Heutger, Christoph Jeloschek, Hanna Sivesand, Aneta Wiewiorowska (Sellier, Bruylant, Staempfli, Oxford University Press 2008).

[27] Principles of European Law. Study Group on a European Civil Code. Lease of Goods (PEL LG). Prepared by Kåre Lilleholt, Anders Victorin†, Andreas Fötschl, Berte-Elen R. Konow, Andreas Meidell, Amund Bjøranger Tørum (Sellier, Bruylant, Staempfli, Oxford University Press 2007).

[28] Principles of European Law. Study Group on a European Civil Code. Service Contracts (PEL SC). Prepared by Maurits Barendrecht, Chris Jansen, Marco Loos, Andrea Pinna, Rui Cascão, Stéphanie van Gulijk (Sellier, Bruylant, Staempfli, Oxford University Press 2006).

55. Deviations from the PEL series. In some cases, however, the model rules which the reader encounters in this DCFR deviate from their equivalent published in the PEL series. There are several reasons for such changes. First, in drafting a self-standing set of model rules for a given subject (such as e. g. service contracts) it proved necessary to have much more repetition of rules which were already part of the PECL. Such repetitions became superfluous in an integrated DCFR text which states these rules at a more general level (i.e. in Books II and III). The DCFR is therefore considerably shorter than it would have been had all PEL model rules been included as they stood.

56. Improvements. The second reason for changing some already published PEL model rules is that, at the stage of revising and editing for DCFR purposes, the Compilation and Redaction Team saw room for some improvements. After consulting the authors of the relevant PEL book, the CRT submitted the redrafted rules to the Study Group´s Co-ordinating Committee for approval, amendment or rejection. Resulting changes are in part limited to mere drafting, but occasionally go to substance. They are a consequence of the systematic revision of the model rules which commenced in 2006, the integration of ideas from others (including stakeholders) and the compilation of the list of terminology, which revealed some inconsistencies in the earlier texts. The DCFR in turn, in its full and final edition, reflects yet further refinements as compared with the interim outline edition.

---

[29] Principles of European Law. Study Group on a European Civil Code. Commercial Agency, Franchise and Distribution Contracts (PEL CAFDC). Prepared by Martijn W. Hesselink, Jacobien W. Rutgers, Odavia Bueno Díaz, Manola Scotton, Muriel Veldmann (Sellier, Bruylant, Staempfli, Oxford University Press 2006).

[30] Principles of European Law. Study Group on a European Civil Code. Personal Security (PEL Pers.Sec.). Prepared by Ulrich Drobnig (Sellier, Bruylant, Staempfli, Oxford University Press 2007).

[31] Principles of European Law. Study Group on a European Civil Code. Benevolent Intervention in Another´s Affairs (PEL Ben.Int.). Prepared by Christian von Bar (Sellier, Bruylant, Staempfli, Oxford University Press 2006).

57. The Acquis Principles (ACQP). The Research Group on the Existing EC Private Law, commonly called the Acquis Group, is also publishing its findings in a separate series.[32] The Acquis Principles are an attempt to present and structure the bulky and rather incoherent patchwork of EC private law in a way that should allow the current state of its development to be made clear and relevant legislation and case law to be found easily. This also permits identification of shared features, contradictions and gaps in the acquis. Thus, the ACQP may have a function for themselves, namely as a source for the drafting, transposition and interpretation of EC law. Within the process of elaborating the DCFR, the Acquis Group and its output contribute to the task of ensuring that the existing EC law is appropriately reflected. The ACQP are consequently one of the sources from which the Compilation and Redaction Team has drawn.

58. Principles of European Insurance Contract Law. The CoPECL network of researchers established under the sixth framework programme for research (see below: academic contributors and funders) also includes the 'Project Group Restatement of European Insurance Contract Law (Insurance Group)'. That body is expected to deliver its 'Principles of European Insurance Contract Law' to the European Commission contemporaneously with our submission of the DCFR.

How the DCFR may be used as preparatory work for the CFR

59. Announcements by the Commission. The European Commission´s 'Action Plan on A More Coherent European Contract Law' of January 2003[33] called for comments on three proposed measures: increasing the coherence of the acquis communautaire, the promotion of the elaboration of EU-wide standard contract terms,[34] and further examination of whether there is a need for a measure that is not limited to particular sectors, such as an 'optional instrument.' Its principal proposal for improvement was to develop a Common Frame of Reference (CFR) which could then be used by the Commission in reviewing the existing acquis and drafting new legislation.[35] In October 2004 the Commission published a further [32] Principles of the Existing EC Contract Law (Acquis Principles). Volume Contract I – Pre-Contractual Obligations, Conclusion of Contract, Unfair Terms. Prepared by the Research Group on the Existing EC Private Law (Acquis Group) (Munich 2007); in print: Volume Contract II (Munich 2009), which includes general provisions, delivery of goods, package travel and payment services; further volumes on specific contracts and extra-contractual matters in preparation.

[33] See fn. 1 above.
[34] This aspect of the plan is not being taken forward. See Commission of the European Communities. First Progress Report on The Common Frame of Reference, COM (2005), 456 final, p. 10.
[35] Action Plan para. 72.

paper, 'European Contract Law and the revision of the acquis: the way forward'.[36] This proposed that the CFR should provide 'fundamental principles, definitions and model rules' which could assist in the improvement of the existing acquis communautaire, and which might form the basis of an optional instrument if it were decided to create one. Model rules would form the bulk of the CFR,[37] its main purpose being to serve as a kind of legislators´ guide or 'tool box'. This DCFR responds to these announcements by the Commission and contains proposals for the principles, definitions and model rules mentioned in them.

60. Purposes of the CFR. It remains to be seen what purposes the CFR may be called upon to serve. Some indication may be obtained from the expression 'principles, definitions and model rules' itself. Other indications can be obtained from the Commission´s papers on this subject. These, and their implications for the coverage of the DCFR, will now be explored.

61. Green Paper on the Review of the Consumer Acquis. The 'Way Forward' communication had announced that parallel to the preparation of the DCFR a review of eight consumer Directives[38] would be carried out. Members of the Acquis Group were involved in this review.[39] In 2007 the European Commission published a Green Paper on the review of the consumer acquis.[40] It asked questions at a number of different levels: for example, whether full harmonisation is desirable,[41] whether there should be a horizontal instrument,[42] (as to which see paragraph 62 below) and whether various additional matters should be dealt with by the Consumer Sales Directive.[43] It is possible that other Directives will also be revised, for example those relating to the provision of information to buyers of financial services. In the longer term, there may be proposals for further harmonisation measures in sectors where there still appears to be a need for consumer protection (e.g. contracts for services and for personal security) or where the differences between the laws of the Member States appear to cause difficulties for the internal market (e.g. insurance and security over movable property).

---

[36] Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council, COM (2004) 651 final, 11 October 2004 (referred to as Way Forward).
[37] Way Forward para. 3.1.3, p. 11.
[38] Directives 85/577, 90/314, 93/13, 94/47, 97/7, 98/6; 98/27, 99/44. See Way Forward para. 2. 1. 1.
[39] See Schulte-Nölke/Twigg-Flesner/Ebers (eds), EC Consumer Law Compendium. The Consumer Acquis and its transposition in the Member States (Munich 2008).
[40] Green Paper on the Review of the Consumer Acquis, COM(2006) 744 final of 8 February 2007 (http://ec.europa.eu/consumers/cons_int/safe_shop/acquis/green-paper_cons_acquis_en.pdf).
[41] Question A3, p. 15.
[42] Question A2, p. 14.
[43] Directive 1999/44/EC. See questions H1-M3, pp. 24-32.

62. Draft proposal for a Directive on consumer contractual rights. The Green Paper on the review of the consumer acquis has now been followed by the publication of a draft proposal for a 'horizontal' directive.[44] In its present form, however, and perhaps for reasons of timing, the latter does not make any explicit use of the DCFR. Whereas terminology and drafting style are rather different, there are nevertheless some characteristic similarities with regard to substance. For instance, both the DCFR and the draft horizontal directive propose general rules on pre-contractual information duties or withdrawal rights, which are different in detail but follow the same basic ideas. One such idea is that, in general, a right of withdrawal and the corresponding information duties should apply to all types of contracts negotiated away from business premises (the draft horizontal directive calls them "distance and off-premises contracts"), except under clearly defined circumstances, which can be easily proved. It will have to be seen what use will be made of the DCFR or a possible political CFR in later stages of the elaboration of the directive.

63. Improving the existing and future acquis: model rules. The DCFR is intended to help in this process of improving the existing acquis and in drafting any future EU legislation in the field of private law. By teasing out and stating clearly the principles that underlie the existing acquis, the DCFR can show how the existing Directives can be made more consistent and how various sectoral provisions might be given a wider application, so as to eliminate current gaps and overlaps – the 'horizontal approach' referred to in the draft proposal. (For instance the DCFR provides for general model rules on pre-contractual information duties and withdrawal rights, which are also the subject of the draft horizontal directive, though this, unlike the DCFR, mainly leaves it to the national laws to determine the consequences of any breach of information duties. The DCFR offers both the EC legislator and the national legislators a model set of sanctions for breach of information duties.) The DCFR also seeks to identify improvements in substance that might be considered. The research preparing the DCFR 'will aim to identify best solutions, taking into account national contract laws (both case law and established practice), the EC acquis and relevant international instruments, particularly the UN Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods of 1980'.[45] The DCFR therefore provides recommendations, based on extensive comparative research and careful analysis, of what should be considered if legislators are minded to alter or add to EU legislation within the broad framework of existing basic assumptions. The DCFR does not challenge these basic assumptions of the acquis (such as the efficacy of information duties or the value of the notion of the consumer as a basis for providing necessary protection) any more than shared propositions of national law. It would not have been appropriate for a group of academic lawyers in an exercise of this nature to do so: these are fundamental and politically sensitive questions which are not primarily of a legal nature. The DCFR simply makes proposals as to how, given the present policy assumptions, the relevant rules might with advantage be modified and made more coherent. In a very few cases it is proposed that, as has been done in some Member States, particular acquis rules applying to consumers should be applied more generally. We do not of course suggest that even those proposals should simply be adopted without further debate. They are no more than model rules from which the legislator and other interested parties may draw inspiration.

[44] Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on consumer rights, COM(2008) 614.
[45] Way Forward para. 3.1.3.

64. Improving the acquis: developing a coherent terminology. Directives frequently employ legal terminology and concepts which they do not define.[46] The classic example, seemingly referred to in the Commission´s papers, is the Simone Leitner case,[47] but there are many others. A CFR which provides definitions of these legal terms and concepts would be useful for questions of interpretation of this kind, particularly if it were adopted by the European institutions – for example, as a guide for legislative drafting.[48] It would be presumed that the word or concept contained in a Directive was used in the sense in which it is used in the CFR unless the Directive stated otherwise.[49] National legislators seeking to implement the Directive, and national courts faced with interpreting the implementing legislation, would be able to consult the CFR to see what was meant. Moreover, if comparative notes on the Articles are included, as they will be in the full version of the DCFR, the notes will often provide useful background information on how national laws currently deal with the relevant questions.

---

[46] In the CFR workshops on the consumer acquis, texts providing definitions of concepts used or pre-supposed in the EU acquis were referred to as 'directly relevant' material. See Second Progress Report on the Common Frame of Reference, COM (2007) 447 final, p. 2.

[47] Case C-168/00 Simone Leitner v TUI Deutschland [2002] ECR I-2631. The ECJ had to decide whether the damages to which a consumer was entitled under the provisions of the Package Travel Directive must include compensation for non-economic loss suffered when the holiday was not as promised. This head of damages is recognised by many national laws, but was not recognised by Austrian law. The ECJ held that 'damage' in the Directive must be given an autonomous, 'European' legal meaning – and in this context 'damage' is to be interpreted as including non-economic loss.

[48] In the absence of any formal arrangement, legislators could achieve much the same result for individual legislative measures by stating in the recitals that the measure should be interpreted in accordance with the CFR.

[49] We note that the draft Directive on consumer rights (fn. 44 above) at present often adopts the words of the existing Directives, even where these are known not to be very clear. We hope that before the Directive is adopted, its drafting will be checked against the DCFR and brought into line with it, save where a different outcome is intended.

65. No functional terminology list without rules. As said before, it is impossible to draft a functional list of terminology without a set of model rules behind it, and vice versa. That in turn makes it desirable to consider a rather wide coverage of the CFR. For example, it would be very difficult to develop a list of key notions of the law on contract and contractual obligations (such as "conduct", "creditor", "damage", "indemnify", "loss", "negligence", "property" etc.), without a sufficient awareness of the fact that many of these notions also play a role in the area of non-contractual obligations.

66. Coverage of the CFR. The purposes to be served by the DCFR have a direct bearing on its coverage. As explained in paragraphs 34-39 above, the coverage of the DCFR goes well beyond the coverage of the CFR as contemplated by the Commission in its communications (whereas the European Parliament in several resolutions envisages for the CFR more or less the same coverage as this DCFR).[50] Today, the coverage of the CFR still seems to be an open question. How far should it reach if it is to be effective as a legislators´ guide or 'tool box'? How may this DCFR be used if it is decided that the coverage of the CFR will be narrower (or even much narrower) than the coverage of the DCFR? The following aspects would seem to be worthy of being taken into consideration when making the relevant political decisions.

67. Consumer law and e-commerce. It seems clear that the CFR must at any rate cover the fields of application of the existing Directives that are under review, and any others likely to be reviewed in the foreseeable future. Thus all consumer law and questions of e-commerce should be included, and probably all contracts and contractual relationships that are the subject of existing Directives affecting questions of private law, since these may also be reviewed at some stage.

68. Revision of the acquis and further harmonisation measures. Secondly, the CFR should cover any field in which revision of the acquis or further harmonisation measures is being considered. This includes both areas currently under review (e. g. sales, and also leasing which is discussed in the Green Paper on revision of the consumer acquis[51]) and also areas where harmonisation is being considered, even if there are no immediate proposals for new legislation. Thus contracts for services should be covered, and also security over movable property, where divergences of laws cause serious problems.

---

[50] European Parliament, Resolution of 15 November 2001, OJ C 140E of 13 June 2002, p. 538; Resolution of 23 March 2006, OJ C 292E of 1 December 2006, p. 109; Resolution of 7 September 2007, OJ C 305E of 14 December 2006, p. 247; Resolution of 12 December 2007, Texts adopted, P6_TA(2007)0615; Resolution of 3 September 2008, Texts adopted, P6_TA(2008)0397.

[51] See fn 40 above.

69. Terms and concepts referred to in Directives. Thirdly, in order to provide the definitions that are wanted, the CFR must cover many terms and concepts that are referred to in Directives without being defined. In practice this includes almost all of the general law on contract and contractual obligations. There are so few topics that are not at some point referred to in the acquis, or at least presupposed by it, that it is simpler to include all of this general law than to work out what few topics can be omitted. It is not only contract law terminology in the strict sense which is referred to, however, and certainly not just contract law which is presupposed in EU instruments. For example, consumer Directives frequently presuppose rules on unjustified enrichment law; and Directives on pre-contractual information refer to or presuppose rules that in many systems are classified as rules of non-contractual liability for damage, i. e. delict or tort. It is thus useful to provide definitions of terms and model rules in these fields – not because they are likely to be subjected to regulation or harmonisation by European legislation in the foreseeable future, but because existing European legislation already builds on assumptions that the laws of the Member States have relevant rules and provide appropriate remedies. Whether they do so in ways that fit well with the European legislation, actual or proposed, is another matter. It is for the European institutions to decide what might be needed or might be useful. What seems clear is that it is not easy to identify in advance topics which will never be wanted.

70. When in doubt, topics should be included. There are good arguments for the view that in case of doubt, topics should be included. Excluding too many topics will result in the CFR being a fragmented patchwork, thus replicating a major fault in existing EU legislation on a larger scale. Nor can there be any harm in a broad CFR. It is not legislation, nor even a proposal for legislation. It merely provides language and definitions for use, when needed, in the closely targeted legislation that is, and will probably remain, characteristic of European Union private law.

71. Essential background information. There is a further way in which the CFR would be valuable as a legislators´ guide, and it has been prepared with a view to that possible purpose. If EU legislation is to fit harmoniously with the laws of the Member States, and in particular if it is neither to leave unintended gaps nor to be more invasive than is necessary, the legislator needs to have accurate information about the different laws in the various Member States. The national notes to be included in the full version of the DCFR will be very useful in this respect. They would, of course, have to be frequently updated if this purpose is to be served on a continuing basis.

72. Good faith as an example. The principle of good faith can serve as an example. In many laws the principle is accepted as fundamental, but it is not accorded the same recognition in the laws of all the Member States. In some systems it is not recognised as a general rule of direct application. It is true that such systems contain many particular rules which perform the same function as a requirement of good faith, in the sense that they are aimed at preventing the parties from acting in ways that are incompatible with good faith, but there is no general rule. So the European legislator cannot assume that whatever requirements it chooses to impose on consumer contracts in order to protect consumers will always be supplemented by a general requirement that the parties act in good faith. If it wants a general requirement to apply in the particular context, in all jurisdictions, the legislator will have to incorporate the requirement into the Directive in express words – as of course it did with the Directive on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts.[52] Alternatively, it will need to insert into the Directive specific provisions to achieve the results that in some jurisdictions would be reached by the application of the principle of good faith. To take another example, in drafting or revising a Directive dealing with pre-contractual information, legislators will want to know what they need to deal with and what is already covered adequately, and in a reasonably harmonious way, by the law of all Member States. Thus general principles on mistake, fraud and provision of incorrect information form essential background to the consumer acquis on pre-contractual information. In this sense, even a 'legislators' guide' needs statements of the common principles found in the different laws, and a note of the variations. It needs information about what is in the existing laws and what can be omitted from the acquis because, in one form or another, all Member States already have it.

73. Presupposed rules of national law. Further, a Directive normally presupposes the existence of certain rules in national law. For example, when a consumer exercises a right to withdraw from a contract, questions of liability in restitution are mainly left to national law. It may be argued that information about the law that is presupposed is more than 'essential background'. The Commission´s Second Progress Report describes it as 'directly relevant'.[53] Whatever the correct classification, this information is clearly important. Put simply, European legislators need to know what is a problem in terms of national laws and what is not. This is a further reason why the DCFR has a wide coverage and why the full DCFR will contain extensive notes, comparing the model rules to the various national laws.

---

[52] Council Directive 93/13/EEC, art. 3(1).
[53] See fn. 46 above, p. 2.

74. DCFR not structured on an 'everything or nothing' basis. The DCFR is, so far as possible, structured in such a way that the political institutions, if they wish to proceed with an official Common Frame of Reference on the basis of some of its proposals, can sever certain parts of it and leave them to a later stage of deliberation or just to general discussion amongst academics. In other words, the DCFR is carefully not structured on an 'everything or nothing' basis. Perhaps not every detail can be cherry-picked intact, but in any event larger areas could be taken up without any need to accept the entirety. For example, the reader will soon see that the provisions of Book III are directly applicable to contractual rights and obligations; it is simply that they also apply to non-contractual rights and obligations. Were the Commission to decide that the CFR should deal only with the former, it would be a quick and simple task to adjust the draft to apply only to contractual rights and obligations. We would not advise this, for reasons explained earlier. It would create the appearance of a gulf between contractual and other obligations that does not in fact exist in the laws of Member States, and it would put the coherence of the structure at risk. But it could be done if required.[54]

Developments after this edition

75. Full version of the DCFR. The full version of the DCFR was submitted to the European Commission at the end of December 2008. It will soon be reproduced in book form as a larger publication. The outline and full editions will differ in that the latter will contain the comments and the comparative notes supplemented by an index and bibliographic tables.

76. Consumer credit contracts not covered. The DCFR does not contain any model rules on consumer credit law. This is the subject-matter of a Directive which was only adopted during the concluding phase of the work on the DCFR.[55] The DCFR could not be revised in time to take account of it.

77. Evaluating the DCFR. The research teams which combined their endeavours under the 6th Framework Programme for Research will have concluded their work with the publication of the DCFR. The network will continue to exist only until the end of April 2009. The discussion about the DCFR and about the CFR which will possibly develop from it will, however, go on. The researchers offer to be a part of that development and the [54] We would strongly urge that if anything like this were done, the Comments should be re-written to explain that in most systems the rules apply also to non-contractual obligations.

[55] Directive 2008/48/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 23 April 2008 on Consumer Credit Contracts and abrogating Directive 87/102/EEC, OJ L 133/66 of 22 May 2008 implementation of new forms of cooperation between the various legal professional groups, but must point out that fresh funding would have to be found to make that possible.

78. CFR. The creation of a CFR is a question for the European Institutions. We suggest that they make decisions about the questions of legal policy which arise in this context only after consultation with the various groups involved. If desired, the researchers remain willing to participate.

79. Square brackets. The square brackets in Interim Outline Edition II.–9:404 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer) remain. The question here is whether the control on unfair terms in a contract between a business and a consumer should apply (a) only to terms which have not been individually negotiated or (b) to any terms which have been supplied by the business. The practical consequences of keeping or removing the words "which has not been individually negotiated" would probably not be great in this context (given that most terms supplied by the business would in any event not be individually negotiated) but the question is a delicate one and better left to a political decision. The square brackets in Interim Outline Edition III.—5:108 (Assignability: effect of contractual prohibition) have been deleted as it proved possible to reach a decision in favour of a less complicated solution than that formerly presented in paragraph (5).

80. The CFR as the basis for an optional instrument. What has been said about the purposes of the CFR relates to its function as a legislators´ guide or toolbox. It is still unclear whether or not the CFR, or parts of it, might at a later stage be used as the basis for one or more optional instruments, i. e. as the basis for an additional set of legal rules which parties might choose to govern their mutual rights and obligations. In the view of the two Groups such an optional instrument would open attractive perspectives, not least for consumer transactions. A more detailed discussion of this issue, however, seems premature at this stage. It suffices to say that this DCFR is consciously drafted in a way that, given the political will, would allow progress to be made towards the creation of such an optional instrument.

January 2009

Christian von Bar, Hugh Beale, Eric Clive, Hans Schulte-Nölke

Academic contributors and funders

The pan-European teams

As indicated already, the DCFR is the result of more than 25 years´ collaboration of jurists from all jurisdictions of the present Member States within the European Union. It began in 1982 with the constitution of the Commission on European Contract Law (CECL) and was furthered by the establishment of the Study Group in 1998 and the Acquis Group in 2002. From 2005 the Study Group, Acquis Group and Insurance Contract Group formed the so-called 'drafting teams' of the CoPECL network. The following DCFR is the result of the work of the Study Group, Acquis Group and CECL.

The Study Group on a European Civil Code

The Study Group has had the benefit of Working (or Research) Teams – groups of younger legal scholars under the supervision of a senior member of the Group (a Team Leader). The Teams undertook the basic comparative legal research, developed the drafts for discussion and assembled the extensive material required for the notes. To each Working Team was allocated a consultative body – an Advisory Council. These bodies – deliberately kept small in the interests of efficiency – were formed from leading experts in the relevant field of law, who represented the major European legal systems. The proposals drafted by the Working Teams and critically scrutinised and improved in a series of meetings by the respective Advisory Council were submitted for discussion on a revolving basis to the actual decision-making body of the Study Group on a European Civil Code, the Co-ordinating Group. Until June 2004 the Co-ordinating Group consisted of representatives from all the jurisdictions belonging to the EU immediately prior to its enlargement in Spring 2004 and in addition legal scholars from Estonia, Hungary, Norway, Poland, Slovenia and Switzerland. Representatives from the Czech Republic, Malta, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovakia joined us after the June 2004 meeting in Warsaw and representatives from Bulgaria and Romania after the December 2006 meeting in Lucerne. Besides its permanent members, other participants in the Co-ordinating Group with voting rights included all the Team Leaders and – when the relevant material was up for discussion – the members of the Advisory Council concerned. The results of the deliberations during the week-long sitting of the Co-ordinating Group were incorporated into the text of the Articles and the commentaries which returned to the agenda for the next meeting of the Co-ordinating Group (or the next but one depending on the work load of the Group and the Team affected). Each part of the project was the subject of debate on manifold occasions, some stretching over many years. Where a unanimous opinion could not be achieved, majority votes were taken.

Its Co-ordinating Group

The Study Group´s Co-ordinating Group has (or had) the following members: Professor Guido Alpa (Genoa/Rome, until May 2005), Professor Christian von Bar (Osnabrück, chairman), Professor Maurits Barendrecht (Tilburg, until May 2005), Professor Hugh Beale (Warwick), Dr. Mircea-Dan Bob (Cluj, since June 2007), Professor Michael Joachim Bonell (Rome), Professor Mifsud G. Bonnici (Valetta, since December 2004), Professor Carlo Castronovo (Milan), Professor Eric Clive (Edinburgh), Professor Eugenia Dacoronia (Athens), Professor Ulrich Drobnig (Hamburg), Professor Bénédicte Fauvarque-Cosson (Paris), Professor Marcel Fontaine (Louvain, until December 2003), Professor Andreas Furrer (Lucerne, since December 2003), Professor Júlio Manuel Vieira Gomes (Oporto), Professor Viggo Hagstrøm (Oslo, since June 2002), Supreme Court Judge Torgny Håstad (Stockholm), Professor Johnny Herre (Stockholm), Professor Martijn Hesselink (Amsterdam), Professor Ewoud Hondius (Utrecht, until May 2005), Professor Jérôme Huet (Paris), Professor Giovanni Iudica (Milan, since June 2004), Dr. Monika Jurčova (Trnava, since June 2006), Professor Konstantinos Kerameus (Athens), Professor Ole Lando (Copenhagen), Professor Kåre Lilleholt (Bergen/Oslo, since June 2003), Professor Marco Loos (Amsterdam); Professor Brigitta Lurger (Graz), Professor Hector MacQueen (Edinburgh), Professor Ewan McKendrick (Oxford), Professor Valentinas Mikelenas (Vilnius, since December 2004), Professor Eoin O´Dell (Dublin, until June 2006), Professor Edgar du Perron (Amsterdam), Professor Denis Philippe (Louvain, since June 2004), Professor Jerzy Rajski (Warsaw), Professor Christina Ramberg (Gothenburg), Supreme Court Judge Professor Encarna Roca y Trias (Madrid/Barcelona), Professor Peter Schlechtriem† (Freiburg i. Br.), Professor Martin Schmidt-Kessel (Osnabrück, since December 2004), Professor Jorge Sinde Monteiro (Coimbra, until December 2004), Professor Lena Sisula-Tulokas (Helsinki), Professor Sophie Stijns (Leuven), Professor Matthias Storme (Leuven), Dr. Stephen Swann (Osnabrück), Professor Christian Takoff (Sofia, since June 2007), Professor Luboš Tichý (Prague, since June 2005), Professor Verica Trstenjak (Maribor, until December 2006), Professor Vibe Ulfbeck (Copenhagen, since June 2006), Professor Paul Varul (Tartu, since June 2003), Professor Lajos Vékás (Budapest), Professor Anna Veneziano (Teramo).

The Study Group´s Working Teams

Permanent working teams were based in various European universities and research institutions. The teams´ former and present 'junior members' conducted research into basically three main areas of private law: the law of specific contracts, the law of extra-contractual obligations, and property law. They sometimes stayed for one or two years only, but often considerably longer in order additionally to pursue their own research projects. The meetings of the Co-ordinating Group and of numerous Advisory Councils were organised from Osnabrück, in conjunction with the relevant host, by Ina El Kobbia.

The members of the Working Teams were: Begoña Alfonso de la Riva, Georgios Arnokouros, Dr. Erwin Beysen, Christopher Bisping, Ole Böger, Michael Bosse, Manuel Braga, Dr. Odavia Bueno Díaz, Sandie Calme, Dr. Rui Cascăo, Cristiana Cicoria, Martine Costa, Inês Couto Guedes, Dr. John Dickie, Tobias Dierks, Dr. Evlalia Eleftheriadou, Dr. Wolfgang Faber, Silvia Fedrizzi, Dr. Francesca Fiorentini, Dr. Andreas Fötschl, Laetitia Franck, Dr. Caterina Gozzi, Alessio Greco, Lodewijk Gualthérie van Weezel, Stéphanie van Gulijk, Judith Hauck, Dr. Lars Haverkamp, Dr. Annamaria Herpai, Dr. Viola Heutger, Dr. Matthias Hünert, Professor Chris Jansen, Dr. Christoph Jeloschek, Menelaos Karpathakis, Dr. Stefan Kettler, Ina El Kobbia, Dr. Berte-Elen R. Konow, Rosalie Koolhoven, Caroline Lebon, Jacek Lehmann, Martin Lilja, Roland Lohnert, Birte Lorenzen, Dr. María Ángeles Martín Vida, Almudena de la Mata Muñoz, Pádraic McCannon, Dr. Mary-Rose McGuire, Paul McKane, José Carlos de Medeiros Nóbrega, Dr. Andreas Meidell, Philip Mielnicki, Anastasios Moraitis, Sandra Müller, Franz Nieper, Teresa Pereira, Dr. Andrea Pinna, Sandra Rohlfing, Dr. Jacobien W. Rutgers, Johan Sandstedt, Marta dos Santos Silva, Dr. Mårten Schultz, Manola Scotton†, Frank Seidel, Anna von Seht, Susan Singleton, Dr. Hanna Sivesand, Daniel

Smith, Dr. Malene Stein Poulsen, Dimitar Stoimenov, Dr. Stephen Swann, Ferenc Szilágyi, Dr. Amund Bjøranger Tørum, Pia Ulrich, Muriel Veldman, Carles Vendrell Cervantes, Ernest Weiker, Aneta Wiewiorowska, Bastian Willers.

The Study Group´s Advisory Councils

The members of the Advisory Councils to the permanent working teams (who not infrequently served more than one team or performed other functions besides) were: Professor Hugh Beale (Warwick), Professor John W. Blackie (Strathclyde), Professor Michael G. Bridge (London), Professor Angel Carrasco (Toledo), Professor Carlo Castronovo (Milan), Professor Eric Clive (Edinburgh), Professor Pierre Crocq (Paris); Professor Eugenia Dacoronia (Athens), Professor Bénédicte Fauvarque-Cosson (Paris), Professor Jacques Ghestin (Paris), Professor Júlio Manuel Vieira Gomes (Oporto), Professor Helmut Grothe (Berlin), Supreme Court Judge Torgny Håstad (Stockholm), Professor Johnny Herre (Stockholm), Professor Jérôme Huet (Paris), Professor Giovanni Iudica (Milan), Dr. Monika Jurčova (Trnava), Professor Jan Kleineman (Stockholm), Professor Irene Kull (Tartu), Professor Marco Loos (Amsterdam), Professor Denis Mazeaud (Paris), Professor Hector MacQueen (Edinburgh), Professor Ewan McKendrick (Oxford), Professor Graham Moffat (Warwick), Professor Andrea Nicolussi (Milan), Professor Eoin O´Dell (Dublin), Professor Guillermo Palao Moreno (Valencia), Professor Edgar du Perron (Amsterdam), Professor Maria A. L. Puelinckx-van Coene (Antwerp), Professor Philippe Rémy (Poitiers), Professor Peter Schlechtriem† (Freiburg i. Br.), Professor Martin Schmidt-Kessel (Osnabrück), Dr. Kristina Siig (Arhus), Professor Reinhard Steennot (Ghent), Professor Matthias Storme (Leuven), Dr. Stephen Swann (Osnabrück), Professor Luboš Tichý (Prague), Professor Stefano Troiano (Verona), Professor Antoni Vaquer Aloy (Lleida), Professor Anna Veneziano (Teramo), Professor Alain Verbeke (Leuven and Tilburg), Professor Anders Victorin† (Stockholm), Professor Sarah Worthington (London).

The Acquis Group

The Acquis Group texts result from a drafting process which involved individual Drafting Teams, the Redaction Committee, the Terminology Group, and the Plenary Meeting. The Drafting Teams produced a first draft of rules with comments for their topic or area on the basis of a survey of existing EC law. The drafts were then passed on to the Redaction Committee and to the Terminology Group which formulated proposals for making the various drafts by different teams dovetail with each other, also with a view towards harmonising the use of terminology and improving the language and consistency of drafts. All draft rules were debated several times at, and finally adopted by, Plenary Meetings of the Acquis Group, which convened twice a year. Several drafts which were adopted by Plenary Meetings (in particular those on pre-contractual information duties, unfair terms and withdrawal) were subsequently presented and discussed at CFR-Net Stakeholder Meetings. Their comments were considered within a second cycle of drafting and consolidation of the Acquis Principles.

The following members of the Acquis Group took part in the Plenary Meetings: Professor Gianmaria Ajani (Torino, speaker), Professor Esther Arroyo i Amayuelas (Barcelona), Professor Carole Aubert de Vincelles (Lyon), Dr. Guillaume Busseuil (Paris), Dr. Simon Chardenoux (Paris), Professor Giuditta Cordero Moss (Oslo), Professor Gerhard Dannemann (Berlin), Professor Silvia Ferreri (Torino), Professor Lars Gorton (Lund), Professor Michele Graziadei (Torino), Professor Hans Christoph Grigoleit (Regensburg), Professor Luc Grynbaum (Paris), Professor Geraint Howells (Manchester), Professor Jan Hurdik (Brno), Professor Tsvetana Kamenova (Sofia), Professor Konstantinos Kerameus (Athens), Professor Stefan Leible (Bayreuth), Professor Eva Lindell-Frantz (Lund), Dr. hab. Piotr Machnikowski (Wrocław), Professor Ulrich Magnus (Hamburg), Professor Peter Møgelvang-Hansen (Copenhagen), Professor Susana Navas Navarro (Barcelona), Dr. Paolisa Nebbia (Leicester), Professor Anders Ørgaard (Aalborg), Dr. Barbara Pasa (Torino), Professor Thomas Pfeiffer (Heidelberg), Professor António Pinto Monteiro (Coimbra), Professor Jerzy Pisulinski (Kraków), Professor Elise Poillot (Lyon), Professor Judith Rochfeld (Paris), Professor Ewa Rott-Pietrzyk (Katowice), Professor Søren Sandfeld Jakobsen (Copenhagen), Dr. Markéta Selucká (Brno), Professor Hans Schulte-Nölke (Osnabrück, co-ordinator), Professor Reiner Schulze (Münster), Professor Carla Sieburgh (Nijmegen), Dr. Sophie Stalla-Bourdillon (Florence), Professor Matthias Storme (Antwerp and Leuven), Professor Gert Straetmans (Antwerp), Dr. hab. Maciej Szpunar (Katowice), Professor Evelyne Terryn (Leuven), Dr. Christian Twigg-Flesner (Hull), Professor Antoni Vaquer Aloy (Lleida), Professor Thomas Wilhelmsson (Helsinki), Professor Fryderyk Zoll (Kraków).

The members of the Redaction Committee were, besides the speaker (Gianmaria Ajani) and the co-ordinator (Hans Schulte-Nölke) of the Acquis Group, Gerhard Dannemann (chair), Luc Grynbaum, Reiner Schulze, Matthias Storme, Christian Twigg-Flesner and Fryderyk Zoll. The Terminology Group consisted of Gerhard Dannemann (Chair), Silvia Ferreri and Michele Graziadei.

Members of the individual Acquis Group Drafting Teams are: 'Contract I' (originally organised in the subteams Definition of Consumer and Business, Form, Good Faith, Pre-contractual Information Duties, Formation, Withdrawal, Non-negotiated Terms): Esther Arroyo i Amayuelas, Christoph Grigoleit, Peter Møgelvang-Hansen, Barbara Pasa, Thomas Pfeiffer, Hans Schulte-Nölke, Reiner Schulze, Evelyne Terryn, Christian Twigg-Flesner, Antoni Vaquer Aloy; 'Contract II' (responsible for Performance, Non-Performance, Remedies): Carole Aubert de Vincelles, Piotr Machnikowski, Ulrich Magnus, Jerzy Pisulińlski, Judith Rochfeld, Ewa Rott-Pietrzyk, Reiner Schulze, Matthias Storme, Maciej Szpunar, Fryderyk Zoll; 'E-Commerce': Stefan Leible, Jerzy Pisulinski, Fryderyk Zoll; 'Non-discrimination': Stefan Leible, Susana Navas Navarro, Jerzy Pisulinski, Fryderyk Zoll; 'Specific Performance': Lars Gorton, Geraint Howells. Numerous further colleagues supported the Plenary and the Drafting Teams or contributed to the Comments, among them Dr. Christoph Busch, Dr. Martin Ebers, Dr. Krzysztof Korus, Professor Matthias Lehmann and Dr. Filip Wejman.

The former Commission on European Contract Law

The members of the three consecutive commissions of the Commission on European Contract Law which met under the chairmanship of Professor Ole Lando (Copenhagen) from 1982 to 1999 were: Professor Christian von Bar (Osnabrück), Professor Hugh Beale (Warwick); Professor Alberto Berchovitz (Madrid), Professor Brigitte Berlioz-Houin (Paris), Professor Massimo Bianca (Rome), Professor Michael Joachim Bonell (Rome), Professor Michael Bridge (London), Professor Carlo Castronovo (Milan), Professor Eric Clive (Edinburgh), Professor Isabel de Magalhães Collaço† (Lisbon), Professor Ulrich Drobnig (Hamburg), Bâtonnier Dr. André Elvinger (Luxembourg), Maître Marc Elvinger (Luxembourg), Professor Dimitri Evrigenis† (Thessaloniki), Professor Carlos Fereira di Almeida (Lisbon), Professor Sir Roy M. Goode (Oxford), Professor Arthur Hartkamp (The Hague), Professor Ewoud Hondius (Utrecht), Professor Guy Horsmans (Louvain la Neuve), Professor Roger Houin† (Paris), Professor Konstantinos Kerameus (Athens), Professor Bryan MacMahon (Cork), Professor Hector MacQueen (Edinburgh), Professor Willibald Posch (Graz), Professor André Prum (Nancy), Professor Jan Ramberg (Stockholm), Professor Georges Rouhette (Clermont-Ferrand), Professor Pablo Salvador Coderch (Barcelona), Professor Fernando Martinez Sanz (Castellon), Professor Matthias E. Storme (Leuven), Professor Denis Tallon (Paris), Dr. Frans J. A. van der Velden (Utrecht), Dr. J. A. Wade (The Hague), Professor William A. Wilson† (Edinburgh), Professor Thomas Wilhelmsson (Helsinki), Professor Claude Witz (Saarbrücken), Professor Reinhard Zimmermann (Regensburg).

The Compilation and Redaction Team

To co-ordinate between the Study and Acquis Groups, to integrate the PECL material revised for the purposes of the DCFR, and for revision and assimilation of the drafts from the sub-projects we established a "Compilation and Redaction Team" (CRT) at the beginning of 2006. The CRT members were Professors Christian von Bar (Osnabrück), Hugh Beale (Warwick), Eric Clive (Edinburgh), Johnny Herre (Stockholm), Jérôme Huet (Paris, until June 2007), Peter Schlechtriem† (Freiburg i.Br.), Hans Schulte-Nölke (Osnabrück), Matthias Storme (Leuven), Stephen Swann (Osnabrück), Paul Varul (Tartu), Anna Veneziano (Teramo) and Fryderyk Zoll (Cracow); it was chaired by Eric Clive and Christian von Bar. Professor Clive carried the main drafting and editorial burden at the later (CRT) stages; he is also the main drafter of the list of terminology in the Annex of the DCFR. Professor Gerhard Dannemann (Berlin), Chair of the Acquis Group's redaction committee, attended several of the later meetings of the CRT by invitation and made important drafting contributions.

Professor Clive was assisted by Ashley Theunissen (Edinburgh), Professor von Bar by Daniel Smith (Osnabrück). Over the course of several years Johan Sandstedt (Bergen) and Daniel Smith (Osnabrück) took care of the Master copy of the DCFR.

Funding

The DCFR is the result of years of work by many pan-European teams of jurists. They have been financed from diverse sources which cannot all be named here.[56] Before we came together with other teams in May 2005 to form the 'CoPECL Network of Excellence'[57] under the European Commission´s sixth framework programme for research, from which funds our research has since been supported, the members of the Study Group on a European Civil Code had the benefit of funding from national research councils. Among others the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (DFG) provided over several years the lion´s share of the financing [56] A complete survey of the donors of the Study Group on a European Civil Code will be found in the opening pages of the most recent volume of Study Group´s "Principles of European Law (PEL)" series (as to which see para. 44 of the introduction). The donors of the Commission on European Contract Law are mentioned in the preface of both volumes of the Principles of European Contract Law.

[57] Joint Network on European Private Law (CoPECL: Common Principles of European Contract Law), Network of Excellence under the 6th EU Framework Programme for Research and Technological Development, Priority 7 – FP6-2002-CITIZENS-3, Contract N° 513351 (co-ordinator: Prof. Hans Schulte-Nölke, Osnabrück).

including the salaries of the Working Teams based in Germany and the direct travel costs for the meetings of the Co-ordinating Group and the numerous Advisory Councils. The work of the Dutch Working Teams was financed by the Nederlandse Organisatie voor Wetenschappelijk Onderzoek (NWO). Further personnel costs were met by the Flemish Fonds voor Wetenschappelijk Onderzoek-Vlaanderen (FWO), the Greek Onassis-Foundation, the Austrian Fonds zur Förderung der wissenschaftlichen Forschung, the Portuguese Fundação Calouste Gulbenkian and the Norges forskningsråd (the Research Council of Norway). The Acquis Group received substantial support from its preceding Training and Mobility Networks on 'Common Principles of European Private Law' (1997-2002) under the fourth EU Research Framework Programme[58] and on 'Uniform Terminology for European Private Law' (2002-2006) under the fifth Research Framework Programme.[59] We are extremely indebted to all who in this way have made our work possible.

[58] TMR (Training and Mobility) Network 'Common Principles of European Private Law' of the Universities of Barcelona, Berlin (Humboldt), Lyon III, Münster (co-ordinator of the Network: Professor Reiner Schulze), Nijmegen, Oxford and Turin. funded under the 4th EU Research Framework Programme 1997-2002.

[59] TMR (Training and Mobility) Network 'Uniform Terminology for European Private Law' of the Universities of Barcelona, Lyon III, Münster, Nijmegen, Oxford, Turin (co-ordinator of the Network: Professor Gianmaria Ajani), Warsaw, funded under the 5th EU Research Framework Programme 2002-2006.

Principles

The underlying principles of freedom, security, justice and efficiency

The four principles of freedom, security, justice and efficiency underlie the whole of the DCFR. Each has several aspects. Freedom is, for obvious reasons, comparatively more important in relation to contracts and unilateral undertakings and the obligations arising from them, but is not absent elsewhere. Security, justice and efficiency are equally important in all areas. The fact that four principles are identified does not mean that all have equal value. Efficiency is more mundane and less fundamental than the others. It is not at the same level but it is nonetheless important and has to be included. Law is a practical science. The idea of efficiency underlies a number of the model rules and they cannot be fully explained without reference to it.

At one level, freedom, security, and justice are ends in themselves. People have fought and died for them. Efficiency is less dramatic. In the context of private law, however, these values are best regarded not as ends in themselves but as means to other ends – the promotion of welfare, the empowering of people to pursue their legitimate aims and fulfil their potential.

In preparing the first part of this account of the role played by these underlying principles in the DCFR, we have drawn heavily on the Principes directeurs du droit européen du contrat[60] and we refer the reader to the analytical and comparative work done in their elaboration. However, we have had to take a slightly different approach for the purposes of the DCFR, which is not confined to traditional contract law.

It is characteristic of principles such as those discussed here that they conflict with each other. For example, on occasion, justice in a particular case may have to make way for legal security or efficiency, as happens under the rules of prescription. Sometimes, on the other hand, rules designed to promote security have to be balanced by considerations of justice, as happens under the rules in Books V and VI which allow for a reduction of liability on equitable grounds. Freedom, in particular freedom of contract, may be limited for the sake of an aspect of justice – for instance, to prevent some forms of discrimination or to prevent the abuse of a dominant position. Principles can even conflict with themselves, depending on the standpoint from which a situation is viewed: freedom from discrimination restricts another's freedom to discriminate. One aspect of justice (e.g. equality of treatment) may conflict with another (e.g. protection of the weak). Therefore the principles can never be applied in a pure and rigid way.

[60] The Principes directeurs form the first part of Fauvarque-Cosson/Mazeaud and Wicker/Racine/Sautonie-Laguionie/Bujoli (eds.), Principes contractuels commun. Projet de cadre commun de référence (Paris 2008); p. 23-198.

The principles also overlap. As will be seen below, there are many examples of rules which can be explained on the basis of more than one principle. In particular, many of the rules which are designed to ensure genuine freedom of contract can also be explained in terms of contractual justice.

Freedom

General remarks

There are several aspects to freedom as an underlying principle in private law. Freedom can be protected by not laying down mandatory rules or other controls and by not imposing unnecessary restrictions of a formal or procedural nature on peoples' legal transactions. It can be promoted by enhancing the capabilities of people to do things. Both aspects are present throughout the DCFR. The first is illustrated by the general approach to party autonomy, particularly but not exclusively in the rules on contracts and contractual obligations. The assumption is that party autonomy should be respected unless there is a good reason to intervene. Often, of course, there is a good reason to intervene – for example, in order to ensure that a party can escape from a contract concluded in the absence of genuine freedom to contract. The assumption is also that formal and procedural hurdles should be kept to a minimum. The second aspect – enhancing capabilities – is also present throughout the DCFR. People are provided with default rules (including default rules for a wide variety of specific contracts) which make it easier and less costly for them to enter into well-regulated legal relationships. They are provided with efficient and flexible ways of transferring rights and goods, of securing rights to the performance of obligations and of managing their property. The promotion of freedom overlaps with the promotion of efficiency and some of these examples are discussed more fully below under that heading.

Contractual freedom

Freedom of contract the starting point. As a rule, natural and legal persons should be free to decide whether or not to contract and with whom to contract. They should also be free to agree on the terms of their contract. This basic idea is recognised in the DCFR.[61] It is also expressed in the first article of the Principes directeurs.[62] In both cases the freedom is subject to any applicable mandatory rules. Parties should also be free to agree at any time to modify the terms of their contract or to put an end to their relationship. These ideas are also expressed in the DCFR[63] and in the Principes directeurs.[64] In normal situations there is no incompatibility between contractual freedom and justice. Indeed it has been claimed that, in some situations, freedom of contract, without more, leads to justice. If, for instance, the parties to a contract are fully informed and in an equal bargaining position when concluding it, the content of their agreement can be presumed to be in their interest and to be just as between themselves. "Qui dit contractuel, dit juste."[65] In normal situations there is also no incompatibility between contractual freedom and efficiency. In general terms it can be assumed that agreements made by parties who are both fully informed and of equal bargaining power will be profit-maximising in the sense of bringing gains to each party (the exact division of the gain is a distributive question of little concern to economic analysis.) The only caveat is that the agreement should not impose costs on third parties (externalities). This is why in most systems certain contracts which are likely to have detrimental effects on third persons are rendered void as a matter of public policy.

Limitations with regard to third parties. There is one principle in the section on contractual freedom in the Principes directeurs which is not expressly stated in the DCFR. It provides that "Parties can contract only for themselves, unless otherwise provided. A contract can produce an effect only in so far as it does not result in an infringement or unlawful modification of third party rights".[66] The DCFR does not contain explicit provisions at such a general level on the relation of contracts to third parties. It takes it as self-evident that parties can contract only for themselves, unless otherwise provided, and that contracts, as a rule,

---

[61] II.–1:102(1). "Parties are free to make a contract or other juridical act and to determine its contents, subject to any applicable mandatory rules." It follows from the general rules on the formation of contracts that the parties can agree not to be contractually bound unless the contract is in a particular form. See II.–4:101. Also in the Book on Proprietary Security the principle of party autonomy is fully recognised in the freedom of the parties to regulate their mutual relationship at the predefault stage, IX.–5:101.

[62] Art. 0:101 of the Principes directeurs: "Each party is free to contract and to choose who will be the other party. The parties are free to determine the content of the contract and the rules of form which apply to it. Freedom of contract operates subject to compliance with mandatory rules".

[63] II.–1:103 (3). See also III.–1:108(1) "A right, obligation or contractual relationship may be varied or terminated by agreement at any time."

[64] Art. 0:103. The second paragraph of this Article adds that unilateral revocation is effective only in the case of contracts of indeterminate duration. The same idea is expressed in the DCFR in II.–1:103(1) read with III.–1:109(2) but there are some special rules for contracts for services (including mandate contracts).

[65] Alfred Fouillée, La science sociale contemporaine. Paris (Hachette) 1880, p. 410.

[66] Art. 0-102 (Respect for the freedom and rights of third parties).

regulate only the rights and obligations between the parties who conclude them. The DCFR merely spells out the exceptions, principally the rules on representation[67] and the rules on stipulations in favour of a third party.[68] So far as the attempted invasion of third party rights is concerned the DCFR takes the view that this will often be simply impossible to achieve by a contract, because of the content of other rules. The parties to a contract could not, for example, effectively deprive another person of his or her property by simply contracting to this effect. There is no need for a special rule to achieve that result. In so far as such invasions or infringements are possible they are dealt with partly by the rules on illegal contracts[69] and partly by the rules in Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another. An example of the latter is the inducement of a contract party to breach the contract. The DCFR qualifies such conduct as a ground for non-contractual liability under Book VI.[70] A rather different case is when the purpose of a contract is to disadvantage creditors, usually by putting property beyond their reach. Classical systems based on Roman law tried to respond to such contracts by the so called actio pauliana, which gave the affected creditor an action against the contract party holding the property in question. The DCFR does not contain explicit provisions on this issue. The reason is that – although an actio pauliana can be brought before the opening of insolvency proceedings – the issue is closely linked to insolvency law, with which the DCFR does not deal. But it would be possible to deal with fraudulent conveyances which aim at the disadvantage of creditors under the rules of Book VI.[71]

Contracts harmful to third persons and society in general. A ground on which a contract may be invalidated, even though it was freely agreed between two equal parties, is that it (or more often the performance of the obligation under it) would have a seriously harmful effect on third persons or society. Thus contracts which are illegal or contrary to public policy in this sense are invalid. (Within the framework of the EU a common example is contracts which infringe the competition articles of the Treaty.) The DCFR does not spell out when a contract is contrary to public policy in this sense, because that is a matter for law outside the scope of the DCFR – the law of competition or the criminal law of the Member State where the [67] Book II, Chapter 6. Under these rules one party (the representative) can contract for another (the principal).

[68] See II.–9:301 to II.–9:303. The rules in Book III, Chapter 5 on change of parties (assignment and substitution of new debtor) and the rule in III.–5:401 on indirect representation (under which, when the representative has become insolvent, the principal and the third party may acquire rights against each other) can also be seen as exceptions to the rule that a contract can produce effects only for the contracting parties.
[69] II.–7:301 to II.–7:304. A contract to injure, or steal from, another person would, for example, be void. This topic is further explored in the following paragraph.
[70] VI.–2:211.
[71] Cf. in particular VI.–2:101 paragraph (3).

relevant performance takes place. However the fact that a contract might harm particular third persons or society at large is clearly a ground on which the legislator should consider invalidating it.

Interventions when consent defective. Even classical contract law recognises that it may not be just to enforce a contract if one party to it was in a weaker position, typically because when giving consent the party was not free or was misinformed. For example, a contract concluded as the result of mistake or fraud, or which was the result of duress or unfair exploitation, can be set aside by the aggrieved party. These grounds for invalidity are often explained in terms of justice but equally it can be said that they are designed to ensure that contractual freedom was genuine freedom; and in the DCFR, as in the laws of the Member States, they are grounds for the invalidity of a contract. Moreover, at least where the contract has been made only as the result of deliberate conduct by one party that infringed the other party's freedom or misled the other party, the right to set it aside should be inalienable, i.e. mandatory. The remedies given by the DCFR in cases of fraud and duress cannot be excluded or restricted.[72] In contrast, remedies provided in cases of mistake and similar cases which do not involve deliberate wrongdoing may be excluded or restricted.[73]

Restrictions on freedom to choose contracting party. While in general persons should remain free to contract or to refuse to contract with anyone else, this freedom may need to be qualified where it might result in unacceptable discrimination, for example discrimination on the grounds of gender, race or ethnic origin. Discrimination on those grounds is a particularly anti-social form of denying the contractual freedom, and indeed the human dignity, of the other party. EU law and the DCFR therefore prohibit these forms of discrimination and provide appropriate remedies.[74] The DCFR is drafted in such a way that it easily allows the addition of further grounds for discrimination, as they exist – for general contract law – in some Member States and as they may be enacted in EC law in the future.

Restrictions on freedom to withhold information at pre-contractual stage. Similarly, restrictions on the parties' freedom to contract as they choose may be justified even outside the classic cases of procedural unfairness such as mistake, fraud, duress and the exploitation of a party's circumstances to obtain an excessive advantage. A particular concern is to ensure that parties were fully informed. The classical grounds for invalidity on the grounds of [73] II.–7:215. However, any attempt to exclude or restrict remedies for mistake will itself be subject to the controls over unfair terms that have not been negotiated. See II.–9:401 et seq.

---

[72] II.–7:215.

[74] See, for the DCFR, II.–2:101 to II.–2:105 and III.–1:105.

mistake, which are reflected in the provisions of the DCFR mentioned above, were quite limited: for example, in many laws the mistake had to be as to the substance of the thing sold. This notion was developed when the goods or services which were to be supplied were usually very much simpler than they are today. In today's conditions parties often need much more information before it can be said that they were fully informed. Thus the law needs to deal not only with cases of inequality of information about the basic characteristics of the goods or services to be supplied but also as to other relevant circumstances. It may also need to go beyond the general contract law of some Member States and impose positive duties to give information to the uninformed party. In the DCFR, the classical defence of mistake has been supplemented by duties to give the other party the information which is essential to enable that party to make a properly informed decision. These rules apply particularly to consumer contracts, but the problem may arise also in contracts between businesses. Normally a business can be expected to make full enquiries before concluding a contract, but if good commercial practice dictates that certain information be provided by one of the parties, the other party is likely to assume that it has been provided. If in fact full information has not been provided, and as a result the party concludes a contract which would not have been concluded, or would have been concluded only on fundamentally different terms, the party has a remedy.

Information as to the terms of the contract. Modern law must also deal with lack of information as to the terms of the contract. The classical defences were developed at a time when most contracts were of a simple kind that the parties could understand readily. This too has changed, particularly with the development of longer-term (and therefore more complex) contracts and the use of standard terms. Standard terms are very useful but there is the risk that the parties may not be aware of their contents or may not fully understand them. Existing EC law addresses this problem and gives protection to consumers when the term in question is in a consumer contract and was not individually negotiated.[75] However, as the laws of many Member States recognise, the problem may occur also in contracts between businesses. Particularly when one party is a small business that lacks expertise or where the relevant term is contained in a standard form contract document prepared by the party seeking to rely on the term, the other party may not be aware of existence or extent of the term. The DCFR contains controls which deal with similar problems in contracts between businesses, though the controls are of a more restricted kind than for consumer contracts.

---

[75] Directive on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts, 1993/13/EEC.

Correcting inequality of bargaining power. The classical grounds for avoidance deal with some simple cases of lack of bargaining power, for example when one party takes advantage of the other party's urgent needs and lack of choice to extort an unfairly high price for goods or services.[76] But modern conditions, and particularly the use of standard contract terms, lead to new forms of inequality that need to be addressed. A party who is offered a standard form contract and who knows what it contains and understands its meaning, and is unhappy with the terms offered, may find that it is impossible to get the other party, or any other possible contracting party, to offer better terms: the party may be told to "take it or leave it." Such problems are most common when a consumer is dealing with a business, but can also occur in contracts between businesses, particularly when one party is a small business that lacks bargaining power. The provisions on unfair terms are thus also based on notions of preserving freedom of contract, but – just as in the existing EC law – in a more extended sense than in classical law. The laws of some Member States apply these provisions to contracts of all types, not just to contracts between businesses and consumers. Again the DCFR takes a balanced view, suggesting a cautious extension beyond the existing acquis.

Minimum intervention. Even when some intervention can be justified on one of the grounds just mentioned, thought must be given to the form of intervention. Is the problem one that can be solved adequately by requiring one party to provide the other with information before the contract is made, with perhaps a right in the other party to withdraw from the contract if the information was not given? In general terms we are concerned, as explained above, to ensure that when parties conclude contracts they should be adequately informed. This suggests that if they were provided with the relevant information, they should be bound by the contract to which they agreed. But in some cases problems will persist even if consumers (for example) are 'informed', possibly because they will not be able to make effective use of the information. In such a case a mandatory rule giving the consumer certain minimum rights (for example, to withdraw from a timeshare contract, as such contracts are typically concluded without sufficient reflection) may be justified. In general terms, the interference with freedom of contract should be the minimum that will solve the problem while providing the other party (e.g. the business seller) with sufficient guidance to be able to arrange its affairs efficiently. Similarly with contract terms: it must be asked whether it is necessary to make a particular term mandatory or whether a flexible test such as 'fairness' would suffice to protect the weaker party. A fairness test may allow certain terms to be used providing these are clearly brought home to the consumer or other party before the contract is made. The fairness test thus interferes less with the parties' freedom of contract than making a particular term mandatory would do. Usually it will be sufficient that a term is not binding on the aggrieved party if in the particular circumstances it is unfair. This leaves parties who are fully informed and dealing at arms' length free (when the term will normally be fair: see above) to arrange their affairs as they wish. However, sometimes it may be easier to have a simple rule rather than a standard that varies according to the circumstances of each case.

[76] See the illustrations to II.–7:207.

Non-contractual obligations

Emphasis on obligations rather than freedom. The purpose of the law on benevolent intervention in another's affairs, on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another and on unjustified enrichment is not to promote freedom but rather to limit it by imposing obligations. Here we see the principle of freedom being counteracted by the competing principles of security and justice.

Freedom respected so far as consistent with policy objectives. Nonetheless the underlying principle of freedom is recognised in that the model rules impose these non-contractual obligations only where that is clearly justified. So, a benevolent intervener has rights as such only if there was a reasonable ground for acting; and there will be no such ground if the intervener had a reasonable opportunity to discover the principal's wishes but failed to do so or if the intervener knew or could be expected to know that the intervention was against the principal's wishes.[77] To the maximum extent possible the principal's freedom of action and control is respected. In the rules on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another, the imposition of an obligation of reparation is carefully limited to cases where it is justified. It is this concern which explains why this Book does not simply adopt some sweeping statement to the effect that people are liable for damage they cause. Respect for freedom (not to mention security and justice viewed from the point of view of the person causing the damage) requires careful and detailed formulation of rules imposing liability. Again, in the law on unjustified enrichment the underlying principle is that people are free to hold what they have. An obligation to redress an enrichment is imposed only in carefully regulated circumstances. In particular, rules ensure that one person cannot force another to pay for an enrichment resulting from a disadvantage to which the first person has consented freely and without error.[78] That would be an unwarranted infringement of freedom. Rules also ensure that those who are enriched by receiving a non-transferable benefit without their consent (such as receiving an unwanted service) are not compelled to reverse that enrichment by paying for its value, since this would in substance require the recipient of an enrichment to perform a bargain not voluntarily concluded. If they are liable at all, their liability is therefore not allowed to exceed any sum which they would have spent in any case in order to enjoy the benefit which they have unwittingly or unwillingly received.[79]

[77] V.–1:101(2).
[78] VII.–2:101(1)(b).

Property

Limited scope for party autonomy. The principle of party autonomy has to be considerably modified in property law. Because proprietary rights affect third parties generally, the parties to a transaction are not free to create their own basic rules as they wish. They cannot, for example, define for themselves basic concepts like "possession". Nor are they free to modify the basic rules on how ownership can be acquired, transferred or lost. Under the DCFR they cannot even agree to an effective contractual prohibition on alienation.[80] The free alienability of goods is important not only to the persons concerned but also to society at large. One type of freedom is restricted in order to promote another – and efficiency.

Recognition and enhancement of freedom in some respects. Within the essential limits just noted, the principle of party autonomy is reflected in Book VIII. It can be seen in the rule that the parties to a transfer of goods can generally determine by agreement the point in time when ownership passes,[81] and in the rule that the consequences of the production of new goods out of another's goods or of the combination or commingling of goods belonging to different persons can be regulated by party agreement.[82] The rules on proprietary security in Book IX can be seen as enhancing freedom (and efficiency) by opening up wide possibilities for the provision of non-possessory security, something which has not traditionally been possible in many legal systems. Similarly, the rules on trusts in Book X could enhance freedom by opening up possibilities for setting property aside for particular purposes (commercial, familial or charitable) in a flexible way which has been much used and much valued in some systems for a very long time and is gradually spreading to others.

---

[79] VII.–5:102(2).
[80] VIII.–1:301.
[81] VIII.–2:103.
[82] VIII.–5–101(1).

Security

General remarks

The importance of the principle of security in private law can be understood by considering some of the ways in which the security of natural and legal persons in the normal conducting of their lives and affairs can be threatened. The most obvious way is by unlawful invasions of their rights and interests or indeed by any unwanted disturbance of the status quo. Security, particularly in forward planning, is also threatened by uncertainty of outcomes. This can be caused by inaccessible or confusing or badly drafted laws. It can also be caused by the unpredictability of others. Will they perform their obligations? Will they do so properly? Will they give good value or attempt to cut corners and get away with the minimum possible? Will they be uncooperative and difficult to work with? Will they be able to pay? Are there effective remedies if things go wrong?

Contractual security

The main ingredients. The Principes directeurs identify as the main ingredients in contractual security:

> (1) the obligatory force of contracts (but subject to the possibility of challenge where an unforeseeable change of circumstances gravely prejudices the utility of the contract for one of the parties);
>
> (2) the fact that each party has duties flowing from contractual loyalty (i.e. to behave in accordance with the requirements of good faith; to co-operate when that is necessary for performance of the obligations; not to act inconsistently with prior declarations or conduct on which the other party has relied);
>
> (3) the right to enforce performance of the contractual obligations in accordance with the terms of the contract;
>
> (4) the fact that third parties must respect the situation created by the contract and may rely on that situation; and
>
> (5) the approach of “favouring the contract” (faveur pour le contrat) (whereby, in questions relating to interpretation, invalidity or performance, an approach which gives effect to the contract is preferred to one which does not, if the latter is harmful to the legitimate interests of one of the parties).[83]

Almost all of these ingredients of contractual security are clearly recognised and expressed in the DCFR. A most important further ingredient of contractual security is the availability of adequate remedies (in addition to enforcement of performance) for non-performance of the contractual obligations. This too is addressed by the DCFR and will be considered below immediately after the topic of enforcement of performance. Another ingredient of contractual security is the protection of reasonable reliance and expectations in situations not covered by the doctrine of contractual loyalty.

Third party respect and reliance. The only aspect of contractual security which is mentioned in the Principes directeurs but which does not appear explicitly in the DCFR is the fourth one - that third parties must respect the situation created by the contract and may rely on that situation. It was not thought necessary to provide for this as it is not precluded by any rule in the DCFR and, if understood in a reasonable way, seems to follow sufficiently from other rules and essential assumptions. One case of practical importance is where a person not being a party to a contract or an intended beneficiary of it nonetheless relies on the proper performance of a contractual obligation (e.g. a tenant's visitor claims damages from the landlord as the tenant could do under the contract, because the visitor falls down the stairs as a result of a broken handrail the landlord was obliged to repair under the contract). In the DCFR such cases fall under the rules on non-contractual liability of Book VI.

Protection of reasonable reliance and expectations. This is an aspect of security which appears in different parts of the DCFR. It first appears in relation to contract formation. It may happen that one party does not intend to undertake an obligation when that party's actions suggest to the other party that an obligation is being undertaken. A typical case is where an apparent offer is made by mistake. If the other party reasonably believed that the first party was undertaking the obligation as apparently stated, the other party's reliance will be protected in most legal systems. This may be achieved either by using the law on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another or, more simply, by holding the mistaken party to the outward appearance of what was said. The protection of reasonable reliance and expectations is a core aim of the DCFR, just as it was in PECL. Usually this protection is achieved by holding the mistaken party to the obligation which the other party reasonably assumed was being undertaken. Examples are the objective rules on interpretation[84], the restriction of avoidance for mistake to cases in which the non-mistaken party contributed to the mistake, should have known of it or shared it[85] and the rule that imposes on a business which has failed to comply with a pre-contractual information duty such obligations under a contract as the other party has reasonably expected as the consequence of the absence or incorrectness of the information.[86]

[83] See Arts 0:201 to 0:204.

The principle of binding force. If the parties have concluded a contract freely and with adequate information, then the contract should normally be treated as binding on them unless they (again freely) agree to modification or termination or, where the contract is for an indefinite period, one has given the other notice of a wish to end the relationship.[87] These rules are set out clearly in the DCFR.[88] It also sets out rules on the termination of a contractual relationship in more detail. Examples are - besides the rules on termination for non-performance – the right to terminate by notice where that is provided for by the contract terms and the right to terminate where the contract is for an indefinite duration. In the latter case the party wishing to terminate must give a reasonable period of notice.[89] The principle of binding force (often expressed still by the Latin tag, pacta sunt servanda) was qualified classically only when without the fault of either party performance of the contractual obligations became impossible for reasons that could not have been foreseen. A more modern development is the right of withdrawal granted to consumers in certain situations. The reasons for this exception vary, but can be seen in the specific situations where such withdrawal rights exist. One example is the right to withdraw from contracts negotiated away from business premises (e.g. at the doorstep or at distance).[90] In such situations the consumer may have been taken by surprise or have been less attentive than he or she would have been in a shop. A further example is provided by some complex contracts (e.g. timeshare contracts)[91], where consumers may need an additional period for reflection. The right to withdraw gives the consumer who concluded a contract in such situations a 'cooling off period' for acquiring additional

---

[84] See II.–8:101.
[85] See II.–7:201.
[86] See II.–3:107(3).
[87] The Principes directeurs state in Art 0-201 (Principle of binding force) paragraph (1): "A contract which is lawfully concluded has binding force between the parties". Article 0-103 (Freedom of the parties to modify or terminate the contract) provides that: "By their mutual agreement, the parties are free, at any moment, to terminate the contract or to modify it. Unilateral revocation is only effective in respect of contracts for an indefinite period."
[88] II.–1:103 read with III.–1:108 and III.–1:109.
[89] See III.–1:109.
[90] See II.–5:201.
[91] See II.–5:202.

information and for further consideration whether he or she wants to continue with the contract. For reasons of simplicity and legal certainty, withdrawal rights are granted to consumers, irrespective of whether they individually need protection, as a considerable number of consumers are considered to be typically in need of protection in such situations.

Exceptional change of circumstances. Many modern laws have recognised that in extreme circumstances it may be unjust to enforce the performance of contractual obligations that can literally still be performed according to the original contract terms if the circumstances in which the obligations were assumed were completely different to those in which they fall to be enforced. As noted above, this qualification is stated in general terms in the Principes directeurs.[92] It is also recognised in the DCFR but the parties remain free, if they wish, to exclude any possibility of adjustment without the consent of all the parties.[93]

Certainty or flexibility. A more general question is whether contractual security is better promoted by rigid rules or by rules which, by using open terms like "reasonable" or by other means, leave room for flexibility. The answer probably turns on the nature of the contract. In contracts for the purchase of certain commodities or types of incorporeal assets where prices fluctuate rapidly and where one deal is likely to be followed rapidly by another which relies on the first and so on within a short space of time, certainty is all important. Nobody wants a link in a chain of transactions to be broken by an appeal to some vague criterion. Certainty means security. However, in long term contracts for the provision of services of various kinds (including construction services), where the contractual relationship may last for years and where the background situation may change dramatically in the course of it, the reverse is true. Here true security comes from the knowledge that there are fair mechanisms in place to deal with changes in circumstances. It is for this reason that the default rules in the part of the DCFR on service contracts have special provisions on the giving of warnings of impending changes known to one party, on co-operation, on directions by the client and on variation of the contract.[94] The general rules on contractual and other obligations in Book III have to cater for all types of contract. So their provisions on changes of circumstances are much more restricted. However, even in the general rules it is arguable that it does more good than harm to build in a considerable measure of flexibility because open criteria will either be disapplied

---

[92] Art. 0-201(3): "In the course of performance, the binding force of the contract can be called into question if an unforeseeable change in circumstances seriously compromises the usefulness of the contract for one of the parties."
[93] II.–1:102. See also III.–1:110(3)(c).
[94] See e.g. IV.C.–2:102, IV.C.–2:103, IV.C.–2:107, IV.C.–2:108, IV.C.–2:109, IV.C.–2:110.

by highly specific standard terms devised for fields of commercial activity where certainty is particularly important or will disapply themselves automatically in cases where they are inappropriate. The effects of terms such as "reasonable" and "fair dealing" depend entirely on the circumstances. Rigid rules (e.g. "within 5 days" instead of "within a reasonable time") would be liable to increase insecurity by applying in circumstances where they were totally unexpected and unsuitable.

Good faith and fair dealing. As the Principes directeurs recognise, one party's contractual security is enhanced by the other's duty to act in accordance with the requirements of good faith. However, the converse of that is that there may be some uncertainty and insecurity for the person who is required to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing, which are rather open-ended concepts. Moreover, the role of good faith and fair dealing in the DCFR goes beyond the provision of contractual security. These concepts are therefore discussed later under the heading of justice.

Co-operation. Contractual security is also enhanced by the imposition of an obligation to co-operate. The Principes directeurs put it this way: "The parties are bound to cooperate with each other when this is necessary for the performance of their contract".[95] The DCFR provision goes a little further than the case where co-operation is necessary: the debtor and the creditor are obliged to co-operate with each other when and to the extent that this can reasonably be expected for the performance of the debtor's obligation.[96]

Inconsistent behaviour. A particular aspect of the protection of reasonable reliance and expectations is to prevent a party, on whose conduct another party has reasonably acted in reliance, from adopting an inconsistent position and thereby frustrating the reliance of the other party. This principle is often expressed in the Latin formula venire contra factum proprium. The Principes directeurs express it as follows: "No party shall act inconsistently with any prior statements made by the party or behaviour on the part of the party, upon which the other party may legitimately have relied." [97] The Interim Outline Edition of the DCFR did not contain an express rule of this nature; it was thought that it could be arrived at by applying the general principles of good faith and fair dealing. Inspired by the Principes directeurs, the

[95] Art. 0-303 (Duty to cooperate)
[96] III.–1:104.
[97] Art. 0-304 (Duty of consistency).

DCFR now incorporates an express provision which qualifies inconsistent behaviour as being contrary to good faith and fair dealing.[98]

Enforcement of performance. If one party fails to perform contractual obligations, the other should have an effective remedy. One of the main remedies under the DCFR is the right to enforce actual performance, whether the obligation which has not been performed is to pay money or is non-monetary, e.g. to do or to transfer something else. This basic idea is also expressed in the Principes directeurs.[99] The DCFR slightly modifies and supplements this principle by some exceptions as the right to enforce performance should not apply in various cases in which literal performance is impossible or would be inappropriate.[100] However, in a change from PECL,[101] under the DCFR the right to enforce performance is less of a "secondary" remedy, reflecting the underlying principle that obligations should be performed unless there are good reasons to the contrary.

Other remedies. In addition to the right to enforcement, the DCFR contains a full set of other remedies to protect the creditor in a contractual obligation: withholding of performance, termination, reduction of price and damages. The creditor faced with a non-performance which is not excused may normally exercise any of these remedies, and may use more than one remedy provided that the remedies sought are not incompatible.[102] If the non-performance is excused because of impossibility, the creditor may not enforce the obligation or claim damages, but the other remedies are available.[103] The remedy of termination provided in the DCFR is a powerful remedy which adds to the contractual security of the party faced with a fundamental non-performance by the other. The aggrieved party knows that if the expected counter-performance is not forthcoming it is possible to escape from the relationship and obtain what is wanted elsewhere. However the powerful nature of the remedy is also a threat to the other party's contractual security and, potentially at least, contrary to the idea of maintaining contractual relationships whenever possible. Termination will often leave the other party with a loss (for example, wasted costs incurred in preparing to perform; or loss caused by a change in the market). The creditor should not be entitled to use some minor non-performance, or a non-performance that can readily be put right, by the other as a justification [98] See I.–1:103 paragraph (2).

---

[99] Art. 0-202: "Each party can demand from the other party the performance of the other party's obligation as provided in the contract".
[100] See III.–3:301 and 3:302
[101] Compare PECL art 9:102, esp. (2)(d).
[102] III.–3:102.
[103] III.–3:101.

for termination. The rules governing termination therefore restrict termination to cases in which the creditor's interests will be seriously affected by the non-performance, while leaving the parties free to agree on termination in other circumstances.

Maintaining the contractual relationship. This aim, recognised in the Principes directeurs under the heading of faveur pour le contrat,[104] is also recognised in various provisions in the DCFR – for example those on interpretation,[105] and on the power of the court to adapt a contract which is affected by invalidity.[106] Also, the debtor's right to cure a non-conforming performance[107] can be seen as being aimed at the preservation of the contractual relationship, as this right may avoid the execution of remedies, including termination. The same aim underlies the provisions which supplement the parties' agreement when there are points which the parties appear to have overlooked. In a sense, many rules of contract law – for example, the remedies available for non-performance – are "default rules" that fill gaps in what the parties had agreed, thus helping to maintain an effective working relationship. But there are a number of rules dealing specifically with points which in some systems of law have led the courts to hold that there can be no obligation, even though it seems clear that the parties, despite the incompleteness of their agreement, wished to be bound. These include provisions on determination of the price and other terms.[108] Further, the DCFR provides a more general mechanism to supplement the agreement in order to make it workable when it is necessary to provide for a matter which the parties have not foreseen or provided for, thus "favouring the contract" and increasing contractual security.[109]

Other rules promoting security. The rules on personal security in Book IV.G obviously promote contractual security by giving the creditor an extra person from whom to seek performance if the debtor defaults. In a different way, the rules on prescription can be seen as promoting security by preventing disturbance of the status quo by the making of stale claims. This example shows that even in the area covered by the PECL the underlying principle of [104] Art. 0:204. "When the contract is subject to interpretation, or when its validity or performance is threatened, the effectiveness of the contract should be preferred if its destruction would harm the legitimate interests of one of the parties".

---

[105] See II.–8:106. "An interpretation which renders the terms of the contract lawful, or effective, is to be preferred to one which would not."

[106] See II.–7:203.

[107] III.–3:202 to III.–3:204.

[108] See II.–9:104 ff.

[109] II.–9:101. The relevant provisions of PECL were slightly less restrictive. They were changed in the light of representations by stakeholders.

security is not confined to contractual security for the creditor. Security is also important for the debtor.

Non-contractual obligations

Security a core aim and value in the law on non-contractual obligations. The protection and promotion of security is a core aim and value in the law on non-contractual obligations. These branches of the law can be regarded as supplementing contract law. Under contract law parties typically acquire assets. The protection of assets once acquired and the protection from infringement of innate rights of personality is not something which contract law is able to provide. That is the task of the law on non-contractual liability for damage (Book VI). A person who has parted with something without a legal basis, e.g. because the contract which prompted the performance is void, must be able to recover it. That is provided for in the law on unjustified enrichment (Book VII). In cases in which one party would have wanted action to be taken, in particular where help is rendered, but due to the pressure of circumstances or in a case of emergency it is not possible to obtain that party's consent, the situation has a resemblance to contract. But the security which would normally be provided for both parties by the conclusion of a contract for necessary services has to be provided by the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (Book V).

Protection of the status quo: non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another. The notion of contract would be meaningless if it were not flanked by a notion of compensation for loss involuntarily sustained. Contracts are aimed at a voluntary change in relationships. That presupposes, however, a regime for the protection of the status quo against involuntary changes. The law on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another is thus directed at reinstating the person suffering such damage in the position that person would have been in had the damage not occurred.[110] It does not seek to punish anybody, neither does it aspire to enrich the injured party. Nor does it aim at a social redistribution of wealth or at integrating an individual in a community founded on the principle of social solidarity. Rather it is aimed at protection.

Protection of the person A particular concern of non-contractual liability law is the protection of the person. The individual stands at the focus of the legal system. A person's rights to physical wellbeing (health, physical integrity, freedom) are of fundamental importance, as are other personality rights, in particular that of dignity and with it protection against discrimination and exposure. Injuries to the person give rise to non-economic loss besides eonomic loss; that also deserves compensation.

[110] VI.–6:101(1).

Protection of human rights. The non-contractual liability law of the DCFR has the function primarily (albeit not exclusively) of providing "horizontal" protection of human rights - that is to say, a protection not vis-à-vis the state, but in relation to fellow citizens and others subject to private law. This protection is provided in the first instance by the claim to reparation for loss suffered, but is not confined to that. Prevention of damage is better than making good the damage; hence Book VI confers on a person who would suffer it a right to prevent an impending damage.[111]

Protection of other rights and interests. Book VI contains specific provisions on various kinds of legally relevant damage (including loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) which may give rise to liability. However, it is not confined to providing security in such listed cases. Loss or injury can, subject to certain controlling provisions, also be legally relevant damage for the purposes of Book VI if it results from a violation of a right otherwise conferred by the law or of an interest worthy of legal protection.[112]

Protection of security by the law on unjustified enrichment.. The rules on unjustified enrichment respect the binding force of contracts in that a valid contract between the parties will provide a justifying basis for an enrichment conferred by one party on the other within the terms of that contract.[113] The rules on unjustified enrichment buttress the protection of rights within private law by the principle that a wrongdoer is not permitted to profit from the exploitation of another's rights. A non-innocent use of another's assets as a rule creates an obligation to pay for the value of that use,[114] so helping to remove any incentive to make improper use of another's property. Protection of reasonable reliance and expectations as a value and aim is relevant to both the elements of the claim and the grounds of defence within the rules on unjustified enrichment. A person who confers an enrichment on another in circumstances where it is reasonable to expect a counter-benefit, or the return of the benefit if events do not turn out as expected, is protected by being entitled to a reversal of the enrichment if the agreement on which reliance was placed turns out not to be valid or if the mutually anticipated outcome does not occur.[115] Equally, the interests of the recipient of a

[111] VI.–1:102.
[112] VI.–2:101.
[113] VII.–2:101(1)(a).
[114] See in particular VII.–4:101(c) and VII.–5:102(1).
[115] Cf. VII.–2:101(4).

benefit are protected if the recipient relies on the apparent entitlement to the benefit received. Such protection is conferred by the defence of disenrichment, where the recipient disposes of the benefit in a bona fide assumption that there is a right to do so,[116] or by a defence, protecting faith in the market, where an acquirer has given value to a third party in good faith for the benefit received.[117]

Property

Security a core aim. Security is a paramount value in relation property law and pervades the whole of Book VIII. The rules in Chapter 6 on the protection of ownership and possession provide a particularly clear example. Indeed, in relation to the acquisition and loss of ownership in movables, certainty and predictability of outcome may sometimes be more important that the actual content of the rules. Different approaches, even fundamentally different approaches, can all lead to acceptable results. Again, however, different values have to be balanced against each other. Some methods of increasing security might, for example, inhibit easy transferability. And certainty has to be balanced against fairness, as can be seen very clearly in the rules in Book VIII on production, combination and commingling.[118] It almost goes without saying that security is also a core aim of the Book on proprietary security. The whole objective is to enable parties to provide and obtain security for the proper performance of obligations. The rules are comprehensive and cover all types of proprietary security over moveable assets, including retention of ownership devices. They aim at maximum certainty by recommending a registration system for the effectiveness of a proprietary security against third parties.[119] A large part of Book IX is concerned with the detailed regulation of this system. They provide effective remedies for creditors wishing to enforce their secuirty.[120]

Protection of reasonable reliance and expectations. This value is strongly reflected in Book VIII. It can be seen most obviously in the rules on good faith acquisition from a person who has no right or authority to transfer ownership[121] and in the rules on the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession.[122] In the Book on proprietary security this value is most

[116] VII.–6:101.
[117] VII.–6:102.
[118] VIII.–5–101 to VIII.–5–105.
[119] Chapter 3.
[120] Chapter 7.
[121] VIII.–3:101 and VIII.–3:102.
[122] VIII.–4:101 to 4:302.

obviously reflected in rules protecting the good faith acquisition of assets, or of security rights in assets, free from a prior security right.[123]

The provision of effective remedies. This is just as important as in contract law but the remedies are different. They are designed to enable ownership and possession to be protected.[124] So the owner is given a right to obtain or recover possession of the goods from any person exercising physical control over them.[125] The possessor of goods is also given protective remedies against those who interfere unlawfully with the possession.[126]

Protection of the status quo. This value lies behind some of the rules in Book VIII designed to protect possession, particularly those for the protection of "better possession".[127]

Justice

General remarks

Justice is an all-pervading principle within the DCFR. It can conflict with other principles, such as efficiency, but is not lightly to be displaced. Justice is hard to define, impossible to measure and subjective at the edges, but clear cases of injustice are universally recognised and universally abhorred.

As with the other principles discussed above, there are several aspects to justice in the present context. Within the DCFR, promoting justice can refer to: ensuring that like are treated alike; not allowing people to rely on their own unlawful, dishonest or unreasonable conduct; not allowing people to take undue advantage of the weakness, misfortune or kindness of others; not making grossly excessive demands; and holding people responsible for the consequences of their own actions or their own creation of risks. Justice can also refer to protective justice – where protection is afforded, sometimes in a generalised preventative way, to those in a weak or vulnerable position.

Contract

Treating like alike. The most obvious manifestation of this aspect of justice in the DCFR is in the rules against discrimination[128] but it is an implicit assumption behind most of the rules on [123] IX.–2:108, IX.–2:109 and IX.–6:102.

[124] See Book VIII, Chapter 6.
[125] VIII.–6:101.
[126] VIII.–6:201 to VIII.–6:204.
[127] VIII.–6:301 and VIII.–6:302.

contracts and contractual obligations that parties should be treated equally by the law unless there is a good reason to the contrary. The big exception to the rule of equal treatment is that there are situations where businesses and consumers are not treated alike. This has been mentioned already and is discussed further below. The "equality" aspect of justice also surfaces in a rather different way in the notion that if both parties have obligations under a contract what goes for one party also goes for the other. This idea – sometimes called the principle of mutuality in contractual relations. – appears, for example, in the rule on the order of performance of reciprocal obligations: in the absence of any provision or indication to the contrary one party need not perform before the other.[129] It also appears in the rules on withholding performance until the other party performs[130] and in the rules allowing one party to terminate the relationship if there is a fundamental non-performance by the other,[131] although the primary explanation for these rules is the need to provide effective remedies to enhance contractual security. A further example of the "equality" aspect of justice can be seen in the rules on a plurality of debtors or creditors: the default rule is that as between themselves solidary debtors and creditors are liable or entitled in equal shares.[132]

Not allowing people to rely on their own unlawful, dishonest or unreasonable conduct. There are several examples of this aspect of justice in the DCFR provisions on contract law. A recurring and important idea is that parties are expected to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. For example, a party engaged in negotiations has a duty to negotiate in accordance with good faith and fair dealing and is liable for loss caused by a breach of the duty.[133] For later stages in the relationship it is provided that :

> A person has a duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing in performing an obligation, in exercising a right to performance, in pursuing or defending a remedy for non-performance, or in exercising a right to terminate an obligation or contractual relationship.[134]

A breach of this latter duty does not in itself give rise to a liability to pay damages but may prevent a party from exercising or relying on a right, remedy or defence. The Principes directeurs say that "Each party is bound to act in conformity with the requirements of good

---

[128] II.–2:101 to II.–2:105 and III.–1:105.
[129] III.–2:104.
[130] III.–3:401.
[131] III.–3:502.
[132] III.–4:106 and III.–4:204.
[133] II.–3:301 (2) and (3).
[134] III.–1:103.

faith and fair dealing, from the negotiation of the contract until all of its provisions have been given effect".[135] They also have an additional provision on performance: "Every contract must be performed in good faith. The parties may avail themselves of the contractual rights and terms only in accordance with the objective that justified their inclusion in the contract."[136] Taken together, these provisions are slightly wider than those of the DCFR but whether there would be much difference in practical effect may be doubted.

There are many specific provisions in the DCFR which can be regarded as concretisations of the idea that people should not be allowed to rely on their own unlawful, dishonest or unreasonable conduct. An example is the rule that the debtor is not liable for loss suffered by the creditor to the extent that the creditor could have reduced the loss by taking reasonable steps.[137] Another recurring example is in the requirements to give reasonable notice before certain steps are taken which would be harmful to the other party's interest. And there are several rules which allow a person to rely on an apparent situation only if that person is in good faith.[138] The rules on voidable contracts, even if their primary purpose is to ensure that a party can escape from a contract concluded in the absence of genuine freedom to contract, often have the incidental effect of preventing the other party from gaining an advantage from conduct such as fraud,[139] coercion or threats.[140]

No taking of undue advantage. This aspect overlaps with the last one. The most explicit recognition of this aspect of justice in contract law is the rule which allows a party, in carefully specified circumstances, to avoid a contract on the ground of unfair exploitation if the party was dependent on or had a relationship of trust with the other party, was in economic distress or had urgent needs, or was improvident, ignorant, inexperienced or lacking in bargaining skill. It is necessary that the other party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the vulnerability and exploited the first party's situation by taking an excessive benefit or grossly unfair advantage.[141] Again, it is clear that the rule also has the function of ensuring that the victim of the exploitation can escape from a contract concluded in the absence of genuine freedom to contract.

---

[135] Art. 0-301 (General duty of good faith and fair dealing).
[136] Art. 0-302 (Performance in good faith)
[137] III.–3:705.
[138] See e.g. II.–6:103(3) (apparent authority of representative); II.–9:201(Effect of simulation) paragraph (2).
[139] II.–7:205.
[140] II.–7:206.
[141] II.–7:207.

No grossly excessive demands. This aspect of justice is reflected in a number of rules which qualify the binding effect of contracts. It is recognised in the rule which regards non-performance of an obligation as excused (so that performance cannot be enforced and damages cannot be recovered) if the non-performance is due to an impediment beyond the debtor's control and if the debtor could not reasonably be expected to have avoided or overcome the impediment or its consequences.[142] It lies behind the rule allowing contractual obligations to be varied or terminated by a court if they have become so onerous as a result of an exceptional change of circumstances that it would be "manifestly unjust to hold the debtor to the obligation".[143] It is the basis of the rule that performance of an obligation cannot be specifically enforced if it would be unreasonably burdensome or expensive.[144] And it appears in the rule that a stipulated payment for non-performance can be reduced to a reasonable amount where it is "grossly excessive" in the circumstances.[145] It is clear, however, that this aspect of justice has to be kept within strict limits. The emphasis is on "grossly", and the oft-repeated warning that principles conflict and have to be balanced against each other is particularly apposite here. There is nothing against people profiting from a good bargain or losing from a bad one. The DCFR does not have any general notion that contracts can be challenged on the ground of lesion. This is explicitly illustrated in the rule excluding the adequacy of the price from the unfairness test in the part of the DCFR dealing with unfair contract terms.[146]

Responsibility for consequences. This aspect is most prominent in Book VI on non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another but it also surfaces in Book III. For example, a person cannot resort to a remedy for non-performance of an obligation to the extent that that person has caused the non-performance.[147]

Protecting the vulnerable. Many of the qualifications on freedom of contract mentioned above can also be explained as rules designed to protect the vulnerable. Here we consider some other examples. Within the DCFR the main example of this aspect of justice is the special protection afforded to consumers. This appears prominently in the rules on marketing and pre-contractual duties in Book II, Chapter 3; on the right of withdrawal in Book II, Chapter 5; and on unfair contract terms in Book II, Chapter 9, Section 4. It also appears

---

[142] III.–3:104.
[143] III.–1:110.
[144] III.–3:302.
[145] III.–3:710.
[146] II.–9:407(2). The exclusion applies only if the terms are drafted in plain and intelligible language.
[147] III.–3:101(3).

prominently in the parts of Book IV dealing with sale, the lease of goods and personal security.[148] Often the protection takes the form of recommending that, in a contract between a business and a consumer, it should not be possible for the parties to derogate from particular rules to the detriment of the consumer. Most of the consumer protection rules in the DCFR come from the acquis. They are, in substance if not in actual wording, part of EU law and of the laws of Member States and seem likely to remain so. The "consumer" is defined as "any natural person who is acting primarily for purposes which are not related to his or her trade, business or profession".[149] Whether the notion of the consumer is necessarily the best way of identifying those in need of special protection is a question which has been raised and will no doubt be raised again. Some argue that small businesses or "non-repeat players" of any kind may be equally in need of protection. However this question may be answered in the future, the point remains that the protection of those in a weak or vulnerable position can be considered an aspect of the underlying principle of justice within the DCFR. Another example in the DCFR is that some of the rules on contracts for the provision of treatment services (medical and other) afford special protection to patients.[150] And yet other examples are the protections afforded to the debtor when a right to performance is assigned[151] and the protections afforded to non-professional providers of personal security.[152] Both are in an inherently exposed position. People presented with standard terms prepared by the other party are also in a vulnerable position in practice, whether or not they are consumers, and there are rules in the DCFR to protect them.[153] Of a rather similar nature is the rule that in cases of doubt an ambiguous term which has not been individually negotiated will be interpreted against the person who supplied it.[154]

Non-contractual obligations

General. Most of the rules on obligations and corresponding rights in Book III apply to non-contractual as well as contractual obligations. Many of the points made above for contractual obligations therefore apply equally to non-contractual obligations. Moreover, most of the aspects of justice mentioned above feature strongly in the rules in Books V to VII.

---

[148] See e.g. (for sale) IV.A.–2:304, IV.A.–2:309, IV.A.–4:102, IV.A.–5:103, IV.A.–6:101 to IV.A.–6:106; (for the lease of goods) IV.B.–1:102 to IV.B.–1:104, IV.B.–3:105; IV.B.–6:102; and (for personal security) IV.G.–4:101 to IV.G.–4:107.
[149] I.–1:106(1).
[150] IV.C.–8:103; IV.C.–8:104; IV.C.–8:106; IV.C.–8:108; IV.C.–8:109(5); IV.C.–8:111.
[151] III.–5:118 and III.–5:119.
[152] See in particular IV.G.–4:101 to IV.G.–4:107.
[153] II.–9:103, II.–9:405 and II.–9:406.
[154] II.–8:103.

Not allowing people to gain an advantage from their own unlawful, dishonest or unreasonable conduct. An example of this aspect of justice in Book VI is the rule denying reparation (where to allow it would be contrary to public policy) for damage caused unintentionally by one criminal collaborator to another in the course of committing an offence.[155] It has already been noted that the law on unjustified enrichment recognises the principle that a wrongdoer is not permitted to profit from the exploitation of another's rights. A non-innocent use of another's assets as a rule creates an obligation to pay for the value of that use.[156] There are also several rules in the Book in unjustified enrichment from which a person can benefit only if in good faith.[157]

No taking of undue advantage. The rules on benevolent intervention reflect the idea that it would be unfair to allow a person who has been assisted in an emergency by the kindness of a stranger to take advantage of that kindness. The assisted person is therefore obliged to pay at least the necessary expenses incurred. This idea is also at the root of the law on unjustified enrichment. The rules on unjustified enrichment primarily give effect to a deep-rooted principle of justice that one person should not be permitted unfairly to profit at another's expense. Where one person, due to mistake, fraud or some equivalent reason, has conferred a benefit on another which would not have been conferred if the true circumstances had been known and the recipient has no countervailing reason to retain that benefit, other than that they have fortuitously received it, the recipient should not be permitted to retain the benefit to the prejudice of the person who was disadvantaged by conferring it.[158]

No grossly excessive demands. This aspect of justice is also found in Books V to VII. For example, it is at the root of rules which enable the normal entitlements of a benevolent intervener to be reduced in certain cases on grounds of fairness.[159] There are similar rules allowing for an equitable reduction in Book VI.[160] These reflect the fact that there may be a gross disproportion between the amount of blameworthiness and the amount of the damage caused: a very slight degree of negligence may cause enormous damage. This aspect of justice is also represented, as a countervailing consideration to the normal rules on liability, in the rules on unjustified enrichment. It is most relevant to the defence of disenrichment, where a

---

[155] VI.–5:103.
[156] See in particular VII.–4:101(c) and VII.–5:102(1).
[157] See e.g. VII.–4:103, VII.–5:101(4), VII.–5:102(2), VII.–5:104(2), VII.–6:101(2) and VII.–6:102.
[158] VII.–1:101.
[159] V.–3:104. Paragraph (2) allows regard to be had to "whether the liability of the principal would be excessive".
[160] VI.–6:202.

person who has disposed of a benefit in good faith is protected.[161] It would be unfair in such circumstances to burden an innocent recipient, who no longer has the benefit received, with the expense of the claimant's mistake.

Responsibility for consequences. This aspect of justice features prominently in the rules of Book VI on non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another. It is the very basis of this branch of the law. Responsibility for damage caused does not rest on a contractual undertaking; it rests instead on intention, negligence or a special responsibility for the source of the damage. Everyone is entitled to rely on neighbours observing the law and behaving as can be expected from a reasonably careful person in the circumstances of the case. It is a requirement of fairness that an employer should be responsible for damage which an employee has caused in the course of the employment. For the same reason the keeper of a motor vehicle, the owner of premises and the producer of goods must all answer for the personal injuries and damage to property which are caused by their things. In the other direction, a person may be unable to recover reparation, if that person consented to the damage suffered or knowingly accepted the risk.[162] Similarly, reparation may be reduced if there was contributory fault on the part of the person suffering the damage.[163]

Protecting the vulnerable. Although the law on non-contractual liability aims at protection, it is framed by reference to types of damage and not by reference to the need for protection of particular groups. There are, however, some recognitions of this aspect of the principle of justice. One is indirect: in the definition of negligence reference is made to failure to come up to the standard of care provided by a statutory provision whose purpose is the protection of the injured person (the assumption being that the statute protects a vulnerable group of which the injured person is a member).[164] The others are more direct but operate in the other direction, by protecting the people in the categories concerned from full liability for damage caused where it would be unfair to expose them to such liability. Children under 7, young persons under 18 and mentally incompetent persons are all given some protection in this way.[165]

Property

[161] VII.–6:101.
[162] VI.–5:101.
[163] VI.–5:102.
[164] VI.–3:102.
[165] VI.–3:103 and VI.–301.

Certainty is so important in property law that there are fewer rules which rely overtly on justice than in the other branches of the law already discussed. However, the idea of treating like alike (specifically, treating all the creditors of the transferor alike) played an important part in the debates on the question of whether ownership should as a rule pass on the conclusion of the relevant contract (e.g. a contract for the sale of goods) or only on delivery of the goods or in accordance with another system.[166] Moreover the notion of good faith plays a crucial role in the rules of Book VIII which deal with the acquisition of goods. Chapter 3 deals with good faith acquisition from a person who is not the owner. The main objective of those rules is the promotion of security by favouring the status quo but they are heavily qualified by notions of justice. The acquirer will get ownership only if the acquisition was in good faith.[167] The position is the same in the rules on the acquisition of ownership by continuous possession.[168] Justice is also an important element in the rules on the consequences of production, combination or commingling. It is not enough to produce an answer to the question of who owns the resulting goods. The result must also be fair. Where, for example, one person acquires ownership by producing something out of material owned by another, a fair result is achieved by giving the person who loses ownership a right to payment of an amount equal to the value of the material at the moment of production, secured by a proprietary security right in the new goods.[169] This prevents the taking of an undue advantage at the expense of another. The only example of consumer protection in Book VIII is the rule on the ownership of unsolicited goods sent by a business to a consumer.[170] Justice lies behind many of the rules in Book IX on proprietary security and particularly the rules on priority[171] and enforcement.[172] In this context it means not only fairness as between the security provider and the secured creditor but also fairness between different secured creditors and indeed others having a proprietary right in the encumbered assets. The emphasis is on the protective aspect of justice and it is the security provider who often requires protection. There are provisions designed to afford particular protection to consumer security providers.[173]

---

[166] For the outcome, see VIII.–2:101.
[167] VIII.–3:101. See also VIII.–3:101 on acquisition free of limited proprietary rights.
[168] VIII.–4:101.
[169] VIII.–5:201.
[170] VIII.–2:304.
[171] Chapter 4.
[172] Chapter 7.
[173] IX.–2:107, IX.–7:103(2), IX.–7:105(3), IX.–7:107, IX.–7:201(2), IX.–7:204, IX.–7:207(2).

Another aspect of justice is reflected in the rules on good faith acquisition of assets, or of security rights in assets, free from a prior security right.[174]

Efficiency

General remarks

The principle of efficiency lay behind many of the debates and decisions made in the course of preparing the DCFR. There are two overlapping aspects – efficiency for the purposes of the parties who might use the rules; and efficiency for wider public purposes.

Efficiency for the purposes of the parties

Minimal formal and procedural restrictions. The DCFR tries to keep formalities to a minimum. For example, neither writing nor any other formality is generally required for a contract or other juridical act.[175] There are exceptions for a few cases where protection seems to be specially required,[176] and it is recognised that in areas beyond the scope of the DCFR (such as conveyances of land or testaments) national laws may require writing or other formalities, but the general approach is informality. Where the parties to a transaction want writing or some formality for their own purposes they can stipulate for that. Another recurring example of this aspect of the principle of efficiency is that unnecessary procedural steps are kept to a minimum. Voidable contracts can be avoided by simple notice, without any need for court procedures.[177] Contractual relationships can be terminated in the same way if there has been a fundamental non-performance of the other party's obligations.[178] A right to performance can be assigned without the need for notification to the debtor.[179] The ownership of goods can be transferred without delivery.[180] Non-possessory proprietary security can be readily created. To be effective against third parties registration will often be necessary but, again, the formalities are kept to a minimum in the interests of efficiency.[181] The rules on set-off can be seen as based on the principle of efficiency. There is no reason for X to pay Y and then for Y to pay X, if the cross-payments can simply be set off against each other.[182] Again,

---

[174] IX.–2:108, IX.–2:109 and IX.–6:102.
[175] II.–1:106.
[176] E.g. personal security provided by a consumer (IV.G.–4:104) and donations (IV.H.–2:101).
[177] II.–7:209.
[178] III.–3:507.
[179] III.–5:104(2).
[180] VIII.–2:101
[181] See Book IX generally.
[182] II.–6:102.

in the DCFR set-off is not limited to court proceedings and can be effected by simple notice.[183]

Minimal substantive restrictions. The absence of any need for consideration or causa for the conclusion of an effective contract,[184] the recognition that there can be binding unilateral undertakings[185] and the recognition that contracts can confer rights on third parties[186] all promote efficiency (and freedom!) by making it easier for parties to achieve the legal results they want in the way they want without the need to resort to legal devices or distortions.

Provision of efficient default rules. It is an aid to efficiency to provide extensive default rules for common types of contracts and common types of contractual problem. This is particularly useful for individuals and small businesses who do not have the same legal resources as big businesses. If matters which experience shows are likely to cause difficulty can be regulated in advance, in a fair and reasonable manner, that is much more efficient than having to litigate about them later. It is hoped that the content of the default rules will also promote efficiency. The DCFR does not take the view (occasionally heard but rarely supported and never adopted) that default rules should be so unreasonable that the parties are pushed to negotiate and think things out for themselves. In cases involving only the parties to a transaction, it tries to base the default rules on what the parties would probably have agreed but for the costs of trying to do so. Such rules should produce efficient outcomes since that is presumably what the parties would have wanted.

Efficiency for wider public purposes

General. The rules in the DCFR are in general intended to be such as will promote economic welfare; and this is a criterion against which any legislative intervention should be checked. The promotion of market efficiency could be a useful outcome of the CFR project as a whole but that is not the aspect with which we are here concerned. The question here is the extent to which market efficiency is reflected in and promoted by the model rules within the DCFR. It is a matter of regret that the condensed timescale for the preparation and evaluation of the DCFR did not allow the evaluative work of the Economic Impact Group within the CoPECL project to be taken into account in the formulation of the model rules from the earliest stages. However, that evaluative work will form a valuable part of the corona of evaluation which

[183] III.–6:105.
[184] II.–4:101.
[185] II.–1:103(2).
[186] II.–9:301 to II.–9:303.

will surround the DCFR and will be available to those taking the project further. What follows is a very brief note of a few areas in which it could be said that this aspect of efficiency is exemplified in the DCFR.

Information duties. Rules which might be said to promote market efficiency (at least when compared to some more traditional approaches) are those on information duties in Book II.[187] There is a public value in better-informed decision making across the board. Interferences with freedom of contract may be justified on the ground that they can serve to promote economic welfare if there is reason to think that because of some market failure (such as that caused by inequality of information) the agreement is less than fully efficient. Consumer protection rules, for example, can be seen not only as protective for the benefit of typically weaker parties but also as favourable to general welfare because they may lead to more competition and thus to a better functioning of markets. This holds true in particular for information duties, where consumers' lack of information about either the characteristics of the goods sold or the terms being offered leads to forms of market failure. Rules that, in relation to the making of a contract of a particular type or in a particular situation, require one party (typically a business) to provide the other (typically a consumer) with specified information about its nature, terms and effect, where such information is needed for a well-informed decision and is not otherwise readily available to that other party, can be justified as promoting efficiency in the relevant market. Indeed a legislator should consider whether this is the justification for the proposed intervention, or whether it is based on a protective notion that consumers simply should have the right in question. The answer to that question may influence the choice of the extent and form of intervention.

Remedies for non-performance. The Article on stipulated payments for non-performance[188] could be said to be more favourable to market efficiency than rules which regard penalty clauses as completely unenforceable.[189] Questions might be asked about the second paragraph of the Article which allows a stipulated payment to be reduced to a reasonable amount when it

---

[187] II.–3:101 to II.–3:107. In De Geest and Kovac, "The Formation of Contracts in the DCFR – A law and Economics Perspective" (Unpublished) the authors cast doubt on the continued value of rights to avoid contracts on the basis of defects of consent and on the way in which the rules on invalidity for mistake etc are formulated in the DCFR.

[188] III.–3:710.

[189] See Schweizer, "Obligations and Remedies for non-Performance: Book III of the DCFR from an Economist's Perspective" http://www.wipol.uni-bonn.de/fileadmin/Fachbereich_Wirtschaft/Einrichtungen/Wirtschaftspolitik/Mitarbeiter/Prof._Dr._Urs_Schweizer/DCFRSchweizerRev.pdf; Ogus, "Measure of Damages, Expectation, Reliance and Opportunity Cost" (Unpublished) at pp 11-12.

is grossly excessive in relation to the loss resulting from the non-performance,[190] but here there are considerations of justice to weigh in the balance. The allowance of damages for pure economic loss seems to be preferable from the point of view of efficiency than the denial of such recovery, as happens under some systems.[191] It is difficult to see any justification for distinguishing between pure economic loss and loss caused by damage to property or injury to the person. The question of whether the other rules on damages are optimal from the point of view of general efficiency seems to be a matter of debate.[192]

Other rules. The rules on prescription in Book III, Chapter 7 are designed to promote efficiency by encouraging the prompt making of claims before evidence becomes stale and expensive to provide and by freeing assets which might otherwise be held against the possibility of old claims being made. The rules on withholding performance and terminating the contractual relationship in cases of anticipated non-performance[193] are designed to promote efficiency by not requiring the creditor to wait until non-performance actually happens. There are also rules which promote efficiency by discouraging the providing of unwanted performance.[194] The rules denying effect to contractual prohibitions on the alienation of assets are also designed to promote general efficiency by favouring the free circulation of goods and other assets.[195] A core aim of the rules in Book IX on proprietary security in movable assets is the facilitation of economic activity and economic welfare by enabling credit to be obtained on favourable terms against the provision of proprietary security.

Conclusion

There is one aspect of efficiency and security which deserves separate mention because it lay, consciously or subconsciously, behind many of the debates on the model rules and because it accounts for an overwhelming part of the actual shape and content of the DCFR. It is stability. People feel more secure with solutions which are familiar, tried, tested and traditional. Other things being more or less equal, such solutions also promote efficiency because there is no need to understand new rules and work out all their possible implications. A valuable store of knowledge and experience is not wasted. This aspect of security and efficiency seems to be

---

[190] Ibid.
[191] Schweizer, cited above, at p.9.
[192] See e.g. the differing views of Schweizer and Ogus cited above.
[193] III.–3:401 and III.–3:504.
[194] See III.–3:301(2), IV.C.–2:111 and IV.D.–6:101.
[195] See III.–5:108 and VIII.–1:301.

particularly valued in the legal sphere. There is a story of a famous judge of a former era who addressed a large and distinguished audience for a full hour and then said at the end, with perfect sincerity, “I hope I have said nothing new.” We would not go quite so far. But we hope and believe that there is much in the DCFR which will indeed be perfectly familiar to private lawyers from every part of Europe. We hope that no lawyer from any part of Europe will see it as an alien product but that all will see it as growing out of a shared tradition and a shared legal culture. It is our great good fortune that that legal culture, thanks to the work of many legal thinkers from many countries over many centuries, is strongly imbued with the principles of freedom, security, justice and efficiency.

Christian von Bar, Hugh Beale, Eric Clive, Hans Schulte-Nölke

Table of Destinations[196]

An entry in this table indicates a model rule which addresses the same legal issue as that dealt with in the relevant article of the PECL. It does not imply that the corresponding model rule is in the same terms or to the same effect. Relocations of Model Rules since the publication of the Interim Outline Edition (IOE) are indicated in italics in square brackets. Reference should be made to the IOE to ascertain changes in wording.

	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
Chapter 1	1:101 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 I.–1:101(1) – – –
	1:102 (1) (2)	 II.–1:102(1) II.–1:102(2)
	1:103	–
	1:104	–
	1:105	II.–1:104(1), (2)
	1:106	I.–1:102(1), (3), (4)
	1:107	–
	1:201 (1) (2)	 II.–3:301(2); III.–1:103(1) III.–1:103(2)
	1:202	III.–1:104
	1:301 (1) (2) (3) (4) (5) (6)	 I.–1:108(1) (with the Annex) [ex IOE I.–1:103(1) (with Annex 1: "Conduct")] I.–1:108(1) (with the Annex) [ex IOE I.–1:103(1) (with Annex 1: "Court")] – I.–1:108(1) (with the Annex) [ex IOE I.–1:103(1) (with Annex 1: "Non-performance")]; III.–1:102(3) [ex IOE III.–1:101] – I.–1:106 [ex IOE I.–1:105]

[196] Compiled by Daniel Smith (Osnabrück) with assistance from Dr. Stephen Swann (Osnabrück).

	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	1:302	I.–1:104 [ex IOE I.–1:103(1) (with Annex 1: "Reasonable")]
	1:303 (1) (2) (3) (4) (5) (6)	 I.–1:109(2) [ex IOE II.–1:106(2)] I.–1:109(3) [ex IOE II.–1:106(3)] I.–1:109(4) [ex IOE II.–1:106(4)] III.–3:106 I.–1:109(5) [ex IOE II.–1:106(5)] I.–1:109(1) [ex IOE II.–1:106(1)]
	1:304	I.–1:110 [ex IOE I.–1:104 (with Annex 2)]
	1:305	II.–1:105
Chapter 2	2:101 (1) (2)	 II.–4:101 II.–1:106(1) [ex IOE II.–1:107]
	2:102	II.–4:102
	2:103	II.–4:103
	2:104 (1) (2)	 II.–9:103(1) II.–9:103(3)(b)
	2:105	II.–4:104
	2:106	II.–4:105
	2:107	II.–1:103(2)
	2:201	II.–4:201
	2:202	II.–4:202(1)-(3)
	2:203	II.–4:203
	2:204	II.–4:204
	2:205	II.–4:205
	2:206	II.–4:206
	2:207	II.–4:207

	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	2:208	II.–4:208
	2:209 (1) (2) (3)	 II.–4:209(1) II.–4:209(2) I.–1:108(1) (with the Annex) [ex IOE I.–1:103(1) (with Annex 1: "Standard terms")]
	2:210	II.–4:210
	2:211	II.–4:211
	2:301 (1) (2) (3)	 II.–3:301(1) II.–3:301(3) II.–3:301(4)
	2:302	II.–3:302(1), (4)
Chapter 3	3:101 (1) (2) (3)	 II.–6:101(1) – II.–6:101(3)
	3:102	–
	3:201 (1) (2) (3)	 II.–6:103(2) II.–6:104(2) II.–6:103(3)
	3:202	II.–6:105
	3:203	II.–6:108
	3:204 (1) (2)	 II.–6:107(1) II.–6:107(2), (3)
	3:205	II.–6:109
	3:206	II.–6:104(3)
	3:207	II.–6:111(1), (2)
	3:208	–
	3:209 (1) (2) (3)	 II.–6:112(1) II.–6:112(3) II.–6:112(4)
	3:301	II.–6:106

	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	3:302	–
	3:303	–
	3:304	–
Chapter 4	4:101	II.–7:101(2)
	4:102	II.–7:102
	4:103	II.–7:201
	4:104	II.–7:202
	4:105	II.–7:203
	4:106	II.–7:204
	4:107	II.–7:205
	4:108	II.–7:206
	4:109	II.–7:207
	4:110 (1) (2)	 II.–9:403-9:405 [ex IOE II.–9:404-9:406]; II.–9:407(1) [ex IOE II.–9:408(1)]; II.–9:408 [ex IOE II.–9:409] II.–9:406(2) [ex IOE II.–9:407(2)]
	4:111	II.–7:208
	4:112	II.–7:209
	4:113 (1) (2)	 II.–7:210 –
	4:114	II.–7:211
	4:115	II.–7:212(2)
	4:116	II.–7:213
	4:117	II.–7:214
	4:118	II.–7:215
	4:119	II.–7:216
Chapter 5	5:101	II.–8:101

	5:102	II.–8:102(1)
	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	5:103	II.–8:103(1)
	5:104	II.–8:104
	5:105	II.–8:105
	5:106	II.–8:106
	5:107	II.–8:107
Chapter 6	6:101 (1) (2) (3)	 II.–9:102(1) II.–9:102(2) II.–9:102(3), (4)
	6:102	II.–9:101(2)
	6:103	II.–9:201(1)
	6:104	II.–9:104
	6:105	II.–9:105
	6:106	II.–9:106
	6:107	II.–9:107
	6:108	II.–9:108
	6:109	III.–1:109(2)
	6:110 (1) (2) (3)	 II.–9:301(1) II.–9:303(1), 2nd. sent. II.–9:303(2), (3)
	6:111	III.–1:110
Chapter 7	7:101	III.–2:101(1), (2)
	7:102 (1) (2) (3)	 III.–2:102(1) III.–2:102(2) III.–2:102(1)
	7:103	III.–2:103
	7:104	III.–2:104
	7:105	III.–2:105
	7:106	III.–2:107(1), (2)
	7:107	III.–2:108

	7:108	III.–2:109(1)–(3)
	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	7:109 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 III.–2:110(1) III.–2:110(2), (3) III.–2:110(4) III.–2:110(5)
	7:110	III.–2:111
	7:111	III.–2:112(1)
	7:112	III.–2:113(1)
Chapter 8	8:101	III.–3:101
	8:102	III.–3:102
	8:103	III.–3:502(2)
	8:104	III.–3:202; III.–3:203(a)
	8:105 (1) (2)	 III.–3:401(2) III.–3:505
	8:106 (1) (2) (3)	 III.–3:103(1) III.–3:103(2), (3) III.–3:503; III.–3:507(2)
	8:107	III.–2:106
	8:108	III.–3:104(1), (3), (5)
	8:109	III.–3:105(2)
Chapter 9	9:101	III.–3:301
	9:102 (1) (2) (3)	 III.–3:302(1), (2) III.–3:302(3), (5) III.–3:302(4)
	9:103	III.–3:303
	9:201 (1) (2)	 III.–3:401(1), (4) III.–3:401(2)
	9:301 (1) (2)	 III.–3:502(1) –
	9:302	III.–3:506(2)

	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	9:303 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 III.–3:507(1) III.–3:508 III.–3:508 III.–3:104(4)
	9:304	III.–3:504
	9:305	III.–3:509(1), (2)
	9:306	III.–3:511(2) [ex IOE III.–3:510 and III.–3:512(2)]
	9:307	III.–3:510 [ex IOE III.–3:511]
	9:308	III.–3:510 [ex IOE III.–3:511]
	9:309	III.–3:510 [ex IOE III.–3:511] III.–3:512 [ex IOE III.–3:513]
	9:401	III.–3:601
	9:501	III.–3:701
	9:502	III.–3:702
	9:503	III.–3:703
	9:504	III.–3:704
	9:505	III.–3:705
	9:506	III.–3:706
	9:507	III.–3:707
	9:508	III.–3:708
	9:509	III.–3:712 [ex IOE III.–3:710]
	9:510	III.–3:713 [ex IOE III.–3:711]
Chapter 10	10:101	III.–4:102
	10:102	III.–4:103
	10:103	III.–4:104
	10:104	III.–4:105

	10:105	III.–4:106
	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	10:106	III.–4:107
	10:107	III.–4:108
	10:108 (1) (2) (3)	 III.–4:109(1) – III.–4:109(2)
	10:109	III.–4:110
	10:110	III.–4:111
	10:111	III.–4:112
	10:201	III.–4:202
	10:202	III.–4:204
	10:203	III.–4:205
	10:204	III.–4:206
	10:205	III.–4:207
Chapter 11	11:101 (1) (2) (3) (4) (5)	 III.–5:101(1) III.–5:101(1) III.–5:101(2) III.–5:103(1) –
	11:102 (1) (2)	 III.–5:105(1) III.–5:106(1)
	11:103	III.–5:107
	11:104	III.–5:110
	11:201	III.–5:115
	11:202	III.–5:114(1), (2)
	11:203	III.–5:108(1); III.–5:122 [ex IOE III.–5:108(3)]
	11:204	III.–5:112(2), (4), (6)
	11:301 (1)	 III.–5:108(2), III.–5:108(3) [ex IOE III.–5:108(4), (5)]

	(2)	III.–5:108(4) [ex IOE III.–5:108(6)
	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	11:302	III.–5:109
	11:303 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 III.–5:119(1) [ex IOE III.–5:118(1)]; III.–5:120(2) [ex IOE III.–5:119(2)] III.–5:120(3), (4) [ex IOE III.–5:119(3), (4)] III.–5:120(1) [ex IOE III.–5:119(1)] III.–5:119(1) [ex IOE III.–5:118(1)]
	11:304	III.–5:119(2) [ex IOE III.–5:118(2)]
	11:305	–
	11:306	III.–5:117
	11:307	III.–5:116(1), (3)
	11:308	–
	11:401 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 III.–5:121(1) [ex IOE III.–5:120(1)] III.–5:114(3) III.–5:122 [ex IOE III.–5:108(3)] III.–5:122 [ex IOE III.–5:108(3)]
Chapter 12	12:101 (1) (2)	 III.–5:202(1)(a) [ex IOE III.–5:201(1)] III.–5:203(1) [ex IOE III.–5:201(1)] III.–5:203(2) [ex IOE III.–5:201(2)]
	12:102 (1) (2) (3)	 III.–5:205(3) [ex IOE III.–5:202(1)] III.–5:205(4) [ex IOE III.–5:202(2)] III.–5:205(5) [ex IOE III.–5:202(3)]

	(4)	III.–5:205(1) [ex IOE III.–5:202(4)]
	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	12:201 (1) (2)	 III.–5:302(1) [ex IOE III.–5:301(1)] III.–5:302(2) [ex IOE III.–5:301(2)]
Chapter 13	13:101	III.–6:102(a), (b)
	13:102	III.–6:103
	13:103	III.–6:104
	13:104	III.–6:105
	13:105	III.–6:106
	13:106	III.–6:107
	13:107	III.–6:108
Chapter 14	14:101	III.–7:101
	14:201	III.–7:201
	14:202	III.–7:202
	14:203	III.–7:203
	14:301	III.–7:301
	14:302	III.–7:302(1)-(3)
	14:303	III.–7:303(1), (2)
	14:304	III.–7:304
	14:305	III.–7:305
	14:306	III.–7:306
	14:307	III.–7:307
	14:401	III.–7:401
	14:402	III.–7:402
	14:501	III.–7:501
	14:502	III.–7:502
	14:503	III.–7:503
	14:601	III.–7:601
Chapter 15	15:101	II.–7:301

	15:102	II.–7:302
	15:103	–
	PECL	DCFR Model Rules
	15:104	II.–7:303
	15:105	II.–7:304
Chapter 16	16:101	III.–1:106(1)
	16:102	III.–1:106(4)
	16:103 (1) (2)	 III.–1:106(2) III.–1:106(3)
Chapter 17	17:101	III.–3:709

Table of Derivations

An entry in this table indicates an article of the PECL which addresses the same legal issue as that dealt with in the relevant model rule. It does not imply that the article of the PECL is in the same terms or to the same effect.

Relocations of Model Rules since the publication of the Interim Outline Edition (IOE) are indicated in italics in square brackets; newly inserted Articles or Paragraphs are pointed out by an asterisk. Reference should be made to the IOE to ascertain changes in wording.

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book I	I.–1:101
	(1)	1:101(1)
	(2)	–
	(3)	–
	I.–1:102
	(1)	1:106(1), 1st sent.
	(2)	–
	(3)	1:106(1), 2nd sent.
	(4)	1:106(2), 1st sent.
	(5)	–
	I.–1:103* [ex IOE Annex 1: "Good faith and fair dealing"]	–
	I.–1:104* [ex IOE Annex 1: "Reasonable"]	1:302
	I.–1:105* [ex IOE Annex 1: "Consumer" and "Business"]	–
	I.–1:106 [ex IOE I.–1:105]	1:301(6)
	I.–1:107 [ex IOE I.–1:106]	–
	I.–1:108
	(1) (with Annex: "Conduct"; "Court"; "Non-performance"; "Standard terms") [ex IOE I.–1:103(1) (with Annex 1: "Conduct"; "Court"; "Non-performance"; "Standard terms")]	1:301(1), (2), (4); 2:209(3)
	(2) [ex IOE I.–1:103(2)]	–

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book I	I.–1:109 [ex IOE II.–1:106] (1) (2) (3) (4) (5) (6) (7)	 1:303(6) 1:303(1) 1:303(2) 1:303(3) 1:303(5) – –
	I.–1:110* [ex IOE I.–1:104 (with Annex 2)]	1:304
Book II	II.–1:101	–
	II.–1:102 (1) (2) (3)	 1:102(1) 1:102(2) –
	II.–1:103 (1) (2) (3)	 – 2:107 –
	II.–1:104 (1) (2) (3)	 1:105(1) 1:105(2) –
	II.–1:105	1:305
	II.–1:106 [ex IOE II.–1:107] (1) (2)*	 2:101(2) –
	II.–1:107 [ex IOE II.–1:108]	–
	II.–1:108 [ex IOE II.–1:109]	–
	II.–1:109* [ex IOE Annex 1: "Standard terms"]	–
	II.–1:110 [ex IOE II.–9:403]	–
	II.–2:101	–
	II.–2:102	–

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book II	II.–2:103	–
	II.–2:104	–
	II.–2:105	–
	II.–3:101	–
	II.–3:102 (1) (2) (3)*	 – – –
	II.–3:103	–
	II.–3:104 (1) (2) (3) (4)* (5)*	– – – – – –
	II.–3:105 (1) (2) (3)* (4)*	– – – – –
	II.–3:106 (1) (2)* (3)	– – – –
	II.–3:107*	–
	II.–3:108*	–
	II.–3:109 [ex IOE II.–3:107]	–
	II.–3:201	–
	II.–3:202*	–
	II.–3:301 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 2:301(1) 1:201(1) 2:301(2) 2:301(3)
	II.–3:302 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 2:302, 1st sent. – – 2:302, 2nd sent.

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book II	II.–3:401	–
	II.–3:501*	–
	II.–4:101	2:101(1)
	II.–4:102	2:102
	II.–4:103	2:103
	II.–4:104	2:105
	II.–4:105	2:106
	II.–4:201	2:201
	II.–4:202 (1) (2) (3) (4)*	 2:202(1) 2:202(2) 2:202(3) –
	II.–4:203	2:203
	II.–4:204	2:204
	II.–4:205	2:205
	II.–4:206	2:206
	II.–4:207	2:207
	II.–4:208	2:208
	II.–4:209	2:209(1), (2)
	II.–4:210	2:210
	II.–4:211	2:211
	II.–4:301	–
	II.–4:302	–
	II.–4:303	–
	II.–5:101	–
	II.–5:102	–
	II.–5:103	–
	II.–5:104	–

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book II	II.–5:105 (1) (2) (3)* (4) (5) (6) (7)*	– – – – – – – –
	II.–5:106	–
	II.–5:201	–
	II.–5:202	–
	II.–6:101 (1) (2) (3)	 3:101(1) – 3:101(3)
	II.–6:102	–
	II.–6:103 (1) (2) (3)	 – 3:201(1) 3:201(3)
	II.–6:104 (1) (2) (3)	 – 3:201(2) 3:206
	II.–6:105	3:202
	II.–6:106	3:301
	II.–6:107 (1) (2) (3)	 3:204(1) 3:204(2), 1st sent. 3:204(2), 2nd sent.
	II.–6:108	3:203
	II.–6:109	3:205
	II.–6:110	–
	II.–6:111 (1) (2) (3)	 3:207(1) 3:207(2) –

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book II	II.–6:112 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 3:209(1) – 3:209(2) 3:209(3)
	II.–7:101 (1) (2) (3)	 – 4:101 –
	II.–7:102	4:102
	II.–7:201	4:103
	II.–7:202	4:104
	II.–7:203	4:105
	II.–7:204	4:106
	II.–7:205	4:107
	II.–7:206	4:108
	II.–7:207	4:109
	II.–7:208	4:111
	II.–7:209	4:112
	II.–7:210	4:113(1)
	II.–7:211	4:114
	II.–7:212 (1) (2) (3)	 – 4:115 –
	II.–7:213	4:116
	II.–7:214	4:117
	II.–7:215	4:118
	II.–7:216	4:119
	II.–7:301	15:101
	II.–7:302	15:102
	II.–7:303	15:104
	II.–7:304	15:105
	II.–8:101	5:101

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book II	II.–8:102 (1) (2)	 5:102 –
	II.–8:103 (1) (2)*	 5:103 –
	II.–8:104	5:104
	II.–8:105	5:105
	II.–8:106	5:106
	II.–8:107	5:107
	II.–8:201	–
	II.–8:202	–
	II.–9:101 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 – 6:102 – –
	II.–9:102 (1) (2) (3) (4) (5) (6)*	 6:101(1) 6:101(2) 6:101(3) 6:101(3) – –
	II.–9:103 (1) (2) (3)(a) (3)(b)	 2:104(1) – – 2:104(2)
	II.–9:104	6:104
	II.–9:105	6:105
	II.–9:106	6:106
	II.–9:107	6:107
	II.–9:108	6:108
	II.–9:109*	–
	II.–9:201 (1) (2)	 6:103 –

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book II	II.–9:301 (1) (2) (3)	 6:110(1) – –
	II.–9:302	–
	II.–9:303	6:110(2), (3)
	II.–9:401	–
	II.–9:402	–
	II.–9:403 [ex IOE II.–9:404]	4:110(1)
	II.–9:404 [ex IOE II.–9:405]	4:110(1)
	II.–9:405 [ex IOE II.–9:406]	4:110(1)
	II.–9:406 [ex IOE II.–9:407] (1) (2)	 – 4:110(2)
	II.–9:407 [ex IOE II.–9:408] (1) (2)	 4:110(1) –
	II.–9:408 [ex IOE II.–9:409]	4:110(1)
	II.–9:409 [ex IOE II.–9:410]	–
	II.–9:410 [ex IOE II.–9:411]	–
Book III	III.–1:101 [ex IOE III.–1:102]	–
	III.–1:102 [ex IOE III.–1:101] (1) (2) (3) (4) (5)	 – – 1:301(4) – –

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book III	III.–1:103 (1) (2) (3)	 1:201(1) 1:201(2) –
	III.–1:104	1:202
	III.–1:105	–
	III.–1:106 (1) (2) (3) (4) (5)	 16:101 16:103(1) 16:103(2) 16:102 –
	III.–1:107	–
	III.–1:108	–
	III.–1:109 (1) (2) (3)	 – 6:109 –
	III.–1:110	6:111
	III.–1:111*	–
	III.–2:101 (1) (2) (3)	 7:101(1) 7:101(2), (3) –
	III.–2:102 (1) (2) (3)* (4)*	 7:102(1), (3) 7:102(2) – –
	III.–2:103	7:103
	III.–2:104	7:104
	III.–2:105	7:105
	III.–2:106	8:107
	III.–2:107 (1) (2) (3)	 7:106(1) 7:106(2) –
	III.–2:108	7:107

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book III	III.–2:109 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 7:108(1) 7:108(2) 7:108(3) –
	III.–2:110 (1) (2) (3) (4) (5)	 7:109(1) 7:109(2) 7:109(2) 7:109(3) 7:109(4)
	III.–2:111	7:110
	III.–2:112 (1) (2)	 7:111 –
	III.–2:113 (1) (2)	 7:112 –
	III.–2:114	–
	III.–3:101	8:101
	III.–3:102	8:102
	III.–3:103 (1) (2) (3)	 8:106(1) 8:106(2), 1st sent. 8:106(2), 2nd sent.
	III.–3:104 (1) (2) (3) (4) (5)	 8:108(1) – 8:108(2) 9:303(4) 8:108(3)
	III.–3:105 (1) (2)	 – 8:109
	III.–3:106 (1) (2)	 1:303(4), 1st sent. 1:303(4), 2nd sent.
	III.–3:107	–
	III.–3:108*	–
	III.–3:201	–

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book III	III.–3:202	8:104
	III.–3:203 (a) (b) (c) (d)	 8:104 – – –
	III.–3:204	–
	III.–3:205*	–
	III.–3:301	9:101
	III.–3:302 (1) (2) (3) (4) (5)	 9:102(1) 9:102(1) 9:102(2)(a)-(c) 9:102(3) 9:102(2)(d)
	III.–3:303	9:103
	III.–3:401 (1) (2) (3) (4)	 9:201(1), 1st sent. 8:105(1); 9:201(2) – 9:201(1), 2nd sent.
	III.–3:501	–
	III.–3:502 (1) (2)	 9:301(1) 8:103
	III.–3:503	8:106(3)
	III.–3:504	9:304
	III.–3:505	8:105(2)
	III.–3:506 (1)* (2)	 – 9:302
	III.–3:507 (1) (2)	 9:303(1) 8:106(3)
	III.–3:508	9:303(2), (3)
	III.–3:509 (1) (2) (3)	 9:305(1) 9:305(2) –

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book III	III.–3:510 [ex IOE III.–3:511]	9:307; 9:308; 9:309
	III.–3:511 [ex IOE III.–3:512] (1) (2) [ex IOE III.–3:510] (3)*	 – 9:306 –
	III.–3:512 [ex IOE III.–3:513]	9:309
	III.–3:513 [ex IOE III.–3:514]	–
	III.–3:514 [ex IOE III.–3:515]	–
	III.–3:601	9:401
	III.–3:701	9:501
	III.–3:702	9:502
	III.–3:703	9:503
	III.–3:704	9:504
	III.–3:705	9:505
	III.–3:706	9:506
	III.–3:707	9:507
	III.–3:708	9:508
	III.–3:709	17:101
	III.–3:710*	–
	III.–3:711*	–
	III.–3:712 [ex IOE III.–3:710]	9:509
	III.–3:713 [ex IOE III.–3:711]	9:510
	III.–4:101	–
	III.–4:102	10:101
	III.–4:103	10:102
	III.–4:104	10:103
	III.–4:105	10:104

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book III	III.–4:106	10:105
	III.–4:107	10:106
	III.–4:108	10:107
	III.–4:109 (1) (2) (3)	 10:108(1) 10:108(3) –
	III.–4:110	10:109
	III.–4:111	10:110
	III.–4:112	10:111
	III.–4:201	–
	III.–4:202	10:201
	III.–4:203	–
	III.–4:204	10:202
	III.–4:205	10:203
	III.–4:206	10:204
	III.–4:207	10:205
	III.–5:101 (1) (2)	 11:101(1), (2) 11:101(3)
	III.–5:102	–
	III.–5:103 (1) (2)	 11:101(4) –
	III.–5:104 (1) (2)* (3)* (4)	 – – – –
	III.–5:105 (1) (2)	 11:102(1) –
	III.–5:106 (1) (2)	 11:102(2) –
	III.–5:107	11:103

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book III	III.–5:108 (1) (2) (3) [ex IOE III.–5:108(4), (5)] (4) [ex IOE III.–5:108(6)]	 11:203 11:301(1) 11:301(1) 11:301(2)
	III.–5:109	11:302
	III.–5:110	11:104
	III.–5:111	–
	III.–5:112 (1) (2) (3) (4) (5) (6) (7)	 – 11:204(a) – 11:204(b) – 11:204(c) –
	III.–5:113	–
	III.–5:114 (1) (2) (3)	 11:202(1) 11:202(2) 11:401(2)
	III.–5:115	11:201
	III.–5:116 (1) (2) (3)	 11:307(1) – 11:307(2)
	III.–5:117	11:306
	III.–5:118*	–
	III.–5:119 [ex IOE III.–5:118] (1) (2) (3)*	 11:303(1), (4) 11:304 –
	III.–5:120 [ex IOE III.–5:119] (1) (2) (3)	 11:303(3) 11:303(1) 11:303(2)

	(4)	11:303(2)
	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book III	III.–5:121 [ex IOE III.–5:120] (1) (2)	 11:401(1) –
	III.–5:122* [ex IOE III.–5:108(3)]	11:203; 11:401(3), (4)
	III.–5:201*	–
	III.–5:202 (1) (a) [ex IOE III.–5:201(1)] (b)* (c)* (2)*	 12:101(1) – – –
	III.–5:203 (1) [ex IOE III.–5:201(1)] (2) [ex IOE III.–5:201(2)] (3)*	 12:101(1) 12:101(2) –
	III.–5:204* III.–5:205 (1) [ex IOE III.–5:202(4)] (2)* (3) [ex IOE III.–5:202(1)] (4) [ex IOE III.–5:202(2)] (5) [ex IOE III.–5:202(3)]	– 12:102(4) – 12:102(1) 12:102(2) 12:102(3)
	III.–5:206*
	III.–5:207*
	III.–5:208*
	III.–5:209*
	III.–5:301*

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
Book III	III.–5:302 (1) [ex IOE III.–5:301(1)] (2) [ex IOE III.–5:301(1)] (3) [ex IOE III.–5:301(2)]	 12:201(1), 1st sent. 12:201(1), 2nd sent. 12:201(2)
	III.–5:401*	–
	III.–5:402*	–
	III.–6:101 (1) (2)*	 – –
	III.–6:102 (a), (b) (c)*	 13:101 –
	III.–6:103	13:102
	III.–6:104	13:103
	III.–6:105	13:104
	III.–6:106	13:105
	III.–6:107	13:106
	III.–6:108	13:107
	III.–6:201	–
	III.–7:101	14:101
	III.–7:201	14:201
	III.–7:202	14:202
	III.–7:203	14:203
	III.–7:301	14:301
	III.–7:302 (1) (2) (3) (4)*	 14:302(1) 14:302(2) 14:302(3) –
	III.–7:303 (1) (2) (3)* (4)*	 14:303(1) 14:303(2) – –

	DCFR Model Rules	PECL
	III.–7:304	14:304
	III.–7:305	14:305
	III.–7:306	14:306
	III.–7:307	14:307
	III.–7:401	14:401
	III.–7:402	14:402
	III.–7:501	14:501
	III.–7:502	14:502
	III.–7:503	14:503
	III.–7:601	14:601

Model Rules

BOOK I

GENERAL PROVISIONS

I.–1:101: Intended field of application

(1) These rules are intended to be used primarily in relation to contracts and other juridical acts, contractual and non-contractual rights and obligations and related property matters.

(2) They are not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation, in relation to rights and obligations of a public law nature or, except where otherwise provided, in relation to:

(a) the status or legal capacity of natural persons;
(b) wills and succession;
(c) family relationships, including matrimonial and similar relationships;
(d) bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments;
(e) employment relationships;
(f) the ownership of, or rights in security over, immovable property;
(g) the creation, capacity, internal organisation, regulation or dissolution of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporated;
(h) matters relating primarily to procedure or enforcement.

(3) Further restrictions on intended fields of application are contained in later Books.

COMMENTS

The model rules are the core part of this Draft Common Frame of Reference (DCFR). Underlying governing principles are discussed in the Introduction. Definitions are contained in various Articles and these, together with some definitions which are too general to have a natural home in any one Article, are set out in the Annex of definitions.

One of the main purposes of the DCFR is to act as an optional source of rules, concepts and terminology for those drafting legislative instruments and contracts. It is hoped that the rules may also prove useful to judges, arbiters, legal practitioners, researchers and law teachers.

Legislative acts and other instruments having binding force often have introductory provisions setting out their scope. However, the present rules have no binding force. They are there to be used and the way in which they may be used cannot be limited. So it would not be appropriate in this Article to state that the rules can be used only in certain areas and cannot be used in others. Nor would it be appropriate to set out in detail in this Article what is already set out in the table of contents. On the other hand, it is necessary to set out the main intended field of application and to indicate certain areas where the rules are not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation. This is done partly in this Article and partly in later Books.

Paragraph (1) sets out positively the intended field of application of the rules. They are intended to be used primarily in relation to contracts and other juridical acts, contractual and non-contractual rights and obligations and related property matters. The main focus of the earlier books is on contract law but there are provisions in later Books on, for example, non-contractual liability for damage caused to another (which often functions as an alternative to contractual liability), obligations to reverse unjustified enrichments (which often arise when a contract is void or avoided) and the transfer of property in movables (which is of particular importance in relation to the law on sale).

Paragraph (2) lists certain matters in relation to which the rules are not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation. Paragraph (2) does not mean that particular rules or concepts or terms could not be used in relation to the listed matters. The use to be made of the rules depends entirely on those using them. The paragraph just serves as a warning that the rules have not, except in a few places, been drafted with the listed matters in mind. It may be anticipated, for example, that:

> (a) the rules on non-contractual rights and obligations would not necessarily be used, or used without restriction or modification, in relation to rights and obligations of a public law nature arising from a statute;
>
> (b) the rules on juridical acts would not be used in relation to marriage, where one would expect to find special rules on constitution, invalidity and termination;
>
> (c) the rules on representation would not necessarily be used in relation to the representation of those with mental incapacity, where special protections may be required, or in relation to the representatives of a deceased person, where special considerations apply,
>
> (d) the rules on obligations might be modified in their application to alimentary obligations where, for example, the resources of the debtor may affect the amount due, there may be limitations on the recovery of arrears and the ordinary rules on a plurality of debtors or creditors may be modified,
>
> (e) the rules on assignment would not be used in relation to the transfer of negotiable instruments,
>
> (f) the rules on contractual rights and obligations might be substantially modified or supplemented in relation to employment relationships,
>
> (g) the rules on contracts might be modified or supplemented in relation to contracts relating to the sale or lease of land, where special formalities and registration requirements may be required, and
>
> (h) the rules on juridical acts and representation would not be used in relation to the formation, running or dissolution of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate.

The list in paragraph (2) is not meant to function as an absolute exclusion. Indeed some matters within the list are dealt with incidentally in the following rules. For example, the rules on proprietary security refer to security over negotiable instruments and will sometimes apply to items which are temporarily attached to land or buildings and therefore technically immovable property. The list is indicative only. Moreover it is not meant to imply that there are no other matters where the rules might require modification before being used for a particular purpose.

Paragraph (3) is just a pointer to the fact that later Books contain further restrictions on their intended fields of application.

I.–1:102: Interpretation and development

(1) These rules are to be interpreted and developed autonomously and in accordance with their objectives and the principles underlying them.

(2) They are to be read in the light of any applicable instruments guaranteeing human rights and fundamental freedoms and any applicable constitutional laws.

(3) In their interpretation and development regard should be had to the need to promote:

(a) uniformity of application;
(b) good faith and fair dealing; and
(c) legal certainty.

(4) Issues within the scope of the rules but not expressly settled by them are so far as possible to be settled in accordance with the principles underlying them.

(5) Where there is a general rule and a special rule applying to a particular situation within the scope of the general rule, the special rule prevails in any case of conflict.

COMMENTS

This Article, like the rest of the rules, has no binding force. If legislators or contracting parties use provisions or terms from the rules in their own laws or contracts it will be the rules on the interpretation of those laws or contracts which apply. However, legislative drafters, judges, arbiters, commentators, legal researchers and others may have occasion to interpret the rules, or build upon them, and this Article is intended to provide guidance on an appropriate approach.

Paragraph (1) provides that the rules are to be interpreted and developed autonomously and in accordance with their objectives and the principles underlying them. The reference to autonomous interpretation is to emphasise that the rules form a coherent system and are to be interpreted in that context and not through the lenses of national private laws. The objectives and underlying principles can be derived not only from the introductory remarks preceding these model rules but also from the later articles and the comments on them. The rules are part of a draft common frame of reference. The benefits which might accrue from their use could be greatly reduced if they were to be interpreted in widely differing ways. This is one idea behind paragraph (1). Another idea is that those interpreting the rules are encouraged to adopt a liberal or purposive interpretation rather than a narrowly literal interpretation. This has a static and a dynamic aspect. The first envisages foreseeable situations which may occur today: the second, unforeseeable situations which may occur in the future. The words “are to be …developed” are important. They are addressed primarily to the courts and are intended to make it clear that judges can develop the principles and rules incrementally.

Paragraph (2) provides that the rules are to be read in the light of any applicable instruments guaranteeing human rights and fundamental freedoms and any applicable constitutional laws. This broad formula is used because it is not possible to foresee what instruments or constitutional laws (European or national) might be relevant in the future. This provision serves as a reminder that such overriding laws may, for example, provide defences to liability not specifically mentioned in the rules. Human rights requirements may, of course, have a direct and powerful effect of their own right in relation to legislation or contracts which use the rules. In relation to contracts, the rules themselves provide later that a contract is of no effect to the extent that it is contrary to principles recognised as fundamental in the laws of the Member States of the European Union.

Paragraph (3) exhorts those who may have to interpret and develop the rules to have regard to the need to promote uniformity of application, good faith and fair dealing, and legal certainty. The reference to uniformity of application reinforces the point made in the first paragraph of the Article. The need to promote uniformity of application may be met for example by looking at prevailing scholarly opinion on the meaning of the text and established trends in judicial application of the rules. The reference to good faith and fair dealing applies to the whole of the rules. It relates to the role of good faith and fair dealing in the interpretation and development of the rules – reflecting the fact that such ideas have played an important role in the development of many useful principles and rules in national private laws. Later Books contain specific references to good faith and fair dealing for other purposes – for example, the rule that parties must perform their obligations and exercise their rights in a way which is in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. The reference to legal certainty serves to some extent as a counterweight to the reference to good faith and fair dealing in relation to interpretation and development: it recognises that certainty is very important, particularly in relation to certain types of commercial contract.

Paragraph (4) recognises that this text is intended to be a dynamic instrument to be built on over the years. Inevitably, new problems will be identified where it does not provide a clear solution, even although the problems are within its general field of application. The point of this paragraph is to encourage those legislative drafters and contracting parties who are using this instrument to solve these new problems in a way which is consistent with the general principles underlying it. These principles, as we have just seen, include the need to promote good faith and fair dealing. The objective of paragraph (4) is to foster and encourage coherence in European private law. There is a similar provision in CISG art. 7(2).

Paragraph (5) is probably not strictly necessary because this would usually be the only reasonable way of dealing with a conflict between a general rule and a more special rule. In some legal traditions, however, legislative drafters have a tendency to insert expressions such as “Subject to paragraph…” or “unless otherwise provided” whenever there is the slightest risk of conflict. The provision is intended to make it unnecessary to encumber the text with such expressions.

This Article is derived from PECL art. 1:106(1), with some drafting changes and additions.

I.–1:103: Good faith and fair dealing

(1) The expression "good faith and fair dealing" refers to a standard of conduct characterised by honesty, openness and consideration for the interests of the other party to the transaction or relationship in question.

(2) It is, in particular, contrary to good faith and fair dealing for a party to act inconsistently with that party's prior statements or conduct when the other party has reasonably relied on them to that other party's detriment.

COMMENTS

A. A standard of conduct

Many of the following model rules refer to good faith and fair dealing. It is therefore useful to define this composite expression at an early stage. It refers to a standard of conduct characterised by honesty, openness and consideration for the interests of the other party to the transaction or relationship in question. "Honesty" is not further defined and has its normal meaning. As the references in the later Articles are often to conduct which is contrary to good faith and fair dealing it will often be dishonesty (rather than honesty) which is at issue. Cheating is contrary to good faith and fair dealing. The reference to openness identifies another important characteristic of good faith and fair dealing. It denotes an element of transparency in a person's conduct. Consideration for the interests of the other party does not require that the other party's interests be preferred. Only a basic level of consideration will normally be required. A party to a legal relationship who is subject to a requirement to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing could, however, be expected not to act out of pure malice. A person should, for instance, not be entitled to exercise a remedy if doing so is of no benefit to anyone and if the only purpose is to harm the other party. What consideration is required for the interests of the other party will depend on the circumstances, including the nature of the contract. In many commercial contracts the rights and obligations of the parties will be so carefully regulated that in the normal course of events considerations of good faith and fair dealing will remain entirely in the background.

The composite expression "good faith and fair dealing" is different from "good faith" on its own. This, unless otherwise qualified, refers to a subjective state of mind generally characterised by a lack of knowledge that an apparent situation is not the true situation. Legal rules sometimes use "good faith" in this subjective sense. For example, a certain result may follow only if a purchaser has acquired goods in good faith, without notice of third-party claims in the goods or documents. Or a representative may have authority to affect the legal relations of a principal (so-called "apparent authority") when the principal's conduct induces the third party in good faith to believe that the representative has such authority.

B. Inconsistent behaviour

A particular application of the principle of good faith and fair dealing is to prevent a party, on whose statement or conduct the other party has reasonably acted in reliance, from adopting an inconsistent position. This translates directly into a number of provisions in these rules, e.g. the rule that a revocation of an offer is ineffective if it was reasonable for the offeree to rely on the offer as being irrevocable, and the offeree has acted in reliance on the offer; the rules under which a party by statement or conduct may be precluded from asserting a merger clause or a no-oral-modification clause to the extent that the other party has reasonably relied on the statement or conduct; the rule that an apparent authority of a representative which has been established by a principal's statements or conduct will bind the principal to the acts of the representative; and the rule that if a common intention of the parties as to the interpretation of a contract cannot be established, the contract is to be understood according to the meaning that reasonable persons of the same kind as the parties would give to it in the same circumstances.

The rule is, however, broader than any of these specific provisions. It is a general principle that a person who has induced another person to incur a change of position on the faith of an act should not be allowed to set up the invalidity of an act or another reason for its not being binding. See III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) paragraph (3) when read with the present Article.

Illustration
An importing firm asked its bank to collect on a negotiable instrument. The bank mistakenly reported to the customer that the money had been paid and paid the customer its value. When it was discovered that the amount had not been paid, the importer had irrevocably credited the amount to its foreign business partner. The bank is precluded from reclaiming the payment.

NOTES

1. See the Notes to III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing).

I.–1:104: Reasonableness

Reasonableness is to be objectively ascertained, having regard to the nature and purpose of what is being done, to the circumstances of the case and to any relevant usages and practices.

COMMENTS

Reasonableness is another concept which is frequently employed in the model rules. The present Article makes it clear that it is to be objectively ascertained. This was expressed in the Principles of European Contract Law (PECL art. 1:302) by saying that:

> "reasonableness is to be judged by what persons acting in good faith and in the same situation as the parties would consider to be reasonable. In particular, in assessing what is reasonable the nature and purpose of the contract, the circumstances of the case and the usages and practices of the trades or professions involved should be taken into account."

The policy is the same under the present Article although it is expressed slightly differently, partly because the reference to fictitious parties is unnecessary and partly because in the present context the concept goes beyond contractual situations. It also seems undesirable to mix up good faith and reasonableness.

The concepts of good faith and fair dealing on the one hand and reasonableness on the other are different. Something can be contrary to good faith and fair dealing and yet be reasonable. For example, it would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to allow the other party to believe, and to act on the belief to that party's prejudice, that a certain right would not be exercised and then to exercise that right. And yet the actual exercise of the right in itself, in the absence of the inconsistent conduct, might be perfectly reasonable. Conversely, something can be unreasonable and yet not be contrary to good faith and fair dealing. For example, a representative might explain that the policy of the principal was to insist on a very severe penalty clause being inserted in the terms of all contracts of a certain type. The representative might warn the other party expressly about the dangers of accepting the clause. The insertion of the clause might be unreasonable in the particular case but if it is openly discussed and if the other party accepts it freely it is not contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

NOTES

1. Few national systems appear to have an equivalent provision. The DUTCH CC art. 3:12 provides, however, that "in determining what reasonableness and equity require, reference must be made to generally accepted principles of law, to current judicial views in the Netherlands and to the particular societal and private interests involved".

I.–1:105: "Consumer" and "business"

(1) A "consumer" means any natural person who is acting primarily for purposes which are not related to his or her trade, business or profession.

(2) A "business" means any natural or legal person, irrespective of whether publicly or privately owned, who is acting for purposes relating to the person's self-employed trade, work or profession, even if the person does not intend to make a profit in the course of the activity.

(3) A person who is within both of the preceding paragraphs is regarded as falling exclusively within paragraph (1) in relation to a rule which would provide protection for that person if that person were a consumer, and otherwise as falling exclusively within paragraph (2).

COMMENTS

A. General

The definitions of consumer and business are modelled on common features to be found in EC directives in the field of consumer protection law, as well as in EC procedural law and EC legislation on conflict of laws. Paragraph (1) defines a consumer as: (1) a natural person; (2) who is acting for purposes which are outside his or her business, commercial or trade activity. Paragraph (2) provides an overarching definition of the concept of "business" whose function is to determine whether a consumer is protected vis-à-vis his or her counterpart by specific provisions of the DCFR such as information duties, e.g. II.–3:102 (Specific duties for businesses marketing goods or services to consumers) or a right of withdrawal, e.g. II.–5:201 (Contracts negotiated away from business premises). Finally, paragraph (3) contains a clarification with regard to "mixed purpose transactions", i.e. contracts that serve both a private and business purpose.

B. Consumer

Unlike the laws of some Member States which extend the scope of several consumer protection provisions to certain legal persons, the notion of consumer in the DCFR is limited to natural persons.

In order to be considered a consumer, a person must primarily act for "purposes which are not related to his or her trade, business or profession". Thus, contracts which are concluded for personal, family or household use are considered consumer transactions. The definition of consumer also covers cases where the consumer intends to make a profit, e.g. by later reselling the goods bought, unless this person does so on a regular basis. The criteria for distinguishing a casual resale from business activity are the frequency and the volume of such transactions.

Illustration 1
A occasionally buys books and after reading sells them in internet auctions. If the frequency and volume of such transactions are rather low, A is still considered a consumer.

While the laws of several Member States extend the scope of consumer protection rules also to businesspersons concluding atypical contracts, the DCFR does not provide for such extensions of the term "consumer".

As the definition used in the DCFR does not refer to self-employed activities but any "trade, business or profession", an employee concluding a contract with his or her employer is – unlike under GERMAN law – not considered as a consumer.

If a would-be consumer deliberately deceives the other party by pretending to act in a business capacity, the consumer protection rules do not apply as this person is acting in breach of the principle of good faith (venire contra factum proprium). In contrast, it is not entirely clear under EC law if consumer protection rules apply if the would-be consumer negligently creates the impression that he or she is acting in the course of a business. According to the ECJ's decision Johann Gruber v. Bay Wa AG, ECJ 20 January 2005, C-464/01, ECR 2005, I-439 a person cannot claim the protection of arts. 13 to 15 of the Brussels Convention if this person negligently has created the impression that he or she was acting in the course of a business (paras. 51 et seq.). However, in the field of substantive consumer protection law, this approach would undermine the purpose of mandatory consumer protection rules.

C. Business

A "business" is a person who is acting for purposes relating to this person's self-employed trade, work or profession. The business has to act on a somewhat regular basis and in a capacity for which it normally requires remuneration. However, it is not necessary that the business intends to make a profit in the course of this activity (see below). In addition, it is irrelevant if the activity is the one normally conducted by the business.

> Illustration 2
> A bookshop sells its old computers and office equipment to a private person. Consumer protection rules apply in favour of the buyer. It is irrelevant that the goods sold are not of the kind normally sold by the business.

The wording "irrespective of whether publicly or privately owned", clarifies that a public body can also qualify as a "business". Thus the DCFR provisions for business to consumer transactions also apply to private law contracts between consumers and public bodies.

A different question is whether public law contracts are also covered. According to I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2), the DCFR is not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation, in relation to rights and obligations of a public law nature. Thus it has to be decided on a case by case basis whether the DCFR rules apply also to public law contracts.

The DCFR furthermore clarifies that persons who do not intend to make a profit are included in the notion of business. The intention to make a profit relates to an internal business factor, which in some circumstances can be proven only with difficulty and which businesses can manipulate (for example by transferring profits within a corporate group). Such internal factors of the business should have no bearing on whether consumers are protected. In addition, EC law supports the view that a profit motive is irrelevant as several directives relate to public bodies.

Conduct by a third party who is acting in the name or on behalf of a business is attributed to the business (see II.–6:105 (When representative's act affects principal's legal position)). A business therefore does not lose this quality by using a consumer as its agent or representative.

A consumer who uses a business intermediary, e.g. a commercial agent, broker or any other professional intermediary, for concluding contracts with other private persons will benefit from consumer protection rules in the internal relationship with the intermediary.

In contrast, the DCFR does not decide the question whether in such a case consumer protection rules are also applicable in the external relationship, i.e. between two private persons one of whom is represented by a business. There is good reason to argue that in such cases consumers need similar protection as in an ordinary business to consumer contract as the other party will benefit from the professional expertise of the business intermediary. However, the extension of consumer protection should not include person to person trading platforms, e.g. online market places, where the platform provider is not involved in the conclusion of the contract. Thus, it is left to the courts to establish clear criteria as to when the role of the intermediary is strong enough to justify the application of consumer protection rules.

D. Mixed purpose contracts

Paragraph (3) deals with the situation which may occasionally arise where there is an overlap between the definitions of "consumer" and "business". This can happen because there is, deliberately, no "primarily" in paragraph (2). A person who is buying a computer which is to be used primarily for personal purposes but to some small extent for business purposes is treated as a consumer for the purposes of any rule protecting consumer buyers. A person who is selling a computer which is used primarily for personal purposes but to some small extent for business purposes is treated as a business in relation to any rule protecting consumer buyers. The purpose is to give the buyer, if a consumer, the protections which would apply to a consumer dealing with a business. The buyer should not have to assess the extent to which the seller is acting for business purposes

NOTES

I. Overarching consumer definitions

1. Directives 93/13/EEC, 97/7/EC, 1999/44/EC, 2000/31/EC and 2002/65/EC define the term "consumer" as a natural person who is acting for purposes which are outside his "trade, business and/or profession". Slightly deviating from this definition Directive 85/577/EEC defines a consumer as "a natural person who, in transactions covered by this Directive, is acting for purposes which can be regarded as outside his trade or profession" (art. 2). The same definition is used by Directive 87/102/EEC. Similarly, the Directive 2005/29/EC on unfair commercial practices defines the term "consumer" as "any natural person who, in commercial practices covered by this Directive, is acting for purposes which are outside his trade, business, craft or profession".

According to Directive 98/6/EC a consumer is a "natural person who buys a product for purposes that do not fall within the sphere of his commercial or professional capacity". The same definition is used in Directive 94/47/EC, although this directive does not use the term "consumer" but "purchaser".

2. Despite slight terminological deviations, all of the Directives mentioned share a common core, providing that a consumer is: (1) a natural person; (2) who is acting for purposes which are outside his or her business, commercial or trade activity. This approach is not only applied in most of EC consumer protection directives but also in European procedural law (arts. 13 to 15 of the Brussels Convention, now arts. 15 to 17 Brussels I Regulation (Regulation 44/2001/EC) and European rules on conflict of laws (Rome Convention art. 5). In contrast, under Directive 90/314/EEC, the term "consumer" also covers parties who conclude package travel contracts for business related purposes. The consumer notion has been interpreted rather narrowly by the European Court of Justice when dealing with the substantive acquis (see e.g. Criminal proceedings v. Patrice Di Pinto, ECJ 14 March 1991, C-361/89, ECR 1991, I-1189 and Bayerische Hypotheken- und Wechselbank AG v. Edgard Dietzinger, ECJ 17 March 1998, C-45/96, ECR 1998, I-1199, both dealing with the Doorstep Selling Directive).

3. Many Member States have harmonised the notion of consumer used in the various directives and established a definition in national law, which is equally applicable in various consumer protection acts. Such single and uniform notions of consumer can be found in AUSTRIA (ConsProtA § 1(1) no. 2 in conjunction with (2)), the CZECH REPUBLIC (CC art. 52(3)), DENMARK (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act § 3(1)), FINLAND (ConsProtA chap. 1 § 4), GERMANY (CC § 13), GREECE (ConsProtA art. 1(4) lit. (α)), ITALY (ConsC art. 3(1) lit. (a) and (b)), LATVIA (ConsProtA art. 1(1)(3)), MALTA (Consumer Affairs Act art. 2), the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:5(1)), POLAND (CC art. 22), SLOVENIA (ConsProtA art. 1(2)) and SPAIN (ConsProtA art. 3) and SWEDEN (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act § 2). In other Member States several overarching consumer definitions exist, e.g. BELGIUM (ConsProtA art. 1 no. 7; Trade Practices Act art. 2 no. 2), ESTONIA (ConsProtA § 2 no. 1; LOA § 34), LITHUANIA (CC art. 6.350(1)), PORTUGAL (ConsProtA art. 2(1); Doorstep Transactions Decree-Law art. 1(3)(a)), SLOVAKIA (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act § 1; CC § 52).

4. In contrast, CYPRUS, FRANCE, HUNGARY, IRELAND, LUXEMBOURG, and the UNITED KINGDOM do not know any legal definition of consumer overarching the directives. Rather they either define the consumer separately in every transposing act or abstain from such a definition in whole or in part. In FRANCE the term consumer is not defined in legislation at all, but case law has extended the definition given by the provisions on démarchage (ConsC art. L. 121-22). A consumer is a contracting party that enters into a contract that is not in direct relation with its professional activity (for unfair contract terms, Civ. I, 3 and 30 January 1996, Bull. Civ. I, no. 9 and 55, JCP 1996.II.22654, note Leveneur; D. 1996, 228, note Paisant). The French legislator meanwhile explicitly abstains from defining the term consumer, as in this way better account can be taken of different situations (cf. e.g. most recently, in transposition of the Consumer Sales Directive, the Rapport au Président de la République relatif à l'ordonnance n° 2005-136 du 17 février 2005 relative à la garantie de la conformité du bien au contrat due par le vendeur au consommateur, JO n° 41 du 18 février 2005, 2777).

5. In MALTA, any other class or category of persons whether natural or legal may, from time to time, be designated as "consumers" for all or for any of the purposes of the Consumer Affairs Act by the Minister responsible for consumer affairs after consulting the Consumer Affairs Council.

6. Even if the term consumer is defined in different legal acts in the Member States, this does not necessarily mean that these definitions differ from each other in substance. On the contrary, it can be stated that in most Member States, in spite of the scattered rules in separate legislative acts, the definitions by and large accord, as they are orientated on Community law and the Community law for its own part exhibits a common core. Difficulties in applying consumer protection legislative acts do of course arise when a member state uses differing definitions of consumer and it is not clear whether one or the other is applicable in each individual case. Generally, however, this does not affect the proper transposition of the relevant directives, since those Member States go beyond the minimum level of protection. In HUNGARY, the notion of consumer is regulated differently in the CC, the Consumer Protection Act, the Government Decree on Doorstep Selling, the Hungarian Competition Act and the Business Advertising Activity Act, and it is often not clear which definition is applicable. However, the planned modifications of the Hungarian CC could clear up these ambiguities.

II. Extensions of the notion of consumer

7. Notion of the final addressee: In SPAIN it was an essential prerequisite that the consumer or user "acquires, uses or enjoys as final addressee some goods", and without "the aim of integrating them in production, transformation or commercialisation processes" (cf. Consumer Protection Act 1984 (Ley 26/1984) art. 1(2) and (3). These notions are omitted in the new definition set out by ConsProtA art. 3. A comparable notion still exists in GREECE, although with the difference that Greek law does not have any limitation for private purpose. According to ConsProtA art. 1(4)(a) a consumer is every "natural or legal person, to whom products or services on a market are aimed, and who makes use of such products and services, so long as the person is the end recipient." Also in HUNGARY the notion of end recipient is applied; according to ConsProtA art. 2 lit. (i) a "consumer transaction" is the supply of goods or the provision of services and, furthermore, the supply of free samples of goods directly to the consumer as final recipient (cf. the decision of the Hungarian Supreme Court, Legf. Bír. Kfv. III. 37.675/2003). The LUXEMBOURG ConsProtA uses the term final addressee (consommateur final privé) in some cases as well (e.g. art. 1-2 and art. 2 no. 20 in relation to the control of unfair terms), without defining what this term means.

8. The notion of "final addressee" in GREECE is wider than the term "consumer" established in the Directives, since it also includes atypical transactions which are not related to a further transfer. However, it is acknowledged that in practice such a broad definition of "consumer" can lead to difficulties in applying the law. Also the need for a teleological reduction is stressed in academic literature and the view is propounded that the regulations should not apply to every final addressee. Rather, in each case it should be verified that the relevant person or entity is in need of protection. In order to qualify as being in need of protection, the end consumer must not be acting within a business or commercial capacity in concluding the transactions in question.

9. Extension to businesspersons concluding atypical contracts: In FRANCE, according to well-established case-law, a consumer is a (natural or legal) person concluding contracts which are not directly related (qui n'ont pas de rapport direct) with his or her profession. The leading decision in this regard was that of the Cass.civ. of 28 April 1987 (Cass.civ. 28 April 1987, JCP 1987. II. 20893 Juris-classeur periodique). In the case under dispute an estate agency purchased for its business premises an alarm system, which was not in good working order. A clause in the general conditions of business however declared that the buyer could not rescind the contract or claim damages. In the view of the Cass. civ. the French ConsC was nonetheless applicable, because the subject matter of the contract did not bear any direct relation to the substance of the business activity and because the technical expertise of an estate agency did not encompass the technology of alarm systems, by reason of which the buyer must be treated just as any other consumer. In later decisions the Cass. civ. has distanced itself from its wide interpretation and pointed out that the decisive criterion for the applicability of the ConsC is not the technical competence of the "professional", but rather whether the contract has a direct relation to the business activity (Cass.civ. 24 January 1995, D. 1995, Jur. 327-329). This case-law has been affirmed in numerous decisions (cf. Cass.civ. 23 November 1999, Juris-classeur, CCC 2000, commentaires, 25; Cass.civ. 23 February 1999, D. 1999, I.R., 82). Protection for businesses who conclude contracts outside of their usual field of business also exists in POLAND and LATVIA. This thinking underlies the LUXEMBOURG Consumer Sales Act; according to its art. 2 no. 2 a "consommateur" is "une personne physique qui agit à des fins qui n'ont pas de rapport direct avec son activité professionnelle ou commerciale". The practical relevance of this group of persons depends on the respective interpretation of the notion of "usual field of business". If this is limited to elementary core activities, then businesses will frequently profit from consumer protection rules. Conversely, if "usual field of business" comprises all transactions which are not completely atypical, businesses will rarely be considered consumers.

10. In the UNITED KINGDOM under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1997 s. 12(1) businesses engaged in a transaction outside their normal business purposes can claim to be "dealing as consumer" since the decision in R. & B. Customs Brokers Co. Ltd. v. United Dominions Trust Ltd. [1988] 1 WLR 321. In this case, the plaintiff, a shipping brokerage, purchased a second-hand car for the personal and business use of the company's directors. Several similar purchases had been made before. The contract excluded liability for breach of certain statutory implied terms. According to the Unfair Contract Terms Act s. 6 (2)(b), where a business sells to a consumer, terms as to quality and fitness for purpose implied by statute (namely Sale of Goods Act 1979 ss. 13-15) cannot be excluded or restricted by reference to any contract term. Therefore, it was to be decided whether the buyer was "dealing as consumer". The CA held that no sufficient degree of regularity had been shown by the defendant so as to establish that the activity was an integral part of the plaintiff's business. Rather, the purchase was only incidental to the company's business activity. The plaintiff was therefore dealing as a consumer within the terms of the Unfair Contract Terms Act s. 12(1). Thus the defendant could not exclude liability for breach of the implied term. Whether this wide definition of consumer can be applied beyond the context of the Unfair Contract Terms Act for other consumer protection legal acts, is questionable however. Firstly it must be noted that the Unfair Contract Terms Act only partly serves the implementation of directive law (namely in relation to the Consumer Sales Directive) and the UK otherwise uses a notion of consumer which is closely orientated towards Community law. Secondly, the cited decision has in the meantime been placed in doubt, as in Stevenson v. Rogers the CA held that for the purposes of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 14 any sale by a business is "in the course of a business" (Stevenson v. Rogers [1999] QB 1028). Thus a solicitor selling off a computer no longer needed in his or her office would, for this purpose, be selling the computer in the course of business.

11. In ITALY some courts similarly propounded the view, for a time, that a person should be protected as a consumer if the relevant transaction does not belong to his or her core business activities (CFI Roma, 20 October 1999, Giust.civ. 2000, I, 2117). The Cass. on the other hand rejected this view and established a narrow definition of consumer (Cass., 25 July 2001, No. 10127, I Contratti 2002, 338). This view is consistent with the case-law of the ECJ. The ECJ has construed the notion of consumer under Directive 85/577 narrowly in Criminal proceedings v. Patrice Di Pinto, ECJ 14 March 1991, C-361/89, ECR 1991, I-1189). The ECJ regarded the French notion of consumer as permissible; but at the same time highlighted that Community law does not "draw a distinction between normal acts and those which are exceptional in nature" (ibid., para 15). This view is also confirmed by the preparatory work for Directive 99/44: whereas the original proposal for Directive 99/44 of 18 June 1996 (COM(95), 520 final) regarded as consumer a person who "is acting for purposes which are not directly related to his trade, business or profession", the amended directive proposal (COM(98), 217 final) omitted the words "not directly".

12. Protection of certain legal persons: Under the above-mentioned Directives only natural persons are regarded as consumers. In the joined cases Cape Snc. v. Idealservice Srl. and Idealservice MN RE Sas. v. OMAI Srl. (ECJ 22 November 2001, C-541/99 and C-542/99, ECR 2001, I-9049, para 16) the ECJ expressly stated (concerning the consumer definition of art. 2 of the Directive 93/13/EEC) that Community law in this respect is not to be given a wider interpretation: "It is thus clear from the wording of art. 2 of the Directive that a person other than a natural person who concludes a contract with a seller or supplier cannot be regarded as a consumer within the meaning of that provision." A number of Member States follow this concept and expressly limit the scope of consumer protection provisions to natural persons: CYPRUS, GERMANY, ESTONIA, FINLAND, IRELAND, ITALY, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, POLAND, SLOVENIA and SWEDEN. In ITALY the Italian constitutional court clarified in its judgment of 22 November 2002 that an extension of protection to legal persons is not provided for in Italian constitutional law either (Corte Cost. 22 November 2002, no. 469, Giust.civ. 2003, 290 et seq.). In LATVIA, there has recently been a reform, so that from now on legal persons are excluded from the notion of consumer (Amendment of the Consumer Protection Act, which came into force on 11 November 2005). In the UNITED KINGDOM by contrast the law varies: whereas the case-law has declared that a company may "deal as a consumer" within the meaning of the Unfair Contract Terms Act, (e.g. R. & B. Customs Brokers Co. Ltd. v. United Dominions Trust Ltd. [1988] 1 WLR 321) in other consumer protection instruments only a natural person can be a consumer. Through the limitation to natural persons small and medium sized enterprises and charitable associations e.g. sporting associations or church parishes, are without protection. Thus there are norms in AUSTRIA, BELGIUM (cf. LPCC art. 1 no. 7, and Unfair Trade Practices Act art. 2 no. 2, by contrast, under Timeshare Act art. 2 no. 5), the CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, FRANCE, GREECE, HUNGARY, SLOVAKIA (with some exceptions) and SPAIN, which treat legal persons as consumers, providing the purchase is for private use (or in Greece, Hungary and Spain the legal person is the final addressee). In FRANCE the Cass.civ. with its judgment of 15 March 2005 has clarified that the notion of "consumer" (consommateur) according to the ECJ decision in Idealservice cannot be carried over to legal persons, whereas on the other hand, the notion "non-professionel" (used in the context of the articles concerning unfair contract terms; see ConsC art. L. 132-1) can also be a legal person under French law (Cass.civ. 15 March 2005, No. de pourvoi: 02-13285 Syndicat départemental de contrôle laitier de la Mayenne). HUNGARY is currently planning to limit the notion of consumer to natural persons. In PORTUGAL, it is unclear whether legal persons can be protected as "consumers", however, a draft of a new Consumer Code acknowledges that legal persons may, in certain circumstances, benefit from the protection conferred to consumers.

13. Protection of employees: A peculiarity of GERMAN law is that it generally regards an employed person who is also acting within his or her professional capacity as a "consumer". According to CC § 13 "consumers" are those persons who "enter into a transaction which can be attributed neither to their business nor their self-employed capacity". Accordingly, the German Federal Labour Court considered an employee to be a consumer (BAG 25 May 2005, NJW 2005, 3305). This does not however mean that all consumer laws in Germany can automatically be applied to the protection of the employee. Rather, case-law makes the following distinction: whereas standard business terms in contracts of employment are in principle subject to the controls of provisions which serve the transposition of the Directive 93/13/EEC (cf. the judgment of the BAG loc. cit.), an agreement concluded at the place of work to end an employer-employee relationship is not subject to the withdrawal provisions of doorstep sales. In the view of the Federal Labour Court such an agreement does not represent a doorstep selling situation within the meaning of CC § 312 (BAG 27 November 2003, NJW 2004, 2401). The right of withdrawal in doorstep selling situations is – according to the court – a consumer protection right related to the type of contract and encompasses only "particular forms of marketing". Accordingly, the right of withdrawal provided by law does not apply to contracts which are not a form of marketing, such as a contract of employment or contract to terminate employment. Therefore, the employee does not enjoy a right of withdrawal in these situations. Whether the European notion of consumer also includes employed persons is contentious in German literature (in favour thereof: Faber, ZEuP 1998, 854, 873 et seq.; against: Mohr, AcP 204 (2004), 660, 671).

14. Protection of founding activities: Whether a person who makes transactions in the course of preparing professional activity (founding activities) is likewise a "consumer", is not expressly regulated in the directives at issue. The ECJ decided in Francesco Benincasa v. Dentalkit Srl. (ECJ 3 July 1997, C-269/95, ECR 1997, I-3767) that art. 13 Brussels Convention (now Brussels I Regulation art. 15) is not applicable if a party has concluded a contract for future professional or business activity. In its reasoning the ECJ stated that "[t]he specific protection sought to be afforded by those provisions is unwarranted in the case of contracts for the purpose of trade or professional activity, even if that activity is only planned for the future, since the fact that an activity is in the nature of a future activity does not divest it in any way of its trade or professional character" (para. 17). Thus, for Community law the predominant view is that also transactions which serve the founding of a business are generally not to be regarded as consumer contracts. This view is confirmed by Directive 2002/65/EC. In recital (29) of this Directive it is stated that "[t]his Directive is without prejudice to extension by member states, in accordance with Community law, of the protection provided by this Directive to non-profit organisations and persons making use of financial services in order to become entrepreneurs."

15. In most Member States the issue of founding activities is not addressed either in statute law or by case-law. AUSTRIA alone regulates the matter in a legislative Act. ConsProtA § 1(3) provides that transactions by which a natural person, prior to commencing a business, obtains the necessary goods or services do not qualify as business transactions. Founders of new businesses therefore enjoy the protection of consumer laws. In GERMANY, by contrast, courts have regarded founders of businesses not as consumers, but as businesses (BGH 24 February 2005, NJW 2005, 1273-1275 on the Directive 93/13).

16. Under GERMAN case law there have been some cases where businesses try to circumvent the transaction being classified as a consumer sale. For instance, a contract clause in which the purchaser confirms that he is a trader was deemed irrelevant once the trader is aware that the buyer is a consumer (CFI Zeven 19 December 2002, DAR 2003, 379). However, in a case where a consumer claimed to be a trader because the seller did not wish to sell to consumers the buyer lost his consumer rights (BGH 22 December 2004, NJW 2005, 1045, see also Halfmeier, GPR 2005, 184 ff).

III. Overarching business definitions

17. Unlike for "consumer", EC law does not use a uniform term for the other party to a consumer contract. That party (the business) is variously described as "trader" (Directives 85/577/EEC; 98/6/EC; 2005/29/EC), "supplier" (Directives 93/13/EEC; 97/7/EC; 2002/65/EC), "seller" (Directives 93/13/EEC; 1999/44/EC), "vendor" (Directive 94/47/EC), "service provider" (Directive 2000/31/EC) or "creditor" (Directive 87/102/EEC). A common feature of these Directives, however, is that the business can be either a natural or a legal person who is acting for purposes relating to this person's self-employed trade, work or profession.

18. A series of Member States have introduced a uniform definition for the counterpart of the consumer, in particular AUSTRIA (ConsProtA § 1(2)), CZECH REPUBLIC (CC art. 52(2)), FINLAND (ConsProtA chap. 1 § 5), GERMANY (CC § 14), ITALY (ConsC art. 3(1)(c)), SPAIN (ConsProtA art. 4) and SLOVENIA (ConsProtA § 1(3)). LATVIA (ConsProtA art. 1(1) ss. 4-5) and LITHUANIA (ConsProtA art. 2(2) and (3)) define the terms "seller" and "service provider" generally for all kinds of consumer contracts. SLOVAKIA introduced general definitions for "seller" and "supplier" in ConsProtA § 2(1)(b) and (e). Other Member States by contrast, in particular FRANCE, abstain from express definitions, relying instead on their case law developing an overarching definition of business.

IV. Public bodies

19. Some Directives make explicitly clear that public bodies can also be "businesses". For example, Directive 2002/65/EC art. 2(c) defines as "supplier" "any natural or legal person, public or private". In the same line, Directive 93/13/EEC emphasises in its recital 14 that the Directive also applies to trades, businesses or professions of a public nature. Cf. e.g. the ENGLISH language version of the directive ("whether publicly owned or privately owned"), the GERMAN version ("auch wenn diese dem öffentlich-rechtlichen Bereich zuzurechnen ist") and the FRENCH version ("activité professionnelle, qu´elle soit publique ou privée"). Thus, Directive 93/13/EEC applies at least to private law contracts between consumers and public legal persons or bodies. Whether public law contracts are also covered by the Directive is less certain. However, considering the fact that the public/private divide is drawn differently in each Member State one should not leave it to the discretion of the national legislator whether a contractual clause classified as "public" under national law is subject to Directive 93/13/EEC or not.

20. A series of Member States have gone beyond the scope of application of Directive 93/13/EEC and Directive 2002/65/EC in providing expressly that "business" includes legal persons under public law. In AUSTRIA, legal persons under public law always qualify as businesses (ConsProtA § 1(2) sent. 2). In BELGIUM, the term "seller" (used in the Trade Practices Act for doorstep and distance selling and price indication) includes governmental institutions that pursue commercial, financial or industrial activity and sell or offer for sale products or services. In CYPRUS, according to ConsProtA art. 2, the word "business" includes "a trade or profession and the activities of any government department or local or public authority", "courts" and "directors". GREEK law also emphasises in ConsProtA art. 1(3) that public sector suppliers qualify as "business". ITALIAN law includes (for sales contracts) under the definition of "seller" every natural or legal person of private and public law (ConsC art. 128(2)(b)). In SLOVENIA, a business is defined as a legal or natural person "regardless of its legal form or ownership" (ConsProtA art. 1(3)). In SPAIN the definition of "business" also covers both private and public activities (ConsProtA art. 4: "actividad empresarial o profesional, ya sea pública o privada"). Similarly in the UNITED KINGDOM in the context of transposing the Consumer Sales Directive it is clarified that "business" includes the profession and activity of any government department (including a Northern Ireland department) or local or public authority (Sale of Goods Act 1979 s. 61(1)(b)). In other Member States such as GERMANY it follows from the general definition of legal person that public bodies are also included.

V. Intention to make profit

21. Directive 93/13/EEC and Directive 2002/65/EC support the view that a profit motive is irrelevant, since both Directive explicitly include public bodies in their scope of application (cf. supra).

22. Some member states have regulated the issue whether the intention to make a profit has any bearing on the definition of the term "business". In AUSTRIA the notion of business is defined in ConsProtA § 1(2) as "every organisation on a continuing basis of independent economic activity", even if this organisation does not intend to make a profit. In GERMANY, the BGH clarified for consumer goods sales that the only relevant factors for qualifying as business are whether the seller offers products on the market against payment, normally over a certain period of time. The court stated expressly that it does not matter whether the seller pursues the business activity with the intention of making profit (cf. BGH 29 March 2006, NJW 2006, 2250). In GREECE, it is likewise recognised that non-profit making organisations or institutions as well as public corporations and local authorities can act as suppliers. In the NETHERLANDS and SWEDEN the notion business/corporation also includes those enterprises that have no profit motive.

23. The position is different, however, in FINLAND and SLOVENIA. According to FINLAND ConsProtA chap. 1 § 5 the trader has to act "in order to gain income or with another economic interest." According to SLOVENIAN ConsProtA § 1(3), a "trader" is defined as a legal or natural person, who is "engaged in a profitable activity" regardless of its legal form or ownership. In SPAIN the position has recently changed. While the term "retail trade" in Retail Trade Act art. 1(2) (Ley 7/1996), which initially transposed Directive 97/7/EC, was defined as "the activity professionally undertaken with a view to profit" (ánimo de lucro), the definition of "business" (empresario) in ConsProtA art. 4 has no such limitation.

VI. Use of intermediaries

24. Community law sometimes contains an extended definition of "business". Thus a "trader" in doorstep sales is also a person who is "acting in the name or on behalf of a trader" (Directive 85/577/EEC art. 2). In the same way Directive 2005/29/EC provides that "trader" is also anyone acting in the name of or on behalf of a trader". Also the first proposal for Directive 97/7/EC contained such a definition (COM(92) 11 final). However, the amended proposal of 7 October 1993 (COM(93) 396 final) refused an express inclusion of auxiliary agents, without the reasons for that exclusion being apparent. Finally, according to art. 1(2) lit. (b) of the Directive 87/102/EEC a "creditor" is not only a person who grants credit in the course of a trade, business or profession, but also "a group of such persons". When a person is acting "in the name or on behalf of a trader" has not hitherto been clarified by the ECJ. In Crailsheimer Volksbank eG v. Klaus Conrads, Frank Schulzke and Petra Schulzke-Lösche, Joachim Nitschke (ECJ 25 November 2005, C-229/04, ECR 2005, I-9273) the Court of Justice did at least clarify that Directive 85/577/EEC "must be interpreted as meaning that when a third party intervenes in the name of or on behalf of a trader in the negotiation or conclusion of a contract, the application of the Directive cannot be made subject to the condition that the trader was or should have been aware that the contract was concluded in a doorstep-selling situation" (para. 45).

25. The issue addressed in Community law in some directives of whether a person acting in the name or on behalf of a trader is to be regarded as a business, is partly regulated in the member states generally for all or several consumer protecting acts. The BELGIAN Trade Practices Act refers to the term "seller" which is defined in art. 1(6) as "any other person, whether acting in its own name or on behalf of a third party". The CYPRIOT notion of "supplier" clarifies as well that the supplier acts "either personally or through his representative". The LATVIAN ConsProtA defines as a "seller" any natural or legal person who offers or sells goods to consumers by means of entrepreneurial activity, as well as a person who acts in the name of the seller or on his or her instruction.

26. In other legal systems this issue is not expressly regulated, but it does however follow from the general definition of consumer and the rules on agency that conduct by a third party is attributed to the business and that a business does not lose its character as such by engaging a representative who would be classed as a consumer (such as in particular for Austrian law, cf. OGH 5 August 2003, 7 Ob 155/03z, SZ 2003/88). By contrast the legal situation in GREECE and POLAND is unclear. In GREECE – in contrast to Directive 85/577/EEC – not any person acting in the name of and on behalf of a trader is viewed as a trader. The same applies for POLISH law. According to CC art. 43 the nature of the activity of the trader must be exercised in the "own name" of the person. This seems to be a narrower definition than the one provided in art. 2 of Directive 85/577/EEC. Furthermore, the issue of whether consumer protection laws apply if a private person is represented by a business is addressed differently. In AUSTRIA and GERMANY it generally depends on the identity of the contractual partner. A contract between two private persons does not therefore fall within the ambit of consumer protection provisions if it is brokered by a person acting in a business or professional capacity. By contrast in DENMARK, ITALY and PORTUGAL it is clarified that for timeshare contracts, if the vendor is not a professional, but the contract is concluded for the vendor by a professional, then it is regarded as a contract covered by the act as well.

VII. Mixed purpose transactions

27. For contracts that serve both a private and business purpose (e.g. the acquisition of a motor vehicle for a freelancer), the directives at issue contain no express rule, in contrast to Directive 85/374/EEC (see art. 9 lit. (b) ii: "used by the injured person mainly for his own private use or consumption"). The judgment of the ECJ in Johann Gruber v. Bay Wa AG (ECJ 20 January 2005, C-464/01, ECR 2005, I-439) has brought no clarification in this regard. The Court stressed in this decision that a person can invoke the special rules of jurisdiction of arts. 13-15 of the Brussels Convention (now Brussels I Regulation arts. 15-17) in respect of dual use contracts only if the trade or professional purpose is so limited as to be negligible in the overall context of the transaction (para. 54). However, this decision related only to European procedural, not substantive law. One might nevertheless wonder whether the procedural notion of consumer can be useful for substantive consumer protection law. Whereas in procedural law terms it can be completely justified on grounds of legal certainty to give standing only in respect of contracts concluded entirely for use for private purposes, in substantive law terms it could be thoroughly justified in the interests of consumer protection to concentrate on the primary use purpose (cf. Ebers, in: Ajani/Ebers (eds), Uniform Terminology for European Contract Law, 115-126 = Ebers, ADC 2006, 229-238). Thus for the directives at issue it remains open how dual use cases are to be treated.

28. Member States found different solutions for classifying mixed transactions. The differentiation according to the criterion of the primary purpose is expressly stated in the DANISH, FINNISH and SWEDISH provisions. GERMAN courts also focus on the question of whether the private or business use is predominant (CA Naumburg 11 December 1997, NJW-RR 1998, 1351, on the applicability of the consumer credit act in relation to motor vehicle leasing). In ITALY, recent case-law tends towards the same direction, so that a small tobacconist was regarded as a consumer when concluding a contract for hire of a vehicle which was for both private and business use. However, it is not clear from this judgment whether the private use was predominant (Giudice di pace Civitanova Marche 4 December 2001, Arch.Giur.circolaz. 2002, 405). In AUSTRIA (ConsProtA § 1(1)) and BELGIUM (ConsProtA art. 1(7)) on the other hand only contracts concluded exclusively for private purposes are encompassed.

I.–1:106: "In writing" and similar expressions

(1) For the purposes of these rules, a statement is "in writing" if it is in textual form and in characters which are directly legible from paper or another tangible durable medium.

(2) "Textual form" means a text which is expressed in alphabetical or other intelligible characters by means of any support which permits reading, recording of the information contained in the text and its reproduction in tangible form.

(3) "Durable medium" means any material on which information is stored so that it is accessible for future reference for a period of time adequate to the purposes of the information, and which allows the unchanged reproduction of this information.

COMMENTS

A. Purpose and general idea

Following the legal systems of the Member States, these rules adhere to the general principle of freedom of form. Thus, I.–1:109 (Notice) states that notices may be given by any means appropriate to the circumstances. Similarly, according to paragraph (1) of II.–1:106 (Form), a contract or other juridical act need not to be concluded, made or evidenced in writing nor is it subject to any other requirement as to form. These are general rules. Particular rules may require writing or some other formality.

Under the present rules there are four levels of form: (i) "textual form", (ii) "textual form on a durable medium", (iii) "in writing" and (iv) "signature". Levels (i) to (iii) are defined in the present Article. Level (iv) is defined in I.–1:107 ("Signature" and similar expressions). Apart from these four categories of formality, the rules do not impose any stricter levels of form (e.g. notarisation). However, the acquis communautaire does acknowledge the existence of such requirements in the laws of the Member States (cf. E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC recital 36 and art. 1(5)(d) 1st indent).

Form requirements may be imposed within these rules for several reasons. Information provided in textual form (or any higher level of form) rather than oral information enables the parties to ponder upon the legal consequences of e.g. entering into a contract. In addition, specific form requirements allow each party to reproduce and store a record of the transaction which may be useful for later reference or in order to be able to give evidence. A form requirement for a contract may also function as a warning to the parties, making them aware that a particular contract or transaction can have very significant effects on their economic position. In some cases, the existence of a text may also facilitate the subsequent control of a transaction by an interested party who is not party to the contract, e.g. for supervision, accounting or tax purposes.

B. In writing

For the purposes of these rules, "in writing" is defined in a very limited sense. In practical terms, it means text written or printed on paper. A signature is not required. It should be noted that this definition deviates from the definitions given in the Unidroit Principles (art. 1(11)) or in PECL (art. 1:301(6)), which also include electronic forms. The reason for such a narrow definition is that the present rules contain protective form provisions which necessitate more differentiation than the Unidroit Principles and PECL. In the acquis communautaire, a number of Directives – both regarding business to consumer and business to business transactions – use the term “in writing” in a rather inconsistent way, sometimes holding the broader meaning, sometimes restricted to writing on paper. Paragraph (1) of the present Article aims to achieve a higher degree of consistency among the different form requirements by linking the definition of “in writing” with the other form requirements.

Thus, the definition of “in writing” combines elements from paragraphs (2) and (3) of the present Article: a statement is “in writing” if it is in “textual form” (paragraph (2)) and provided on paper or another “durable medium” (paragraph (3)). In addition, the statement has to be “in directly legible characters”.

A text is “in directly legible characters” if the characters can be read without any change or conversion. Reading may be visual (letters printed on paper or carved in stone) or tactile (Braille letters). Sound recordings are not ‘in writing’ because they are neither in textual form (paragraph (2)), nor directly legible. Also a DVD which stores text is “not directly legible”.

An email message is not in writing because it is not in characters which are directly legible from paper or another tangible durable medium. It may, when displayed, be in characters which are directly legible from a computer screen but that is a display medium and not a storage medium. (See the definition of “durable medium” below.)

C. Textual form

Paragraph (2) provides a definition of “textual form”. This term marks the lowest level of formality in these rules. In order to be considered as “textual form”, a statement must fulfil the following requirements.

> (i) It must be “expressed in alphabetical or other intelligible characters”. Alphabetical characters are letters (e.g. Roman, Cyrillic, Greek, Arabic). Other characters include e.g., Chinese or Japanese symbols, but may extend to any set of intelligible characters in which a message can be formed. Oral messages or purely graphical symbols, on the other hand, are not expressed in characters.
>
> (ii) It must be so expressed “by means of any support which permits reading”. The medium which is used for this support is irrelevant. Reading may be visual (paper, screen) or tactile (Braille letters).
>
> (iii) It must be so expressed by means of any support which permits “recording of the information contained in the text and its reproduction in tangible form.” “Textual form” (other than “durable medium”) does not require the information to be permanently available, but it must be made available in a way which allows the information to be recorded and reproduced in tangible form. In other words, the text must be made available in such a way that the addressee can read it on the spot and can easily record and store it. This applies e.g. to textual information presented on a website, if this can be downloaded (i.e. recorded) and then later accessed and printed out (i.e. reproduced in a tangible form).

In the DCFR “textual form” as such (without being combined with durable medium or signature) is only required in II.–3:105 (Formation by electronic means) paragraph (2) and II.–9:103 (Terms not individually negotiated) paragraph (2), which are both only applicable to contracts to be concluded by electronic means. In practical terms, the requirement to make information available in textual form means that the information must at least be provided as text on a webpage in a way that it can be downloaded and recorded. It does not need to be provided on a durable medium in the sense of paragraph (3) of the present Article (which would be, for instance, a DVD or an email, cf. below under D.)

Illustration 1
Air Company X sells tickets on the internet, referring to standard terms which are available and can be downloaded from the same webpage. This is sufficient for the "textual form" requirement in II.–3:105 (Formation by electronic means).

Illustration 2
As above, but the website is designed in such a way that the "save page" function is disabled. X cannot successfully argue that customers could nevertheless have recorded the terms using a special screenshot program, because X has not used a support which permits recording and reproduction.

Another example of the use of "textual form" is IV.G.–4:104 (Form), which seeks to protect and warn a consumer who provides personal security. The provision stipulates that the contract of security must be in textual form and must be signed by the security provider. If the contract does not comply with these requirements, it is void. By using "textual form" instead of "in writing" the Article permits the contract to be concluded electronically with a form of electronic signature according to I.–1:107 ("Signature" and similar expressions).

D. Durable medium

Paragraph (3) contains a definition of the term "durable medium". The definition of "durable medium" is based on two elements: (a) durability, and (b) non-alterability by the sender. The term "durable medium" consequently covers e.g. floppy disks, CD-ROMs, DVDs and hard drives of personal computers or servers on which electronic mail is stored. In general, it excludes Internet sites, unless the information has been stored on the website for a sufficient period of time and cannot be altered by the person who has posted the information, as, for example, could be the case for auction postings on some online auction sites.

The term is lifted from several Directives, of which some contain a materially similar definition to the present Article (cf. Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC art 2(f), Insurance Mediation Directive 2002/92/EC art. 2(12)).

In these rules, several provisions require information to be provided "in textual form on a durable medium" (cf. II.–3:106 (Clarity and form of information) paragraph (3), II.–5:104 (Adequate information on the right to withdraw), IV.A.–6:103 (Guarantee document)). In these cases the information must be provided in such a way that the addressee gains control over the durable medium which stores the information. Thus, the fulfilment of this information duty requires actively sending the information to the addressee in such a way that, in the end, the information reaches the addressee on a durable medium he or she has under control. A paper copy or DVD must therefore be physically sent to the addressee. Also, an email is automatically stored on the hard disk of a personal computer or on a remote server the addressee has under control. Thus, even an email which is not stored on the personal computer of the addressee but in an online email account the addressee can access, fulfils the requirement of information in textual form on a durable medium. In the case of an email, the sender need not send the durable medium itself (as is the case with a DVD), because he or she initiates the creation of the durable medium in the addressee's sphere of control.

NOTES

1. Definitions of "writing" in national laws are often for a specific purpose but usually embrace at least some modern means of communicating or recording information. For example, the PORTUGUESE Voluntary Arbitration Act (Lei no. 31/86 of 29 August 1986), which requires a written form for contracts for arbitration, accepts telegrams, telex and "other means of communication of which there may be written proof" (art. 2). The position is similar under the GERMAN CCP § 1031; the SLOVENIAN CCP art. 461(3); and (for arbitration clauses) the BULGARIAN International Commercial Arbitration Act (art. 7(2)). These provisions all seem to be based on the UNCITRAL Model Law on Arbitration art. 7(2).
2. Other international provisions are narrower. The CISG art. 13 refers simply to telegrams and telexes. See also Opinion no. 1: Electronic Communications under CISG, 15 August 2003.
3. National statutes frequently require a document with a signature, either simply because they were passed before the electronic age or because the requirement of signed writing is thought to have a protective function, e.g. GERMAN CC § 126; GREEK CC art. 160; ESTONIAN GPCCA § 78(1), but see note 6 below; and the UK Consumer Credit Act 1974 s. 60 and the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 s. 2(3). For an analysis of which English statutes requiring writing or similar formalities may be satisfied by electronic messages, see Reed, Electronic Commerce. In SLOVENIAN law a "written" contract is a signed document. However, the law gives similar effect to any form of communication which can show an unchanged record of text and can be authenticated (LOA § 57). It is not uncommon to find that statutes requiring writing are interpreted or adapted in a way which now seems appropriate (e.g. in DENMARK, see Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret, 171; in SWEDEN, see Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 127; in FINLAND, see Hemmo, Sopimusoikeuden oppikirja, 110; in PORTUGUAL, see Decree-Law no. 62/2203 of 3 April 2003; and in SLOVENIA see the Electronic Commerce and Signature Act (consolidated version from 9 September 2004) which provides the requirements for electronic documents and electronic signatures.
4. In BELGIAN law the definitions of "writing" and "signature" were broadened by the Acts of 20 October 2000 and 11 March 2003 to allow modern techniques of proof and recording (see CC arts. 1317, 1322 and 2281). Under FRENCH law, when a written document is required it can be established and recorded in an electronic form (CC arts. 1316-1 and 1316-4); also see CC art. 1108-1 alt. 1 and 2.
5. Under the SLOVAK CC § 40 a written juridical act is valid if signed by the acting person. The requirement of written form is satisfied if a juridical act is made by cable, telex, or electronic means which enable the contents of the act to be recorded and the person who performed it to be determined.
6. ESTONIAN law defines "writing" as a format requiring a handwritten signature (GPCCA § 78(1)). An electronic format (electronic signature required) is generally deemed to be equal to "writing" (GPCCA § 80(1)). However, the majority of the formal requirements in contract law require only a "format which can be reproduced in writing" (e.g. notice of termination of a lease (LOA § 325(1)). Also, if the format of the transaction is agreed by the parties, the requirements provided by law for such format may be modified by the parties themselves (GPCCA § 77(2)).

7. For something to be "in writing" under BULGARIAN legal doctrine there must be a handwritten signature under the text of the document. There is no special statutory provision on this matter. This definition is broadened significantly by the already mentioned International Commercial Arbitration Act art. 7(2) and by Ccom art. 293(3), which requires only technical reproduction of the statement.

8. The HUNGARIAN civil law provides for the principle of freedom of form in relation to the formation of contracts (CC § 216(1)). Contracts concluded by exchange of letters, telegraphs, telexes and faxes are regarded as written contracts. According to a special statute, exchanges of declarations through certain durable media, especially documents signed with increased secure electronic signature (Ptké [Order with statutory force no. 11 of 1960 on the Entry into Force and Execution of the Civil Code as amended] § 38(2)) are also regarded as written. The Draft Civil Code of Hungary suggests a contract is to be regarded as written if it is signed by all the parties. This applies to an electronic document, too, at least if it is signed with a secure electronic signature, if the information can be reproduced without change and if the declaring person and the time of the declaration are identifiable. The Hungarian CCP (Act no. III of 1952 as amended) regulating documentary evidence defines some forms of special documents (§§ 195, 196), where paper-based as well as electronic documents are meant. As regards electronic documents and electronic signatures, Act no. XXXV of 2001 on Electronic Signatures approximates to Directive 1999/93/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council on a Community framework for electronic signatures, and Directive 2000/31/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council on certain legal aspects of information society services, in particular electronic commerce, in the Internal Market (Directive on Electronic Commerce) art. 9(2).

I.–1:107: "Signature" and similar expressions

(1) A reference to a person's signature includes a reference to that person's handwritten signature, electronic signature or advanced electronic signature, and references to anything being signed by a person are to be construed accordingly.

(2) A "handwritten signature" means the name of, or sign representing, a person written by that person's own hand for the purpose of authentication.

(3) An "electronic signature" means data in electronic form which are attached to or logically associated with other electronic data, and which serve as a method of authentication.

(4) An "advanced electronic signature" means an electronic signature which is:

(a) uniquely linked to the signatory;
(b) capable of identifying the signatory;
(c) created using means which can be maintained under the signatory's sole control; and
(d) linked to the data to which it relates in such a manner that any subsequent change of the data is detectable.

(5) In this Article, "electronic" means relating to technology with electrical, digital, magnetic, wireless, optical, electromagnetic, or similar capabilities.

COMMENTS

A. Purpose and general idea

This Article provides a definition of the term "signature" and several sub-types of signatures. The provision opts for a "non-discriminatory approach" to electronic signatures by stating that a reference to a person's signature includes a handwritten, electronic or advanced electronic signature. Requirements of separate signatures can serve several purposes. Signatures are a useful tool for authentication. Moreover, signature requirements may be used as an instrument of consumer protection legislation, where they can assure that information is not slipped past the unsuspecting consumer. Examples in the DCFR are IV.E.–2:402 (Signed document available on request) and IV.G.–4:104 (Form).

Electronic signatures may serve the same purpose in electronic transactions. In an electronic environment, the potential for fraud is considerable, as the original of an electronic message is usually indistinguishable from a copy. Thus, the purpose of electronic signatures is to provide the technical means to identify the sender of an electronic message and to associate that person with the content of the message. In addition, this Article may serve as an interpretation guide, e.g. for authentication requirements stipulated in a contract.

B. Handwritten signature

Paragraph (2) defines the term "handwritten signature". As with an "advanced electronic signature" (defined in paragraph (4)(d) of the present Article), a handwritten signature must be placed in such a way that any subsequent change of the text is detectable. Thus, as a rule, the name must be placed under a text so close to its end that it is difficult to add something to the text.

C. Electronic and advanced electronic signature

The definition of “electronic signature” and “advanced electronic signature” are lifted from E-Signatures Directive 1999/93/EC art. 1(1) and (2). Although this Directive makes extensive use of the term “electronic”, it does not contain a definition of this term. Such a definition is provided in paragraph (5) of the present Article.

> Illustration
> A uses a so-called signature file which is attached to all email messages sent by A. It indicates A’s name, address, and telephone number. This provides information about A, but no authentication. So this is not an ‘electronic signature’, just as the use of stationery with a printed name and address cannot replace a handwritten signature.

D. Electronic

The definition of “electronic” in paragraph (5) is broadly modelled on Directive 1998/48/EC art. 1(2) yet follows the more concise wording of US Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act 2000 s. 106(2). According to Directive 1998/48/EC art. 1(2) the term “by electronic means” means that a service is sent initially and received at its destination “by means of electronic equipment for the processing (including digital compression) and storage of data, and entirely transmitted, conveyed and received by wire, radio, optical means or other electromagnetic means”. Certainly, some of the technologies referred to in Directive 1998/48/EC art. 1(2) and the cited US legislation, are not technically electronic (e.g. optical means). Consequently, the term “electronic” is not used in a narrow sense but as a descriptive term for a variety of current and future data transmission technologies.

I.–1:108: Definitions in Annex

(1) The definitions in the Annex apply for all the purposes of these rules unless the context otherwise requires.

(2) Where a word is defined, other grammatical forms of the word have a corresponding meaning.

COMMENTS

This Article introduces the list of definitions in the Annex. As one of the main functions of this instrument is to provide a source of terms and concepts, the list of definitions is more extensive than might be normal in a legislative instrument. As it is extensive, it was considered preferable to have it at the end in an Annex rather than at the beginning, so as not to interrupt the flow of the Articles.

The Annex contains two types of definition. In some cases the definitions in the Annex repeat definitions contained in the main text. It is hoped that it will be convenient for users to have all important definitions grouped together in the Annex in alphabetical order for ease of reference. Other definitions, of a type which do not require comments or national notes or which are too general to find a natural home in any one Article, are contained only in the Annex.

Paragraph (1) of this Article makes it clear that the definitions apply “unless the context otherwise requires”. There are two reasons for this provision. First, a particular provision now or in the future may disapply or modify a definition for its own purposes. An example is the special definition of “producer” in VI.–3:204 (Accountability for damage caused by defective products). Secondly, and more generally, meaning depends on context. Words are not to be interpreted in a mechanistic way. Some defined words may occasionally be used in a way other than the defined way. For example, “loss” is defined largely for the purposes of provisions relating to damages for loss, but the word is sometimes used in an ordinary sense as in “loss of the right to terminate” (III.–3:508). “Term” is defined as a provision (of a contract or other juridical act, of a law etc) but the context would override this meaning in expressions such as “short term” or “long term”.

Paragraph (2) means, for example, that if “invalid” is defined then “invalidity” has a corresponding meaning.

I.–1:109: Notice

(1) This Article applies in relation to the giving of notice for any purpose under these rules. "Notice" includes the communication of information or of a juridical act.

(2) The notice may be given by any means appropriate to the circumstances.

(3) The notice becomes effective when it reaches the addressee, unless it provides for a delayed effect.

(4) The notice reaches the addressee:

(a) when it is delivered to the addressee;

(b) when it is delivered to the addressee's place of business or, where there is no such place of business or the notice does not relate to a business matter, to the addressee's habitual residence;

(c) in the case of a notice transmitted by electronic means, when it can be accessed by the addressee; or

(d) when it is otherwise made available to the addressee at such a place and in such a way that the addressee could reasonably be expected to obtain access to it without undue delay.

(5) The notice has no effect if a revocation of it reaches the addressee before or at the same time as the notice.

(6) Any reference in these rules to a notice given by or to a person includes a notice given by or to an agent of that person who has authority to give or receive it.

(7) In relations between a business and a consumer the parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the rule in paragraph (4)(c) or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. Scope

The Article applies to the giving of a notice for any purpose of the rules. "Notice" is defined for this purpose as including the communication of information or of a juridical act. The juridical act could be, for example, a unilateral undertaking, an offer, an acceptance, a notice of withdrawal, revocation or termination, or a notice exercising an option.

B. The form of notices

Notices may be made in any form - orally, in writing, by fax or by electronic mail, for example - provided that the form of notice used is appropriate to the circumstances. It would not be consistent with good faith and fair dealing for a party to rely on, for instance, a purely casual remark made to the other party. For notices of major importance written form may be appropriate.

C. The receipt principle

The general rule adopted here is that a person cannot rely on a notice sent to another person unless and until the notice reaches that person. It is not normally necessary that the notice should actually have come to the addressee's attention provided that it has been delivered in the normal way, e.g. a letter placed in the letter box or a message sent to the fax machine. Similarly the risk of errors in the transmission of the notice is normally placed upon the sender. The principle of good faith and fair dealing means that a person cannot exercise a right on the basis that a notice has not been received, or has not been received in time, if the person has deliberately evaded receiving it.

Illustration
A notice to extend a charterparty must be given to the owner's office, which is open round the clock, by 17.00 on April 1. The charterer telephones at 16.59. The owners are expecting the call but do not want the charter to be extended. Therefore they deliberately let the phone ring until after 17.00 has passed; they then answer it and say that the notice is too late. The notice is treated as having been given in time.

D. Default rules only

In accordance with the general rule that a specific provision will override a more general one, the rules in the Article apply only unless otherwise provided. Particular provisions in later Books may provide special rules for notices of certain types or given in certain circumstances. One important example of such special rules is III.–3:106 (Notices relating to non-performance) which provides that when one party to a contract gives a notice to the other because of the other's non-performance the risk of non-receipt falls on the defaulting party. This is an application, in this particular context, of what is known as the "dispatch principle".

E. When notice "reaches" addressee

This is regulated by paragraph (4). It will be noticed that the notice need not actually reach the addressee in person. Under sub-paragraph (b) it is regarded as reaching the addressee when delivered to the addressee's place of business or, if there is no such place of business or the notice relates to a personal matter, to the addressee's habitual residence. Sub-paragraph (c) covers the special case of notices transmitted by electronic means. Here the notice reaches the addressee when it can be accessed by the addressee. Sub-paragraph (d) covers other situations in which a notice could be regarded as having reached the addressee – such as, for example, leaving a message in a place which the addressee is known to check regularly.

F. Simultaneous withdrawal

A notice is not effective if at the same time, or earlier, the recipient gets a withdrawal or countermand of the notice.

G. Notices by or to agents

Paragraph (6) of the Article provides, for the avoidance of doubt, that any reference to a notice given by or sent to a person includes a reference to a notice given by or sent to an agent (who need not be a representative with power to bind the principal by a contract or other juridical act) with authority to give or receive it.

H. Electronic transmission

Paragraph (7) contains a special rule for messages transmitted by electronic means. In accordance with paragraph (4)(c) the normal rule is that the message reaches the addressee when it can be accessed by the addressee. Normally parties can contract out of the rules in this Article. However, for the protection of consumers, paragraph (7) makes it clear that in business-to-consumer relations this rule is mandatory in favour of the consumer. In other words the business cannot stipulate that an electronic message is to be deemed to reach the consumer before it can be accessed by the consumer.

NOTES

I. The general "receipt" principle

1. Although some systems, particularly the ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH laws, recognise special rules in relation to the postal acceptance of an offer (see Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative law[3], 358-359, and for Scotland, where the Scottish Law Commission has recommended a change in the law on the point, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, §§ 6.114-6.118), under most systems notices in general must arrive if they are to be effective; and this applies even to notices given because of the other's default. Several systems assume that the basic principle is that actual knowledge is required, e.g. SPANISH CC art. 1262 and ITALIAN CC art. 1335, which states circumstances in which the recipient is deemed to have knowledge; ENGLISH law, see the case of Car & Universal Finance Co. Ltd. v. Caldwell [1965] 1 QB 525 (CA) (rescission for fraud); but in SCOTTISH law, see MacLeod v. Kerr 1965 SC 253 (actual notice required for rescission to take effect).

2. In FRENCH law discussion of the topic is restricted to formation of contracts. It appears that the matter is within the discretion of the judge (Cass.soc. 21 November 1966, JCP 67 II 15012; Cass.com. 6 March 1961, Bull.civ. III no. 123, p. 109), but the courts show some preference for the dispatch principle, notably (Cass.com 7 January 1981, Bull.civ. IV no. 14), which adopts it explicitly; see (Bénabent, Les obligations, no. 68). The receipt principle is adopted in art. 31 of the Projet de Reforme du Droit des Contrats published by the Ministry of Justice in July 2008. In LUXEMBOURG the receipt principle is favoured: (Cour 16 July 1896, Pas. 4, 209; Cour 27 March 1903, Pas. 6, 248). In BELGIUM courts and legal writers favour the receipt principle, (the Act of 20 October 2000 introduced this rule in the CC art. 2281), for most written notices. In ESTONIA, the receipt principle is generally applied (GPCCA § 69). In BULGARIA the receipt principle is also applicable, although the question is expressly regulated only in regard to offer and acceptance (LOA arts. 13 and 14)

3. In SPANISH law, as from the 2002 modification of the Civil and Commercial Codes, the knowledge principle now applies generally, to both civil and commercial contracts. However, the ignorance of the recipient may amount to knowledge when this is required by good faith (CC art. 1262; Ccom art. 54).

4. Under CISG art. 24 the receipt principle governs offers, acceptances and most other statements covered by Part II on formation of contracts.

5. In NORDIC law the receipt principle generally applies. However the dispatch principle governs certain notices given in order to prevent a contract arising, such as notices given under the Contract Acts § 4(2). In SLOVAKIA discussion of the topic is restricted to formation of contracts, CC § 45. A notice is effective against a person who is absent from the moment it reaches this person.

6. In AUSTRIA and GERMANY the receipt principle is recognised (see AUSTRIAN CC § 862a, GERMAN CC § 130); only then does a declaration of will produce its binding effect. The duration of the binding effect of the declaration of will depends on the circumstances (cf. AUSTRIAN CC § 862). In certain cases receipt is not necessary, e.g. in the case of a unilateral promise (AUSTRIAN CC § 860) or in the case of accepting an offer by performance (AUSTRIAN CC § 864(1)). Similarly, in SLOVENIAN law any statement of intention is effective when it reaches the addressee (LOA §§ 25(2) and 28(1)).

7. CZECH civil law does not contain a common provision on notices (except for CC § 43a(2) on conclusion of contracts), but it is undisputed that the receipt principle applies throughout, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Švestka), OZ[10], 231, 305. Exceptions are conceivable only with regard to the good morals clause (CC § 3) or the principle of fair business dealing (Ccom art. 265), e.g. if a party intentionally avoids a notice of termination of a contractual relationship. The receipt principle is also generally followed in HUNGARY (Act no. IV of 1959 as amended; CC §§ 214(1), 199).

II. Actual knowledge not required

8. Many systems, though adopting the receipt principle, explicitly recognise that actual communication to the recipient is not necessary provided that the notice has been properly delivered to the recipient's address: e.g. ENGLISH law (dicta in Holwell Securities Ltd. v. Hughes [1974] 1 WLR 155 (CA); BELGIAN law (Cass. 25 May 1990, Arr. Cass. no. 561, Pas. 1990 I 1086; Cass. 19 June 1990, Pas. 1990 I 1182); GREEK law (A.P. 482/1956, NoB 5 (1957) 94; CA Athens 3347/1973, NoB 21 (1973) 1474-1475, 287/1998 EllDik 41 (2000) 536); and SCOTTISH law (Burnley v. Alford (1919) 2 SLT 123). Under ESTONIAN law, although actual knowledge is not necessary, it is generally required that the recipient has "received" the declaration, i.e. that it has arrived at the residence or seat of the recipient and the recipient has had a reasonable opportunity to consider it (GPCCA § 69(2)). What is a reasonable opportunity to consider depends on the time when the sender of the declaration, under normal circumstances, could presume that the recipient had received the declaration (Riigikohus tsiviilkollegium 19 December 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-156-05, p. 10). In SLOVAKIA notice need not actually reach the addressee in person. So the knowledge of the addressee is not legally relevant. (Svoboda, Komentár a súvisiace predpisy, p. 112). In NORDIC law a notice countermanding an earlier offer or acceptance is effective if it reaches the recipient before or at the same time as the offer or acceptance comes to the recipient's attention, see the Contract Acts § 7). The ESTONIAN GPCCA § 72 is to the same effect (see Riigikohus tsiviilkollegium 1 December 2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-129-05, p. 37). The BULGARIAN doctrine unanimously supports the same rule, see Kalajdjiev, Law of Obligations, 79, 86. CZECH law does not require the recipient to have actual knowledge of the contents of the notice, it is sufficient that the notice reaches the recipient's sphere of control, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Švestka), OZ[10], 231.

9. The ITALIAN CC art. 1335 provides that a notice will not be effective if, without fault on the part of the addressee, it was not possible for the addressee to learn of the notice; the burden of proof is on the addressee. Other systems which use the receipt principle also adopt the rule that the addressee cannot rely on non-receipt if it was the addressee's own fault (DUTCH CC art 3:37(3); PORTUGUESE CC art. 224) or if the addressee had deliberately prevented communication (ENGLISH law: Car & Universal Finance Co. Ltd. v. Caldwell [1965] 1 QB 525 (CA) or generally due to circumstances for which the recipient bears the risk (ESTONIAN GPCCA § 69(4)). Currently, the SPANISH system is similar to the principles laid down in the DUTCH and PORTUGUESE Codes (the addressee cannot rely on non-receipt if it was the addressee's own fault); see SPANISH CC art. 1262 II. In SCOTLAND, however, notice of rescission of a contract must reach the party at fault: MacLeod v. Kerr 1965 SC 253.

10. It should be noted, however, that many systems draw a distinction between a notice which will be binding on the recipient and a declaration such as a promise or offer which will bind the sender. Such a declaration will be binding on the sender only when the recipient has actual knowledge of it (e.g. NORDIC law, Contract Acts § 7); ENGLISH law, R. v. Clarke (1927) 40 CLR 227 (HC of Australia).

11. In AUSTRIA this principle is – although not expressly stated – recognised and derived from CC § 862a (OGH EvBl 1995/43). The same holds true for GERMANY, see BGH 3 November 1976, BGHZ 67, 271, 275.

12. In HUNGARIAN law, in order to be effective, a written notice must be received by the other party (actual knowledge is not necessary) whereas in case of a statement which was made orally (among persons who are present) actual knowledge is required (CC § 214(1)). Statements which are not yet effective can be withdrawn. The notice of withdrawal must reach, or be made known to, the other party no later than the arrival of the withdrawn statement (CC § 214(2)).

I.–1:110: Computation of time

(1) The provisions of this Article apply in relation to the computation of time for any purpose under these rules.

(2) Subject to the following provisions of this Article:

(a) a period expressed in hours starts at the beginning of the first hour and ends with the expiry of the last hour of the period;

(b) a period expressed in days starts at the beginning of the first hour of the first day and ends with the expiry of the last hour of the last day of the period;

(c) a period expressed in weeks, months or years starts at the beginning of the first hour of the first day of the period, and ends with the expiry of the last hour of whichever day in the last week, month or year is the same day of the week, or falls on the same date, as the day from which the period runs; with the qualification that if, in a period expressed in months or in years, the day on which the period should expire does not occur in the last month, it ends with the expiry of the last hour of the last day of that month;

(d) if a period includes part of a month, the month is considered to have thirty days for the purpose of calculating the length of the part.

(3) Where a period is to be calculated from a specified event or action, then:

(a) if the period is expressed in hours, the hour during which the event occurs or the action takes place is not considered to fall within the period in question; and

(b) if the period is expressed in days, weeks, months or years, the day during which the event occurs or the action takes place is not considered to fall within the period in question.

(4) Where a period is to be calculated from a specified time, then:

(a) if the period is expressed in hours, the first hour of the period is considered to begin at the specified time; and

(b) if the period is expressed in days, weeks, months or years, the day during which the specified time arrives is not considered to fall within the period in question.

(5) The periods concerned include Saturdays, Sundays and public holidays, save where these are expressly excepted or where the periods are expressed in working days.

(6) Where the last day of a period expressed otherwise than in hours is a Saturday, Sunday or public holiday at the place where a prescribed act is to be done, the period ends with the expiry of the last hour of the following working day. This provision does not apply to periods calculated retroactively from a given date or event.

(7) Any period of two days or more is regarded as including at least two working days.

(8) Where a person sends another person a document which sets a period of time within which the addressee has to reply or take other action but does not state when the period is to begin, then, in the absence of indications to the contrary, the period is calculated from the date stated as the date of the document or, if no date is stated, from the moment the document reaches the addressee.

(9) In this Article:

(a) "public holiday" with reference to a member state, or part of a member state, of the European Union means any day designated as such for that state or part in a list published in the official journal; and

(b) "working days" means all days other than Saturdays, Sundays and public holidays.

COMMENTS

A. Introduction

The model rules have several provisions which set time limits for various purposes. The provisions on prescription are the most obvious example. Many rules also provide for a party to a contractual or other legal relationship to set time limits for something to be done. It is necessary to have some general rules on how time is computed. Such rules may also be useful as model rules which could be adopted or modified for legislative or contractual purposes.

B. Need for precision

It is important that the rules on the computation of periods of time should be sufficiently clear and precise so that those affected by rules such as those on prescription and those affected by periods of time set by another party to a contractual or other legal relationship may know where they stand. The rules set out in this Article attempt to provide such precision. They are default rules. They apply only unless otherwise provided in particular provisions, or by contracting parties in their contract, or by a person setting a period of time for some act to be done or reply to be received. Whether the default rules have been displaced will depend on the contents and interpretation of the act or instrument concerned. That in turn may be affected by usages or practices. In certain fields of activity there may, for example, be a usage or practice that when a reply is to be received on a stated day it must be received by close of business on that day.

C. Source of the rules

The rules in this Article reflect rules which are commonly found in national systems and which have been found to be commercially convenient. The actual wording is derived with minor drafting changes, from the Regulation (EEC/Euratom) No. 1182/71 of the Council of 3 June 1971 determining the rules applicable to periods, dates and time limits. Article 3 of the Regulation provides as follows.

Article 3

1. Where a period expressed in hours is to be calculated from the moment at which an event occurs or an action takes place, the hour during which that event occurs or that action takes place shall not be considered as falling within the period in question .

Where a period expressed in days, weeks, months or years is to be calculated from the moment at which an event occurs or an action takes place, the day during which that event occurs or that action takes place shall not be considered as falling within the period in question.

2. Subject to the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 4 :

(a) a period expressed in hours shall start at the beginning of the first hour and shall end with the expiry of the last hour of the period;
(b) a period expressed in days shall start at the beginning of the first hour of the first day and shall end with the expiry of the last hour of the last day of the period;
(c) a period expressed in weeks, months or years shall start at the beginning of the first hour of the first day of the period, and shall end with the expiry of the last hour of whichever day in the last week, month or year is the same day of the week, or falls on the same date, as the day from which the period runs. If, in a period expressed in months or in years, the day on which it should expire does not occur in the last month, the period shall end with the expiry of the last hour of the last day of that month;

(d) if a period includes parts of months, the month shall, for the purpose of calculating such parts, be considered as having thirty days.

3. The periods concerned shall include public holidays, Sundays and Saturdays, save where these are expressly excepted or where the periods are expressed in working days .

4. Where the last day of a period expressed otherwise than in hours is a public holiday, Sunday or Saturday, the period shall end with the expiry of the last hour of the following working day. This provision shall not apply to periods calculated retroactively from a given date or event .

5. Any period of two days or more shall include at least two working days .

It will be noticed that there is a difference between Article 3 of the Regulation and the present Article in relation to starting points. The Regulation refers in article 3(1) to a period “calculated from the moment at which an event occurs or an action takes place". It says nothing about periods calculated from a specified time, such as 11.30. This is probably not an important omission in practice because usually a person setting a time limit of this type would specify the time of expiry and would, for example, say “You have until 16.30” rather than “You have five hours from 11.30”. Nonetheless it is perfectly possible that a time limit could be expressed as running from a specified time and the gap in the Regulation could give rise to some uncertainty. It might not be entirely clear whether a period of five hours from 6.30 ends at 11.00 (five hours after the beginning of the clock hour in which the period starts) or 11.30 (if "first hour" means the hour beginning at 6.30 and not the first clock hour) or 12.00 (if the rule applying to "events" is applied by analogy). The present Article contains a separate paragraph on periods which are to be calculated from a specified time. Under the Article a period expressed in hours which is to be calculated from a specified time begins at the specified time. So a period of five hours from 6.30 begins at 6.30 and ends at 11.30, which is the result most people would expect. The same considerations do not seem to apply to times expressed in days, weeks, months or years, where it would be rather arbitrary and difficult to distinguish between a specified event and a specified time. In relation to such periods the Article retains the normal rule that the time runs from midnight to midnight.

Apart from paragraph (4), the only provision in the Article which is not derived from the Regulation is paragraph (8). This is derived from PECL art. 1:304, which is narrower than the present Article in scope as it applies only in relation to periods of time “set by a party in a written document for the addressee to reply or take other action”.

The provisions of the present Article are consistent with, but more comprehensive than, those of the Council of Europe’s European Convention on the Calculation of Time-Limits of 16 May 1972 (ETS No 76) which, as at 14 April 2005, had been ratified by Austria, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg and Switzerland.

D. Time expressed in days, weeks, months or years runs from midnight to midnight.

The effect of the rules in the Article is that where a period is expressed in days, weeks, months or years, the day during which the starting point occurs is not counted. The same effect is achieved in another way by the European Convention on the Calculation of Time-Limits, which provides in article 3(1) that time runs from midnight to midnight.

E. Non-working days count unless the last day of the period

The Article follows Regulation No 1182/71 (above), the European Convention (above) and PECL art. 1:304 in including Saturday, Sundays and public holidays in the period, except that if the last day of a period is an official non-working day or public holiday in the relevant place (e.g. where a message is to be delivered or an action performed) the period is extended to include the next working day. In cases turning on the interpretation of a contract, this rule could be affected by the existence in a particular trade or activity of a usage of working on what is officially a holiday, or by a local usage of working or not working on the relevant day.

F. "Two working days" rule

Paragraph (7) states that any period of two days or more is regarded as including at least two working days. The purpose of this rule is to prevent the preceding rule from having too dramatic an impact in the case of short time periods. For example, if a period of three days from a Friday is allowed and if the following Monday is a public holiday, then the effect of the preceding rule is that the period would expire at midnight on the Tuesday. The nominal three days would include only one working day. The effect of paragraph (7) is that the period expires at midnight on the Wednesday. So the nominal three days includes two working days. Clearly, there is no need for this provision when the period is only one day because the normal rule already gives one working day even if the period ends on a non-working day.

G. Special rules for periods of time set by a person for another to reply etc.

Paragraph (8) contains special rules for this situation. They are derived from PECL art. 1:304, with slight drafting changes and with the omission of a reference to "normal close of business" which is difficult to apply in modern conditions.

Documents. These special rules apply only to documents because if a person sets a period of time in an oral communication, whether face to face or by phone, and does not state from when it is to run, the natural assumption is that it runs from the moment of communication. (This would apply even to a message left on a telephone answering machine: the period will start from the moment the message is recorded.) No special rule is needed for this case. Problems arise only with communications in writing or other textual form.

Express time prevails. The rules in paragraph (8) apply only if the person setting the period has not said when it is to begin. If the person setting the time has stated how it is to be computed that should govern. In some situations the model rules require that a person set a reasonable time. Choosing an inappropriate method of computation might mean that the notice given is not adequate and the period will have to be extended.

Default rule on starting point where date shown on document. In default of a stated method of computation, there might be uncertainty whether the period should start from the time the communication was prepared, the time it was sent or the time it was received. It is well known that delays occur not only in the actual transmission of communications such as letters but also in the sending out of all types of communication. For example a fax may be signed on one day but the sender's office may not dispatch it until the next. This will not necessarily be apparent to the sender, who may simply be given back the original; nor to the person in the recipient's office who is charged with responding. Although fax machines record the time the message was received at the top or bottom of the page, this is very easily lost when the document is photocopied again. For this reason the paragraph adopts the rule that the date shown as the date of the letter or other document should normally be treated as the starting date by whatever method the document was transmitted.

Default rule on starting point where no date shown. With non-instantaneous communications like letters, if the letter itself is undated, time should run from the date at which it was received, which will be all that is clear to the recipient. With instantaneous written communications like a fax, there is little difficulty because the sending and receipt are simultaneous.

No special default rule on ending of period set by a person for reply etc. The normal rule under the Article is that a period of time expressed in days, weeks, months or years expires at midnight. If a person who is setting a period for a reply or action wishes the period to end at some other time of day, and if that result is not already achieved by an applicable usage or practice, then the particular time should be specified.

NOTES

I. Time expressed in days, weeks, months or years runs from start of next day to midnight of last day

1. This rule is very common: e.g. AUSTRIAN CC § 902; BELGIAN Judicial Code art. 52(1); ENGLAND, presumption to this effect, see Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 21-020 and Halsbury's Laws of England XLV[4], paras. 1134-1135; FINLAND, specific rule in Insurance Contracts Act of 1994, § 11 (5); FRENCH NCPC arts. 641-642; GERMAN CC §§ 187 and 188; GREEK CC art. 241, CCP art. 144(1); PORTUGUESE CC art. 279(c). The BULGARIAN rule is similar, but it covers only time expressed in days, not in weeks, months and years – in the latter cases the period starts from the same day mentioned and not from the following one (LOA art. 72(1)).
2. The same rule is to be found, as noted above, in art. 3 of the EEC/Euratom Regulation No. 1182/71 of the Council of 3 June 1971 determining the rules applicable to periods, dates and time limits, in art. 3(1) of the European Convention on the Calculation of Time-limits of 16 May 1972 (ETS. No. 76) and in PECL art. 1:304(3).

II. Official holidays and non-working days

3. Many systems provide or assume that official holidays and non-working days are included in the period of time: ENGLAND, see Chitty on Contracts I[29], no. 21-019, Halsbury's Laws of England XLV[4], para. 1140; GERMANY, Larenz and Wolf, Allgemeiner Teil des deutschen Bürgerlichen Rechts, § 52 no. 10 and the BULGARIAN doctrine.

4. The rule that if the last day of the period is a holiday or non-working day, the time is extended to the next working day is also found widely: e.g. AUSTRIAN CC § 903; BELGIAN Judicial Code art. 53; FRENCH NCPC art. 642 GERMAN CC § 193; NORDIC Instruments of Debt Act § 5(2); PORTUGUESE CC art. 279(e), BULGARIAN LOA art. 72(2) which also refers to judicial holidays. In ENGLAND, however, the rule applies only to acts to be done by a court or in court; in other cases, the general rule is that the fact that the last day is a Sunday or a holiday does not extend the time, Halsbury's Laws of England XLV[4], para. 1138.

5. The rule in the Article is derived from the EEC/Euratom Regulation No 1182/71 (above) and corresponds to art. 5 of the European Convention on the Calculation of Time-Limits (above) and PECL art. 1:304(2).

III. Special rules for some situations

6. Some systems have a rule or presumption that, in certain contexts or situations, a time to reply ends at the normal close of business on the last day, rather than at midnight: e.g. BELGIAN Judicial Code art. 52(2); ENGLAND, see Chitty on Contracts I[29], § 21-019. In GERMAN commercial law, performance must be effected by the close of business on the last day, Ccom § 358. The European Convention on the Calculation of Time-limits, art.3(2) provides that the normal rule that a period of time expressed in days, weeks, months or years ends at midnight does "not preclude that an act which is to be performed before the expiry of a time-limit may be performed on the dies ad quem only before the expiry of the normal office or business hours". See also PECL art. 1:304(3).

7. In BULGARIAN law there is a special rule on a period of time computed before a certain day (LOA art. 72(3)) – in those cases this certain day and the preceding day are not counted in the period. The purpose is to ensure that the period of time computed in that manner includes as many full days (i.e. full 24 hour days) as stated.

8. In HUNGARIAN civil law the order with statutory force no. 11 of 1960 on the Entry into Force and Execution of the Civil Code (Ptké. as amended) sets forth some provisions on the computation of time. If a period is expressed in days, the initial day does not have to be included (i.e. it runs from the start of the next day) (Ptké § 3(1)). A period expressed in weeks, months or years expires on the day which by its name or number corresponds to the beginning day; if such a day does not exist in the last month, the period expires on the last day of the month (Ptké § 3(2)). If the last day of the period is a non-working day, the period expires on the next working day (Ptké § 3(3)). If the parties extend the period, the new period in doubt has to be counted from the day on which follows the expiration of the original period (Ptké § 4(1)). If acquisition of a title is bound to a specific day, it occurs at the beginning of this day (Ptké § 4(2)). The legal consequences of the omission of a period or of a delay come about only after the expiration of the last day of the period (Ptké § 4(3)). CC § 282(1) has a provision in contract law regarding the performance period: the day on which the contract is concluded is not included in the performance period; if the last day of the performance period falls on an official holiday the performance period expires on the next working day. CCP § 103 includes parallel provisions in civil procedural law. CCP § 103(5) says the period expires by the end of the last day, but the period for submissions to the court and for anything to be done in presence of the court ends at the end of the office hours.

BOOK II

CONTRACTS AND OTHER JURIDICAL ACTS

CHAPTER 1: GENERAL PROVISIONS

II.–1:101: Meaning of "contract" and "juridical act"

(1) A contract is an agreement which is intended to give rise to a binding legal relationship or to have some other legal effect. It is a bilateral or multilateral juridical act.

(2) A juridical act is any statement or agreement, whether express or implied from conduct, which is intended to have legal effect as such. It may be unilateral, bilateral or multilateral.

COMMENTS

A. Contracts

The word "contract" is used in at least three different ways in current European and international texts. The word is used, first, in the "agreement" way given here. It is used, secondly, to indicate a legal relationship arising from a contract in the agreement sense. When it is said, for example, that a contract may be terminated in a certain way what is usually meant is that the legal relationship resulting from a contract may be terminated in that way. The word is used, thirdly, to indicate a document in which the terms of a contract, in the agreement sense, are set out. An analysis of relevant EU and international legal texts shows that the "agreement" sense given here is, however, by far the preponderating sense in which the word is currently used in such texts.

The definition in the Article covers not only an agreement which is intended to create rights and obligations but also an agreement which is intended to have some other legal effect. For example, an agreement to vary the terms of an existing contract, or to terminate an existing legal relationship between the parties, would itself be within the definition. An agreement which transfers property immediately, or assigns a right immediately, or renounces a right immediately, without there being any intermediate obligation to do so, would be a contract within the definition.

B. Juridical acts

The notion of a juridical act is a useful one. It covers not only contracts but also many statements which are intended to have legal effect – including offers, acceptances, unilateral promises or undertakings intended to be binding without acceptance; unilateral grants of authority to act as a representative; unilateral grants of consent or permission; unilateral acts of ratification or approval; unilateral acts of withdrawal, revocation, avoidance or termination; and unilateral acts granting, transferring or waiving rights. There is no essential difference between a unilateral "promise" intended to be binding without acceptance and a unilateral "undertaking" intended to be binding without acceptance. Both give rise to an obligation, often a conditional obligation. The difference is simply linguistic. In some contexts the word "promise" will be more natural - for example, when a person promises to pay a reward. In some contexts the word "undertaking" (in the sense of an assumption of an obligation) will be more natural - for example, when a person assumes a security obligation. A unilateral promise or undertaking may merge into a contract if it is accepted by the person to whom it is addressed. The law needs to regulate many aspects of juridical acts.

The term "juridical act" is not universally used. The Principles of European Contract Law refer, for example, to "statements and other conduct indicating intention". (See PECL Art. 1:107 which applies the Principles to such statements and conduct "with appropriate modifications".) The reference to "intention" means in the context an intention to create some legal effect but it seems better to make that clear. The Rome Convention on the Law Applicable to Contractual Obligations (Article 14(2)) talked of "a contract or other act intended to have legal effect". This is essentially the same as the definition used here but an adjective such as "juridical" is useful to distinguish this sort of act from other acts of a purely physical or non-legally-significant nature. The adjective "legal" might be considered but would have the disadvantage of suggesting a contrast with "illegal".

NOTES

I. Contracts

1. The FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1101, the ITALIAN CC art. 1321 and the SPANISH CC art. 1254 define a contract as an agreement by which one or several persons bind themselves to one or several others to give, to do or not to do something. The first three of these codes distinguish between synallagmatic contracts and unilateral contracts, see arts. 1103 and 1104. The former create reciprocally binding obligations for the parties; the seller, for instance, must deliver the goods and the buyer in return pays the purchase money. Unilateral contracts create obligations for only one party and rights for the other. Some systems treat agreements to modify or end a contract as conventions, not contracts, see on FRENCH law Ghestin, La formation du contrat[3], pp. 1 ff. On the other hand, the ITALIAN CC expressly refers to modifications and terminations of contract in the general definition of contract (art. 1321). In BELGIAN law, agreements to modify or terminate a contract are treated as contracts, See: Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 19. BULGARIAN law adopts the definition of contract of the French CC (LOA art. 8(1)). The Bulgarian law and doctrine similarly distinguish between unilateral and bilateral contracts. There is a further significant division of contracts into consensual, formal and real contracts (similarly to GERMAN and AUSTRIAN law, see infra).
2. In ENGLAND, Treitel describes a contract as an agreement giving rise to obligations which are enforced or recognised by law, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 1-001. The law makes a distinction between bilateral and unilateral contracts. A bilateral contract is a synallagmatic contract. A unilateral contract is one under which a counter promise of the offeree is not required. The acceptance occurs in doing the act or suffering the forbearance, which is asked, or possibly by beginning the act or forbearance, provided that it unambiguously shows acceptance (Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 2-053). Thus an offer of a reward made to the public is accepted when a person being aware of the offer does, or possibly begins, the act which is asked for. For either type of contract there must also be consideration, see notes to II.–4:101 (Requirements for the conclusion of a contract). In a bilateral contract, each promise is normally the consideration for the other; in a unilateral contract, the act or forbearance is the counter-performance which makes the promise of the offeror binding.

3. In SCOTLAND a contract has been defined in terms of an agreement which creates, or is intended to create, a legal obligation between the parties to it (see Gloag, Law of Contract[2], pp. 8, 16). The exact meaning of "intention to create legal obligation" is controversial and not yet settled: 15 SME paras. 656-658; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland, paras. 5.02-5.09.

4. In GERMAN, AUSTRIAN and PORTUGUESE law a contract is a legal transaction which consists of at least two declarations of will which constitute an agreement (see e.g. AUSTRIAN CC § 861). However, in Austrian law there are also contracts which require not only agreement but also a transfer of something (real contracts vs. contracts by agreement) such as a loan (CC § 983) or a loan for use (CC § 971). A contract may be unilaterally binding or bilaterally binding. A unilaterally binding contract, such as a donation or a contract of guarantee only creates obligations for one person. In principle the offer or promise needs express acceptance by the other party. However, in German law acceptance of a donation is presumed when the other party remains silent, see CC § 516(2). There is also an acceptance by conduct (e.g. AUSTRIAN CC § 864 part 1 where the other party accepts by performing). Silence, however, only constitutes a valid acceptance if the accepting party is under a "duty" to say something. A bilaterally binding contract is one which creates reciprocal duties for both parties, such as a sale or a lease contract. It presupposes the parties' concordant intention to be legally bound, see Larenz and Wolf, Allgemeiner Teil des deutschen Bürgerlichen Rechts[8], §§ 22 and 23. The formation of a contract is treated in title 3 of Book 1 Part 3 of the BGB. In SLOVENIAN law a contract is an agreement which creates, modifies or abrogates a right or a legal relationship (Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, p. 93). It can be bilateral or multilateral. The LOA provides some special rules for synallagmatic contracts (LOA §§ 100-124), as opposed to other bilateral contracts where the obligation of the parties are not reciprocally connected. As in Austrian law, there are also contracts which, as well as an agreement, demand a transfer of something (real contracts, e.g. the so called "arrha", LOA § 64).

5. DANISH law is similar to German and Austrian Law. See Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 18 ff and 50 ff. The NORDIC Contract Acts adhere to the 'løfteteori' under which an offer is binding on the offeror, and the contract consists of two binding and concordant declarations of will or legal acts (Dan. viljeserklæringr, Swed rättshandling Finn. oikeustoimi). Whereas in the Romanistic legal systems mistake, fraud and coercion render a *contrac*t invalid, these circumstances make the aggrieved person's declaration of will or legal act invalid under the Nordic Contract Acts as under the German CC. In SLOVAKIA there is no definition of contract in the CC. Generally a contract is defined as a legal transaction which consists of at least two unilateral consensual acts, which express agreement.

6. The DUTCH CC says that a contract is a multilateral juridical act whereby one or more parties assume an obligation towards one or more other parties (CC art. 6:213). The ESTONIAN LOA § 8(1) defines contract similarly.

7. In CZECH law contracts are traditionally defined as bilateral or multilateral juridical acts established by the consensus, which is the complete and unconditional acceptance of an offer for conclusion of a contract, see Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law II, 29. The purpose of contracts is to establish, secure, amend or terminate obligations, Knappová (-Knapp/Knappová/Švestka), Civil Law II, 40; Czech contract law does not make any conceptual distinctions between regulations of these types of contracts.

8. According to the HUNGARIAN legal doctrine a contract is two or more persons` concordant declarations of will (consensus) intended to trigger, and capable of triggering, legal effects (Bíró and Lenkovics, Általános tanok[4], 188). CC § 205(1) Contracts are concluded by the mutual and concordant expression of the parties' intent. CC § 198(1) lays down that a contract constitutes an obligation to perform and a right to demand such a performance. A contract can both establish and operate on (i.e. secure, amend or terminate) an obligation.

II. Juridical acts

9. All legal systems know the idea of an act (or statement) intended to have legal effect and all are familiar with various types of acts of this nature and regulate them in one way or another. The concept of the juridical act (acte juridique) is a key one in FRENCH law. Juridical acts are defined in art. 2 of the Projet de Reforme du Droit des Contrats published by the Ministry of Justice in July 2008 as manifestations of will intended to produce legal effects. They can be conventional or unilateral. Not all legal systems, however, use the generalised notion of a "juridical act". ENGLISH law, for example, does not use this term, though it recognises many types of statement which would be termed "juridical acts" in other systems. For example, an obligation may be created by a promise contained in a deed, which requires neither acceptance nor consideration: see further below, II.–1:103 (Binding effect); but even more common examples would be contractual notices given by one party to the other that have legal effect, such as notices of avoidance or termination. SCOTTISH law does use the term "juridical act" and of course recognises and regulates a large number of juridical acts such as offers, acceptances, promises, notices to quit and so on, but it is not a familiar term and little in the way of a general theory has been developed.

10. In GERMAN, AUSTRIAN and PORTUGUESE law a contract is one of several juridical acts. A juridical act is an act by one or more persons the purpose of which is to bring about legal effects. Every juridical act must consist of at least one declaration (or conduct) which expresses a person's intention to be legally bound by the effect which the declaration purports to bring about, also called a declaration of will and to which the law gives that effect because it is intended. A promise is a declaration of will (declaration for a transaction in PORTUGUESE law*)*, which binds the promisor and may do so without acceptance. In SLOVENIAN law, juridical acts are understood in a very similar way. In AUSTRIA the juridical act generally only produces its effects when it reaches the addressee, which means that the latter is able to get to know its contents (empfangsbedürftige Willenserklärung, i.e. a declaration of will which becomes complete upon receipt by the other party). In BELGIUM, the same rules were developed by case law. Under the DUTCH CC a juridical act requires an intention, manifested by a declaration, to produce juridical effects (CC art. 3:33) In the SLOVAK CC § 34 an act in law - a juridical act - is defined as a manifestation of will aimed particularly at the creation, modification or extinction of rights and obligations which statutory provisions attach to such manifestation. In DANISH law the terms juridical act and declaration of will are used in almost the same way as in German law. Similarly, the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 67(1) defines a transaction as an act or a set of interrelated acts which contains a declaration of intention directed at bringing about a certain legal consequence.

11. According to the CZECH CC, a juridical act is a manifestation of will which aims especially at the establishment, modification or termination of rights or obligations which are assigned to such manifestation by the law (CC § 34). Juridical acts are a kind of juridical facts (facts which induce legal consequences), namely such juridical facts which realize the human will. They are classified into unilateral, bilateral and multilateral juridical acts. A juridical act ensues either from an action of a person or from an omission of a legally relevant action of that person, Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 137.

12. The BULGARIAN LOA (art. 44) provides an express definition of unilateral statements of will, stating that the rules applicable to contracts apply "accordingly" to them. There is a further specialty – while a contract is always a source of obligation, the unilateral juridical act (statement of will) is such a source only if a statute so provides. This means that party autonomy in this field is not possible. While party autonomy is almost absolute in the field of contracts (bilateral juridical acts), the unilateral juridical acts are a numerus clausus.

13. In HUNGARIAN law a juridical act is a declaration of will of one or more persons which is intended to bring about legal effects. The (bilateral or multilateral) contract is the most prevalent juridical act. Unilateral juridical acts are able to create, amend or terminate a legal relationship without the consent of others (Bíró and Lenkovics, Általános tanok[4], 182-183 and 189).

II.–1:102: Party autonomy

(1) Parties are free to make a contract or other juridical act and to determine its contents, subject to any applicable mandatory rules.

(2) Parties may exclude the application of any of the following rules relating to contracts or other juridical acts, or the rights and obligations arising from them, or derogate from or vary their effects, except as otherwise provided.

(3) A provision to the effect that parties may not exclude the application of a rule or derogate from or vary its effects does not prevent a party from waiving a right which has already arisen and of which that party is aware.

COMMENTS

Like the national legal systems of the European Union, this instrument acknowledges the right of the citizens and their enterprises to decide with whom they will make their contracts and to determine the contents of these contracts. The principle of freedom of contract is a key principle. This principle of party freedom extends also to the making of other juridical acts.

The principle of freedom of contract and other legal action is, however, always subject to important restrictions. This instrument cannot itself impose restrictions as it is not a legislative instrument. The present Article recognises, however, that any legislator using provisions from the model rules would wish to impose certain restrictions. Some Articles do indicate that they are intended to be mandatory or that derogations from them would have only a limited effect. For example, derogations to the detriment of a consumer might be ineffective. The effect of such provisions is, of course, not actually to make the Articles mandatory or to limit the effect of derogations. This instrument cannot do that. The effect is just to indicate that if a legislator were to adopt the rules it might be expected to make them mandatory or to limit the effect of derogations. The following comments must be read in the light of these preliminary observations.

Paragraph (1) of the Article provides that the parties' freedom to make a contract and to determine its contents is subject to any applicable mandatory rules. This is just a reminder that party autonomy is not absolute. The freedom to decide with whom to contract, the freedom to conclude or not conclude a contract, and the freedom to formulate the terms of a contract may all be limited in one way or another, and similarly for other juridical acts. This instrument itself indicates certain rules which restrict party autonomy and which are intended to be regarded as mandatory.

It does not follow from this provision that an offending contract will always be invalid. It may sometimes be, but the consequences of non-compliance or infringement is determined by later Articles or other rules. For example, a contract concluded by fraud or unfair exploitation would be liable to be avoided under the rules on these subjects (see II.–7:205 (Fraud) and II.–7:207 (Unfair exploitation)) but would not be automatically invalid. A provision in a contract which said that one party reserved the right to ignore any duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing without this having any consequences whatsoever would be ineffective because a later Article (III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing)) provides that the parties cannot contract out of this duty. A contract for the transport of slaves would be contrary to principles recognised as fundamental in all Member States and would be automatically void

(see II.–7:301 (Contracts infringing fundamental principles)). A contract contrary to some less fundamental mandatory rule would have the effect determined by that rule or, if no such effect was laid down, might be avoided in whole or in part, or modified, by a court (see II.–7:302 (Contracts infringing mandatory rules)).

The freedom to conclude a contract implies the freedom not to do so, but again party autonomy is not absolute. The reference to good faith and fair dealing is relevant here. Breaking off negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing may give rise to liability in damages (see II.–3:301 (Negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing)).

One effect of paragraph (2) is that each provision on contract law in the following rules has to be read as if it began, "unless the contract otherwise provides". The paragraph is intended to save a great deal of repetition in later Articles.

Paragraph (3) is designed to avoid a doubt which has sometimes arisen. The fact that a rule is mandatory does not prevent any right which has already arisen under that rule from being waived. In particular it does not prevent a party from settling any dispute relating to that right.

NOTES

1. The freedom of the parties to make the contract and provide the contract terms they wish is recognised in all the Member States. It is provided in art. 2(1) of the GERMAN Constitution. In addition, it is found in art. 5(1) of the GREEK Constitution and in art. 361 of the Greek CC. However, according to art. 3 of the Greek CC "mandatory rules cannot be set aside by the volition of the parties." It is also provided for in the old DANISH code "Danske Lov" of 1683 in § 5.1.1; in FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law (where the freedom of the parties can be derived from CC's art. 1134(l) on the binding effect of valid contracts); in the ITALIAN CC art. 1322; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:248; the PORTUGUESE CC art. 405; the SLOVENIAN LOA §§ 2 and 3; the POLISH CC art. 353^1; the SLOVAKIAN CC § 2(3) and Ccom § 263; and the SPANISH CC art. 1255. It is elevated to a governing principle in the Projet de Reforme du Droit des Contrats published by the FRENCH ministry of Justice in July 2008 (arts. 15 and 16). Under AUSTRIAN law, freedom of contract exists as a constitutional principle and is underpinned by § 859 of the CC. Freedom of contract is expressly stated in the BULGARIAN LOA (art. 9). The only restrictions are the mandatory provisions of law and the bonos mores. In Member States where no statutory provision can be invoked, freedom of contract is a basic principle: e.g. for ENGLAND, see Chitty on Contracts I^{27}, nos. 1-011-1-012. However, freedom of contract exists only within the limits set by the mandatory rules. In modern law considerations of policy, notably the need to protect the weaker party to a contract, have led to many statutory restrictions of contractual freedom.
2. In ESTONIA the principle of freedom of contract is generally recognized and has been safeguarded first of all in the Constitution arts. 19, 31 and 32 stating the rights to free self-performance, free entrepreneurship, and protection of ownership. LOA § 9 also states that contracts are concluded on the basis of the mutual consent of the parties. As the rules of contract law are presumed to be dispositive (LOA § 5), parties are generally free, subject to specific statutory restrictions, to determine the content of their contract (LOA § 23).

3. In the CZECH CC the principle of freedom of contract is set forth in § 2(3) according to which the parties may arrange their rights and obligations by an agreement that differs from the law, if the law does not expressly forbid this or if it does not result from the nature of the provision that it cannot be derogated from. The principle is further supported by CC § 51 pursuant to which the parties may conclude contracts which are not specially regulated in the CC, and CC § 491 which allows for mixed contracts made up of several types of contracts regulated in the CC. However, the same freedom does not apply to all juridical acts. There is a principle in CZECH law that unilateral juridical acts have legal consequences only if this is stipulated by the law (numerus clausus), Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 35. The situation is the same in BULGARIAN law (LOA art. 44).
4. In HUNGARIAN civil law the principle of freedom of contract is important but it is subject to restrictions (CC § 200(1)).

II.–1:103: Binding effect

(1) A valid contract is binding on the parties.

(2) A valid unilateral undertaking is binding on the person giving it if it is intended to be legally binding without acceptance.

(3) This Article does not prevent modification or termination of any resulting right or obligation by agreement between the debtor and creditor or as provided by law.

COMMENTS

A. Binding character of contracts

The first sentence of paragraph (1) of this Article expresses one of the most fundamental and general principles of European contract law. Valid contracts are binding on the parties. Pacta sunt servanda.

B. Binding character of a unilateral undertaking

A contract is defined in terms of an agreement. If there is no agreement there is no contract. Often an agreement can be spelled out of conduct indicating acceptance. However, this is not always possible. Sometimes there is simply a unilateral undertaking which is intended to be binding without acceptance. To force such cases into the contractual mould can be artificial and unconvincing. A more direct approach can be taken. The unilateral undertaking is itself binding.

Paragraph (2) is derived from Article 2:107 of the Principles of European Contract Law. The word "undertaking" is used instead of "promise" as it now seems to be more commonly used in European instruments and is the term used in the rest of the DCFR. No change in meaning is intended. An "undertaking" is simply a voluntary assumption of an obligation. Any expression which clearly indicates an intention to be legally bound will suffice – for example, "I undertake to", or "I bind myself to" or "I promise to" or "we assume an obligation to" or "we hereby guarantee".

Some legal systems do not enforce a party's unilateral undertaking even if it is intended to be legally binding without acceptance. Some do so but only if it is not gratuitous or is couched in a solemn form or is found to serve a socially desirable purpose which cannot be achieved by other means.

The fear that the enforcement of unilateral undertakings will lead to socially undesirable results is not well founded. In fact many such undertakings serve legitimate commercial purposes.

Nor is it necessary to inquire into the social desirability of the undertaking if it is sincerely made. Experience shows that the legal systems which enforce gratuitous undertakings (whether they are intended to be binding without acceptance or were intended to be, and were, accepted and thus fall within the definition of a contract in II.–1:101 (Meaning of "contract" and "juridical act") do not in general encounter problems. People of sound mind do not normally assume obligations without good reason. In some cases a requirement of writing may be justified (see II.–1:106 (Form) and the Comments on it), but that is a different question from the question whether a unilateral undertaking can be binding. On the other hand, those legal systems which do not enforce "gratuitous" promises have faced problems when such promises sincerely made have since been revoked. These problems arise in a most acute form when the promisee has acted in reasonable reliance on the promise, but they do not arise only in this case. Legitimate expectations fall to be respected even if there has been no actual reliance. The position in this respect is similar to that encountered in the case of contracts.

Leaving aside exceptional cases where some requirement of writing may be justified for special reasons, on balance it appears to be justifiable and desirable to regard unilateral undertakings as binding if they are intended to be binding without acceptance; and (as is provided expressly in II.–1:106 (Form)) not to subject all such undertakings to formal requirements. Of course, they must be valid. They may, for example, like contracts, be avoided for mistake or fraud or threats and so on. See Chapter 7 (Grounds of Invalidity).

C. Unilateral undertaking and offer distinguished

An offer is a unilateral juridical act which requires acceptance. An offeror is not bound by the act unless it is accepted. Other undertakings may be binding without acceptance. Whether there is such an undertaking depends on the language used and other circumstances. The undertaking must of course be communicated to the other party or to the public.

Illustration 1
When the Gulf War started in 1990 the enterprise X in country Y published a statement in several newspapers in Y promising to establish a fund of €1 million to support the widows and dependent children of soldiers of country Y who were killed in the war. After the war X tried to avoid payment invoking big losses recently made. X will be bound by its promise.

D. Modification or termination

Paragraph (3) is added to make it clear that the fact that a contract or juridical act can create obligations does not mean that those obligations cannot be modified or terminated by agreement between the debtor and the creditor or as provided by law. (The debtor and creditor will not necessarily be the original parties to a contract: there may have been an assignment of the creditor's right or a substitution of a new debtor or a transfer of one party's whole contractual position.) Very often a contract will itself provide a mechanism whereby its terms can be varied. Variation in accordance with such a mechanism is simply giving effect to the contract. The reference to modification or termination "as provided by law" takes account, for example, of the later provisions on termination for non-performance of a contractual obligation (see Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5) and of the provisions which, exceptionally, enable a court to modify the terms of a contract or terminate the contractual relationship altogether in certain situations (see III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances)).

E. Commercial importance of unilateral undertakings

Many unilateral undertakings made in the course of business are binding without acceptance and it is important in practice that they generally should be. An irrevocable documentary credit issued by a bank (the issuing bank) on the instructions of a buyer binds the issuing bank; a confirmation of such a credit by an advising bank binds the bank as soon as it is delivered to the seller. Some assumptions of security obligations also fall under this category (see further Book IV Part G (Personal Security)).

Illustration 2
C sends a letter to the creditors of its subsidiary company D, which is in financial difficulties, undertaking to ensure that D will meet its existing debts. The undertaking is made in order to save the reputation of the group of companies to which C and D belong. It is binding upon C without acceptance since it is to be assumed that C intends to be bound without the acceptance of each creditor.

We will see below (II.–4:202 (Revocation of offer)) that an offer which is stated to be irrevocable or which subject to a fixed time limit for acceptance may not be revoked within the period. In this case making the offer itself amounts to a unilateral juridical act which is binding without acceptance, since it carries with it an express or implied unilateral undertaking not to revoke it.

NOTES

The rule that contracts are legally binding is universal within the systems of the European Union and national notes would be superfluous. Of more interest is the question whether unilateral undertakings may be binding without acceptance.

I. Unilateral undertakings binding

1. Under some of the legal systems of the Union, promises may be binding without acceptance when this is stated in the promise or follows from the nature of the promise. This applies to GERMAN, AUSTRIAN, SLOVENIAN and ESTONIAN law where, for instance, promises of rewards are binding without acceptance (for Austria CC § 860 and German CC § 657, Auslobung; and for Slovenian LOA §§ 207-211. In PORTUGUESE law a public promise is binding in favour of the person who is in the situation or makes the action described by the public announcement (CC art. 459).
2. Under the ITALIAN CC, art. 1333 allows for a promise to be binding without acceptance when its purpose is to conclude a contract with obligations for the promisor only.
3. A promise is also binding on the promisor without acceptance in FINNISH and SWEDISH law, Contract Acts § 1. These impose formal requirements for a promise to make a gift, but do not require acceptance by the promisee, see for Finland, Timonen, Inledning till Finlands rättsordning, 280. The promise is also binding without acceptance in DANISH law, which does not require formalities for gift promises.
4. In THE NETHERLANDS such promises may be binding, see CC arts. 6:219 and 6:220. The same holds true of BELGIAN law, where promises can be binding without any acceptance, see Cass. 9 May 1980, Arr.Cass. 1979-80, 1132 and 1139, Cass. 3 Sept 198l, T. Aann. 1982, 131, Cass. 16 March 1989, Arr.Cass. 1988-89, 823, Cass. 27 May 2002 www.cass.be, Cauffman, De verbindende eenzijdige belofte, nos. 176 and 228; Simont, L'engagement unilatéral, 4 ff, Van Ommeslaghe, JT 1982, 144.
5. In SCOTTISH law there are “unilateral” promises for which no consideration is required and which are binding without acceptance, although writing is required unless the promise is in the course of business, see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], chap. 2 (pp. 15-26) and Requirements of Writing (Scotland) Act 1995, s. l.

6. In POLAND a public promise, as defined by the code (CC 919-921), is a binding unilateral act. A promisor who offers the public a reward for performance of an action or the best performance of an action is bound. The promisor can decide whether the promise is to be revocable or irrevocable.

7. The SLOVAK CC § 850 provides for unilaterally binding promises to the public: whoever makes a promise to pay a reward or provide some other performance to one or more persons from the public (or from an otherwise unspecified number of persons) who meet conditions stated in the public promise will be bound by the promise.

8. In HUNGARIAN law a right to demand performance can be established from a unilateral statement only in the cases defined by legal regulations; (unless otherwise provided by law, the provisions on contracts are applied to unilateral statements) (CC § 199). The Hungarian CC recognises e.g. the public offer of a reward (Auslobung) (CC § 592) and public commitments (CC §§ 593-596). A gift is a contract: a gift must be accepted (CC §§ 579-582).

9. In BULGARIAN law a unilateral promise is binding only if so provided by law (numerus clausus of unilateral juridical acts – LOA art. 44). However there are several situations where unilateral acts not explicitly regulated by law have a binding effect – e.g. a unilateral termination of a contractual relationship according to a termination clause in the contract (and not provided by law).

II. Acceptance required

10. In ENGLISH law promises generally need acceptance (which may, however, be by conduct) before they will give rise to a binding legal obligation. The only clear cases of a binding promise which do not require acceptance are (i) the deed – the beneficiary need not know of it (the deed must have been delivered but it need not have been delivered to the beneficiary: see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 3-164–3-166), and (ii) the irrevocable letter of credit. The latter is considered binding as soon as the confirming bank notifies the seller that the credit has been opened, see Adams/Atiyah/MacQueen, Sale of Goods[9],440; Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 3-153; Goode, Abstract payment undertakings.

11. FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG law require acceptance of promises. In SPANISH law promises are not binding unless accepted which may take place by performing the act required, see Supreme Court Judgment 17 October 1975, RAJ (1975) 3675 and 6 March 1976 RAJ (1976) 1175 and Sancho, Elementos del Derecho Civil II[2], 173-181. This applies even in situations in which it could be presumed that the addressee's silence amounts to acceptance e.g. a contract for the provision of personal security: Supreme Court Judgment 23 March 1988, RAJ 2422). However, in cases in which the unilateral promise is backed by a previous "moral obligation", the promise is binding, as having "fair cause" regardless of the acceptance of the beneficiary. (See: Supreme Court Judgment 17 October 1932).

12. Acceptance is generally required under GREEK law; a mere promise is not enough. However, the CC art. 193 provides that under special circumstances the acceptance as such may suffice, regardless of whether it has been dispatched or arrives at the offeror's place, see Erman (-Simantiras), BGB I[9], 193 no. 11.

13. The ITALIAN CC art. 1987 provides that a unilateral promise of a performance, i.e. an undertaking which does not require acceptance, is not binding except in specific cases provided by law, such as a promise to the public (CC art. 1989), and a promise of payment and acknowledgment of debt (CC art. 1988).

14. In DANISH law promises made exclusively for the advantage of the promisee, such as promises of a gift, do not require acceptance. See Ussing, Aftaler[3], 61. However, in the case where an offeror has declared that no reply is expected the offeree is nevertheless obliged on request to say whether the offer is to be accepted; should the offeree omit to do so, the offer lapses. See Contracts Act § 8.

15. In ESTONIAN law acceptance is presumed for contracts of surety (LOA § 144(1)) and guarantees (LOA § 155(1^1). Contracts for gift, like contracts generally, need acceptance for their formation (LOA §§ 259 ff).

16. CZECH law holds that a unilateral juridical act (including a promise) is binding on the promisor only if it is provided by the law (numerus clausus), Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 35, so CZECH law does not allow for innominate unilateral promises. However, the Civil Code and the Commercial Code contain a broad regulation of nominate promises – e.g. the public competition (CC §§ 847 et seq.), public tender (Ccom arts. 281 et seq.), promise of indemnity (Ccom arts. 725 et seq.) or public promise (CC §§ 850 et seq.). The latest seems to be the broadest of all – its definition reads: whoever makes a public promise binds himself, under such promise, to pay a reward or provide other consideration to one or more of an unspecified number of persons who meet the conditions provided in the public promise (CC § 850). Although a simple promise not accepted by the recipient is not binding, its breach may give rise to damages award (CC § 415).

17. Acceptance of a unilateral promise is not required by BULGARIAN law, as far as the promise itself is regulated by special law (LOA art. 44). An “acceptance of a promise” automatically brings about a concluded contract. In those cases the “promise” is regarded as an offer.

II.–1:104: Usages and practices

(1) The parties to a contract are bound by any usage to which they have agreed and by any practice they have established between themselves.

(2) The parties are bound by a usage which would be considered generally applicable by persons in the same situation as the parties, except where the application of such usage would be unreasonable.

(3) This Article applies to other juridical acts with any necessary adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. Scope

This Article deals with usages and with practices which the parties to a contract have established between themselves. Under paragraph (1) a usage applies if the parties have expressly or tacitly agreed that it should. Under paragraph (2) a usage which would be considered applicable by persons in the same situation as the parties will bind them even without their agreement, provided the usage is not unreasonable and is consistent with the express terms of the agreement.

A usage may be described as a course of dealing or line of conduct which is, and for a certain period of time has been, generally adopted by those engaged in a trade or other activity.

A practice which the parties have established between themselves may arise as a result of a sequence of previous conduct in relation to a particular transaction or a particular kind of transaction between the parties. It is established when their conduct may fairly be regarded as a common understanding. The conduct may not only lend a special meaning to words and expressions which they use between themselves but may also create rights and obligations.

B. Priority of usages and practices over the rules of law

Both usages and practices will, when applicable, preclude the application of default rules of law which are designed to fill gaps in a contract. However, although not stated, it is implicit in the Article that usages and practices are only valid in so far as they do not violate mandatory rules of the law applicable to the contract or to the particular issue in question.

C. Parties refer to a usage

Sometimes the parties may refer to a usage which otherwise would not operate between them under the second paragraph of the Article. Such a usage then becomes binding under the first paragraph.

Illustration 1
A, who operates in Copenhagen and who has bought a commodity in Hamburg resells it to B, who also lives in Copenhagen. In their contract the parties agree to have the local usages of the Hamburg Commodity Exchange apply. These usages will then bind both of them.

D. A practice between the parties

A practice established between the parties may vary their initial agreement, and it may create other mutual rights and obligations between them.

> Illustration 2
> Having been called a couple of times to fill A's oil tank, B, on the basis of information received regarding A's consumption, has done so for more than 5 years without having been called. B has seen to it that A, whose factory is dependant on the oil, never runs out of oil. A has always paid B close to but not later than 90 days after receipt of the oil.
>
> The initial agreement between the parties that B should only fill the tank when called upon has been changed by their practice; an obligation on B to see to it that the tank never runs out of oil has been created. Also, although never expressly agreed upon, a practice between the parties extending to a credit of not more than 90 days after receipt has been established between them.

It goes without saying that the parties may later agree to vary a practice which they have established between them.

In case of a conflict between a practice between the parties and a usage not agreed upon by the parties, the former will take precedence over the latter.

E. Usages not agreed upon

A usage may operate without having been agreed upon by the parties (provided that the parties have not agreed, expressly or by implication, to exclude it). For such a usage to be binding, paragraph (2) of the Article requires that it is one which would be considered applicable by persons in the same situation as the parties and is not unreasonable.

The usage must be so well established and have such general application among those engaged in the trade or activity that persons in the same situation as the parties would consider it applicable. Parties may thus be bound by usages which have application to all or several trades and by usages which apply in a particular trade only.

The Article applies to local, national and international usages. A usage may be international either in the sense that it operates in the world trade, or in the sense that in a contract between parties which have their place of business in two different states, it operates in both states.

A local or national usage which operates at the place of business of one of the parties but not at that of the other party can only bind the latter if this would be reasonable. A party who comes into a market of the other party will often be bound by the local usages.

> Illustration 3
> A in Brussels sends an order to B, a broker in Paris, to be executed on the Paris Stock Exchange. A is ignorant of stock exchange transactions and has no knowledge of the usages of the Paris exchange. A can, therefore, have no intention to submit to these usages. Nevertheless the order is to be executed in accordance with the reasonable usages of the Paris Stock Exchange.

Illustration 4
A, a merchant from Milan, goes to London and there negotiates and concludes a contract to deliver to B in London "ground walnuts". These words mean a finer grinding in London than the corresponding expression does in Milan. Unless otherwise agreed the contract is taken to refer to the London usage.

The application of a usage must not be unreasonable. A usage can never set aside a mandatory rule of law, but if the law merely supplies a term in the absence of contrary agreement, the usage may reverse what would otherwise be the normal rule, provided its application is not unreasonable. Commercial acceptance by regular observance by business people is some evidence that the usage is reasonable but even a usage which is regularly observed may be disregarded by the court if it finds the application of the usage unreasonable.

The way in which the usages are ascertained - through expert witnesses, by opinions submitted by the national or local Chamber of Commerce etc. - is decided by the applicable national law.

F. Other juridical acts

Paragraph (3) applies the rules in the Article, with any necessary modifications, to other juridical acts. In the case of certain unilateral juridical acts, such as offers or notices of withdrawal of offers, for example, the word “parties” may have to be regarded for the purposes of paragraph (1) as referring to the parties to a pre-contractual relationship. In certain other cases the word “parties” may have to be regarded as referring to the sole party involved. In such a case, of course, the references in paragraph (1) to usages or practices agreed between the parties will be inapplicable, but paragraph (2) could still apply.

Illustration 5
It is a well-established usage in a certain trade that the sending of a request to act in a certain form confers authority to act in accordance with the rules of the trade association. A person engaged in that trade who sends such a form will be bound by the usage and could not argue that the rule in the Article is inapplicable because there is no contract but only a unilateral act.

NOTES

I. Definition of usage

Statutes, courts and authors have offered various definitions of usages:

1. Some have required that if a trade practice is to be classified as a usage, it must be accepted as binding by those engaged in that line of business, see Schmitthoff, International Trade Usages, 14, and the GERMAN RG 10 January 1925, RGZ 110, 47 (48).
2. The UNITED STATES UCC § 2.105 defines a usage as "any practice or method of dealing having such regularity of observance in a place, vocation or trade as to justify an expectation that it will be observed with respect to the transaction in question". This definition does not take into consideration the possibility that a usage may bind the parties even though, at the time of the conclusion of the contract, none of them was aware of the usage, see the ENGLISH House of Lords decision in Comptoir d'Achat et de Vente Belge SA v. Luis de Ridder Limitada [1949] AC 293.

3. In ENGLAND the definition of a usage provided in Halsbury's Laws of England[4], 12(1), 650 is "a particular course of dealing or line of conduct generally adopted by persons engaged in a particular department of business life".

4. In POLAND, courts and legal writers have held that the usage must not be contrary to statutory law and the principles of social co-existence. In CZECH law trade usages are defined as rules which are as a matter of fact observed by the parties in economic relations, although they are not set forth by the law, Štenglová/Plíva/Tomsa, Commercial Code[10], 4. Conviction of the binding character is not required; Pelikánová, Commercial Code, 21. In SLOVENIA, the trade usage is understood as a line of conduct the observance of which is expected by those engaged in a trade or business (Juhart and Plavšak, Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 127).

5. In AUSTRIA CC § 10 refers to usages or practices and states that usages are to be observed only in statutorily defined cases. CC § 914 expressly states that usages have to be considered when interpreting contracts. CC § 863(2) refers to usages when determining the implied meaning of acts and omissions.

6. In ESTONIA, according to the general clause in the introductory part of the civil code, custom (tava) is a source of law when it has been applied for a long period of time and the persons involved consider it legally binding (GPCCA § 2). However, a custom cannot change the law. For contracts entered into with respect to the economic or professional activities of the parties, a provision resembling the present Article applies additionally (see LOA § 25). See also Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 11.02.2003, civil matter no. 3-2-1-9-03 p. 30 for accepting international usage as a source of law qualifying a guarantee as a first demand guarantee.

7. In BULGARIAN law no strict distinction between usages and practices is made. The terms are used synonymously.

II. Proof of a usage

8. The way in which a usage is proved differs from country to country; see on the laws Schmitthoff, International Trade Usages, 20 ff.

III. Parties' choice of usage and practice

9. Paragraph (1) of the Article is drafted in the same way as CISG art. 9(1) which is in force in the majority of Member States of the European Union. See also ULIS art. 9(1).

10. The first branch of the rule, providing that the parties are bound by any usage they have agreed upon, seems to be generally accepted by the legal systems, see Dölle (-Junge), Kommentar zum einheitlichen Kaufrecht, art. 9 no. 8.

11. The second branch of the rule, which provides that practices established between the parties will bind them, is applied in several legal systems. In case of a conflict between a practice established between the parties and a usage not expressly agreed upon, the former takes priority, see FRENCH Cass.com. 14 June 1977, Bulletin IV no. 172, p. 148 and Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), CISG, art. 9 no. 8.

12. The rule in paragraph (1) has also been adopted in NORDIC, DUTCH, SCOTTISH and SPANISH law: see Nordic Contract Acts § 1, Scotland: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 9.60-9.64 (although cases of the paragraph (2) type have been more common), and Spanish CC arts. 1282 and 1287 as interpreted by the courts. A similar rule is also found in SLOVAKIA under the Ccom § 264(2). See also PORTUGUESE CC art. 405(1). Under Portuguese law practices established between the parties are only considered to be a guide for the interpretation and supplementation of the contract. See also the ITALIAN CC arts. 1340 and 1368 (and Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 38 ff, with reference to the scholarship and case law distinguishing between usi normativi and usi negoziali for further references).

13. There is no general rule such as the one in this Article in the POLISH CC. However it refers to usages (customs) in a number of contexts such as: effects of an act in law (CC art. 56); interpretation of a declaration of will (CC art. 65 § 1); acceptance of an offer (CC art. 69); the manner in which a debtor must perform the obligation and a creditor must co-operate in the performance (CC art. 354).

14. ESTONIAN LOA § 25(1) literally follows paragraph (1) of the present Article. However, it is applicable only with regard to contracts concluded in relation to professional and economic activities. Additionally, a practice the parties have established between themselves and a usage observed in the profession or field of activity of the parties may give rise to implied terms in the contract (see LOA § 23(1) (2) and(3) respectively).

15. CZECH law mentions practices established by the parties only in the Commercial Code, which applies in legal relationships between businesspersons (Ccom arts. 266(3), 275(4), 369a(4) etc.), and the practices serve merely as an interpretation aid. Although CC does not expressly provide for practices at all, it can be at least assumed that the practices should be taken into account in course of interpretation of the parties' will (as under the Commercial Code). It can be further assumed that if the practices are obviously a component of the parties' will, they are a part of the contract (but there is little experience with this attitude yet).

IV. Usages not expressly chosen by the parties

(a) Implied intention

16. Some legal systems refer to the implied intention of the parties. For the position in ENGLAND, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 6-047–6-049; see also the ENGLISH law on incorporation of terms through a course of dealings, e.g. Henry Kendall & Sons v. Lillico & Sons Ltd [1969] 2 AC 31. On FRENCH law see the current interpretation of CC art. 1135 and art. 1160 (Bénabent, Les obligations[7], nos. 208 ff); on AUSTRIAN law, see CC §§ 863(2), 914; and BELGIAN law, Cass. 29 May 1947, Pas. belge 1947, I 217. These laws consider the will of the parties as the legal basis for the application of usages. CISG art. 9(2) provides that the parties are considered impliedly to have made certain usages applicable to the contract Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), CISG, art. 9 no. 12). In contrast, paragraph (2) of the present Article treats usages as legal norms applicable independently of the volition of the parties (cf., in GREECE, Athens Administrative Court of Appeal 7388/1991, EEN 58 (1991) 336, 337-338); usages may bind parties who were unaware of them when they made the contract. On NORDIC law see Ramberg, Köplagen, 160 and the Nordic Contract Acts (§1(2)). ESTONIAN LOA § 25(2) has the same effect if the parties have concluded a contract in the course of professional and economic activity. See also the SPANISH CC art. 1258 which refers expressly to usage as an implied term to which the parties are assumed to have agreed. In SLOVAKIA under Ccom § 264(1) common business practices, generally observed in the particular line of business, unless contradicting the contents of the contract or law, are taken into account when determining the rights and obligations ensuing from a contractual relationship. Similarly, in SLOVENIAN law, trade usages and practices established between the parties are taken into account with regard to contractual relationships in the course of business activity, see LOA § 12.

17. In BULGARIA usages are decisive for the interpretation of contracts (LOA art. 20) and for determining the content of an obligation (LOA art. 63(1)) and are for that reason binding for the parties (expressly stated in Ccom art. 288).

(b) Imputed knowledge

18. CISG art. 9(2) relies on the knowledge or the imputed knowledge of the parties in question. This test leaves doubt as to whether newcomers in the trade or outsiders are bound by a usage of which they cannot reasonably have any knowledge. It has not been included in the present Article. A usage conceived as a legal norm will apply to everybody within its scope and will bind even the newcomer to the market.

19. CZECH Ccom art. 1(2) provides that trade usages are to be taken into account if a case cannot be resolved according to the written law. Ccom § 264 further stipulates that in determining the rights and duties arising from an obligational relationship, regard is to be had also to trade usages observed generally in a particular branch of business, unless they contradict the terms of the contract or the law; trade usages which should be taken into consideration pursuant to the contract prevail over rules of law which are not mandatory. So, this concept uses neither implied intention nor imputed knowledge, but simply makes the usages a part of the law. The regulation applies only in relations between business persons; the CC does not contain any provision on usages.

(c) Unreasonable usage

20. In several legal systems unreasonable usages will not bind the parties. This holds true of AUSTRIA, see CC § 863(2); DENMARK, see Andersen and Nørgaard, Aftaleloven[2], 35; ENGLAND, see the discussion in Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 6-047–6-049; GREECE, see Athens Court of Appeal 2449/1960, EEN 28 (1961) 225-226, note Pothos; GERMANY, see Baumbach/Duden/Hopt (-Hopt), Handelsgesetzbuch[12], § 346 no. 11; the NETHERLANDS, see CC art. 6:248(2); PORTUGAL, see CC art. 3(1); SPAIN, see CC art 3.1 and Vicent Chuliá, Compendio crítico de Derecho Mercantil[3], 1, 44; SWEDEN, see Ramberg, Köplagen, 161; SCOTLAND, see "Strathlorne" S.S. Co v. Baird & Sons 1916 SC 134; and probably for FRANCE, see the discussion in Marty and Raynaud, Introduction générale[2], no. 114. In ITALY Disposizioni sulla legge in generale, art. 8 seems to exclude any usage which is contrary to statutory law. See also Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 38 ff for further references.

21. CISG does not expressly require the usage to be reasonable. Writers on CISG, however, regard this requirement to be implied. See Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), art. 9 no. 5.

(d) International, national and local usages

22. Unlike CISG art. 9(2), which applies only to usages in international trade, the present Article applies also to national and local usages.

II.–1:105: Imputed knowledge etc.

If a person who with a party's assent was involved in making a contract or other juridical act or in exercising a right or performing an obligation under it:

(a) knew or foresaw a fact, or is treated as having knowledge or foresight of a fact; or
(b) acted intentionally or with any other relevant state of mind this knowledge, foresight or state of mind is imputed to the party.

COMMENTS

A. Purpose

It is the purpose of this Article to neutralise the legal risks inherent in the modern division of labour in trade and industry. This is achieved by imputing actual or constructive knowledge or a legally relevant state of mind, such as intention, negligence or bad faith, of a person assisting in the making of a contract or other juridical act, or in exercising rights or performing obligations under it, to the party to whom that assistance is rendered.

The issues covered by this Article are not always clearly regulated in the existing national laws. The Article represents what are thought to be the principles which underlie each law's approach, shorn of the technical concepts which many laws use to arrive at much the same results.

B. Scope

Under modern conditions, most contracts are not concluded by the contracting parties personally. Rather, at least one and often each party makes the contract through the agency of employees or other persons and entrusts performance of the obligations under the contract to employees, representatives, subcontractors and other third persons. A later Article (III.–2:106 (Performance entrusted to another)) provides that a party cannot escape from an obligation by delegating it to another; if the obligation is not performed, the party will remain responsible. The present Article is complementary to that Article. It deals with other aspects of this modern division of labour, namely the imputation to the contracting party of actual or constructive knowledge of persons assisting in the making of a contract or the performance of obligations under it (paragraph (a)) and with the imputation of intention or some other relevant state of mind such as negligence. The same considerations apply to other juridical acts, such as the giving of legally effective notices for various purposes.

The clearest case of a person acting with the assent of a party in performing a contractual or other similar obligation is where the debtor in the obligation has entrusted performance to that person. However, a third person may nevertheless under certain conditions be entitled to perform the obligation. If the third person acted with the debtor's assent that is equivalent to an entrustment and therefore falls under the present Article.

In contrast, if the third person has acted only by virtue of a legitimate interest in the performance, and not with the assent of the debtor, that falls outside the scope of the Article.

C. Imputed knowledge and foresight

Many of the following rules use the criteria of knowledge, awareness or foresight. A party who could reasonably be expected to have known or foreseen a fact is often treated as having had the knowledge or foresight.

When a contract is being made, a party is normally only fixed with the knowledge imputed to the party's employees or representatives involved in making the contract. Under some Articles, knowledge or foreseeability at the time of non-performance is relevant. In this case, knowledge or intention even of any subcontractor or other person to whom performance has been entrusted may be imputed to the party.

However, there is one limitation. The employee or other person must have been someone who was, or who appeared to be, involved in the negotiation or performance of the contract. If a person not so related to the contract knows a relevant fact he or she may not be able to appreciate its relevance to the contract and thus might not report it. The burden of proving that the person for whom the contracting party is held responsible was not and did not reasonably appear to the other party to be involved in the making or performance of the contract rests on the first party.

D. Imputed intention, etc.

According to paragraph (b), certain states of mind or behaviour of the person acting are also imputed to the contracting party for whom a contract has been concluded or an act of performance is rendered (and similarly for other juridical acts).

Under several rules, intentional or similar behaviour or bad faith by a party creates or increases liability. However, it should be noted that, under the following rules on contractual and other voluntary obligations, liability is not generally based on the notion of fault. This limits the scope of the Article.

The intentional or other behaviour of a party or of a person whose state of mind is imputed to a party only refers to the act or omission which constitutes the non-performance. It is not necessary that the intention or state of mind also extend to the consequences which may follow from the non-performance.

NOTES

I. Imputation of knowledge

1. Imputation of knowledge when a contract is being made is dealt with in rules on agency or mandate in BELGIUM (de Page and Dekkers, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge[3] no. 52), GERMANY (CC § 166), ITALY (CC art. 1391) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 259(1)). In Germany it is held that the rule of CC § 166 on agency expresses a general principle: a person who entrusts another with executing certain affairs on his or her own responsibility will be regarded as having the knowledge which the other has acquired in that context (BGH 25 March 1982, BGHZ 83, 293 (296)); this principle corresponds to the idea underlying sub-paragraph (a) of the present Article. Although there is no explicit rule in the AUSTRIAN Code, the Austrian Supreme Court (OGH) reaches the same result by reference to CC § 1017 (OGH 13 February 1963, SZ 36/25; see Schwimann (-Apathy), ABGB IV[3], § 1017 no. 14). The matter is also discussed when determining a company's (or other legal entity's) knowledge. Whenever a person is responsible to a certain extent for the company's affairs, the knowledge of this person is considered the company's knowledge, even if that responsibility is not conferred upon the person by the company's internal constitution (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 75). In SLOVENIAN law the issue is dealt with in the rules on agency (direct effect, LOA § 70(1) and (2)) and mistake (LOA § 48). In ENGLISH law the question is treated as one of agency (cf. Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 6-048 and 6-068; Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 9-029 with references) or, when the question is whether a person's knowledge may be attributed to a corporation, "identification" (see Meridian Global Funds Management v. Securities Commission [1995] 2 AC 500 (PC)). In the NORDIC countries the representative's knowledge is imputed to the principal, Kaisto s. 265. This is not absolutely clear according to SWEDISH law; see Dotevall, Mellanmannens kunskap och huvudmannens bundenhet, passim. In POLISH law, the issues covered by this Article are not clearly regulated. However, a contract made through a representative, acting with authority, has "direct effects for the person represented" (CC art. 95). Legal writers hold that if those effects depend on good or bad faith, or knowledge or lack of knowledge, one has to take into consideration both the representative's and the principal's state of mind (e.g. Pietrzykowski, Kodeks cywilny, art. 95). In ESTONIA, in addition to special rules for representatives (GPCCA § 123, see note 3 below), GPCCA § 133(1) states that if a person uses another person in a business (i.e. in the first person's economic or professional activity) on a continuous basis, the first person is deemed to be aware of the circumstances known to the other person, except if the duties of that person do not include communication of such information to the first person or if the other person cannot reasonably be expected to communicate such information taking into account the duties involved. Similar provision applies for persons involved in performing an obligation (GPCCA § 133(2)). For CZECH law, see CC § 32(3): if the principal acts in good faith or knew or ought to have known of certain circumstances, account of this shall be taken also with regard to the representative, unless the representative had learned about the circumstances before the grant of the authority. The principal who is not in good faith cannot appeal to the good faith of the representative.

2. In BELGIUM a similar rule is justified by analogy to the rule on performance entrusted to another (see below). In FRANCE, a corresponding rule has apparently not yet been formulated; but it may be compatible with the solutions to be found in case law, especially in determining foreseeability of damage (cf. Viney and Jourdain, Les effets de la responsabilité[1], no. 325).

3. In GERMANY (CC § 166(1), GREECE (CC art. 214), ITALY (CC art. 1391(1)), ESTONIA (GPCCA § 123(1)) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 259(1)), only the representative's state of mind is, as a rule, considered. If, however, the representative has acted according to instructions, also the principal's state of mind is considered in Germany (CC § 166(2)) and Greece (CC art. 215). Though not explicitly regulated, the situation is the same in SLOVENIA (Juhart and Plavšak, Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 433). By contrast, in Italy (cf. supra), Estonia (GPCCA § 123(2)) and Portugal (CC art. 259 (2)) only the principal is then considered. A very flexible rule has been enacted in THE NETHERLANDS: either the representative or the principal or both are taken into account, depending on the extent to which each of them took part in concluding the contract or in determining its contents (CC art. 3:66(2)). Under the SLOVAK CC § 32(3) if the principal knew or must have known of certain circumstances, this is taken into consideration also with regard to the representative, unless it concerns circumstances about which the representative had already learned before the authorisation was granted.

II. Imputation of intention etc.

4. In some national laws, the imputation of intention, negligence and bad faith is very important in the framework of a fault principle for liability. According to several provisions, a non-performing party is responsible for the culpable behaviour of persons charged with performing the obligations (AUSTRIAN CC § 1313a; BELGIUM: CC art. 1245 and Cass. 21 June 1979, Pas. belge 1979 I 1226; Cass. 5 Oct. 1990, Pas. belge 1991, 115; Cass. 27 Feb. 2003, RGDC 2004, 410); DENMARK: Danske Lov 1683 art. 3-19-2; GERMANY: CC § 278 sent. 1; GREECE: CC arts. 330 and 334; ITALY: CC art. 1228; the NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:76; PORTUGAL: CC art. 800(1); ESTONIA GPCCA § 132 (LOA § 1054 for delictual claims); SLOVAKIA Ccom §§ 331 and 580(2). FRENCH law reaches the same result for exclusion clauses (Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], no. 986). In POLISH law the debtor is liable, as for the debtor's own act or omission, for acts and omissions by the persons with the assistance of whom the debtor performs the obligation, as well as the persons entrusted with the performance of the obligation (CC art. 474). Thus, under CC art. 474 the third persons' behaviour (acts and omissions) is imputed to the party, regardless of the party's own fault. (See also CC: arts. 429 and 430 on the delictual position). In other words a non-performing party is responsible for the culpable behaviour of the persons whom such party has charged with performing (or assisting in performing) the party's obligations – as for the party's own acts or omissions.

5. In SPANISH law, there is no corresponding general rule for contractual liability, but legal writers and case law acknowledge contractual liability for acts of persons for whom the non-performing party is responsible (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[4], paras. 724-726; Fraga, La responsabilidad contractual, 561 ff; TS 22 June 1989 (RAJ 1989/4776); TS 1 March 1990 (RAJ 1990/1656)), although intention probably cannot be imputed. In ENGLISH law, the question does not arise because the fact that a breach is deliberate usually does not affect a party's liability in contract.

6. The CZECH Ccom art. 331 provides that the debtor who performs an obligation through another person is liable as if the debtor had performed personally. The CC has no similar provision but the civil law doctrine has adopted the same position, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ, 989. Analogical standards apply in case of liability for damages – according to CC § 420(2), the damage is deemed to have been caused by a certain person if it has been caused within the scope of that person's activity by those who were used for performance of the activity. The Commercial Code further specifies that if a breach of an obligation is caused by a third party, whom the debtor entrusted with the performance, the liability of the debtor is excluded only if it is excluded under the law and the third party would also not be liable if directly obliged to the creditor (Ccom art. 375). In SLOVENIAN law, the general principle of liability of the debtor for persons entrusted with performance of an obligation is based on the rules of liability within the contract for work (LOA § 630), transport (LOA § 694) and mandate (LOA § 770(4)). In addition, LOA § 174 establishes a general rule on the (delictual) liability of employers for damage caused by employees within the scope of their duties.

7. Some of the modern civil codes also deal with good and bad faith. ITALY and PORTUGAL start out from the general principle set out above. However, a principal who is in bad faith cannot invoke the representative's ignorance or good faith (Italian CC art. 1391(2) and Portuguese CC art. 259(2)). Under the SLOVAKIAN CC § 32(3) if the principal acts in good faith this is taken into consideration also with regard to the representative. A principal who is not in good faith cannot rely on the representative's good faith. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 315a person who charges another person to perform obligations or exercise rights is liable for the conduct of that person.

8. In BULGARIAN law there is no special rule. Such a rule can, however, be derived from the rules on representation. For support for having such an express rule, see Takoff, Dobrovolno predstavitelstvo, 456 ff.

9. See generally Treitel, Remedies for Breach of Contract, § 1 and literature cited there.

II.–1:106: Form

(1) A contract or other juridical act need not be concluded, made or evidenced in writing nor is it subject to any other requirement as to form.

(2)Where a contract or other juridical act is invalid only by reason of non-compliance with a particular requirement as to form, one party (the first party) is liable for any loss suffered by the other (the second party) by acting in the mistaken, but reasonable, belief that it was valid if the first party:

(a) knew it was invalid;

(b) knew or could reasonably be expected to know that the second party was acting to that party's potential prejudice in the mistaken belief that it was valid; and

(c) contrary to good faith and fair dealing, allowed the second party to continue so acting.

COMMENTS

A. General rule: no formal requirements

Paragraph (1) lays down the general principle that there is no formal requirement for a contract or other juridical act. This may be displaced by a particular provision on a particular topic but, in general, there is no need for writing, sealing, authentication by a notary, filing in a public registry or anything else. This principle is widely accepted among the legal systems at least as far as commercial contracts are concerned. For international contracts it is particularly important since many such contracts have to be concluded or modified without the delays which the observance of formalities will cause.

B. Exceptions

In some cases the model rules themselves require some formality (e.g. textual form, or textual form on a durable medium) for a particular juridical act and national laws often require writing or some other formality, particularly in relation to land. This does not need to be expressly recognised in this Article as it follows from the general principle that particular provisions prevail over more general ones (I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (5)). Any legislator using the model rules is, of course, free to prescribe writing or any other formality in relation to any type of contract or other juridical act. It is important, however, to establish the basic rule that there is no formal requirement unless otherwise provided.

One context in which a formal requirement may be called for is that of certain unilateral undertakings to make a donation. Many legal systems impose formal requirements in such cases, in order to provide evidence that the promise was actually made (the "evidentiary function") and was intended to be legally binding (the "channelling function") and at the same time to encourage the promisor to stop and think before assuming an obligation which may turn out to be burdensome (the "cautionary function"). This issue is dealt with in Book IV, Part H on Donation.

Another context is which a formal requirement may sometimes be called for is that of consumer protection. See, for example, IV.G.–4:104 (Form) in relation to consumer contracts for the provision of personal security.

As will be seen from the comparative notes, the present Article represents the law of the majority of Member States in that there are no general requirements of writing or other form. However these model rules as a whole require formality in fewer specific cases than do many laws. Experience shows that formal requirements can hinder commerce and can enable parties to escape obligations for no good reasons. Most systems have developed mechanisms to limit unjustified evasions, but the better approach is to target formal requirements on cases in which they are really needed.

C. Liability for allowing other party to proceed in reliance on formally invalid contract or juridical act

Paragraph (2) can be regarded as a particular application of the principle of good faith and fair dealing. It would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing for one party, knowing that a contract was invalid because of lack of form, to stand by and knowingly allow the other party to suffer loss in the mistaken and reasonable belief that it was valid. The paragraph imposes a liability to compensate the other party for any loss suffered in these circumstances.

NOTES

I. Formal requirements

No formal requirement for contracts in general

1. In the majority of countries of the European Union, writing or other formalities are not required for the validity of contracts in general. This holds true of FRANCE, see Bénabent, Les obligations[7], no. 101; DENMARK, see Danske Lov § 5.1.1; SWEDEN, see Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 125; FINLAND, see Hoppu, Handels-och förmögenhetsrätten i huvuddrag, 36; GREECE, CC art. 158; GERMANY, CC § 125 (impliedly); BULGARIA (LOA art. 26(2), Ccom art. 293(1)); AUSTRIA, CC § 883; PORTUGAL, CC 219 ff; SLOVENIA, LOA § 51(1); ESTONIA, GPCCA § 77(1), LOA § 11(1); ITALY, CC art. 1325 no. 4 (see Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto I[2], 706 ff; Roppo, Il contratto, 218 ff); ENGLAND (see e.g. Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 4-001); and SCOTLAND, Requirements of Writing (Scotland) Act 1995; SLOVAK CC § 46 impliedly. The DUTCH CC art. 3:37 lays down that unless otherwise provided declarations, including communications, may be made in any form. The same rule applies in SPAIN, see CC art. 1278, Ccom art. 51 and art. 11 of the Retail Trade Act (l996). In POLAND, the principle that a contract need not be concluded or evidenced in writing nor is it subject to any other requirement as to form is implied from the freedom of contract principle (see e.g. the Supreme Court's decision of April 28, 1995, III CZP 166/94). There are, however, statutory requirements as to the form of certain contracts. These forms are the following: writing, writing with official certification of date, writing with notarial certification of signatures, notarial deed. The requirement of form can play different legal functions, e.g. for the validity of an act, for proof of an act, or to cause specific effects of an act. Further limitations may be created by the parties themselves (CC art. 76). The GREEK CC provides that contracts and other juridical acts have to be made in a certain form when the law so provides (CC art. 158) or the parties have agreed on it (art. 159 (1)) and this holds true of the other laws which do not require form. See for example arts. 1350–1351 of the ITALIAN CC or the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 77(1) for transactions generally and LOA § 11(1) for contracts specifically.

2. CZECH law similarly adopts the principle of informality of contracts, see § 46 CC and Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Hulmák), OZ[10], 263.

3. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 216a contract may be concluded either orally or in writing, unless otherwise provided by legal regulation. The intention to conclude a contract can also be expressed by conduct that implies such intention. Failure to make a statement, if it is not implicit conduct, is deemed to be acceptance only if a legal regulation has so prescribed or the parties have so agreed.

4. CISG art. 11 provides that a contract for the sale of goods need not be concluded in writing and is not subject to any other requirement as to form. It may be proved by any means, including witnesses. Under art. 29(1) a contract may be modified or terminated by the mere agreement of the parties. A State which is party to the Convention may , however, make a declaration to the effect that articles 11 and 29 do not apply where any party has the place of business in that State. None of the Members of the European Union has made such a declaration.

5. Art. 1.2 of the UNIDROIT Principles provides that nothing in the Principles requires a contract to be concluded in any form. It may be proved by any means, including witnesses.

II. Writing required

6. Unless the defendant is a merchant, the FRENCH courts will not admit proof of a contract above a certain value (1500€) unless it is in writing, see CC art. 1341. But the requirements of writing are not great. A commencement of proof by writing is sufficient, see CC art. 1347, and in special cases where it was not possible for a party to provide a written document, oral testimony is allowed, see art. 1348. Under art. L.110-3 of the Commercial Code, oral testimony of contracts made between merchants is allowed. BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG have similar rules (see on Belgium: Mougenot and Mougenot, La preuve[3]). BULGARIA has the same rule on forma ad probationem – CCP art. 164.

7. In ITALY proof by witnesses will not be allowed for contracts above a certain value unless they are in writing, see CC art. 2721(1), but there are a number of exceptions from this rule. Thus art. 2721(2) provides that the court can admit proof by witness even beyond that limit, taking into account the character of the parties, the nature of the contract and any other circumstances. Moreover, the ITALIAN CC art. 2724 provides that proof by witnesses is admissible in all cases where there is prima facie written evidence; when it has been morally or materially impossible for the contracting party to secure any written evidence; when the contracting party has lost, without fault, the document providing the evidence.

8. The SPANISH CC art. 1280 lists several contracts for the validity of which written notarial form would be required. However, ever since the enactment of the Code the courts have unanimously held that this requirement does not affect the validity of the contract. Though lacking this form, contracts create effects as between the parties and normally also in relation to third parties.

9. In CZECH law a requirement of writing may result from a stipulation of law or from an agreement of the parties. The written form requirement is construed fairly strictly by the courts – the entire will of the parties must intelligibly follow from the writing; it does not suffice that the content of the contract is clear to the parties (Supreme Court 3 Cdo 227/96).

10. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 217a legal regulation may prescribe definite forms for contracts. A contract concluded in violation of formal requirements is void, unless otherwise provided by legal regulation. A form stipulated by the parties is a condition for the validity of a contract, if the parties have expressly so agreed. In such cases, the contract will become valid by acceptance of performance or partial performance.

III. Specific contracts

11. In all the countries, certain specific contracts need to be in writing or in a notarial document in order to be valid. For example there may be formal requirements for such contracts as consumer contracts, contracts for the establishment of companies, loans, guarantees, sales of motor vehicles, employment contracts and tenancies.

12. In SPANISH law, notarial deeds are needed for mortgages and contracts regulating the joint economy of married people. In addition, most consumer contracts (consumer credit contracts, time-sharing contracts, etc.) have by statute to be in writing, although there is no clarity about the consequences of lacking the required form. Such contracts are not, however, voidable on this ground against the consumer.

13. Formal requirements for special agreements are found in some *C*onventions. For arbitration clauses, the New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards of 1958, art. II requires writing. Art. 23 of the Brussels I-Regulation on Jurisdiction and Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters has formal requirements for a jurisdiction clause. See also arts. 12 and 96 of CISG.

14. In IRISH law informality is the rule but a considerable number of contracts must be evidenced in writing: contracts of guarantee, contracts for which the consideration is marriage, contracts for the sale of land or an interest in it, contracts that will not be performed within one year (see Statute of Frauds (Ireland) 1964, s. 2), contracts for the sale of goods in excess of a certain value (SGA 1893, s. 4) and hire purchase contracts (ConsCredA, 1995, s. 30).

15. In ITALY writing is required for the sale of land, see CC art. 1350, which includes a number of other contracts regarding land as, for example, settlement or lease of a certain duration. In GERMANY, CC § 311b(1) requires a notarial document, as do GREEK CC arts. 1033 and 369, PORTUGUESE CC art. 875 (with few exceptions), SPANISH CC art. 1280, ESTONIAN LPA § 119(1) and POLISH CC art. 158. In the U.K., contracts for the sale of land must be in writing and signed by both parties (not by deed - that is required for the conveyance), see, for SCOTLAND, the Requirements of Writing (Scotland) Act 1995 s. 1 and, for ENGLAND, the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (1925 ??), s. 2. (replacing the earlier requirement that the contract be evidenced in writing; for England the Statute of Frauds 1664 (1677 ??) still requires that guarantees be evidenced in writing. See Chitty on Contracts I[27], chap. 4. In SWEDEN writing and in FINLAND writing and the signature of an official sales witness are required, see SWEDISH Land Code chap. 4, § 1 and FINNISH Land Code chap. 2, § 1. DANISH law has no formal requirements. In FRANCE, some contracts must take the form of a deed to be valid: donation (art. 931), prenuptial agreement (art. 1394), mortgage (art. 2127), off-plan real estate sale (CCH art. 216-11). In SLOVAKIA under CC § 46a contract for the transfer of immovables, as well as certain other contracts for which the law or the agreement between the parties requires a written form, must be in writing. In SLOVENIA writing is required for the sale of immovables and the establishment of other property rights in immovables (LOA § 52) as well as for some other contracts, e.g. personal security (LOA § 1013), building contracts (LOA § 649) or a donation where the gift is not handed over at the time of conclusion (LOA § 538); some contracts require a notarial deed, e.g. transfer of property between spouses (Notary Act art. 47).

16. In CZECH law writing is required for contracts for the transfer of immovables (CC § 46(1)), pledge and mortgage contracts (CC § 156(1)), contracts for the assignment of a receivable (CC § 524(1)), donation contracts if the subject of the donation is not handed over at the time of conclusion of the contract (CC § 628(2)) and many more.

17. In several systems a contract for the sale of land will not transfer the property to the buyer; further formalities are necessary to achieve this. AUSTRIAN law provides an example: according to CC § 883 a contract for the sale of land can be concluded without any form. Property, however, is transferred by registration in the land register (CC § 431), a process that is done in writing. For the transfer of property it is therefore necessary to draft the agreement in writing and have it certified by an official authority such as a court or a notary (see § 31 Grundbuchsgesetz). In SLOVENIA a contract for the sale of immovables must be concluded in writing but a notarial verification of the seller's signature is required for the transfer of property by registration in the land register (Land Registry Act art. 33).

18. In BULGARIAN law, contracts for rights in immovables need to be in the form of a notarial deed, a huge number of contracts need a notarial verification of the signatures and a large number of contracts should be concluded in writing in order to be valid (forma ad substantiam) – for more then 100 examples see Takoff, Zakon za zaduljeniyata i dogovorite[6], 22. The authorisation of a representative for the conclusion of such a contract should be in the same form as is required for the contract (LOA art. 37).

19. Written form is a requirement for the validity of the contract in HUNGARIAN law in many cases. Under CC § 254(2) lien contracts must be concluded in writing. For the creation of liens on certain properties, additional formal requirements may be prescribed by law. Under CC § 365(3) contracts for the sale of immovables are valid only if concluded in writing. Under CC § 272(2) personal security contracts are valid only if made in writing. Under CC § 522(2) bank credit contracts are valid only if concluded in writing. Under CC § 579(2) contracts for the donation of real properties are valid only if concluded in writing.

II.–1:107: Mixed contracts

(1) For the purposes of this Article a mixed contract is a contract which contains:

(a) parts falling within two or more of the categories of contracts regulated specifically in these rules; or

(b) a part falling within one such category and another part falling within the category of contracts governed only by the rules applicable to contracts generally.

(2) Where a contract is a mixed contract then, unless this is contrary to the nature and purpose of the contract, the rules applicable to each relevant category apply, with any appropriate adaptations, to the corresponding part of the contract and the rights and obligations arising from it.

(3) Paragraph (2) does not apply where:

(a) a rule provides that a mixed contract is to be regarded as falling primarily within one category; or

(b) in a case not covered by the preceding sub-paragraph, one part of a mixed contract is in fact so predominant that it would be unreasonable not to regard the contract as falling primarily within one category.

(4) In cases covered by paragraph (3) the rules applicable to the category into which the contract primarily falls (the primary category) apply to the contract and the rights and obligations arising from it. However, rules applicable to any elements of the contract falling within another category apply with any appropriate adaptations so far as is necessary to regulate those elements and provided that they do not conflict with the rules applicable to the primary category.

(5) Nothing in this Article prevents the application of any mandatory rules.

COMMENTS

Book IV has a number of Parts on specific types of contracts – for the sale of goods, for the supply of services, for mandate, for franchises and similar long-term "framework" contracts, for the lease of goods, for the provision of personal security, for donation etc. The problem is that there may be mixed contracts – e.g. a contract to construct and sell, or a contract to sell and provide a training service, or a contract to lease and sell. There are many such contracts. Which special rules, if any, then apply and how?

It might be tempting to argue that cases of mixed contracts really involve two or more contracts. So the problem disappears. This might be a possible argument in systems with a different notion, or a vague and flexible notion, of what a contract is. However, it does not work under these rules where a contract is defined as a type of agreement – a juridical act. If there is one agreement – often constituted by an offer and an acceptance – there is one contract. It is quite normal under these rules for a contract to give rise to several sets of reciprocal obligations. So the problem of mixed contracts cannot always be avoided by saying there are really two or more contracts. Of course there may in fact be two or more contracts. If each is a pure contract then the case is no longer one in the realm of mixed contracts.

However, although this "two contract" solution does not work under the present rules it contains a pointer to the appropriate solution. It will often be a mere matter of chance whether there is one contract or two. This suggests that the practical results should preferably not differ depending on whether the parties conclude one contract or two. This is one reason for the solution adopted in the Article. Another reason is that all alternative solutions seem unacceptable. To apply only one set of special rules would leave the other part of the contract unregulated by the rules specially created for it. To apply only the general rules of Books I to III would be open to the same objection in relation to both parts of the contract. To create specially designed rules for every conceivable type of mixed contract would be impracticable.

So the Article opts for the solution which involves applying the relevant set of rules to the relevant part of the mixed contract. This basic policy is slightly modified to deal with some special situations.

Paragraph (1) defines what is meant by a mixed contract for the purposes of the Article. Paragraph (1)(b) is not meant to deal with a contract which is partly governed by special rules and partly by the general rules. A pure contract for the sale of goods would then be governed by the rules on mixed contracts. This is not what is intended and not what is said. The provision is, as its wording indicates, intended to deal with contracts which contain a part falling within one category and another part falling only within the general rules – e.g. a contract for (a) the sale of a horse and (b) the granting of permission to keep it on a certain plot of land.

> Illustration
> A contract provides for something to be donated and also for something not to be done. The part of the contract which deals with the donation falls under the special rules for contracts of donation in Book IV. The part which contains an obligation not to do something falls under only the general rules in Books I to III. This is a mixed contract for the purpose of the Article.

Paragraph (2) is meant to deal with cases where the two matters might just as well have been dealt with in separate contracts but the parties chose to deal with them in one contract. For example, where a contract obliges one party to sell a machine and then to provide a training course in how to use it, the sales rules would apply to the sale part of the contract and the services rules would apply to the training part of the contract. Similarly, if a contract obliges one party to buy goods from the other and then lease them back to the other, the sales rules would apply to the sale part of the contract and the leases rules to the lease part. Another important type of mixed contract which would often fall under the rule in paragraph (2) is a contract for sale and processing, or processing and sale. For example, a garage agrees to sell and fit a new tyre or an exhaust. Or an engineer agrees to repair a machine at so much per hour and sell the client at list prices any parts necessary for the job. An advantage of this approach is that it enables the same solution to be reached whether the parties conclude one contract or two. The words “unless this is contrary to the nature and purpose of the contract” are inserted to cover cases where although the contract contains elements of specific types of contracts it is clearly designed to be governed only by the general rules or only, perhaps, by a special set of standard terms. Paragraph (5) prevents this possibility from being used to avoid mandatory rules.

Paragraphs (3) and (4) are meant to deal with other contracts, such as contracts for construction and sale, where one part is purely incidental to the other. They cover two situations.

Paragraph (3)(a) covers the situation where a rule provides that a certain type of mixed contract is to be regarded as primarily a contract falling within one category. For example, there is a rule in the Sales provisions to the effect that a contract for the manufacture of goods and the transfer of the ownership of them to the ordering party, in exchange for a price, is to be considered as primarily a contract for sale. The reasoning is that the construction is for the purposes of the sale. It is a means to an end. The ordering party is primarily interested in getting an end product which conforms to the contract.

However, special rules of this type cannot be devised for every possible situation which might arise and would not be appropriate in many cases. So paragraph (3)(b) covers the situation where one part of a mixed contract is in fact so dominant that the contract can only reasonably be regarded as falling primarily within one category. For example, in a contract for hotel accommodation, a part of the price is for the right to use movables, such as bed, chair, TV, towels etc. Yet most people would regard it as artificial to say that the contract was a mixed contract, one part of which was a contract for the lease of movables. The lease of movables is purely incidental. Similarly, the short-term storage of goods is often an incidental element of a contract which is primarily of another nature. And the repairing obligations of a lessor under a contract for the lease of movables will usually be best regarded as merely an incidental aspect of a contract for lease.

For a contract under paragraph (3), which either in law or in fact is primarily of a certain type and only incidentally of another type, paragraph (4) provides that the dominant rules prevail. The rules applicable to the incidental part apply only so far as necessary and only so far as they do not conflict with the dominant rules. In a contract for the construction and sale of a boat, for example, the sales rules on conformity and the passing of risk will apply at the end of the construction process to the exclusion of the construction rules. The construction rules might still fall to be applied to questions arising during the construction process – for example, if the client wanted to change the specification or if the constructor became aware of something of which the client ought to be warned. Similarly in a contract with a hotel, the general rules on services would apply. In theory the rules on leases of movables could apply incidentally and so far as necessary but in practice it is hard to imagine a case where it would be necessary to apply them to the normal movables (bed, chair, table etc) which the guest has the right to use. However, the rules on mixed contracts (probably paragraph (2)) would naturally apply if a guest made a special arrangement, but under the one contract, for the hire of a special piece of equipment during his or her stay at the hotel.

One of the dangers of allowing one set of rules to prevail in a mixed contract is that mandatory rules designed to protect certain people, such as consumers, might be denied effect. Paragraph (5) therefore expressly preserves the effect of mandatory rules.

NOTES

1. There are few legislative provisions on this topic. One is the ESTONIAN Ccom art. 1(2) which provides that "If a contract has the characteristics of two or more types of contract provided by law, the provisions of law concerning such types of contract apply simultaneously, except provisions which cannot apply simultaneously or the application of which would be contrary to the nature or purpose of the contract." Another provision is the DUTCH CC art. 6:214 which applies only to contracts which fall under the rules applicable to two or more specific types of contract: 'Where a contract meets the description of two or more particular kinds of contracts provided for by law, the rules applicable to each of them apply to the contract concurrently, except to the extent that these provisions are not easily compatible or that their necessary implication, in relation to the nature of the contract, results in incompatibility.' However, the topic has been the subject of considerable discussion in doctrine in several countries. In the past there has been a tendency to apply a preponderance test but different solutions are used, including a distributive application of the relevant rules to the relevant parts of the contract. See e.g. for FRANCE, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 76 and for GERMANY, BGH 15 June 1951, BGHZ 2, 331, 333, CA Cologne 20 June 1979, NJW 1980, 1395; Palandt (-Grüneberg), BGB[67] Pref. to § 311 no. 26. See also, for mixed contracts involving sale, the Notes to IV.A.–1:101 (Contracts covered) and, for mixed contracts involving lease, the Notes to IV.B.–1:101 (Lease of goods).

2. Other systems tend to treat contracts that might fall within this article as separate types of contract. For example, ENGLISH law would treat a building contract or a contract to repair a car using new parts as a "contract for work and materials", not as a mixed contract for services and the supply of goods. Those contracts thus do not fall within the Sale of Goods Act (SGA) 1979 but within Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982. But the net effect is similar, as ss. 3-4 of the 1982 Act imply terms about the quality of the description and goods that are almost identical to those that apply to sale of goods, while the work element is governed by the same provision (s. 13) as applies to pure services contracts. But it seems likely that an English court faced with a new form of "hybrid" contract would approach it in the way proposed by this article.

3. The SLOVAKIAN CC § 491(3) states that the obligations arising from mixed contracts should be appropriately governed by the statutory provisions governing obligations of that type, unless the contract stipulates otherwise.

II.–1:108: Partial invalidity or ineffectiveness

Where only part of a contract or other juridical act is invalid or ineffective, the remaining part continues in effect if it can reasonably be maintained without the invalid or ineffective part.

COMMENTS

There are various situations in which a contract or other juridical act may be partly invalid or ineffective. A term may infringe the rules on unfair contract terms and may be ineffective as a result. A term may be contrary to some fundamental principle and therefore void or it may infringe a mandatory rule which says that it is to be void or invalid or ineffective. Part of a contract may be invalid because of failure to comply with a formal requirement for validity. A contract may, for example, be partly for donation and partly for sale or the provision of a service. The rules on contracts for donation may require some legal formality. They will apply to the donation part but not to the other parts. See the preceding Article.

Consistently with the general intention of preserving contractual relationships so far as possible, this Article provides the possibility that if a contract is invalid or ineffective only in part the remainder of the contract continues to be valid and effective unless this would be unreasonable in all the circumstances. Circumstances which might be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of upholding the remaining part include whether or not the contract has any independent life without the invalidated part; whether the parties would have agreed to a contract consisting only of the remaining parts of the contract; and the effect of partial invalidity upon the balance of the respective obligations of the parties.

NOTES

1. Severability of a contract only partly invalid is widely recognised in the European legal systems, albeit in varying forms (see e.g. GERMAN CC § 139; SWISS LOA art. 20; GREEK CC art. 181; ITALIAN CC art. 1419; SLOVENIAN LOA § 88; the NETHERLANDS CC art. 3.41) and the POLISH CC (art. 58 § 3). It is widely thought in GERMANY that CC § 134 is a lex specialis to CC § 139 (MünchKomm (-Mayer-Maly), BGB, § 134 no. 109). The general rule under CC § 134, is that the contract is void in its totality unless the purpose of the prohibitory rule can be met by partial nullity. The practical effect of that rule is normally however the same as it would be under § 139. BELGIAN case law and legal writers apply similar rules (starting from CC art. 900): only a part of the contract or even only a single clause will be declared void if partial nullity is consistent with the purpose of the prohibitory rule and if the remaining part of the contract can continue in effect (depending on the common intention of the parties and its objective purpose): Cass. 18 March 1988, Pas. belge 1988, 868, RW 1988-89, 711, note Dirix; Cornelis, Algemene theorie van de verbintenis, no. 568; Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 182. The rule in the Article is consistent with the general principles of DANISH contract law: see Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 128. In SPAIN, while there is no explicit provision in the CC, there is special provision in the rules on standard terms (art. 10 General Terms of Contracts Act) and in consumer protection legislation (art. 10 bis ConsProtA). There are no special rules about partial invalidity for illegality in the PORTUGUESE CC:

the general rules are applicable. For severability of illegal clauses in ENGLAND, see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 16-188 ff; for SCOTLAND, Stair, The Laws of Scotland XV, para. 764. In contrast, where a contract term is of no effect under the UK Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, the contract is simply treated as if it had not contained the relevant term.

2. Under AUSTRIAN law the extent of a "partial nullity" (Teilnichtigkeit) follows primarily from the protective purpose of the rule providing for the invalidity (see e.g. Supreme Court OGH. SZ 63/23). The question whether it may be reasonable for a party to uphold the contract is not so important. In the majority of cases where a statute has been violated (especially in respect of consumer contracts concluded on the basis of standard terms which are unfair and therefore unlawful under the ConsProtA § 6), the contract will be upheld in those parts which are not affected by the violation of the law: the validity is reserved but the content reduced.

3. Under ITALIAN law, and according to a general principle of favouring contracts, the nullity of single terms does not imply the nullity of the contract, when, by operation of law, mandatory rules are substituted for the void terms, but if it appears that the contracting parties would not have concluded the contract without that part of its content which is affected by nullity, partial nullity of the contract implies the nullity of the entire contract (CC art. 1419(1)). The BULGARIAN LOA art. 26(4) has almost the same wording of the respective rule.

4. Under SLOVAK law the effect of a partial nullity is regulated by a general provision for all grounds of nullity and invalidity of any contract or juridical act. According to CC § 41 if the reason for invalidity is related only to a part of the juridical act, only this part is invalid unless it follows from the nature of the act or from its content or from the circumstances under which the act was done that this part cannot be separated from the other content.

5. Under ESTONIAN law, the general rule is that the nullity of a part of a transaction does not render the other parts void if the transaction is divisible and it may be presumed that the transaction would have been entered into without the void part (GPCCA § 85). Special rules for partial avoidance (GPCCA § 90(3)) and for the contracts with a void standard term (LOA § 41) generally follow the idea of this general rule.

6. The HUNGARIAN CC § 239 states that in the event of partial invalidity of a contract, the entire contract fails only if the parties would not have concluded it without the invalid part. Legal regulation may provide otherwise. In the case of partial invalidity of a consumer contract, the entire contract fails only if the contract cannot be fulfilled without the invalid part.

II.–1:109: Standard terms

A "standard term" is a term which has been formulated in advance for several transactions involving different parties and which has not been individually negotiated by the parties.

COMMENTS

Several later rules make reference to standard terms. The use of such terms is very common. The key element of them is that they are formulated in advance for several transactions involving different parties and that they have not been individually negotiated by the parties (on which see the following Article).

NOTES

1. The definition of "standard term" is similar to the definition of "general conditions of contract" in art. 2:209 of the Principles of European Contract Law. The only significant difference is that those Principles refer to terms formulated in advance "for an indefinite number of contracts.". That seems too strict, however. Terms formulated in advance for, say, a hundred contracts should equally be considered standard terms. See further the Notes to the following Article.

II.–1:110: Terms "not individually negotiated"

(1) A term supplied by one party is not individually negotiated if the other party has not been able to influence its content, in particular because it has been drafted in advance, whether or not as part of standard terms.

(2) If one party supplies a selection of terms to the other party, a term will not be regarded as individually negotiated merely because the other party chooses that term from that selection.

(3) If it is disputed whether a term supplied by one party as part of standard terms has since been individually negotiated, that party bears the burden of proving that it has been.

(4) In a contract between a business and a consumer, the business bears the burden of proving that a term supplied by the business has been individually negotiated.

(5) In contracts between a business and a consumer, terms drafted by a third person are considered to have been supplied by the business, unless the consumer introduced them to the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General principle and scope

Some of the model rules refer to terms which are not individually negotiated. See e.g. II.–9:402 (Duty of transparency in terms not individually negotiated) and II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer). The present Article provides a definition of a term that is "not individually negotiated" and sets up complementary burden of proof rules. This definition, which is reproduced in the Annex, is also relevant to the term "individually negotiated". See I.–1:108 (Definitions in Annex) paragraph (2). The positive form is used in e.g. paragraphs (3) and (4) of this Article, II.–4-104 (Merger clause) and II.–8:104 (Preference for negotiated terms). The definition takes it for granted that the question whether or not a term has been individually negotiated falls to be answered by reference to the contract or transaction in question. It will be not be enough to make a term "not individually negotiated" if, for example, a consumer party to the transaction had been able to influence its content some years ago in his or her capacity as a former employee in the legal department of the business now supplying the term.

B. Real and meaningful possibility to influence the content of the term

Paragraph (1) defines under which conditions a term is considered to be "not individually negotiated". This provision is not limited to terms of a contract. Thus, terms in other instruments (e.g. powers of attorney, receipts) are covered as well.

Illustration 1
Supplier X requires potential customers to submit an "application form" which technically constitutes an offer. According to a term in this form, the customer is bound by the offer for three months. The term falls under this Article although technically, a term of an offer is not a contract term.

Illustration 2
A supplier uses a standard receipt form. Although, in most cases, a receipt does not constitute a contract, the text of the receipt may be subject to judicial control, e.g. concerning its transparency.

The definition is a negative one: a term supplied by one party has not been individually negotiated if the other party "has not been able to influence its content". A party to a contract is able to exercise influence on a term if negotiations take place between the parties which offer a real opportunity to change the term. Thus, the crucial criterion is whether such real and meaningful negotiations took place. This requires an assessment of the substantial qualities of the negotiations which can be formalised only in part. In general, such negotiation not only requires a simple conversation about the term but must offer a real chance to influence it. Thus, it is usually an indication of the existence of real and meaningful negotiations if a term has in fact been substantially changed in the course of the negotiations.

> Illustration 3
> Supplier X offers to explain a certain term to the other party. This is not sufficient for a negotiation. If however, after having read the supplier's terms, the other party makes a counter-proposal for a certain term and the parties engage in a discussion about a compromise acceptable to both parties, the term is negotiated.

In order to be considered an "individually" negotiated term, the negotiation must have taken place between the individual parties. However, a single negotiation between the same parties will be sufficient to cover several uses of the same term if the relevant legal circumstances are similar.

> Illustration 4
> A contract is negotiated between consumer association X and business association Y. If a business Z uses this term, the term is not considered to be individually negotiated, merely because it was the subject of negotiations between X and Y. However, the courts may consider the collective bargaining when assessing the unfairness of the term pursuant to II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer).

> Illustration 5
> Business X sells goods to business Y on the basis of a continuing business relationship. They always use the same standard contract. It will generally be sufficient if a term has been negotiated once.

Paragraph (1) gives some further guidance in this direction by indicating that a party is usually unable to influence the content of a term if the other party has drafted the term in advance, whether as part of standard terms or not. A term is drafted in advance if its content is fixed by the user prior to the negotiations. The moment "prior to the negotiations" refers to the negotiations concerning the issue governed by the term; it does not necessarily refer to the whole negotiation process. This idea is complemented by paragraph (3) which contains a burden of proof rule according to which a party supplying a standard term bears the burden of proving that it has been individually negotiated. In addition, a standard term stating that the other party confirms that individual negotiations took place is not sufficient to qualify the content of a contract term as having been negotiated.

C. Selection of terms

Paragraph (2) further concretises the requirements for real and meaningful negotiations. According to this provision, a term will not be considered to be individually negotiated merely because it has been chosen from a "menu of terms" supplied by the other party. In such a case, the party supplying the terms usually does not give the other party a real opportunity to change the terms. The freedom to influence the content of the contract is limited to selecting one of several terms supplied by the other party.

Illustration 6
Insurance company X offers 5-year and 10-year contracts. The term is drafted in advance because the possible choices are defined by the supplier of the "menu of terms". The situation is different if the insurance company leaves it to the customer to decide on the duration of the contract. For example, if the consumer may fill in a gap in a form and thereby choose the duration of the contract according to his or her preferences and the insurance company is willing to accept any duration, the duration is individually negotiated.

D. Burden of proof

Paragraphs (1) and (2) are complemented by paragraphs (3) and (4) which deal with the burden of proving that a term has been individually negotiated. Paragraph (3) contains a general rule applicable regardless of the status of the parties, whereas paragraph (4) only applies to contracts between a business and a consumer. According to paragraph (3), if it is disputed whether a term supplied by one party as part of standard terms has since been individually negotiated, that party bears the burden of proving that this term has been individually negotiated. "Standard terms" (as defined in the preceding Article) are terms which have been formulated in advance for several transactions involving different parties, and which have not been individually negotiated by the parties. Thus the rule in paragraph (3) has to be read in the sense that if a term has been initially supplied as part of standard terms, but has since been the subject of individual negotiations, the party who supplied it must prove that it has since been individually negotiated. If this party fails to prove the individual negotiations, the term is considered to be a standard term.

For relations between businesses and consumers paragraph (4) sets up an even stricter burden of proof rule. Here the business bears the burden of proving that a term supplied by the business has been individually negotiated.

Both paragraphs (3) and (4) only address the matter of the burden of proof, i.e. determining which party has to present evidence and to bear the consequences of a remaining lack of factual certainty about individual negotiations. The standard of proof (e.g. preponderance of the evidence or judicial certainty) must be determined pursuant to the applicable procedural law.

E. Terms drafted by a third person

Terms not individually negotiated can normally be attributed to one of the parties to a contract. However, it is possible that a third person (such as a notary) has drafted one or more of the terms. This situation is dealt with by paragraph (5). In order to prevent a circumvention of the Article this provision states that in contracts between a business and a consumer, terms drafted by a third person are considered to have been supplied by the business, unless the consumer introduced them to the contract. This provision is based on Article 3(2) of the Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC which generally refers to a "term which has been drafted in advance and the consumer has therefore not been able to influence the substance of the term". Thus, under the Directive it does not matter whether the business introduced the term into the contract itself. Rather, in order to protect consumers, terms introduced by third parties are subject to control under the Directive.

NOTES

1. The ESTONIAN LOA § 35(1) refers to a contract term which is drafted in advance for use in standard contracts or which the parties have not negotiated individually for some other reason. This definition covers standard terms in the strict sense and also terms which are not individually negotiated for other reasons (see also Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 30.04.2007, civil matter no. 3-2-1-150-06 p. 17). Although there is no specific rule corresponding to paragraph (2) of this Article, the question is treated similarly within the framework of LOA § 35(1) cited above (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 35, no. 4.1.4.). The party supplying a term in circumstances where the other party has not been able to influence its content, in particular because it has been drafted in advance (i.e. otherwise qualified as a standard term in the meaning of LOA § 35(1)) generally bears the burden of proving that a term has been individually negotiated (LOA § 35(2), Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 30. 04.2007, civil matter no. 3-2-1-150-06 p. 17, Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 35, no. 4.2.). The stricter burden of proof rule stated in paragraph (4) of this Article is thus applied regardless of the status of the parties. The principle stated in paragraph (5) may be inferred from LOA § 35(1) (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 35, no. 4.1.3.).
2. There is a very similar provision in § 53(2) and (3) of the SLOVAK CC. Paragraph (2) states that : "terms of which the consumer was aware before the conclusion of the contract, but the content of which the consumer did not have any right to influence are not considered to be individually negotiated terms." Paragraph (3) states that: "If the supplier does not prove the contrary, terms agreed on between the supplier and the consumer are not considered to be individually negotiated." In other words, the supplier bears the burden of proving that the terms were individually negotiated. However it does not matter whether the terms were part of standard terms or not. Moreover, art. 53(4)(a) stipulates that one of the situations in which a term will be presumed to be unfair is when the consumer is obliged to fulfil a commitment which he or she did not have an opportunity to become aware of before the conclusion of the contract.
3. The HUNGARIAN CC § 205/A has similar provisions to those in the present Article.

CHAPTER 2: NON-DISCRIMINATION

II.–2:101: Right not to be discriminated against

A person has a right not to be discriminated against on the grounds of sex or ethnic or racial origin in relation to a contract or other juridical act the object of which is to provide access to, or supply, goods, other assets or services which are available to the public.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article and the following express a general prohibition of any discrimination on the grounds of sex, ethnicity or racial origin. Their content has mainly been harvested in EC Law. As these model rules are drafted with a view to being used in the field of contract law (excluding labour law) and patrimonial law, the non-discrimination rules set out here contain just a part of the much broader general law on non-discrimination. The two main limitations of these provisions are, first, the rather short list of prohibited discrimination criteria (just 'sex' or 'ethnic or racial origin'), which reflect the current status of EC law in the field of general contract law (see below under C) and, secondly, the limitation to certain contracts on goods, other assets and services 'available to the public' (see below under D). This is by no means meant as a political statement in the sense that non-discrimination law should not be broadened according to the example of some national laws. By contrast, the rules are drafted in such a way that it should be fairly easy to add further discrimination criteria and situations if a legislator so wants.

B. Context

This Article is not a complete rule. It is only a part of the rule and needs to be read with other provisions in this Chapter. II.–2:102 (Meaning of discrimination) contains a definition of discrimination while II.–2:103 (Exception) provides a possible justification where unequal treatment is the result of a legitimate aim. II.–2:104 (Remedies) makes clear that an infringement of the right not to be discriminated against granted under this Article triggers, without prejudice to any other remedies available, the remedies for non-performance of an obligation under Book III, Chapter 3. As the heading of the Article indicates, the right stated here forms not only a part of contract law, but also fulfils functions traditionally associated with the law on non-contractual liability for damage. The general provisions on non-discrimination law are nevertheless located in Book II (Contracts and other juridical acts), because the stage of the preparation of contracts is one of their main fields of application. III.–1:105 (Non-discrimination) clarifies that these rules apply not only in relation to contracts and other juridical acts as such but also to obligations generally, including contractual, 'post-contractual' and non-contractual obligations, with appropriate modifications.

C. Discrimination on grounds other than 'sex' or 'ethnic or racial origin'

The discrimination criteria 'sex' or 'ethnic or racial origin' are lifted from the two Directives which are applicable to the field of general contract law (and not just to labour contracts), i.e. the Antiracism Directive 2000/43/EC and the General Sex Discrimination Directive 2004/113/EC. Other grounds for discrimination which are also applicable in general contract law could be religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation (cf. art. 13 EC-Treaty); colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status (cf. art. 14 European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms) or genetic features, language, religion or belief, political or any other opinion, membership of a national minority, property, birth, disability, age or sexual orientation (cf. art. 21 EU Charter of Fundamental Rights). All these provisions are not directly applicable in general contract law. Hence, the particular remedies spelled out here in Chapter 2 of Book II are not applicable to cases where discrimination occurs on the basis of these further criteria. This does not, of course, mean that such discrimination is allowed. Discrimination on grounds other than 'sex' or 'ethnic or racial origin' are to be taken into account when applying these model rules, in particular the rules on good faith and fair dealing. This follows from I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (2) according to which these rules are to be read in the light of any applicable instruments guaranteeing human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Another ground for discrimination, which may widely overlap with 'race or ethnic origin', is nationality (cf. art. 12 of the EC-Treaty). But several Directives on non-discrimination exclude nationality from their scope of application (e.g. art. 3(2) of the Antiracism Directive 2000/43/EC). The reason may be that the prohibition of discrimination on the ground of nationality in art. 12 EC-Treaty can be seen as being directly applicable (cf. ECJ, 6 June 2000, C-281/98 – Angonese). Hence, Art. 12 EC-Treaty is a general principle of Community law and can therefore be invoked against any private person. But the EC-Treaty does not provide any sanctions for a violation of its art. 12. Therefore it seemed more appropriate not to include discrimination on the ground of nationality into the system of remedies set out in these rules. In the (almost unimaginable) case of discrimination on the ground of nationality, which at the same time is not discrimination on the grounds of race or ethnic origin, the general rules, in particular I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (2), apply.

In the ECJ judgment of 22 November 2005, it is pointed out that "The principle of non-discrimination on grounds of age must thus be regarded as a general principle of Community law" (C-144/04 – Mangold). However, this statement can be read in connection with the preceding passage which primarily refers to the Directive on General Framework for Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation. Even if the ECJ favours a broader understanding, expanding the prohibition of age related discrimination to all areas of private law, this would not solve the question of what the consequences of a violation of the prohibition should be. Hence, as in the case of art. 12 of the EC-Treaty, these model rules do not provide a system of remedies for age discrimination.

> Illustration 1
> A group of citizens from one of the Member States books rooms in a hotel in a different Member State. The hotel refuses to perform its obligations under the contract, arguing that the citizens of this State are not welcome in the hotel. This type of discrimination is covered by art. 12 of the EC-Treaty. From the perspective of this draft it also fulfils the conditions of discrimination based on ethnic origin. The notion of ethnic origin is sufficiently broad to also cover common citizenship.

It should be stated that in European law any kind of discrimination – for the reasons mentioned in arts. 12 and 13 of the EC-Treaty – is wrongful behaviour. It does not mean however that every instance of such behaviour will automatically amount to a violation of the law. The sanctioning of all possible kinds of discrimination in many different contexts would lead to conflict with other, often highly protected, values such as personal freedom, freedom of thought and freedom of contract. The current EC law shows an attempt by the law-maker to find a balance among all of these important values. The rules on non-discrimination are drafted with the idea of allowing easy modification and extension of the scope of its application in other areas of discrimination. The decision of whether such extension should happen is purely political.

D. Sex

Discrimination based on sex means that a person is treated by the other party differently from another person for the reason of being a man or a woman. The terminology suggested here is partially modelled on art. 2 General Sex Discrimination Directive 2004/113/EC, which uses the term "sex" to describe the prohibited discrimination criteria. It might also have been possible to use the term "gender", which refers to a social, cultural, or psychological condition, as opposed to that of biological sex. The terminology used by EC documents is not always consistent with regard to this distinction. Yet, as art. 2 of the General Sex Discrimination Directive 2004/113/EC and art. 2(1) (a) Directive on Principle of Equal Opportunities and Equal Treatment of Men and Women use the term "sex" in the definition of "direct discrimination", these model rules follow this terminology.

E. Ethnic or racial origin

Discrimination based on ethnic origin means that a person is treated in a different way because that person, supposedly or actually, belongs to a group with a common tradition, culture or language. Discrimination based on race means that that person is treated differently because he or she, supposedly or actually, belongs to a specific race. The term "race" has to be understood in a subjective way, leaving it open to the discriminating persons to determine what they understand as being of a different "race". Specifically, the use of the term "race" does not mean that these model rules accept any of the theories classifying people by race. However, one should acknowledge that the notion "race" cannot be purely understood in its subjective sense, i.e. from the perspective of the wrongdoer. A purely subjective criterion could lead to forbidden discrimination in any case where unequal treatment occurs due to the appearance of the person. Rather, discrimination based on race should be understood as relating to certain traits that, within a concrete cultural and social environment, are understood as a distinguishing criterion from the group of people to which a discriminator is believed to belong. It is necessary to evaluate each case with consideration to the local cultural and historical context and background.

Illustration 2
Landlord A refuses to rent an apartment to B for the reason that B has naturally red hair. A declares openly that he does not trust red-haired people. This example shows the difficulties in applying a purely subjective criterion of "race". Generally it cannot be treated as discrimination based on racial reasons, unless there are some local contexts, which evidence that the local community treats "red-haired people" as strangers or some type of 'other'.

Illustration 3
A shopkeeper refuses to sell bread to a customer, arguing that the buyer is Jewish. It is a clear case of racial discrimination, and it also follows a shameful tradition of discriminatory treatment of Jewish people as a different race. In this situation, it does not matter whether the client in fact belongs to the Jewish community or not. Legally, it is solely a question of evaluating the reason for the shopkeeper's decision.

F. Access to goods, other assets and services available to the public

The right not to be discriminated against granted here is confined to contracts or other juridical acts which provide access to, or supply goods, other assets and services which are available, to the public. The notion of goods, other assets and services is meant to correspond to the notion of "goods and services" in the Antiracism Directive 2000/43/EC and the General Sex Discrimination Directive 2004/113/EC and should have a similar meaning to the meaning of that expression in these Directives. The words "other assets" are added here because in the DCFR the word "goods" is limited to corporeal movables, which would be a narrower meaning than in the Directives. In addition the expression "goods, other assets or services" should be interpreted in the light of art. 23(1) EC-Treaty and art. 50 EC-Treaty regarding the free movement of goods and services. The contracts must either be designed to transfer certain assets from the seller to the buyer, or to allow the customer to receive or make use of a service of the provider. The assets and services are available to the public if they are typically offered in a general manner, irrespective of the person to whom the product is offered. This is precisely the case where goods or services are marketed to the public at large, for example, via an advertisement in the media or where goods and services are publicly offered by the owner of a shop or restaurant, regardless of whether this qualifies as an "offer" in the technical sense. Another example is the transport business, where the person of the contractual partner typically has no or little relevance.

Illustration 4
A one year contract to teach a foreign language has been concluded by the respective parties. A male student verbally violates the dignity of his female teacher because of her sex. This kind of contract is not covered by this Article because it is the supplier of the service and not the recipient who is discriminated against. Aside from this, the definition of harassment in II.–2:102 (Meaning of discrimination) paragraph (2) is fulfilled. Although this has the consequence that the remedies of this Chapter are not applicable, there may be other remedies. For example, the teacher may terminate the contractual relationship according to the rules on non-performance and might have a claim for damages under Book VI (Non-contractual Liability for Damage caused to Another).

NOTES

I. Grounds of discrimination

1. Rules on non-discrimination can be found in many sources of Community law. For instance, the general rule on non-discrimination in Art. 12 of the Treaty establishing the European Communities (EC-Treaty) prohibits discrimination on the basis of nationality, while art. 141 of the EC-Treaty ensures the principle of equal pay for male and female workers. Article 13 of the EC-Treaty mentions discrimination on the basis of sex, racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation. But this provision is not directly applicable; it merely authorises the Council to prevent and stop such discrimination. However, it has to be borne in mind that according to art. 6(2) of the Treaty on the European Union, the Union shall respect fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Article 14 of the Convention sets out that the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms under the Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status. Building on these provisions, art. 21 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights prohibits discrimination based on any ground "such as sex, race, colour, ethnic or social origin, genetic features, language, religion or belief, political or any other opinion, membership of a national minority, property, birth, disability, age or sexual orientation". Article 23 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights guarantees the equal treatment of men and women in all spheres, including employment, occupation, and education.

2. Regarding secondary legislation, there are numerous directives dealing with the question of non-discrimination. These are, in particular:

   Council Directive 2000/43 of 29 June 2000 implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin – further referred to herein as the Antiracism Directive;

   Council Directive 2000/78 of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation – also referred to as the Directive on a General Framework for Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation;

   Directive 2002/73 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 23 September 2002 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions – further referred to herein as the Directive on Equal Treatment for Men and Women as Regards Access to Employment (with effect from 15 August 2009 the Directive 2002/73/EC will be repealed and replaced by the Directive 2006/54/EC);

   Council Directive 2004/113 of 13 December 2004 implementing the principle of equal treatment between men and women in the access to and supply of goods and services – further referred to herein as the General Sex Discrimination Directive;

   Directive 2006/54 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 5 July 2006 on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation – also referred to as the Directive on the Principle of Equal Opportunities and Equal Treatment of Women and Men.

3. The EC directives identify different reasons on the basis of which one may not discriminate. These proscribed reasons need to be enumerated. Another ground defined by primary Community law is nationality (art. 12 of the EC-Treaty), which is, however, not included in the directives on non-discrimination (art. 3(2) Antiracism Directive; art. 3(2) Directive 2000/78/EC). This is due to the fact that the prohibition of discrimination on the ground of nationality in art. 12 of the EC-Treaty is directly applicable. That is the view held by the majority of the commentators, although there are some diverging opinions. The majority opinion can be supported by the ECJ's decision of 6 June 2000 in C-281/98 – Angonese. Hence art. 12 of the EC-Treaty is a general principle of Community law and can therefore be invoked against any private person. It should however be noticed that there is no sufficient Acquis governing the consequences of a violation of the requirement of non-discrimination under art. 12 of the EC-Treaty. The EC-Treaty does not provide any sanctions for a violation of its Art. 12; however it could be considered to expand the scope of application of the non-discrimination rules of this instrument to include discrimination based on nationality.

4. In its judgment of 22 November 2005, the ECJ points out that "the principle of non-discrimination on grounds of age must thus be regarded as a general principle of Community law" (C-144/04 – Mangold). However, this statement should be read in connection with the preceding passage which primarily refers to the Directive on a General Framework for Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation. Even if the ECJ favours the broader understanding, expanding the prohibition of age related discrimination to all areas of private law, this would not solve the question of what the consequences of a violation of the prohibition should be. Hence, as in the case of art. 12 of the EC-Treaty, no further rules of the Acquis can be identified.

5. The Antiracism Directive (art. 1) and the General Sex Discrimination Directive (art. 2) refer only to sex, ethnic or racial origin as prohibited grounds of discrimination. In contrast, the Directive 2000/78/EC (art. 1) prohibits discrimination on the grounds of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation. However, this directive applies only with regard to employment and occupation. Although art. 13 of the EC-Treaty gives the Community the competence to extend this prohibition to other contracts as well, the legislator has not made use of this power. In early 2008 a European Commission proposal for a single EU anti-discrimination directive has been issued which provides for protection from discrimination on grounds of age, disability, sexual orientation and religion or belief in areas other than employment – including, inter alia, access to and supply of goods and services which are commercially available to the public.

6. Some Member States have extended the list of unlawful discrimination criteria by applying the grounds of discrimination contained in the Directive 2000/78/EC, i.e. religion or belief, disability, age and sexual orientation, to all contractual obligations. For example, the GERMAN General Equal Treatment Act mentions in § 19(1) religion, age, disabilities and sexual orientation alongside race and sex and extends these criteria explicitly to general contract law. The same applies to BULGARIAN, HUNGARIAN, LITHUANINAN, SLOVAKIAN and SLOVENIAN law. DENMARK extends the prohibition of discrimination only to religion or belief and sexual orientation. The NETHERLANDS General Equal Treatment Act art. 1(1)(b) provides that "distinction" on grounds of, inter alia, religion, belief, hetero- and homosexual orientation shall be unlawful. In SWEDEN, discrimination is prohibited on the grounds of ethnic origin, religion or belief and sexual orientation and disability (Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act art. 1).

7. Discrimination criteria that are not derived from the Employment Equality Directive can be found in the anti-discrimination laws of BULGARIA (Law on Protection against Discrimination art. 4(1): education, opinions, political affiliation, marital status, property status); FINLAND (Non-Discrimination Act art. 6(1): language, opinion, health, other personal characteristics); HUNGARY (Equal Treatment Act art. 8: health, family status, financial status, work, membership in an organisation representing employees' interests); NETHERLANDS (General Equal Treatment Act art. 1(1)(b): political opinion); SLOVAKIA (Anti-Discrimination Act s. 2(1): language, family status, property); SLOVENIA (Act implementing the Principle of Equal Treatment art. 1(1): health state, language, education, financial state, social status). All these criteria are applicable within general contract law (access to and supply of goods and services).

8. BULGARIAN law extends the grounds of discrimination to "any other ground, established by the law, or by international treaties to which the Republic of Bulgaria is a party" (Law on Protection against Discrimination art. 4(1)).

II. Race and ethnic origin

9. The Antiracism Directive prohibits discrimination based on the grounds of "racial or ethnic origin" (art. 1(1)), but neither of these terms is defined or explained. Recital 6 of the Directive however declares that the "European Union rejects theories which attempt to determine the existence of separate human races. The use of the term 'racial origin' in this Directive does not imply the acceptance of such theories." Another ambiguity within the Directive is the extent to which criteria such as colour, national origin or national minority, language or social origin fall within the scope of "racial or ethnic origin". A further unclear issue concerns the relationship of ethnic origin and religion. Although religion is expressly included in the Employment Equality Directive (and not in the Antiracism Directive) the concepts of ethnicity and religion are closely linked. Thus, the European Court of Human Rights recently took the view that "ethnicity has its origin in the idea of societal groups marked by common nationality, tribal affiliation, religious faith, shared language, or cultural and traditional origins and backgrounds" (Timishev v Russia, 13 December 2005).

10. The discrimination criterion "ethnic or racial origin" set out by the Directive has been incorporated by all Member States. However, a number of Member States have adopted legislation concerning discrimination on grounds of race and ethnic origin only in the area of employment and have fallen short of enacting discrimination legislation outside employment. Notably, this includes the CZECH REPUBLIC, ESTONIA (draft Equal Treatment Act, 2008, still in legislative process), LATVIA, and POLAND (draft anti-discrimination act, last legal proceeding 16 July 2008).

11. Some Member States have felt uncomfortable in including "race" or "racial origin" in their anti-discrimination legislation because that may reinforce the perception that humans can be distinguished according to "race". Therefore, not all national provisions refer literally to "ethnic or racial origin". For example, the AUSTRIAN Equal Treatment Act does not mention "race" but only "ethnic origin" (art. 31(1)), the FINNISH Non-Discrimination Act refers to "ethnic or national origin" (art. 6(1)), whilst the SWEDISH Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act refers to "ethnic belonging" (arts. 1 and 4).

12. Nearly all Member States that have implemented the Antiracism Directive have refrained from providing a definition of the concept of racial and ethnic origin. Similarly, most national preparatory works and explanatory memoranda lack any specific definition of the anti-discrimination grounds. IRELAND and the UNITED KINGDOM have defined "race" by listing a number of more specific grounds, see Ireland Equal Status Act art. 3(2)(h): "the ground of race: being of different race, colour, nationality, or ethnic or national origins"; United Kingdom Race Relations Act 1976 art. 3(1): "racial grounds means any of the following grounds, namely colour, race, nationality, origin or national or ethnic decent." SWEDEN Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act art. 4 defines ethnic origin (or: belonging) as "the condition of belonging to a group of persons of the same national or ethnic origin, race or skin colour."

13. Many national laws include, as a minimum, colour and national origin within legislation implementing the Antiracism Directive. E.g., BELGIUM Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Racial Discrimination art. 4(4), BULGARIA Protection against Discrimination Act art. 4(1), PORTUGAL Law 18/2004 art. 3(2) and SLOVAKIA Anti-Discrimination Act art. 2(1) list colour and nationality as additional grounds of discrimination alongside race and ethnic origin. DUTCH, ROMANIAN and SLOVENIAN anti-discrimination legislation declare discrimination on grounds of nationality unlawful. HUNGARY Equal Treatment Act art. 8(e) also includes "origin of national or ethnic minority" as a specific ground of discrimination. POLAND and SLOVENIA have special laws on the protection of national and/or ethnic minorities, but it remains unclear whether these laws will be relied upon when national courts interpret anti-discrimination legislation.

14. National case-law has tried to balance the relationship of religion and ethnic origin that has been left open by the Directive. In the NETHERLANDS, discrimination against Jews and, in certain circumstances, Muslims has been accepted as discrimination on racial grounds. In the UNITED KINGDOM, case law has established that Jews, Gypsies and Sikhs are ethnic groups but that Muslims and Rastafarians are not (Seide v. Gillette Industries Ltd. [1980] IRLR 427; Mandla v. Dowell Lee [1983] 2 AC 548).

III. Sex

15. Discrimination based on "sex" is part of EC anti-discrimination law. It is banned by the General Sex Discrimination Directive which was the very first EC instrument to implement the principle of gender equality outside the workplace. The term "sex" is also used by art. 2(1) Burden of Proof Directive 1997/80 and art. (2)(1)(a) Recast Directive 2006/54. Before the adoption of the Directives, art. 141 EC-Treaty (the principle of equal pay between men and women for equal work or work of equal value) has been the legal base used for gender equality measures in EC law. The concept of sex discrimination is not legally defined by EC primary legislation or by the Directives adopted under Art. 13 EC-Treaty, but has been developed by several rulings of the ECJ. In the Dekker case (9 November 1990 – C-177/88 Decker v. Stichting VJV [1990] ECR I-3941) the ECJ held that the definition of sex also covers pregnancy. This view has been adopted by the EC legislator in Recital 20 of the General Sex Discrimination Directive which states that "less favourable treatment of women for reasons of pregnancy and maternity should be considered a form of direct discrimination based on sex." Additionally, the General Sex Discrimination Directive provides that "[t]his Directive shall be without prejudice to more favourable provisions concerning the protection of women as regards pregnancy and maternity" (art. 4(2)). The neglect to clearly define the concept of sex discrimination strengthens the idea that pregnancy and maternity rights are exceptions to, rather than conditions and part of, the achievement of gender equality. Other case law from the area of sex equality is concerned with discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment and discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. In P. v. S. the ECJ accepted that transsexualism is so closely related to sex that a distinction based on this ground can be regarded as a distinction that is directly based on grounds of sex (30 April 1996 – C-13/84 P. v. S. and Cornwall County Council [1996] E.C.R. I-2143). On the other hand, the ECJ refused to find that discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation is sex discrimination because in such a case it is not a person's own sex that is at issue but the sex of his or her partner (17 February 1998 – C-249/96 Grant v. South-West Trains [1998] ECR I-621).

16. The General Sex Discrimination Directive had to be implemented by the Member States by 21 December 2007. Most Member States have implemented the Directive and, thus, the sex criteria in their national legal systems. Some Member States have done so by amending their already existing gender equality law, e.g. IRELAND and the UNITED KINGDOM. A series of Member States has set up completely new legislation to introduce the discrimination criteria into their national legal systems. This approach was, for example, taken by ITALY, PORTUGAL and SPAIN. So far, only AUSTRIA has not undertaken any activity concerned with the implementation of the Directive. The POLISH draft anti-discrimination act covers sex discrimination in the area of general private law. The same applies to the CZECH anti-discrimination bill which, however, was vetoed by the president of the Czech Republic on 16 May 2008. The discrimination criterion "sex" is thus not part of all Member States' legislation.

17. In the majority of Member States there is no definition of the notion of sex discrimination. Only a small number of national anti-discrimination laws provide that distinction on grounds of pregnancy, childbirth and/or maternity are deemed (direct) discrimination based on sex (BELGIUM Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Gender Discrimination art. 4(1); ESTONIA Gender Equality Act art. 3(3); FINLAND Gender Equal Treatment Act art. 7(2); LUXEMBOURG Law of 21 December 2007 art. 1; NETHERLANDS General Equal Treatment Act art. 1(2); SPAIN law 3/2007 art. 8). HUNGARY Equal Treatment Act art. 8(l) mentions motherhood (pregnancy) and fatherhood and thus goes beyond the General Sex Discrimination Directive that, in Recital 20, only refers to maternity. The UNITED KINGDOM Sex Discrimination Act 1975 s. 3B(1)(b) is more specific on the period of maternity ("period of 26 weeks beginning on the day on which she gives birth").

18. Only under BELGIAN (Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Gender Discrimination art. 4(2)) and BRITISH (Sex Discrimination Act 1975 s. 2A(1)) law is gender reassignment expressly considered as a ground of sex discrimination.

19. Member States differ on whether protection from discrimination should encompass not only transsexuals (undergoing, intending to undergo, or having undergone a medical operation resulting in gender reassignment), but also other categories, such as "transvestism". For example, the DUTCH Equal Treatment Commission regards discrimination on the ground of "transvestism" as a form of sex discrimination (ETC 15 November 2007, Opinion 2007-201). In other Member States, discrimination on grounds of transgenderism is treated neither as sex discrimination nor as sexual orientation discrimination, resulting in a lower level of protection. This includes the CZECH REPUBLIC, ESTONIA, GREECE, CYPRUS, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, PORTUGAL and ROMANIA. GERMANY considers discrimination on grounds of transgenderism as sexual orientation discrimination (Explanatory Memorandum to the General Equal Treatment Act, Bundestag, publication no. 16/1780, p. 31) and applies this ground of discrimination also to goods and services, which results in a higher level of protection.

IV. Scope of application

(a) Personal scope

20. Recital 16 of the Antiracism Directive states that it is important to protect all natural persons against discrimination and that Member States should also provide, where appropriate and in accordance with their national traditions and practice, protection for legal persons where they suffer discrimination on grounds of the racial or ethnic origin of their members. The General Sex Discrimination Directive does not contain a similar recital or provision, but its recital 21 states that "associations, organisations and other legal entities should also be empowered to engage in proceedings […] either on behalf or in support of any victim."

21. Several Member States expressly provide that both natural and legal persons are protected against discrimination. Under BULGARIAN law, legal persons are protected when they have been discriminated against with regard to their members or the persons employed by them (Law on Protection against Discrimination art. 3(2)).

The HUNGARIAN Equal Treatment Act art. 8 mentions groups alongside persons. The IRISH Equal Status Act defines the term person as including "an organisation, public body or other entity" (s. 2(1)). SLOVAKIAN equal treatment law defines discrimination against a legal entity as the failure to observe the principle of equal treatment with respect to its, inter alia, members, shareholders or employees (Anti-Discrimination Act art. 2a(9)). In BELGIUM, FINLAND, GERMANY, GREECE and LATVIA, where the law does not expressly distinguish between natural and legal persons, it is assumed that both are protected. Legal persons remain categorically unprotected in LITHUANIAN and SWEDISH law, while ESTONIAN local legal tradition implies that only natural persons can be victims of discrimination.

(b) Material scope

22. The Antiracism Directive and the General Sex Discrimination Directive extend the material scope of protection against discrimination to access to and the supply of goods and services that are available to the public. The term "goods and services" has been adopted by all Member States that have implemented the Directives, e.g. AUSTRIA Equal Treatment Act § 31(1) no. 4; BULGARIA Law on Protection against Discrimination art. 37; FRANCE Law 2008-496 art. 2(1) and (4); GERMANY General Equal Treatment Act § 2(1) no. 8; UNITED KINGDOM Race Relations Act 1976 s. 20. Some Member States have fallen short of enacting discrimination legislation outside employment. Notably, this includes the CZECH REPUBLIC, ESTONIA, LATVIA and POLAND (see above).

23. Most Member States restrict the protection against unlawful discrimination to publicly available goods. A smaller number of Member States go beyond the requirements of the Directives in not distinguishing between goods and services that are available to the public and those that are only privately available: BULGARIA Law on Protection against Discrimination art. 37; FRANCE Law 2008-496 art. 2(1); ITALY Law 215/2003 art. 3(1)(i); SLOVENIA Act Implementing the Principle of Equal Treatment art. 1(1); SPAIN Law 62/2003 art. 29(1). It is thus presumed that the discrimination criteria apply to both publicly and privately available goods and services. PORTUGUESE Law 18/2004 and Law 14/2008 are applicable to all goods and services (art. 3(2)(a) and art. 2(1)), but, according to Decree-law 594/74 (as amended by Decree-law 71/77), private associations have the right to restrict goods and services to their members. The DUTCH General Equal Treatment Act requires the notion of availability to the public only for goods and services which are offered by private persons not engaged in carrying on a business or exercising a profession (art. 7(1)(d)). The SWEDISH Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act prohibits discrimination in connection with the "professional provision" of goods and services (art. 9(1)) and does not distinguish between goods and services available to the public and those which are privately available.

24. Another approach is taken by the HUNGARIAN Equal Treatment Act which does not enumerate the fields falling under its scope, but instead lists the public and private entities which must respect the requirement of equal treatment in all their actions. These are mostly public bodies and include state, local and minority self-governments, public authorities (art. 4). Four groups of private actors are listed (art. 5): (i) those who offer a public contract or make a public offer; (ii) those who provide public services or sell goods at their premises open to customers; (iii) entrepreneurs, companies and other private legal entities using state support; and (iv) employers and contractors.

25. For discrimination based on the grounds of sex the GERMAN General Equal Treatment Act is according to § 19(1) no. 1 only applicable for "Massengeschäfte" which are legally defined as contractual obligations which are "typically concluded in many cases under comparable conditions irrespective of the person concerned or in which the special characteristics of a person are of inferior importance with regard to the nature of the contractual obligation".

26. The FINNISH Non-Discrimination Act covers the "supply of or access to housing and movable and immovable property and services on offer or available to the general public other than in respect of relationships between private individuals" (art. 2(2)(4)). This goes beyond the Directives since their provisions do not cover immovable property.

27. Under SLOVAKIAN law the principle of equal treatment applies only in combination with separate laws regulating the access to and provision of goods and services, in particular the ConsProtA (Anti-Discrimination Act art. 5(2)(d)). Art. 6 of this Act provides that any seller may not discriminate against any consumer in any way. There remains some ambiguity about the interaction of these two provisions.

V. Further national notes

28. The principles of equality and non-discrimination have general constitutional protection under the ESTONIAN Const. art. 12 (Everyone is equal before the law. No one shall be discriminated against on the basis of nationality, race, colour, sex, language, origin, religion, political or other opinion, property or social status, or on other grounds). GEA prohibits discrimination based on sex (§ 5(1)) and has a wide scope of application (§ 2(1)). The principle of equal treatment in labour relations (on grounds of sex, racial origin, age, ethnic origin, level of language proficiency, disability, sexual orientation, duty to serve in defence forces, marital or family status, family-related duties, social status, representation of the interests of employees or membership in workers' associations, political opinions or membership in a political party or religious or other beliefs) is addressed by the Employment Contracts Act § 10.

29. The SLOVAK law was fully harmonized with the Antiracism Directive 2000/43/EC, General Sex Discrimination Directive 2004/113/EC, Directive 2000/78/EC which established a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation and Directive 76/207/EEC on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion and working conditions. Therefore there are no major discrepancies concerning the legal regulation of discrimination under Slovak law. Slovak regulation on discrimination is mainly included in the Act No. 365/2004 Z.z. on equal treatment in some areas and on protection from discrimination as amended by Act No. 85/2008 Z.z. effective from April 1st, 2008. There is also a general framework regulation in the Constitution of the Slovak Republic. Furthermore the prohibition of discrimination is also mentioned in Act No. 311/2001 Z.z. Labour Code (Article 5 Section 2 Letter (f) and Article 13 thereof) and in Act. No. 250/2007 Z.z. on the protection of the consumer (Article 4 Section 5 thereof). There is a much broader scope of grounds of discrimination stipulated in Article 2(1) of the Slovak Act No. 365/2004 Z.z. on equal treatment in some areas and on protection from discrimination. The areas in which the protection from discrimination applies are specified are art. 3(1) and in art. 5, which states the rules on the supply of goods and services available to the public.

30. SPANISH law does not contain specific non-discrimination rules applicable to civil contracts. Nevertheless, art. 14 of the Spanish Constitution sets forth a general right to equality before the law which forbids any discrimination, based on birth, race, sex, religion, opinion or any other personal or social circumstances. Naturally, the observance of this non-discrimination principle is strong in public law, but in private law it necessarily has to be more flexible, due to the general principle of autonomy of the will that rules the civil law: as long as the discrimination does not go against the values held by the Constitution, it may be accepted (e.g. a person may choose to make a donation to any chosen person, thus discriminating against all other possible donees); cf. Bercovitz, Principio de igualdad y Derecho privado, pp. 369-428). Regarding the effectiveness of the constitutional rights in private law relations, the Supreme Court admits the right to equality between private persons only in the area of labour relations and partially in gender distinctions (cf. Carrasco, Derecho Civil, p. 43). However, there are some specific provisions that limit party autonomy in some areas of law. For example, arts. 1 and 2 of the Defence of Competition Act forbids an application of unequal conditions for equal provisions that may provoke unfair treatment of one competitor compared to the others; that situation may arise from the dominant position of one company in the market or may have its origin in an illegal agreement that has the ability to cause a distortion of the market. The Unfair Competition Act (art.16) prohibits discriminatory treatment of a consumer with regard to prices and other conditions of sale. The Workers' Statute (art. 28) prohibits discrimination in remuneration of a job of equal value, whether it is performed by a man or a woman (the result of the transposition of an EU Directive). Non-discrimination is also one of the general principles of the Spanish Equality between Men and Women Act (art. 3) which aims to combat gender violence and establish an equal legal position of both sexes. The Consumer Law contains no specific provision on non-discrimination, but it contemplates a series of consumers' rights in its art. 8; among others, protection of the consumer against abusive contract clauses and a right to correct information about the goods and services, as well as a right to be consulted and heard (through consumers' associations) when general provisions affecting consumers are elaborated.

31. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 76 any breach of the principle of equal treatment is regarded as a violation of basic human rights.

32. Non-discrimination is protected in BULGARIA by the Constitution (art. 19(2) – equal legal conditions for economic activity) and especially by the Law on Protection against Discrimination 2003.

II.–2:102: Meaning of discrimination

(1) "Discrimination" means any conduct whereby, or situation where, on grounds such as those mentioned in the preceding Article:

(a) one person is treated less favourably than another person is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation; or

(b) an apparently neutral provision, criterion or practice would place one group of persons at a particular disadvantage when compared to a different group of persons.

(2) Discrimination also includes harassment on grounds such as those mentioned in the preceding Article. "Harassment" means unwanted conduct (including conduct of a sexual nature) which violates a person's dignity, particularly when such conduct creates an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment, or which aims to do so.

(3) Any instruction to discriminate also amounts to discrimination.

COMMENTS

A. Generic definition

Since the prohibited grounds for discrimination – ethnic or racial origin and sex – are already included in II.–2.101 (Right not to be discriminated against), there is no need to repeat them in the definition of the notion of discrimination. Therefore this Article provides a generic definition which also operates for other grounds of discrimination. The definition thereby underlines the idea that in principle all unequal treatment in a comparable situation may amount to discrimination, although there is not a remedy for each sort of discrimination.

B. Direct and indirect discrimination

This Article is a synthesis of the definitions expressed by the non-discrimination Directives. It contains a definition of the term "discrimination" that covers both direct and indirect discrimination. In both cases the same remedies are available, and in both cases there is the possibility of justifying the unequal treatment (II.–2:103 (Exception)). Thus, these rules do not treat direct and indirect discrimination separately.

Generally, discrimination can be understood as meaning that a person is treated "less favourably than another person would be treated in a comparable situation". Although the definition states that the unequal treatment must happen "on grounds" such as those mentioned in II.–2.101 (Right not to be discriminated against), no causal link between that reason and the treatment is required. Such a link would be very difficult to prove for the person discriminated against. According to II.–2:105 (Burden of proof) the person who considers himself or herself discriminated against on such grounds must merely establish the facts from which it may be presumed that there has actually been discrimination. In that case, it falls on the other party to prove that there has been no such discrimination.

Direct discrimination (paragraph (1)(a)) refers to a person being treated less favourably than another person would be treated in a comparable situation. The less favourable treatment means all treatment that disadvantages, such as rejecting the conclusion of a contract, not providing sufficient information, terminating a contractual relationship, requiring additional security or guarantees or additional services. A comparable situation is taken to mean a real or a potential situation of normal treatment of a person in similar circumstances subject to market conditions.

Illustration 1
A bank does not provide loans to coloured people. This is unequal treatment because the bank differentiates on the ground of race; white people who fulfil the other loan requirements would get the loan.

Illustration 2
A woman needs the additional signature of her husband in order to finance a lease, while a man could conclude that type of contract without his wife's signature.

Illustration 3
A seller delivers goods to Roma people only against payment in advance, while other customers are able to get goods with a 14 day payment period after delivery.

The definition of indirect discrimination in paragraph (1)(b) tries to prevent the use of criteria that are not immanently linked to a specific group of people, but that could (proportionately) affect such a group more than another group of people.

Illustration 4
A bank grants loans only to full-time employees. Since most people who are employed in part-time jobs are women, such a policy of the bank is discriminatory.

C. Harassment

Paragraph (2) extends the notion of discrimination to two kinds of harassment: harassment in a broader sense and, in particular, sexual harassment. The harassment cases are not covered by the definition of discrimination under paragraph (1) because a harassed person is formally treated like others; yet such a person cannot enter into the transaction without being put into an intimidating or hostile or otherwise difficult or negative situation. The definition is modelled on the notion of harassment in Art. 2 (3) of the Directive on General Framework for Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation 2006/54/EC, Art. 2 (3) of the Antiracism Directive 2000/43/EC and Art. (2)(c) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive 2004/113/EC. The inclusion of harassment cases in these rules on contract law can be justified by a need for coherence of the whole text on non-discrimination. In this case the proximity to the law on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another is evident.

Illustration 5
Racist music is played in a bar or restaurant. Such conduct violates human dignity and creates a humiliating and offensive environment.

Illustration 6
During a bus journey, a pornographic movie is being shown without the prior consent of the passengers. This constitutes sexual harassment because it may cause a degrading or humiliating situation for the passengers.

D. Instruction to discriminate

The term "discrimination" also includes an instruction to discriminate. The relation between the person acting in a discriminating way and the person discriminated against is of no relevance. Therefore, the prohibition of an instruction to discriminate could belong to the law on non-contractual liability. However, due to the close relationship to the whole system of non-discrimination, it has been included here. An "instruction to discriminate" means all orders to discriminate in the sense of paragraph (1) of this Article. An instruction to harass is also discrimination according to these rules.

Illustration 7
The manager of a barbershop orders employees to stop providing services to coloured people.

NOTES

I. Direct discrimination

1. The notion of direct discrimination as opposed to indirect discrimination was first established by the ECJ in C-43/75 Defrenne v SABENA (II) [1976] ECR 455. The court held that "a distinction must be drawn … between, first, direct and overt discrimination … and, secondly, indirect and disguised discrimination…" However, no further guidance on how to define direct (or indirect) discrimination was given. The distinction between direct and indirect discrimination was soon recognised by EC legislation (Art. 2(1) Gender Employment Directive 1976/207). The first express definition of direct discrimination was provided by Art. 2(2)(a) Antiracism Directive. Similar definitions are part of other Directives on equal treatment, e.g. Art. 2(2)(a) Directive 2000/78/EC; Art. 2(a) General Sex Discrimination Directive. The present definition contains three components. First, a comparable situation must be established. Secondly, a comparator must be found. The ECJ had already established the possibility of comparators from the present and from the past (27 March 1980 – 129/79 Macarthys Ltd.v Smith [1980] ECR 1275), the Directives additionally allow the use of hypothetical comparators. Thirdly, a less favourable treatment of the discriminated person has to be established.
2. Nearly all Member States have introduced a definition of direct discrimination that generally reflects the definition adopted by the Directives. Most national definitions contain the need to demonstrate less favourable treatment, the requirement for a comparison with another person in a similar situation and the possibility to use a comparator from the past or a hypothetical comparator. E.g. AUSTRIA Equal Treatment Act § 32(1); BULGARIA Law on Protection against Discrimination art. 4(2); CYPRUS Equal Treatment Law art. 2; ESTONIA Gender Equality Act art. 3(1)(3); FINLAND Non-Discrimination Act art. 6(2)(1); FRANCE Law 2008-496 art. 1(1); GERMANY General Equal Treatment Act § 3(1)(1); IRELAND Equal Status Act s. 3(1)(a); ITALY Law 215/2003 art. 2(1)(a); Law 196/2006 art. 55-bis(1); LUXEMBOURG Law of 28 November 2006 art. 1(2)(a); Law of 21 December 2007 art. 2(2)(a); MALTA Equal Treatment of Persons Order art. 2(2)(a); PORTUGAL Law 18/2004 art. 3(3)(a); Law 14/2008 art. 3(a); SLOVAKIA Anti-Discrimination Act art. 2a(2), SLOVENIA Act Implementing the Principle of Equal Treatment art. 4(2); SWEDEN Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act art. 3(1).
3. Several definitions do not explicitly include the comparator from the past, e.g. HUNGARY Equal Treatment Act art. 8; SPAIN Law 3/2007 art. 6(1); Law 62/2003 art. 28(1)(b); UNITED KINGDOM Race Relations Act 1976 s. 1(1)(a) and Race Relations (Northern Ireland) Order 1997 s. 3(1)(a). The express reference to hypothetical comparators has not been incorporated into the national legislations of SPAIN (Law 62/2003 art. 28(1)(b)) and HUNGARY (Equal Treatment Act art. 8).

4. The national provisions implementing the definition of direct discrimination state – consistently with the Directives – that there is no justification in case of direct discrimination. However, BELGIAN law explicitly provides a justification with regard to direct discrimination. According to the Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Racial Discrimination art. 4(7), direct discrimination can only be established if the conduct in question lacks an objective and reasonable justification. Similar Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Gender Discrimination art. 5(6).

5. There are Member States where the meaning of direct discrimination has not been codified in legislation. FRANCE and the NETHERLANDS, although having adopted legislation that forbids direct discrimination in the area of supply of and access to goods and services, have stopped short of providing a definition of direct discrimination; see for France, Law 2008-496 art. 2(1) and for the Netherlands, General Equal Treatment Act art. 1(1)(a).

6. The NETHERLANDS legislator did not literally implement the term (direct or indirect) "discrimination", but rather refers to "onderscheid", which can be translated as "distinction". In the process of legislative drafting, it was argued that the term "discriminatie" would give the wrong impression that the discriminator must have the intention to discriminate. Since the Dutch term is wider that the one adopted by the Directives, it does comply with them. DANISH anti-discrimination legislation uses (direct and indirect) "unequal treatment" instead of "discrimination".

II. Indirect discrimination

7. The concept of indirect discrimination is part of EC primary and secondary legislation. It was developed with regard to the application of the fundamental freedoms, especially the free movement of goods. The ECJ applied this concept to natural persons in a case concerned with discrimination on grounds of nationality under (today) Art. 39 EC (12 February 1974, 152/73, Sotgiu v. Deutsche Post). The first legislative definition of indirect discrimination was set out in Art. 2(2) Burden of Proof Directive 1997/80: "For the purposes of the principle of equal treatment indirect discrimination exists where an apparently neutral provision, criterion or practice disadvantages a substantially higher proportion of the members of on sex unless that provision, criterion or practice is appropriate and necessary and can be justified by objective factors unrelated to sex." All Directives on equal treatment contain similar definitions of indirect discrimination. E.g., Art. 2(b) General Sex Discrimination Directive defines indirect discrimination as follows: "where an apparently neutral provision, criterion or practice would put persons of one sex at a particular disadvantage as compared with persons of the other sex, unless that provision, criterion or practice is objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary."

8. Most Member States that have already implemented the definition of indirect discrimination have done so by repeating the relevant definitions word for word: BELGIUM Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Gender Discrimination art. 5(7); BULGARIA Law on Protection against Discrimination art. 4(3); CYPRUS Equal Treatment Law art. 2; DENMARK Ethnic Equality Act art. 3(3); ESTONIA Gender Equality Act s. 3(1)(4); FINLAND Non-Discrimination Act art. 6(2)(2); GERMANY General Equal Treatment Act § 3(2); IRELAND Equal Status Act s. 3(1)(c); ITALY Law 215/2003 art. 2(1)(b); Law 198/2006 art. 55-bis(2); LUXEMBOURG Law of 28 November 2006 art. 1(2)(b), Law of 21 December 2007 art. 2(2)(b); MALTA Equal Treatment of Persons Order art. 2(2)(b); PORTUGAL Law 18/2004 art. 3(3)(b); Law 14/2008 art. 3(b); SLOVAKIA Anti-Discrimination Act art. 2a(3); SLOVENIA Act Implementing the Principle of Equal Treatment art. 4(3); SPAIN Law 3/2007 art. 6(2); Law 62/2003 art. 28(1)(c); SWEDEN Discrimination (Goods and Services Act) art. 3(2).

9. Some Member States have slightly deviated from the definition set out in the equal treatment directives. The AUSTRIAN Equal Treatment Act § 32(2) does not require the comparison to a different group of persons to establish indirect discrimination. The definition requires only evidence that the measure in question disadvantaged the individual complainant. Similarly, SWEDISH law makes no explicit reference to the comparison with other persons (Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act art. 3(2)). The SPANISH transposition of the Antiracism Directive refers only to a "legal or administrative provision, a clause of a convention or contract, an individual agreement or a unilateral decision", i.e. only to "provisions" in the sense of the Directive, while the Directives' terms "criterion or practice" are not included (Law 62/2003 art. 28(1)(c)). The UNITED KINGDOM Race Relations Act 1976 s. 1(1A) requires that the complainant personally as well as the group to which the complainant belongs are put at a particular disadvantage. The definition is narrower than the one set out in the Directives.

10. FRANCE has not implemented the definition of indirect discrimination but simply declares indirect discrimination unlawful. The NETHERLANDS provide a different definition of indirect discrimination (General Equal Treatment Act art. 1(c): "distinction on the ground of other criteria than [inter alia, religion, belief, race] which results in direct discrimination"). Under HUNGARIAN law the definition of indirect discrimination is modelled closely on the definition of direct discrimination (Equal Treatment Act art. 9: "Those dispositions are considered indirect negative discrimination, which are not considered direct negative discrimination and apparently comply with the principle of equal treatment but put any persons […] at a considerably larger disadvantage than other persons […] in a similar situation were or would be").

III. Harassment

11. All non-discrimination directives include the notion of harassment (Art. 2(3) Directive 2000/78/EC; Art. 2(3) Antiracism Directive; Art. (2)(c) General Sex Discrimination Directive). They define harassment as a situation where unwanted conduct relates to a ground of discrimination and occurs with the purpose or effect of violating the dignity of a person and of creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment. There are however differences as to the obligation of the Member States to implement the concept of harassment. Whereas the Directive on a General Framework for Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation and the Antiracism Directive have left it to the discretion of the Member States to define the notion of harassment in accordance with their national laws and practice, the later Directives do not contain a similar restriction. They apply to every kind of unwanted conduct and therefore define the notion of "harassment" in an absolute manner.

12. The majority of Member States have adopted definitions of harassment that contain the elements adopted by the Directives. Several national provisions slightly deviate from the wording set out in the Directives: FRANCE Law 2008-496 art. 1(3)(1) does not require the creation of an "intimidating" environment; LITHUANIA Law on Equal Treatment art. 2(5) and ROMANIA Law 137/2000 art. 2(5) omit the notion of the "humiliating" environment; SPAIN Law 62/2003 art. 28(d) and Law 3/2007 art. 7(2) do not include the words "hostile" and "degrading". PORTUGAL Law 18/2004 art. 1(4) uses "disturbing" (desestabilizador) instead of "offensive".

13. Some Member States provide definitions of harassment that are somewhat broader than the one found in the Directives. Some national provisions do not require the unwanted conduct to both violate a person's dignity and create an intimidating etc. environment. The BULGARIAN Law on Protection against Discrimination [Additional Provisions] art. 1 (1) and the UNITED KINGDOM'S Race Relations Act 1976 s. 4A(1) and Sex Discrimination Act 1975 s. 4A use the term "or" instead of the Directives' "and", thus providing a more favourable definition for the harassed person. The SWEDISH Discrimination (Goods and Services Act) art. 3(3) does not require that the behaviour also creates an intimidating etc. environment, but only that it violates the dignity of a person. The Swedish definition also omits the qualification of "unwanted", a criterion which is understood to be an integral part of the term "harassment" in Swedish (trakasserier).

14. On the other hand, ITALY has adopted a wording slightly unfavourable to the harassed person by providing that the unwanted conduct must have the effect of "creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating and offensive environment" (Law 215/2003 art. 2(3)). However, the definition of harassment was correctly transposed with relation to gender equality by Law 198/2006 art. 55-bis(4). The FINNISH Non-Discrimination Act art. 6(2)(3) provides a definition that adversely deviates from the Directives by stating that the infringement of the dignity of a person has to be caused by the creation of an intimidating etc. environment.

15. Some Member States have introduced specific rules on how to determine whether the conduct in question is such as to violate a person's dignity or create an intimidating etc. environment. E.g. SLOVAKIAN law stresses the perception of the harassed person by making reference to treatment "which that person can justifiably perceive" as harassment (Anti-Discrimination Act art. 2a(4)). MALTESE law further defines the harassing conduct as "to subject the person to any unwelcome act, request or conduct, including spoken words, gestures or the production, display or circulation of written words, pictures or other material" (Equal Treatment of Persons Order art. 2(1)).

IV. Instructions to discriminate

16. The early Directives on equal treatment did not contain a provision dealing with instructions to discriminate. This concept as a specific form of discrimination was introduced by Art. 2(4) of the Antiracism Directive and Art. 2(4) of Directive 2000/78/EC. Art 4(4) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive extends the definition of discrimination to instructions to directly or indirectly discriminate. All the Directives mentioned above provide that instructions to discriminate are deemed to be discrimination. However, they do not provide a definition of what constitutes an instruction to discriminate.

17. The Member States' provisions on instructions to discriminate are very similar to those set out in the Directives. Most Member States have opted to replicate the wording of the Directives and merely provide that instructions to discriminate "constitute" discrimination (AUSTRIA Equal Treatment Act § 32(3); LITHUANIA Law on Equal Treatment art. 2(8)), are "considered" as discrimination (GERMANY General Equal Treatment Act § 3(5); ITALY Law 215/2003 art. 2(4) and Law 198/2006 art. 55-bis(6); LUXEMBOURG Law of 28 November 2006 art. 1(4) and Law of 21 December 2007 art. 2(4); PORTUGAL Law 18/2004 art. 3(5); ROMANIA Law 137/2000 art. 2(2); SPAIN Law 62/2003 art. 28(2) and Law 3/2007 art. 6(3)), are "deemed" to be a form of discrimination (GREECE Law 3304/2005 art. 2; MALTA Equal Treatment of Persons Order art. 2(2)(d); SLOVENIA Act Implementing the Principle of Equal Treatment art. 4(4)), simply "mean" discrimination (FINLAND Non-Discrimination Act art. 6(2)(4); HUNGARY Equal Treatment Act art. 7(1)), or are "included" in the definition of discrimination (FRANCE Law 2008-496 art. 1(3)(2)).

18. A small number of Member States have provided some guidance on the notion of instructions to discriminate. The BULGARIAN Law on Protection against Discrimination [Additional Provisions] s. 1(5) defines "instigations" to discrimination as "direct and purposeful encouragement, instruction, exertion of pressure or prevailing upon someone to discriminate when the instigator is in a position to influence the instigated". The SLOVAKIAN Anti-Discrimination Act art. 2a(7) provides that "incitement to discrimination shall mean persuading, affirming or inciting a person to discriminate against a third person". In two Member States the orders or instructions have to be given to someone who is under the command of, or in a position of dependency on, the instructor: SWEDEN Discrimination (Goods and Services Act) art. 3(5) ("who is […] in a subordinate or dependent position relative to the person who gives the orders or instructions"); UNITED KINGDOM Race Relations Act s. 30 ("person who has authority over another person"). According to the UNITED KINGDOM's Sex Discrimination Act s. 40 the induced person has to be offered a benefit or threatened with a detriment.

II.–2:103: Exception

Unequal treatment which is justified by a legitimate aim does not amount to discrimination if the means used to achieve that aim are appropriate and necessary.

COMMENTS

A. General

This provision brings some necessary flexibility into the process of evaluating unequal treatment. It allows the justification of such treatment by legitimate aims. In this way, rational use of the freedom of contract, as long as it does not violate human dignity, is still granted. The rule also allows for different factors to be taken into account. It prevents the mechanical qualification of all unequal treatment as discrimination. The provision also allows specific measures to prevent or compensate disadvantages (positive discrimination), although these may constitute discrimination themselves.

B. No distinction between direct and indirect discrimination

II.–2:102 (Meaning of discrimination) does not distinguish between direct and indirect discrimination. This provision generalises the ideas expressed in Art. 4(5) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive 2004/113/EC. By contrast, the Antiracism Directive 2000/43/EC formulates the prohibition of direct discrimination on the grounds of race and ethnic origin as an absolute principle without any exception, whereas indirect discrimination in this Directive by definition also presupposes that there is no justified reason for the different treatment. II.–2:102 does not follow the strict division between direct and indirect discrimination because it does not seem practical to maintain this distinction with regard to the requirements and effects of discrimination. Both the questions of whether there is discrimination, and of whether it could be justified, are a matter of evaluation, and their answers depend on its intensity as well as on a number of different facts. This approach also allows the law to justify and accept any 'positive discrimination' which is aimed at compensating or improving the position of disadvantaged people, often referred to as "reverse discrimination" or "affirmative action".

The intention of this Article is therefore not to expand the possibilities of justification of unequal treatment, in particular in relation to the Antiracism Directive 2000/43/EC. The provision just merges different definitions and thereby reaches a higher level of abstraction. The consequence of such a synthesis is a reduction of the casuistic approach, which leads to the necessity of a more flexible interpretation and application. As this Article is an exception to the general prohibition of discrimination it has to be interpreted strictly. In the case of ethnically and racially based unequal treatment, only very exceptional circumstances may lead to the justification of such practices.

C. Justification by a legitimate aim

Unequal treatment may be justified by legitimate aims if the means applied to reach these aims are appropriate and necessary. The aims are legitimate, if they constitute a protected value in a society, which should not be surrendered. It could reflect the need to protect privacy, decency, religion or cultural identity. In exceptional cases (e.g. insurance contracts) certain economic factors can also provide justification. It is not sufficient, however, that such societal values are in conflict with the requirement of equal treatment. Rather, it must be decided whether the protection is of such value that it does not violate the main goal of non– discrimination laws: the protection of human dignity. The existence of a legitimate aim is not sufficient in itself. There needs to be proof that the unequal treatment is the only way to achieve this goal. The application of such a justification is tempered by the requirement of proportionality.

The fact that II.–2:102 (Meaning of discrimination) may apply to all cases of discrimination does not mean that the grounds on which discrimination occurs would not be relevant in deciding whether such discrimination can be justified. Depending on the kind of discrimination at hand, the exception test must be applied differently, i.e. more or less strictly. For instance, in the case of racial discrimination, the possibility of justification is extremely limited and absolutely exceptional, because of the overriding principle that the criterion of race should be abandoned as a means of classifying people. Since the criterion of race and, to some extent, that of ethnic origin are predominantly subjective categories, unequal treatment usually cannot bring real benefit worthy of justification. Therefore, only an exceptional justification test may be used when deciding whether to permit this kind of discrimination. The main example where unequal treatment on the ground of race or ethnic origin could be justified would be 'positive discrimination'. In case of any harassment (sexual or otherwise) there is no possible justification because of the reprehensibility of the very nature of such behaviour.

Illustration 1
A woman makes an offer to rent two rooms in her apartment, but only to female students. This discrimination can be justified for reasons of privacy and decency.

Illustration 2
A woman makes an offer to rent rooms in her apartment only to white students. This discrimination cannot be justified. Although there might be a legitimate privacy argument, this must not be based on or linked to the race of the roommates. One of the goals of non–discrimination law is to fight against unreasonable stereotypes. Race is such a stereotype that leads to degrading conditions for certain groups of people. Therefore, privacy motivations alone cannot be sufficient. Europe has an extremely painful history of racial discrimination. The memory of this history is reflected in constitutionally protected values, which must obviously influence which justifications for discrimination are permitted and which are not.

NOTES

I. Justification

1. As previously mentioned, the Directives distinguish between direct and indirect discrimination. The prohibitions against direct discrimination are phrased differently from those against indirect discrimination. While indirect discrimination by definition presupposes that there is no justified reason for the different treatment, the proscription of direct discrimination on the grounds of race and ethnic origin in the Antiracism Directive is formulated as an absolute principle without any exception. On the other hand, Art. 4(5) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive provides that differences based on sex ("provision of the goods and services exclusively or primarily to members of one sex") are not precluded if they can be justified by a legitimate aim and if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary. In addition, Art.

5(2) of the same directive allows justification of different premiums and benefits in insurance between men and women. These justifications apply to both direct and indirect discrimination.

2. Most national provisions implementing the definitions of direct and indirect discrimination state – consistently with the Directives – that direct discrimination is not open to justification, whereas indirect discrimination can be justified by legitimate aims. Thus, the laws of AUSTRIA, BULGARIA, DENMARK, FINLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY, IRELAND, ITALY, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA, SLOVANIA, SPAIN, SWEDEN, and the UNITED KINGDOM provide justifications only for indirect discrimination while not providing any justification for conduct that has been established as direct discrimination.

3. Only a few Member States have departed from the Directives' definitions and enacted anti-discrimination laws which expressly permit the justification of direct discrimination. BELGIUM Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Racial Discrimination art. 4(7) defines direct discrimination as a "difference in treatment lacking objective and reasonable justification". See also BELGIUM Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Gender Discrimination art. 2(3). The HUNGARIAN Equal Treatment Act art. 7(2) did not distinguish between direct and indirect discrimination and provided that any action or conduct "shall not be taken to violate the requirement of equal treatment if it is found by objective consideration to have a reasonable ground directly to the relevant legal relation." After a recent amendment, which came into force on 1 January 2007, this justification is not anymore applicable to direct discrimination based on racial origin, see art. 7(3).

4. Some legal systems provide specific legal justifications for different treatment that apply to both direct and indirect discrimination. Under BULGARIAN law, inter alia, minimum or maximum age requirements are not deemed discrimination if they can be objectively justified and do not exceed what is necessary (Protection against Discrimination Act art. 7(1) nos. 5, 6, 11). Under GERMAN law different treatment based on, inter alia, sex can be justified if a "reasonable ground" ("sachlicher Grund") can be established. Reasonable grounds include the prevention of damage, or the need for protection of private life or personal security (General Equal Treatment Act s. 20(1)). Further justifications will be established by the courts. This justification is not applicable to different treatment based on racial or ethnic origin.

5. Under LITHUANIAN law direct and indirect discrimination are treated differently, but this is done differently from the way followed in the Directives. The Law on Equal Treatment art. 2(7) lists several exceptions for direct discrimination, for example legislation on age restrictions, on requirements to know the State language or legislation concerning different rights applied on the basis of citizenship. Conversely, there is no justification for indirect discrimination.

6. Consistently with the Directives, a series of Member States provide specific justifications for discrimination based on sex. Under FRENCH (Law 2008-496 art. 2(4)), LUXEMBOURGIAN (Law of 21 December 2007 art. 4), ITALIAN (Law 198/2006 art. 55-bis(7)), SLOVAKIAN (Anti-Discrimination Act art. 8(7)(c)), SLOVENIAN (Act Implementing the Principle of Equal Treatment art. 2a(3)) and SWEDISH (Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act art. 9(2)) law differences in treatment that are based on a person's sex can be justified by a legitimate aim if the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary. The DUTCH legislator has adopted an exception for cases "in which sex is a determining factor" (General Equal Treatment Act art. 2(2)(a)). Although under PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law the General Sex Discrimination Directive has been implemented by independent laws there is no specific provision under which unequal treatment based on sex may be justified.

II. Genuine occupational requirement

7. The Directives on equal treatment authorise the Member States to grant an exception from the prohibition of unequal treatment if a genuine and determining occupational requirement requires this. For example, Art. 4 of the Antiracism Directive allows Member States to "provide that a difference of treatment which is based on a characteristic related to racial or ethnic origin, shall not constitute discrimination where, by reason of the nature of the particular occupational activities concerned or of the context in which they are carried out, such a characteristic constitutes a genuine and determining occupational requirement, provided that the objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate." Similar provisions containing exceptions for occupational requirements can be found in the Directive 2000/78/EC (art. 4(1)), the Directive 2002/73/EC (art. 1) and the Directive 2006/54/EC (art. 14(2)).

8. The majority of Member States have adopted genuine occupational requirement exceptions that are closely modelled on the ones found in the Directives. This includes BELGIUM, CYPRUS, DENMARK, ESTONIA, FINLAND, GERMANY, GREECE, HUNGARY, IRELAND, ITALY, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, POLAND, PORTUGAL, SLOVAKIA, SPAIN, SWEDEN and the UNITED KINGDOM. Under ITALIAN law the occupational requirement has to be established "in compliance with the principles of proportionality and reasonableness" (proporzionalità e ragionevolezza), thus, the requirement of "legitimate objective" has been replaced by "reasonableness" which leaves more room for discretion (Law 215/2003 art. 3(3)).

9. LUXEMBOURG and IRELAND have chosen not to include an exception for genuine occupational requirement in their national law. The Irish legislator removed a previous exception under which distinctions on various grounds could be justified if the relevant characteristic was an occupational qualification.

II.–2:104: Remedies

(1) If a person is discriminated against contrary to II.–2:101 (Right not to be discriminated against) then, without prejudice to any remedy which may be available under Book VI (Non-contractual Liability for Damage caused to Another), the remedies for non-performance of an obligation under Book III, Chapter 3 (including damages for economic and non-economic loss) are available.

(2) Any remedy granted should be proportionate to the injury or anticipated injury; the dissuasive effect of remedies may be taken into account.

COMMENTS

A. General

The provision indicates which sanctions apply for violation of the right not to be discriminated against. Sanctions serve to undo the results of discrimination and also to prevent further discrimination. Moreover, the effect should also be general prevention. According to the underlying Directives, the sanctions for discrimination must be effective, proportionate and dissuasive and entail the payment of damages for loss to the victim.

As II.–2.101 (Right not to be discriminated against) grants a right not be discriminated against, an infringement of this right triggers the remedies for non-performance of an obligation under Book III, Chapter 3. Such remedies can be, in particular, the right to claim damages under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 7 or the right to terminate a contractual relationship under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5. In exceptional cases, the remedy can also be a right to enforce performance under III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations), which may include the right to demand the conclusion of a contract.

B. Right to claim damages

The primary remedy for forbidden discrimination is the right to claim damages. Which persons are entitled to claim damages is a particularly controversial question. On the one hand, it would be going too far to grant this right to anyone who belongs to the discriminated group of persons. On the other hand, it would excessively restrict the right to damages if one required a person to actively try to enter into a contract with the discriminating person, even though the latter has made it clear that he or she will reject that attempt. It seems that a certain amount of proximity between the person who claims to be discriminated against and the discriminating situation or behaviour itself is a pre-condition to a right to claim damages. Otherwise the person will not be considered to have suffered loss, not even a non-economic loss. The question of who has a right to claim damages must be determined by bearing in mind that the remedies have to be effective, proportionate and dissuasive. Generally, a party to a contract, or at least a potential contractual partner, may be entitled to claim damages. It could, however, also be a person who is simply a customer and not a party to a contract or a potential contractual partner.

Illustration 1
A invites her boyfriend B, a person of colour, to a restaurant. The waiter does not want to serve B on racial grounds. In this situation, B is entitled to claim damages for non-economic loss even though he is not a party to the contract.

Paragraph (1) of the Article clarifies that the right to claim damages for loss includes non-economic loss in the sense of III.–3.701 (Right to damages) paragraph (3). Because of the nature of discrimination, it may be extremely difficult in a large number of cases to prove that an economic loss has been suffered. Above all, discrimination violates human dignity. Therefore, it usually causes a non-economic loss.

Illustration 2
X, a credit institution, refuses to provide a loan to client B on the basis of B's ethnicity. B is forced to enter into a contract with another institution, Y, under less beneficial financial conditions. B has a right to a claim damages for economic loss from X, which is the difference between the cost of the loan by institution Y and the costs of the loan by institution X. B may also have a right to claim damages for non-economic loss because of the violation of his dignity.

C. Right to terminate

Another remedy could be the termination of a contractual relationship, even if the contract does not allow such termination before the end of the regular duration of the contract.

Illustration 3
B, a person of colour, has, by contract, taken out a subscription to a newspaper. The newspaper unexpectedly publishes a series of articles presenting clearly racist positions. In this situation, B can terminate the contractual relationship because the criterion of harassment has been fulfilled.

D. Right to demand the conclusion of a contract

In exceptional cases, this Article in connection with III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) can result in a right to demand the conclusion of a contract. Although such a remedy should not generally be excluded, it needs to be applied with the highest level of caution. It fundamentally infringes the principle of freedom of contract and is usually considered inefficient in the field of civil law contracts. Normally, a right to claim damages should be a sufficient means to satisfy the aggrieved party. In very specific situations, however, it is necessary to ensure that the victim of discrimination has access to the goods or services, where there has been a general denial to provide them on the basis of discrimination.

Illustration 4
A is a landlord who refuses to rent an apartment to a young pregnant woman, B, because specific protective measures exist which limit the ability to terminate contractual relationships with pregnant women. B may demand the conclusion of the contract with her. Since it is very likely that she will also face similar refusals from other people for the same reason, other remedies such as damages may not be sufficient to undo the effects of the discrimination.

Illustration 5
A seller refuses to sell food to a person of colour for racist reasons. Damages (also non-economic) should be a sufficient remedy, unless there are no other places to purchase food in the immediate or nearby area.

E. Other remedies, cumulation of remedies

The catalogue of remedies provided for in this Article is not exhaustive. There are various types of discrimination that could possibly occur in different situations, so that an adequate remedy has to be left to the circumstances. For instance, if a discriminating act occurred and will probably be repeated, it must also be possible to prohibit future discrimination. An exhaustive list of remedies could endanger the real possibility of undoing the consequences of discrimination. Other remedies for discrimination can be derived from many provisions of these model rules. Examples are nullity of a contract under II.–7:301 (Contracts infringing fundamental principles), interpretation of a contract or implying a term in favour of a discriminated party under II.–8:102 (Relevant matters) sub-paragraph (g) or II.–9:101 (Terms of a contract), setting aside a contract term as being unfair under Chapter 9, Section 4 of Book II, the application of the rules on non-discrimination to all obligations, including 'post-contractual' and non-contractual obligations, under III.–1:105 (Non-discrimination) or remedies available under Book VI (Non-contractual Liability for Damage caused to Another).

> Illustration 6
> A is a landlord who rents apartments to tenants T1 to T4. Only the contract with T3, who is a person of colour, contains a provision according to which an additional guarantee payment is required to secure potential claims for damages. As this is a discriminatory clause, it is void under II.–7:301 (Contracts infringing fundamental principles).

All remedies can be combined, if appropriate. Save for cases of abuse of rights, a person who has been subjected to discrimination can choose from different remedies.

> Illustration 7
> If the victim is terminating a contractual relationship, the victim cannot at the same time require that the contract be modified, invalidating the discriminating clause(s). The victim may, however, simultaneously claim economic and non-economic damages.

F. Proportionality test and dissuasive effect

The remedies must be proportionate to the injury or anticipated injury. When applying this proportionality test, the particular situation of a person who has discriminated against others has to be taken into account, since the remedy must have a dissuasive effect. The dissuasive effect of sanctions plays its main role when non-economic loss is to be measured. The general policy function of the remedy, i.e. its dissuasive effect, must be taken into account. Consequently, the general rule on measure of damages in III.–3:702 (General measure of damages) has to be applied with a view to also give the remedy a dissuasive effect. In that sense, damages for non-economic loss may have a punitive element. Such damages are related to the specific kind of injury that has been suffered. When determining the amount of damages it should be borne in mind that the remedy must make any future acts of discrimination economically unattractive for the discriminating person. A dissuasive effect can only be achieved if the kind and size of the business belonging to the discriminating person is taken into consideration. The kind of discrimination and its degree of "intimidating power" should also be relevant. However, if the discriminatory act does not really affect the life conditions or real market opportunities of the person discriminated against, the amount of damages must not be disproportionate even when it has to be measured with a view to have a dissuasive effect.

Illustration 8
A large enterprise that provides hotel services only offers rooms with lower standards to certain ethnic groups. Each potential client from such ethnic groups, who was trying to rent a higher quality room and was refused, may claim non-economic damages in a "significant" amount, which would reflect the enterprise's position in the market.

Other remedies (apart from damages for economic and non-economic loss) must also be proportionate and dissuasive. In cases where the remedies directly relate to the modification of contract terms or the termination of a contractual relationship, the requirement of dissuasiveness has a limited scope of application. This simply means that the aggrieved party may also use stronger remedies than those needed to undo the consequences of discrimination, although the dissuasive purpose cannot lead to the abandonment of the requirement of proportionality. It follows that in particular cases, the termination of a contractual relationship may be granted although another remedy would be sufficient to undo the effects of discrimination, for example, a modification of the terms of the contract.

Illustration 9
In the case presented as Illustration 6, the tenant, instead of just declaring the discriminating contract clause void, terminates the entire contractual relationship. The remedy may apply, although the nullity of the clause would be sufficient to undo the effects of the discrimination.

NOTES

I. Compensation

1. The Antiracism Directive and the General Sex Discrimination Directive contain a sort of general description of the aim and content of remedies. Art. 15 of the Antiracism Directive says that sanctions may include the payment of compensation to the victim of discrimination and that all sanctions must be effective, proportionate, and dissuasive. Art. 8(2) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive explicitly requires effective compensation or reparation for any loss and damage sustained by a person injured as a result of discrimination in a way which is dissuasive and proportionate to the damage suffered. Other directives on non-discrimination related to labour law formulate similar concepts (cf. Art. 17 Directive 2000/78/EC and Art. 18 Directive on Principle of Equal Opportunities and Equal Treatment of Men and Women 2002/73). With regard to the Directive 1976/207, dealing with discrimination on grounds of sex in the field of employment, the ECJ held that when a Member State chooses to penalise the breach of the prohibition of discrimination under rules governing civil liability, "the Directive … preclude[s] provisions of domestic law which make reparation of damage suffered as a result of discrimination … subject to the requirement of fault" (judgment of 22 April 1997, C-180/95 – Nils Draehmpaehl v Urania Immobilienservice OHG, ECR 1997, I-2195). In the Colson case, the ECJ expressed the view that "compensation must in any event be adequate in relation to the damage sustained" (judgment of 10 April 1984 – Von Colson and Kamann/Land Nordrhein-Westfalen, ECR 1984, 1891, para. 23). According to the Court, the limitation of the right to compensation to a purely nominal amount would not satisfy the requirements of an effective transposition of the directive. Later, the court held that where compensation is the remedy chosen by the national legislator "the fixing of an upper limit of the kind at issue, cannot by definition constitute proper implementation of art. 6 of the Directive, since it limits the amount of compensation a priori to a level which is not necessarily consistent with the requirement of ensuring real equality of opportunity through adequate reparation for the loss and damage sustained as a result of the discriminatory dismissal". (judgment of 2 August 1993, C-271/91– M. Helen Marshall v. Southampton and South-West Hampshire Area Health Authority, ECR 1993, I-4367). Art. 8(2) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive explicitly prohibits a fixing of a maximum limit for compensation. According to the European Commission "there can be no doubt that upper limits on compensation for discrimination are not acceptable either in the context of either the Race or Employment Framework Directives. Even though, to date, explicit case law and legislation on this issue concern sex discrimination, there is no conceivable convincing reason why a different approach should apply in relation to other types of discrimination" (European Commission publication "Remedies and Sanctions in EC non-discrimination law", 2005). Only the last directive in the field of labour law provides for the possibility to fix a maximum limit for compensation, but only in the case of a refusal to take a job application into consideration (Art. 18 Directive 2002/73/EC).

2. A vast majority of Member States provides for compensation awards. Under AUSTRIAN law the claimant can claim compensation for economic loss and also for non-economic loss (Equal Treatment Act § 35(1)). In the latter case the amount granted must compensate the victim for any personal suffering; the minimum amount is € 400. These claims are permissible only after mediation. Under BELGIUM law, the victim of a discrimination may seek reparation (damages) according to the usual principles of civil liability (Law of 10 Mai 2007 Combating Racial Discrimination art. 16(1): "en application du droit de la responsabilité contractuelle ou extra-contractuelle"). According to the BULGARIAN Protection against Discrimination Act art. 71(1) no. 3 the discriminated person can lodge a claim before the Regional Court demanding compensation for damage, which primarily means compensation for economic loss. In CYPRUS, the court may award all types of damages available in civil procedures, like pecuniary, nominal or punitive damages. In DENMARK, when a violation of the Ethnic Equality Act can be established, it is possible to bring a civil action for delictual damages before the courts (cf. Act on Torts art. 26). However, in practice, it seems less likely that a person will be compensated for discrimination which has not been declared a criminal offence in a previous criminal court case. Under ESTONIAN law the injured party has a right to demand compensation for damage, including non-pecuniary loss (Gender Equality Act art. 13(1)). In GERMANY the discriminator is liable to pay damages for material loss only if the loss was caused by the discriminator's fault (wilful or negligent wrongdoing). Only in the case of non-material loss does the law impose a strict liability on the discriminator (General Equal Treatment Act § 21(2)). Given the case law of the ECJ demanding strict liability (mentioned above) this is in breach of EC law. SLOVAKIAN law provides that the victim may seek non-pecuniary damages, especially where the violation of the principle of equal treatment has considerably impaired the dignity and the social status of the victim (Anti-Discrimination Act art. 9(3)). Whereas the SPANISH legislation implementing the Antiracism Directive does not contain sanctions at all, the legislation implementing the General Sex Discrimination Directive provides for "indemnizaciones que sean reales, efectivas y proporcionadas al perjuicio sufriode" (Law 3/2007 art. 10).

3. Member States differ on the question of upper limits for pecuniary damages. Some states have adopted limits for compensation. In BELGIUM, the victim may opt for a payment of the lump sums defined in the law (Law of 10 MAI 2007 Combating Racial Discrimination art. 16(2)(1): € 1300, reduced to € 650 if the discriminator provides evidence that the measure creating the disadvantage would have been adopted anyway, even in the absence of the discriminatory element). According to the FINNISH Non-Discrimination Act art. 9(1) compensation for the injured party is not to exceed € 15,000. This maximum compensation may only be exceeded for "special reasons" (e.g. the length and seriousness of discrimination). The (theoretical) maximum sum in compensation is to be adjusted every three years by a decree by the Ministry of Labour (art. 21). However, the award of compensation is without prejudice to the possibility of obtaining damages under the Tort Liability Act (412/1974) or some other law (art. 9(3)). A considerable number of Member States have refrained from including upper limits to the amount of compensation that can be awarded, e.g. AUSTRIA, BULGARIA, CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, ESTONIA, GERMANY, ITALY, LUXEMBOURG, the NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, SLOVAKIA, SLOVENIA, SPAIN, and the UNITED KINGDOM. In HUNGARY there is equally no upper statutory limit. However, Hungarian courts tended to be rather cautious in the amounts awarded. In a number of cases concerning discrimination in access to services (most frequently denying Roma guests entry to discos and bars), the amount of compensation was quite steadily around € 400. Recently however, the average amounts have started to rise. In some recent cases, discrimination based on racial or ethnic origin was sanctioned with non-pecuniary damages of around € 2000, which is a promising change in the general judicial approach. In LATVIA there is no limit for compensation under civil law; however for damage caused by state administration institutes the law provides for maximum amounts ranging from around € 5000 to around € 20000. Under SWEDISH law no limits apply, but according to the Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act art. 18 damages can be reduced or even cancelled if this is "deemed reasonable".

4. Some Member States have included time limits for making claims for compensation. For example, in GERMANY, the claimant has to lodge the claim within two months (General Equal Treatment Act § 21(5)), whereas ESTONIAN law provides for a period of one year from the date when the injured party became aware or should have become aware of the damage caused (Gender Equality Act art. 14). In IRELAND the complainant is required to initiate the complaint by notifying, in writing, the respondent within two months of the date of the occurrence of the discriminatory conduct (Equal Status Act art. 21(2)(a)). If there is no satisfactory response, the claimant can pursue the matter to the Equality Tribunal. Furthermore, a long-stop rule of six months from the date of the occurrence is applicable. Under SWEDISH law the legal proceedings must be initiated within two years from the date of the alleged offence (Discrimination (Goods and Services Act) art. 23).

5. Some Member States do not provide for civil compensation. The GREEK Law 3304/2005 only provides for penal sanctions (ranging from administrative fines to even imprisonment). Legislative proposals which included reparation, restitution and other civil remedies have not become law.

II. Other civil sanctions

6. The Directives only require the Member States to lay down sanctions that are effective, proportionate and dissuasive. No further guidance is given on the character of the remedies, i.e. their orientation as backward-looking (e.g. damages) or forward-looking (e.g. remedies seeking to adjust future behaviour).

7. Some Member States declare contractual terms that are incompatible with the prohibition of discrimination to be void. Under BELGIAN law such terms are void (Law of 10 MAI 2007 Combating Racial Discrimination art. 13: "sont nulles"). In FINLAND, a court may amend or ignore contractual terms which are contrary to the prohibition of discrimination (Non-Discrimination Act art. 10(1)). If circumstances so warrant, a court may also amend other parts of the contract or declare the whole contract void (art. 10(2)). Similarly, under SWEDISH law terms that are in conflict with the principle of equal treatment can be adjusted or declared invalid. Even the whole contract may be adjusted or declared invalid, if the provision is of such importance for the contract that it is unreasonable to demand that the contract apply as to the rest without material changes (Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act art. 15(1)). In the case of discrimination in terminating a contractual relationship, the legal document effecting the termination must be declared invalid if so requested by the aggrieved person (art. 15(2)). The LUXEMBOURG Law of 28 November 2006 art. 6 makes null contractual provisions which violate the principle of equal treatment (also Law of 21 December 2007 art. 9(1)). SPANISH law declares provisions violating the anti-discrimination laws to be void and not binding (Law 3/2007 art. 10: "nulos y sin efecto"). Under DUTCH law, contractual provisions which are in conflict with the General Equal Treatment Act are void (art. 9: "nietig").

8. Under some national laws, the victim may seek termination of the discriminatory behaviour, conduct or act. Furthermore, the consequences of such acts and behaviour must be removed and the previous situation must be restored. In BELGIUM the person discriminated against may lodge a claim before the Regional Court for an order requiring the discriminatory practice to cease (Law of 10 May 2007 Combating Racial Discrimination art. 18(1): "ordonne la cessation d'un acte") and the decision may be posted publicly (art. 18(3)). In the event of non-compliance with a judicial order the addressee (discriminator) may be subject to fines (astreintes) (art. 17). Under BULGARIAN law the victim may seek termination of the violation and restoration of the status quo ante. Furthermore, the discriminator can be obliged to refrain in future from further violations (Protection against Discrimination Act art. 71(1) no. 2). Under ESTONIAN law the injured party has a right to demand termination of the harmful activity (Gender Equality Act art. 13(2)). In GERMANY, the victim has a claim for the cessation of the discriminatory acts and the removal of the disadvantage (General Equal Treatment Act § 21(1)). According to ITALIAN Law 215/2003 art. 4(5) the judge can order the termination of the discriminatory behaviour and the removal of its effects, and can also adopt a plan aiming at the removal of the identified discriminations. Similarly, under Law 198/2006 art. 55-quinquies(1) the judge may order termination (cessazione) of the discriminatory conduct and removal of the effects of discrimination (rimuovere gli effetti delle discriminazione). In the NETHERLANDS the Equal Treatment Commission can initiate legal action requesting that conduct contrary to the relevant equal treatment legislation be prohibited and that the consequences of such conduct be rectified (General Equal Treatment Act art. 15(1)). According to the SLOVAKIAN Anti-Discrimination Act art. 9(2) the court may order the person violating the principle of equal treatment to refrain from such conduct and to rectify the illegal situation.

II.–2:105: Burden of proof

(1) If a person who considers himself or herself discriminated against on one of the grounds mentioned in II.–2:101 (Right not to be discriminated against) establishes, before a court or another competent authority, facts from which it may be presumed that there has been such discrimination, it falls on the other party to prove that there has been no such discrimination.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply to proceedings in which it is for the court or another competent authority to investigate the facts of the case.

COMMENTS

A. General

The aim of paragraph (1) is to facilitate the requirement of proving the occurrence of the discriminatory act. Paragraph (2) does not change these rules. It only states that an investigating court or authority, acting ex officio, should also collect evidence which is in favour of the person allegedly acting in a discriminatory way. The provision is modelled along similar rules in EC law, e.g. in the Antiracism Directive 2000/43/EC and the General Sex Discrimination Directive 2004/113/EC.

B. Presumption

This provision does not entail a formal shift of the burden of proof, but it allows for the drawing of a conclusion from facts based on life experiences which indicate discrimination. It relaxes the rigidity of the law of evidence in favour of the person who claims to be discriminated against. The facts on which the presumption is based must be fully proved by this person. They must be facts which make the existence of discrimination likely according to the local practices, customs, or existing bias and traditional ideas. If such facts are proved the person who allegedly acted in a discriminatory way has the right to prove that there has not been such discrimination. This requires convincing the responsible court that the behaviour was motivated by – legitimate – grounds other than sex, race or ethnic origin.

> Illustration
> A landlord does not want to rent an apartment advertised in the press to an affluent Roma family. Because of the well known general problems faced by the members of Roma minorities, it is sufficient, at least in some Member States, to infer from the established fact alone that discrimination has occurred. In a situation where a landlord refuses to rent an apartment to a woman, this would by itself not be enough to give rise to a presumption of discrimination, unless in a specific country or region or local community such a sex-based refusal was common.

The burden of proof rule plays a crucial role in order to ensure the efficacy of anti-discrimination law. However, it is a highly controversial instrument, which in the context of civil law, is considered close to being an instrument allowing control over the intentions and other thoughts of the alleged discriminator. Because of the ambivalence of the criterion for discrimination (in particular in cases of race) it is extremely difficult to determine the circumstances justifying the shift of the burden of proof.

C. Exception for ex officio inquisition proceedings

Paragraph (2) restates an exception from paragraph (1). The provision must be understood to mean that in such proceedings the alleged discriminator does not need to prove innocence. In such cases, the investigating authority has to collect the evidence proving all relevant circumstances, as well as evidence that is in favour of the respondent. It does not exclude the possibility, however, that conclusions or inferences can be made from the established facts. In this sense, presumptions based on paragraph (1) may also apply to proceedings in the sense of paragraph (2).

NOTES

I. Shifting the burden of proof

1. The principle of shifting the burden of proof can be traced back to case-law from the ECJ, see 109/88 [1989] ECR 3199; Enderby – C-127/92 [1993] ECR I-5535. Subsequently, it was codified in legislation through Art. 4(1) of the Burden of Proof Directive 1997/80 which lays down that persons who consider themselves to have been discriminated against need only establish, before a court or other competent authority, facts from which it may be presumed that there has been discrimination. The burden of proof will then shift to the respondent who must then prove that there has been no breach of the principle of equal treatment. Art. 8(1) of the Racial Equality Directive 2000/43, Art. 10(1) of Directive 2000/78/EC, and Art. 9(1) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive set out equivalent rules on the burden of proof. In addition, the preambles to all non-discrimination directives provide that "the rules on the burden of proof must be adapted when there is a prima facie case of discrimination and for the principle of equal treatment to be applied effectively, the burden of proof must shift back to the respondent when evidence of such discrimination is brought" (Recital 21 of the Antiracism Directive; Recital 31 of the Directive 2000/78/EC; Recital 22 of the General Sex Discrimination Directive; and Recital 30 of the Directive on Principle of Equal Opportunities and Equal Treatment of Men and Women 2002/73).
2. Recent ECJ case law has dealt with the meaning of "facts from which it may be presumed that there has been direct or indirect discrimination". In Centrum voor gelijkheid van kansen en voor racismebestrijding v Firma Feryn NV (10 July 2008 – C-54/07) it was held that "public statements by which an employer lets it be known that under its recruitment policy it will not recruit any employees of a certain ethnic or racial origin are sufficient for a presumption of the existence of a recruitment policy which is directly discriminatory within the meaning of Article 8(1) of Directive 2000/43." Some ambiguities exist with regard to the requirements placed on the person alleging discrimination. According to the English version of the Directives he or she has to establish facts from which it may be presumed that there has been discriminatory conduct, i.e. has to fully prove these facts. In the German version the person is only required to provide credible evidence ("glaubhaft machen") of the facts from which the discrimination may be presumed. Thus, the German version suggests that the Directive was intended to lower the burden of proof in three respects. First, to lower the requirements posed on the complainer; he or she does not have to prove the facts but is only required to "provide credible evidence of" these facts. Secondly, the facts need not inevitably point to a discriminating conduct: it is sufficient if they indicate a possible discrimination. And thirdly, once the complainer has provided credible evidence of these facts, the burden of proof shifts to the alleged discriminator. Although most of the other language versions make a difference at least in the wording between the complainer and the discriminator – for the former, "établit" (French), "espongono" (Italian), "prezinta" (Romanian), "referir" (Spanish), while for the latter "prouver" (French), "provare" (Italian), "dovedească" (Romanian), "demostrar" (Spanish) – it does not seem that the different wordings do in fact imply a different meaning. The Hungarian version requires both the complainer and the discriminator to prove and uses the same word ("bizonyítania" or "bizonyítanak"). The legal term "valóstínusiteui" which comes close to the German "glaubhaft machen" is not used.

3. Most Member States chose to simply copy the text of the Directives into national law. For example, the provisions on the shift of the burden of proof in DENMARK (Ethnic Equality Act art. 7); FINLAND (Non-Discrimination Act art. 17); GREECE (Law 3304/2005 art. 14(1)); IRELAND (Equal Status Act s. 38A(1)); LUXEMBOURG (Law of 28 November 2006 art. 5(1); Law of 21 December 2007 art. 8(1)); MALTA (Equal Treatment of Persons Order art. 13(1)); the NETHERLANDS (General Equal Treatment Act art. 10(1)); PORTUGAL (Law 18/2004 art. 6(1) and Law 14/2008 art. 9(1)) are almost identical to that found in the Directives. According to the FRENCH Law 2008-496 art. 4(1) the complainer has to present facts (présente les faits), whereas the respondent has to prove that the conduct is justified. Under SLOVENIAN law the discriminated person has to "quote" facts before the alleged offender must prove that he or she did not violate the principle of equal treatment (Act Implementing the Principle of Equal Treatment art. 22(2)). SPANISH law provides that the burden shifts if well-founded evidence of discrimination can be inferred from the allegations (alegaciones) of the complainant (Law 62/2003 art. 32; Law 3/2007 art. 13(1)), whilst according to the SWEDISH Discrimination (Goods and Services) Act art. 21 it is sufficient if the victim can point to circumstances that support a claim. ESTONIAN law requires the alleged discriminator, at the request of the competent body, to explain the reasons and motives for his or her behaviour (Gender Equality Act art. 4(1)).

4. BELGIAN law provides some guidance on how the victim can establish facts which could lead the judge to presume that discrimination has occurred. According to Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Racial Discrimination art. 30 the victim who is seeking damages on the basis of CC art. 1382 will be authorised to produce "statistical data" and "tests de situation". But statistical data and situation tests are merely "exemplative" of the kinds of facts which could be brought forward to reverse the burden of proof. From a distinction which is "intrinsèquement suspect" it can also be presumed that there has been discrimination (Law of 10 May 2007 on Combating Gender Discrimination art. 33(3)(2)).

5. The burden of proof provision adopted by the HUNGARIAN legislator (Equal Treatment Act art. 19) is more generous for the victim than the solution applied by the Directives as it requires the victim only to substantiate that he or she has suffered a disadvantage and that he or she falls under any ground of discrimination. The victim is thus not required to establish the causal link between the discrimination criteria and the disadvantage.

6. Several legal systems have rules that require the complainer to "prove" (rather than to "establish") facts from which a discrimination may be presumed. This is in line with the English version of the Directive (see above, Note 2). Although the German version of the Directive speaks of "credible evidence", under GERMAN law (General Equal Treatment Act § 22) the claimant has to "beweis[en]" (rather than "glaubhaftmachen") facts which may indicate a possible discrimination. Literally interpreted this provision is not in line with the Directives; however, it is argued that it can be interpreted accordingly (MünchKomm (-Thüsing) BGB[5], § 22 AGG no. 2). The old CYPRUS Equal Treatment Law art. 7 required the claimant "to prove" facts from which a violation could be inferred. This was changed by the Law amending the Equal Treatment (Racial or Ethnic origin) No. 147(I)/2006: the claimant has now merely to introduce such facts. The BULGARIAN Protection against Discrimination Act art. 9 requires the victim to "prove" ("докаже") the facts. Similarly, under the ROMANIAN law (Law 137/2000 art. 27(4) the person alleging discrimination has to "prove" the existence of facts from which a discrimination may be presumed ("dovendi existenta unor fapte care permit a se presupune existenta unei discrimină directe sau indirecte"). The UNITED KINGDOM Race Relations Act s. 57ZA(2) and Sex Discrimination Act s. 63A(2) also provide that the claimant has to "prove facts from which the court could conclude that the respondent has committed such an act of discrimination."

7. Some Member States have not satisfactorily transposed the reversal of burden of proof. The AUSTRIAN Equal Treatment Act § 35(3), while lowering the burden, is not considered to comply with the Directives. According to this provision, the respondent has only to prove that "it is more likely that a different motive – documented by facts established by the respondent – was the crucial factor in the case or that there has been a legal ground of justification (in cases of indirect discrimination)". Under ITALIAN law (Law 215/2003 art. 4(3)), if the person who considers himself or herself wronged by discrimination establishes facts about the existence of discrimination, the judge can evaluate such elements on the basis of CC art. 2729 that allows a "prudent appreciation" of presumptions. There is no explicit shift of the burden of proof. However, the reversal of burden of proof contained in the General Sex Discrimination Directive has been implemented correctly by repeating the provision word for word (Law 198/2006 art. 55-sexies).

8. A small number of Member States have fallen short in implementing the burden of proof provisions. Under LATVIAN law the burden of proof only shifts in the area of employment. The same applies to POLISH law, where, however, the draft Anti-Discrimination Act will introduce a provision that is applicable also outwith employment law. Originally, the LITHUANIAN Law on Equal Treatment had no provision for shifting the burden. However, after a recent amendment a provision on the burden of proof can be found in art. 4.

II. Exceptions

9. All the non-discrimination directives provide an exception with regard to procedures in which a competent authority has to investigate the facts of the case (Art. 8(5) of the Antiracism Directive, Art. 10(5) of Directive 2000/78/EC, Art. 9(5) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive, and Art. 19(3) of Directive 2002/73/EC – in this last case the provision also encompasses other named procedures). Additionally, the Directives exempt criminal cases from the shift of the burden of proof, e.g. Art. 8(3) of the Antiracism Directive; Art. 9(3) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive.

10. Express exceptions for penal proceedings are provided by the anti-discrimination laws of BELGIUM, ESTONIA, FINLAND, FRANCE; HUNGARY; LUXEMBOURG; PORTUGAL and SPAIN. In the other Member States it is presumed that criminal cases are excluded from the provisions on the burden of proof.

11. Some Member States made use of the exceptions provided by Art. 8(5) of the Antiracism Directive and Art. 9(5) of the General Sex Discrimination Directive and decided not to apply the shift of the burden of proof to cases in which courts have an investigative role. For example, in ESTONIA (Gender Equality Act art. 4(2)) and FRANCE (Code of Administrative Justice art. R441-1) the burden of proof is not shifted in administrative procedures which are inquisitorial in nature. Under PORTUGESE law this principle does not apply to actions when it is up to the court to carry out the investigation (Law 18/2004 art. 6(2)).

12. Several legal systems refrained from including an exception for administrative procedures, e.g., HUNGARY; MALTA; NETHERLANDS; SWEDEN; UNITED KINDOM. Under GERMAN law, which also does not provide such an exception, it is presumed that the shift of the burden of proof is applicable also to administrative procedures (MünchKomm (-Thüsing), BGB[5], § 22 AGG no. 5). On the other hand, under SLOVAKIAN law the shifting of the burden of proof is applicable to "civil judicial proceedings" only.

13. A third group of Member States explicitly extend the burden of proof principle to administrative proceedings. According to GREEK Law 3304/2005 art. 14(3) the shift also applies in the framework of administrative actions. The LUXEMBOURG Law of 28 November 2006 art. 5(1) and Law of 21 December 2007 art. 8(1) states that if a victim establishes facts from which discrimination may be presumed "devant la jurisdiction civile ou administrative" the other party has to prove the contrary. Similar provisions can also be found in SLOVENIAN (Act Implementing the Principle of Equal Treatment art. 22(1)) and SPANISH law (Law 62/2003 art. 32).

CHAPTER 3: MARKETING AND PRE-CONTRACTUAL DUTIES

Section 1: Information duties

II.–3:101: Duty to disclose information about goods, other assets and services

(1) Before the conclusion of a contract for the supply of goods, other assets or services by a business to another person, the business has a duty to disclose to the other person such information concerning the goods, other assets or services to be supplied as the other person can reasonably expect, taking into account the standards of quality and performance which would be normal under the circumstances.

(2) In assessing what information the other person can reasonably expect to be disclosed, the test to be applied, if the other person is also a business, is whether the failure to provide the information would deviate from good commercial practice.

COMMENTS

A. General principle and scope

Each party to a contract can generally be expected to assume the responsibility of obtaining the relevant factual and legal information that party may need before entering into a contract. There is no overarching general principle that requires the full disclosure of all the relevant information which the opposite party may need in order to make a fully-informed decision about whether to conclude a contract on particular terms.

This Article focuses on circumstances where the supplier of goods, other assets or services is in possession of information about the quality and performance of those goods, other assets or services, disclosure of which can reasonably be expected by the other party. It does not require the positive disclosure of all the information the supplier may have about the assets or services, but only of information which is relevant in assessing the quality and performance and which the other party can reasonably expect to be given. It is a disclosure provision in the sense that the supplier can usually not be reasonably expected to provide information that it neither has nor ought to have. However, where the supplier has such information, it must be disclosed in order to avoid any subsequent liability for supplying assets or services not in conformity with the contract.

The information duty imposed by this Article is limited in two respects. Firstly, the duty to disclose is only imposed on businesses. Secondly, the subject matter of the contract to be concluded by the business must be the supply of goods, other assets or services to another person. Consequently, for other types of contracts (e.g. partnership agreements), different and even stricter disclosure rules may apply. The status of the other person, i.e. the recipient, is relevant for determining how the “reasonable expectations” test is concretised. If the other party is not a business, the “normal standards of quality and performance” test applies (paragraph 1). If, however, the other party is also a business, the less strict “gross deviation from good commercial practice” test is applicable (paragraph 2).

B. Normal standards of quality and performance

If the other party to the contract is not a business, the starting point for establishing the information to be disclosed is the "standards of quality and performance which would be normal in the circumstances of the case" (paragraph 1). If there is no information that would indicate that the goods, other assets or services would deviate from this standard, then there will be no further duty to disclose information.

> Illustration 1
> Business A is the seller of a car, and B is the buyer. There are no problems with the car and it is of the quality normal for the type and make of car, and performs as normal. There is no duty under this Article on the seller to disclose any information.

However, if the business supplying the goods, other assets or services has information that the quality or performance of the goods or services to be provided will fall below the normal standard, then there is a duty to disclose this information to the other party.

> Illustration 2
> Business A is the seller of a car, and B is the buyer. A is aware that there is a problem with this car's engine when the car is driven for short distances only. This information would affect the level of quality and performance B could reasonably expect of a car of this type and make. A has a duty to disclose this information.

Information relevant in this context often relates to sub-normal standards of quality of performance. However, other information concerning what is to be supplied may be relevant as well. If, for example, the supplier knows that goods cannot be used for a particular purpose mentioned by the buyer, the buyer can reasonably expect to be informed about the uselessness of the goods for this purpose.

> Illustration 3
> Business A is the seller of a car, and B is the buyer. There are no problems with the car and it is of the quality normal for the type and make of car, and performs as normal. However, it is the previous season's model, and a new model is about to replace the model of the car to be sold within the next few days. If A knows this it must disclose this fact to the buyer.

Legal requirements related to the subject matter of the contract may be as relevant as physical ones. If the seller knows that the buyer is not allowed by law to use the goods in the way the buyer plans to do, and the seller is aware of these plans, the seller must inform the buyer of the legal obstacles.

> Illustration 4
> Business A is selling premises of a size suitable for a small shop to B. A knows that B plans to use them for a shop and also knows that according to municipal legislation the premises cannot be used for shop keeping. A should inform the buyer of this fact.

C. Deviation from good commercial practice

If the other party to the contract is also a business, the "reasonable expectations" test is modified. In this case, the test to be applied when assessing what information has to be provided is whether the failure to provide the information would deviate from good commercial practice. The reason for this modification is that in business to business relationships there are fewer pre-contractual disclosure duties than in business to consumer relationships. The standard of good commercial practice is also used in determining pre-contractual information duties applicable to commercial agency, franchise and distributorship agreements cf. IV.E.–2:101 (Pre-contractual information duty). A related (yet less strict) standard is used for assessing the unfairness of standard terms in a contract between business parties under II.–9:405 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between businesses). According to this provision a term is considered unfair if it "grossly deviates from good commercial practice, contrary to good faith and fair dealing".

D. Relationship to other provisions

This Article only deals with duties to provide information. False and misleading information is not dealt with in this context, cf. paragraph (1) of the following Article and II.–7:201 (Mistake) and II.–7:205 (Fraud).

The Article ties in with the provisions on non-conformity of goods as expressed e.g. in Book IV.A, Chapter 2, Section 3 (Conformity of the goods) and in the Consumer Sales Directive 1999/44/EG. As explained above, it is generally the case that a seller of goods who is aware of matters rendering goods not in conformity with the contract can make the buyer aware of these and thereby avoid liability for failure to perform the contractual obligation to ensure that the goods conform with the contract (see, in particular, IV.A.–2:307 (Buyer's knowledge of lack of conformity). There is therefore already an incentive for the seller to make such a disclosure. The present Article restates this position as a disclosure duty which applies to suppliers of goods, other assets or services.

NOTES

1. There is in ESTONIAN law no such specific provision as the present article. However, different provisions form the basis for similar duties. LOA § 14(2) creates a general pre-contractual duty to inform the other party of all circumstances the other person can reasonably expect, i.e. with regard to which the other party has, based on the purpose of the contract, an identifiable essential interest. If such circumstances directly concern the subject matter of the contract, LOA § 218(4) creates an incentive for the seller to make a disclosure as the seller is not liable for any lack of conformity of a thing if the purchaser was or ought to have been aware of the lack of conformity upon entry into the contract. Additionally, LOA § 221(1) 2) provides that a purchaser may rely on the lack of conformity regardless of the purchaser's failure to examine a thing or give notification of the lack of conformity on time if the seller is aware or ought to be aware of the lack of conformity or the circumstances related to it and does not disclose such information to the purchaser (see LOA § 645(1) and (2) respectively for service contracts). In relation to consumers, a seller or a service provider should disclose information according to ConsProtA §§ 4-8.
2. In SLOVAKIA, generally the doctrine of mistake (CC § 49a) would apply to situations where a supplier fails to provide necessary information to the other party when entering into contract, if the mistake was caused or known by the supplier. This duty is stressed in business to consumer relations. The act of the trader is considered misleading also in the event of not disclosing a variety of information (see ConsProtA

§ 5), which is illicit. There is no express test of reasonable expectations of the consumer which underlies the information to be provided regarding characteristics of the goods or services (the test uses only the notion of the "ordinary quality" of goods – see ConsProtA § 2(k)). This duty is based on several provisions e.g. mistake (CC § 49a), consumer sales law (CC § 617), liability for defects (CC §§ 499, 596, 597), consumer protection and unfair commercial practices (ConsProtA §§ 5, 7 et seq., 11 et seq.). The principle of fair trade practices pursuant to Ccom § 265, as a general principle governing commercial legal relations, together with the doctrine of mistake, could similarly be taken into account, as there are no specific information duties imposed on businesses in business to business contracts.

3. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 205(3) parties must cooperate during the conclusion of a contract and respect each other's rightful interests. Parties must inform each other regarding all essential circumstances in relation to the proposed contract before the contract is concluded.

4. Under BULGARIAN law, there are two related provisions. The first one is the classical rule of LOA art. 12 (1950) – "in the negotiation and conclusion of contracts parties have to act according to good faith.". The second one is ConsProtA arts. 4 and 5 which concerns the duties of a business towards a consumer on the conclusion of sales and services contracts.

II.–3:102: Specific duties for businesses marketing to consumers

(1) Where a business is marketing goods, other assets or services to a consumer, the business has a duty not to give misleading information. Information is misleading if it misrepresents or omits material facts which the average consumer could expect to be given for an informed decision on whether to take steps towards the conclusion of a contract. In assessing what an average consumer could expect to be given, account is to be taken of all the circumstances and of the limitations of the communication medium employed.

(2) Where a business uses a commercial communication which gives the impression to consumers that it contains all the relevant information necessary to make a decision about concluding a contract, the business has a duty to ensure that the communication in fact contains all the relevant information. Where it is not already apparent from the context of the commercial communication, the information to be provided comprises:

(a) the main characteristics of the goods, other assets or services, the identity and address, if relevant, of the business, the price, and any available right of withdrawal;
(b) peculiarities related to payment, delivery, performance and complaint handling, if they depart from the requirements of professional diligence; and
(c) the language to be used for communications between the parties after the conclusion of the contract, if this differs from the language of the commercial communication.

(3) A duty to provide information under this Article is not fulfilled unless all the information to be provided is provided in the same language.

COMMENTS

A. General scope

This Article imposes specific information duties on businesses marketing goods, other assets or services. Its scope deviates in two respects from the scope of II.–3:101 (Duty to disclose information about goods, other assets and services). Firstly, the duties under the present Article only apply to relations between businesses and consumers. Secondly, the duties arise only in the context of the marketing of goods, other assets or services.

Paragraph (1) imposes a duty not to give misleading information when goods, other assets or services are marketed to consumers. It is aimed in particular at "bait" advertising designed to lure customers into a store with misleading information about bargains on offer.

Paragraph (2) contains a "completeness rule" for commercial communication (e.g. advertising and marketing information), which seeks to improve the rather unclear model of Art. 7 paragraph (4) of the Unfair Commercial Practices Directive 2005/29/EC. In a situation where a business uses a commercial communication to draw the availability of particular assets or services to the consumer's attention, and the communication itself gives the impression to consumers that it contains all the relevant information necessary to make a decision about concluding a contract, the commercial communication must in fact provide all the relevant information.

In such circumstances, some information will have to be given, provided that this is not already apparent from the communication. However, it does not apply to general marketing activities by a business where it is clear that a consumer may have to take additional steps before it will be possible to acquire the assets or services, such as visiting a shop or a web-site.

B. Duty not to give misleading information

Paragraph (1) imposes a duty on businesses not to give misleading information in the marketing of goods, other assets or services to consumers. It is based on Art. 7(1) of the Unfair Commercial Practices Directive 2005/29/EC. Information is misleading for this purpose if it misrepresents or omits material facts which the average consumer could expect to be given for an informed decision on whether to take steps towards the conclusion of a contract. In assessing what an average consumer could expect to be given, account is to be taken of all the circumstances and of the limitations of the communication medium employed

As this provision is a consumer protection provision related to marketing, its formulation has to be in more general terms (using the notion of the average consumer) than the more individual "reasonable expectations" mentioned in II.–3:101 (Duty to disclose information about goods, other assets and services) paragraph (1). In many cases the requirements of both Articles are similar. However, this Article indicates that in consumer relationships the required information should, to the extent prescribed by the Article, have been provided in the marketing of the goods.

> Illustration 1
> Business X markets 'antique' decoration telephones to consumers. Both II.–3:101 (Duty to disclose information about goods, other assets and services) paragraph (1) and paragraph (1) of the present Article require that X should provide information about the material fact that connecting these telephones to the telephone network is not allowed. According to paragraph (1) of the present Article, however, X should have provided this information in its marketing even before entering into any communication with a particular potential buyer.

In addition, the scope of this Article is broader in the sense that it covers information other than just information concerning the assets or services to be provided.

The notion of the "average consumer" was developed in the case law of the European Court of Justice, primarily in the context of Art. 28 EC (free movement of goods) and misleading advertising (cf. e.g., C-210/96 – Gut Springenheide GmbH and Rudolf Tusky v Oberkreisdirektor des Kreises Steinfurt – Amt für Lebensmittelüberwachung, C-220/98 – Estee Lauder Cosmetics GmbH & Co. OHG v Lancaster Group GmbH and C-44/01 – Pippig Augenoptik GmbH & Co. KG v Hartlauer Handelsgesellschaft GmbH) and is also defined in the Preamble to the Unfair Commercial Practices Directive 2005/29/EC, Recital 18.

The duty under the present Article is subject to two limitations. First, in assessing what an average consumer could expect to be given, account is to be taken of all the circumstances and of the limitations of the communication medium employed. Regard must be had to the whole context in which the information might be provided. The circumstances and context may therefore determine which information is material, and how detailed the information to be provided must be. Secondly, the limitations of the communication medium employed are relevant. Thus, where the business is communicating with the consumer by telephone, it may be possible to provide fewer items of information than when using a website, or e-mail communication.

C. Completeness rule

Paragraph (2) only covers the situation where the business uses a commercial communication which gives the impression to consumers that it contains all the relevant information necessary to make a decision about concluding a contract. In such a case, the commercial communication must in fact contain all the relevant information. In addition, more concrete requirements on the content of the information can be given.

The information that has to be made available covers the main characteristics of the assets or services, the address and identity of the business, and the price. The consumer's right of withdrawal, where available according to the law, must also be included in this. In most commercial communications, this information will already be provided, and this paragraph would not impose any additional duties on a business.

In addition, if the practices of the business with regard to payment, delivery, performance and complaint handling depart from the requirements of professional diligence, then this must also be stated. The term "professional diligence", which is derived from Art. 2(h) of the Unfair Commercial Practices Directive 2005/29/EC, relates to the standard of special skill and care which a business may reasonably be expected to exercise, measured with reference to honest market practice in the particular business sector, and good faith. In some situations, a business may offer a level of complaint handling which goes beyond this basic standard. Where this is the case, it is likely that a business would advertise this fact as part of its overall marketing strategy, and such information would therefore already be provided.

Paragraph (2) does not exclude the simultaneous application of paragraph (1), if its requirements are not fulfilled.

D. Sanctions for breach of information duties

The provision is derived from unfair commercial practices law (cf. Art. 7 Unfair Commercial Practices Directive 2005/29/EC), but it seems to have a useful role to play within the contract law framework as well. As it will be at least partially 'consumed' by II.–3:101 (Duty to disclose information about goods, other assets and services) in a situation when a contract is concluded, it will have its main role as a basis for damages under II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (2). However, as the information requirements according to this Article in some aspects go further than those of II.–3:101 (Duty to disclose information about goods, other assets and services), it may be used as a basis for contractual claims according to II.–3:109 paragraph (3) as well.

Illustration 2
Business X, which markets 'antique' decoration telephones, omits in its marketing to inform consumers of the material fact that to connect these telephones to the telephone network is not allowed. Consumers who run up travel expenses for visiting X's shop because of the marketing can claim damages for such costs under II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (2), even though they do not conclude any contract, having learnt about this feature.

NOTES

1. There is no specific comparable provision in ESTONIAN law. See note to Article II.–3:101.
2. In SLOVAKIA, generally, the binding effect of publicly presented statements regarding the characteristics of goods or services is provided for in CC § 496. The prohibition of omitting to provide material information is referred to in ConsProtA § 8 cl. 4 (in connection with other provisions of that paragraph), which implements Art. 7(1) of the Unfair Commercial Practices Directive respectively. The situation in paragraph (2) is regulated by ConsProtA § 8 cl. 6 in connection with other provisions of ConsProtA § 8. Specific information requirements in relation to commercial communication including advertising or marketing are to be found in separate acts (see ConsProtA § 8 cl. 7 and fn 15 thereof).
3. The respective rules in BULGARIAN law are ConsProtA arts. 4–8. ConsProtA arts. 9(1), 13(3), 68g, pp. 8, 153 (the latter concerns specially the time-sharing contract) set obligations regarding the language of contracts. According to the general civil law, (abuse of language not known or familiar to one of the contracting parties can lead to nullity because of lack of consent (LOA art. 26(2)).

II.–3:103: Duty to provide information when concluding contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage

(1) In the case of transactions that place the consumer at a significant informational disadvantage because of the technical medium used for contracting, the physical distance between business and consumer, or the nature of the transaction, the business has a duty, as appropriate in the circumstances, to provide clear information about the main characteristics of any goods, other assets or services to be supplied, the price, the address and identity of the business with which the consumer is transacting, the terms of the contract, the rights and obligations of both contracting parties, and any available right of withdrawal or redress procedures. This information must be provided a reasonable time before the conclusion of the contract. The information on the right of withdrawal must, as appropriate in the circumstances, also be adequate in the sense of II.–5:104 (Adequate information on the right to withdrawal).

(2) Where more specific information duties are provided for specific situations, these take precedence over the general information duty under paragraph (1).

(3) The business bears the burden of proof that it has provided the information required by this Article.

COMMENTS

A. General idea and scope

This Article sets out, in general form, three key situations in which particular pre-contractual information duties are imposed on a business dealing with a consumer, because the consumer is placed at a significant informational disadvantage. Such situations may be based on (i) the technical medium used for entering into a contract; (ii) the physical distance between the consumer and the business, or (iii) the nature of the particular transaction.

B. Significant informational disadvantage

The Article does not impose a general duty to disclose information before a contract is concluded between a business and a consumer. Instead, the circumstances are limited to those where the consumer is at a significant informational disadvantage. It is generally the case that consumers are subject to an informational disadvantage when dealing with a business, because the business will generally know more about the goods or services it provides. It will also have the benefit of experience from repeat transactions, whereas a consumer will often engage in the transaction once only. The scope of this Article is therefore restricted by requiring that the informational disadvantage has to be significant.

The Article is further limited by linking the significant informational disadvantage to the technical medium used for entering into a contract; the physical distance between business and consumer and the nature of the transaction. Therefore, it is not merely the existence of the significant informational disadvantage that activates the duty to provide information before a contract is made, but the fact that this disadvantage is caused by one (or more) of the three factors mentioned. Thus, buying goods over the internet creates a significant informational disadvantage because the consumer is unable to examine the goods (or a sample or representative model). The same applies where a consumer orders goods by telephone. Distance selling and e-commerce are therefore paradigm situations.

Illustration 1
S runs an on-line electronics store. C wishes to buy a washing machine and places an order over the internet. As C cannot inspect the washing machine before deciding to purchase, he is placed at a significant informational disadvantage. S is therefore required to provide information about the main characteristics of the washing machine, its price, including the cost of delivery, and other relevant information (including the existence of a right of withdrawal).

The nature of the transaction might also cause a significant informational imbalance; this will particularly be so in the case of high-value low-frequency transactions. An example is a contract for a timeshare, which is complex and requires the provision of information before a consumer decides to enter into a transaction. If, however, the informational disadvantage is based on the inexperience of the consumer rather than on the complexity of the transaction, the Article does not impose an information duty on the business.

Illustration 2
C who knows very little about personal computers has gone to S's store to purchase a new laptop. C is at a significant informational disadvantage because she has very little information about computers. However, the disadvantage is not caused by the technical medium used, nor is there a physical distance between C and S, nor is the nature of the transaction itself the cause of the disadvantage. Consequently, there is no duty on S to provide information under this Article.

C. Categories of information

The Article lists a number of categories of information. These are expressed in very general terms, but they reflect the different items of information that have been required by the existing rules on pre-contractual information disclosure in the acquis communautaire. This generalisation is inspired by the provisions of the Unfair Commercial Practices Directive 2005/29/EC, where broad general categories similar to the ones listed in this Article are used. Existing legislation which requires the disclosure of information in particular situations frequently contains more detailed requirements. It is generally possible to group these requirements under the headings provided by the categories listed in this Article. For example, the present Article refers to the "main characteristics" of the goods, other assets or services. Under the Timeshare Directive 1994/47/EC, a business is required to provide a long list of particulars about the property subject to the timeshare contract. Many of these could be classed as relating to the main characteristics of the service provided. Paragraph (1) is therefore not intended to replace these more detailed catalogues of information, but to provide a broad statement of the instances when information duties may be imposed, and what sort of information will be required.

The phrase "rights and obligations of both contracting parties" may include obligations regarding the means of delivery. Also, where there are no "redress procedures" available, it may be desirable to at least provide an address to which a consumer may send a complaint.

The Article contains the qualification that the business must provide the relevant information "as appropriate in the circumstances". This emphasises that it may not always be appropriate to provide information under all of the headings listed in the Article. Alternatively, some of the information may be obvious and need not be provided separately.

D. Time and form of information

The Article requires the business to provide the information in reasonable time before the conclusion of the contract. In order to effectively compensate the informational disadvantage addressed the consumer must be able to assess the relevance of the information provided for the decision whether or not to conclude the contract. How much time the consumer needs for evaluating the information provided by the business depends in particular on the nature of the product.

With regard to the information on the right of withdrawal, the last sentence of this Article stipulates that such information must also be adequate in the sense of II.–5:104 (Adequate information on the right to withdraw). Consequently, the existence of a right to withdraw has to be appropriately brought to the consumer's attention and must provide, in textual form on a durable medium and in clear and comprehensible language, information about how the right may be exercised, the withdrawal period, and the name and address of the person to whom the withdrawal is to be communicated.

The formal requirements applicable to the other information items mentioned are set out in II.–3:106 (Clarity and form of information) paragraph (1).

E. Relation to more specific information duties

Paragraph (2) reflects the fact that paragraph (1) is a generalisation, and that it will be necessary to spell out the items of information that should be provided in the context of specific contracts in more detail, such as package travel or timeshare, or in particular, contracting situations, such as distance or doorstep selling. Paragraph (2) confirms that where rules have been adopted for specific contracts, these rules apply instead and no recourse should be allowed to paragraph (1) to create additional information duties.

NOTES

1. There is no specific comparable provision in ESTONIAN law (see also note to II.–3:101). However, detailed regulation can be found covering information duties in case of distance contracts (LOA § 54(1)), distance selling of financial services LOA § 54(1^1)) and contracts entered into through computer networks (LOA § 62^1, see also note to Article II.–3:104 (Information duties in real time distance communication).
2. In SLOVAKIA, the general duty to provide information in the sense of the list in Art. 6 of the Unfair Commercial Practices Directive is provided for in ConsProtA § 8 as stated above. These duties are specified with regard to a particular disadvantage of the consumer in specific cases in separate Acts – Distance selling (§ 10 Act No. 108/2000 on Consumer Protection in Doorstep Selling and in Distance Selling as amended) – here regulation of the duty to inform about the withdrawal period proved necessary (see amendment No. 118/2006); e-commerce (§§ 4, 5 Act No. 22/2004 on electronic commerce as amended); time-sharing (CC § 55) and others.
3. In BULGARIA no such general rule can be found. The consumer law, however, contains several regulations of the same kind which can be used by way of analogy. These are arts. 48 ff (distance sales), ConsProtA arts. 149 ff (time sharing), consumer credits (ConsCredA), distance financial services contracts (arts. 8 ff of the Distance Financial Services Act 2006) and electronic trade (Electronic Trade Act 2006).

II.–3:104: Information duties in real time distance communication

(1) When initiating real time distance communication with a consumer, a business has a duty to provide at the outset explicit information on its name and the commercial purpose of the contact.

(2) Real time distance communication means direct and immediate communication of such a type that one party can interrupt the other in the course of the communication. It includes telephone and electronic means such as voice over internet protocol and internet related chat, but does not include communication by electronic mail.

(3) The business bears the burden of proof that the consumer has received the information required under paragraph (1).

(4) If a business has failed to comply with the duty under paragraph (1) and a contract has been concluded as a result of the communication, the other party has a right to withdraw from the contract by giving notice to the business within the period specified in II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period).

(5) A business is liable to the consumer for any loss caused by a breach of the duty under paragraph (1).

COMMENTS

A. Background and purpose

This Article is modelled on Art. 4(3) of the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC and Art. 3(3)(a) of the Distance Selling of Financial Services Directive 2002/65/EC which both require businesses to disclose their identity and their commercial purposes when initiating certain kinds of real time distance communication with a consumer. The provision, which has the character of a market practices rule, is designed to ensure that the consumer is warned at the outset of the communication that he or she is engaging in a commercial communication and should assess the statements made by the business with the necessary attention and caution.

It should be noted that II.–3:106 (Clarity and form of information) specifies that a duty to provide information – including the duty established by the present Article – is not fulfilled unless the information is clear and precise, and expressed in plain and intelligible language.

B. Real time distance communication

Paragraph (1) states that the disclosure duty applies when a business initiates "real time distance communication" with a consumer. This term is used neither in the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC nor in the Distance Selling of Financial Services Directive. 2002/65/EC Art. 4(3) of the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC stipulates the duty to disclose the identity and the commercial purpose of the communication only for "telephone communications". The more recent Art. 3(3)(a) of the Distance Selling of Financial Services Directive 2002/65/EC uses the term "voice telephony communications". This wording clarifies that the disclosure rule also applies to electronic means such as voice over internet protocol ("voice over IP"). What both traditional telephones and voice over IP communication have in common is that they involve a direct, immediate and interruptible ("real time") communication between the business and the consumer. Paragraph (2) spells this out and, in order to provide some guidance on the scope of application mentions some technologies covered, and not covered, by this expression.

C. Burden of proof and sanctions

The Article provides two sanctions for breach of the duty.

First, under paragraph (4) the consumer has a right to withdraw from any contract concluded as a result of a failure by the business to comply with the duty. The withdrawal period is the general one laid down in II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period). The effect of this rule is that the consumer who is not told that there is a right to withdraw has a year from the time of conclusion of the contract but a consumer who is told that there is a right to withdraw (on any ground) has 14 days from that notification. It should be noted that, in the vast majority of cases, the withdrawal right granted in paragraph (4) does not add anything to the rights of the consumer, as there will in any event be a withdrawal right under II.–5:201 (Contracts negotiated away from business premises). Thus, paragraph (4) is just a gap filling sanction for those cases where the consumer has no right of withdrawal under II.–5:201 (Contracts negotiated away from business premises) because of the exceptions set out in paragraphs (2) and (3) of that Article.

Secondly, under paragraph (5) the business is liable for any loss caused to the consumer by a breach of the duty.

In order to make sure that the sanction for a violation of the disclosure rule is "effective, proportional and dissuasive" – as required e.g. by Art. 11 of the Distance Selling of Financial Services Directive 2002/65/EC – paragraph (3) states that the business bears the burden of proof that the consumer received the information required under this Article.

NOTES

1. ESTONIAN LOA § 54(2) sent. 2 is similar to paragraph (1) of the present Article, but is limited to "telephone communication" only.
2. The SLOVAK law does not specify the "distance communication over telephone" in case of distance selling of financial services pursuant to § 4 cl. 3 of the Act No. 266/2005 on Consumer Protection in distance financial services as amended, nor the "offer over telephone" in distance selling cases (§ 10 cl. 2 Act No. 108/2000 on Consumer Protection in Doorstep Selling and in Distance Selling as amended). In spite of that, the notion and its resulting information duties as in this Art., could apparently be used also for VoIP. Internet related chat would fall under the general regime of information duties in distance communication (§ 10 cl. 1 Act No. 108/2000 as amended, resp. § 4 ods. 1 et seq. Act No. 266/2005 as amended). The sanctions for breaching these duties are to be found in separate acts (see the fn. 23 resp. 25 of the above Acts).
3. Several regulations in the sense of this article of the DCFR are contained in BULGARIAN law in arts. 4 and 5 of the Electronic Trade Act 2006. However, the questions of the burden of proof and of the withdrawal are regulated in the respective general texts of the ConsProtA (arts. 61, 107, 146(4) and 47, 55, 154).

II.–3:105: Formation by electronic means

(1) If a contract is to be concluded by electronic means and without individual communication, a business has a duty to provide information about the following matters before the other party makes or accepts an offer:

(a) the technical steps to be taken in order to conclude the contract;
(b) whether or not a contract document will be filed by the business and whether it will be accessible;
(c) the technical means for identifying and correcting input errors before the other party makes or accepts an offer;
(d) the languages offered for the conclusion of the contract;
(e) any contract terms used.

(2) The business has a duty to ensure that the contract terms referred to in paragraph (1)(e) are available in textual form.

(3) If a business has failed to comply with the duty under paragraph (1) and a contract has been concluded in the circumstances there stated, the other party has a right to withdraw from the contract by giving notice to the business within the period specified in II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period).

(4) A business is liable to the consumer for any loss caused by a breach of the duty under paragraph (1).

COMMENTS

A. General scope

This Article contains a list of information items necessary for the smooth conclusion of contracts by electronic means. The scope of the Article is limited in two respects. First, the information duties are imposed only on businesses (irrespective of the status of the other party). Secondly, the information duties do not apply to contracts concluded by exchange of electronic mail or other equivalent individual communications.

It should again be noted that II.–3:106 (Clarity and form of information) specifies that a duty to provide information – including the duty established by the present Article – is not fulfilled unless the information is clear and precise, and expressed in plain and intelligible language.

B. Information requirements

The Article is broadly modelled on art. 10 of the E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC. However, there are some notable deviations from the model. While art. 10(1)(c) of the E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC requires information about technical means for identifying and correcting input errors "prior to the placing of the order", under sub-paragraph (c) the information has to be given "before the other party makes or accepts an offer". This change allows for the application of the rule without taking a position as to how the conclusion of the contract takes place, i.e. which party makes or accepts the offer.

Unlike art. 10(2) E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC, the wording of this Article does not stipulate a duty of the business to indicate the relevant codes of conduct to which it has subscribed. An express reference to codes of conduct has been omitted in this Article mainly for two reasons. First, the Member States' experience with art. 10(2) E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC does not show clearly that the duty to indicate relevant codes of conduct does play an important role in legal practice across the European Union. Second, in those cases in which the specific provisions of a code of conduct are of importance for the contractual relationship, one can expect that these provisions will be referred to or even included in the contract itself. Consequently, in those cases reference to those terms will be covered by the disclosure duty provided by sub-paragraph (e).

C. Sanctions for breach of information duties

See the Comments to the preceding Article.

NOTES

1. Paragraph (1) corresponds to LOA § 62^1(2) in ESTONIAN law. Paragraph (2) corresponds to LOA § 62^1(5) in Estonian law.
2. The SLOVAK provision of § 5 (esp. cl. 3) Act No. 22/2004 on electronic commerce as amended, uses the wording of the E-Commerce Directive and thus refers to the present Article. There is a duty to reveal a code of conduct only if an applicable one for such services exists (§ 5 cl. 5 (a)).
3. This article of the DCFR corresponds almost literally to the BULGARIAN Electronic Trade Act 2006.

II.–3:106: Clarity and form of information

(1) A duty to provide information imposed on a business under this Chapter is not fulfilled unless the requirements of this Article are satisfied.

(2) The information must be clear and precise, and expressed in plain and intelligible language.

(3) Where rules for specific contracts require information to be provided on a durable medium or in another particular form it must be provided in that way.

(4) In the case of contracts between a business and a consumer concluded at a distance, information about the main characteristics of any goods, other assets or services to be supplied, the price, the address and identity of the business with which the consumer is transacting, the terms of the contract, the rights and obligations of both contracting parties, and any available redress procedures, as may be appropriate in the particular case, must be confirmed in textual form on a durable medium at the time of conclusion of the contract. The information on the right of withdrawal must also be adequate in the sense of II.–5:104 (Adequate information on the right to withdraw).

COMMENTS

A. Meaning and purpose

This Article complements the other provisions in this Chapter by explaining how information required elsewhere has to be provided. It contains requirements with regard to both the clarity and the form of information.

B. Clarity of information

According to paragraph (2) all pre-contractual information supplied by a business under Book II, Chapter 3 must be clear and precise. This means that the information should not be ambiguous, and must, reasonably, avoid leaving room for different interpretations. In addition, the language used must be plain and intelligible. This means that technical language should be avoided as much as possible. Where such language has to be used, it should be explained adequately.

Illustration

Company S operates a website for selling laptops on-line. It is required (under II.–3:105 (Formation by electronic means)) to provide a consumer with certain items of information. In giving this information, S needs to ensure that the information is clear and precise. For example, a statement about the cost of supplying a laptop along the lines of "€499.99, with additional tax and delivery charges as notified in our standard terms and conditions" is insufficiently clear and precise, whereas a statement that supplying the laptop "costs €549.99 (including all taxes and delivery costs)" would be acceptable.

C. Form of information

Paragraph (3) recognises that there may be instances where such information has to be provided on a durable medium or in another particular form. It is not a general requirement that information always has to be provided in a particular form, but this may be needed for specific contracts. Paragraph (4) provides an example of such a rule stipulating that specific information items required for distance contracts need to be confirmed in textual form on a durable medium at the time of the conclusion of the contract.

D. Sanctions for breach of form requirements

The effect of paragraph (1) is that failure to satisfy particular form requirements for an information duty will amount to a breach of the duty. However, the consequences of this particular type of breach may nevertheless be different for damages than the consequences of a failure to provide information. This is because of the causation requirement – the loss for which damages are claimed must have been caused by the incorrect or missing information, or the fact that information was not provided in the correct form. But the losses caused by having information in an incorrect form may not be the same as the losses caused by not having received the information in question at all.

It must also be noted that there may be additional consequences, because a failure to observe the correct form may trigger additional rights, such as the right to withdraw from the contract or to terminate the contractual relationship.

NOTES

1. In ESTONIA there is no general provision comparable to paragraph (2), but the principle that information duties are not fulfilled unless the information is clear and precise, and expressed in plain and intelligible language is generally supported (e.g. explicitly for distance contracts see LOA § 54(2)). Paragraph (2), LOA § 54(1) provides for a detailed regulation on information duties in the case of distance contracts with consumers. Required information should be confirmed in writing or by means of any other durable data medium accessible by the consumer not later than during the time of the performance of the contract or, in the case of movables, not later than at the time of delivery (LOA § 55). As the consequences of failure to observe requirements of LOA § 55 (see previous paragraph of the note), the time-limit for the consumer to exercise the right of withdrawal from the distance contract will be postponed up to 3 months from conclusion of a contract (LOA § 56(2)). Additionally, a consumer may, on general grounds, claim compensation for damage which occurred due to the non-performance of the obligation (LOA § 115(1)).
2. In SLOVAKIA, the need of clarity, preciseness or unambiguity of information provided, is reiterated in several acts: ConsProtA § 5 cl. 1 and § 11 et seq., § 4 cl. 5 Act No. 22/2004 on electronic commerce as amended, § 4 cl. 2 Act No. 266/2005 on Consumer Protection in distance financial services as amended, CC § 56 cl. 1. Specific forms of information, in line with the directives' provisions, are necessary in certain situations. For example, (in line with the present Art. para. (3)), there is a requirement of a written form of information in distance selling pursuant to § 10 cl. 3 and 4 Act No. 108/2000 on Consumer Protection in Doorstep Selling and in Distance Selling as amended. The effect of paragraph (4) would be the same, as there are no special provisions on remedies for non-justification of the information duty's form (see e.g. § 12 cl. 1 Act No. 108/2000 as amended).
3. In BULGARIA duties in relation to the clarity and preciseness of information are contained in several texts of the consumer law (business to consumer – relations) – e.g. BULGARIAN ConsProtA arts. 5, 9, 16, 24, 25, 52, 59, 68f, 119, 145.

II.–3:107: Information about price and additional charges

Where under this Chapter a business has a duty to provide information about price, the duty is not fulfilled unless what is provided:

(a) includes information about any deposits payable, delivery charges and any additional taxes and duties where these may be indicated separately;

(b) if an exact price cannot be indicated, gives such information on the basis for the calculation as will enable the consumer to verify the price; and

(c) if the price is not payable in one sum, includes information about the payment schedule.

II.–3:108: Information about address and identity of business

(1) Where under this Chapter a business has a duty to provide information about its address and identity, the duty is not fulfilled unless the information includes:

(a) the name of the business;

(b) any trading names relevant to the contract in question;

(c) the registration number in any official register, and the name of that register;

(d) the geographical address of the business;

(e) contact details;

(f) where the business has a representative in the consumer's [Member] state of residence, the address and identity of that representative;

(g) where the activity of the business is subject to an authorisation scheme, the particulars of the relevant supervisory authority; and

(h) where the business exercises an activity which is subject to VAT, the relevant VAT identification number.

(2) For the purpose of II.–3:103 (Duty to provide information when concluding contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage), the address and identity of the business include only the information indicated in (1) (a), (c), (d) and (e).

II.–3:109: Remedies for breach of information duties

(1) If a business has a duty under II.–3:103 (Duty to provide information when concluding contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage) to provide information to a consumer before the conclusion of a contract from which the consumer has the right to withdraw, the withdrawal period does not commence until all this information has been provided. Regardless of this, the right of withdrawal lapses after one year from the time of the conclusion of the contract.

(2) If a business has failed to comply with any duty imposed by the preceding Articles of this Section and a contract has been concluded, the business has such obligations under the contract as the other party has reasonably expected as a consequence of the absence or incorrectness of the information. Remedies provided under Book III, Chapter 3 apply to non-performance of these obligations.

(3) Whether or not a contract is concluded, a business which has failed to comply with any duty imposed by the preceding Articles of this Section is liable for any loss caused to the other party to the transaction by such failure. This paragraph does not apply to the extent that a remedy is available for non-performance of a contractual obligation under the preceding paragraph.

(4) The remedies provided under this Article are without prejudice to any remedy which may be available under II.–7:201 (Mistake).

(5) In relations between a business and a consumer the parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of remedies

This Article provides for several categories of remedies for breach of information duties stated in Book II, Chapter 3, Section 1. The first remedy, which is only available for violations of II.–3:103 (Duty to provide information when concluding a contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage), is a delay in the commencement of the period for the exercise of an existing right to withdraw (paragraph (1)). Secondly, the failure to fulfil any duty under this Section of this Chapter may also affect the substance of the obligations assumed under the contract and may result in the incorrect performance or non-performance of contractual obligations (paragraph (2)). The third remedy, which also applies to all information duties in this Section, is a right to damages for loss caused by the failure to inform (paragraph (3)). Finally, it is made clear by paragraph (4) that remedies for mistake are not affected. Under II.–7:201 (Mistake) paragraph (1)(b)(iii) a party may be able to avoid a contract for mistake if the other party caused the contract to be concluded in error by failing to comply with a pre-contractual information duty.

B. Prolongation of the right to withdraw

Paragraph (1) is based on several provisions in the Acquis communautaire that provide for the prolongation of an existing right of withdrawal in case of a violation of certain information duties (cf. Art. 5 Doorstep Selling Directive 1985/577/EEC, Art. 5(1) Timeshare Directive 1994/47/EC, Art. 6 Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC and Art. 6(1) Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC). Reflecting these provisions, paragraph (1) of this Article states that in case of a violation of the information duty under II.–3:103 (Duty to provide information when concluding contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage) the period for the exercise of an existing withdrawal right does not commence until all the information required has been provided.

One of the more thorny issues in this context is whether the commencement of the withdrawal period is extended indefinitely or whether there should be a long-stop for extending the withdrawal period. Case law before the ECJ had established that the prolongation of the withdrawal period because of a violation of information duties under certain Directives which do not provide for a clear long-stop may be unrestricted (C-481/99 – Heininger v. Bayerische Hypotheken- und Wechselbank). However, the second sentence of paragraph (1) provides for such a long-stop stating that the right of withdrawal lapses after one year from the time of the conclusion of the contract.

C. Consequences for the substance of the contract

Paragraph (2) reflects the general idea that information available in the pre-contractual context can have a bearing on the substance of a contract. Thus, if a contract has been concluded, failure to provide the required pre-contractual information, or to use the correct form, can affect the substance of the obligations assumed under the contract, and may result in the non-performance of contractual obligations.

D. Right to damages

Paragraph (3) deals with the issue of damages. A right to damages is available regardless of whether or not a contract is concluded. Thus, if the information provided by one party was incomplete and has caused the consumer to decide not to conclude a contract at all, the other party may still have a right to damages, although in these circumstances damages could not be awarded for non-performance of a contractual obligation. The question of damages is further considered in II.–3:501 (Liability for damages).

E. Relation to other provisions

The remedies available for breach of pre-contractual information duties are partially found in other parts of contract law, related both to business-to-consumer relations as well as to other contractual relationships. In some situations an omission to give information can be misleading in a way that makes the general provisions on validity of contracts or on unfair contract terms applicable. Failure to comply with the duties in this Section may have consequences within existing validity rules, e.g. when establishing whether there has been legal intention, fraud, etc., although those consequences may not amount to remedies in the strict sense.

In other situations the omission can lead to such a difference between the other party's expectations and the actual performance that remedies for non-performance of contractual obligations may be available. In particular, if the omission to provide information leads to a situation in which the other party concludes a contract misinformed about some relevant fact, this party in a contract of sale has the ordinary remedies for lack of conformity.

NOTES

1. If there is a failure to observe the requirements of ESTONIAN LOA § 55 or LOA § 54^1 in case of financial services, the commencement of the withdrawal period for the consumer distance contract is extended, but the consumer may withdraw from the contract within three months as of the date on which the consumer receives the goods or, in the case of services, as of the date of entry into the contract (LOA § 56(2)). If required information is communicated in the required form during this three-month term, the consumer may withdraw from the contract within the term initially foreseen, i.e. 14 days in case of distant contracts. The right to withdraw from a contract for services expires if the supplier has commenced the service before the expiry of the term for withdrawal with the consent or on the initiative of the consumer (LOA § 56(2) sent. 4). Similarly to paragraph (3), non-performance of the obligation to inform may give grounds to claim for compensation of damage irrespective of whether parties concluded a contract (LOA § 115(1)) or not (LOA § 115(1) in conjunction with § 14(2)) There is no specific provision comparable to paragraph (2) in ESTONIAN law. However, the same principle may be drawn from several provisions. LOA § 217(2) 6) generally provides that a thing does not conform to a contract if, in a consumer sale, the thing does not possess the quality usual for that type of thing which the purchaser may have reasonably expected based on the nature of the thing and considering the statements made publicly with respect to particular characteristics of the thing by the seller, producer or previous seller of the thing or by another retailer, in particular in the advertising of the thing or on labels. Further, LOA § 221(1) 2) provides that a purchaser may rely on the lack of conformity regardless of the purchaser's failure to examine a thing or give notification of the lack of conformity of the thing on time if the seller is aware or ought to be aware of the lack of conformity of the thing or the circumstances related to it and does not disclose such information to the purchaser (similarly LOA § 645(1) 2) for service contracts). LOA § 101(2) gives general freedom to choose a remedy: in the case of non-performance, the creditor may resort to any legal remedy separately or resort simultaneously to all legal remedies which arise from law or the contract and can be invoked simultaneously unless otherwise provided by law or the contract. However, according to the good faith principle a party may be hindered from declaring the contract void because of a mistake in circumstances related to the subject matter of the contract if remedies for non-performance of the contractual obligations are available and are less detrimental to the other party (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus II, Pref. to §§ 217-228, no. 3.1.1.). Similarly to paragraph (5) of the present Article, LOA §§ 62 and 62^1(7)) state that agreements which derogate from the provisions regulating minimum protection of consumers in case of distance contracts and contracts entered into through computer networks to the detriment of the consumer are void.
2. In SLOVAKIA, the stricter remedies according to paragraph (1) are to be found in separate Acts implementing respective Directives (§ 12 Act No. 108/2000 on Consumer Protection in Doorstep Selling and in Distance Selling as amended, CC § 59 cl. 2, § 5 cl. 1 Act No. 266/2005 on Consumer Protection in distance financial services as amended). The wording of § 8 cl. 1 in connection with § 7 cl. 1 lit. d) Act No. 108/2000 differs from the Art. 5(1) Doorstep Selling Directive and thus could be interpreted as denying the prolongation of the withdrawal period contrary to the requirements of European law. Since there are no special provisions on damages regarding breach of information duties, the general provisions on damages (CC §§ 415 and 420) would apply. Similarly, failure to provide information does not absolve the business from its contractual obligations, but gives rise to additional rights of the consumer (cf. CC § 55 cl. 2, § 12 cl. 3 Act No. 108/2000 as amended). If the requirements of the doctrine of mistake under CC § 49a are met, the contract would be voidable by the misled party (cf. CC § 40a).

3. The BULGARIAN ConsProtA art. 68f(4) contains such obligations for a business only in the field of consumer sales. Remedies for non-compliance with the respective requirements are not provided. So they remain for the time being a lex imperfecta. The last paragraph of the same article uses a very unsatisfactory juridical technique – instead of listing the requirements, the law simply refers to the "requirements of Directives nos. …".

Section 2: Duty to prevent input errors and acknowledge receipt

II.–3:201: Correction of input errors

(1) A business which intends to conclude a contract by making available electronic means without individual communication for concluding it, has a duty to make available to the other party appropriate, effective and accessible technical means for identifying and correcting input errors before the other party makes or accepts an offer.

(2) Where a person concludes a contract in error because of a failure by a business to comply with the duty under paragraph (1) the business is liable for any loss caused to that person by such failure. This is without prejudice to any remedy which may be available under II.–7:201 (Mistake).

(3) In relations between a business and a consumer the parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. Scope

Paragraph (1), which is modelled on Art. 11(2) of the E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC sets up specific technical requirements for enabling an e-commerce customer to identify and correct input errors in the process of concluding a contract. The scope of application of this Article is limited in two respects: Firstly, the duties under paragraph (1) are only imposed on businesses (irrespective of the status of the other party). Secondly, no such duty applies if the contract is concluded by means of individual electronic communication, e.g. e-mail.

Art. 11(2) of the E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC requires that technical means for identifying and correcting input errors have to be provided "prior to the placing of the order". In contrast, the above Article states that such technical means have to be available "before the other party makes or accepts an offer". This change of wording allows for the application of the rule without taking a preconceived position as to how the conclusion of the contract takes place, i.e. which party makes or accepts the offer.

According to paragraph (3), in relations between businesses and consumers, the Article is mandatory in favour of a consumer.

B. Sanctions and relation to other provisions.

The E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC does not provide for a clear sanction for the breach of the duty under its Art. 11 and leaves the determination of sanctions to the Member States. In contrast, paragraph (2) of the present Article states that the business is liable for any loss caused to the other party because of the erroneous conclusion of a contract due to the business's failure to comply with sub-paragraph (1) of this Article. This is without prejudice to any remedy which may be available under II.–7:201 (Mistake). Under II.–7:201 paragraph (1)(b)(iii) a party may be able to avoid a contract for mistake if the other party caused the contract to be concluded in error by failing to comply with a duty to make available a means of correcting input errors.

The Article is complemented by II.–3:105 (Formation by electronic means) paragraph (1)(c) which requires businesses to provide information about the technical means for identifying and correcting input errors.

NOTES

1. ESTONIAN LOA § 62^1(1) is similar to paragraph (1) of the present Article. The principles stated in paragraph (2) can be inferred from LOA § 14(1), LOA § 14(2) and LOA § 115. LOA § 14(1) imposes an obligation to take reasonable account of the other party's interests and rights in the precontractual stage, LOA § 14(2) imposes a general duty to provide information with regard to which the other party has, based on the purpose of the contract, an identifiable essential interest and LOA § 115 enables a party to claim compensation for damage in the case of non-performance of an obligation. As to avoidance for mistake, see note to Article II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (4). According to LOA § 62^1(7), in relations between a business and a consumer the parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of LOA § 62^1(1) (duty to provide technical means for correction of input errors) or derogate from or vary its effects. A standard term which precludes or unreasonably restricts the claims of the other party vis a vis the party supplying the terms or another party, i.e. modifies otherwise available remedies (LOA § 101(2) 2), see also note to II.–3:109 paragraph (4)) to the detriment of the consumer is deemed to be unfair and is therefore void according to the "black list" in LOA § 42(3) 2).
2. The SLOVAK provision of § 5 cl. 3 lit. a) Act No. 22/2004 on electronic commerce as amended, takes the wording of the E-Commerce Directive provision, and similarly does not provide for specific remedies for breach of this duty. Therefore general civil law (CC § 49a – mistake; CC § 420 – damages) prevails. If the contract is concluded between businesses, liability under §§ 373 et seq. Ccom would apply.
3. The BULGARIAN Electronic Commerce Act 2006 contains the duties mentioned in paragraph (1), but does not provide remedies for non-fulfilment as is done in paragraph (2). The prohibition of derogation in business to consumer relationships (paragraph (3)) is regulated in the general text of ConsProtA art. 143, pp. 1 and 2.

II.–3:202: Acknowledgement of receipt

(1) A business which offers the facility to conclude a contract by electronic means and without individual communication has a duty to acknowledge by electronic means the receipt of an offer or an acceptance by the other party.

(2) If the other party does not receive the acknowledgement without undue delay, that other party may revoke the offer or withdraw from the contract.

(3) The business is liable for any loss caused to the other party by a breach of the duty under paragraph (1).

(4) In relations between a business and a consumer the parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

Section 3: Negotiation and confidentiality duties

II.–3:301: Negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing

(1) A person is free to negotiate and is not liable for failure to reach an agreement.

(2) A person who is engaged in negotiations has a duty to negotiate in accordance with good faith and fair dealing and not to break off negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing. This duty may not be excluded or limited by contract.

(3) A person who is in breach of the duty is liable for any loss caused to the other party by the breach.

(4) It is contrary to good faith and fair dealing, in particular, for a person to enter into or continue negotiations with no real intention of reaching an agreement with the other party.

COMMENTS

A. The subject matter

In trying to obtain a contract a person may commit fraud or make misrepresentations or threats. For such behaviour the person may become liable in damages whether there is a valid contract or not. The question of validity is dealt with later.

The present Article deals primarily with the duty to negotiate in accordance with good faith and fair dealing and with the liability of a party to negotiations for harm caused to the other party by entering into or continuing negotiations with the intention not to make a contract or by breaking off negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

B. Freedom to negotiate and to break off

Apart from cases where the law imposes a duty to make certain contracts, or at least prevents the selection of a contracting partner in a discriminatory fashion (see Chapter 2 (Non-Discrimination), a person is free to decide whether or not to enter into negotiations and whether or not to conclude a contract. This principle is restated in paragraph (1), which sets the scene for the rest of the Article. A person may enter into negotiations even though uncertain as to whether a contract will result. A person may break off the negotiations, and does not have to disclose why they were broken off. Shopkeepers and other sellers will generally have to accept that people inspect their goods and ask for prices and other terms without buying. The same applies to lessors and sellers of apartments and houses who invite inspection of the premises.

C. Freedom qualified by duty

The freedom stated in paragraph (1) is qualified by the duty, set out in paragraph (2), to negotiate in accordance with good faith and fair dealing and not to break off negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing. The duty may not be excluded or limited by contract. It will be noted that this is a duty, not an obligation. The remedies for non-performance of an obligation are not all available. In particular, the remedy of specific performance is not available: it could be impracticable to try to enforce specifically a duty to negotiate fairly and in good faith. The remedies of withholding performance of reciprocal obligations and termination of reciprocal obligations are also unavailable. This means that, for example, breach by one party of the duty to negotiate in accordance with good faith and fair dealing does not entitle the other to disregard his or her reciprocal duty. However, breach of the duty may give rise to a liability for damages under paragraph (3).

D. Entering into negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing

A person, and especially a professional, who enters into negotiations knowing that they will never result in a contract may be held liable to the other party if the other, in negotiating in vain, incurred significant costs.

Illustration 1
A, who lives in England, applies for a senior post at B's factory in Spain. B has offered to pay travel expenses for attending an interview. A never has any intention of taking the job, but simply wants a free trip to Spain in order to visit a friend. B pays A's travel expenses but later learns the truth. A is liable to B for the costs B incurred in paying for A's travel.

E. Continuing negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing

There may also be liability for continuing negotiations after one has decided not to conclude the contract.

Illustration 2
The facts are the same as in Illustration 1 except that when starting the negotiations A did intend to take the job if it seemed suitable. The decision not to accept any offer of a post with B was made after the first interview. However, in order to get a second free trip A pretends to be interested in attending a second more intensive interview and gets travel expenses for that. B then learns the truth. A is liable to B for the costs incurred by B in paying for the second lot of travel expenses.

F. Breaking off negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing

A person may incur liability for breaking off negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

Illustration 3
B has offered to write a software programme for A's production. During the negotiations B incurs considerable expenses in supplying A with drafts, calculations and other written documentation. Shortly before the conclusion of the contract is expected to take place, A invites C, who can use the information supplied by B, to make a bid for the programme, and C makes a lower bid than the one made by B. A then breaks off the negotiations with B and concludes a contract with C. A is liable to B for the expenses incurred by B in preparing the documentation.

G. Basis of liability

Liability may be based on misrepresentation: see Illustrations 1 and 2 where A led B to believe that he intended to conclude a contract. Such misrepresentation may give rise to a right to damages under Book VI (Non-contractual Liability arising out of Damage caused to Another) but the present Article provides an alternative basis of claim. Liability may also be imposed because a party gave promises during the negotiations.

Illustration 4
A assures B that B will obtain a franchise to operate a grocery store as one of A's franchisees. The conditions are that B invest a stated amount and acquire some experience. In order to prepare herself for the franchise B sells her bakery store, moves to another town, and buys a lot. The negotiations, which last over two years, finally collapse when A charges a substantially larger financial contribution than the one originally contemplated, and B finds herself unable to make this contribution. Although there is no evidence that the promises originally made by A were made contrary to good faith, A's breach of these promises is contrary to good faith, and A will be held liable to B for the losses B suffered in preparing for the franchise.

H. Heads of damages

The losses for which the person who acted contrary to good faith and fair dealing is liable include expenses incurred (Illustration 1), work done (Illustration 3) and loss on transactions made in reliance of the expected contract (Illustration 4). In some cases loss of opportunities may also be compensated. However, the aggrieved party cannot claim to be put into the position in which that party would have been if the contract had been duly concluded and if the obligations under it had been duly performed.

Illustration 5
Weare, a company which manufactures clothes, is about to order material of a registered design from Cloth, a company which owns the copyright. Another company, Scham, falsely claims that it owns the copyright and offers to supply the material to Weare at a lower price than Cloth has offered. By the time Weare discovers that Scham does not own the copyright and cannot sell the material, Weare has lost the chance to sell the dresses it intended to make from the material. Weare, which has not made any contract with Scham, may claim damages for lost opportunity and wasted expenses from Scham, but not the amount Weare would have saved by paying the lower price which Scham had offered.

NOTES

I. Liability for negotiation contrary to good faith.

1. Under the laws of the Union, a person is free to start negotiations even if it is not known whether or not any contract will be concluded. A person may also break off negotiations, and, in general, will not have to account for the reasons for doing so. For example, where the contracts are prepared by the parties' lawyers, there is in general no deal and no duty to make a deal until the contract documents are signed and delivered, see von Mehren, Formation of contracts, no. 38.
2. However, several systems have rules similar to those in the Article, imposing liability on a party who, when negotiating a contract, acts contrary to good faith and fair dealing and thereby causes loss to the other party.
3. In the 19th century the German writer von Jhering established a doctrine on culpa in contrahendo. Under this doctrine, entering into contractual negotiations creates a special legal relationship which imposes on each party a duty of care. A violation of this duty of care constitutes culpa in contrahendo, which entails liability. The courts in GERMANY and AUSTRIA and in 2002 the GERMAN CC § 311(2) have adopted this doctrine, and so has the GREEK CC, arts. 197 and 198, SLOVENIAN LOA § 20 and the PORTUGUESE CC art. 227. Also the ITALIAN CC art. 1337 and the BULGARIAN LOA art. 12 impose upon the parties a duty to act in accordance with good faith when conducting negotiations and concluding contracts. In SPAIN, liability is based on the good faith principle laid down in CC art. 7(l), see Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[4], 274-76. The courts oscillate between contractual liability (CC art. 1101, see Supreme Court decisions of 2 December 1976, RAJ (1976) 5246 and 30 October 1988 (labour court), RAJ (1988) 8183), and delictual liability under CC art. 1902, see Supreme Court decision of 16 May 1988, RAJ (1988) 4308.

4. FRENCH, BELGIAN and probably LUXEMBOURG law also employ delictual liability under CC art. 1382 in case of a wrongful breaking off of negotiations. One example is when a firm offer is wrongfully revoked; see on France, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 183. (However, in exceptional cases the court might hold that a contract has been concluded in spite of the revocation.) The principle is used more widely, however. See on the culpa in contrahendo in Belgium: De Boeck, Informatierechten en –plichten, 2000, nos. 418-447; Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 192. Liability for negotiations contrary to good faith is well established in FRENCH case law (no. 185).

5. In a few cases the NORDIC courts have imposed liability for culpa in contrahendo in the circumstances described in the present Article. See on DANISH law Andersen and Nørgaard, Aftaleloven[2], 109 and Hondius (-Lando), Pre-contractual Liability, 113 ff; on SWEDISH law, Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[10], 103 ff and Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], Chapter 6 and on FINNISH law, Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 206-226 and Supreme Court case 1999:48 in Sisula-Tulokas, Contract and tort law: twenty cases from the Finnish Supreme Court.

6. In POLAND, liability for negotiations contrary to good faith is expressly provided by the civil code (CC art. 72 § 2): "a party who entered into or continued negotiations contrary to fair dealing, especially without any intention to conclude a contract, is liable for losses caused to the other party as a result of that party's reliance that a contract will be concluded". Liability is delictual, unless the parties have concluded a separate negotiation contract.

7. In SLOVAKIA generally the doctrine of freedom of contract prevails. Pre-contractual negotiations do not give rise to specific stricter duties of care. However, according to the general provisions on prevention of harm, parties must not exercise their rights so as to infringe the legitimate interest of others or contravene morality (CC § 3 cl.1). While forming a contract, they have to avoid everything causing dissension (CC § 43). They have to prevent damage by their actions (CC § 415). This duty (of a delictual nature) pursuant to CC § 420 imposes liability on the basis of culpability and covers also the liability of auxiliaries. There is, however, no distinction in legal consequences or procedural position of the parties when considering contractual or delictual liability. A person is also liable for causing damage by an intentional act contra bonos mores (CC § 424). Abridgement of such damages is impossible.

8. ENGLISH law does not impose any specific duty on the parties to enter into or continue negotiations in good faith, see Walford v. Miles [1992] AC 128, HL Even an express agreement to negotiate cannot be enforced, see Courtney & Fairbairn Ltd. v Tolaini Bros (Hotels) Ltd. [1975] 1 WLR 297 (though it has been suggested that an express undertaking to negotiate in good faith is merely part of a wider contract which is binding, the obligation may be enforceable: see Petromec Inc. v Petrobas Brasileiro SA Petrobras (No 3) [2005] EWCA Civ 891, [2006] 1 Lloyd's Rep 121 at [117]-[121]). Either party has a right to break off negotiations at any stage before the final conclusion of the contract. Liability for pre-contractual behaviour is only imposed under limited circumstances, see below.

9. In SCOTTISH law, where good faith is an underlying and legitimating principle rather than an active source of liability, older case law imposes liability in some cases where negotiations were broken off in circumstances connoting culpa. These are now understood to entail reliance liability where one party acts on the other's implied assurance that there is a binding contract when in fact there was no more than an agreement falling short of contract (*Dawson Internationa*l plc v. Coats Paton plc 1988 SLT 854), but this has been criticised as too narrow (MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, §§ 2.89-2.96; cf. McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 5.57-5.67).

10. In ESTONIAN law, LOA § 14(3) broadly corresponds to the present Article. Breach of the pre-contractual obligation creates liability for damages (as breach of any other existing obligation, incl. contractual) based on LOA § 115. For discussion on the nature and scope of the pre-contractual liability in Estonian law see Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 14, no. 4.6.2.

11. The HUNGARIAN CC in its introductory provisions sets forth that in the course of exercising civil rights and fulfilling obligations, all parties should act in the manner required by good faith and fair dealing, and are obliged to cooperate with one another (§ 4(1)). In contract law CC § 205(3) provides that parties must cooperate during the conclusion of a contract and respect each other's legitimate interests. In case of failure to do so, the sanction can be liability for damages.

II. Examples of a behaviour which entails liability

12. In several of the systems a person who enters into or continues negotiations without any intention of concluding a contract may be held liable in damages. A party who becomes unwilling, or knowingly unable, to conclude the contract will have to inform the other party. This view is supported by courts and writers in FRANCE, see Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], no. 464; Cass.civ. 1ère , 6 janv. 1998: Bull.civ. I, no. 7; ITALY, see Hondius (-Alpa), Pre-contractual Liability, 200; DENMARK, Hondius (-Lando) Pre-contractual Liability, 117; SWEDEN, see Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 83 f and NJA 1990, 745, (obiter dictum); FINLAND, Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 209; AUSTRIA, see Hondius (-Posch), Pre-contractual Liability, 44; GERMANY, see Hondius (-Lorenz), Pre-contractual Liability, 165; SLOVENIA, see LOA §. 20(2) and Juhart and Plavšak (-Kranjc), Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 24; see also UNIDROIT art. 2.15. For the express rule in ESTONIAN law, see GPCCA § 14(3) sent. 2. There is also support for this view in the laws of ISRAEL, SWITZERLAND AND THE UNITED STATES, see Hondius (-Hondius), Pre-contractual Liability, l6.

13. Some countries will hold liable a party who has made the other party believe that a contract may be concluded, and then without good cause breaks off the negotiations. The GERMAN Supreme Court has held a person liable for refusing, without good reason, to continue negotiations after having behaved in such a way that the other party had reason to expect a contract to come into existence with the content which had been negotiated, see BGH 6 February 1969. Lindenmaier and Möhring, Nachschlagewerk des BGH, §276 no. 28 and Hondius (-Lorenz), Pre-contractual Liability, 166. The same rule applies in AUSTRIA, see Rummel (-Reischauer), ABGB I[3], Pref. to §§ 918-933 no. 17: Liability in the case that negotiations are broken of without good reason and therefore against good faith; see also Austrian Supreme Court (OGH) 30 May 1979, 1 Ob 617/79, SZ 52/90; BELGIUM, see De Boeck, De precontractuele aansprakelijkheid, 87; De Coninck, Le droit commun de la rupture des négociations précontractuelles, 17 ff; DENMARK, Hondius (-Lando), Pre-contractual Liability, 117; FRANCE, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 185 and Cass.com. 11 juillet 2000 (v. note 6), THE NETHERLANDS, Hondius (-Dunné), Pre-contractual Liability, 228, Plas v. Valburg, HR 18 June 1982, NedJur 1983, 723 and CBB v. JPO, HR 12 August 2005, RvdW 2005, 93); PORTUGAL, STJ 4 July 1991 and 3 October 1991, see BolMinJus 409, 743 and 410, 754 and Prata, Notas sobre responsabilidade pré-contratual, 66 ff; ITALY Hondius (-Alpa), Pre-contractual Liability, 201 and Castronovo, Liability between Contract and Tort, 273 ff; see Cass. 14 June 1999, no. 5830, GI 2000, 1179 and probably also in FINLAND, see von Hertzen, Sopimusneuvottelut, 239. For the express rule in ESTONIAN law, see GPCCA § 14(3) sent. 2; for SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 20(3).

14. In ENGLAND a party will generally not be held liable for breaking off negotiations in such a situation. However, there may be liability if the innocent party has relied on a negligent misstatement by the other party which induced a belief that a contract would be concluded, whereby the innocent party suffered loss, and on the facts there was a special relationship between the parties, see Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465, HL and Box v. Midland Bank [1979] Lloyds Rep 391.

15. In IRELAND a "contract to enter into a contract" was held to be binding in Guardians of Kelly Union v. Smith (1917) 52 ILTR 65 HC

16. Generally a party will have to bear the expenses incurred by that party in negotiating a contract. If, however, in the bona fide belief that a contract will be concluded, a party incurs expenses or does work which exceeds that which one can normally expect from an offeror, and does so at the other party's request or with the other party's consent, the other party will have to pay these expenses or compensate for the work done if the other party breaks off the negotiations without good reasons. This rule is applied in some countries sometimes on the basis of an alleged pre-contract, see on DENMARK Hondius (-Lando), Pre-contractual Liability, 121; the NETHERLANDS (semble) idem (-van Dunné) 227; and SPAIN, see Diez-Picazo 276-278. The SCOTTISH cases base liability upon the reliance interest of the party who has incurred wasted expenditure (MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, § 2.93. In ENGLAND compensation has been awarded on a quantum meruit basis, see William Lacey Ltd. v. Davies [1967] 1 WLR 932.

17. Contracts for building and engineering works are often preceded by an invitation to make tenders for which the law provides certain rules of procedure. If, in violation of these rules, the employer does not award the contract to a tenderer, the latter has sometimes been awarded damages, see e.g. the GERMAN Supreme Court decision of 25 November 1992 (BGHZ 120, 28l), the ENGLISH case of Blackpool & Fylde Aero Club Ltd. v. Blackpool Bororough Council [1990] 1 WLR 1195 CA (where however the facts were slightly different), and the DANISH Supreme Court decision of 30 April 1985 (UfR 1985 550). In AUSTRIA not contracting with the objectively best tenderer might constitute an infringement of § 338 of the Bundesvergabegesetz and therefore entitle that tenderer to compensation for loss caused by an unlawful act in the pre-contractual stage (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 19).

18. The preceding situations have been illustrations. There are other situations as well. One is where a person falsely claims to act as a representative of another. For other examples see Hondius (-Alpa), Pre-contractual Liability, 201.

III. Remedy

19. In most countries the remedy in such cases is damages, though in ENGLAND sometimes restitution is awarded and not damages. In DENMARK, GERMANY, AUSTRIA, SCOTLAND, FINLAND, and SWEDEN compensation will be awarded for expenses incurred in reliance on a contract but damages will generally not cover the expectation interest. See for Sweden NJA 1963 105; for Finland CC 1999:48; and for Austria Welser, ÖJZ 1973, 287. In AUSTRIA – following the principle of restitution in kind – the remedy might also be the rescission or adaptation of the contract (Bydlinski, Bürgerliches Recht I[3], no. 6/39). In GERMANY reliance interest may in certain cases include lost profit, see BGH 17 October 1983, NJW 1984, 866, and sometimes even expectation interest, see BGH 6 April 2001, NJW 2001, 2875.

20. In SPAIN and in ITALY damages are limited to the reliance interest, and do not cover lost opportunities (see for ITALY Cass. 14 February 2000, no. 1632, GI 2000, 2252; Benatti, Culpa; Bianca, Diritto civile III, 175; Galgano, Diritto civile e commerciale II(2)[3], 552; Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto II[2], 260; Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 50). In exceptional circumstances, however, the damages awarded have gone beyond the reliance interest. This has happened in the tender cases mentioned above in 1(d). In PORTUGAL the opinions are divided between those who will only give compensation for expenses incurred in reliance on a contract and those who will cover any loss which is adequately caused by the loss of the contract, including lost profit; see on the one hand Almeida Costa, RLJ 114 (1983-84), 73 ff, and on the other, Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 216 and Prata, Notas sobre responsabilidade pré-contratual, 166 ff. In THE NETHERLANDS the courts most often only award the reliance interest, which may include loss of other opportunities. However, in a case where negotiations have been broken off they may also award damages for the expectation interest, see Hartkamp, Interplay.

21. In FRANCE, which does not make, and BELGIUM, which rarely makes, any distinction between reliance and expectation interest, damages may include: various expenses incurred during the time of the negotiation which has been improperly broken, expenses incurred by the breach of the negotiation, the loss of a chance to conclude the negotiated contract with a third party. However, the loss of a chance to make the earnings that the conclusion of the contract would have allowed, had the negotiation not been breached, is not a recoverable loss (Cass.civ. 3è, 28 June 2005, D. 2006, 2693).

22. The amount of damages that can be claimed as a result of breach of pre-contractual negotiations is controversial in POLISH legal doctrine. Most authors maintain that it only includes losses incurred in anticipation of a future contract (see: Czachórski, Zobowiązania[8], 170); however, others would agree to award the full damage, including the loss of other opportunities to contract. In any case, damages should not include lost benefits that a party would have gained, had the final contract been concluded (expectation damages).

23. In SLOVAKIA the aggrieved party can claim actual damages and lost profit. Unless the aggrieved party requests it and it is possible, restitution will not be awarded. The courts will usually award compensation for expenses incurred. The reimbursement of lost profit on the unconcluded contract will be judged strictly according to the individual circumstances of each case.

24. In ENGLAND a person who indicates an intention to grant an interest in land to another and who stands by while the other incurs some detriment on the assumption that the interest will be granted, may be liable on the principle of proprietary estoppel, and the court may even order specific performance, see Crabb v. Arun District Council [1976] chap. 179, CA

25. In the NETHERLANDS the court may order the party who broke off the negotiations to resume them, see CC art. 3:296 and the case law of the Hoge Raad and other courts.

26. In ESTONIAN law, in the absence of express provision, the general principle that damage is not compensated for to the extent that prevention of damage was not the purpose of the obligation or provision in question (LOA § 127(2)) is the guideline for determining the scope of the recoverable damage (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Sein), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 127, no. 4.4.). Following that principle, in case of breach of pre-contractual obligations recoverable damage is generally limited to the reliance interest (Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 5.01.2007, civil matter no. 3-2-1-89-06, p. 16; Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, no. 4.6.2.)

27. In SLOVENIAN law only expenses incurred in preparation for the conclusion of the contract will be reimbursed; however, some authors support the view that the scope of recoverable damages can be larger, see Juhart and Plavšak (-Kranjc), Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 230. In the decisions of the Supreme Court No. II Ips 490/2004 from 13.7.2006, lost profit was awarded.

28. See generally Hondius, Precontractual Liability.

II.–3:302: Breach of confidentiality

(1) If confidential information is given by one party in the course of negotiations, the other party is under a duty not to disclose that information or use it for that party's own purposes whether or not a contract is subsequently concluded.

(2) In this Article, "confidential information" means information which, either from its nature or the circumstances in which it was obtained, the party receiving the information knows or could reasonably be expected to know is confidential to the other party.

(3) A party who reasonably anticipates a breach of the duty may obtain a court order prohibiting it.

(4) A party who is in breach of the duty is liable for any loss caused to the other party by the breach and may be ordered to pay over to the other party any benefit obtained by the breach.

COMMENTS

A. No general duty of confidentiality

Parties who negotiate a contract have in general no obligation to treat the information they have received during the negotiations as confidential. Should there be no contract, the recipient may disclose the information to others, and may make use it.

B. Confidential information

A party, however, may be interested in confidentiality and may expressly declare that information given is to be kept secret, and may not be used by the other party. Further, when no such declaration is made, the receiving party may be under an implied duty to treat certain information as confidential. This implied duty may arise from the special character of the information, and from the parties' professional status. The other party knows or can reasonably be expected to know that this information is confidential. It will be contrary to good faith and fair dealing to disclose it or to use it for the recipient's own purpose if no contract is concluded.

> Illustration
> A has offered to acquire B's know-how for the use of special plastic bags in the dyeing industry. During negotiations B must give A some information about the essential features of the know-how in order to enable A to assess its value. Although B has not expressly requested A to treat the information given as confidential, B has sent the written documentation to A at A's personal address and by registered mail, and B has only talked to A about it when they were alone.

A has a duty to treat the information given as confidential. A may not disclose it to others. Should there be no contract, the information may not be used for A's own purposes.

C. Rights and remedies

In relation to breach of confidentiality prevention is often more important than the recovery of damages. This is reflected in paragraph (3). Paragraph (4) gives a right to damages for any loss caused by a breach. The injured party may also be entitled to recover the benefit which the person in breach has received by disclosing the information or by using it even if that party has not suffered any loss. Although this remedy is not provided by the laws of all the Member States, it seems appropriate by analogy to remedies available for infringement of other intellectual property rights.

NOTES

I. Duty of confidentiality

1. The duty of confidentiality imposed by this Article seems to be accepted in most of the countries of the Union. The writers often treat it as an instance of the parties' duty to observe good faith in contract negotiations, see on DANISH, ITALIAN and DUTCH law, Hondius (-Lando), Pre-contractual Liability, 201, (-Alpa), 228 and (-van Dunné), 120; on GREEK law CC art. 197; and on BELGIAN law, Derains/Goffin/Hanotiau/Herbots/Marchandise/Renaudière, Le contrat en formation, 20. In FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG breach of confidentiality is a delict, a violation of a duty to act in good faith, see Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[1], no. 474. The breach of a duty of confidentiality can amount to an act of unfair competition or a parasitic action (Le Tourneur, no. 847).
2. In GERMANY, AUSTRIA and PORTUGAL the duty of confidentiality follows from the duty of care in contractual negotiations see for Germany, Larenz and Wolf, Allgemeiner Teil des deutschen Bürgerlichen Rechts[8], p. 609 and for Portugal Prata, Notas sobre responsabilidade pré-contratual, 63 ff. In ENGLAND the courts have established "the broad principle of equity that he who received information in confidence shall not take unfair advantage of it*", see Seager v. Copydex Ltd* [1967] 1 WLR 923, CA, and Hondius (-Allen), Pre-contractual Liability, 137. SCOTLAND also recognises a duty of confidentiality; see Stair, The Laws of Scotland XVIII, 1451-1492. The ESTONIAN LOA § 14(4) contains a rule similar to the one in the Article (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 14, notes 2. and 4.5).
3. SPAIN is reported not to have a rule similar to the one in the Article. The same is true for SLOVENIA, though a duty of confidentiality follows from the general duty of acting in accordance with good faith.
4. In POLAND, liability and remedies for breach of confidentiality at the stage of negotiations, as stated in the Article, are provided for in CC art. 72.
5. In SLOVAKIA the protection of confidential information in the pre-contractual stage is accepted in commercial legal relations (Ccom § 271). The contractual party has to state the confidentiality of the information, without a need of a specific form. The wrongdoer is obliged to compensate for the damage pursuant to Ccom §§ 373 et seq. (liability regardless of culpability). This duty can be analogically accepted in pure civil relations, as well, with the liability and remedy provisions of the CC § 420 as stated above. If the information is considered a commercial secret according to Ccom §§ 17-20, the protection is stricter and the remedies are the same as provided for in unfair business practices (see Ccom §§ 51, 53-55).
6. In HUNGARIAN law there is no independent head of liability for "breach of confidence". Under CC § 81(1) a violation of another's right of personality is committed by anyone who interferes with the secrecy of postal correspondence, comes into the possession of private or business secrets and publishes them without authorisation or misuses them in any other way. The sanctions are in CC § 84. See also Act no. LVII of 1996 on the Prohibition of Unfair and Restrictive Market Practices § 4 under which it is prohibited to gain access to, or use, business secrets in an unfair manner, and to disclose such secrets to unauthorised parties or publish them.

7. In BULGARIA a particular duty for confidentiality is contained in CA art. 52, but this norm refers only to the different kinds of commercial representatives. A general duty of confidentiality can be deduced from interpretation of LOA art. 12 (good faith during negotiations and in concluding contracts).

II. What is compensated?

8. In AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, DENMARK, FRANCE, GERMANY and LUXEMBOURG the aggrieved party's loss is compensated, see for Belgium, Derains/Goffin/Hanotiau/Herbots/Marchandise/Renaudière, Le contrat en formation, 20 and for Denmark, Andersen and Nørgaard, Aftaleloven[2], 109.

9. ITALIAN and PORTUGUESE law will compensate the aggrieved party for loss suffered, and will also allow recovery of the benefit received by the party who misused the information even when the aggrieved party suffered no loss, see for Portugal Prata, Notas sobre responsabilidade pré-contratual, 49 ff; for ITALY Benatti, Culpa; Bianca, Diritto civile III, 166; Scognamiglio, Dei contratti in generale, 206; in favour of resorting to the remedies of unjust enrichment (CC art. 2041) Castronovo, Obblighi di Protezione. Under DUTCH law also the court may measure the damages by the profit received by the person liable, see CC art. 6:104.

10. In ENGLAND damages for a deliberate misuse of information given may include the defendant's profits, see Peter Pan Manufacturing Corp. v. Corsets Silhouette Ltd. [1964] 1 WLR 96. If the defendant was merely negligent, the damages may be based on the market value of the information, see Seager v. Copydex Ltd. [1967]1 WLR 923, CA

11. In SCOTLAND the remedies include compensation for loss and restoration of enrichment, see Stair, The Laws of Scotland XVIII, 1488-149l.

12. In SLOVAKIA the remedies are actual loss and lost profit. Instead of lost profit, the aggrieved party can claim recovery of a profit usually realised under similar circumstances according to fair trade and fair dealing (Ccom § 381).

Section 4: Unsolicited goods or services

II.–3:401 No obligation arising from failure to respond

(1) If a business delivers unsolicited goods to, or performs unsolicited services for, a consumer:

(a) no contract arises from the consumer's failure to respond or from any other action or inaction by the consumer in relation to the goods and services; and

(b) no non-contractual obligation arises from the consumer's acquisition, retention, rejection or use of the goods or receipt of benefit from the services.

(2) Sub-paragraph (b) of the preceding paragraph does not apply if the goods or services were supplied:

(a) by way of benevolent intervention in another's affairs; or

(b) in error or in such other circumstances that there is a right to reversal of an unjustified enrichment.

(3) This Article is subject to the rules on delivery of excess quantity under a contract for the sale of goods.

(4) For the purposes of paragraph (1) delivery occurs when the consumer obtains physical control over the goods.

COMMENTS

A. Purpose

The purpose of this Article is to protect consumers from an unwanted marketing technique, the unsolicited delivery of goods or provision of services. It should help to promote correct behaviour by the threat of a private law sanction. As the provision seeks to avoid an aggressive practice, there is in principle no reason to protect the position of the business. The present Article may even be partially just affirmative, as it should anyway follow from the general rules on the formation of contracts (Book II Chapter 4) or on unjustified enrichment (Book VII) that in most cases the business cannot claim anything from the consumer on the basis of such selling methods. But following the model of the Distance Selling Directives 1997/7/EC and 2002/65/EC, the Article expressly makes it clear that no contract arises and that no non-contractual obligation arises except in genuine cases of unjustified enrichment (e.g. delivery in error) or benevolent intervention. The Article deliberately leaves open, whether the ownership of goods passes to the consumer in case of the unsolicited provision of goods. This question is regulated in Book VIII on the Acquisition and Loss of Ownership in Movables. See below.

B. Goods and services in business to consumer relations

The rule concerns both the supply of goods as well as the provision of services by a business to a consumer. This scope of application, in particular the limitation to business to consumer relations (business to consumer), reflects the situation in EC law. This limitation does not support an e contrario conclusion that the unsolicited delivery of goods or provision of services is allowed between businesses in any case.

C. Delivery

Paragraph (4) provides that for the purposes of paragraph (1) delivery occurs when the consumer obtains physical control over the goods. It is useful to say this because the normal definition of "delivery" in the Annex applies only for the purpose of an obligation to deliver goods and here there is no obligation. See also VIII.–2:304 (Passing of ownership of unsolicited goods). The definition makes it clear that delivery to a carrier for the purposes of transmission to the consumer does not suffice for the purpose of this Article.

D. Unsolicited

The delivery of goods or provision of services must be unsolicited. This is not the case where, prior to the supply of the goods or the provision of the services, the consumer has ordered them. If the consumer has made a request which did not amount to an offer in the sense of II.–4:201 (Offer) and the business in response delivered the goods or services in question together with an offer, it is not always clear whether the goods or services are unsolicited. In such cases, the goods or services are not unsolicited if the consumer knew or ought to have known in the circumstances that, in response to the request, the business would link its offer with the delivery of the goods. If a contract has already been concluded between consumer and business, but has subsequently been avoided, the goods or services originally ordered do not thereby become unsolicited. It is also not regarded as an unsolicited supply if the business has supplied goods or provided services which are different from those ordered, but which are similar in terms of price and value, and if the business makes it clear that the consumer is not obliged to accept them and does not have to bear the costs of return. In such circumstances the consumer does not require the protection provided under the present Article.

E. Benevolent intervention, error, excess quantity

Paragraph (2) clarifies some further exceptions from the rigid rule of paragraph (1) with regard to non-contractual obligations. These exceptions are justified because they cover cases where the business clearly is not using an unwanted marketing technique. Benevolent intervention may occur, in particular with regard to services, in emergency situations where non-contractual claims should not be excluded. Where the unsolicited delivery of goods or provision of services is just the consequence of an error (which the business will have to prove) it would be inappropriate to exclude all non-contractual claims. It should be noted that paragraph (2) does not itself grant any right to the business. It just does not exclude non-contractual rights arising from Book V (Benevolent Intervention) or Book VII (Unjustified Enrichment). Paragraph (3) regulates the relationship of the present Article with the more specific provisions in IV.A.–3:105 (Early delivery and delivery of excess quantity).

Illustration 1

Consumer B has ordered a men's wrist watch from business A. By mistake, business A sends a ladies' wrist watch to B. B assumes that A has made a mistake and throws the ladies' wrist watch away. In this case, the present Article does not – according to the purpose of the rule (to prevent improper market behaviour) – catch the behaviour of A, as A has sent B the wrist watch in response to the latter's order and has thus acted in the context of acceptable market behaviour, but has merely made a mistake. The present Article therefore does not apply; thus the business may have a claim based on unjustified enrichment and – if applicable – for damages under the general rules.

Illustration 2
Consumer B has ordered a men's wrist watch for €50 from business A. A intentionally sends B a different, higher value model and, without any further explanation, invoices him for €200 . This case concerns the supply of unsolicited goods. B is under no obligation to pay for the product or to return it.

F. No contract

Paragraph (1)(a) is just affirmative. In the case of unsolicited goods or services, it follows from the general rules on the formation of contract that no contract is concluded as long as the consumer does not respond. This applies in all cases, whether the goods or services were supplied deliberately or by mistake. Mere silence by the consumer is not to be regarded as offer or acceptance. The rule excludes any obligation on the part of the consumer arising from his or her failure to respond. If the consumer does not state that he or she wishes to conclude a contract, no contract is concluded. This also applies if the consumer makes use of the goods supplied or disposes of them, if no other circumstances clearly show that the consumer intends to conclude a contract with the business. All claims which are based on the existence of a contract are excluded. This also includes, in addition to the claim for payment of the price for the goods or service, all contractual claims for non-performance and remedies associated therewith (e.g. damages). No contract based on conduct arises between consumer and business.

Illustration 3
Business A sends consumer B a product together with a statement that, if B does not object, then B will be billed for the product in two weeks time. B does nothing and receives a bill from A after two weeks. B is under no obligation to pay for the product.

Illustration 4
The facts are the same as in Illustration 3, except that B, without making any statement towards B, has used the product a few times. The mere use of the product by B is not to be regarded as an acceptance of A's offer; a contract has therefore not been concluded. B is under no obligation to pay for the product. Neither need B pay any damages for use of the product.

G. No non-contractual obligations

The main field of application of this Article could be paragraph (1)(b) which states that no non-contractual obligation arises from the consumer's acquisition, retention, rejection or use of the goods or receipt of benefit from the services. The provision clearly seeks to have a dissuasive effect on businesses which want to use this marketing technique. The consumer does not need to return the goods or keep them or in any way treat them with care. Paragraph (1)(b) therefore excludes all claims against the consumer for restitution for use and for value, provided they relate to the unsolicited goods or services, irrespective of whether such claims are based on unjustified enrichment, non-contractual liability for damage or property rights, and irrespective of whether the consumer behaved negligently or deliberately. Also restitutionary claims based on property law (rei vindicatio) are excluded.

Illustration 5
The facts are the same as in Illustration 3, except that one week later B dumps the product in a rubbish bin. B is under no obligation to pay damages to business A.

H. Ownership

The provision does not deal not with the question whether the recipient of unsolicited goods becomes owner of them. That is regulated in VIII.–2:304 (Passing of ownership of unsolicited goods) which provides that the consumer acquires ownership if the business (as would normally be the case) had the right or authority to transfer it. The consumer may however promptly reject the acquisition of ownership.

I. Claims against the sender of unsolicited goods

The present Article does not regulate possible claims of the recipient against the supplier of the unsolicited goods or services. If the recipient returns the unsolicited goods, the costs of return may have to be borne by the supplier under the rules of Book V (Benevolent intervention). However, the recipient should be expected to communicate with the supplier before sending the goods back at the supplier's expense. In the rare case where the recipient cannot contact the supplier and comes to the reasonable conclusion that the supplier would want to have the goods back, then the rules on benevolent intervention would apply and there would be a right to reimbursement of the expenditure on sending the goods back. The situation may be similar in the – probably rare – case that the recipient has to incur specific costs for the disposal of the goods. The recipient can recover any price already paid in error under the rules of Book VIII (Unjustified enrichment).

NOTES

1. Distance Selling Directives 1997/7/EC, art. 9, and 2002/65/EC, art. 9, require Member States to "exempt the consumer from any obligation in the event of unsolicited [goods or services being supplied], the absence of a reply not constituting consent."
2. In ESTONIA, LOA § 99 provides protection, similar to the one prescribed in the Article, only for consumers. Any claim is excluded, unless the goods or services were not intended for the consumer, or the person who dispatched the goods or provided the services erroneously believed that the consumer ordered the goods or services and the consumer was or should have been aware of the error. In the latter cases, the rights arising from the law (e.g. unjustified enrichment (LOA § 1027 ff), vindication (LPA § 80)) are not excluded Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Parkel), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 99, no. 4.) In SLOVENIA, art. 45 of the ConsProtAmakes clear that for a consumer, no obligations can arise from unsolicited goods or services.
3. In SLOVAKIA, the consumer protection is provided for accordingly in cases of distance selling (§ 11 Act No. 108/2000 on Consumer Protection in Doorstep Selling and in Distance Selling as amended) and distance selling of financial services (§ 7 Act No. 266/2005 on Consumer Protection in distance financial services as amended). Pure silence or inertia does not imply consent (cf. CC § 44 cl. 1). With the exception of the distance selling of financial services, a vindication right or more usually a right to the reversal of unjustified enrichment (CC §§ 451 et seq.) would be applicable. All the costs would have to be borne by the sender acting in bad faith (CC § 458). It should be noted, that conduct of the sender considered illegal and contra bonos mores does not enjoy legal protection (CC §§ 3 cl. 1, 39), not even in commercial legal relations (cf. Ccom § 265).
4. In the UK, the Consumer Protection (Distance Selling) Regulations 2000 (No. 2334) Reg 24 makes it an offence for the supplier to claim payment for unsolicited goods or services. The consumer may treat unsolicited goods as a gift. In addition, the Unsolicited Goods and Services Act 1971, s. 2. makes it an offence to demand payment for unsolicited goods sent to a business.

5. In BULGARIA there is a long-established doctrinal consensus that silence in response to an offer does not lead to the conclusion of a contract. There are exceptions in Ccom arts. 43, 292 and 301, but they apply to business to business relations only. In the PCL (art. 62) there is now an explicit regulation corresponding to paragraph (1) of the present Article. Paragraphs (2) and (3) of the Article have no corresponding provision in the Bulgarian legislation.

Section 5: Damages for breach of duty under this Chapter

II.–3:501: Liability for damages

(1) Where any rule in this Chapter makes a person liable for loss caused to another person by a breach of a duty, the other person has a right to damages for that loss.

(2) The rules on III.–3:704 (Loss attributable to creditor) and III.–3:705 (Reduction of loss) apply with the adaptation that the reference to non-performance of the obligation is to be taken as a reference to breach of the duty.

COMMENTS

A. General

The main sanction for a breach of one of the duties imposed by this Chapter is that the person in breach is liable for any loss caused by the breach. See II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (3); II.–3:201 (Correction of input errors) (paragraph (2)); II.–3:202 (Acknowledgement of receipt) paragraph (3); II.–3:301 (Negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing) paragraph (3) and II.–3:302 (Breach of confidentiality) paragraph (4). Paragraph (1) of the present Article simply makes it clear that the practical consequence of such liability is that the person who suffers the loss has a right to damages.

This is a self-standing non-contractual right. In case C-334/00 – Fonderie Officine Meccaniche Tacconi Spa v Heinrich Wagner Sinto Maschinenfabrik GmbH, a case from Italy involving a claim for wrongfully breaking-off negotiations regarding a contract, the ECJ took the view that this kind of action was a "matter relating to tort" for the purposes of the Brussels Convention. Under these model rules there might indeed be a right to reparation under Book VI (Non-contractual Liability arising out of Damage Caused to Another) for some types of pre-contractual behaviour causing damage. However, as it might not be so straightforward to establish liability under that Book, the person suffering the damage would normally find it easier to recover under the express provisions of this Chapter.

"Loss" is defined in the Annex as including economic and non-economic loss. "Economic loss" includes loss of income or profit, burdens incurred and a reduction in the value of property. "Non-economic loss" includes pain and suffering and impairment of the quality of life.

"Caused" has its normal meaning in this context. See by way of analogy VI.–4:101 (General rule). Given the purpose of pre-contractual duties it should not readily be assumed that normal and reasonable behaviour by the person who suffers the loss would break the chain of causation.

B. Non-application of some provisions from Book III

Book III, Chapter 3, Section 7 (Damages and interest) deals with damages for non-performance of an obligation. The provisions of that Section would not automatically apply to breach of a duty. So III.–3:702 (General measure of damages) and III.–3:703 (Foreseeability) do not apply here. Indeed the second of these provisions is expressly limited to obligations arising from a contract or other juridical act. So it is the basic test of a sufficient causal link which applies for the purposes of the present Chapter. Tests or rules based on the assumption that the parties are already in contractual relations with each other are inappropriate.

C. Application of two provisions from Book III

Paragraph (2) of the Article applies two provisions from Book III. The first - III.–3:704 (Loss attributable to creditor) – has the effect that a person should not be able to recover damages for loss caused by a breach to the extent that that person contributed to the breach or its effects.

> Illustration 1
> X has broken off negotiations with Y, without warning and contrary to good faith and fair dealing. However, Y contributed to this breach of duty by extremely rude and insulting behaviour towards X. If Y tries to recover damages for loss caused by X having broken off negotiations, Y's own conduct will be taken into account.

The second provision taken over from Book III is III.–3:705 (Reduction of loss). This has the effect that the person in breach is not liable for loss suffered by the other person to the extent that the latter could have reduced the loss by taking reasonable steps.

> Illustration 2
> In response to some very misleading "bait" advertising X decides to visit a shop in another town. Hoping to get a great bargain and knowing that the business will be liable for any loss if the marketing is misleading, X takes a taxi to travel 50 miles to the shop, when there is perfectly good public transport. The business's liability will be limited to reasonable travel costs.

NOTES

1. For the different approaches to the basis of liability for breach of pre-contractual duties see the Notes to II.–3:301 (Negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing).
2. For paragraph (2) see the Notes to the Articles there cited.

CHAPTER 4: FORMATION

Section 1: General provisions

II.–4:101: Requirements for the conclusion of a contract

A contract is concluded, without any further requirement, if the parties:

(a) intend to enter into a binding legal relationship or bring about some other legal effect; and

(b) reach a sufficient agreement.

COMMENTS

A. Contract

In these rules the notion of a contract covers any agreement between two or more parties which is intended to give rise to a binding legal relationship or to have some other legal effect, such as the modification or termination of existing rights or obligations or the immediate assignment or waiver of a right. The notion of a contract includes not only cases where both parties have reciprocal rights and obligations but also cases where only one party has obligations. The present Article is concerned not with defining a contract but with stating the requirements for the conclusion of a contract.

The basic requirements for the conclusion of a contract are that the parties have an intention to enter into a binding legal relationship or bring about some other legal effect and reach a sufficient agreement.

B. Parties

For there to be a contract there must be two or more parties. A contract is a bilateral or multilateral juridical act. Under these rules, unilateral juridical acts of various types, including undertakings intended to be binding without acceptance, may produce legal effects but they are not contracts.

C. Intention

The requirement of an intention to enter into a binding legal relationship or bring about some other legal effect serves to distinguish a contract from such agreements as mere social engagements or mere provisional understandings reached in the course of negotiations. It also leaves it open to parties, if they prefer, to make it clear that they are operating under an agreement or arrangement which is not intended to be a legally binding contract.

It is not necessary that both parties must intend to incur obligations under the contract. They both must intend to enter into a binding legal relationship or to bring about some other legal result but there could be a contract even although only one party had obligations under it.

There could also be a contract even if the intention was to bring about a binding legal result immediately and directly without the intervention of any obligation to do so by a further step.

A party's intention is for this purpose to be ascertained from the party's statements or conduct as reasonably understood by the other party. See the following Article.

D. Sufficient agreement

The requirement of an agreement serves to distinguish a contract not only from unconcluded negotiations which have not yet led to agreement but also from a unilateral juridical act where there is no agreement between two or more parties.

The agreement may be reached by one party's acceptance of the other's offer, by the parties' assent to terms which have been drafted by a third party, or in other ways. An acceptance may be express or may be by doing an act or suffering a forbearance asked for by the offeror.

There must be agreement but a very vague and general agreement might not be enough for there to be a contract. The agreement must also be "sufficient" – that is to say, it must have sufficient content.

E. No further requirement

The existence of two or more parties, the relevant intention of the parties and sufficient agreement between the parties are enough. There are no further requirements. No form is required, save in exceptional cases where this is provided for expressly. Nor is it necessary that one party undertakes to furnish or furnishes something of value in exchange for the other party's undertakings (consideration). Unlike the laws of some Member States, these model rules do not require consideration or cause, nor do they require that to create certain contracts, property must be handed over to the party who is to receive it (real contracts). The additional requirements (which in many cases are attenuated or are readily evaded) do not seem to fulfil a sufficiently important function to be desirable elements of a modern model for contract law. Any residual functions of consideration or cause, such as preventing very one-sided agreements from being enforceable, are fulfilled by other rules, such as II.–7:207 (Unfair exploitation).

The fact that there is no further requirement for the formation of a contract does not mean that a contract, once formed, may not be invalid because of some defect of consent or illegality. These topics are dealt with later (see Chapter 7 (Grounds of Invalidity)).

NOTES

I. Introduction.

National laws

1. In BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG the rules on formation are laid down in the decided cases, which were in origin inspired by the 18th century writer Pothier, Obligations. CC art. 1108 of BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG is the only provision of the codes dealing with the formation of contracts. It provides that the necessary conditions for the validity of a contract are consent of the party who assumes an obligation, capacity to contract, a certain object which forms the matter of the agreement and a lawful cause. The SPANISH CC has similar rules in arts. 1261 and 1262. It mentions that the agreement of the parties manifests itself by the offer and acceptance. PORTUGUESE law deals with the requirements for conclusion of a contract under the requirements for juridical acts in general; similarly in CZECH law (CC §§ 37 and 38 provide for the necessity of due will, proper expression of will, existence of an object and the capacity of the parties). ITALIAN law takes much the same position as French law, since in order for a contract to be binding agreement by the parties is not sufficient. Existence of a lawful causa and a possible, lawful and determined object are also necessary, as well as compliance with certain formalities, when prescribed by law: see CC art. 1325. Similarly, in SLOVENIAN law, a contract is concluded when the parties, having the intent to enter a binding legal relationship, reach an agreement on the essential elements of the contract (LOA § 15), and some further requirements are met: the contract must have a lawful cause (LOA § 39(1), and its object be sufficiently determined or determinable, lawful and possible (LOA § 34). However, the existence of the cause is presumed, even if it is not apparent (LOA § 39(3). In BULGARIAN law, full coincidence between offer and acceptance is required for the conclusion of a contract.

2. In ENGLAND, IRELAND and SCOTLAND the rules on the formation of contracts are based largely on case law, although statutes prescribe certain formal requirements for certain types of contracts. In the other Member States rules on the conclusion of contracts are generally provided in codes and statutes, sometimes in the context of the requirements for juridical acts in general. For AUSTRIA see CC §§ 861 ss: A contract is an agreement between two or more parties with the intention to create legal relations. It is not essential that this results in rights and obligations for both or all parties; a contract can also be unilateral, i.e. only binding for one party (such as a donation or a contract of guarantee). Some – older – types of contract require the transfer of the goods to be binding (so-called real contracts such as a loan (CC § 983) or a loan for use (CC § 971).

3. According to the HUNGARIAN legal doctrine a contract is two or more persons` concordant declaration of will (consensus) intended to and able to trigger legal effects (Bíró and Lenkovics, Általános tanok[4], 188). CC § 205(1) provides that contracts are concluded upon the mutual and concordant expression of the parties' intent. CC § 198(1) lays down that a contract constitutes an obligation to perform and a right to demand such performance.

II. Paragraph (1). "A contract is concluded when..."

4. On the requirements for a contract there are differences between the legal systems, mostly of a terminological character.

5. In all the systems an intention to be legally bound is presumed when the transaction involves a patrimonial interest for the parties, but not when it is only a social engagement, such as a dinner appointment. Friends and family members often agree to help each other but such agreements are generally not regarded as contracts and are not legally enforceable, see Kötz, European Contract Law I, l18 who cites the ENGLISH case Balfour v. Balfour [1919] 2 KB 571 (CA), FRENCH Cass. 19 March 1974 Bull. Cass. I no. 117, and the GERMAN BGH 22 June 1956, BGHZ 21, 102. See also for BELGIUM Cass. 2 Dec. 1875, Pas. belge 1876, 37; DENMARK Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 30 and for IRELAND, Friel 78; AUSTRIA Schwimann (-Apathy and Riedler), ABGB IV[3], § 861 ABGB no. 7. For CZECH law see Knappová

(-Knapp/Knappová/Švestka), Civil Law II, 70 (the intention to be legally bound is missing).

6. Even in business relations, parties may conclude agreements which oblige them only morally, not legally. It may follow from the language of the agreement or be implied from the circumstances that the parties assumed only a moral obligation, for example if the agreement provides that it is to be 'binding in honour only', as in the English case of Rose & Frank v JR Crompton & Bros Ltd. [1925] AC 445, HL, see further Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 4-004-4-007; for Ireland, Cadbury Ireland Ltd. v Kerry Co-operative Creameries Ltd. [1982] ILRM 77, HC. Gentlemen's agreements, which give rise to only a moral bond between the parties, are also well-known in ITALIAN law; see Roppo, Il contratto 15.

7. In ENGLAND collective labour agreements are presumed not to be intended to create legal relations: Ford Motor Co. Ltd. V. AUEFW [1969] 2 QB 303, QB. In IRELAND statements made obiter in several cases suggest that they are, see Goulding Chemicals Ltd. V. Bolger [1977] IR 211, SC and Ardmore Studios v. Lynch [1965] IR 1, HC. In BELGIUM gentlemen's agreements are valid but bind only morally: Cass. 11 Jan. 1978, Pas. belge 1978, 530.

8. In POLISH law a contract is considered to be a type of juridical act - i.e. an act by one or more persons which brings about legal effects. Every juridical act must consist of at least one declaration of will. Barring the exceptions provided for by statutory law, a declaration of will may be expressed by any behaviour of a person performing an act in law which manifests their intent sufficiently. A contract is a legal transaction which consists of at least two declarations of will which express agreement. In the General Part of the Polish civil code there are provisions that refer to all juridical acts and others that apply specifically to contracts.

9. CZECH law provides that the contract is concluded at the moment when the acceptance of an offer to enter the contract comes into effect (CC § 44(1)), which happens at the moment when the expression of consent with an offer reaches the offeror (CC § 43c(2)). These provisions comply with both requirements of the commented article: the acceptance means reaching the agreement and the intention to be legally bound is implied in both the offer and the acceptance which presuppose the intention of the parties to cause legal consequences (CC § 34). There are no requirements other than reaching consensus on at least the essential terms of the contract (essentialia negotii), see Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law II, 39.

10. In SLOVAK law also a contract is considered to be a type of juridical act and the requirements are regulated in that context.

11. Under ESTONIA law a contract is entered into by an offer and acceptance or by the mutual exchange of declarations of intent in any other manner if it is sufficiently clear that the parties have reached an agreement (LOA § 9(1)). For further details see notes below.

III. Social engagements, engagements involving no patrimonial interests, moral engagements

12. In all the legal systems, the parties' intention to be legally bound is a condition of the formation of a contract. Agreements made in jest or in the course of play-acting are not contracts. For CZECH law, see CC § 37(1) – juridical acts must be made seriously; otherwise they are not binding (invalid).

IV. "Without any further requirement"

(a) Consideration

13. In ENGLAND and IRELAND (but not SCOTLAND) "consideration" is generally required for the formation of a contract. The doctrine of consideration is complex and unclear, but its essence is that a promise or offer, even if seriously meant and accepted by the other party, will not result in a contract unless the other party gives or does something, or promises to give or do something, in exchange. See e.g. Re Hudson (1885) 54 LJ chap. 811 and cf. Re McArdle [1951] chap. 669, C.A.; "past consideration is no consideration".

14. It is not necessary that the action taken or promised is of direct benefit to the promisor. What is important is that the promisee has in some sense incurred a detriment in exchange for the promise. Thus a promise to a bank to guarantee a loan made to a third party is made for good consideration and, if accepted, would result in a contract though the guarantor may obtain no benefit; the bank incurs a detriment by advancing the money to the debtor. But if the money has been advanced already, and the bank does not give the debtor any concession as a result of the guarantee, e.g. extra time to pay, the guarantee will be without consideration and, even if there is agreement between the parties, there will be no contract, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 3-034-3-035; compare Alliance Bank v. Broom (1864) 2 Dr & Sm 289 (actual forbearance by creditor, therefore consideration).

15. Certain actions, or promises of actions, are treated as not being good consideration because they involve the promisee in no detriment. For example, a promise to pay a person to perform an act which that person is already obliged to do under the general law is usually treated as being for no consideration: Glasbrook Bros. v. Glamorgan CC [1925] AC 270, HL

16. Further, the doctrine does not often prevent the formation of a contract if the courts wish there to be an enforceable contract. First, the consideration need not be 'adequate', i.e. of equivalent value, so that a small or even a purely nominal payment is good consideration, e.g. Thomas v. Thomas (1842) 2 QB 851. Secondly, the courts seem to 'invent' consideration by fixing on some action, or the possibility of some action, by the promisee and treating it as exchanged for the promise: e.g. de la Bere v. Pearson [1908] 1 KB 280. In that case a newspaper's promise to give readers financial advice was held to be contractual, because the newspaper had the right to publish the readers' letters if it so wished. See generally Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para 3-009. Atiyah argues that this means that the doctrine is incoherent and means no more than 'a good reason to enforce the promise': Essays on Contract, 241.

17. In relation to agreements to alter the terms of existing contracts, there were formerly in ENGLISH law considerable difficulties when the terms were varied in a way that benefited only one of the parties; e.g. one party promised to release the other from part of the obligation (Foakes v. Beer (1884) 9 App. Cas. 605 (HL)) or to increase the price payable to the other (Stilk v. Myrick (1809) 2 Camp 317). More recently, the courts have prevented the promisor from going back on the promise (unless it was unfairly extorted) via, in the first situation, the doctrine of promissory estoppel (see WJ Alan & Co. Ltd. v. El Nasr Export & Import Co [1972] 2 QB 189, CA) or, in the second, by treating the promise as being for good consideration if the promisor got a 'practical benefit', and there was no element of coercion, even though the promisee was doing no more than previously bound to do (Williams v. Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd. [1991] 1 QB 1 (CA)).

18. In SLOVAKIA it is not necessary that one party undertakes to furnish or furnishes something of value in exchange for the other party's undertakings (consideration). HUNGARIAN law does not know the doctrine of consideration either. Gratuitous contracts are certainly recognised , but it is rebuttably presumed in contract law that contracts are non-gratuitous. See CC § 201. Unless the contract or the applicable circumstances indicate otherwise, a consideration is due for any services to be provided under the contract. If at the time of the conclusion of the contract the difference between the value of a service and the consideration due, without either party having the intention of bestowing a gift, is grossly unfair the injured party is allowed to contest the contract.

(b) Cause, causa

19. The model rules do not expressly provide for a requirement of cause or causa. Causa is, however, mentioned as a requirement for the formation of a contract in AUSTRIAN law, in FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs arts. 1108 and 1131-1133, ITALIAN CC arts. 1325 and 1343-45, SLOVENIAN LOA § 39 and SPANISH CC art. 1261. It is also mentioned in SLOVAK legal theory see Lazar, Základy občianskeho hmotného práva, 108 (and see CC § 495). C*ausa* is a prerequisite for the validity of a contract under BULGARIAN law as well (LOA art. 26 (2)), although nullity because of an absence of causa is proclaimed by courts only in extreme situations. There has been a broad discussion about causa in the BULGARIAN doctrine in recent years, but no definite solution seems to have been found yet.

20. In AUSTRIAN law the causa signifies the economic purpose of the contract, which has to be transparent from the contract itself or the circumstances. A promise which has no apparent purpose is not binding. Exceptions are recognised in such cases as a promissory note or the acceptance of a payment or delivery order (Bydlinski, Bürgerliches Recht I[3], nos. 5/15 et seq.). Under GERMAN law causa is sometimes identified with the purpose, see Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht, Allgemeiner Teil[6], nos. 22 et seq. However, CC §§ 780 and 781 show that such a purpose is not necessary for the (formally) binding effect of promises; but those promises may be set aside by virtue of a claim for unjustified enrichment.

21. In FRENCH law, la cause can be defined as the justification, the grounds for existence of the undertaking signed by both parties to the contract. There is a distinction between the objective cause which can be found in the existence of consideration and which protects each party against an undertaking without consideration, and the subjective cause which is the deciding motive which has led a party to commit itself and which enables the public interest to be protected against contracts contrary to public policy and good morals. Thus, the party who concludes a bilateral contract for a derisory or illusory consideration can claim that the contract is void for lack of cause. (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 337). A similar solution is applied in the event of a mistake as to the existence of the cause by one party, that is when one party has falsely believed in the existence of a justification, a consideration for its undertaking. If the cause is partially false, the contractual obligation is therefore reduced (Cass.civ. 1ère, 11 mars 2003: Bull.civ. I, no. 67). When a party has sought an illicit or immoral goal, the contract is null and void (Cass.civ. 1ère, 10 février 1998: Bull.civ. I, no. 49). In BELGIAN law both aspects of the cause are referred to in case law (Cass. 13 Nov. 1969, RCJB 1970, 326, note Van Ommeslaghe; Cass. 13 March 1981, Pas. belge 1981, 760; Cass. 16 Nov. 1989, Pas. belge 1990, 331; Cass. 21 Jan. 2000, Pas. belge 2000, 165; see also Nudelhole, L'obligation sans cause, l'obligation sur une fausse cause et l'erreur sur le mobile déterminant, 709) and modern legal writers stress the fact that there is only one, subjective concept of cause because one of the main motives for contracting (subjective concept) will be the objective reason (abstract cause) for contracting (Foriers, La caducité des obligations contractuelles par disparition d'un élément essentiel à leur formation, nos. 84-85; Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, nos. 139-151; Van Ommeslaghe, RCJB 1970, 326).

22. Since the ITALIAN CC remains silent on the issue, the meaning of the term causa has historically caused a division of opinion among legal writers. From a subjective approach, according to which causa would mean the aim pursued by the parties in entering into a binding agreement, an objective approach has to be distinguished, under which causa would stand for the social and economic function of the contract (see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 447 f). This latter view is the one taken by prevailing case law (see, among others, Court of Cassation, 15 July 1993, no. 7844, published in excerpt in Bessone, Casi e questioni di diritto privato, 1027).

23. Some DUTCH authors argue that causa, although no longer mentioned in the Dutch CC, does remain a requirement for the validity of a contract - see van Schaick, Contractsvrijheid en nietigheid (with summaries in English, French and German) and Smits, Het vertrouwensbeginsel in de contractuele gebondenheid (with a summary in English). Other authors consider causa as “the content of the contract as a whole", see on these theories Becker, Gegenopfer und Opferverwehrung, 237. If used in this sense the causa is hardly a requirement other than that the contract must contain legal obligations for the debtor.

24. In SLOVENIAN LOA § 39 the causa is referred to as “grounds” (reason) for contractual obligations. Even in cases where the cause is not apparent, its existence is presumed (LOA § 39(3)). As to the meaning of the cause, there are different opinions among legal writers, see Juhart and Plavšak (-Grilc), Obligacijski zakonik I, 289. The prevailing view seems to be, that the cause is the purpose of the contract in the sense of the reason of the parties for entering the contract or the reason of one party of which the other party was aware or could not have been unaware. A mere motive of one party to conclude the contract, does not affect its validity (LOA § 40). If, however, an unlawful motive has essentially influenced the decision of one party and this was known or could not have remained unknown to the other party, the contract is void, see LOA § 40(2) With regard to donation contracts, this applies regardless of the essential influence, see LOA § 40(3).

25. The POLISH CC does not expressly provide for a requirement of cause or causa, although many authors argue that causa remains a general requirement for the validity of a contract aimed at a shift of assets. The doctrine distinguishes different types of causa: causa solvendi, causa acquirendi, causa donandi, causa cavendi. The concept of causa is referred to in the Polish CC in an article which provides that performance of an obligation is undue when the basis for performance, i.e. causa, drops off (CC art. 410 § 2). There are exceptions to the general rule of causality of juridical acts in the POLISH system. As opposed to the “causa-based” acts, there are certain listed “abstract” acts such as taking over a debt (CC art. 524 § 2) or granting a bill of exchange or cheque. Some contracts may be valid despite of the lack of causa, i.e. without regard to any underlying relationship (see the Supreme Court’s decision of April 28, 1995, III CZP 166/94, OSNC 1995/10, poz. 135, with reference to bank guarantees).

26. The GREEK and PORTUGUESE CCs do not require cause as a condition for the formation of the contract, but the Greek CC arts. 174-178 provide that contracts the contents of which are unlawful are invalid and arts. 904-913 that payments made without a cause or without a lawful cause may be recovered. On this basis, some Greek writers infer that cause is an essential element for the validity and enforceability of contracts (Kerameus and Kozyris, Introduction[2], 65 f). The same is the predominant view in Portugal, see Carvalho Fernandes, Teoria geral do direito civil II [3], 345 ff.

27. Causa has no role in the formation and validity of contracts in ENGLISH or IRISH law. Nor is the concept used in GERMANY, see Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative law[3], 381 (but see § 812(2) where a residual element of cause leads to restitution where an abstract promise is given without causa, see Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht, Allgemeiner Teil[6], no. 23), the NORDIC COUNTRIES, see for DENMARK, Ussing, Aftaler[3], 113, ESTONIA, see Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 8, no. 4.1, or SCOTLAND, see Smith, Laws of Scotland, 742 f.

28. "Cause" in SPANISH law has various meanings. In bilateral contracts, "cause" means the counter-obligation of the other party to a contract; in gratuitous promises, "cause" is the intention of the donor (CC art. 1274). "False cause" and "falsity of the cause" are seen in arts. 1276 and 1301 of the SPANISH CC, where the reference is to the underlying motive and the main function of "cause" is to avoid contracts in which the parties do not have the purpose typically intended by the rule of law; for instance, when parties disguise a gratuitous transfer under the cover of a sale or when the real intention of the parties to a sale contract is to create a security right in favour of the transferee (see as seminal contribution, De Castro, El Negocio Jurídico, 163 ff).

29. CZECH CC § 495 provides that the validity of an obligation is not influenced if the contract does not express the causa on the basis of which the debtor is obliged to perform, but the creditor must prove the causa in case of need (with an exception for certain securities). From this provision it is clear that CZECH law subjects the validity (or at least enforceability) of contracts to the existence of a causa. However, the causa is traditionally interpreted extensively as an immediate economic purpose of the contract. Thus, as a matter of fact, every contract has its causa and it is relevant only whether the causa is lawful and whether the creditor is able to bring evidence of it (which helps to reveal dissimulated or coerced contracts etc.); for details see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 887.

(c) Real contracts

30. Today these agreements are often interpreted as a promise to make a contract to lend, deposit, pledge, etc. which is valid but its violation can only give rise to damages and not to specific performance: when performed these contracts are governed by the same rules as other contracts (see for France Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 147 and 148 and for Belgium de Page, Traité II no. 505). Under the PORTUGUESE CC the rules on real contracts are applied to loans, deposit and pledge. However under the influence of Mota Pinto, Cessão da posição contratual, 11 ff, it has been held that the mere agreement between the parties makes these contracts enforceable.

31. In SPAIN, ITALY, AUSTRIA, SLOVENIA and the NETHERLANDS the concept of the "real contract" still exists: in Spain for loans, including gratuitous loans, deposit, and pledge, see Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[4], 139; the same is true of Italy, see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 241; and in Austria for deposit contracts, loans (of money and other consumable goods) loans for use and "orders to sell" (Kaufaufträge), see CC §§ 957, 971, 983, 1086. A mere agreement without the handing over of the good is – if the special requirements are met – seen as a preliminary contract (CC § 936).

32. In SWEDEN and FINLAND one alternative prerequisite for a binding gift is that it is physically handed over (Act on Gifts § 1) but there is nothing else approaching the notion of a “real contract”.

33. In POLAND “real contracts” are not validly concluded until the property to which they relate has been handed over to a person authorised to receive it. This applies, for example, to lending for use (CC art. 710, deposit (art. 835) and pledge (art. 307 § 1).

34. In SCOTLAND the early writers adopted the civil law division between real and other contracts but modern writers consider that the term “real contract” now has no legal significance. See Gloag, Law of Contract[2], 14.

35. In SLOVAKIA it has been held that the so-called "real contract" (e.g. a storage contract, CC §§ 747–753) is not validly concluded until the property to which it relates has been handed over to the creditor or some other person authorised to receive it.

36. Also CZECH law distinguishes real contracts as opposed to consensual contracts (see Knappová (-Knapp/Knappová/Švestka), Civil Law II, 100), but if a contract, statutorily regulated as a real contract, is concluded as a consensual one (i.e. providing consideration is not part of the formation of the contract), the result is usually not regarded as defective, but simply as an innominate consensual contract.

37. Under BULGARIAN law the real contracts are: deposit, (real) pledge, loan, commodatum, donation, transmission of ownership over bearer-securities. Most of these contracts can, however, be formed in another way as well – pledge over rights can be effected by notification to the debtor and handing over of the documents vouching the right; pledge exists in the form of registered pledge as well (Registered Pledges Act 1996); loan in the case of bank credit agreement is a purely consensual contract and donation can be made by a notarially authenticated deed.

38. In the GERMAN CC some residual elements of a former doctrine of real contracts may be found in § 516 (gift from hand to hand) and in the former version of § 607 (credit contract) in force until 2001. The prevailing opinion interprets these rules in the sense of pure consensualism, see Schlechtriem, Schuldrecht, Besonderer Teil[5], no. 185.

39. “Real contracts" are not known in the other countries. It is not necessary as a condition for the coming into existence of a contract that the goods or money contracted for should be handed over to the creditor. The handing over may, however, be a condition for the perfection of a security interest in relation to third parties.

40. And in ENGLISH law a person who takes possession of another party’s goods, even without any agreement between them (e.g. a finder) may come under obligations under the law of bailment: see Chitty on Contracts I[27], chap. 33.

II.–4:102: How intention is determined

The intention of a party to enter into a binding legal relationship or bring about some other legal effect is to be determined from the party's statements or conduct as they were reasonably understood by the other party.

COMMENTS

A. Intention

Parties often make preliminary statements which precede the conclusion of a contract but which do not indicate any intention to be bound at that stage. The parties to an arrangement may also make statements which attempt to make it clear that they will be morally but not legally bound. It will often be necessary to interpret such statements. It can, for example, be difficult to distinguish between a non-binding letter of intent or letter of comfort and a letter which is intended to be legally binding and which, if accepted, will lead to a contract

> Illustration
> When a subsidiary company asked a bank to grant it a loan of €8 million, the bank asked the parent company to guarantee the loan. The parent company refused, but gave a letter of comfort instead. This read: "It is our policy to ensure that the business of (the subsidiary) is at all times in a position to meet its liabilities to you under the loan facility arrangement". The letter also stated that the parent company would not reduce their financial interests in the subsidiary company until the loan had been repaid. When during the negotiations the bank learned that a letter of comfort would be issued rather than a guarantee, its response was that it would probably have to charge a higher rate of interest. When later the subsidiary company went into liquidation without having paid, the bank brought an action against the parent company to recover the amount owing. The action failed since the parent company's statements made it clear that it did not intend to be legally bound.

A statement is sometimes an invitation to one or more other persons to make an offer. Such an invitation is not meant to bind the person who makes it. It may, however, produce effects later if it has provoked an offer and acceptance which refer to the terms stated in the invitation.

B. The appearance of intention

The Article provides that the intention of a party to enter into a binding legal relationship or bring about some other legal effect is to be determined from the party's statements or conduct as they were reasonably understood by the other party. This is consistent with the normal rule on the interpretation of unilateral juridical acts. See II.–8:201 (General rules).

This represents the law in many (probably the majority) of Member States. Others maintain their traditional position that a party who can prove that, despite an apparent intention, there was no actual intention to contract will not be liable in contract; but even in these laws the party will normally be liable on some other basis for having carelessly misled the other party. It seems better for the model rules to follow the first approach and hold a party liable on the basis of what reasonably appeared to the other party to be an intention to be bound or to produce some other legal effect.

C. Silence or inactivity

Silence or inactivity will generally not bind a person. However, specific exceptions from this rule are provided in several later Articles.

NOTES

I. Real or apparent intention?

Party bound by apparent intention

1. Even if a party had no intention to be legally bound, most of the laws will hold that the party is bound if the other party to whom the statement or other conduct was addressed had reason to assume that the first party intended to be bound. Whether this is the case is to be decided under the rules of interpretation.

2. The rule is provided in the DUTCH CC art. 3:35: a person's absence of intention cannot be invoked against another person to whom the declaration or conduct was addressed and who gave it a meaning which was reasonable in the circumstances. In AUSTRIA, a similar rule is inferred from CC §§ 861 and 863, see Schwimann (-Apathy and Riedler), ABGB IV[3], § 863 nos. 1-4: Applying the so-called Vertrauenstheorie (principle of confidence) a declaration of will and with it the intention to create legal relations is given the content that a reasonable person under the given circumstances would have inferred. This principle, however, does not apply if the addressee knew that the declaration was meant differently. In NORDIC law, the rule is based on an interpretation e contrario of the Contract Acts § 32, according to which an error in expression does not bind the promisor if the promisee knew or should have known of the mistake, see for DENMARK Dahl (-Møgelvang) 231 and Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 56; for SWEDEN, Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 180. In GREECE the rule is based on CC art. 200, which provides that contracts are to be interpreted in accordance with good faith, see A.P. l340/l977, NoB l978.l053; see also for GERMANY CC § 157 and Larenz and Wolf, Allgemeiner Teil des deutschen Bürgerlichen Rechts[8], § 28 paras. 16 ff. In ITALY and PORTUGAL the rules on interpretation apply to ascertain the intention of the parties; good faith and reasonableness play an important part, see on Italy*: Bianca*, Diritto civile III, 417 ff. and on Portugal Almeida, Negocio juridico 719 ff. However, the statement is not binding if the party who made it was convinced that the other party would realise that the statement was not serious or was not conscious of having made a statement, see CC arts. 245 and 246. In ESTONIA, ordinary rules on interpretation apply to ascertain the intention of the parties (GPCCA §§ 68, 75). Silence or inactivity is deemed to be a declaration of intention only if so prescribed by law, an agreement between the parties, practices which the parties have established between themselves or a usage observed in their field of activity (GPCCA § 68(4), LOA § 20(2)).

3. In POLAND a statement is not binding if the other party realises that it is not serious. (Cf. CC art. 83 § 1.) Otherwise, a unilateral mental reservation by a party who makes a statement is irrelevant. General rules on the interpretation of a declaration of will apply. Based on CC art. 65 which gives priority to the congruent intention of the parties and the purpose of their contract, courts and legal writers point out that one must first examine what has been understood by the parties. Only if their understanding is inconsistent, should objective standards be applied (see the Supreme Court's decisions of June 13, 1963, II CR 589/62, OSNCP 1964/10, poz. 200, and February 20, 1986, III CRN 443/85, OSNCP 1986/12, poz. 211). "Silence" in POLISH law generally does not amount to a declaration of will (e.g. acceptance of an offer). Nevertheless, in certain rare circumstances inactivity may produce legal effects.

4. In SLOVAKIA an expression of will aimed at the conclusion of an agreement and addressed to one or more certain persons is considered as an offer to conclude an agreement if it is sufficiently definite and if the offeror expresses the will to be bound in case of acceptance (CC § 43a sub-para. 1). A unilateral mental reservation by a party who makes a statement is irrelevant. General rules on the interpretation of a declaration of will apply. "Silence" in SLOVAK law generally does not amount to a declaration of will (CC § 44 sub-para. 1).

5. ENGLISH contract law is concerned with objective appearance rather than with the actual fact of agreement. The classic statement of the principle is that of Blackburn J. in Smith v. Hughes (187l) LR 6 QB 597, 607: "If, whatever, a man's real intention may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would believe that he was assenting to the terms proposed by the other party, and that the other party upon that belief enters into the contract with him, the man thus conducting himself would be equally bound as if he had intended to agree to the other party's terms." See also: The Hannah Blumental, [1983] 1 AC 854 (HL) and Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 1-002; for IRISH law, see Friel 78 ff.

6. In SCOTLAND see Muirhead & Turnbull v. Dickson [1905] 7 SC 686, 694: "… commercial contracts cannot be arranged by what people think in their inmost minds. Commercial contracts are made by what people say." See also MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, §§ 2.5-2.7.

7. In SPAIN the courts generally rely on CC art. 1281 (on the interpretation of contract terms) to hold as ineffective a "mental reservation" by one party as to the real intention to be bound. Even in a marriage contract a mental reservation will not allow a party to escape the obligatory effect of the contract. According to a solid body of doctrine, the individual "motives" of one party to a contract have no relevance at all; if these motives are not shared by the other party (see Morales, Comentario, 281).

8. § 43a(1) of the CZECH CC makes it clear that the offer to enter a contract is a manifestation of will aimed at conclusion of a contract. The "manifestation" as an objective factor is decisive. Although CC § 37(1) stipulates that seriousness of will is one of the essentials of a juridical act, the provision is interpreted in such a way that the absence of seriousness must be objectively recognisable so as to satisfy the principle of protection of good faith, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 245. Any reference to mental reservations in connection with juridical acts is disallowed, Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 154. The courts hold consistently that the contents of a juridical act may be interpreted according to the will of the parties only so far as it will not conflict with the language used (e.g. Supreme Court 25 Cdo 1116/2001).

9. In SLOVENIAN law, the intention of the party to conclude a contract can be expressed by statements or by conduct. It must be free and serious (LOA § 18). According to the principles of interpretation, priority must be given to the way it is reasonably understood by the addressee. A mental reservation of a party is not relevant, unless the other party knew that the statement was not serious.

10. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 207 in the event of a dispute, contractual statements are to be interpreted as the other party must have understood them in the light of the presumed intent of the person issuing the statement and the circumstances of the case, in accordance with the general accepted meaning of the words. Parties' secret reservations or concealed motives are immaterial, CC § 216.

11. In BULGARIAN law, the contract should be interpreted according to the "actual will of the parties" (LOA art. 20). This means that if there is no will even of one of the parties there should be no contract. Apparent will is considered however to be sufficient – although there is no special rule on this matter. Doctrine follows the German approach for most cases of apparent will (hidden dissensus) – s. Tadjer, V., Civil law. The subjective understanding of the other party however is of no importance – the objective criterion prevails – argument from the interpretation of contracts rule of LOA art. 20.

II. Subjective intention governs

12. Generally, in FRANCE, one can only be bound by a contract if one has shown an intention to be bound: to contract is to want (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 93). If there is a contradiction between the declarations made by one party and that party's real intention, the latter will prevail if it can be established with certainty; in the reverse situation, the declared intention will be taken into account. If there is a conflict between the internal intention and the declared intention and if that conflict is due to negligence on the part of the person who expressed the intention, that person may be held delictually liable (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 93). The same rules apply in LUXEMBOURG. The PORTUGUESE CC arts. 245 and 246 impose liability on a person who acted negligently when making a statement which was not meant seriously or which was made unconsciously.

III. Divided opinion

12. In BELGIUM there is one school which sticks to the traditional FRENCH "doctrine of the intention", see e.g. Verougstraete, TPR 1990, 1195-96, and another school which will apply the same rule as the one in the present Article, see van Ommeslaghe, Rev.dr.int.dr.comp. 1983, 144; M.E. Storme, RGDC/TBBR, 1993, 336; Stijns-Van Gerven-Wéry, JT 1996, 693-696; De Boeck, Informatierechten en –plichten, 2000, nos. 280-345; Van Gerven, 2006, 74-75; Stijns & Samoy, 2007, pp. 74 ff. The rule in the Article has been applied by the Cour de Cassation in a decision of 20 June 1988, Pas. belge 1988 I 1256, where it was held that a principal was bound by an act done by the representative when the third party had reason to rely on the representative's apparent authority; see also CA Brussels 26 May 1996, RGDC/TBBR, 1996, 333 where the rule was also applied.

II.–4:103: Sufficient agreement

(1) Agreement is sufficient if:

(a) the terms of the contract have been sufficiently defined by the parties for the contract to be given effect; or

(b) the terms of the contract, or the rights and obligations of the parties under it, can be otherwise sufficiently determined for the contract to be given effect.

(2) If one of the parties refuses to conclude a contract unless the parties have agreed on some specific matter, there is no contract unless agreement on that matter has been reached.

COMMENTS

A. Sufficient content to agreement

For there to be a contract there must be agreement and there must be a sufficient content to the agreement. The parties could draw up very full and precise terms in a written document but there would be no contract until they had agreed to be bound. If the contract was to be concluded by signatures, then there would only be a draft contract until the parties signed. However, agreement by itself is not enough. There must also be a sufficient content to the agreement. A vague and general agreement of the type "We hereby conclude a contract", without anything more, would not be a contract because it would not have sufficiently precise content. This Article is concerned with the second requirement – the need for sufficient content to the agreement.

The test used here is not, as in some laws, whether the "object" or the price of the contract have been agreed but a broader one of whether the agreement reached is sufficient, or can be fleshed out sufficiently, for the contract to be given effect. It must normally be possible to determine what each party has to do.

B. Terms defined by the parties

The parties may themselves define the terms of the contract with sufficient precision. Under paragraph (1)(a) the test of sufficient precision for this purpose is whether the contract can be given effect. This paragraph will apply where the contract is of a type where the rights and obligations of the parties are not laid down by the law or by applicable usages or practices.

Illustration 1
Two enterprises have entered into negotiations about their "future co-operation in the market". There will be no contract between them until they have agreed upon the essential features of their co-operation - that is, the main rights and obligations of both parties.

C. Content otherwise determinable

Most contracts belong to certain familiar and usual types (sale of goods, supply of services, employment, insurance, etc.). For these contracts the parties' agreement on the type of contract (e.g. sale) and a few crucial terms (type of goods and quantity) will suffice. If the parties are silent on other issues (e.g. price, quality, delivery) these issues will be decided either by the general rules in Chapter 9 (Contents and Effects of Contracts) of this Book (e.g.

II.–9:104 (Determination of price), II.–9:108 (Quality)) or by the rules of law applying to that particular type of contract (e.g. for sale contracts IV.A.–2:201 (Delivery)). These issues may also be determined by other means such as usages and practices between the parties.

D. Terms made essential

An agreement to negotiate a contract (a contract to contract) is in itself a binding contract which entails an obligation on both parties to make serious attempts to conclude the planned contract. However the parties are not obliged to reach agreement.

A party may consider a term to be so essential that assent to the contract will be dependent upon agreement on that point. For example, if the parties bargain over the price of the goods to be sold, they show that the price is a decisive term. Even points which are normally not considered essential points can be made so by one party.

However a party who has made one or more points essential for assent to the contract may nevertheless accept performance of the envisaged contract by the other party. In that case the contract is to be considered concluded by the conduct of the parties, and the rules and other factors, see comment C, will supply the disputed terms.

Although two parties have not agreed on all terms they may agree to commence performance. In that event, it will normally be assumed that they did after all intend a contract from that point on. The rules and factors mentioned in comment C may supply the missing terms so as to give sufficient content to the agreement for there to be a contract.

> Illustration 2
> A has negotiated with B to maintain B's computers every month for one year 'at a monthly fee to be agreed'. Although they have not agreed on A's fee they have decided that A will begin, and A does so. A reasonable fee will be payable, see II.–9:104 (Determination of price).

However, the parties' conduct may demonstrate that they have not concluded a contract:

> Illustration 3
> The facts are as before but they are still arguing over the fee when A starts work. After one month they realise that they cannot reach agreement and B asks A to stop. B will be liable to A under the rules of unjustified enrichment (Book VII) and will have to reverse the enrichment obtained by the receipt of A's services.

NOTES

I. Terms determinable

1. Under all the systems, there is only a contract when the terms of the parties' agreement can be determined. Questions may arise when the parties have left terms open, when they have agreed that they will later make a contract, and when they have made a framework agreement.

II. Object required

2. Some systems require that a contract has an object. Art. 1108 of the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs makes it a condition for the validity of a contract that the contract has an object which constitutes the subject matter of the agreement; see also the rules in arts. 1126-1130. In FRANCE, the object must be ascertained or ascertainable (art. 1129), licit and possible (Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], nos. 600 et seq.) Similar provisions are found in ITALIAN CC art. 1325(3) and arts. 1346-1349, in SPANISH CC arts. 1261 and 1271–1273, PORTUGUESE CC art. 280(1) and in the SLOVENIAN LOA §§ 34-38.

3. In POLISH law the object is a necessary element of a contract. The object of a contract generally is the conduct of one of the parties, i.e. performance of an obligation, which can be claimed by the other party (CC 353). In CZECH law the object is traditionally placed among the essentials of a contract (and it is seen – depending on the point of view – either as the contractually stipulated conduct of the parties or as the assets which are subject of the conduct of the parties, see Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 180). However, the term "object" is construed very extensively (it is assumed that each contract, intrinsically, has some object), so the concept usually does not have any major practical effect.

4. The purpose of the object is also to prevent agreements where one of the parties arbitrarily fixes the contents of the obligations, and the other party is left helpless. On recent developments in FRENCH law concerning the price, see Bénabent, Les obligations[7], nos. 148 f.

5. In SLOVAKIA the object must be possible (a juridical act concerning an impossible performance is invalid, CC § 37 sub-para. 2) and legal (a juridical act whose content or purpose are at variance with an Act, circumvent the Act or are at variance with good morals is invalid, CC § 39). According to the Ccom parties may conclude a contract of a type not specifically regulated. However, should the parties not sufficiently identify the subject matter of their obligations, then the contract is void. Parties may also agree that a certain part of a contract is to be subject to the parties' agreement on a procedure to enable the subsequent specification of the subject-matter of the contract, if this procedure does not depend on the will of only one party. If a court or a designated person is to specify the missing part of the contract, the agreement must be in writing. (Ccom § 269 sub-paras. 2, 3).

6. In BULGARIA, the consent of the parties should cover all the essentialia negotii, which is more than the "object" of the contract.

III. No requirement of object

7. An object is not mentioned as a requirement in the other legal systems. However, as provided in the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:227, it is everywhere a condition for the formation of a contract that "the obligations which the parties assume are determinable". The parties' agreement must make it possible for a court which is asked to enforce it (either specifically or by awarding damages) to do so, with the help of the terms of the contract and the rules of law, see the UNITED STATES Restatement 2d, § 33, and for AUSTRIA Schwimann (-Apathy and Riedler), ABGB IV[3], § 869 nos. 3 et seq.; Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 869 no. 5; for DENMARK, Ussing, Aftaler[3], 33; for FINLAND, Kivimäki & Ylöstalo, 167 f.; for GERMANY, RKGK (-Piper); Pref. to § 145 no. 3; and for GREECE, Full Bench of Areios Pagos 138l/1983, NoB 1984.1193-1194; A.P. 1186/1986 NoB 35 (1987) 901; 1473/1987 NoB 36 (1988) 1618; 393/2002 NoB 50 (2002) 1855.

8. The law of ENGLAND also requires that the parties' agreement is sufficiently definite to be enforced. There is no fixed minimum content; but if a critical term of the contract is left open or vague, and the court has no way of determining what was intended, the contract will fail, e.g. Scammell & Nephew Ltd. v. Ouston [1941] AC 251 (HL), where an agreement to 'sell' a truck 'on hire purchase terms' was held to be too imprecise, since the precise terms of the hire purchase were not settled and at that date such contracts took a variety of forms. The rule is the same in IRELAND; see Central Meat Products v. Corney (1944) 10 IrJurRep. 34. Also under SCOTTISH law the contract must be sufficiently clear to be enforceable, see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 5.19-5.33.

IV. Terms left open

9. Agreement between the parties to a contract is a condition for its formation. This is expressed in several laws, for instance FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1108, ITALIAN CC arts. 1321 and 1325(1) and SPANISH CC arts. 1258 and 1261.

10. However, the agreement of the parties need not always be perfect. After having ended their negotiations the parties may not have reached agreement on a term. Some point brought up by them or one of them has not been settled. Several of the laws seem to agree on the following rules. If the unsettled point is one which is generally regarded as material, there is no contract until agreement on that point is reached. If the term is generally considered to be immaterial the contract is considered to have been concluded, and the rules of law - or a later agreement - will settle the matter.

11. Parties may, however, have agreed expressly or by implication that their failure to settle a point which is normally material, such as the price, will not prevent the contract from coming into existence. In these cases the rules of law will supply the term which the parties have not agreed. This is not true in FRENCH law see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 188 in fine and Cass.soc. 19 déc. 1989). Conversely, one party may state or let the other party understand that a term, which is normally held to be immaterial, is considered to be material, and the parties' failure to reach agreement on that term will then prevent the conclusion of a contract, see for AUSTRIA, Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 869 no. 10; FRANCE, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 188; BELGIUM, Kruithof & Bocken 313 f, Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 99; DENMARK, Lynge Andersen 70 ff; FINLAND, Kivimäki & Ylöstalo, 188 f and SGA § 45; SPAIN, Durany, 1059 ff; and SWEDEN, Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 135.

12. The DUTCH CC art. 6:225 provides that where a reply which was intended to accept an offer only deviates from the offer on points of minor importance, the reply is considered to be an acceptance and the contract is formed according to the terms of the reply, unless the offeror objects to the difference without undue delay. This principle also covers terms which have been left open without there having been an offer and a reply. In that case the rules of law will decide the issue.

13. Although there is no express rule such as that in the Article, it holds true under POLISH law that the obligations which the parties assume must be determinable. If the parties are engaged in negotiations, pursuant to CC art. 72 § 1, a contract is deemed concluded once the parties have reached an agreement on all its provisions which have been the subject matter of negotiations. It means that in such situations Polish law makes no distinction between material and immaterial terms. This rigorous approach has been criticised by legal writers (see Brzozowski, Komentarz (red. Pietrzykowski), Art. 72). If one party makes an offer to be accepted by the other party, in accordance with CC art. 66, it is sufficient when the offer determines only the essential provisions of the contract proposed.

14. PORTUGUESE law makes no distinction between material and non-material terms. Every term is material if one of the parties considers it necessary for the agreement, see CC art. 232 and Vaz Serra 130 ff.

15. In ENGLISH and IRISH law the parties must have reached agreement, and if some matter is left 'to be agreed' there will be no concluded contract (May & Butcher Ltd. v R [1934] 2 KB 17n, HL) unless there are clear indications that the parties intended to be bound nonetheless (e.g. the matter was minor and they have commenced performance: Foley v. Classique Coaches [1934] 2 KB 1, CA). In SCOTLAND there are essentials in law for particular contracts on which the parties must have agreed before there is a contract, see also McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 5.11-5.18.

16. The GERMAN CC provides in § 154 that in case of doubt a contract is not concluded until the parties have agreed on all the points on which they or one of them require agreement. CC § l55 lays down that if the parties regard a contract as having been concluded, without realizing that in fact agreement has not been reached on some term, then what has been agreed upon is binding if it is shown that the contract would have been concluded even without agreement on that term, see MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, §§ 154, 155; Staudinger (-Dilcher), §§ 154, 155. GREEK CC arts. l95 and 196 has similar provisions as the GERMAN CC, see on their application, A.P. 69/1966 NoB 14 (1966) 800; 827/1986 EEN 54 (1987) 265, 266 I; Athens Court of Appeal 1010/1976 NoB 24 (1976) 737, 738 I. Furthermore, if the price is left open by the parties GERMAN law gives the creditor the right to fix it unilaterally under CC §§ 316, 315.

17. Under ITALIAN law, in order for a valid contract to come into existence parties have to reach an agreement at least on the essentials of the contract: see Roppo, Il contratto 456; Cataudella, 68 and, among others, Court of Cassation, 29 March 1995, no. 3705, Giust.civ. 1995, 2565. For a stricter approach see however Court of Cassation, 18 January 2005, no. 910, in I contratti 2006, 22 ff. Missing terms will be integrated by law, which failing by usages or equity, as provided for by CC art. 1374. Good faith is unanimously considered a further important source of integration of contract content and parties' duties: see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 500 ff. Nonetheless, parties may always decide to make the conclusion of a contract dependent on subsequent agreement on terms originally missing (see Cataudella, 68 and Court of Cassation, 9 January 1993, in Corr.giur. 1993, 574).

18. In SLOVENIAN law the contract is concluded when the parties reach an agreement on the material (essential) terms of the contract (LOA § 15). If there is no disagreement on the non-material terms, they are provided for by rules of law. If however the parties deliberately leave some non-material terms open and at the same time intend to enter a binding contract, they will be, if the parties are unable to reach an agreement on them, provided by the court, taking into account negotiations, practice established among the parties and usages (LOA § 22(2)).

19. In SLOVAKIA the parties may explicitly express their will that a contract with incomplete content is to be valid even if no agreement is reached on the rest of the content (CC § 50b).

20. ESTONIAN law does not specify under which conditions it is sufficiently clear that the parties have reached an agreement as a necessary element for the conclusion of a contract (LOA § 9(1)). Law (e.g. LOA § 27) and doctrine (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (- Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 9, no. 4.1.1.) make a distinction between material and non-material terms. For the contract to be concluded, it is generally necessary that material terms are determined or determinable in such a way that the right to performance could be enforceable by the court (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 9, no. 4.1.1.). Rules for terms deliberately left open by the parties (LOA § 26), absence of agreement on material terms (LOA § 27) and determination of price (LOA § 28) apply accordingly.19.

21. The CZECH CC holds a contract to be concluded only upon the unconditional acceptance of all of the proposed terms whether objectively material or not. According to CC § 44(2) an acceptance which contains additions, reservations, limitations or other amendments, is a refusal and is regarded as a new offer. But a reply which expresses the contents of the proposed contract in other words without changing the substance is regarded as an acceptance. There are two major exceptions to the principle that all the proposed terms must be accepted. The first follows from CC § 50b which allows for an agreement of the parties according to which the contents of a contract will be further supplemented, provided that the parties have manifested the intention at the same time that the contract should come into force despite the need for this supplementation. The second exception can be found in the Ccom: § 269(3) provides that in relation to a particular part of a contract the parties may agree on a method whereby the contents of the obligation can be determined later, provided that the method does not depend on the will of one of the parties only.

22. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 205(2) it is fundamental to the existence of a contract that an agreement is reached by the parties concerning all essential issues as well as those deemed essential by either of the parties. The parties need not agree on issues that are regulated by statutory provisions. CC § 213(2) An acceptance with contents which deviate from the offer is regarded as a new offer.

23. Under BULGARIAN law it is possible to have terms left open. Such terms should be determined later either by the parties or by a third person. If no consensus between the parties can be reached or if the third person refuses to determine the terms, the determination can be made by the court (Ccom arts. 299, 300). Although this rule is provided for business to business relations, it can be applied for business to consumer relations as well.

II.–4:104: Merger clause

(1) If a contract document contains an individually negotiated term stating that the document embodies all the terms of the contract (a merger clause), any prior statements, undertakings or agreements which are not embodied in the document do not form part of the contract.

(2) If the merger clause is not individually negotiated it establishes only a presumption that the parties intended that their prior statements, undertakings or agreements were not to form part of the contract. This rule may not be excluded or restricted.

(3) The parties' prior statements may be used to interpret the contract. This rule may not be excluded or restricted except by an individually negotiated term.

(4) A party may by statements or conduct be precluded from asserting a merger clause to the extent that the other party has reasonably relied on such statements or conduct.

COMMENTS

Merger clauses

When concluding a contract which is embodied in a document the parties sometimes agree that the document contains their entire agreement, and that earlier statements and agreements are not to be considered. Such a merger clause may be useful when during the negotiations the parties made promises and statements based on assumptions which were later abandoned. A merger clause which has been individually negotiated, i.e. inserted in the contract as a result of a mutual discussion between the parties, will prevent a party from invoking prior statements and agreements not embodied in the document. This follows from the principle of freedom of contract.

The merger clause will not apply to prior agreements or statements which, though made when the contract was negotiated, are distinct and separate from the contract.

If, on the other hand, the prior agreement is one which has such a connection with the contract that it would be natural to include it in the contract document, the merger clause will apply.

> Illustration
> During the negotiations for the sale of a property the parties orally agree that the seller will remove an unsightly ice house from a nearby tract. This agreement was not mentioned in the contract document which contained an individually negotiated merger clause. The buyer cannot require the ice house to be removed.

If, however, the merger clause has not been individually negotiated it will only establish a rebuttable presumption that the parties intended that their prior statements should not form part of the contract, see paragraph (2) of the Article. Experience shows that in such cases a party should be allowed to prove that the merger clause was not intended to cover a particular undertaking by the other party which was made orally or in another document. It often happens that parties use standard form contracts containing a merger clause to which they pay no attention. A rule under which such a clause would always prevent a party from invoking prior statements or undertakings would be too rigid and could often lead to results which were contrary to good faith.

A merger clause will not prevent the parties' prior statements from being used to interpret the contract. This rule in paragraph (3) of the Article applies also to individually negotiated merger clauses, but in an individually negotiated clause the parties may agree otherwise.

On a party's reliance on the other party's later conduct, see Comment B to the following Article.

NOTES

I. Merger clauses in general

Clauses upheld

1. A provision similar to that in paragraph (1) of the Article is to be found in the UNIDROIT Principles art. 2.1.17. A merger or 'entire contract' clause is conclusive in SCOTTISH law even if not individually negotiated (Contract (Scotland) Act 1997 s. 1(3)); but the un-negotiated term would be subject to regulation under the unfair contract terms legislation (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 5.56). The Article is also in accordance with PORTUGUESE law where it follows from CC art. 221 and the good faith principle that a person is not allowed go back on an agreement earlier made (venire contra factum proprium), and corresponds to the ESTONIAN LOA § 31. Merger clauses are generally enforced in the U.S.A., see Farnsworth II § 7, 3 ff. They are upheld under arts. 8, 11 CISG; see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), art. 8 no. 35.

2. Neither from CZECH law nor from Czech court practice can any particular conclusion on merger clauses be derived. It must probably be assumed that merger clauses require more or less strict respect, as the CC's provisions on interpretation of juridical acts clearly prefer the written terms of a contract over any other relevant circumstances (CC § 35(2)). Exceptions (if any) must be based on the assumption that the mutual consensus of the parties does not include the merger clause (especially in case of standard contract terms). The position is the same in SLOVAKIA and BULGARIA.

II. Merger clause probably not conclusive

3. This is so in ENGLAND. At one time it appears that English law prohibited the bringing of 'parol evidence' (that is, evidence of terms which were not contained in the document) to add to, vary or contradict a written contract. However, when faced with clear evidence that the parties had in fact agreed on some term which was not in the document, the courts evaded the rule by the simple expedient of saying that the contract was not wholly in writing, so that the rule did not apply, see for example J. Evans & Son (Portmouth) Ltd. v. Andrea Merzario Ltd. [1976] I WLR 1078, CA. As the Law Commission points out, this renders the rule meaningless, and it is now agreed that there is at most a presumption that the written document contains all the terms of the contract (Treitel, p 193). It is generally thought that a merger clause will do no more than add weight to this presumption (Law Commission, Report on Parol Evidence Rule) and it will not be conclusive; see Thomas Witter Ltd. v. TBP Industries Ltd. [1976] 2 AllER 573, noted at (1995) 111 LQR 385). However it has recently been suggested that the parties might be prevented from relying on the promise not contained in the writing under the doctrine of estoppel by convention: see Peekay

Intermark Ltd. v. Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd. [2006] EWCA Civ 386 at [56]. The Contract (Scotland) Act 1997 has abrogated the parol evidence rule for SCOTLAND. In IRELAND the rule, if it still exists, has been greatly modified, see Friel, 153-154. Under the CISG the parol evidence rule does not apply, see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schlechtriem), art. 11 no. 13.

4. Under DUTCH law, evidence of oral agreements may always be brought: there is no such thing as a parol evidence rule. The landmark case is HR 13 March 1981, Nederlandse Jurisprudentie 1981, 635 (Haviltex). It has been argued that clauses which purport to import the parol evidence rule into the Netherlands are invalid, at least when they are to be found in standard terms: Hondius, Entire Agreement Clauses 24-34.

5. In FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG and SPAIN merger clauses are reported to be rare, and there does not seem to be literature about them. They would probably be covered by the rules on proof of juridical acts or through the guidelines set up for the judges in the process of interpreting the contract (see CC arts. 1163 and 1161). In Spain the rules on interpretation may also be applied, see Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[4], paras. 259-261. Although merger clauses seem to be valid in commercial contracts in BELGIAN law, the authors tend to give the clauses a restrictive interpretation, see Storme, Invloed no. 183; Walschot (2004) 151.

6. Rules such as those provided in paras. (1) and (2) of the Article are not to be found in the ITALIAN CC and the issues have not been dealt with in the legal writing or in reported cases. On the one hand a rule on evidence in CC art. 2711 provides that "proof of witnesses is not permitted to establish clauses which have been added or are contrary to the contents of a document, and which are claimed to have been made prior to or at the same time as the document". This rule may be relevant for merger clauses. On the other hand CC art. 1362(2) on interpretation of contracts provides that "in order to ascertain the common intention of the parties, their common behaviour, also after the conclusion of the contract, shall be taken into account." This rule may exclude merger and no-oral modification clauses, but it may nonetheless lead to the conclusion that a merger clause is enforceable under CC art. 1322: see *A*ntoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 103. A party entitled to rely on parties' statements and conduct in contrast with a merger clause's content may invoke the venire contra factum proprium principle: Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 104.

7. Merger clauses are not dealt with in the GREEK CC, nor in the reported cases. Whether they will be enforced will probably be viewed as a question of interpretation and of CC art. 200, which provides that "contracts are to be interpreted in accordance with good faith having regard to business practices". This provision is mandatory in the sense that parties are not allowed to contract out of it, see Balis para. 53, Filios, Principles § 174B, Georgiadis, Principles § 41 No. 6, Papantoniou para. 64 1, pp. 347-349; cf. A.P. 908/1978 NoB 27 (1979) 758; 240/1995 EllDik 37 (1996) 681; 154/2002 EllDik 43 (2002) 1638.

8. The rules laid down in the Article are not found in the POLISH CC and these issues have not been dealt with in the legal writing or reported cases. It is generally held that the parties' prior statements (including those made during their negotiations) may be used to interpret the contract (see the Supreme Court's decision of July 4, 1975, III CRN 160/75, OSPiKA 1977/1, poz. 6).

III. Merger clauses disregarded.

9. In the other countries of the union a merger clause has the effect that the written contract is presumed to contain a complete record of the contract terms, but the courts will admit evidence of an oral agreement whereby the parties expressly or impliedly decide to disregard a merger clause. If the court is convinced, the merger clause will be disregarded, and an oral agreement which adds to it or varies it will be enforced. This holds true of the law in GERMANY, Larenz and Wolf, Allgemeiner Teil des deutschen Bürgerlichen Rechts[8], § 27 V p 528 and Boergen; Die Effektivität von Schriftformklauseln, BB 1971, 202; see also BGH WM 1966, 1335; BGHZ 66, 378; for AUSTRIA see the presumption is provided in CC § 884. For DENMARK see, Lynge Andersen 93 and for Sweden see, Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 264. In FINLAND, a negotiated term, even if made orally, takes priority over written standard form terms. Parties may orally agree to disregard a merger clause, see Telaranta 191; Wilhelmsson, Standardavtal 86. In SLOVENIA, LOA § 56(1) provides that if the contract has to be concluded, by law or by agreement, in a certain form, only agreements embodied in this form are part of the contract. However, paras. (2) and (3) allow simultaneous oral agreements to become a part of contract under some circumstances. Consequently, a merger clause constitutes a rebuttable presumption.

IV. Not-individually negotiated merger clauses

10. With the possible exception of THE NETHERLANDS, few of the countries seem to make any distinction between individually and not individually negotiated merger clauses. However, the Indicative and illustrative list of terms which may be regarded as unfair, annexed to the EEC Council Directive on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts of 5 April 1993 includes in para. (n) a term which has the object or effect of limiting the seller's or the supplier's ob1igation to respect commitments undertaken by a representative or making commitments subject to compliance with a particular formality. Under this rule a merger clause will (semble) not be upheld. § 10(3) of the AUSTRIAN Consumer Protection Act invalidates clauses like the one mentioned in para. (1) (n) of the EEC list of terms. In accordance with paragraph (2) of the present Article, the ESTONIAN LOA § 31(2) states that if a merger clause is prescribed in standard terms, it is only presumed that the parties intended their prior declarations of intent, acts or agreements to be deemed not to form part of the contract, i.e. the effect of the clause is left to be decided by the rules on standard terms (LOA §§ 37 ff), see Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 31, no. 4.2.

11. As under the PORTUGUESE Decree Law 446 / 85 of October 25 1985, art. 7, on standard terms, and POLISH CC art. 385 § 1, individually negotiated terms take priority over terms in a standard form contract; a merger clause in such a contract cannot set aside a prior or simultaneous individual agreement. The same is true of ITALY (see CC art. 1342), where in order for a merger clause contained in standard terms to be effective it is also necessary that the adhering party knew, or should have known, of the standard terms at the time of conclusion of the contract by using ordinary diligence (see CC art. 1341).

V. Extrinsic evidence on interpretation of the contract

12. In the systems which enforce merger clauses, it is generally held that the parties' prior statements may be used to interpret the contract, see UNIDROIT Principles art. 2.1.17, second sentence, and the notes to II.–8:101 (General rules) and II.–8:102 (Relevant matters) in the Chapter on interpretation, below.

13. Under ESTONIAN law, LOA § 31(3) allows the parties' prior statements to be used to interpret the contract even in the case of a merger clause. Subject to the principle of good faith, this rule may be excluded by the express agreement of the parties (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 31, no. 4.3)

II.–4:105: Modification in certain form only

(1) A term in a contract requiring any agreement to modify its terms, or to terminate the relationship resulting from it, to be in a certain form establishes only a presumption that any such agreement is not intended to be legally binding unless it is in that form.

(2) A party may by statements or conduct be precluded from asserting such a term to the extent that the other party has reasonably relied on such statements or conduct.

COMMENTS

A. 'No oral modification' clauses in general

Contract terms which provide that modification or termination by agreement must be in writing (or some other specified form) often occur, especially in long-term contracts. Under this Article such clauses will only establish a rebuttable presumption that any such later oral agreements or agreements made by conduct were not intended to be legally binding. It would be contrary to good faith to let the parties' agreement to use a particular form bind them to that form when later they have clearly made up their minds to use another form. If, therefore, it can be shown that both parties agreed to a modification of the contract terms or a termination of the contractual relationship, but did not use the specified form, effect must be given to their agreement. This applies even if in an individually negotiated clause in their contract they provided that they would not give effect to an oral agreement to disregard the "no oral modification" clause.

B. Reliance in spite of a merger or 'no oral modification' clause

If the parties have reached an oral agreement – for example, they have agreed orally to modify a contract that contains a merger clause or a "no oral modification" clause - but it cannot be shown that they have agreed to disapply the clause, yet one party has reasonably acted in reliance on the oral agreement, the other party will be precluded from invoking the clause

> Illustration
> A construction contract contains a clause providing that "this contract may only be modified in writing signed by both parties". Subsequently the parties orally agree to some changes in favour of the owner. The changed obligations are performed. When later the contractor invokes another oral modification made in its favour the owner invokes the "no oral modification clause.

The contractor may invoke the performance of the obligations as modified by the first oral agreement to show that the second oral agreement, in favour of the contractor, is binding on the owner. The contractor has in fact relied on the abrogation of the "no oral modification" clause.

NOTES

I. Evidential value only

1. The rule in paragraph (1) which only gives evidential weight to the written modifications clause is in accordance with the laws of most of the countries of the Union as far as contracts in general are concerned.

2. Thus in FINNISH, DANISH and SWEDISH law, even if the parties have agreed that any modification of their contract is without effect unless made in writing, they may nevertheless later orally agree to disregard their previous no-oral modification agreement. However, a party invoking such a later oral agreement has to prove it, see Ramberg, Köplagen, 108, and. Bryde Andersen: Grundlæggende 235 and Finnish case law e.g. CC 1998:75 (Finnish Supreme Court in e.g. Sisula-Tolokas, Twenty Cases).

3. The same appears to be the case in GERMAN law see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schlechtriem), art. 29 no. 19. Parties who "seriously and definitely" wish to make an informal modification of a contract which contains a no-oral modification clause may do so. Such an informal agreement may, however, be difficult to prove, see Dölle (-Reinhardt), Kommentar zum einheitlichen Kaufrecht, art. 15 no. 68. The position of SLOVENIAN law is the same, see LOA § 52(2), (3), (4). 4. The Supreme Court of GREECE has held that even if the parties have agreed to conclude their contract in writing, they may later orally agree to modify it (A.P. 1054/1976, NoB 25 (1977), 508). Even contracts for which the law requires form for their modification may be ended by oral agreement (A.P. l376/ 1982, EEN 50 (1983), 600).

5. Paragraph (1) also appears to be in accordance with the law of ENGLAND and IRELAND, although there is no authority on this exact point. There are cases holding that a contractor cannot recover extra payment when under the terms of a building contract a written instruction for a variation of the contract should have been obtained, see Hudson §§ 7-055-058.

6. The ITALIAN CC art. 1352 provides: "If the parties have agreed in writing to adopt a specified form for their future contract, it is presumed that such a form was intended as a requirement for the validity of the contract". The same rule applies if parties to a contract have agreed in writing that any subsequent modification or addition will be made in a specific form: Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 106 and Court of Cassation, 14 April 2000, no. 4861, in I contratti 2000, 873. Special formalities may also be agreed for acts which enforce already existing rights and duties such as acts of communication or performance, see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 300.

II. A mixed approach, or the law is unsettled

7. In those countries which refuse to admit proof of the existence of civil contracts not made in writing, modifications must also be in writing, see FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1341. A specific example of this: under art. l793, in a contract providing a fixed price for the work as a whole, architects and contractors may only demand an increase in the price for extra work if this extra work and its price have been agreed in writing.

8. In BELGIUM, however, the courts have admitted evidence by other means than writing of agreements on extra work in building contracts, once the extra work has been performed, see Cass. 22 March 1957, Pas. belge I, 887. Likewise in SPAIN both CC art. 1593 and the Supreme Court admit oral and tacit agreements on payment for extra work in building contracts once the work has been carried out (see Supreme Court decision of 25 January 1989 RAJ (1989) 126). Relying on the prescribed written consent may amount to abuse of right, where the party is proved to have orally agreed (Supreme Court decision of 20 December 1990 RAJ (1990) 10364). Likewise in FRANCE where reliance is a criterion which is becoming more and more important (see. D. Mazeaud's report, RTDC 2004).

9. In FRANCE the question whether in commercial contracts which need not be made in writing, no-oral modification clauses are valid, has not arisen. The rule is that agreements on evidence, be it agreements on whether evidence is to be admitted or on the effects of such evidence, are enforced.

10. As any evidence is admitted for the existence of a commercial contract covered by art. L.110-3 of the FRENCH and art. 25 of the BELGIAN Commercial Codes, the parties may orally agree to disregard a previous no-oral modification clause (Dölle (-Reinhardt), Kommentar zum einheitlichen Kaufrecht, 105, who for FRANCE quotes Schlessinger (-Bonassies) II 165).

11. No-oral modification clauses are generally not enforced in the USA, see Farnsworth II 228 ff. However the UCC § 2-209(2) enforces such clauses in sales contracts, but, except as between merchants, such a requirement on a form supplied by a merchant must be separately signed by the other party if the other is not also a merchant.

III. No-oral modification clauses enforced

12. CISG gives effect to no-oral modification clauses. Art. 29(2), first sentence, provides that a contract in writing which contains a provision requiring any modification or termination by agreement to be in writing may not be otherwise modified or terminated by agreement, see also UNIDROIT Principles art. 2.1.18. The ESTONIAN LOA § 13(2) is similar. AUSTRIAN law is reported to give effect to no-oral modification clauses except in consumer contracts.

13. According to POLISH law, modification of a contract has to be made in the same form which either legal provision or the parties provided for its conclusion (CC 77). Accordingly, if the parties required writing for the validity of their agreement any subsequent modification must be in writing as well. Unless stated otherwise by the parties, writing is required for evidential purposes only. Therefore, although an oral agreement on modification would be valid, there are serious restraints as to its proof. Where the written form provided for evidential purposes is not observed, evidence by witnesses or evidence in the form of statements made by the parties concerning the performance of the act, is not admissible, unless (i) both parties consent to that effect, (ii) a consumer so demands in a dispute with a business, or (iii) the fact of the performance of the act in law is made probable in writing. The provisions requiring writing for evidential purposes are not applicable to juridical acts in business relations (CC art. 74).

14. The SLOVAK CC § 40 sub-para. 2 provides that "a written agreement may be changed or cancelled only in writing". According to the SLOVAK Ccom, should a contract which has been concluded in writing include provisions stipulating that the contract may be amended or cancelled by an agreement of the parties in writing, then the contract may be amended or cancelled only in writing. (Ccom § 272 sub-para. 2).

15. The CZECH CC simply provides that a contract concluded in writing may be modified or terminated only in writing (§ 40(2)). It makes no difference whether the written form is required by the law or whether the parties chose this form of their own will. In commercial relations, Ccom § 272(2) applies according to which if a contract concluded in writing contains a provision that it may be modified or terminated only by an agreement in writing, then the contract may be modified or terminated only in writing. So a modification agreement made orally contrary to the contract may be at best an aid to interpretation; see Štenglová/Plíva/Tomsa, Commercial Code[10], 1011.

16. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 218(3) if the validity of a contract requires a definite form determined by law or the agreement of the parties, termination or cancellation is normally valid only if in the specified form. However, this can be overridden by the parties' mutual consent.

17. BULGARIAN law provides that modifications of a contract should be made in the form of the original contract (Ccom art. 293(6)). Non-conformity with the required form makes the contract void (Ccom art. 293(2), LOA art. 26(2)).

IV. Reliance despite merger clauses and no oral modification clause

18. Paragraph (2) of the Article provides that a party by word or conduct may be precluded from invoking a no-oral modification clause if the other party has acted in reliance on the words or conduct. Similar rules are provided for the no-oral modification clause in US UCC arts. 2.209(4) and (5), CISG art. 29(2) second sentence and UNIDROIT art. 2.18. The same rules on reliance apply in AUSTRIAN law, see Schwimann (-Apathy), ABGB IV[3], § 884 no. 3 and in ESTONIAN law (LOA § 13(3)). In BULGARIA too the good-faith reliance of a party on the (informal and null) statement is protected by the law – the other party cannot invoke the nullity if it did not challenge the validity of the statement upon its receipt (Ccom art. 293(3)).

19. Even though they give effect to merger and 'no-oral modification' clauses, in those countries which allow the good faith and fair dealing principle to operate generally, a reliance rule will probably apply. In GREEK law the principle of venire contra factum proprium would apply. On ITALIAN CC arts. 1175, 1337 and 1375 see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 422 ff and 500 ff. In FRANCE, see Mazeaud's report.

20. In ENGLAND reliance may be invoked based on the doctrine of estoppel. If in a binding contract the court finds that the employer allowed extra work to be done, the contractor may recover payment for this work although the employer did not consent in writing as required by the contract, see Hudson §§ 7-094 - 097.

21. In SPAIN, reliance may be invoked on the doctrine of the abuse of right, as a form of abuse consisting in defending voidability on formal grounds only (see, Bercovitz [-Carrasco] Comentarios al Código Civil, 2006, 66).

Section 2: Offer and acceptance

II.–4:201: Offer

(1) A proposal amounts to an offer if:

(a) it is intended to result in a contract if the other party accepts it; and

(b) it contains sufficiently definite terms to form a contract.

(2) An offer may be made to one or more specific persons or to the public.

(3) A proposal to supply goods from stock, or a service, at a stated price made by a business in a public advertisement or a catalogue, or by a display of goods, is treated, unless the circumstances indicate otherwise, as an offer to supply at that price until the stock of goods, or the business's capacity to supply the service, is exhausted.

COMMENTS

A. The "offer and acceptance model"

This section deals with contracts concluded by an offer followed by an acceptance, which is the usual model for the conclusion of contracts.

However, there are other models for the conclusion of a contract. Agreements are often made under circumstances where it is not possible to analyse the process of conclusion into an offer and an acceptance. The rules of this section may sometimes apply to these cases.

B. Requirements for an offer to become effective

An offer is a proposal to make a contract. If it is accepted it becomes a contract provided that the general requirements for concluding a contract are met.

For a proposal to amount to an offer it must (a) show an intention that a contract is to result if it is accepted; and (b) contain terms which are sufficiently definite. Before it can be effective it must also be communicated to one or more specific persons or to the public. This follows from the general rules on the making of juridical acts.

C. Proposals to the public

Proposals which are not made to one or more specific persons (proposals to the public) may take many shapes - advertisements, posters, circulars, window displays, invitations for tenders, auctions etc. These proposals are generally to be treated as offers if they show an intention to be legally bound if they are accepted. However, proposals made in circumstances where the personal qualities of the other party are likely to be important are generally presumed to be invitations to make offers only. This applies to an advertisement of a house for rent at a certain price. Further, an advertisement for a job-opening for persons who meet certain requirements does not oblige the advertiser to employ a person offering his or her services and meeting the requirements. Construction contracts are often made on the basis of public bidding. Owners generally only invite tenders, which are the offers.

Other considerations may also lead to the assumption that, unless otherwise indicated, a proposal is only an invitation to make an offer.

Putting up an item for auction is generally only an invitation to bid. The auctioneer need not accept a bid and may withdraw the goods if the highest bid is too low. The bid is the offer which is accepted by the fall of the hammer. A clear indication that the goods are sold "without reserve" or the like may, however, turn putting them up for auction into an offer.

On the other hand, in order for a proposal to have effect it may be necessary for the proposer to make an offer which may be binding if accepted. This applies for example to an offer of a commission if a representative effects a sale of the proposer's property. Furthermore, persons who make advertisements etc. may wish prospective suppliers or purchasers to know that they will be able to deliver or acquire the goods or services by accepting the proposal, and that they do not risk refusal of their "acceptance" and the consequent waste of their efforts and reliance costs. Therefore, proposals which are sufficiently definite and which can be accepted by anybody without respect of person are to be treated as offers. This consideration has led to the provision in paragraph (3) and will also result in a proposal being an offer in other cases.

Illustration 1
Company A advertises in a trade paper that it will buy "all fresh eggs delivered to our premises before 22 February" and pay a certain price. A's advertisement is to be considered an offer which may be accepted by bringing the eggs to its premises.

Illustration 2
In the local paper Bell advertises a plot of land for sale to the first purchaser to tender €25,000 in cash. This constitutes an offer and when Mart tenders €25,000 there is a contract.

D. Goods and services offered at stated prices

Paragraph (3) provides that a proposal to supply goods from stock, or a service, at a stated price made by a business in a public advertisement or a catalogue or by display of goods is regarded, unless the circumstances indicate otherwise, as an offer to supply at that price until the stock of goods, or the business's capacity to supply the service, is exhausted.

The business which advertises goods in the way described is, unless otherwise indicated, taken to have a reasonable stock of goods and a reasonable capacity to provide services.

The rule applies only if the circumstances do not indicate that the proposal is not intended to be an offer. A different intention may appear from the advertisement, etc. and may follow from the circumstances. Thus, if the goods or services are offered on credit terms the business may refuse to deal with persons of poor credit-worthiness.

Although the "offer and acceptance" model is known throughout the laws of the Member States, the precise application of it differs. In particular some laws do not normally recognise an offer by a business to supply goods at a stated price, or a display of goods marked with a price, as an offer. However the rule adopted in paragraph (3) seems preferable, since otherwise a business may mislead customers into thinking that goods or services are available at prices at which the business has no intention to supply them.

NOTES

I. The "offer and acceptance" model in the laws

1. The "offer and acceptance" model, by which one person makes an offer to another person which the latter accepts, has been the prototype for the conclusion of contracts in all the legal systems of the Union, see GERMAN CC §§ l45-l50, AUSTRIAN CC §§ 861-864a, NORDIC Contract Acts §§ l-9, GREEK CC arts. 185-192, ITALIAN CC arts. 1326-1329, DUTCH CC arts. 6:2l7- 6:225, CZECH CC §§ 43a–45, ESTONIAN LOA §§ 16-22, SLOVENIAN LOA §§ 21-32, SLOVAK CC §§ 43a–51; HUNGARIAN CC §§°211-214;. BULGARIAN LOA arts. 13-14; and POLISH CC arts. 66-70. The same is true in the ENGLAND, IRELAND and SCOTLAND jurisdictions: see e.g. Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], chap. 2; Gloag and Henderson para. 5.09. It is also the main model used in CISG part II, arts. 14-24, and in chapter 2 of the UNIDROIT Principles. In all the countries of the Union, including those which do not have any statutory provisions on the conclusion of contracts in general, writers treat the offer and acceptance as the principal model.

II. What is required for an offer to be binding?

2. All the laws of the UNION require that the offer must show an intention to be bound, and that it must be sufficiently definite to establish an enforceable contract. Thus the AUSTRIAN CC § 869 provides that "the acceptance of an offer as well as the offer itself must be declared freely, seriously, precisely and intelligibly." SPANISH law also requires seriousness of intention, definitiveness and completeness, see Supreme Court decisions of 28 May l945 RAJ (1945) 692 and 10 October l980, RAJ (1980) 3623. The general rule is also followed in BELGIUM (see e.g. Cass. 23 Sept. 1969, Pas. belge 1970, 73, RCJB 1971, 216). The ITALIAN CC does not contain any specific definition of the term "offer", but both scholars (see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 214 f.; Roppo, Il contratto 101) and case law (see, among others, Court of Cassation 24 May 2001, Giust.civ.Mass 2001, no. 7094 and 3 July 1990, published in excerpt in Bessone, Casi e questioni di diritto privato 813 ff) require a proposal purporting to be an offer to show the offeror's intention to be legally bound and to specify the essentials of the proposed deal with sufficient certainty. POLISH law requires that the offer is a firm proposal to conclude a contract and that it "defines essential terms of this contract" (CC art. 66 § 1). The "firm" proposal means that the conclusion of a contract then depends on the offeree and is made by acceptance of the offer. The term "offer" need not be used; as every declaration of will that fulfils basic requirements specified in CC art. 66 constitutes an offer (see the Supreme Court's decision of September 28, 1990, III CZP 33/90, OSPiKA 1991/3, poz. 70). Similarly, the SLOVENIAN LOA § 22(1) defines an offer as a proposal for conclusion of a contract, addressed to a specific person, containing all the essential terms of the contract, so that the contract would be concluded by mere acceptance. An intention of the offeror to be legally bound is also required (Juhart and Plavšak, Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 237). The BULGARIAN law states also that the offer is binding for the offeror – LOA art. 13; the offer however should contain all the terms of the contract. Under ENGLISH and IRISH law a proposal does not amount to an offer if it expresses some reservation on the part of the maker or if the terms proposed are not sufficiently specific. On both points see, e.g., the English case of Gibson v. Manchester City Council [1979] 1 WLR 294, HL The ESTONIAN LOA § 16(1) corresponds to paragraph (1) of the present Article. The SLOVAK CC § 43a sub-para. 1 provides that an expression of will aimed at the conclusion of an agreement and addressed to one or more certain persons is to be considered as an offer to conclude an agreement if it is sufficiently definite and if the offeror expresses in it a will to be bound in case of acceptance. The SLOVAK Ccom § 269 sub-para. 2 allows parties to conclude a contract of a type not specifically regulated. However, should the parties not sufficiently identify the subject matter of their obligations, then the contract is void. CZECH CC requires the offer to be definite enough and the offeror's will to be bound in case of acceptance (§ 43a(1)); additional requirements are given in CC § 37(1)– the offer must be made freely, seriously, definitely and understandably.

III. Proposals to the public

3. All the legal systems accept that in some situations proposals to the public may amount to an offer. However, in a number of situations the laws reach different results on the question whether a proposal is an offer. Most of them have general principles, and provide special rules applicable to special situations.

4. The ITALIAN CC art. 1336(1) provides that a proposal to the public which contains the main elements of the contract towards whose formation the proposal is directed is effective as an offer unless it appears otherwise from the proposal or from usages, see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 251, who stresses the necessity of a clear undertaking.

5. For the international sale of goods, CISG art. 14(2) provides that a proposal other than one addressed to one or more specific persons is to be considered merely an invitation to make offers unless the contrary is clearly indicated by the person making the proposal.

6. Paragraph (2) differs from the ITALIAN rule and CISG in that it does not establish a presumption one way or the other, but leaves the issue to be decided by the rules of interpretation. This also appears to the attitude taken by the UNIDROIT Principles which do not provide rules on offers to the public.

7. SPANISH courts and established legal doctrine agree that offers made to the public amount to contractual offers if the following requirements are met: (1) there is an intention to be bound; (2) the essential terms of the contract are established and (3) the offer can be known by the third parties (Supreme Court Judgments 10 October 1980, RJ 3623, 30 May 1996, RJ 3864, 26 Febrero 1994, RJ 1198; Moreno, La Oferta de Contrato, p. 146; Gómez, Comentarios, p. 66).

8. The SLOVENIAN LOA § 22(3) provides that a proposal addressed to an undetermined number of persons generally does not constitute an offer but an invitation to make offers, unless the circumstances indicate otherwise. However, a display of priced goods is considered an offer, unless the circumstances or usages indicate otherwise, LOA § 23.

9. In BULGARIAN commercial law the invitation to make an offer (Ccom art. 290) as well as the offer to the public (Ccom art. 291) are regulated. The distinction between them depends however on the concrete circumstances.

10. In POLISH law an offer can be addressed to one or more specific persons as well as to the public, see: Radwański, System prawa prywatnego, II, Supl., 26. However, in case of doubt as to their legal effects, advertisements, notices, price-lists and other information directed to the public or to specific persons, are not considered as offers, but as invitations to take steps to conclude a contract (CC art. 71).

11. CZECH law is based on the concept that the offer must be made to one or more individually identified persons; Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 292, Knappová (- Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law II, 37. The most important exception to this principle are consumer contracts where it is inferred that even a proposal to the public may establish the offer (CC § 53 and Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Hulmák), OZ[10], 346). Other public offer provisions may be found e.g. in the Copyright Act (as to the license agreements, with special regard to software license agreements - § 46(5)), or in the Ccom (§§ 276 et seq., which sets forth quite detailed regulation on how the public offer may be repealed, with whom of the acceptors the contract is concluded etc.).

12. According to the SLOVAK law an offer can be addressed to one or more certain persons (CC § 43a sub-para. 1). The SLOVAK Ccom § 276 sub-para. 1 provides that a manifestation of will by an offering party towards unspecified persons in order to conclude a contract is to be deemed a public offer to conclude a contract.

13. Apart from these rules there are no general statutory provisions on the subject in the European Union. Its regulation is left to the courts. Whether a proposal to the public is an offer or only an invitation to make an offer has been a question of interpretation of the proposal. However, the rules of interpretation which the courts have established differ.

14. In FRANCE the courts have shown an inclination to treat proposals to the public as offers, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 114. However, in some contracts the offeror wants to know the identity of the other party. Therefore in France, as in BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, the proposal is probably only an offer if the proponent will be ready to conclude a contract without further investigations once the proposal has been accepted, see for Belgium (see Cornelis, TBH 1983, 39). But there is an exception when the content corresponds to an offer, e.g. advertisements in catalogues (see De Boeck, Informatierechten en –plichten, (2000) no. 269) and for FRANCE, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 114.

15. In ENGLAND, IRELAND and SCOTLAND proposals to the public are in general treated as invitations to make an offer, but they may amount to an offer, see Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. [1893] 1 QB 256. CA; Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-007-2-011; and the IRISH case of Billings v. Arnott (1945) 80 ILTR 50, HC. In SCOTLAND they may also amount to a unilateral promise McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 2.27. In AUSTRIAN law the proposal to the public does not, as a rule, qualify as an offer since it is not sufficiently definite and therefore does not show any intention of the offeror to be bound, see OGH 3 October 1972, SZ 45/102. It is treated as a mere invitation to anybody who might be interested to negotiate.

16. In the NETHERLANDS there is no general rule. An offer in an advertisement to sell immovable property will generally be an invitation to submit an offer, even if the person who is the first to respond agrees to pay the full price charged. But a department store which offers a free teddy bear to every purchaser who buys goods for over a certain amount will generally be bound.

IV. Specific issues

(a) Proposals to supply goods and services at stated prices

17. The presumption established in paragraph (3) applies in several countries to proposals made in advertisements in the press and in the television, and to advertising material and price lists communicated to a large number of addressees: for DENMARK, see Lynge Andersen 54 ff; for BULGARIA, Ccom art. 291, sent. 2; for ITALY, see Bianca, La vendita e la permuta 247, who maintains that in the retail business such proposals remain offers as long as there is stock at hand; and PORTUGUAL, see Almeida Negocio juridico 804.

18. In FRANCE it has been held that such proposals constitute offers "which bind the offeror to the first acceptor" unless the contrary follows from the proposal or from the circumstances, see French Cass.civ. 28 November 1968, Bull.civ. III 389. A proposal for an employment, a lease, the granting of loan or other contracts where the proponent may want to know the personal characteristics of the other party are only invitations to make an offer, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 113 and Bénabent, Les obligations[7], no. 58. BELGIAN law does not generally regard proposals made in advertisements in papers as offers, see Cornelis, Tidschridt voor Belgisch Handelsrecht 1983, 39. The same holds true for GERMAN law but proposals may by way of interpretation be qualified as binding offers, see MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, § l45 no. 10.

19. In ENGLISH law public advertisements of goods are generally invitations to make offers, see Grainger & Son v. Gough [1896] AC 325, HL) and Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para 2-010. SCOTTISH law is to the same effect, see Hunter v. General Accident Corporation 1909 SC 344, aff'd. 1909 SC (HL) 30 and McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 6.25-6.27. In AUSTRIA such proposals generally are also not treated as offers (Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 861 nos. 7 et seq.).

20. In SWEDEN and DENMARK advertisements are invitations to make offers. When such offers are made Danish authors hold that the rule in the Contract Acts § 9 on the binding effect of silence by the offeree to the offer applies, see Lynge Andersen 56 f and Bryde Andersen, Grundlæggende 183 f. In Sweden that is uncertain, see Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 104, Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[10], 55. That advertisements are invitations to make offers is also the prevailing view in FINLAND, see Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 107-108.

21. In CZECH law, a public advertisement may result in an offer only if made to consumers (Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Hulmák), OZ[10], 346) and if it is specific enough (i.e. the supplier, the goods and the price are definitely specified). In other cases, advertisements or proposals not addressed to one or several identified persons are only invitations to make an offer.

22. In SLOVENIA proposals with stated prices made in the newspapers, television, or in catalogues etc. generally do not constitute offers but invitations to treat, LOA § 24(1). However, the supplier is liable in damages to the offeror, if the supplier rejects the offer without good reason, LOA § 24(2).

(b) Display of priced goods

23. In FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG and BELGIUM, displays of priced goods in windows and self-service stores are held to be offers, see in FRANCE: Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 113 and Bénabent, Les obligations[7], no. 58 and in BELGIUM Dekkers, II no. 92; Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, (2006) 156. The same applies in SPAIN; see Retail Trading Act (1996), art. 9, where special rules apply to consumer contracts. In ITALY too a priced display is considered an offer to the public, see note (a) (aa) above and Roppo, Il contratto 112. This is also true of PORTUGAL, see Almeida, Negocio juridico 804 and Hörster 45, BULGARIA, see Kozhuharov, Law of Obligations, 65 and SLOVENIA, see LOA § 23. In DENMARK a shopkeeper is taken to have made an offer of the displayed goods, but not of all goods which are in stock, see Lynge Andersen 54. In POLAND, the display of goods with the price to the public at a place of sale is deemed an offer of sale (CC art. 543).

24. In DENMARK there is some support for the view that advertisements in interactive media such as the internet are binding offers UfR 2003. 907, Lynge Andersen 57 f and Bryde Andersen, Grundlæggende 184 f.

25. Displays of priced goods in shops and markets are normally treated as invitations to make an offer in ENGLISH law and in IRISH law, see for ENGLAND, Fisher v. Bell [1961] 1 QB 394 (display of goods in shop window) and Pharmaceutical Society of GB v. Boots Cash Chemists (Southern) Ltd. [1953] 1 QB 401, CA (display of goods marked with prices on self-service shop shelves) and, for IRELAND, Minister for Industry and Commerce v. Pim [1966] IR 156. The same holds true of GERMANY, see BGH 16 January 1980, NJW l980, 1388; AUSTRIA, see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 861 no. 7; ESTONIA, see Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 16, no. 4.2; SWEDEN, see Grönfors, Avtalslagen 28; and in FINLAND, see Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 107. SCOTTISH law is probably the same, but has been criticised as being contrary to normal expectations, see Walker, Contracts, para. 7.9.

(c) Auctions

26. Applying the offer-acceptance model, some laws consider the putting up of property for an auction as an invitation, and each bid as an offer which lapses when a higher bid is made; the final bid is then accepted if and when the agreed concluding step is taken – i.e. the step which indicates acceptance of the highest bid. In traditional auctions this might be when the auctioneer lets the hammer fall. This rule, which means that either party may withdraw an offer before the concluding step, such as the fall of the hammer, is applied in GREECE, see CC art. 199; PORTUGAL, see Almeida, Negocio juridico 804 and Hörster 457; BELGIUM, see Kruithof & Bocken 307, the NETHERLANDS; DENMARK, see Lynge Andersen 58; SWEDEN, see Grönfors, Avtalslagen 37 and Christina Ramberg, Internet Marketplaces: The Law of Auctions and Exchanges Online, Oxford University Press 2002, Chapter 8; SLOVENIA, see Juhart and Plavšak, Obligacijski zakonik I, 199, and ESTONIA LOA § 10; and FINLAND, see Finnish Contracts Act § 9 and POLAND, see CC arts. 70^2 § 2. The same rule applies in ENGLAND, SCOTLAND and IRELAND, see the UK Sale of Goods Act 1979, s. 57, and Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 2-008. In GERMANY only the seller may withdraw while the bidder is bound until a higher bid is made or the auction is cancelled altogether, see CC § 156 and MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, 1316 § 156 no. 5.

27. However, in ENGLAND, SCOTLAND and IRELAND, if the sale has been advertised as being 'without reserve', the highest bidder will have a remedy. However, this will be not against the seller but against the auctioneer who allows the goods to be withdrawn, see the English case of Warlow v. Harrison (l859) 1 E&E 309 and the Irish case of Tully v. Irish Land Commission (1961) 97 ILTR 174, HC. For Scotland see Gloag, Contract, 22-3.

28. In contrast, in FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG, ITALY and SPAIN the proposal to the public to bid is the offer, and the highest and last bid is the acceptance, see for France, Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], no. 468; Spanish Retail Trading Act 1996 art. 56 and Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[4], 300 f; and for Italy, Bianca, Diritto civile III, 249. The situation seems to be the same in BULGARIA, where the auction is regulated in Ccom arts. 337–341, but under subsidiary application of the general rules of offer and acceptance (LOA arts. 13-14).

29. In CZECH law, transfer of ownership in an auction is not regarded as a contract, but as a special (original) acquisition title, so questions of offer and acceptance do not arise; see Knappová (-Mikeš), Civil Law II, 196.

(d) Rewards

30. It appears that in most, if not all the systems, an offer of a reward is held to have been accepted by performing the act for which the award is offered. This rule is expressly provided in the DUTCH CC art. 6:120, and is adopted in DENMARK, see Ussing, Aftaler[3], 51 and in SPAIN, see Supreme Court 17 October 1975, RAJ (1975) 3675 and 6 March l976, RAJ (1976)1175. In ESTONIA, GERMANY, GREECE, PORTUGUAL and ITALY the offeror must pay the reward to the person who performs the act even though that person did not act in response to the award, in most cases because he or she did not know of it, see the ESTONIAN LOA § 1005, GERMAN CC § 657, GREEK CC arts. 709 ff, PORTUGUESE CC art. 459 and ITALIAN CC art. 1989. The situation in BULGARIA (LOA arts. 368-369) is similar, although there is no definite doctrinal or court opinion on this matter. This is also the unanimous opinion of AUSTRIAN writers, see e.g. Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[13], 15 et seq.

31. In ENGLAND an advertisement of a reward is an offer but, for there to be a contract, the person who acts must have been conscious of the offer. A person cannot claim a reward for information given if at the relevant time he or she did not know of or had forgotten the offer. The act is then not an acceptance of the offer, see R v. Clarke (1927) 40 CLR 227, H.Ct of Australia, and Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 2-047 and (on unilateral contracts in the English sense of the word) paras. 2-050 ff. In SCOTLAND advertisements of rewards may, depending on the interpretation given to them, be offers, see Hunter v. General Accident Corporation, 1909 SC (HL) 30 or binding promises which do not need acceptance, see Petrie v. Earl of Airlie (1834) 13 S 68.

32. In FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG the issue is not settled by statute or precedent. The French authors are divided. Some regard the promise of a reward as an offer: thus an offer of a reward to the one who returns a lost dog will only bind the offeror to pay the person who returns the dog if that person in awareness of the offer has accepted it. Others regard it as a unilateral engagement, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 53. In BELGIUM it is held to be a binding promise which does not need acceptance, see Cauffman, De verbindende eenzijdige belofte, nos. 464-484; Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 363. In FINLAND and SWEDEN the law on this point is unsettled.

33. In POLAND, such a public promise for a reward is not an offer in the strict sense; however, it is binding on the promisor.

34. The SLOVAK CC § 850 provides that a public promise binds the person who publicly undertakes to pay a reward or give another performance to any person from a number of persons not specified in advance who fulfils the terms laid down in the public promise.

35. According to the CZECH CC, the public promise (§§ 850–852) is regarded not as a contract but as a unilateral juridical act. This concept is motivated by the fact that the condition which must be satisfied in order to get the reward, need not be a juridical act but may simply be factual conduct of the recipient (who may not even intend to satisfy the condition); Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Macek), OZ[10], 1402. In principle, the same holds true in case of the public competition (CC §§ 847–849).

36. In SLOVENIA the obligation of the promisor to pay a reward is not based on a contract, but on the fact that someone meets the conditions, as stated in a unilateral juridical act. See Juhart and Plavšak (-Polajnar-Pavčnik), Obligacijski zakonik II, p. 75.

II.–4:202: Revocation of offer

(1) An offer may be revoked if the revocation reaches the offeree before the offeree has dispatched an acceptance or, in cases of acceptance by conduct, before the contract has been concluded.

(2) An offer made to the public can be revoked by the same means as were used to make the offer.

(3) However, a revocation of an offer is ineffective if:

(a) the offer indicates that it is irrevocable;
(b) the offer states a fixed time for its acceptance; or
(c) it was reasonable for the offeree to rely on the offer as being irrevocable and the offeree has acted in reliance on the offer.

(4) Paragraph (3) does not apply to an offer if the offeror would have a right under any rule in Books II to IV to withdraw from a contract resulting from its acceptance. The parties may not, to the detriment of the offeror, exclude the application of this rule or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. Revocation and withdrawal distinguished

An offer becomes effective when it reaches the offeree. However, before it reaches the offeree the offer may be countermanded or withdrawn, and it will not become effective. It cannot then be accepted by the offeree. However, an offer may be revoked before the offeree has dispatched an acceptance; the offer which is revoked has become effective, and might have been accepted, but if the acceptance has not been dispatched, and if the contract has not been concluded by an act of performance or other act by the offeree, the offer is revoked when the revocation reaches the offeree.

B. Acceptance by conduct

In case of acceptance by conduct the contract is normally concluded when the offeror learns of it. In this case the revocation is effective if it reaches the offeree before the offeror has learned of the conduct. In those cases where the offeree can accept by performing an act without notice to the offeror, the revocation must reach the offeree before the latter begins to perform.

C. Offers to the public

Revocation of offers to the public which are not irrevocable can be made by the same means as the offer. The revocation must then be as conspicuous as the offer. If the offer appeared as an advertisement in a newspaper the revocation must appear at least as visibly in the paper as the advertisement.

The revocation of an offer made in an advertisement which was mailed to the offeree must reach the offeree before the acceptance is dispatched. If the offer has been published in a newspaper, the paper announcing the revocation must be in the offeree’s mailbox or available in the news-stands before the offeree dispatches the acceptance.

D. Irrevocable offer

Under paragraph (3) there are three exceptions to the general rule in paragraph (1):

(a) if the offer indicates that it is irrevocable;

(b) if it states a fixed time for its acceptance;

(c) if the offeree had reason to rely on the offer as being irrevocable, and has acted in reliance on the offer.

In these cases the offer, if accepted, results in a contract even though it was purportedly revoked before it was accepted. If the offeror does not perform the obligations under the contract, the normal consequences of such non-performance will follow. The offeror may, for example, have to pay damages.

There is wide variation among the laws of the Member States as to when an offer may be revoked and when not, and, if the offer is regarded as irrevocable, as to the effect if nonetheless the offeror purports to revoke it. Paragraph (3) represents an improved version of the compromise adopted by the CISG. Paragraph (3) applies rules that accord with what businesses or consumers without legal knowledge are likely to understand when they receive an offer. If an offer is stated to be irrevocable for a period, the offeree is reasonable in assuming that an acceptance within the time limit will result in a contract. Likewise, if the offer simply contains a time limit the offeree is likely to understand that it will be held open until the limit expires. It is of course open to the offeror to state that the offer may be withdrawn at any time.

E. Irrevocability stated

The indication that the offer is irrevocable must be clear. It may be made by declaring that the offer is a “firm offer” or by other similar expressions. It may also be inferred from the conduct of the offeror.

F. Fixed time for acceptance

Another way of making the offer irrevocable is to state a fixed time for its acceptance. This statement must also be clear. If the offeror states that the offer “is good until January 1” the offer is irrevocable. The same applies if the offeror states that the offer “lapses on September 1”. If on the other hand the offeror only advises the offeree to accept quickly, the offer will be revocable.

G. Reliance

The third exception to the rule in paragraph (1) concerns cases where “it was reasonable for the offeree to rely on the offer as being irrevocable” and the “offeree has acted in reliance on the offer”. Reliance may have been induced by the behaviour of the offeror. It may also be induced by the nature of the offer.

Illustration
Contractor A solicits an offer from sub-contractor B to form part of A’s bid on a construction to be assigned within a stated time. B submits its offer and A relies on it when calculating the bid. Before the expiry of the date of award, but after A has made its bid, B revokes its offer. B is bound by its offer until the date of assignment.

H. Revocation always possible if withdrawal from contract possible

Paragraph (4) deals with the situation where a person makes an offer which would normally be irrevocable but where that person would have a right to withdraw from any contract resulting from the offer's acceptance. In this situation the offer is always revocable until it is accepted (after which the right to withdraw would come into play). The rule should be read along with the rules on the right of withdrawal in Chapter 5 of this Book. In the absence of this rule a person might give an ineffective notice of revocation of an offer but, having done that, might not realise that a separate notice of withdrawal was necessary in order to escape from a contract resulting from acceptance of the offer. The rule is mandatory in the interests of the offeror.

I. Incompatible contracts

It may happen that an offeree accepts an offer knowing that it is incompatible with another contract which the offeror has made. A collector accepts the offer of an art dealer to sell a picture knowing that the dealer has already sold the same picture to another collector. A theatre manager accepts the offer of an actor to perform at the theatre knowing that the actor has engaged himself to perform at another theatre for the same period. The offeree may still accept the offer: the contract is not invalid. The offeree is not bound to inquire into the validity or terms of the first contract or the steps which the offeror intends to take in relation to it. For all the offeree knows, the art dealer may be able to buy back the picture from the first customer or the actor may be willing and able to negotiate a release from his obligations under the first contract.

Neither the fact that at the time of the conclusion of the contract the performance of the obligation was impossible, nor the fact that at that time the party had no right or authority to dispose of the assets to which the contract relates, will prevent the contract from coming into existence (see II.–7:102 (Initial impossibility or lack of right or authority to dispose).

NOTES

I. Are offers revocable? Effects of wrongful revocation.

1. In this matter the laws of the Union differ on various questions. Is an offer revocable or irrevocable before it has been accepted? If it is normally revocable, can an offeror make the offer irrevocable? What are the effects of an improper revocation?

II. Offers are revocable but may be made irrevocable

2. Like the Article, some laws provide that an offer is revocable, but that it may follow from the offer or from the circumstances that it is irrevocable. If in spite of an attempted revocation the offeree accepts an irrevocable offer in due time, there is a contract.
3. Art. 1328 of the ITALIAN CC provides that the offeror may revoke the offer until the contract is concluded, i.e. the offeror has knowledge of the other party's acceptance. However, an offer must be deemed irrevocable when the offeror has made a declaration in that sense (see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 234) or has undertaken to keep the promise open for a certain time, see CC art. 1329. Some Italian writers (see, among others, Roppo, Il contratto, 153) and case law prevailing in the past (see e.g. Court of Cassation, 9 July 1981, no. 4489, Foro it. 1982, I, 456) maintain that revocation is effective provided that it is dispatched before acceptance reaches the offeror, while others (see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 232; Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto III, 206) together with more recent case law (see Court of Cassation, 16 May 2000, no. 6323, Foro it. 2001, I, 227) hold that revocation is effective only if it reaches the offeree before the offeror has knowledge of the acceptance (thus granting wider protection to the offeree's interests). If the offer is accepted within the time originally envisaged by the offer, there is a contract in spite of the revocation. And if the offeree has acted in reliance on the offer in good faith the offer may be revoked but the offeree may claim damages under the rules on precontractual liability, see Bianca, Diritto civile III, 231. The rules in the DUTCH CC art. 6:219 come close to those of the Italian CC with the exception that an offer can be revoked until the offeree has dispatched the acceptance. In SCOTLAND the offer is generally revocable unless the offeror states otherwise. A firm offer is treated as a promise not to revoke the offer for whatever is the stated period, see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 6.57, but it is thought that the consequences of a breach would be liability for damages rather than the ineffectiveness of a revocation, see Gloag and Henderson, para. 5.01. In SPANISH case law offers are generally revocable, see Supreme Court 23 March l988, RAJ (1988) 3623 and 3 November 1993, RAJ (1993) 8963, but an option given by a seller to a prospective buyer is irrevocable. See Supreme Court 4 February l994 RAJ (1994) 910 and 14 February l995, RAJ (1995) 837.

4. CISG art. 16, and art. 2.4 of the UNIDROIT Principles provide:

   (1) Until a contract is concluded an offer may be revoked if the revocation reaches the offeree before an acceptance has been dispatched.

   (2) However, an offer cannot be revoked:

   (a) if it indicates whether by stating a fixed time for acceptance or otherwise that it is irrevocable; or

   (b) if it was reasonable for the offeree to rely on the offer as being irrevocable, and the offeree has acted in reliance of the offer.

5. The wording of art. 16(2)(a) reflects a disagreement among the delegates of the Diplomatic Conference which in 1980 adopted CISG. The common lawyers wished the offeror's fixing of a period for acceptance to be a time limit after which the offer could no longer be accepted but before which it could still be revoked. The civil lawyers saw the fixing of a time limit for acceptance as a promise by the offeror not to revoke the offer within that time limit (see also ULFIS art. 5(2)).The wording of art. 2(a) was a compromise. The offer can be made irrevocable, but the provision has not cleared the controversy as to whether the mere fixing of a time for acceptance makes the offer irrevocable. Common lawyers believe that it does not per se make the offer irrevocable; there must be additional grounds for assuming that, see von Caemmerer and Schlechtriem, Kommentar zum einheitlichen UN-Kaufrecht[2], art. 16 note 10 and Honnold nos. 141 ff. The question is to be solved by the rules in CISG art. 8 on interpretation of statements.

6. The present Article obviates this doubt. The fixing of a time for acceptance will make the offer irrevocable for that period.

7. In the SLOVAK law an offer is generally revocable. The SLOVAK CC § 43a sub-paras. 3, 4 provides that if the agreement has not yet been concluded, the offer may be revoked if the revocation is delivered to the addressee before the addressee sends an acceptance. The offer cannot be revoked during a time period stipulated for its acceptance unless the a right to revoke it even before the lapse of this period follows from the content of the offer. It cannot be revoked if its irrevocability is explicitly expressed in the offer. Besides the revocation the offeror may cancel even an irrevocable offer if the expression of the cancellation is delivered to the addressee prior to or at least at the same time as the offer (CC § 43a sub-para. 2). The SLOVAK Ccom § 277 provides that a public offer may be revoked if the offeror announces the revocation before the acceptance, and the announcement is made in the same manner as the announcement of the offer.

8. According to CZECH CC, an offer may be revoked until the contract is concluded, on the condition that the revocation reaches the person whom it is addressed before this person dispatched the acceptance thereof (§ 43a(3)). The offer cannot be revoked (i) during time specified in the offer for the acceptance, unless from the contents of the offer results a right to revoke the offer before the lapse of this time-limit, or (ii) if the offer is marked as irrevocable (§ 43a(4)).

III. Non-contractual liability for improper revocation

9. The FRENCH courts have held that the offeror can revoke the offer until it has been accepted. The offeror may, however, expressly or by implication, for instance by fixing a time limit for acceptance, promise not to revoke the offer; and even if no such promise is made it may follow from the circumstances of the case or from usage that the offeror cannot revoke it without incurring liability. If the offeror nevertheless revokes the offer, there is a disagreement between French academics as to the consequences of such a revocation. Some consider that there will be no contract but the offeror will incur liability in damages if the offer is revoked before a reasonable time has lapsed but other academics consider that the revocation should be deprived of its effects and the contracts could be formed see Bénabent, Les obligations, no. 59 and Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 118. The amount for which the offeror will be held liable in damages is to be finally settled by the courts. The rules are reported to be the same in LUXEMBOURG.

IV. Even offer stated to be irrevocable may be revoked

10. In ENGLISH law the offer is revocable even if it is stated to be irrevocable. By giving a notice to the offeree the offeror may revoke the offer before acceptance. The offeree can make the offer irrevocable with the offeror's consent by furnishing a consideration for holding the offer open, for instance by paying the offeror £1, or by using a deed. Apart from this the offeror cannot unilaterally make the offer irrevocable, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 3-154-3-155.

V. Offers are generally irrevocable

11. Under some laws the offer is binding and remains so until it lapses, either because it has not been accepted within the time limit set for its acceptance, which is either the time fixed by the offeror or a reasonable time, or because it has been rejected. An acceptance of the offer in due time makes it into a contract even though it has been revoked. The offeror may, however, state in the offer that it is revocable.

12. These rules apply in GERMANY, see CC § 145, AUSTRIA, see CC § 862, GREECE see CC arts. 185 and 186, SLOVENIA, see LOA § 25, PORTUGAL see CC art. 230, in BULGARIA (LOA art. 13(2)), in BELGIUM, where the offer becomes irrevocable when it reaches the offeree, see Dirix & van Oevelen, RW 1992-93, 1210 and in the NORDIC law, see Contract Acts § 7. § 9 of the DANISH and SWEDISH Contract Acts provide that where a person has stated in a proposal that it is made "without obligation", or has used similar expressions, the statement is regarded as an invitation to make an offer. In FINLAND, which has not adopted § 9, the same rule applies. Also under ESTONIAN law an offer becomes irrevocable when it reaches the offeree (GPCCA § 72 (impliedly), see also Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 1.12.2005, civil matter no. 3-2-1-129-05, p. 37). In AUSTRIA, however, the offer can be revoked before it reaches the sphere of the offeree; whether the same is true if the offer has reached the offeree, but is revoked before the offeree actually got knowledge of it, is controversial (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 124).

13. In POLISH law an offer is generally irrevocable. This results from the fundamental principle stating that the withdrawal of a declaration of will communicated to another person is only effective if it arrives simultaneously with or prior to this declaration (CC art. 61 § 1). By way of exception, and only between businesses, an offer can be revoked if the revocation reaches the offeree before the acceptance has been dispatched (CC art. 66^2 § 1). Nevertheless, even in this exceptional case, an offer is irrevocable when it states a fixed time for acceptance or otherwise indicates that it is irrevocable (CC art. 66^2 § 2).

14. In FRENCH law, an offer made for acceptance without delay must be maintained during a "reasonable delay" (Benabent, no. 59).

VI. Revocation of offers to the public

15. The general rule seems to be that a proposal to the public which is an offer to make a contract can be revoked by taking reasonable steps to revoke it, see Schlesinger I 113. Thus the ITALIAN CC art. 1336(2) provides that a revocation of an offer to the public, if made in the same form or in equivalent form as the offer, is effective even towards persons who have no notice of it (on rewards see below). A similar rule is found in PORTUGAL, see CC art. 230(3); BELGIUM; DENMARK, see Ussing, Aftaler[3], 51; ENGLAND, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 2-060; and IRELAND. In SCOTLAND a proposal which is interpreted as an offer (rather than as a promise intended to be binding without acceptance) is on principle revocable by whatever means the proposal itself was made (cf. McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 6.58-6.61).

16. In FRANCE some offers to the public are not revocable for a certain period, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 118. In GREECE, authors consider proposals to the public as invitations to make an offer and they will therefore never become binding, see Georgiadis/Stathopoulos CC 199 no. 2, p. 322. In SPAIN the issue is reported not to be regulated.

17. In POLAND, if the offer was made to the public (ad incertas personas) it can be revoked or changed at any time, unless the offeror stated a fixed time for acceptance. Revocation or modification of an offer to the public does not affect those persons who have accepted the offer and thereby already concluded a contract, see: Radwański, System prawa prywatnego, II, Supl., 33.

18. According to the CZECH Ccom, a public offer may be revoked only prior to its first acceptance and by the same means as those used for the publication of the offer (§ 277).

19. The BULGARIAN Ccom does not contain a rule on this specific matter. So the general regulation of the irrevocability of an offer (LOA art. 13(2)) should be applied. However, there is a mitigation of this excessively harsh rule – the offer (including an offer to the public) – should be accepted "immediately". Otherwise it ceases to be binding (LOA art. 13(3)).

VII. Offers of rewards

20. Under GERMAN law, an offer of a reward is not revocable if the possibility of its revocation was renounced when it was published, either expressly or impliedly by fixing a time limit for the act to be accomplished, see GERMAN CC § 658(2). The same rule is adopted in SPAIN, see Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I[4], 288 f and in ESTONIA (LOA § 1006). In AUSTRIA an offer of a reward can be revoked in the same way as it was published or in another effective way at any time before the other party fulfils the required action (CC § 860a). The offer of a reward is irrevocable if this was expressly stated in the publication or if the irrevocability is implied from the statement of a fixed period for fulfilment (CC § 860a).

21. In the NETHERLANDS and ITALY an offer of a reward may only be revoked or modified for important reasons, see DUTCH CC art. 6:220 and ITALIAN CC art. 1990 (where it is stated that a reward may be revoked only for juste cause; yet, revocation has no effect if the specific situation has already occurred or the specific act has already been performed). The NETHERLANDS CC art. 6.220 provides that even in the event of a valid revocation the court may grant equitable compensation to a person who has prepared the requested performance on the basis of the offer.

22. According to POLISH law, a public promise of a reward can be made by the promisor as revocable or irrevocable. The promisor may revoke such promise if the time for the performance of an act was not specified, and there was no stipulation that the promise is irrevocable. The revocation must be made by a public notice in the same manner as the promise was made. However, the revocation is ineffective against a person who has already performed the act (CC art. 919 § 2).

23. In BULGARIA, similarly, the promise of reward is revocable or not depending on the will of the promisor (argument from LOA art. 9 – freedom of contract).

24. In FRANCE, according to case law, the promisor of a reward is bound to perform if another person has accomplished the requested service. If that person knew about the offer of a reward, a contract is thus concluded. Conversely, the undertaking of the offeror amounts to a quasi-contract (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 53). The law does not provide any special regulation of public promises or offers of reward (see CC §§ 850–852).

25. In CZECH law a public promise (as well as a public competition) may be revoked only for important reasons. The revocation must be made by the same means as the promise was announced, or by another equally effective means. The promisor of the revoked promise must indemnify those who entirely or partially fulfilled the conditions of the promise prior to its revocation; the promisor must point out the right to indemnification in the revocation. See CC § 849 and Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová/Spáčil (-Macek), OZ[10], 1403.

26. According to § 208 of the SLOVENIAN LOA a public promise of a reward may be revoked in the same way it was given or by a personal message, unless a time for performance was set. However, a person who performed the act and did not and could not have known of the revocation is entitled to the reward. A person who, acting in reliance of the promise, incurred expenses before revocation can claim these expenses, unless the promisor proves they were useless.

27. In ENGLISH law, the advertisement of the reward is treated as an offer for a unilateral contract which is accepted by performing the required act. Until the act has been performed, or at least performance of it has been begun (e.g. the person who has found the lost dog is in the process of returning it) the offer may be revoked.

II.–4:203: Rejection of offer

When a rejection of an offer reaches the offeror, the offer lapses.

COMMENTS

When a rejection of an offer reaches the offeror, the offer lapses, even if the offer is irrevocable and even if the time for acceptance has not yet run out. The offer can then not be accepted even if the offeree has a change of mind.

The rejection need not be express but may be implied, for instance if the offeree makes a counter-offer or invites a lower bid or a smaller consignment than the one offered.

An acceptance which contains a modification of the offer may be, but is not always, a rejection. This is regulated by II.–4:208 (Modified acceptance).

A rejection may be withdrawn provided that the withdrawal - whether accompanied by an acceptance or not - reaches the offeror before or at the same time as the rejection. This follows from the general rules on notices.

An offer will normally also lapse if, when the time for acceptance runs out, the offer has not been accepted.

NOTES

1. In most if not all the countries of the Union, an offer lapses if it is rejected, see for instance, the NORDIC Contract Acts § 5; CZECH CC § 43b(1); the GERMAN CC § 146; SLOVENIAN LOA § 26(59); DUTCH CC art. 6:221(2); GREEK CC art. 187; ESTONIAN LOA § 19(1); SLOVAK CC § 43b sub-para. 1 c; for PORTUGAL, Cordeiro, I-I, 556; and see also CISG art. 17 and the UNIDROIT Principles art. 2.5.
2. The rejection takes effect when it reaches the offeror so that, as stated in art. 235(2) of the PORTUGUESE CC, the offer will be regarded as accepted if an acceptance which is dispatched later than the rejection reaches the offeror before or at the same time as the rejection. Under DUTCH law the same rule flows from CC art. 3:37(3) and (5).
3. Similar rules apply in countries where there is no statutory provision on rejection; see on SCOTLAND, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 6.37-6.43 and on BELGIUM: Delforge, in Fontaine (2002), p. 166. On ITALIAN law, see Roppo, Il contratto 108. In ENGLAND it is probable that the offer lapses if the rejection reaches the offeror before an acceptance sent earlier by the offeree, even if the acceptance was posted, and therefore would have concluded the contract, before the rejection reached the offeror, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 2-063. There is no case authority for this rule. In IRELAND there is, see Kelly v. Cruise Catering [1994] 2 ILRM 394.
4. In POLAND, there is no statutory provision on rejection. However, it results from the rules on contract formation and declaration of will that the offer lapses when a declaration of rejection reaches the offeror. The offeror is not bound any longer even if the rejection was made before the lapse of time fixed for acceptance. There is no special form required for the rejection, even if the offer was made in a special form, see: Radwański, System prawa cywilnego, II, Supl., 33.

5. In AUSTRIA there is no express rule on rejection, but on termination of the offer because of lapse of time see CC §§ 862, 862a.

6. The same is the situation in BULGARIA, where only termination because of lapse of time is regulated – see LOA art. 13(3).

II.–4:204: Acceptance

(1) Any form of statement or conduct by the offeree is an acceptance if it indicates assent to the offer.

(2) Silence or inactivity does not in itself amount to acceptance.

COMMENTS

A. Acceptance

Like other declarations of intention a party's acceptance of an offer can be made by a statement and by conduct, e.g. by performing an act. The acceptance need not be made by the same means as the offer. An offer sent by letter may be accepted by email or even orally by telephone.

It will be remembered that the intention of a party to enter into a binding legal relationship is to be determined from the party's statements or conduct as they could reasonably be expected to be understood by the other party.

The acceptance must be unconditional. It may not be made subject to final approval by the offeree, or the offeree's board of directors, or by a third party, unless the offeror knew or could reasonably be expected to know that the approval of a third party (e.g. government authorities) was required. II.–4:208 (Modified acceptance) deals with the question of acceptances which contain modifications. In some cases they may be effective acceptances.

B. Silence or inactivity

Silence and inactivity will generally not amount to acceptance. This is provided by paragraph (2). There are, however, some exceptions to this rule under later Articles.

Nor is acceptance required when it follows from an earlier statement by the offeree, e.g. in an invitation to make an offer, or from usage or practices between the parties, that silence will bind the offeree.

> Illustration 1
> O asks P for a bid to paint the railing surrounding O's factory telling P that it can start painting a week after it has sent its bid unless before that time O has rejected the offer. Having sent the bid and heard nothing from O, P starts painting. O is bound by the contract.

Further, it may follow from a framework agreement between the parties that a party's silence to an offer by the other party will amount to acceptance.

Under the usages of some trades, an order to provide goods or services from one professional to the other will be considered as accepted unless it is rejected by the offeree without undue delay. It may also follow from practices between the parties that silence will be considered as acceptance.

Illustration 2
Between A who runs a maintenance service and B who owns a factory, a practice has developed according to which A sends B a note telling B the day A intends to service B's machinery. If B does not want A's services, B informs A immediately. If B keeps silent, A will come. A's note will oblige A to come at the date fixed. B is obliged to receive A if B does not cancel A's visit immediately upon receipt of the note.

NOTES

I. What is acceptance?

1. Under all the legal systems of the Union acceptance is any statement or conduct by the offeree which manifests assent. In general no form is required, see Bénabent, Les obligations[7], no. 66.

2. In POLISH law, no special form for acceptance is required. However, if a special form is necessary for conclusion and validity of a contract, both offer and acceptance should be in such form. Besides, the offeror may require that acceptance be made in a specific form or through special means of communication, see: Radwański, 43. Under ITALIAN law, acceptance does not have to be effected by a specific form, but if the offeror has requested otherwise, acceptance given in a form other than that expressly required is without effect: see CC art. 1326(4). The same rule applies under DUTCH law (Asser-Hartkamp, 4_II algemene leer der overeenkomsten, no. 222). Under ESTONIAN law acceptance is generally defined as an assent to conclude a contract indicated by a direct declaration of intent or by an act (LOA § 20(1)), subject to certain exceptions to this rule (see notes below).

3. According to the SLOVAK law a timely declaration of the addressee or other timely conduct from which consent can be derived is considered acceptance of the offer (CC § 43c sub-para. 1). No special form for acceptance is required, however, if a special form is necessary for the conclusion and validity of a contract, both offer and acceptance should be in such form.

4. For CZECH law, see CC § 46(2) pursuant to which the requirement to conclude a contract in writing is satisfied if both the offer and the acceptance are made in writing. But it has been held that if the offeror makes the offer by presenting a signed wording of a contract, the offeree may accept the contract only by co-signing the presented wording. (Supreme Court 22 Cdo 114/99).

5. According to the BULGARIAN law silent acceptance is possible (Kozhuharov, Law of Obligations, 68), but this is applicable only to consensual contracts, being naturally impossible in the case of formal and real contracts.

II. Silence

6. There is also general agreement that silence in itself does not amount to acceptance, see on BELGIUM where the circumstances of the silence must indicate assent to the offer: Delforge, in Fontaine (2002), p. 168-169; Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994, 265; NORDIC Contract Acts § 8 and on DENMARK, Ussing, Aftaler[3], 393 and Lynge Andersen 99 and on SWEDEN, Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 137 ff; FRANCE, Bénabent, Les obligations[7], no. 66; LUXEMBOURG; GERMANY, MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, Pref. to § 116, no. 23; AUSTRIA, Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 863 no. 15 and Austrian Supreme Court (OGH) 18 December 1991 SZ 64/ 185; GREECE, Georgiadis, Principles § 32 no. 22, Karasis in Georgiadis/Stathopoulos art.

189 no. 5, Simantiras, no. 653; ITALY, Bianca, Diritto civile III, 211 ff; PORTUGAL, CC art. 218; SLOVAKIA, CC § 44 sub-para. 1; SLOVENIA, § 30(1) LOA; SPAIN, Supreme Court decisions of 2 February l990 and 19 December l990, RAJ (1990) 10287; ENGLAND, Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 2-042; CZECH CC § 44(1) and in POLAND, see: Radwański, 43-44. The same rule applies in IRELAND, see Friel 50 ff, in ESTONIA, LOA § 20(2) (impliedly), and is provided in CISG art. 18(1) second sentence and in the UNIDROIT Principles art. 2.1.6, second sentence.

7. Silence may, however, amount to acceptance if before the offer was made the offeree had indicated to the offeror or let the offeror believe that the offeree's silence would mean acceptance. Thus the offeree will generally be bound by silence if the offer followed an invitation to deal by the offeree. § 9 of the NORDIC Contract Acts, which deals with an invitation to make an offer, provides that if an offer arrives within reasonable time from anyone invited, and the person who made the invitation must realise that the offer was caused by it, that person is regarded as having accepted the offer unless it is rejected by sending a notice to the offeror without undue delay. In FINLAND, which has not adopted § 9, a similar rule is applied. In the AMERICAN Restatement 2d § 69 it is provided generally that the offeree will be bound by silence if the offer followed an invitation to deal by the offeree.

8. ENGLISH authors support the proposition that if an offeror has indicated to the offeree that the offeree need not communicate acceptance, and the offeree, although willing to accept, remains silent, the principle of estoppel will prevent the offeror from arguing that the offer had never been accepted, see Beale, Bishop and Furmston 213 and Miller, Felthouse v. Bindley Revisited [1972] M.L.R. 489. However, the only decided case on the issue seems to be against the rule, see Kerr J in Fairline Shipping Corpn v. Adamson [1975] Q.B .180.

9. Further, silence will be considered an acceptance if the parties have established a practice between themselves to this effect, or if it follows from usage, see on BELGIUM, Delforge, in Fontaine (2002), 169; on the NORDIC COUNTRIES, see for DENMARK, Ussing, Aftaler[3], 393, and Lynge Andersen 99 ff; for SWEDEN Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 138. This holds true also of FRANCE, Ghestin, La formation du contrat[3], no. 404, LUXEMBOURG, see Cour 26 June 1914, Pasicrisie 11, 89; SCOTLAND, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 6.78-6.81; GERMANY, MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, § 151 nos. 4 et seq.; for AUSTRIA see Schwimann (-Apathy and Riedler), ABGB IV[3], § 863 nos. 19 et seq. with references to case law; ITALY, Bianca, Diritto civile III, 211 f and Court of Cassation, 20 February 2004, no. 3403, Rep.Foro it. 2004 398, PORTUGAL CC art. 218; SLOVENIA, LOA § 30(3); SPAIN, Supreme Court decisions of 18 October 1982 and 3 December 1993 RAJ (1993), 9494 and POLAND, see: Radwański, 44. The same rule is applied in IRELAND, see Friel 51. In ENGLAND this view is maintained by Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-043 ff, but there is no case authority.

10. Some laws have provided further exceptions to the main rule, see the NORDIC Law on Commission Agents § 5, art. 22(2) of the PORTUGUESE decree no. 177/86 on commercial agents, and the SPANISH Retail Trading Act (l996), art. 4l).

11. § 362 of the GERMAN Ccom provides that if a merchant is asked to act for another merchant with whom there are business connections or for whom the merchant has offered to act, the merchant is obliged to answer without undue delay; silence is considered as an acceptance. Outside commercial relationships GERMAN law in CC § 663 reduces the duties of a service provider to a duty to give notice. In AUSTRIA the equivalent provision in the former Ccom § 362 has been cancelled with the introduction of the new commercial code. Now the general rules apply. The same rule exists in BULGARIA (Ccom art. 292). There are several further cases where silence amounts to an acceptance, e.g. tacit prolongation of a hire contract (LOA art. 236), tacit acceptance in case of sale by sample (LOA art. 203).

12. In POLAND silence will be considered acceptance between entrepreneurs who have permanent business relations provided that an offer is within the offeree's scope of business (CC art. 68).

13. In ESTONIA silence or inactivity is deemed to be acceptance only if so provided by law, an agreement between the parties, practices which the parties have established between themselves or a usage observed in their field of activity (LOA § 20(2). A special rule provides that silence is deemed to be acceptance if a business person receives an offer from a long-term business partner and has not responded to the offer within a reasonable time (LOA § 20(3)).

14. In SLOVENIA, LOA § 30(4) provides that if a person offers to carry out certain orders for another person or if such orders are within the person's business or profession, the person must reject an order immediately, if a contract is not to be concluded, as in such circumstances silence constitutes acceptance.

15. See generally, Schlesinger I, 134 and Kötz, European Contract Law I, 41.

II.–4:205: Time of conclusion of the contract

(1) If an acceptance has been dispatched by the offeree the contract is concluded when the acceptance reaches the offeror.

(2) In the case of acceptance by conduct, the contract is concluded when notice of the conduct reaches the offeror.

(3) If by virtue of the offer, of practices which the parties have established between themselves, or of a usage, the offeree may accept the offer by doing an act without notice to the offeror, the contract is concluded when the offeree begins to do the act.

COMMENTS

A. Significance of the time of conclusion

From the moment when the contract is concluded each party is bound to the other and cannot revoke or withdraw consent. The time of conclusion may also have effects in other respects. For example, standard terms may not be binding if not brought to the attention of the other party until after the conclusion of the contract. And the amount of damages payable for non-performance of a contractual obligation may depend on what was foreseeable at the time of conclusion of the contract.

B. Moment of acceptance

This Article deals with the moment when the acceptance becomes effective and the offer cannot any longer be revoked or withdrawn. The next Article deals with the period of time available for an acceptance to be effectively made.

The general rule is that once the acceptance has been dispatched the offeror can no longer revoke the offer. However, the acceptance becomes binding on the offeree when it reaches the offeror. The offeree cannot then revoke the acceptance, and the contract is concluded.

This rule reflects what seems to be the practical outcome in almost all the laws, though some explain it differently, treating the contract as made when a postal or similar acceptance is dispatched but then applying exceptions which result in much the same outcome as the rule stated in paragraph (1).

C. Conduct

In the case of acceptance by conduct the contract is concluded when the offeror learns of the accepting conduct. An offeree may accept by delivering goods ordered by the offeror, by accepting unsolicited goods sent by the offeror, by opening a credit in the offeror's favour, by starting a production of goods ordered etc. Whether conduct amounts to acceptance will depend upon the circumstances.

Illustration 1
Having learned from a colleague that B may be interested in buying and reselling A's goods, A sends unsolicited goods to B. B accepts by advertising the goods for sale in a trade paper which A reads. A learns of the acceptance on reading the advertisement.

In the case of a more complicated offer, especially if it is one for a contract of long duration, conduct which shows a positive attitude to the offer may not amount to an acceptance of the offer.

Illustration 2
Having learned from a colleague that B may be interested in selling A's goods, A sends B goods with a draft distribution contract by which B is to become A's sole distributor in B's country. B's advertisement of the goods in a trade paper, which A reads, without mention of any distributorship agreement does not amount to an acceptance of the latter.

If, however, the relationship develops, and both parties observe the terms of the draft contract, B's behaviour will be considered an acceptance of the offer though B never signs the draft contract.

When notice of conduct, such as the production of goods ordered or other preparations by the offeree, will not reach the offeror within the time set for acceptance, an express assent by the offeree will be needed. Commencement of performance will be at the offeree's own risk.

Illustration 3
Opera Manager M offers soprano S the part of Susanna in The Marriage of Figaro, which will start in two months time. S immediately starts rehearsing the part, but does not send M any answer. M engages another soprano. S claims to be entitled to play the part. M is not bound by any contract to S.

D. Acceptance without notice

However, if it follows from the offer or from practices between the parties or from usage that the offeree may indicate assent by performing an act without notice to the offeror, the acceptance is effective at the moment performance of the act begins, see paragraph (3). In these cases the start of production or other preparations makes the acceptance effective even though the offeror does not get notice of these acts.

Illustration 4
The facts are the same as in Illustration 3 except that M in his offer to S advises her to start rehearsing at once and by herself, because the rest of the company will tour the province during the next two weeks and cannot be reached. S immediately starts rehearsing. M and S have concluded a contract when S starts rehearsing.

A similar acceptance which is effective from the moment a performance begins may also follow from practice between the parties.

In cases covered by paragraph (3) the acceptance is effective when the act is performed even if the offeror learns of it after the time for acceptance.

The performance which will bind both parties under paragraph (3) is one which the offeree cannot revoke. It only applies to acts which are real performances, not to acts which prepare for a performance. If in view of the offer the offeree applies to a bank for a cash credit in order to increase available funds this act in itself will not constitute a beginning of a performance covered by paragraph (3).

NOTES

I. Significance of the time of conclusion

1. Among the various effects of the time of conclusion of the contract, the one which is considered here is the time when the parties are bound to the contract and none of them can withdraw from it. The laws attach various other effects to the time of conclusion, see, for instance, CISG art. 35(2)(b) and (3), 42(1), 55, 66, 74, 79(1) and 100(2), and, generally, Rodière, Formation 136 f.

II. Time of conclusion when acceptance is communicated by language

2. In determining the moment when a contract is concluded through communication of an acceptance, the laws are divided.

3. Some laws consider the contract to be concluded when the acceptance reaches the offeror. This is the rule of CISG art. 23 and the UNIDROIT Principles 2.6(2), and the main rule in GERMANY, see Staudinger (-Bork) 2003, § 146 no. 4; BULGARIA, see LOA art. 14; AUSTRIA, see CC § 862a; CZECH REPUBLIC, see CC § 43c(2) and § 44(1); GREECE see CC art. 192; the NETHERLANDS, see CC art. 3:37(3); PORTUGAL, see CC art. 224; ESTONIA, see LOA § 9(2) sent. 1; SLOVENIA, see LOA § 28(1) and SLOVAKIA, see CC § 43c sub-para. 2. According to the NORDIC Contract Acts the acceptance may be revoked before the offeror has taken cognisance of the acceptance. Thus in effect the contract is not concluded before the offeror has read the acceptance (it is not enough that the acceptance has reached the offeror), see Contracts Acts §§ 2 and 3. However, under § 7 of the Act the offeree can revoke the acceptance, if the revocation reaches the offeror before or at the same time as the acceptance comes to the offeror's knowledge. Also in POLAND a contract is concluded when the acceptance reaches the offeror, see CC art. 70 § 1. In addition, POLISH law provides separately that in the case of an auction a contract is concluded at the moment of manifestation of selection of the highest bid (when the "hammer falls" – CC art. 70^2 § 2).

4. The receipt rule is also the main rule in ENGLAND, but there are important exceptions. The most important is the "postal rule" whereby an acceptance sent by post takes effect when the letter of acceptance is posted. From that moment a withdrawal of the offer, even if it has been posted previously, has no effect, see Henthorn v. Fraser [1892] 2 Ch 27, CA The acceptance has effect even though the letter never reaches the offeror, and the contract is considered concluded, Household Fire and Carriage Accident Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Grant (1879) 4 ExD 216, unless perhaps the loss or delay was the fault of the offeree, cf. Adams v. Lindsell (1818) 1 B&Ald 681. But the offeree may prevent conclusion by sending an "overtaking" withdrawal of the acceptance, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 2-063. The "postal rule" only applies when it was reasonable to use the post, and it does not apply if the offeror has stipulated for actual communication of the acceptance, see Holwell Securities Ltd. v. Hughes [1974] 1WLR 155, CA. For an acceptance made by instantaneous means of communication such as email, fax and telephone, the main rule applies, as it does for an acceptance sent through a messenger, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-023 and 2-032. The IRISH law is basically the same as the English. However, in Kelly v. Cruise Catering Ltd. [1994] 2 ILRM 394 the Irish Supreme Court suggested obiter that the postal rule would not apply if the letter of acceptance was lost in the post.

5. SCOTTISH law is to the same general effect as English law (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 6.109-6.118). The Scottish Law Commission has proposed the abolition of the postal rule (Scottish Law Commission, Report No. 144, 1993) but this has not yet been enacted.

6. Other laws consider the offeror's knowledge of the acceptance as decisive, however, with the proviso that the offeror is considered or presumed to have the knowledge when the acceptance is received. This rule applies in BELGIUM, see Cass. 25 May 1990, Pas. belge 1990, 1086; Cass. 19 June 1990, Pas. belge 1990, 1182, and in ITALY CC arts. 1326(1) and 1335, according to which an offer, acceptance and any other declaration addressed to a person are deemed to be known at the time when they reach the address of the person to whom they are directed.

7. In PORTUGUESE law the contract is also concluded when the offeror gets effective knowledge of the acceptance or culpably prevents that from happening. On the other hand, the contract is not concluded if without fault the offeror was prevented from getting knowledge of the acceptance, see CC art. 224.

8. The same rule applied in SPAIN until 2002, when the fundamental rule was modified and the civil and commercial law provisions were harmonised. Under the current law, the contract is concluded when the acceptance is known to the offeror, unless the absence of knowledge is due to the offeror's fault; if this is the case, the contract can be concluded when the acceptance reaches the offeror or even (if, for example, the offeror indicated a wrong address) when the acceptance is dispatched. The change has meant the codification of the construction developed in the past by the Supreme Court in limiting the radical effects of the "knowledge rule" (Supreme Court Judgements 29 September 1960, 22 October 1974, RAJ (1974) 3971, 26 May 1976, RAJ (1976) 2366, 29 September 1981, RAJ 3247, 10 December 1982, RAJ (1982) 7474, 22 December 1992, RAJ (1992) 10642, 24 April 1995, RAJ (1995) 3546. The amended rules contain a special provision for the so-called "contracts made by automatic devices" or "click contracts" (e.g. vending machines, contracts entered into through web sites, automatic phone messages, etc): in such cases, the contract is concluded when the offeree takes the necessary steps to express acceptance, regardless of factual delivery or the real knowledge of the offeror.

9. In FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG the question appears to be unsettled. The French Cour de Cassation has considered it a question of fact left to the sovereign appreciation of the lower courts. In FRANCE, the Cour de Cassation held that the contract is concluded as soon as the offeree has dispatched the acceptance, unless stipulated otherwise. see Cass. 7 January 1981, Bull.civ. IV no. 14. This may be considered a general decision on when a contract by correspondence is concluded, see Bénabent, Les obligations[7], no. 68 (with a comparison with PECL).

III. Acceptance by conduct

10. The systems agree that an offer may be accepted by conduct. Under most systems the contract is concluded when notice of the conduct reaches the offeror, see on ENGLISH law, Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-017 and 2-023; on the DUTCH CC art; 3:38(1); for CZECH law, see CC § 43c(2); GERMANY, Staudinger (-Bork) 2003, § 146 no. 5; for GREECE, Erman (-Simantiras), BGB I[9], 189 nos. 2-5, Karasis in Georgiadis & Stathopoulos art. 189 no. 5; for ITALY see Roppo, Il contratto 122; for ESTONIA, LOA § 9(2) sent. 2; see also CISG art. 18(2), UNIDROIT art. 2.6(2). The same rule applies in IRISH law, see Package Investments v. Shandon Park Mills, unreported High Court decision of 2 May 1991, Friel 52 and in SCOTTISH law, see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 6.73-6.77.

11. In FRANCE the courts oscillate between the moment the act is performed and the moment notice of the performance reaches the offeror; see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 123. The laws of SPAIN, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG also seem to be unsettled on that point.

12. In POLAND, if the offer does not require that a declaration of acceptance reaches the offeror, and in particular if the offeror demands immediate performance, the contract is deemed to be concluded when the other party in due time proceeds to perform (CC arts. 69, 70 § 1). BULGARIAN law is silent on this matter.

IV. Performance of an act without notice

13. Paragraph (3) is similar to CISG art. 18(3) and UNIDROIT Principles art. 2.6(3). In all the systems the offeror may stipulate the way by which the offer is to be accepted - except by silence - and practices between the parties and usages may also regulate the mode of acceptance.

14. The GERMAN CC § 151 provides that the contract is concluded without a declaration of acceptance by the offeree to the offeror being required, if it follows from general commercial practices that such a declaration is not to be expected or the offeror has renounced it. It seems to be the prevailing view that the act which shows acceptance must be one which manifests itself to the outer world. The mere fact that the offeree has resolved internally to accept is not enough, see on the German CC § 151 and MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, § 151 no. 54.

15. Similar solutions are to be found in or follow from the AUSTRIAN CC § 864, which assumes that acceptance by conduct is a "declaration" of will which does not need to be communicated to the addressee (see Schwimann (-Apathy and Riedler), ABGB IV[3], § 864 no. 1); CZECH Ccom § 275(4); SCOTTISH law, where McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 6.76 suggests there will be no acceptance if there is another reasonable interpretation of the offeree's action; FRENCH law, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 123; NORDIC Contract Acts § l(2); GREEK CC art. l93(1); ITALIAN CC art. 1327(1); PORTUGUESE law, see P.M. Pinto, Declaracàò tacita 620 and Almeida, Negocio juridico 794; SLOVENIAN LOA § 28(2) and ENGLISH law, see Weatherby v. Banham (1832) 5 C&P 228 and Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-026. and 2-046.

16. In SLOVAKIA, a person to whom an offer is directed may signify acceptance by performing the relevant activity (e.g., the dispatch of goods or the payment of a purchase price) without advising the other party. In this event, the acceptance of the offer is deemed to be effective from the moment of the performing of the activity as long as it occurred prior to the time limit for accepting the offer (Ccom § 275 sub-para. 4, applicable for commercial contracts).

17. The ESTONIAN LOA § 9(3) is similar to paragraph (3) of the present Article. BULGARIAN law is silent on this matter.

II.–4:206: Time limit for acceptance

(1) An acceptance of an offer is effective only if it reaches the offeror within the time fixed by the offeror.

(2) If no time has been fixed by the offeror the acceptance is effective only if it reaches the offeror within a reasonable time.

(3) Where an offer may be accepted by performing an act without notice to the offeror, the acceptance is effective only if the act is performed within the time for acceptance fixed by the offeror or, if no such time is fixed, within a reasonable time.

COMMENTS

A. Time for acceptance

This Article provides for the period of time within which the offeree's acceptance must reach the offeror in order to be effective.

B. Time fixed

The acceptance of the offer must reach the offeror within the time fixed by the offeror. The acceptance may be made by an express statement or by conduct. This rule represents the practical result reached in most laws under which the question has been considered.

C. Reasonable time

If the time for performance has not been fixed by the offeror, the offeree's acceptance must reach the offeror within a reasonable time. Due account has to be taken of the circumstances of the transaction. One factor is the rapidity of the means of communication used by the offeror.

Another factor is the type of contract. Offers relating to the trade of commodities or other items sold in a fluctuating market will have to be accepted within a short time. Offers relating to the construction of a building may need a longer time for reflection.

In the cases covered by paragraphs (1) and (2), the acceptance must reach the offeror in time. The offeree will generally be expected to use the same means of communication as the offeror. However, the time for acceptance is to be counted as an entirety. An offeree who receives an offer by mail may, if too much time has been taken for reflection, catch up by accepting by some faster means of communication.

This result doe not obtain under the laws of all the Member States; some place the risk of delay in transmission wholly on the offeree. The rule in paragraph (2) is thought to represent a fair compromise between the interests of the parties, neither of whom is to blame for the delay.

D. Acceptance by performance

In the case of acceptance by conduct, notice of the conduct must normally reach the offeror within the time for acceptance. In those situations where an act of performance by the offeree will constitute acceptance even before the offeror gets notice of it, the performance must be commenced within the time fixed by the offeror or, if no such time is fixed, within a reasonable time, but it is not required that the offeror learns of it before that time.

NOTES

1. The rules in paragraphs (l) and (2) are similar to CISG art. 18(2), and (3), UNIDROIT arts. 2.6 and 2.7, NORDIC Contract Acts §§ 2 and 3, GERMAN CC §§ 147(2) and 148, BULGARIAN LOA art. 13(3), AUSTRIAN CC § 862, ESTONIAN LOA §§ 17(1) and 18, GREEK CC art. 189, DUTCH CC art. 6: 221(1) and BELGIAN case law. The ITALIAN CC art. 1326(2) provides that the acceptance must reach the offeror within the time set by the offeror, or within the time which is ordinarily required according to the nature of the transaction or usage. Art. 228(l) of the PORTUGUESE CC provides that the acceptance must reach the offeror within the time set by the offeror or within 5 days after the time which is reasonable according to the nature of the transaction. In POLISH law, if the offeror did not fix a time for acceptance, an offer made in the presence of the other party or by any means of instantaneous communication lapses if it is not accepted immediately; an offer communicated in any other manner lapses after the period in which the offeror might have received an answer transmitted under ordinary circumstances without undue delay (CC art. 66 § 2).
2. In SLOVAKIA the rules on the time limit for acceptance can be inferred from CC § 43b sub-para. 1 a), b), which provides that even an irrevocable offer expires after the lapse of the period stipulated in it for acceptance or after the lapse of an adequate time period having regard to the nature of the offered agreement and to the means of communication used by the offeror. CC § 43c sub-para. 2 refers to acceptance as a "timely" declaration of the addressee or other "timely" conduct indicating consent.
3. The rules in paragraphs (1) and (2) also apply in ENGLISH, SCOTTISH and IRISH law. In English law it is not clear whether, if the offeror has set a time limit for acceptance, it suffices that the acceptance is dispatched within the period or whether it must reach the offeror within the period, cf. Holwell Securities Ltd. v. Hughes [1974] 1 WLR 155, CA. However, in Scotland and Ireland an acceptance by post is timely, if dispatched before the time set for acceptance, see for Scotland, Jacobsen v. Underwood (1894) 21 R 654.
4. Under FRENCH law an acceptance by correspondence is made in time if dispatched before the time set by the offeror, Cass. 7 January 1981. Unless the offeror has set a time limit, the acceptance must be dispatched within a reasonable time, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 115 and 171. The latter rule has also been adopted in SPAIN, see Supreme Court decision of 23 March 1988, RAJ (l988) 2422.
5. CZECH law is similar to what is laid down in paragraphs (1) and (2) of the Article (but instead of "reasonable time" the CC § 43b(1) uses "appropriate time taking into account the nature of the offered contract and the speed of the means of communication used by the offeror to transmit the offer"). In addition, CC § 43b(2) provides that an oral offer lapses if not accepted immediately, unless the contents of the offer do not indicate otherwise. The CC further specifies in detail the moment from which the time for acceptance starts to run: e.g. for offers delivered by post it is the date shown in the letter or, if there is no such date, the date of the postmark.

6. The regulation in SLOVENIAN law is very similar. Paragraph (1) of the Article corresponds to LOA § 26(1) in conjunction with § 28(1) and § 31(2); and the rule contained in the paragraph (2) is basically the same as in LOA § 26(3) and (4). As in Czech law, the moment from which the time for acceptance runs is defined in detail in § 26(2).

II.–4:207: Late acceptance

(1) A late acceptance is nonetheless effective as an acceptance if without undue delay the offeror informs the offeree that it is treated as an effective acceptance.

(2) If a letter or other communication containing a late acceptance shows that it has been dispatched in such circumstances that if its transmission had been normal it would have reached the offeror in due time, the late acceptance is effective as an acceptance unless, without undue delay, the offeror informs the offeree that the offer is considered to have lapsed.

COMMENTS

A. Late acceptance ineffective

The normal rule is that in order for an acceptance to be effective it must reach the offeror within the time for acceptance. Any acceptance which reaches the offeror after that time may be disregarded by the offeror. Normally the offeror does not even have to reject the acceptance.

B. Assent to a late acceptance

Paragraph (1) of the present Article states, however, that notwithstanding that normal rule the offeror may render the late acceptance effective by accepting it. The offeror must then without undue delay inform the offeree. If this is done the contract become effective from the moment the late acceptance reached the offeror, and the offeree is then bound by the acceptance.

The notice need not be an express statement of acceptance. An electronic transfer of the purchase money, which will reach the offeree as quickly as a notice, may suffice to make the contract effective.

Illustration 1
A has indicated 31 July as the last day for an acceptance of its offer. B's acceptance reaches A on 2 August. A immediately orders a transfer of the purchase money demanded by B. Notwithstanding that the payment does not come to B's notice until 4 August the contract is concluded on 2 August. Even if B now regrets the acceptance B cannot invoke its lateness to avoid the contract.

C. Late acceptance caused by delay in transmission

If the acceptance is late because the offeree did not send it in time, it is ineffective unless the offeror immediately indicates assent to the contract. If, however, the offeree has sent the acceptance in time, but the acceptance reaches the offeror after the time set for acceptance because of a delay in transmission, the offeree should be notified if the offeror does not want to assent to the contract. The late acceptance should be considered effective unless the offeror without undue delay informs the offeree that the offer as considered to have lapsed or gives notice to that effect. The offeror, however, only has this duty if the acceptance shows that it was sent in time and that it arrived late due to an unexpected delay in transmission.

Illustration 2
A has indicated 31 July as the last day for an acceptance of its offer. B, knowing that the normal time of transmission of letters is two days, sends its letter of acceptance on 25 July. Owing to a sudden strike of the postal service in A's country the letter, which shows the date 25 July on the envelope, arrives on August 2. B's acceptance is effective unless A objects without undue delay.

D. Late acceptance as a new offer

Some legal systems treat a late acceptance as a new offer which the offeror may accept within the time set for acceptance which is often longer than the time provided for in paragraph (1). The Article does not contain such a rule.

NOTES

I. Late acceptance

1. Paragraph (1) is in accordance with CISG, art. 21(1) and UNIDROIT Principles art. 2.9(1), and is similar to the CZECH CC § 43c(3), DUTCH CC art. 6:223(1), PORTUGUESE CC art. 229, ESTONIAN LOA § 22(2), ITALIAN CC art. 1326(3) and SLOVAK CC § 43c sub-para. 3.

2. Under some systems the late acceptance operates as a new offer which requires acceptance by the offeror, see NORDIC Contract Acts § 4(1), GERMAN CC § 150, AUSTRIAN law, see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 862 no. 4 and (Austrian Supreme Court (OGH) 24 November 1976 SZ 49/142, GREEK CC art. 191, POLAND, see: Radwański, 41, Arbitration Commission, December 9, 1976, OSP 1977, no. 7, poz. 122 and SLOVENIA, LOA § 31(1). In FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG and BELGIUM it is the general opinion that this is the rule (see, however, Trib. de Grande Instance de Paris 12 February l980, D. 1980, I.R. 261 note Ghestin), but there are no recent cases of authority. SPANISH and BULGARIAN law have no similar provision to paragraph (1) of this Article. In ENGLAND, SCOTLAND and IRELAND there is no authority on the point.

II. Delay in transmission

3. Paragraph (2) is identical to CISG art. 21(2), see note 1 above, UNIDROIT art. 2.9(2), SLOVENIAN LOA § 31(2), BULGARIAN LOA art. 13(5), and is similar to the NORDIC Contract Acts § 4(2), GERMAN CC § 149, AUSTRIAN law, see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 862a no. 6 (depending on the fact that the dispatch in due time is recognisable), CZECH CC § 43c(4), GREEK CC art. 190, NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:223(2), POLISH CC art. 67 and ESTONIAN LOA § 22(1), (3). In BELGIAN law the offeror's obligation to inform the offeree would follow from the principle of good faith and fair dealing.

4. Paragraph (2) is similar also to the SLOVAK law, according to which if it follows from the acceptance letter or document that it was sent under such circumstances that it would have been delivered to the offeror in time if transmission had taken place in a usual way, the delayed acceptance has effect as a timely one unless the offeror notifies the addressee without undue delay that the offer is considered to have lapsed.

5. In the UK, where the acceptance has effect when posted, the offeror will carry the risk of a delay in transmission unless it is due to the fault of the offeree who, for instance, misunderstood or misspelled the address, see on ENGLISH law Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 27-28 and on SCOTTISH law Jacobsen v. Underwood (1894) 21 R 654.

6. FRENCH, LUXEMBOURG, ITALIAN, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law have no rule similar to the one in paragraph (2) of the Article. However, in Spain the solution laid down in art. 21(2) CISG has been regarded as generally applicable to other contracts (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos I, p. 317; G*ómez*, Comentarios al Código civil XVII 1º-B, pp. 140-141, Moreno, La oferta de contrato, p. 157).

II.–4:208: Modified acceptance

(1) A reply by the offeree which states or implies additional or different terms which materially alter the terms of the offer is a rejection and a new offer.

(2) A reply which gives a definite assent to an offer operates as an acceptance even if it states or implies additional or different terms, provided these do not materially alter the terms of the offer. The additional or different terms then become part of the contract.

(3) However, such a reply is treated as a rejection of the offer if:

(a) the offer expressly limits acceptance to the terms of the offer;
(b) the offeror objects to the additional or different terms without undue delay; or
(c) the offeree makes the acceptance conditional upon the offeror's assent to the additional or different terms, and the assent does not reach the offeree within a reasonable time.

COMMENTS

A. The main principles

This Article contains the following rules:

(1) A contract is concluded if the reply expresses a definite assent to the offer.

(2) A reply containing terms which materially alter the terms of the offer is a rejection and a new offer.

(3) Additional and different terms which do not materially alter the terms of the offer become part of the contract.

(4) If in the case mentioned in (3) the offeror has limited the acceptance to the terms of the offer, or objects without undue delay to the different or additional terms, the offer is considered to have been rejected by the different or additional terms. The same applies if the offeree makes acceptance conditional upon the offeror's assent to the additional or different terms, and the offeror does not give assent within a reasonable time.

B. Considerations underlying the main principles

The notion that non-material additions or modifications become part of the contract has been widely accepted. Such additions and modifications are frequently attempts to clarify and interpret the contract, or to supply terms which would otherwise be considered "omitted terms". The offeror should object to them if they are not acceptable.

Under these rules an answer containing additions or modifications which materially alter the terms of the contract is to be considered as a counter-offer which the offeror may accept either by express assent or by conduct, for instance by performance of the contract. The special question of the "battle of forms" (conflicting standard terms) is covered in the following Article.

C. When is an alteration material?

Whether an alteration is material is a question of degree to be decided on the facts of each case. An alteration would not be material if it would not be likely to influence the offeror in deciding whether to contract or as to the terms on which to contract.

CISG art. 19(3), provides a list of additional and different terms which are to be considered material, such as terms relating, among other things, to the price, payment, quality and quantity of the goods, place and time of delivery, extent of one party's liability to the other, or the settlement of disputes. This technique has not been used in the present Article. The range of contracts and circumstances covered by the model rules is so extensive that any such list could only have been illustrative. For example, though a clause relating to settlement of disputes is often material, if among merchants in the trade it is usual, though not customary, to refer disputes to settlement by arbitration, an arbitration clause in the offeree's answer will not materially alter the terms of the contract.

D. Modification by conduct

An acceptance by conduct may contain additional or different terms. These terms may be material, for instance, if the offeree dispatches a much smaller quantity of a commodity than that which was ordered by the offeror, or immaterial if only a very small quantity is missing.

E. Acceptance of modification by conduct

A modification is an "acceptance" which makes the answer a rejection and a new offer. It may be accepted by the offeror's conduct. After having received the modified acceptance the offeror may perform the contract or accept the offeree's performance and this will amount to an acceptance of the new offer.

> Illustration
> S offers B a contract under which B is to buy 350 tonnes of coal, at a certain price, to be delivered in instalments. The draft contract document contains a jurisdiction clause. B returns the contract document with the jurisdiction clause struck out and an arbitration clause inserted instead. The contract is then put into S's manager's desk by one of S's employees. S subsequently delivers the first instalment which B accepts. Before the second instalment is to be delivered there is a sharp rise in the market price of coal, and S then tries to avoid the contract by invoking B's modified acceptance to which, it says, it never has agreed. However, S is to be considered as having accepted the contract by delivery of the first instalment.

F. Modified acceptance and conflicting standard terms

A reference in a typed or hand-written reply to the offeree's standard terms which contain terms which materially alter the terms of the contract is covered by the present Article when the offeror has not made any reference to standard terms. If the offeror has referred to standard terms, the case is covered by the following Article on conflicting standard terms (the battle of the forms) even though the reference is made in a hand-written or typed letter.

NOTES

I. Modified acceptance as rejection and a new offer

1. The rule in paragraph (1) is almost identical with CISG art. 19(1) and UNIDROIT art. 2.11(1). It is in accordance with AUSTRIAN law, the NORDIC Contract Acts § 6(1), GERMAN CC § 150(1), GREEK CC art. 191, POLISH CC art. 68, PORTUGUESE CC art. 233, ITALIAN CC art. 1326(5), DUTCH CC art. 2:226 (1), ESTONIAN LOA § 21(1), SLOVENIAN LOA § 29(1) and the laws of BELGIUM, see Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994 no. 97; Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 163, ENGLAND, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-018-2-020, SCOTLAND, see *Wolf & Wolf v. Forfar Potat*o Co 1984 SLT 100, Rutterford v. Allied Breweries 1990 SLT 249 and SLOVAKIA, see CC § 44 sub-para. 2, according to which an acceptance which contains amendments, reservations, restrictions or other changes is considered to be a rejection of the offer and a new offer. In BULGARIA there is no express rule on this matter, but it can be derived from the existing regulation which envisages only a full acceptance as an effective one.

II. Contract upheld in spite of non-material modifications

2. With slight modifications the rules in paragraphs (2) and (3) are the same as in CISG art. 19(2) and UNIDROIT art. 2.11(2). They were first introduced in the UCC § 2.207, see also ULFIS art. 7(2) and the DUTCH CC art. 6:225(2). The ESTONIAN LOA § 21(2) is to the same effect, as well as the SLOVENIAN LOA § 29(2) and (3), where a list of modifications which are deemed material is included.

3. Several other systems also accept that in case of non-material modifications, the contract is concluded on the terms of the offeree, see on FRENCH law, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 121; on SPANISH law, Supreme Court decisions of 26 March 1993 and 26 February 1994, RAJ (1994) 1198. In LUXEMBOURG and SCOTLAND there is no authority to this effect but some Scottish jurists have advocated the same approach, see for instance MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland § 2.26, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 6.92-6.95. Under GERMAN law CC §§ 154, 155 could provide a similar solution.

4. In BELGIAN law the prevailing view is that acceptance of the essential terms of the contract may suffice (Delforge, in Fontaine (2002), 170). The law or usages will determine the (accessory or inessential) terms on which there is disagreement, Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994 nos. 97-98, contra Cornelis, TBH 1983, 37.

5. In POLAND, the rules on non-material modifications, as provided by paragraphs (2) and (3), apply only between businesses CC art. 68[1]).

6. In SLOVAKIA the offer is considered to be accepted if the addressee's answer defines the content of the offered agreement in other words, unless a modification follows from the answer.

III. Complete agreement required: the "mirror image rule"

7. Most of the systems do not have rules corresponding to paragraphs (2) and (3). Several of them seem to require complete agreement between the parties so that even non-material modifications in the offeree's reply prevent the contract from coming into existence - with the proviso that mere trifles are to be disregarded. This seems to be the position in GERMAN law, see Staudinger (-Bork) 2003, § 150 no. 13; AUSTRIAN law, see Austrian Supreme Court (OGH) 31 May 1988 SZ 61/136;

BULGARIAN law (Kozhuharov, Law of Obligations, 67, 71); CZECH law, see CC § 44(2) and Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 297 (CZECH CC allows nothing more than different wording compared with the offer); PORTUGUESE law, see CC art. 232 and Vaz Serra 130 ff; ITALIAN law, see, among others, Cass. 24 October 2003, no. 16016, in I contratti 2004 221 and 4 May 1994, no. 4 in Repertorio del Foro Italiano, 1994 727 no. 272; for a more flexible approach by legal writers see Roppo, Il contratto 107, and Bellelli, 130 ff; and in ENGLAND, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-019-2-020, and IRELAND. The same rule applies in the NORDIC countries, see Contract Acts § 6(l) and for DENMARK, Lynge Andersen 70 ff, for FINLAND, Telaranta 147. However, under § 6(2) of the Contract Acts the "mirror image rule" does not apply where (1) the offeree considered the reply to be in conformity with the offer, and (2) the offeror must have realised this. If in that case the offeror does not wish to be bound by the terms of the reply, the offeror must give notice without undue delay. The "double awareness test" of (1) and (2) does not leave much room for application of the rule in practice, see Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 114 f.

8. SPANISH court decisions have held that a contract is concluded if the offeree slightly modified the original offer and at the time of acceptance the offeror did not object to the modifications. See: (TS 3 November 1955 (RAJ 1955) 3564 (contract for the provision of personal security), TS 30 January 1965 (RAJ 1965) 1803 (transfer of leasing contract), TS 26 March 1993 (RAJ 1993) 2395, TS 30 October 1995 (RAJ 1995) 8352 (sale of goods).

IV. Modification accepted by conduct

9. When because the acceptance was not in the same terms as the offer a contract has not come into existence, it may nevertheless be "healed" by the subsequent conduct of the parties, e.g. by performance by one party and acceptance of performance by the other party. It seems that several of the legal systems accept this solution. The ENGLISH case Trentham Lt.d v. Archital Luxfer Ltd. [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep 25, 27 supports the view that it will be easier for the courts to infer that the outstanding point of disagreement is inessential and that therefore there is a contract if the parties have begun performance. In SCOTLAND also there may be acceptance by conduct in this situation, see Uniroyal v. Miller 1985 SLT 101. But if negotiations are still pending an English case has held that there was no contract and that any performance made would have to be paid for on a restitutionary basis, see British Steel Corp. v. Cleveland Bridge Engineering Co. Ltd. [1994] 1 AllER 94, QB.

10. It is often held that by making a counter-offer the offeree becomes the offeror, and the offeror becomes the offeree who by conduct accepts the counter-offer, see on the CISG, Bianca-Bonell (-Farnsworth) 179 and Honnold nos. 170 ff and on FRENCH law, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 121. On the battle of the forms see the notes to the following Article.

11. DANISH cases and writers support the rule that performance may heal a contract. An offeror who has received an acceptance with modifications but who acts as if the contract is concluded must be considered to have accepted the modifications of the offeree, see UfR 1989 486 H. In other cases of performance where there is no basis for giving preference to one party's terms, the conflicting terms may be disregarded, and the rules of law will apply, see Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 104 f and Bryde Andersen Grundlægende 208 ff. See also on SWEDISH law, Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[10], 71 and Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 114 f.

II.–4:209: Conflicting standard terms

(1) If the parties have reached agreement except that the offer and acceptance refer to conflicting standard terms, a contract is nonetheless formed. The standard terms form part of the contract to the extent that they are common in substance.

(2) However, no contract is formed if one party:

(a) has indicated in advance, explicitly, and not by way of standard terms, an intention not to be bound by a contract on the basis of paragraph (1); or
(b) without undue delay, informs the other party of such an intention.

COMMENTS

A. The battle of forms

To-day's standardised production of goods and services has been accompanied by the standardised conclusion of contracts through the use of pre-printed supply and purchase orders. The pre-printed forms have blank spaces meant for the description of the performance, the quantity, price and time of delivery. All other terms are printed in advance. Each party tends to use terms which are favourable to it. Those prepared by the supplier, or by a trade organization representing suppliers, may, for example, contain limitations of liability in case of difficulties in production and supply or of defective performance, and provide that customers must give notice of any claim within short time limits. The forms prepared by the customer or its trade association, in contrast, hold the supplier liable for these contingencies, and give the customer ample time for complaints.

A special rule for this battle of forms is called for because it often happens that the parties purport to conclude the contract each using its own form although the two forms contain conflicting provisions. There is an element of inconsistency in the parties' behaviour. By referring to their own standard terms, neither wishes to accept the standard terms of the other party, yet both wish to have a contract. A party will only be tempted to deny the existence of the contract if the contract later proves to be disadvantageous for that party. The purpose of the rule is to uphold the contract and to provide an appropriate solution to the battle of forms.

Compared to the rules applied by those laws which still require offer and acceptance to be "mirror images" of each other before there can be a contract, this Article provides solutions which are much more likely to accord with the reasonable expectations of businesses and consumers who are not familiar with the technicalities of contract law. It does not, however, limit the freedom of the parties in any way. They remain free to state exactly what will or will not amount to offer and acceptance in their dealings.

B. Scope of the rule

The rule in the Article is not needed in every situation in which each party has a set of standard terms and these are not identical.

First, the parties may have so conducted themselves that only one set applies. This may happen because they have agreed explicitly that one set should govern their contract, for example when a party has signed a document which is to be treated as the contract, although in previous correspondence that party has referred to its terms of contract. It may also happen because one party fails to bring its standard terms to the other party's attention before or when the contract is concluded.

Secondly, the question as to which terms govern only arises when the standard terms are in real conflict. This is not always the case. It may be that one party's standard terms contain terms which are implied in any contract of that kind, or that they merely list technical specifications of the goods or services to be supplied or performed. Such clauses are often not at variance with the other party's standard terms, which may not contain any clauses on these points.

There is, however, a battle of forms even if only one party's terms contain provisions on an issue, when its terms deviate from the general rules of law, and it is to be understood that the other party meant the rules of law to cover the issue. Thus the rules in the Article will govern the situation where in its offer the supplier's general terms contain a price escalation clause and the buyer in its acceptance uses a form which says nothing about later changes in the price.

C. The solutions

Is there a contract? The Article provides that there may be a contract even though the standard terms exchanged by the parties are in conflict. This is an exception to the general rule on modified acceptance in the preceding Article. Under that Article, an acceptance which differs from the offer will be effective only if the differences are not material. Otherwise, the acceptance would be (i) a rejection of the offer and (ii) a new offer. It is true that, if the party who receives the new offer does not object to it and performs the contract, it will be deemed to have accepted that there is a contract. The difference made by the present Article, is that the contract may be formed by the exchange of standard terms, rather than only if and when the performance takes place.

Under the present Article, a party who does not wish to be bound by the contract may indicate so either in advance, or later.

If done in advance, this must be indicated explicitly and not by way of standard terms. Experience has shown that a party whose standard terms provide that there will be no contract unless those terms prevail (such a clause is often called a 'clause paramount') often remains silent in response to the other party's conflicting terms, and acts as if a contract had come into existence. The provision is often contradicted by the party's own behaviour. To uphold it would erode the rule.

A party, however, may prevent a contract from coming into existence by informing the other party, without undue delay after the exchange of the documents which purport to conclude the contract, of an intention not to conclude a contract.

Which terms govern? If despite a conflict between the two sets of terms, a contract does come into existence, the question is: which terms will apply? Until recently many legal systems would answer the question as follows: By performing without raising objections to the new offer, the recipient must be considered to have accepted the standard terms contained in the new offer (the 'last shot' theory). Under another theory it is argued that a party which states that it accepts the offer should not be allowed to change its terms. Under this theory (the so-called ‘first shot’ theory) the conditions of the first offeror prevail.

Under the present Article the standard terms form part of the contract only to the extent that they are common in substance. The conflicting terms ‘knock out’ each other. As neither party wishes to accept the standard terms of the other party, neither set of standard terms should prevail over the other. To let the party which fired the first or the last shot win the battle would make the outcome depend upon a factor which is often coincidental.

It is then for the court to fill the gap left by the terms which knock each other out. The court may apply applicable rules of law to decide the issue on which the terms are in conflict. Usages in the relevant trade and practices between the parties may be particularly important here, for example if there is a usage of employing terms which have been made under the auspices of official bodies or standard forms promoted by some other neutral organisation. If the issue is not explicitly covered either by the law or by usages or practices, the court or the arbitrator may consider the nature and purpose of the contract and apply the standards of good faith and fair dealing to fill the gap.

> Illustration 1
> A orders some goods from B. A’s order form says that the seller must accept responsibility for delays in delivery even if these were caused by force majeure. The seller’s sales form not only excludes the seller’s liability for damages caused by late delivery where there was force majeure, but also states that the buyer has no right to terminate for delay unless the delay is over six months. The delivery is delayed by force majeure for a period of three months and the buyer, who because of the delay no longer has any use for the goods, wishes to terminate the contractual relationship. The two clauses knock each other out and the general rules of law will apply: thus the seller is not liable in damages but the buyer may terminate for delay if the delay was fundamental.

The term “common in substance” conveys that it is identity in result not in formulation that counts. However, what is “common in substance” will not always be easy to decide.

> Illustration 2
> A sends B an order, which has on the back general terms providing, among other things, that any dispute between the parties will be submitted to arbitration in London. B sends A an acknowledgement accepting the offer. On the back of the acknowledgement is a clause submitting all disputes to arbitration in Stockholm. Although offer and acceptance have in common that they both refer to arbitration, the clauses are not ‘common in substance’ and accordingly neither of the places of arbitration is agreed upon. But did the parties agree on arbitration?

A court might conclude that the parties preferred arbitration to litigation in any case and would then apply the normal rules on jurisdiction in civil and commercial matters to decide where the place of arbitration should be.

If, however, the court finds that the parties or one of them would only have agreed to arbitration if it was to be held at a certain place the arbitration clause may be disregarded and the court may then admit the action.

NOTES

I. Is there a contract ?

1. In most of those countries where the courts have addressed the battle of forms it seems to be held that a contract has come into existence by the offer and its purported acceptance unless the offeror objects to the purported acceptance without undue delay. Thus the contract is held to exist even before the parties have acknowledged it in any other way, for instance by tendering performance. This is also the position of some of the writers in the countries where there is no case law on the subject.

2. In countries where the classical rules on offer and acceptance govern the battle of forms, a contract only comes into existence when these rules so provide. Under the classical rules on the conclusion of contracts the contract may also come into existence when the parties treat it as concluded expressly or by conduct, for instance by performing the contract. This is the position in ENGLISH law, see Sauter Automation Ltd. v. Goodman (Mechanical Services) Ltd. (1986) 34 Building LR 81. See on PORTUGAL, Almeida, Negocio juridico 886 and on SPAIN, Diez-Picaso 211. In FRENCH and in BELGIAN law the contract is not formed unless both parties consider the conflicting terms as unessential, see von Mehren, Formation of contracts, 164; Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 188; Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994, no. 99.

3. In sales governed by CISG part II, where the terms of the purported acceptance do not materially alter the terms of the offer, the acceptance will conclude the contract unless the offeror objects without undue delay, see art. 19(2). If the terms of the purported acceptance materially alter the terms of the offer, there is a counter-offer, and therefore no contract until the offeror has shown by statements or conduct that the counter-offer is accepted, for instance by performing the contract, see arts. 19(1) and 18(1), and Farnsworth in Bianca & Bonell art. 19, ss. 2.3-2.6. The situation seems to be the same under the SLOVENIAN LOA § 29 which is identical to CISG art. 19, but there has not been any case law to support this.

II. Which terms govern?

(a) The "knock out" rule

4. The Article is in accordance with the UNIDROIT Principles art. 2.22, see Bonell, International Restatement 124 ff. The GERMAN courts have adopted a similar "knock out" principle. In most of the cases they have solved the conflict by applying the rules of law (das dispositive Recht) governing the issue, see BGH 20 March 1985, NJW 1985, 1838, BGH 23 January 1991, NJW 1991 1606, and Staudinger (-Bork) 2003, § 150 no. 18. Basically the same position has been taken by the AUSTRIAN courts, see OGH 22 September 1982, SZ 55/134 and OGH 7 June 1990, JBl 1991, 120; see also Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 864a no. 3. Also, DANISH law appears to support this rule see Bryde Andersen Grundlæggende 208 ff, Lando, UfR 1988, B 1 and Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 104. The ESTONIAN LOA § 40 corresponds to the present Article.

5. In FRENCH and BELGIAN law the contract is concluded provided the conflicting terms do not cover an essential element, 'cause determinante', of the contract, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 188, 189, 366. It is held that in such cases no terms have been agreed and the rules of law will fill the gap, see de Ly &

Burggraaf 47 and Mahé; Delforge, in Fontaine (2002), 488-489; Stijns-Van Gerven-Wéry, JT 1996, p. 715, no. 79.

6. In POLAND the "knock out" rule is reflected in CC art. 385[4]. It provides that a contract concluded between entrepreneurs who use conflicting standard terms remains valid, but does not include those provisions of the standard forms which are mutually contradictory. A contract is not concluded, however, if any party immediately declares that it does not intend to conclude such contract.

(b) The "last shot" theory

7. The last shot theory seems to be the prevailing view in ENGLAND, see B.R.S. v. Arthur Crutchley [1967] 2 AllER 285, 287, although the outcome will depend on the exact facts, see Butler Machine Tool Co. v. Ex-Cell-O Corporation(England) Ltd [1979] 1 WLR 811, 817, C.A. and Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-019-2-020. It is also the prevailing view in SCOTLAND, see SME, vol. 15, § 636; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 6.97-6.105

8. CISG arts. 18-19 seem to lead to the same outcome, both in cases where the conflicting terms of the acceptance materially alter the terms of the offer, see arts. 19(1) and 18(3), and when they do not, see art. 19(2), see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schlechtriem and Schroeter), CISG, art. 19 no. 19 and Farnsworth in *Bia*nca & Bonell art. 19, ss. 2.3-2.6.

(c) The first shot rule

9. The DUTCH CC art. 6:225(3) provides that if offer and acceptance refer to different standard terms, the second reference is without effect, unless it explicitly rejects the applicability of the standard terms contained in the first reference. It appears that the explicit rejection must be one which the offeree communicates for the occasion and not one which only appears in the offeree's standard terms.

10. In the USA § 2-207 of the UCC provides a general rule on additional terms in acceptance or confirmation. It is the prevailing view that the result is similar to that of the Dutch CC. However, if the additional terms do not materially alter the terms of the offer, these additional terms will become part of the contract, unless the offer expressly limits acceptance to the terms of the offer or notification of objection has already been given or is given within a reasonable time after notice of them is received. Several authors have criticised the rules in § 2-207, see von Mehren, Formation of contracts, 157-180.

(d) The law is unsettled

11. In the law of several countries, statutory provisions on the conclusion of contracts do not address the issue or do not provide what the authors consider to be clear and satisfactory answers. There is no case law and the authors are sometimes divided.

12. There is no general rule in SPAIN, where the authors tend to favour the classical rules on offer and acceptance and on interpretation of contracts. This is also the position of the PORTUGUESE authors, but tempered by the good faith principle; see Frada de Sousa, 140 ff. There is no express rule in ITALY, where some authors favour the "last-shot" theory (see Bellelli, 151), while others are in support of the "knock-out" doctrine (see Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto III, 407). In CZECH law there is no specific rule on conflicting standard terms. So the general rules on conclusion of contracts apply.

13. Many authors assert that there can be no hard and fast rule which solves the conflict. The cases are to be decided individually. This is the attitude of the SWEDISH authors, see Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 174 ff; Göransson, passim, who seems to favour the first shot theory; Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt II[4],73; and Hellner, Kommersiell avtalsrätt 50, who is not even sure what is the right approach, and who shows some sympathy for the last shot rule, a sympathy which Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], seems to share; see also Bernitz 40.

14. The question is treated by the FINNISH author Wilhelmsson (Standardavtal 1995), who seems to prefer the knock out principle, see pp. 79 f. Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 170-178 is less willing to consider any of the alternatives as a main rule and emphasises the role of the merits of every particular case. Among DANISH authors, Lando, Kampen, and Bryde Andersen. Grunlæggende 210 favour the knock out principle; Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], argues for the last shot rule where the offeror treats the contract as concluded without objecting to the additional or different terms in the acceptance, while in other cases the rules of the law should apply, see p. 105; Lynge Andersen 74 seems to prefer the last shot rule.

15. In SLOVAKIA only the classical rules on offer and acceptance govern the battle of forms, as statutory provisions on the conclusion of contracts do not address this issue and there is no case law.

II.–4:210: Formal confirmation of contract between businesses

If businesses have concluded a contract but have not embodied it in a final document, and one without undue delay sends the other a notice in textual form on a durable medium which purports to be a confirmation of the contract but which contains additional or different terms, such terms become part of the contract unless:

(a) the terms materially alter the terms of the contract; or

(b) the addressee objects to them without undue delay.

COMMENTS

A. Background

Between persons engaged in business transactions who have made a contract, it may not be entirely clear on what terms their contract has been concluded. A party may then send the other party a confirmation (e.g. by letter or email) containing the terms which the first party believes were agreed upon, and the terms which that party believes to be implied. The party needs to send this confirmation in order to be sure of the terms of the contract before performance begins. In most cases the recipient will assent to the confirmation by silence, having no reason to reconfirm what has already been agreed upon and confirmed by the other party. The silence will, therefore, be considered as assent. A recipient who disagrees with the terms must object without undue delay.

In many cases the additional terms provided in the confirmation will take the shape of an interpretation of the contract.

> Illustration 1
> Upon the termination of a distribution contract between the supplier S and the distributor D, D requests, and it is agreed orally, that S will take over D's stock of machinery "at the usual trade discount". These words usually mean the discount applied in sales from S to D (30%). However, in a letter of confirmation sent to S immediately after the oral agreement D points out that it means the discount which D applies to customers (28%). Since S does not object to D's letter, D's interpretation will prevail.

The rule stated in this Article is not recognised, or not clearly recognised, in all the laws but it again represents what seems to be widely accepted as fair commercial dealing between businesses. It would not be appropriate to apply it between a business and a consumer; however, as consumers cannot be expected to check all the documents sent to them by the business to ensure that they are consistent with the oral agreement made earlier.

B. Requirements

In order for the confirmation to become binding upon the recipient, the following requirements must be met:

> (1) The rule only operates between persons operating in their business capacity, as distinguished from relationships between professionals and consumers or between private individuals.

(2) The confirmation must be in textual form on a durable medium.

(3) The contract must have been incomplete in the sense that it did not materialise into a document which was a record of all the contract terms.

(4) The confirmation must reach the recipient without undue delay after the negotiations and it must refer to them.

(5) If the recipient does not object without undue delay to the terms additional to or different from the terms agreed upon in the preceding negotiations, they become part of the contract unless they materially alter the terms agreed upon.

Illustration 2
Upon the oral conclusion of a sales contract S sends B a letter of confirmation in which, inter alia, it is provided that B has to make an advance payment of half of the purchase price three months before delivery of the goods. S cannot prove that this was agreed when the contract was concluded; the term is unusual in the trade, and would materially alter the terms of the contract. B is not bound by the term on prepayment. S, on the other hand, must perform the contractual obligations without getting the advance payment.

NOTES

I. Unidroit, German, Estonian, Nordic and Polish law.

1. The rule laid down in this Article is provided in the UNIDROIT Principles, art. 2.1.12. The same rule probably also applies in SWEDEN in contracts between professionals, see Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt II[4], 74 ff and NJA 1980, 46 (Swedish Supreme Court). The same rule applies in DENMARK, ESTONIA, FINLAND and GERMANY, see references below.

2. In these four countries a professional's written confirmation may also create a contract even though it was not clear that one existed already. The letter of confirmation will bind the addressee to a contract even if the addressee did not believe there was a contract, if the sender of the confirmation had reason to believe that the negotiations between the parties had led to a contract, see on DANISH law, Lynge Andersen 100 ff and the Supreme Court's decision in UfR l974 119 H; on FINNISH law, Telaranta 172; and on GERMAN law, Baumbach/Duden/Hopt (-Baumbach and Hopt), Handelsgesetzbuch[12], § 346 nos. 16 et seq. However, in this case the recipient will not be bound, if the letter contains surprising terms, or the recipient objects to the writing without undue delay. The general rule in ESTONIAN law corresponds to the present Article (LOA § 32(1)). In LOA § 32(2) it is further specified that the rules do not apply if the sender of the written confirmation knew or should have known that the contract had not been concluded or if the terms in the written confirmation differ from the terms agreed upon earlier to such an extent that the sender of the written confirmation cannot reasonably rely on the other party's consent to the contents of the written confirmation.

3. The rule of the present Article, as applicable to contracts concluded between businesses, is explicitly embodied in POLISH law (CC art. 77^1). The rule was introduced in 2003 and there is no case law on the subject to date.

II. English, Irish and Scottish law

4. It is argued that also under ENGLISH law, usages and practices between the parties may mean that if a party receives a letter of confirmation or similar document modifying the terms of the contract, and does not object, the party may nevertheless be bound. Although the principles of good faith and fair dealing are not generally adopted in English law, some cases seem to show that even when there are no usages and practices between the parties, silence in response to such a communication may be regarded as acceptance when it would be unreasonable to hold otherwise, such as when the recipient had initiated the negotiations, see Schlesinger (-Leyser) 116 ff, Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 2-043 and *Rus*t v. Abbey Life Ins. Co. [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep 355. Although there is little authority in IRELAND to support this view, it appears to be in line with the spirit of the law. The same may be true in SCOTLAND; cf. McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 6.71-6.77.

III. The other systems

5. In most other European countries, a party's silence in response to a letter of confirmation or other communication purporting to change the terms of the contract will only amount to acceptance if this follows from usages and a practice between the parties, or when under the principle of good faith and fair dealing silence must be interpreted as acceptance. See for instance the LUXEMBOURG Cass. 26 June 1914, Pasicrisie 11, 89, where it was stated that under the circumstances "the confirmation of a purchase is implied by the silence of the buyer to the letter of confirmation of the seller." The same solution applies under the CISG, see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), CISG, art. 9 nos. 22-24. In AUSTRIAN law a professional's silence to another professional's written confirmation which adds to or deviates from the agreement made is in general not regarded as an acceptance of the written confirmation, see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I^3, § 861 no. 13, and Austrian Supreme Court (OGH) 7 July 1982 SZ 55/106, 28 April 1993 JBI 1993, 782.

6. In FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG, BELGIUM and THE NETHERLANDS there seems to exist a general usage under which the recipient of an invoice is taken to have accepted the terms in the invoice unless the recipient objects to them without undue delay. A party's acceptance of a performance without objecting to the terms communicated by the performing party before or with the performance, or other similar circumstances may also be interpreted as acceptance of these terms, if good faith and fair dealing so require: see on Belgian law, Rodière, Formation 53 and Storme TBH 1991, 467 ff; on French law, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 104-121; and on Dutch law, Rodière, Formation 100.

7. In ITALY, a written confirmation containing new terms diverging from those embodied in the original contract tends to be considered as an offer to amend the content of the agreement already reached between the parties (see Cass. S.U. 9 June 1995 no. 6499 in Foro it. 1997, I, 562; see also 14 March 1983 no.1888, Giur.it. 1984, I, 1 336. For a more flexible approach by legal writers see however Bonell, Tecnica di redazione dei contratti internazionali, Enciclopedia giuridica Treccani 3 ff; Addis, 232 ff.

8. There is no rule developed on this in SPANISH law. However, the situation raises the problem of when silence will be regarded as acceptance. In this situation, the other party is bound by the good faith rule to give an express objection to the writing. There is a duty to speak and silence counts as acceptance. It should be noted, however, that the rule just explained does not apply when a notarial deed differs from the terms previously embodied in a private contract document (CC art. 1224).

9. In SLOVAKIA there is no special rule and only the general rule according to which silence or inactivity is not to be considered as an acceptance (CC § 44 sub-para. 1) will be applicable. In SLOVENIA, too, no special rules for formal confirmation between businesses exist and the general rules on conclusion are applicable. It is the same in BULGARIAN law – see under acceptance by silence, Ccom art. 292.

10. The CZECH CC does not deal with this issue and so the courts apply the general rules on the formation of contracts.

II.–4:211: Contracts not concluded through offer and acceptance

The rules in this Section apply with appropriate adaptations even though the process of conclusion of a contract cannot be analysed into offer and acceptance.

COMMENTS

A. Other models than the offer and acceptance model

The conclusion of a contract may not always be separated into an offer and an acceptance. The parties may start with a letter of intent or a draft agreement made by one party or a third party. Then follow negotiations either in each other's presence or in an exchange of letters. Or they start by sitting down together to negotiate, sometimes with rather vague ideas of where they will end. It may not be easy to tell where in this process the parties reach an agreement which amounts to a binding contract. The same may be true of the many contracts that are made by conduct alone, as when a motorist parks in a car park and gets a ticket from a machine or a traveller takes out travel insurance by putting money into a slot machine and receiving the policy from the machine. Or a multilateral contract may be concluded by the parties voting at a meeting to accept the terms of a prepared draft.

B. Application of Section 2

The rules in Section 2 cannot always be applied to such other models. Sometimes, however, they may apply:

> Illustration 1
> Two parties meet to draft a written contract. When they have made the draft they agree that each party will have two weeks to decide whether to accept it. The draft is treated as an "offer". If after the two weeks each of them has not received the other party's acceptance there is no contract. The same applies if before that time a party receives the other's rejection. If during the respite a party makes proposals for additions which materially alter the terms of the draft, this is to be treated as a rejection and a "new offer".

> Illustration 2
> After conclusion of an oral agreement a person acting for two professional parties is asked to prepare a written contract. The person then sends both parties a draft accompanied by a letter saying that the draft will be taken to be their agreement unless either replies to the contrary within a certain time. The draft contains the terms which the parties had agreed upon and some additional terms which reflect usual commercial practices in the trade. The parties will be bound if neither opts out within the stated time.

NOTES

1. The conclusion of a contract by way of an offer and acceptance is the principal model in all the legal systems. Other models are only sparsely regulated in the statutes, and several of the problems are not solved in the case law, see for ENGLAND Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-076-2-079 and for the NETHERLANDS, Asser-Hartkamp 4-II, Algemene leer der overeenkomsten, nos. 135 and 156.

2. It seems, however, to be universally agreed that the rules on the principal model apply by way of analogy to the other models, in so far as this is possible and reasonable. In many countries this follows from the general principle of analogous application of the laws. The authors are in agreement on this; see for GERMANY, Staudinger (-Bork) 2003, before § 145 no. 38; for DENMARK, Lynge Andersen 85 f; and for FINLAND and SWEDEN, The Contracts Act § 1 and Grönfors, Avtalslagen 35 f. This also appears to be the position in ENGLAND, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 2-076-2-079; for ITALY, see Roppo, Il contratto 136 and Bianca, Diritto civile III, 238. For ESTONIA, see LOA § 9(1): a contract may be concluded by the mutual exchange of declarations of intent in any other manner if it is sufficiently clear that the parties have reached an agreement (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 9, no. 4.1.1).

3. In SLOVAKIA it is generally accepted (no regulation in Codes) that a contract is concluded when sufficient agreement is reached without strictly following the contractual model of offer and acceptance. (see Fekete,I: Občiansky zákonník, komentár. Bratislava, Eops, 2002, p. 161).

4. Under BULGARIAN law, the silent conclusion of a contract is generally accepted. If the prerequisites of the latter are satisfied, a contract can be concluded without offer and acceptance too.

5. See generally Schlesinger II, 1583-1620*; Fontaine*, in Mélanges Van Ommeslaghe (2000), 115.

Section 3: Other juridical acts

II.–4:301: Requirements for a unilateral juridical act

The requirements for a unilateral juridical act are:

(a) that the party doing the act intends to be legally bound or to achieve the relevant legal effect;

(b) that the act is sufficiently certain; and

(c) that notice of the act reaches the person to whom it is addressed or, if the act is addressed to the public, the act is made public by advertisement, public notice or otherwise.

COMMENTS

A. General

The rules on the formation of contracts, with their emphasis on agreement, cannot be applied directly to the formation of other unilateral acts. Nonetheless, questions about the effectiveness of a unilateral juridical act can arise.

Illustration

Under a contract between A and B, A has the right to terminate the contractual relationship upon one month's notice and the payment of a certain sum. A sends B a letter giving one month's notice but then changes her mind and calls B to tell her to ignore the notice, which has not yet reached B. As the notice has not yet taken effect it can be revoked. The intention necessary under sub-paragraph (a) is no longer present (see also I.–1:109 (Notice) paragraph (5)).

This Article represents the general approach taken by the majority of laws in which the matter has been discussed.

An offer and an acceptance are types of unilateral juridical acts but the more specific rules regulating them will prevail over the general rules in this Article in any case of conflict (see I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (5)).

B. Requirements

The requirements for the formation of a unilateral juridical act are, however, very similar to the requirements for the formation of a contract. The need for an intention on the part of the maker of the act to be legally bound or to achieve the desired legal result, and the need for sufficient certainty are very similar to the requirements for a contract. These requirements are coupled with the need for an appropriate externalisation of the intention. A secret intention which is not communicated to anyone is not binding. The person who forms an intention to achieve some legal result remains free to have a change of mind so long as the intention, even if written down, is not communicated to anyone. The general rule is that a juridical act is made only when notice of it reaches the person to whom it is addressed. The general provisions on notices determine when a notice "reaches" the addressee. A special rule is needed for juridical acts addressed to the public at large and here the Article requires that the act be made public by advertisement, public notice or otherwise. The model rules are not intended to apply to testamentary acts. If they did so apply then the requirement of notice would have to be modified: the event which precludes a subsequent change of mind is not notice in such a case but death. There are also specific rules which dispense with the need for a juridical act to reach the addressee. For example, an acceptance by doing an act may in certain circumstances be effective even without communication to the offeror. See II.–4:205 (Time of conclusion of the contract) paragraph (3).

NOTES

1. The requirements for the formation of contracts are applied by analogy to unilateral juridical acts by BELGIAN case law (see *Stijns-Van Gerven-Wé*ry, JT 1996, 708; on unilateral promises: Cauffman, De verbindende eenzijdige belofte, nos. 228 and 777).
2. In PORTUGUESE law, the principle is that unilateral acts are not able to create obligations (CC art. 457). The main exceptions are public promises (CC art. 459) and written declarations on negotiable instruments. In the absence of statutory provisions, requirements for these unilateral acts and for many others which affect the formation and the effects of contracts (such as offer, acceptance, waiver, authorisation) may be inferred from general principles and from the rules on legal transactions (CC art. 295).
3. Pursuant to art. 1324 of the ITALIAN CC, rules governing contracts apply, unless otherwise provided by law and to the extent they are compatible, to unilateral inter vivos juridical acts having a patrimonial content. Scholars favour the application of the rule also to mortis causa acts and juridical acts not having a patrimonial content (see Roppo, Il contratto 87; Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto III, 73). Similarly, according to SLOVENIAN LOA § 14, the rules on contracts apply with appropriate modifications to other juridical acts. There are no special rules on the formation of unilateral juridical acts. The same solution is contained in the BULGARIAN LOA art. 44.
4. In FRANCE, there is no general theory of unilateral juridical acts but some of these acts are submitted to special rules. In the absence of specific rules, the rules regarding contracts are adapted and applied. (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 50). The position is the same in SCOTLAND; a promise which is capable of creating a binding obligation will not do so unless it is communicated to the addressee (Burr v. Boness Police Commissioners (1896) 24 R. 148).
5. GERMAN law distinguishes between strict unilateral acts and other unilateral acts. The effectiveness of strict unilateral acts does not depend on the knowledge of a certain person (so called “nicht empfangsbedürftige Willenserklärung” - declaration of intent which does not need to be received). It is deemed sufficient that the party doing the act expresses the declaration of intent in a noticeable way, for instance, by paying the agreed prize or dispatching the ordered products (Staudinger (-Singer/Bemedict) 2004, § 130 No. 11). Non-strict unilateral acts (so called “empfangsbedürftige Willenserklärung” – declaration of intent which has to be received) are regulated in CC § 130(1) sentence 1 and become effective at the time they reach the addressee. Regarding CC § 151 an exception from this rule is possible in case of an acceptance of an offer. The acceptance is dispensable, if such a declaration is not to be expected according to common usage, or if the offeror has waived it.
6. The DUTCH CC, like the German CC, takes the ‘juridical act’ as a starting point for regulation (arts. 3:33 ff) and treats contract and the non-strict unilateral act as species.

Therefore regulation of the non-strict unilateral juridical act in the CC is quite limited (art. 3:37(3), (4) and (5)).

7. In AUSTRIA unilateral juridical acts exist in the form of e.g. testamentary acts, offers of rewards, the authorisation of a representative, notices and withdrawals. In part general provisions of the law of contracts are applicable by analogy, if the unilateral juridical act has to reach the addressee in order to be binding (see CC § 876).

8. POLISH law does not regulate unilateral juridical acts separately from juridical acts in general. According to the general rules, a party making a juridical act must act intentionally, and can express the will by any conduct which manifests it sufficiently clearly (CC art. 60). The declaration of will is deemed to be made at the moment when it reaches the addressee in such a way that the addressee can access it. Among all unilateral juridical acts only a public promise is regulated separately (CC arts. 919-921): anyone who, by way of advertisement, publicly promises a reward for the performance of a specified act, is obliged to fulfil that promise. In this case public announcement of the declaration of intent is a requirement for the formation of the unilateral act.

9. In SLOVAK law there are special rules for the formation of a few types of unilateral juridical act – i.e. public promise (CC §§ 850-852), public competition (CC §§ 847-849) and promise of indemnity (Ccom §§ 725-728). For the rest the general rules on juridical acts apply.

10. In CZECH law unilateral juridical acts are subject to the same general rules as contracts (see CC §§ 34-42a). So, a unilateral juridical act must be made freely, seriously, in a definite manner and must be understandable (CC § 37(1). Performance of a unilateral juridical act must be objectively possible (CC § 37(2). It is generally recognized that an addressed unilateral juridical act is not effective unless the manifestation of will reaches the addressee, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], CC, 231. Regarding non-addressed unilateral juridical acts, CZECH law does not contain any common provision on making a manifestation of will public – the answer usually results from particular regulations as set forth in special parts of the CC (e.g. CC §§ 847, 850) and (CC §§ 276, 281). That is because a general public promise regulation is unknown to Czech law, see Knappová (-Knapp/Knappová/Švestka) Civil Law II, 73.

11. Under ESTONIAN law, a general provision for both unilateral and multilateral juridical acts can be found in GPCCA §§ 67-75. A unilateral juridical act (e.g. testamentary act, public offer of reward, the authorisation of a representative, notice of withdrawal) is defined as a transaction for which a declaration of intention of one person is necessary (GPCCA § 67(2) sent. 2). A declaration of intention (to bring about a legal consequence) directed at a certain person, if it is properly expressed (directly or indirectly) becomes effective at the time it reaches the addressee (GPCCA § 69(1) sent. 1). A declaration of intention which is not directed at a certain person (e.g. a public offer of reward) enters into force upon expression of the intention (GPCCA § 69(1) sent. 2).

12. In ENGLISH law, there is no general rule for unilateral juridical acts since the concept is not recognised as such. For most such acts – for example, notices that affect the obligations under a contract, such as a notice of avoidance or termination - the communication will have to reach the other party in order to be effective. See the Notes to I.–1:109 (Notice). In contrast, a promise by deed does not have to be communicated to be effective. However, promises under deed and contractual notices are subject to the usual defences of invalidity, such as fraud: see Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 1-091.

13. In HUNGARIAN law a juridical act is a declaration of will of one or more persons which is intended to bring about legal effects. From a unilateral statement a right to demand performance arises only in the cases defined by legal regulations; the provisions on contracts are to be applied to unilateral statements, unless otherwise provided by law (CC § 199).

II.–4:302: How intention is determined

The intention of a party to be legally bound or to achieve the relevant legal effect is to be determined from the party's statements or conduct as they were reasonably understood by the person to whom the act is addressed.

COMMENTS

This is very similar to the equivalent rule for contracts. It would be unacceptable to allow a party's subjective intention to prevail over the reasonable understanding of the other party.

NOTES

1. See the notes on II.–4:102 (How intention is determined).
2. The same interpretation rules as to contracts apply also in CZECH law, (CC § 35) and DUTCH law (CC art. 3:35).

II.–4:303: Right or benefit may be rejected

Where a unilateral juridical act confers a right or benefit on the person to whom it is addressed, that person may reject it by notice to the maker of the act, provided that is done without undue delay and before the right or benefit has been expressly or impliedly accepted. On such rejection, the right or benefit is treated as never having accrued.

COMMENTS

A. Freedom to reject right or benefit

This Article reflects the policy that a person should not be forced to accept a right or benefit which the person does not want. There could be various reasons for rejecting an apparent benefit. The recipient may have personal reasons for not wishing to be under any moral obligation to the person trying to confer the benefit. Or the benefit may come with inherent burdens or disadvantages. For example, the owner of certain types of property may well come under certain duties or burdens of a public law nature.

It is obvious that the Article cannot apply to all juridical acts. A person who is given notice of avoidance of a contract, for example, cannot reject it. It should also be remembered that this is just a default rule. The parties may have contracted otherwise. The recipient may be contractually bound to accept the right or benefit.

NOTES

1. By analogy with the rejection of an offer, the rejection of the benefit of a promise is accepted by BELGIAN legal writers (see Cauffman, De verbindende eenzijdige belofte, no. 1221).
2. The principle invito non datur beneficium (nobody can be constrained to accept a benefit) is unanimously recognised by PORTUGUESE lawyers (see JORGE 216), but there is no particular statutory provision or regime about it. The same situation is observed in BULGARIA, where donations (LOA art. 225) and remissions of a debt (LOA art. 108) are contracts and not unilateral acts and where the contract in favour of a third person becomes effective towards the third person only after acceptance (LOA art. 22). In the NETHERLANDS, the above-mentioned principle and the proviso that the person to whom the right or benefit is addressed may reject it only without undue delay may be concluded from the CC arts. 6:5(2), 6:160(2), 6:253(3) and 7:175(2). The same principle can be found in the GERMAN CC §§ 333, 515(2) and is partly mirrored by CC § 167.
3. In FRANCE, the rule stating that a person can refuse a unilateral act which would trigger a gain is firmly established.
4. Under POLISH law, there is no express similar rule but it is recognised that a benefit may not be conferred on anyone against that person's will. Donation is a contract (CC art. 888), a benefit conferred in a testament can be rejected (CC art. 1012). Until a 2005 judgment of the Constitutional Court, there applied a CC rule (former CC art. 179) that an owner of a real estate may renounce it, upon which title to that real estate passed to the municipality or the State. However, this rule was found unconstitutional (Judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal of 15 March 2005, K 9/04, Journal of Laws, 2005/48/462), as it shifted title without conferring any right to reject it.

5. In SLOVAKIA the policy or the rule that a person should not be forced to accept a right or benefit which the person does not want is not explicitly expressed in the CC or the Ccom but results from the basic rules on which the private law is based.

6. In SCOTLAND it is accepted that the benefit conferred by a promise can be rejected. Gloag and Henderson para. 5.11.

7. In CZECH law it is accepted that, unless the law provides otherwise, no right or obligation may be imposed on the addressee by the way of a unilateral juridical act until the addressee consents to (Knappová (-Knapp/Knappová/Švestka) Civil Law II, 72). The consent may result from the addressee's own unilateral juridical acts made after the unilateral juridical act in question had taken effect (typically, accepting or following the unilateral juridical act) or from the addressee's previous legal undertakings (concluded contracts etc.) This principle is not stated in the CC but is inferred from provisions regulating particular types of unilateral juridical acts.

8. In ESTONIA there is no general rule comparable to this Article. In Estonian law acceptance is presumed for contracts of surety (LOA § 144(1)) and contracts of guarantees (LOA § 155(11). Contracts for gift, like contracts generally, need acceptance for their formation (LOA § 259).

CHAPTER 5: RIGHT OF WITHDRAWAL

Section 1: Exercise and effect

II.–5:101: Scope and mandatory nature

(1) The provisions in this Section apply where under any rule in Books II to IV a party has a right to withdraw from a contract within a certain period.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of the entitled party, exclude the application of the rules in this Chapter or derogate from or vary their effects.

COMMENTS

A. General rules on exercise and effect of withdrawal

Section 1 of this Chapter contains a set of rules which are applicable to all individual rights of withdrawal. These common rules concern only the exercise and effect of the right of withdrawal, including some related matters such as time limits for exercising this right and requirements to inform the party who is entitled to withdraw on the basis of this right. Paragraph (1) clarifies that these rules apply where a party has the right of withdrawal within a certain period under any rule in Books I to IV. Such withdrawal rights are granted, for example in II.–5:201 (Contracts negotiated away from business premises) and II.–5:202 (Timeshare contracts) and may be granted in possible future parts of Book IV. The present Article provides that the rules of this Section apply, where under these rules in the DCFR the right of withdrawal exists, but they do not indicate when the right of withdrawal exists. Hence, this Article does not extend the rights of withdrawal beyond those that are established by other provisions. The general rules on exercise and effect of withdrawal of this Section are modelled on the individual provisions on withdrawal rights in Community law, namely in the Doorstep Selling Directive 1985/577/EEC, the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC, the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC, the Timeshare Directive 1994/47/EC and the Life Assurance Directive 2002/83.

B. Mainly, but not exclusively consumer law

The provisions in this Section are drafted as rules of general contract law, applicable to all parties to contracts including businesses, although their main field of application consists of consumer contracts. The reason is that in systematic terms, the concept of the right to withdraw from a contract does not necessarily have to be restricted to the field of consumer protection. Although the right to withdrawal did emerge in this sector, its purpose may transcend the concept of consumer, as protection for one party from being too hastily bound in a situation where that party is in a structurally disadvantageous position at the time of conclusion of the contract. Correspondingly, in Art. 35(1) of the Life Assurance Directive 2002/83/EC the right of withdrawal is available irrespective of whether the entitled party is a consumer. Thus, existing EC law (and many national laws) do not totally restrict the right of withdrawal to consumer contracts, neither in its legal structure nor in all individual provisions. The (potentially) overarching nature of the rules for rights of withdrawal implies that they are more accurately categorised as general contract law than as belonging only to the specific field of consumer protection law. A right of withdrawal may be granted under any piece of legislation, if the legislator assumes that a party, whether a consumer or a business, who concludes particular types of contract, or does so under particular circumstances, deserves particular protection which is best served by the right of withdrawal.

C. Mandatory nature

Because the main purpose of the general rules on withdrawal rights is to protect the entitled party, paragraph (2) stipulates that the rules of this Chapter (Section 1 and Section 2) may not be amended to the disadvantage of the protected party by any agreement between the parties. For the same reason, the present Article does not prohibit any contractual amendments which are more favourable to the protected party. Therefore, the parties to the contract are allowed to facilitate the exercise of the withdrawal and to extend its effects by deviating from the rules of this Chapter, as long as this operates in favour of the entitled party. Parties may equally agree that a party to the contract may withdraw even where no such right is granted in these model rules.

Although the rules of this Section apply expressly only where a party has a right of withdrawal granted by these model rules, this does not exclude the application of this Section to contractually stipulated rights of withdrawal. In those cases, the rules in this Section are not mandatory in the sense of paragraph (2). Negotiated rights of withdrawal do not have to be regulated expressly in this Section, as they are not based on explicit provisions of the DCFR, but on agreement between the parties, which in turn is based upon the principle of freedom of contract.

Illustration 1
In a sales contract concluded outside of business premises within the meaning of II.–5:201 (Contracts negotiated away from business premises), the buyer and seller agree that the buyer has three months within which to exercise the right of withdrawal. This term deviates from II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period) where a fourteen day period is provided. As paragraph (2) of the present Article only prevents agreements to the disadvantage of the entitled party, the term is valid.

Illustration 2
In a sales contract concluded outside of business premises within the meaning of II.–5:201 (Contracts negotiated away from business premises), the buyer and seller agree that the buyer has only three days within which to exercise the right of withdrawal. This term is contrary to II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period). As paragraph (2) of the present Article states that the following provisions are mandatory, this term is invalid.

Illustration 3
As above, but the buyer and the seller agree that the buyer must give reasons why the right of withdrawal is exercised. Again, this agreement is not in accordance with II.–5:102 (Exercise of right to withdraw), and this term is therefore invalid.

D. Meaning and function of withdrawal

The Directives which grant withdrawal rights, and the national laws even more so, use many different terms for regulating withdrawal rights. In order to reach a coherent terminology these model rules have opted for the uniform use of the term “withdrawal”. Its meaning and the main function of withdrawal rights is described in the definition provided in the Annex , which reads as follows.

> A right to 'withdraw' from a contract or other juridical act is a right to terminate the legal relationship arising from the contract or other juridical act, without having to give any reason for so doing and without incurring any liability for non-performance of the obligations arising from that contract or juridical act. The right is exercisable only within a limited period (in these rules, normally 14 days) and is designed to give the entitled party (normally a consumer) additional time for reflection. The restitutionary and other effects of exercising the right are determined by the rules regulating it.

The idea behind such a generalisation is that the individual withdrawal rights to be found in Community law and in the national laws are based upon a common concept. They all require the presence of specific situations of contract formation where in the eyes of the law one party, usually a consumer, deserves protection. In doorstep sales or distance sales (cf. II.–5:201 (Contracts negotiated away from business premises), this need for protection arises from the way in which the contract is initiated. In distance sales, it reflects in particular the customer's inability to visually inspect the goods before buying, as well as the customer's lower inhibition threshold to buy goods. In timeshare (cf. II.–5:202 (Timeshare contracts)) and life assurance contracts, the complexity of the contract calls for protection of the consumer. In order to counteract the structural imbalance between the parties in such situations, the right of withdrawal allows the protected party to escape contractual obligations without having to give reasons.

E. Differences between withdrawal and termination and other rights to be released from a contract

The rights of withdrawal provided by these rules must be distinguished from other rights to be released from the binding effect of a contract or a binding juridical act. The primary aim of withdrawal rights is to allow the consumer time for further consideration (a so-called 'cooling-off' period) and for obtaining information. The entitled party can therefore rely on a right of withdrawal without having to show non-performance by the other party, as would be required for termination of a contractual relationship under Art. 3(2) and (5) of the Consumer Sales Directive. (which uses the word 'rescind') or under Art. 49 CISG (which uses the term 'avoidance') or under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 of these model rules. Nor is withdrawal linked to mistake, fraud or other conduct of which the law disapproves. The applicable principle is rather that withdrawal brings the contractual obligations to an end without there having to be any specific reasons, as long as the requirements for both the right and its exercise (such as time limits) have been met.

F. Overlapping remedies

There may be situations in which all the requirements for the right of withdrawal are met, but where the contract is void or voidable under Book II Chapter 7, or where the contractual relationship can be terminated for other reasons (e.g. termination for non-performance under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5). In this case, the entitled party should not be limited to remedies based on these other reasons, but should rather be entitled to exercise the right of withdrawal and benefit from the effects of withdrawal, which may be more favourable. It would counteract the protective effect of the right of withdrawal if it could be considerably compromised by the mere existence of a further defect of the contract, and even more so if this defect has been caused by the other party (cf. also II.–7:216 (Overlapping remedies) with regard to avoidance and remedies for non-performance).

Illustration 4
Two parties conclude a contract which is avoidable under II.–7:205 (Fraud) because of one party's fraudulent behaviour. The other party may nevertheless withdraw from this contract and is not confined to the remedy of avoidance under Book II, Chapter 7.

G. Provisions on withdrawal rights in other parts of these model rules

Some general provisions on withdrawal rights are located in other parts of these model rules. For instance, II.–3:103 (Duty to provide information when concluding contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage) paragraph (1) stipulates that the necessary information on the right of withdrawal must be provided within a reasonable time before the conclusion of the contract. II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (1) postpones the beginning of the withdrawal period if certain information has not been not given to a consumer, but also provides for a maximum time limit of one year for the withdrawal period.

As the rules of this Section generally regulate the exercise and the effects of all rights of withdrawal, in some cases provisions for a particular right of withdrawal deviate from the general rules. This is the case, for instance, in II.–5:202 (Timeshare contracts) paragraphs (2) and (3) with regard to the restitutionary effects of withdrawal. As usual, such particular provisions will take precedence under the general principle of lex specialis derogat legi generali (see I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (3)).

NOTES

I. Rights of withdrawal

1. Provisions on withdrawal rights are part of EC secondary legislation, namely of the consumer protection directives. Both the Doorstep Selling Directive and the Timeshare Directive contain a right of withdrawal in Art. 5. The Distance Selling Directive as well as the Distance Selling of Financial Services Directive provide for a right to withdraw in Art. 6. The Life Assurance Directive contains in Art. 35(1) a right to cancel an individual life-assurance contract. This right of withdrawal is available irrespective of whether the entitled party is a consumer. Thus, existing EC law does not totally restrict the right of withdrawal to consumer contracts. The terminology used in these Directives is somewhat incoherent, e.g. the Doorstep Selling Directive refers to a "right of cancellation" (recital 5, art. 4(1); art. 5(2)), a "right to renounce" (art. 5(1)), as well as a "right of renunciation" (art. 7). The right of withdrawal contained in the Timeshare Directive is partially called a "right to cancel" (cf. "cancellation and withdrawal" in the 2nd and 13th recital; "right to cancel or withdraw" in art. 7 and in lit. (l) of the Annex). Some Directives that confer rights on a consumer do not provide for a right to withdraw. E.g., the Package Travel Directive, the Unfair Contract Terms Directive, the Price Indications Directive, the Injunctions Directive and the Consumer Sales Directive make no reference to a right of withdrawal.

2. All Member States have implemented the Directives' provisions on rights of withdrawal. Some states have done so by including the rights of withdrawal in several Acts that cover different situations of consumer protection. This includes CYPRUS, DENMARK, HUNGARY, IRELAND, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, ROMANIA, and the UNITED KINGDOM, where separate laws on distance selling, doorstep selling, or timeshare contracts can be found. Other Member States have set up single acts that deal with consumer protection in different areas, e.g. AUSTRIA, BULGARIA, FINLAND, FRANCE, ITALY, SLOVENIA and SPAIN. A third group of states have included the rights of withdrawal into their civil codes: GERMANY, LITHUANIA and the NETHERLANDS. The SLOVAK CC contains special provisions dealing with the right of withdrawal in consumer contracts (CC § 59). This provision was implemented on the basis of Directive 94/47/EC (Svoboda). There are special legal acts – no. 108/2000 about protection of a consumer in relation to doorstep selling and mail-order selling, no. 250/2007 about protection of a consumer, no. 258/2001 in relation to consumer credits – published in the Slovak CC which prescribes specific rules and withdrawal periods in the area of consumer law.

3. The Member States have conceived the right to withdraw from a contract primarily as a consumer protection right. Thus, the entitled party has to be consumer. However, as the notion of consumer (and of trader or supplier) varies considerably in national legislation (see Notes on I.–1:105 ("Consumer" and "business")) the scope of application of the right of withdrawal differs throughout the Member States.

II. Mandatory nature

4. The Directives containing a right of withdrawal require the Member States to provide for the imperative nature of the Directives' provisions. Art. 6 of the Doorstep Selling Directive, Art. 12(1) of the Distance Selling Directive, and Art. 12(1) of the Distance Selling of Financial Services Directive state that the consumer "may not waive" the rights conferred on him or her. Art. 8 of the Timeshare Directive requires the Member States to ensure that contractual clauses whereby the consumer waives his or her rights are not binding.

5. Nearly all Member States have adopted a mandatory law provision. For doorstep selling contracts only IRELAND and FRANCE refrained from doing so. With regard to distance selling contracts both FRANCE and SLOVENIA did not implement such a provision. Some Member States, e.g. DENMARK (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 28) and SLOVAKIA (CC § 574), only state that the consumer may not waive the rights conferred on him or her. However, most of the states declare contractual terms that remove or reduce the rights of the consumer to be void, e.g. ESTONIA LOA § 51; ITALY ConsC art. 143(1); LUXEMBOURG Doorstep Selling Act art. 10(2); MALTA Doorstep Selling Act art. 11(c); NETHERLANDS Doorstep Selling Act art. 23(5); ROMANIA Doorstep Selling Act art. 17; UNITED KINGDOM Consumer Protection Reg. 1987 reg. 10(1).

6. Most of the national rules explicitly allow contractual terms that are more profitable for the consumer. E.g., the GERMAN CC § 312f sent. 1 states that agreements between the parties may not derogate "to the disadvantage of the consumer" from the provisions on the right to withdraw. The LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.357(12) requires agreements to be detrimental to the consumer's position whereas The SLOVENIAN ConsProtA § 1(11) simply states that the consumer's rights cannot be limited or excluded.

7. According to the GERMAN CC § 312f sent. 2 the provisions in favour of the consumer apply even if they are circumvented by other constructions.

II.–5:102: Exercise of right to withdraw

(1) A right to withdraw is exercised by notice to the other party. No reasons need to be given.

(2) Returning the subject matter of the contract is considered a notice of withdrawal unless the circumstances indicate otherwise.

COMMENTS

A. Exercise by notice

In stipulating that the right to withdraw is exercised by notice, the provision makes applicable I.–1:109 (Notice) paragraph (3), which lays down that notice becomes effective when it reaches the addressee. Generally, this requirement ensures that the entitled party communicates the withdrawal to the other party who thereby becomes aware of the withdrawal and, if necessary, can prepare the restitution of, e.g., goods delivered and payments made under the contract. According to I.–1:109 paragraph (2) the notice may be given by any means appropriate to the circumstances. This includes an explicit declaration of the withdrawal but also, as paragraph (2) of the present Article clarifies, by returning the subject matter of the contract (cf. B. below).

The communication must be sufficiently precise to indicate that the entitled party is withdrawing from the contract. It is also necessary that the withdrawing party and the contract from which that party is withdrawing can be clearly identified. The entitled party does not have to use the word “withdrawal”. It is sufficient if the addressee can understand from the notice that it is meant as a communication of withdrawal.

B. Returning the subject matter of the contract

"Returning" means sending back the subject matter of the contract (which is, in such a case, usually goods) to the supplier in a way which the entitled party can choose, for example, by handing them over personally, or by sending them by mail. It is also necessary that the withdrawing party can be clearly identified by the addressee. Returning the subject matter of the contract is of course not an option for services. In case it is unclear whether the subject matter of the contract is returned in order to withdraw from the contract or, for instance, to claim replacement because of a defect, paragraph (2) of the provision indicates that the communication is considered as the exercise of a right to withdraw unless the circumstances indicate otherwise.

Illustration 1
B is entitled to withdraw from a contract. She simply returns the goods by mail without giving any further information. The goods reach the other party. In this case, the withdrawal is effective.

C. No reasons need to be given

It is one of the core characteristics of a withdrawal right that no reasons have to be given in order to exercise the right effectively. In fact, a reason does not even have to exist. The function of a withdrawal right is to give the entitled party the necessary time to rethink the decision to conclude the contract. A right to withdraw does not require any non-performance of obligations by the other party or any other specific justification. That is why the entitled party does not need to give any reasons when exercising its right to withdraw.

Illustration 2
A is entitled to withdraw from a contract. He sends a letter to the other party which states that he considers himself to be no longer bound to the contract. But he does not give any reasons for the withdrawal. Nevertheless, the withdrawal is effective.

Illustration 3
F has the right of withdrawal from a contract with G. F communicates her withdrawal to G and indicates reasons for her withdrawal which in fact are unfounded. The withdrawal is effective (provided all other requirements have been met) as no reasons have to be given at all. Therefore, unfounded reasons do not affect this right.

D. No formal requirements for the exercise of withdrawal

The provision does not stipulate a formal requirement for the exercise of the right to withdraw. The reference to the provisions on notice makes clear that, according to paragraph (2) of I.–1:109 (Notice), the withdrawal may be communicated by any means appropriate to the circumstances. This is partially in contrast to the relevant Directives which allow the Member States to stipulate formal requirements for the exercise of the right to withdraw. Also the ECJ emphasises that the Member States are not precluded from adopting rules which provide that the communication of withdrawal is subject to formal requirements (for the Doorstep Selling Directive 1985/577/EEC cf. case C-423/97 – Travel Vac, para. 51). Some, but not many, Member States have made use of this option by stipulating that the entitled party can only withdraw by notice in textual or written form (or even, in a few cases, by registered letter).

Requirements as to form may indeed provide a higher degree of certainty. This can be in the interest of both parties and could even help the entitled party to prove that the right of withdrawal has been exercised in time. But this requirement may also lead to the result that the entitled party loses the right if the required form is not used. Moreover, a requirement of textual or written form would not serve as reliable proof for the entitled party. If a formal requirement was to be probative, anything short of a registered letter would not fulfil this function. A further argument against the introduction of a formal requirement is that it could be seen as inconsistent with the possibility of withdrawing by returning the subject matter of the contract. Also the entitled party might find it unlikely, and therefore might not expect, that a contract concluded without any formality (e.g. over the phone) could not be withdrawn from in the same way.

NOTES

1. The Directives do not have a specific formal requirement for withdrawal. Thus, Art. 5(1) of Directive 85/577/EC only requires the consumer to send a withdrawal notice to the trader and, furthermore, expressly allows the Member States to regulate the procedure for the exercise of the withdrawal right. The Distance Selling Directive does not contain an explicit provision allowing the Member States to regulate formal requirements for the exercise of the withdrawal right by the consumer. But as Art. 5(1) 1st indent provides that the consumer has to be informed about “the conditions and procedures for exercising the right of withdrawal", it is generally assumed that the Member States are free to regulate formal requirements. The Timeshare Directive does not stipulate any formal requirements either and only states in its Art. 5(2) that the consumer has to notify the recipient by a means that can be proven. Annex (l), however, only speaks of a cancellation sent by letter. Article 3(1)(3)(d) of Directive 2002/65/EC requires the supplier to provide "practical instructions for exercising the right of withdrawal", but does not specify how the right is to be exercised. The ECJ emphasises that the Member States are not precluded from adopting rules which provide that the communication of withdrawal is subject to formal requirements (for the Doorstep Selling Directive cf. case C-423/97 – Travel Vac, para. 51).

2. As a result of this lack of regulation the Member States have discretion to regulate formal requirements for the exercise of the withdrawal and therefore their laws vary considerably on this matter. In several Member States, the right of withdrawal can be exercised without any formal requirements. Regarding doorstep contracts, this is explicitly provided by the laws of DENMARK (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 19), ESTONIA (LOA § 49) and SWEDEN (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act s. 4(5)). Similarly, FINLAND, HUNGARY, the NETHERLANDS, MALTA and PORTUGAL do not have any formal requirements. This means that, in these countries, the consumer can withdraw by any means, including a pure oral declaration. For SPANISH law it has been held that "the withdrawal is also valid if it is exercised verbally within the period of seven days, particularly when the trader has failed to comply with his/her legal duty to provide a withdrawal form or document" (Audiencia Provincial Asturias judgment of 15 September 2003, 369/2003 Laura v Cambridge Institute 1908, S. L.). This is mirrored by recent legislation which states that no specific formal requirement has to be met, and that, "en todo caso", the withdrawal will be effective by posting a document of withdrawal or by sending back the goods received under the contract (ConsProtA art. 70).

3. In other Member States, a written notice has to be sent to the trader to withdraw from a doorstep selling contract, e.g. in BULGARIA, CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC, IRELAND, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, POLAND, ROMANIA, SLOVENIA and the UNITED KINGDOM. In LATVIA, the consumer additionally has to make a note on the withdrawal form in order to confirm receipt of the form (Cabinet Reg. 327 art. 3). Besides a written notice, SLOVAKIAN law provides for the possibility of mutually agreeing other formal requirements for exercising the right of withdrawal (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act § 8). According to AUSTRIAN law, the consumer can withdraw from the contract by giving written notice. He or she may also send the contract document to the trader with a withdrawal notice. Furthermore, a verbal withdrawal notice is possible if the trader agrees to this form of withdrawal (OGH 13 February 2002, 2 Ob 11/02k). In POLAND, the consumer is provided with a standard withdrawal form by the trader. Therefore, it can be assumed that the consumer should make use of this form, but it remains unclear whether he or she can also withdraw by other means. Under GERMAN law (CC § 355(1)), the withdrawal notice has to be sent to the trader in textual form (which also allows text on another durable medium). With regard to distance selling contracts a similar provision can be found in GREECE, where the consumer can exercise the right of withdrawal in written form or in another durable medium available and accessible to him or her (ConsProtA art. 4(10). For timeshare contracts the CYPRUS Timeshare Act art. 9(1) sent. 1 specifies that the consumer must complete and send a written notification of withdrawal which has to contain the purchaser's decision to withdraw, the date at which the notice is given and the name and address of the recipient of the notice according to the recipient named in the contract.

4. Under several laws it is possible to withdraw from a contract by returning the goods to the trader (or supplier), cf. FINLAND ConsProtA art. 6(9); GERMANY CC § 355(1); SPAIN ConsProtA art. 70. DANISH law equally does not require the consumer to send a cancellation notice, but to return the goods received before the cancellation period expires.

5. Some legal systems require the consumer to send the letter of withdrawal by recorded delivery. For timeshare contracts this applies to BELGIUM (Timeshare Act art. 9(2)), MALTA (Timeshare Act art. 8(1)), and LUXEMBOURG (Timeshare Act art. 10(2) sent. 1). Under FRENCH and ITALIAN law the notification of withdrawal from a doorstep selling contract must similarly be in writing and sent as a registered letter. GREEK law also requires recorded delivery, but Greek literature and case law accepts a withdrawal without formal requirements as well. The position is similar in PORTUGAL. Under Portuguese law the notice is always considered effective if it is sent by recorded delivery, but it is assumed that case law would accept another notice mechanism if it could be proved that notice had been given.

6. In a small number of Member States, e.g. FRANCE, ITALY and PORTUGAL, the consumer who wishes to withdraw from a timeshare contract has to send a signed registered letter with return receipt. Thus, in France, ConsC art. L. 121-64(1) states that if the consumer does not send a letter with a return receipt, he or she can use any other means that provide for the same guarantees as to the determination of the date. In Italy, it is also possible to use telegram, telex or fax to meet the period of withdrawal, if they are confirmed by a registered letter with return receipt within the following 48 hours (ConsC art. 73(5)).

7. With regard to distance selling contracts ITALIAN law requires the consumer to send the notice of cancellation in a letter sent by registered mail with advice of receipt ("lettera raccomandata con avviso di ricevimento") and it has to be signed by the person who concluded the contract or drafted the proposal. It can also be sent by telegram, telex, fax and e-mail within the period, but it must be confirmed by a letter sent by recorded delivery within the following 48 hours. The presentation of the receipt ("avviso di ricevimento"), however, is not an essential condition for proving the exercise of the right of withdrawal (ConsC art. 64(2) sent. 3).

II.–5:103: Withdrawal period

(1) A right to withdraw may be exercised at any time after the conclusion of the contract and before the end of the withdrawal period.

(2) The withdrawal period ends fourteen days after the latest of the following times;

(a) the time of conclusion of the contract;
(b) the time when the entitled party receives from the other party adequate information on the right to withdraw; or
(c) if the subject-matter of the contract is the delivery of goods, the time when the goods are received.

(3) The withdrawal period ends no later than one year after the time of conclusion of the contract.

(4) A notice of withdrawal is timely if dispatched before the end of the withdrawal period.

COMMENTS

A. Function of the withdrawal period

The main function of the withdrawal period is to determine exactly the moment until when the right to withdraw can be exercised. This is important, because the additional period of reflection which is granted to one party to the contract leads to uncertainty for the other party as to whether the contractual relationship will continue to exist and whether restitution will be required in relation to goods or services provided and payments made. Paragraph (1) therefore stipulates that a right to withdraw can only be exercised before the end of the withdrawal period. According to paragraph (4) timely dispatch suffices (cf. E. supra). When the withdrawal period ends, the right to withdraw ceases to exist. Paragraph (1) makes it clear that the right to withdraw can be exercised at any time after the conclusion of the contract (e.g. after the conclusion of the contract, but before the goods are delivered, cf. paragraph (2)(c) of the present Article).

B. Length of the withdrawal period

The normal period of withdrawal is fourteen days (paragraph (2)), calculated from the latest time set out in paragraph (2). By stipulating a fourteen day period, this rule mediates the great diversity of withdrawal periods to be found in Community law and in the Member States' laws, which vary between 7 and about 15 days (and in some specific cases even reach 30 days). Such a unification of the different withdrawal periods is desirable, because this would very much facilitate the conduct of business where withdrawal rights apply. The common idea behind the withdrawal period is to guarantee a sufficient period of time for calm consideration ('cooling off' period) and for obtaining information. The fourteen day period follows the model of the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC, which – unlike the earlier Directives which provide shorter periods – seeks full harmonisation. The model of a uniform fourteen day period has also been followed by some Member States, whereas very few Member States have gone beyond the fourteen days by providing (only slightly) longer periods.

The fourteen day period set out in paragraph (2) always applies unless a lex specialis provides for a different period because of specific needs of protection (which could be the case, for instance, for life assurance contracts, for which a possible future part in Book IV on insurance contracts could follow the model of the Life Assurance Directive 2002/83/EC, where a 30 day withdrawal period is stipulated). As the fourteen day period begins at the point in time set out in paragraph (2), the actual period during which the entitled party can withdraw can be much longer than fourteen days and amount to up to one year. Also the rules on the computation of time, which are set out in I.–1:110 (Computation of time), can lead to a prolongation of the actual time span for withdrawal, because, for instance, a time limit which would otherwise end on a Saturday, a Sunday or a national holiday will expire at the end of the next working day instead (cf. paragraph (5) of that Article).

C. Beginning and end of withdrawal period

The withdrawal period begins at the time of conclusion of the contract (paragraph (1)). Paragraph (2) sets out three events or actions and provides that the withdrawal period normally ends fourteen days after the latest of them. They are: (a) the conclusion of the contract; (b) the receipt of adequate notification that there is a right to withdraw; or (c) the receipt of the goods, if the subject-matter of the contract is the delivery of goods. As the withdrawal period is to be calculated from one of these events or actions, it has to be computed according to the rule given in paragraph (3)(b) of I.–1:110 (Computation of time).

The time when the contract is concluded has to be determined according to the rules laid down in Chapter 4 of Book II. The principle that the withdrawal period does not commence before the conclusion of the contract is expressly laid down in several provisions of Community law and in many Member States' laws. The reason for this rule is that the entitled party must not lose the right of withdrawal even before the contractual obligations have been conclusively fixed. If the entitled party, for instance, makes a binding offer, it is not known whether the offer will be accepted by the other party. If the fourteen days withdrawal period began when the offer was made, the offeror would have to withdraw the offer within the fourteen days just by way of precaution; and also in cases where it has not yet been accepted and perhaps will never be accepted. This would be a very formalistic result, which may surprise the offeror because it forces him or her to make an unnecessary declaration. The rules should avoid such provisions which lead to inefficiency. For this reason, paragraph (2)(a) should also apply to cases where the validity of a contract, although it is concluded, depends on further action of the parties, as is the case, for instance, in a sale on approval. In such a case the withdrawal period should not begin before the contract is finally valid (cf. BGH (German Supreme Court), judgment of 1 March 2004, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift-Rechtsprechungsreport (NJW-RR) 2004, 1058 et seq.).

> Illustration 1
> Even before conclusion of a sales contract, the seller gives the buyer adequate notice of the buyer's right of withdrawal in case the contract is concluded. The withdrawal period starts to run on the date of the conclusion of the contract and not on the date of the notice of the right of withdrawal.

The requirements for adequate information on the right to withdraw (paragraph (2)(b)) are laid down in II.–5:104 (Adequate information on the right to withdraw). It is solid ground in Community law and the laws of the Member States that the withdrawal period is at least substantially extended if the entitled party does not receive adequate information on the right to withdraw. Paragraph (2)(c) of the present Article reaches this result by stipulating that the normal withdrawal period of fourteen days does not begin before the receipt of such adequate notification. The provision has a double function. On the one hand, it protects the entitled party, who has not been adequately informed of the right to withdraw, by granting a much longer period of one year, giving this party the chance to learn otherwise about the right to withdraw during the extended period. On the other hand, the rule is a sanction against the party who did not inform the other party adequately of the right of withdrawal. The sanction results in a substantial extension of the withdrawal period, which is, from the perspective of this party, a period of pending uncertainty whether the contractual relationship will continue to exist and whether there will have to be restitution.

> Illustration 2
> A party is entitled to withdraw from a contract. The goods are delivered, but the other party fails to indicate, in the notification of the right to withdraw, the name of the person to whom the notice of withdrawal should be addressed. The entitled party can withdraw even after the expiry of fourteen days, and loses the right of withdrawal after one year has passed.

For contracts where the subject matter is the delivery of goods, paragraph (2)(c) postpones the date from which the end of the withdrawal period is calculated to the time when the goods are received. This rule follows the model of Art. 6(1) Sentence 3 of the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC, but broadens it to all cases where one party has a right to withdraw. It is not sufficient that the other party has just fulfilled the obligation to dispatch the goods, as the time of receipt may be considerably later than the time of dispatch. The rationale of this rule follows from one of the core functions of the right to withdraw, which is to give the entitled party additional time for reflection. Where goods are delivered under the contract, the rule ensures that the entitled party can inspect the goods during the full duration of the fourteen day period in order to make an informed decision whether to stick to the contract or to withdraw. This time for inspection is typically needed in many situations where withdrawal rights exist, because, as in the case of distance selling or of an order made at the doorstep, there was usually no opportunity to see the goods at the time of the placing of the order.

There may be other provisions in these rules which make the beginning of the withdrawal period dependent on other events. This is the case in II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (1) which also prevents the period from beginning if certain pre-contractual information duties other than the duty to inform on the right to withdraw have been infringed. Moreover, II.–5:101 (Scope and mandatory nature) does not prevent agreements on the beginning of the withdrawal period which are in favour of the entitled party and which therefore take precedence over the rules in paragraph (2).

D. ‘Long stop’ maximum time limit

For the case where the ordinary fourteen day withdrawal period under paragraph (2) does not begin at all, paragraph (3) stipulates a ‘long stop’ maximum period of one year. This period begins at the time of the conclusion of the contract and is to be computed according to the rules laid down in I.–1:110 (Computation of time). Also in the (unlikely) case of a pending offer made by a party entitled to withdraw from the contract, the ‘long stop’ withdrawal period will never begin, as there is no contract concluded. Hence, the entitled party has an eternal right to revoke the offer in this case. (See also II.–4:202 (Revocation of offer) paragraph (4)). In the other cases of paragraph (2) (i.e. the lack of adequate notification or the – unlikely – situation of a delivery of goods later than one year after the conclusion of the contract), the right to withdraw ceases to exist after one year.

Illustration 3
The other party delivers the goods, but the anticipated conclusion of the contract has not yet materialised (e.g. because applicable form requirements have not yet been complied with). The entitled party can withdraw at any time. As the withdrawal period does not start to run before the conclusion of the contract, the maximum time limit of one year does not apply to this situation.

The uniform one year 'long stop' period is not based on communalities of Community law and the laws of the Member States. For most legal orders it is an innovation which follows the model of Finnish law. The reason for this suggested innovation is the very incoherent regulation of this question in Community law, and the even greater incoherence in the Member States' laws. Whereas the Doorstep Selling Directive 1985/577/EEC, the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC and the Life Assurance Directive 2002/83/EC do not provide for a maximum time limit, the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC and the Timeshare Directive 1994/47/EC do. Both of these Directives establish a maximum time limit of three months (plus the ordinary withdrawal period). With regard to the Doorstep Selling Directive the ECJ held that the Member States may not provide for a maximum time limit if this is not intended by the relevant Directive (cf. ECJ 31 December 2001 C-481/99 – Heininger). In theory, this leads to an eternal right of withdrawal, which is only limited by general prescription rules (if they apply) or by the application of the principle of good faith and fair dealing. Such extreme differences do not seem to be justified by the peculiarities of the individual Directives. Therefore a uniform maximum period seemed desirable in order to simplify the law and to make it more coherent. An eternal period, although rather consumer friendly, did not seem advantageous, because such a right would be alien to contract law principles and would lead to a lot of uncertainty. The one year maximum period is a compromise that balances the existing rules. It simultaneously extends the 'three months plus periods' (which are perhaps too short) of several Directives but it considerably shortens the eternal period. In case a legislator wants to stipulate a shorter or longer maximum period for particular rights of withdrawal, this can be provided in specific legislation.

Paragraph (3) of this Article overlaps with II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (1) in so far as a 'long stop' maximum period of one year is provided for in both. The two provisions are nevertheless not identical, because their scope of application is different. II.–3:109 paragraph (1) also prevents the commencement of the ordinary fourteen day withdrawal period for cases where the information to be given under II.–3:103 (Duty to provide information when concluding contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage), which also includes information other than the notification on the right to withdraw, has not been provided. Hence, the 'long stop' maximum period regulated in II.–3:109 paragraph (1) is necessary to avoid an eternal period in these cases.

E. Dispatch rule

Paragraph (4) lays down that the entitled party merely has to dispatch the notice of withdrawal within the period in order to comply with the time limit. It is unnecessary for the notice to reach the addressee within the period. This rule is in line with similar provisions in several of the Directives regulating individual withdrawal rights (e.g. Art. 5(1) Sentence 2 Doorstep Selling Directive 1985/577/EEC; Art. 5 No. 2 Sentence 2 Timeshare Directive 1994/47/EG). The purpose of this provision is to protect the entitled party by giving this party the benefit of the full withdrawal period for reflection, rather than having to bear the risk and the burden of proof associated with a delay in the transmission of the notice.

Illustration 4
A party is entitled to withdraw from a contract. The entitled party writes a letter to the other party which contains notice of withdrawal. The entitled party places this letter in the mail box on the last day of the withdrawal period. The withdrawal notice reaches the other party three days later. As the notice was dispatched within the withdrawal period, and actually reached the other party, withdrawal is effective.

F. Risk of loss of the notice of withdrawal

Paragraph (4) also distributes the risk between the parties in case a notice of withdrawal, which has been dispatched before the end of the period, does not reach the addressee. According to its wording, paragraph (4) seems to be only a 'timeliness rule', not a 'lost letter' or 'mailbox rule'. However, the question is put too simply. In case of a lost letter (or other form of communication), which has been dispatched in time, the present Article answers three questions, namely (i) whether the withdrawal is effective despite the loss of the letter, (ii) whether it has been exercised in time, if a second letter is dispatched after the end of the period, and (iii) at which point in time the withdrawal becomes effective. Question (i) is not a question: If the addressee never receives notice of withdrawal, there is, of course, no withdrawal. Question (ii) is the core issue, namely how to solve the case, when the entitled party writes a second letter which is dispatched after the end of the period, informing the other party of the lost notice of withdrawal and manages to prove that he or she has dispatched the first notice of withdrawal in time. As paragraph (4) of this Article seeks to disburden the entitled party from the risk of delayed transmission of the notice, it would be odd to distinguish between a delay caused by an unusually slow transmission and a delay caused by the fact that the letter got lost and a second letter had to be sent. Therefore paragraph (4) should lead to the result that withdrawal is effective if the second letter (or other form of communication) actually reaches the other party, even if this second letter – other than the first – has been dispatched after the end of the withdrawal period (for the same result cf. OLG Dresden (German Court of Appeal), 20 October 1999, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift-Rechtsprechungsreport (NJW-RR) 2000, 354).

With regard to question (iii), when the withdrawal becomes effective, I.–1:109 (Notice) paragraph (3) applies. According to that Article a notice becomes effective "when it reaches the addressee". Thus, in the 'lost letter case' the withdrawal will not be effective before the second letter reaches the addressee. The opposite rule, according to which notice (even if it has been lost) becomes effective at the time at which it would have arrived in normal circumstances, can be found in III.–3:106 (Notices relating to non-performance). But that Article concerns cases of non-performance, i.e. cases where the addressee has failed to perform an obligation under the contract. As explained above under A., it is a core characteristic of withdrawal rights, that there is typically no legal reason e.g., non-performance of obligations under the contract. Moreover, the rule on the effects of withdrawal (II.–5:105) reaches more convincing results if the withdrawal is not effective before the notice actually reaches the addressee. Therefore, III.–3:106 is a rule for a specific case. There is no reason to deviate from the general rule in I.–1:109 paragraph (3). The withdrawal becomes effective when the notice reaches the addressee.

Illustration 5
A party is entitled to withdraw from a contract. The notice of withdrawal is dispatched within the withdrawal period, but the letter gets lost in the post and therefore never reaches the other party. As the risk of loss of the notice of withdrawal is borne by the entitled party, the withdrawal is not effective. But if the entitled party writes a second letter in order to replace the first, the withdrawal becomes effective when this letter reaches the addressee, even if it is dispatched after the end of the withdrawal period.

NOTES

I. Length of the withdrawal period

1. At EC level there are significant divergences in relation to the length of withdrawal periods, and as to the beginning and calculation of the periods. The shortest period can be found in Art. 5(1) of Directive 85/577/EEC which sets out a period of "not less that seven days". Under Art. 6(1) of Directive 97/7/EC the consumer has the right to withdraw from the contract within seven "working days" which may amount to a significantly longer period than seven calendar days. Cf., Art. 2(2) of Regulation 1182/71 determining the rules applicable to periods, dates and time limits which expressly defines "working days" as all days other than public holidays, Sundays and Saturdays. Directive 94/47/EC states in Art. 5(1) a period of withdrawal of ten calendar days after the signature of the contract by both parties or the signature of a binding preliminary contract, and further specifies that "if the 10th day is a public holiday, the period shall be extended to the first working day thereafter." Directive 2002/65/EC, which unlike the earlier Directives seeks full harmonisation, sets out a period of fourteen calendar days (art. 6(1)). Directive 2002/83/EC contains in Art. 35(1) a right to cancel an individual life-assurance contract within a "period of between 14 and 30 days".
2. The great diversity found within the Directives is mirrored by national legislation implementing the withdrawal periods. The time limit for exercising the withdrawal right ranges from seven calendar days up to fifteen working days.
3. A series of Member States chose precisely the periods that were contained in the Directives. The seven working days period of the Distance Selling Directive has been adopted by AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, BULGARIA, IRELAND, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, the NETHERLANDS, SLOVAKIA, SPAIN and the UNITED KINGDOM. However, it cannot be assessed, whether "working day" has the same meaning in all these countries as defined in the Regulation mentioned above, and in particular, whether the term excludes Saturdays. But as the term must be interpreted in accordance with the Directive, there should be no infringement, unless a national court comes to a different result. The ten calendar days period set out by the Timeshare Directive has been adopted by DENMARK, ESTONIA, FINLAND, FRANCE, GREECE, IRELAND, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, POLAND, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA, SPAIN and SWEDEN. The seven days period of the Doorstep Selling Directive has been implemented as a seven working days period by the legislators of BELGIUM, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA and the UNITED KINGDOM. The period is seven calendar days in BULGARIA, the CZECH REPUBLIC, FRANCE, IRELAND and SPAIN.
4. Many Member States have used the minimum clauses to prolong the withdrawal periods. The seven days provided for by the Doorstep Selling Directive have been extended to eight calendar days in the NETHERLANDS and to eight working days in HUNGARY. In AUSTRIA, the consumer has one week to withdraw from the contract. According to POLISH law, the period is ten calendar days, whereas according to GREEK and ITALIAN law, the consumer can withdraw from a contract within ten working days. The longest withdrawal period (15 calendar days) can be found in MALTESE and SLOVENIAN law. Whereas the Timeshare Directive provides for a period of ten calendar days, the period lasts for ten working days in BULGARIA, ITALY and PORTUGAL, 14 calendar days in AUSTRIA, LATVIA and the UNITED KINGDOM, two weeks (in some cases one month) in GERMANY, 15 calendar days in CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC, HUNGARY and SLOVENIA and even 15 working days in BELGIUM. The seven calendar days period contained in the Distance Selling Directive has been prolonged by the legislators of HUNGARY (eight working days), GREECE, ITALY and ROMANIA (ten working days). The period is ten (calendar) days in POLAND, 14 (calendar) days in CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, ESTONIA, FINLAND, LATVIA, PORTUGAL and SWEDEN, two weeks in GERMANY and even 15 (calendar) days in MALTA and SLOVENIA.

5. Concerning the seven working days period of the Distance Selling Directive the FRENCH implementation seems to be problematic because the consumer has a period of only seven days ("jours francs") to withdraw from the contract. "Jour franc" is a one-day-period (0h to 24h). The day of the event, in this case the receipt of the goods in the case of delivery of goods or the day of the conclusion of the contract in the case of provision of services, is not included for the computation of the period. Furthermore, for the computation of the withdrawal period it is irrelevant whether the seven "jours francs" include "jours ouvrables" (working days) or "jours feriés" (Sundays and public holidays). This understanding of the notion "jours francs" is supported by the text of ConsC art. L. 121-20(4). According to this provision a Sunday or a public holiday is not included in the withdrawal period unless the period expires on such a day. Therefore, the seven "jours francs" period in France is a breach of EC law.

II. Beginning of the withdrawal period

6. The Directives contain provisions that determine the beginning of the withdrawal period. A common feature in all the Directives is that the ordinary (short) period, which is applicable when the business fulfils its information obligations, does not begin before the receipt of the information, cf. Art. 5 of Directive 85/577/EEC, Art. 5(1) 2nd indent of Directive 94/47/EC, and both Art. 6(1) sent. 3, 2nd indent of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC and of Directive 2002/65/EC. Similarly, Art. 35(1) of Directive 2002/83/EC provides that the period begins when the policy holder was informed that the contract had been concluded and of the time within which to cancel the contract. A second feature of the Directives is the requirement for the conclusion of the contract. Thus, Art. 6(1) 2nd indent of Directive 97/7/EC and Art. 6(1) sent. 3, 2nd indent of Directive 2002/65/EC require the contract to have been concluded. According to Art. 5(1) 1st indent of Directive 94/47/EC the period begins when both parties sign the contract or a binding preliminary contract. However, the Doorstep Selling Directive seems to provide that in certain cases the period may begin (and even end) before a contract has been concluded (art. 4 lit. (c): "when the offer is made by the consumer"). Regarding this second feature the Directives are incoherent. A further requirement for the beginning of the period is the receipt of goods to be delivered under the contract. This requirement allows the consumer to examine the goods before deciding whether to withdraw. At present, only Art. 6(1) sent. 3, 1st indent of Directive 97/7/EC stipulates the start of the withdrawal period in the case of delivery of goods as the day of receipt of goods by the consumer.

7. Most Member States' laws state that the withdrawal period does not begin before the trader has fulfilled the information obligations. If the entitled party does not receive adequate information of his or her right to withdraw, the withdrawal period is extended. With regard to doorstep selling contracts, in AUSTRIA, BULGARIA, GERMANY and LITHUANIA, the withdrawal period starts upon receipt of the notice regarding the right of withdrawal. If, under Bulgarian law, the information on the right of withdrawal is not provided, the consumer can exercise the right of withdrawal within three months from the conclusion of the contract (ConsProtA art. 46(2)). In ROMANIA, the parties can contractually prolong the period of withdrawal if necessary (Doorstep Selling Act art. 9(2)). Under ITALIAN law, the withdrawal period starts with the signing of an order form containing the information on the right of withdrawal (ConsC art. 47(3)). If no order form is used, the withdrawal period starts upon receipt of the information itself. In FINLAND, the withdrawal period starts when the door-to-door selling document (set form) is supplied (ConsProtA art. 6). In the NETHERLANDS, the trader is obliged to register the contract at the Kamer van Koophandel (Chamber of Commerce). Therefore, the withdrawal period starts on the day of registration (cf. Doorstep Selling Act art. 25(2)).

8. The Member States have transposed the Directives' provisions that the period starts on the day on which the contract is concluded. Some laws have provisions varying from the Directives. In GREECE, the period begins when the consumer receives the documentation informing him or her that the contract is concluded (ConsProtA art. 4(10) sent. 1). In BELGIUM (ConsProtA art. 80(1) sent. 4, 2nd indent) and CYPRUS (Distance Selling Act art. 7(1)(b)), the period begins on the day following the day of the conclusion of the contract if the confirmation has already been provided. CZECH law refers to the "receipt of performance" for the beginning of the withdrawal period in the case of provision of services (CC art. 53(7)).

9. With regard to doorstep contracts, DANISH law distinguishes between contracts under which the trader supplies goods and contracts under which services are provided. In the case of contracts for services, the withdrawal period begins upon conclusion of the contract. If the trader supplies goods, the withdrawal period starts upon their delivery (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 10(2)). The same distinction is made in HUNGARY. However, where the goods are delivered after the contract is concluded, it is from this delivery that the withdrawal period starts (Doorstep Selling Act art. 3(1)). Similar provisions can be found in ROMANIA, SLOVENIA and SWEDEN.

10. Some Member States have included a provision for timeshare contracts under which the withdrawal period begins when both parties sign the contract or a binding preliminary contract. Notably, this includes BULGARIA, CYPRUS, FINLAND, IRELAND, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, ROMANIA and SPAIN. Alternatively in Bulgarian law, the period starts with the end of the precontract (ConsProtA art. 154(1)). Many Member States do not refer to the signing of the contract but to the conclusion of the contract. They are: the CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, ITALY, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, PORTUGAL, SLOVAKIA, SLOVENIA and the UNITED KINGDOM. In BELGIUM (Timeshare Act art. 9(1) no. 1) and SWEDEN (Timeshare Act art. 12), the period begins the day after the signature of the contract by both parties. In FRENCH law, the ten day period starts when the purchaser sends the accepted offer to the professional. In addition, France attempts to improve the protection of the consumer by requiring that the offer should be maintained for at least seven days (ConsC art. L. 121-64(2)). However, this provision just regulates the period during which the vendor is bound by the offer (Cf. Calais-Auloy, Steinmetz, Droit de la Consommantion, no. 483). The consumer is not prevented from accepting the offer before the seven day period expires. In AUSTRIA, GERMANY, GREECE, ESTONIA, HUNGARY, the NETHERLANDS and POLAND, the withdrawal period starts running from the day when the contract document is delivered to the purchaser. In Germany, the period does not start running before the vendor additionally has informed the purchaser about the right of withdrawal and provided some further information (BGB-InfoV § 2). These provisions improve the position of the consumer and are therefore in accordance with the Directive. Only some member states have seen the necessity to include an explicit provision on the signature of a binding preliminary contract in their national law, e.g. BULGARIA, CYPRUS, GREECE, HUNGARY, IRELAND, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, ROMANIA and SLOVENIA.

11. Most Member States have transposed the day of receipt of goods by the consumer as the beginning of the withdrawal period for distance selling contracts, e.g. AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, BULGARIA, the CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, ESTONIA, FRANCE, GERMANY, GREECE, HUNGARY, IRELAND, ITALY, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, POLAND, PORTUGAL, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA, SLOVENIA, SPAIN and SWEDEN. Under BELGIAN (ConsProtA art. 80(1)) and CYPRIOT (Distance Selling Act art. 7(1)(a)) law, the period begins on the day following the day of receipt of goods. In the UNITED KINGDOM, the period begins with the day on which the contract is concluded but does not end until seven days after receipt of the goods, starting on the day after receipt (Consumer Protection Reg. 2000 reg. 11). In FINLAND, the period begins after the receipt of confirmation or, if the goods are delivered after confirmation, with the delivery of the goods (ConsProtA art. 6(15)).

12. Some legal systems have applied the rule that the day of receipt of goods is the beginning of the withdrawal period also to doorstep contracts. In FINLAND, the withdrawal period normally starts when the door-to-door selling document (set form) is supplied. However, there is a special provision concerning the sale of tangible goods according to which the withdrawal period begins with the delivery of the goods if this delivery is later than the receipt of the document (ConsProtA art. 6(9)). Under GREEK law, the withdrawal period starts with the conclusion of the contract or, if goods are handed over at a later date, with the delivery of the goods to the consumer (ConsProtA art. 3(4)). An equivalent rule can be found in PORTUGAL (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 18(1)).

III. "Long stop" rule

13. A "long stop" period is not part of all Directives containing a right of withdrawal. Whereas the Doorstep Selling Directive, the Distance Selling of Financial Services Directive and the Life Assurance Directive do not provide for a maximum time limit, the Distance Selling Directive and the Timeshare Directive do. Both of these Directives establish a maximum time limit of three months (plus the ordinary withdrawal period). According to Art. 5(1) of Directive 94/47/EC, if by the end of the three-month period the purchaser has not exercised the right to cancel and the contract does not include the information referred to in points (a), (b), (c), (d) (1), (d) (2), (h), (i), (k), (l) and (m) of the Annex, the consumer has the right to withdraw from the contract within the regular withdrawal period (in the Directive: ten days) from the day after the end of that three-month period. Similarly, Art. 6(1) sent. 4 of Directive 97/7/EC. With regard to the Doorstep Selling Directive the ECJ decision in Heininger has clarified that in doorstep selling cases the period does not begin before the consumer has been informed about the right of withdrawal. This may lead to an eternal withdrawal right.

14 Regarding the long stop rule contained in the Timeshare Directive the transposition in the Member States varies considerably, partially also because the length of the regular withdrawal period is different in the Member States. For instance, in LITHUANIA, the period is four months counting from the conclusion of the contract. In BELGIUM, the period of withdrawal is one year, counting from the day following the day on which the contract was signed, if the missing information has not been provided within three months (Timeshare Act art. 9(1) no. 3). In GERMANY, the length of the period depends on the type of information that is lacking. If the information about the right of withdrawal is lacking or incomplete, there is no period for the withdrawal at all. In this case, the consumer has in effect an eternal right of withdrawal. If other necessary information is lacking, the extended withdrawal period is six months (CC § 355(3), (1)). Also in AUSTRIA, the withdrawal period does not begin before the purchaser is informed of the right of withdrawal (Timeshare Act art. 6(2)).

IV. Dispatch rules

15. Dispatch rules can be found in several Directives, notably in Art. 5(1) sent. 2 of Directive 85/577/EEC and Art. 5(2) sent. 2 of Directive 94/47/EC. Strikingly, the Distance Selling Directive is (together with the Life Assurance Directive) the only Directive which does not contain a dispatch rule. Even the later Distance Selling of Financial Services Directive comprises such a rule in Art. 6(6) sent. 2. The wording of the existing dispatch rules is non-uniform and also unclear with regard to the effect of a timely dispatch. They allow different interpretations in the case of a letter which was dispatched in time, but got lost and therefore never reached the addressee. If the rule only regulates the calculation of the period, and leaves the consumer to bear the risk of a successful transmission of the declaration, the contract is not withdrawn, if the letter gets lost. The rule that the declaration is deemed to be received (cf. Art. 5(2) sent. 2 of Directive 94/47/EC) could, however, also be construed as being a legal fiction.

16. In the vast majority of Member States the rule is that a withdrawal is within the deadline if the consumer dispatches the notification before the deadline expires. Most of the national dispatching rules are substantially equivalent to the Directives' provisions. This applies, inter alia, to AUSTRIA (ConsProtA § 3(4)), BELGIUM (ConsProtA arts. 88 and 89(2)), GERMANY (CC § 355(1) sent. 2), DENMARK, ESTONIA, GREECE, LITHUANIA (CC art. 1.122(2)), POLAND, PORTUGAL, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act § 7(2)), SLOVENIA, SPAIN (Timeshare Act art. 10(3) sent. 2) and SWEDEN.

17. Some of the Member States may achieve the result required by the Directives with the application of their general rules on the computation of periods. ITALY has not laid down a dispatch rule, but the purchaser has to send a registered letter with advice of delivery and may therefore prove that the notice was sent within the withdrawal period. In the DUTCH regulations on doorstep selling – and running counter to the general rule – the message is assumed to have reached the addressee when it is first delivered (Doorstep Selling Act art. 25(4)).

18. In IRELAND, there is a form of postal rule stipulating that the cancellation has effect from the date of delivery of the cancellation form by hand or the date on which it is posted (European Communities Reg. 1989 reg. 5(1)). In CYPRUS (Doorstep Selling Act art. 8) and the UNITED KINGDOM (Consumer Protection Reg. 1987 reg. 4(7)), the transposition law contains a postal rule stating that a withdrawal notice sent by post is deemed to have been served at the time of posting, whether it has been received or not. A similar provision exists in FINLAND: if the withdrawal notice is sent appropriately, it can be invoked even if it is delayed, altered or lost (ConsProtA art.

12(1)(c)). The FRENCH provisions do not contain a dispatching rule, but as the withdrawal notice must be sent by recorded delivery (ConsC art. L. 121-25: "par lettre recommandée avec accusé de réception"), the letter can be regarded as being served at the time of posting.

19. Only few Member States have no specific legislative transposition. In BULGARIAN and CZECH law, there is no postal or dispatching rule. In MALTA there is no dispatching rule either. The withdrawal can be exercised without any formal requirements. It is only necessary that the intention of the consumer is substantially conveyed to the trader, cf. Doorstep Contracts Act art. 8(2). On the one hand, the term 'delivery' may be interpreted to mean that the notice only needs to be dispatched and not received. On the other hand, the requirement that the intention be conveyed to the consumer seems to imply that the door-to-door salesman must have actually received the notice.

20. Member States differ on whether the dispatch rule purely ensures the timeliness of the withdrawal (as in GERMANY) or whether it even makes a withdrawal valid should the declaration never reach the supplier (e.g. because the letter got lost after being dispatched), as in CYPRUS, FINLAND and the UNITED KINGDOM.

II.–5:104: Adequate information on the right to withdraw

Adequate information on the right to withdraw requires that the right is appropriately brought to the entitled party's attention, and that the information provides, in textual form on a durable medium and in clear and comprehensible language, information about how the right may be exercised, the withdrawal period, and the name and address of the person to whom the withdrawal is to be communicated.

COMMENTS

A. Duty to inform of the right to withdraw

The Article, which regulates when information on the right to withdraw is adequate, presupposes the existence of a requirement or duty to inform the entitled party of the right to withdraw. A requirement of information follows indirectly from II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period) paragraph (2)(b). A duty to inform is explicitly laid down in II.–3:103 (Duty to provide information when concluding contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage). II.–3:103 also clarifies that the information on the right to withdraw must be provided within a reasonable time before the conclusion of the contract, if that is appropriate in the circumstances. The explicit reference to the present Article at the end of II.–3:103 paragraph (1) further clarifies that the information on the right to withdraw must be in textual form on a durable medium and must contain all the items listed in the present Article, if that is appropriate in the circumstances. The requirements for the adequacy of the information have been extracted from the corresponding provisions of the Doorstep Selling Directive 1985/577/EEC, the Timeshare Directive 1994/47/EC, the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC, the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC and the Life Assurance Directive 2002/83/EC.

It should be noted that the present Article is not applicable to the duties imposed on businesses by II.–3:102 (Specific duties for businesses marketing to consumers) paragraphs (1) and (2). The information on the right to withdraw to be given to the entitled party under that article can be limited to the fact that a right of withdrawal exists. The business does not need to provide all the information items listed in the present Article. It also does not need to provide the information in textual form on a durable medium. As paragraph (1) of that article states, it is sufficient that the information is given, "so far as is practicable having regard to all the circumstances and the limitations of the communication medium employed". It also follows from II.–3:102 paragraph (2) that the information on the right to withdraw has to be given within the commercial communication (which could be, e.g., a TV spot); thus by the means the communication medium allows, but not necessarily in textual form on a durable medium.

B. Two step information can be necessary

If it is not appropriate in the circumstances to provide complete information or to provide it in textual form on a durable medium before the conclusion of the contract (e.g. TV spots and subsequent conclusion of contracts over the phone), the business must inform the entitled party twice about the right to withdraw. Firstly, within a reasonable time before the conclusion of the contract, the entitled party must generally be informed of the right to withdraw in the appropriate way having regard to the communication channel used under II.–3:103 (Duty to provide information when concluding contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage). Secondly, according to II.–3:106 (Clarity and form of information) paragraph (3), the information must in any case be confirmed in textual form on a durable medium at the time of the conclusion of the contract. If the first information was only general and did not contain all the information items necessary under the present Article, it must also be completed, at the latest, at this time in order to avoid the consequence of the extended withdrawal period under II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period) paragraph (2)(b). Such a 'two step' duty to inform the entitled party of his or her right to withdraw is in line with the Directives that confer rights of withdrawal upon the consumer. It is in particular modelled on Art. 4 and Art. 5 of the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC.

C. Sanctions for the infringement of the duty to provide adequate information

If the other party does not give adequate notification as laid down in the present Article, the withdrawal period of one year according to II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period) paragraph (3) applies. Moreover, the withdrawing party is not liable for any diminution in value caused by normal use of goods received under the contract (cf. II.–5:105 (Effects of withdrawal) paragraph (4)) and can even be entitled to damages as provided for in II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (2).

> Illustration 1
> In the autumn A orders an electric heater by mail. He has not been adequately informed of his right to withdraw. A few days after the receipt of the heater he notices that it consumes much more energy than another model with the same thermal output available on the market for the same price. As A does not know about his right to withdraw, he uses the heater despite the high energy consumption during the winter. In spring, A learns by chance about his right to withdraw and withdraws. A can claim damages for the loss, which are the higher energy costs, under II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (2). This claim may in particular reduce or even outweigh the counterclaim of the business for compensation for the use of the heater under II.–5:105 (Effects of withdrawal) paragraph (2) and III.–3:513 (Use and improvements).

In addition to such inter-party consequences, an infringement of the duty to provide adequate notification of the right to withdraw can lead to preventative proceedings or fines under the applicable unfair commercial practices law.

D. Appropriately brought to the entitled party's attention

The duty to bring the information on the right to withdraw appropriately to the entitled party's attention requires the business to make some reasonable effort to emphasise or highlight in particular the information on the right to withdraw. The information on the withdrawal right must not be hidden in unspecified other information. It is not sufficient to state the right of withdrawal in standard terms in such a way that it will most likely not be read by the entitled party. Appropriate means are, for example, bold letters or a frame on an order form close to the space for the client's signature. Also a highlighted paragraph in the standard terms may suffice.

Illustration 2
A party has the right of withdrawal. The complete information on the right is provided within one of many standard clauses. This can not be regarded as adequate as the information is not appropriately brought to the entitled party's attention.

E. Textual form on a durable medium

The notion of textual form on a durable medium is defined in I.–1:106 ("In writing" and similar expressions) paragraphs (2) and (3). Examples are printed paper or an e-mail. An oral communication – e. g. in the situation of a doorstep sale – or a leaflet which is only shown and not handed over to the entitled party is not sufficient. Information just on a HTML page on the internet which can be downloaded or stored by the computer user is also not sufficient because the information is just provided in textual form, but not on a durable medium. The possibility that the addressee produces a durable medium, e.g. by storing the information on the hard drive or by printing it out, is not the 'provision' of a durable medium.

F. Clear and comprehensible language

The requirement of using clear and comprehensible language in the information is also lifted from the relevant Directives. The information must be drafted in a way that the "average consumer who is reasonably well-informed and reasonably observant and circumspect" in the sense of the ECJ case law can understand it (cf. ECJ, C-210/96, Gut Springenheide). In particular, the information must not be ambiguous as this could deter the entitled party from exercising the right.

G. Necessary content of the information

The Article limits the required information to three elements, namely (i) how the withdrawal right may be exercised, (ii) the withdrawal period, and (iii) the name and address of the person to whom the withdrawal is to be communicated. Compared with some more detailed requirements in individual Directives (cf. e.g. Art. 3(3) Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC) and the even more specific requirements in the laws of some Member States, this Article only provides for a common core of the compulsory information items which can be found in EC and national legislation on the duty to inform of withdrawal rights.

There are two reasons for the approach adopted. The first is that the Article is part of a general regulation of withdrawal rights. It therefore does not exclude more specific provisions with regard to individual withdrawal rights (e.g. in the field of financial services such as consumer credit, information on the consequences of withdrawal might be needed). The second reason is that a more modern approach seeks to limit the number of necessary information items to core information ('information chunks') in order to avoid information overkill on the side of the addressee. This approach is in line with at least several of the Directives and laws of the Member States. Hence, the purpose of this Article is to ensure that the entitled party has a basic knowledge of the right to withdraw and the most important information necessary in order to withdraw. The purpose of the information is not to create a comprehensive knowledge basis for reflection on the question whether to exercise the right of withdrawal or not. In particular, the following information does not need to be provided: the calendar dates when the withdrawal period begins and ends, the method of its calculation (including the influence of public holidays and Saturdays), the fact that no reasons need to be given, the effects of withdrawal, also information with regard to restitution. It would be very difficult for the business to provide this information correctly. At the same time the information would become rather long and complicated to understand.

H. How the right may be exercised

The information on how the right may be exercised must make clear, ideally with the help of examples, that there are no formal requirements, thus, that the entitled party can withdraw over the phone, by email, fax, letter, or by returning the goods received under the contract. It need not be expressly stated that no reasons have to be given.

I. Withdrawal period

This information must include the length of the withdrawal period (i.e. fourteen days), the event(s) which trigger(s) the start of the period and that the deadline is met if the notice of withdrawal has been dispatched before the end of the period. Adequate information on the right to withdraw does not include that the entitled party must also be informed of the dates on which the withdrawal period starts and ends. Nevertheless, if any date that is given turns out to be earlier than the correct end date of the period, the information is not adequate. The incident that triggers the start of the withdrawal period is not sufficiently indicated if the information on the right of withdrawal does not make clear whether the withdrawal period begins at the time of conclusion of the contract or at the time when the entitled party receives adequate notification of the right to withdraw from the other party or at the time when the goods are received.

Illustration 3

A party to a sales contract concluded at a distance merely gives the entitled party the information that she can withdraw within fourteen days after both the contract has been concluded and adequate notification of the right to withdraw has been received. The information that the withdrawal period does not begin before the goods have been received is missing. The information is therefore not adequate.

J. Address of the person to whom the withdrawal is to be communicated

"Address" means the postal or geographical address under which the other party will actually receive an express notice of withdrawal or the goods. If the other party provides details of their company's name, a PO Box number and the municipality in which the company is based, but fails to give more precise geographical indicators (e.g. the street name and house number), the requirements of this Article are not fulfilled. A PO Box number cannot be regarded as an address. Street name and house number are necessary parts of the address as this ensures that returned goods, in particular if they are bulky, actually reach the other party. Moreover, under some national mail systems it is also easier to get proof of the notice of withdrawal if it is sent to a geographical address (e.g. registered letter with return receipt). The requirement to indicate a geographical address is in line with the provisions in some of the Directives (cf. Art. 3(1)(1)(a) of the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC)

NOTES

I. Formal requirements and language

1. All Directives that give the consumer a right to withdraw require the trader or supplier to provide adequate information on the right of withdrawal (Art. 4 of Directive 85/577/EEC; Art. 4(1) and Annex (l) of Directive 94/47/EC; Art. 4(1)(f) of Directive 97/7/EC; Art. 3(1)(3)(a) of Directive 2002/65/EC; Art. 36(1) and Annex III(A) of Directive 2002/83/EC). The Directives require the information on the right to withdraw to be in writing, meaning practically on paper (Art. 4 sent. 1 of Directive 85/577/EEC; Art. 4 1st indent of Directive 94/47/EC; Art. 5(1) of Directive 97/7/EC; Art. 5(1) of Directive 2002/65/EC). In cases where electronic communication has been established between business and consumer, the information can also be provided on a "durable medium" (Art. 5(1) of Directive 97/7/EC; Art. 5(1) of Directive 2002/65/EC).

2. Not all Directives explicitly require the information to be given in clear and comprehensible language. This requirement is not part of the Doorstep Selling Directive. The Timeshare Directive provides in Art. 3(1) that "brief and accurate information" of the right to withdraw is to be provided to any person requesting information. There is no requirement for clarity and comprehensiveness with regard to the information of the withdrawal right included in the written contract. Annex III of Directive 2002/83/EC states that information must be provided in "a clear and accurate manner". The most detailed requirement of clarity can be found in Art. 4(2) of Directive 97/7/EC and Art. 3(2) of Directive 2002/65/EC which both state that the information "shall be provided in a clear and comprehensible manner […] with due regard, in particular, to the principles of good faith in commercial transactions, and the principles governing the protection of those who are unable, pursuant to the legislation of the Member States, to give their consent, such as minors". On the concept of "clear and comprehensible information" see notes on II.–3:106 (Clarity and form of information). Only the Timeshare Directive provides for a specific language requirement: Art. 4 2nd indent obliges the vendor to provide the information "in the language or one of the languages of the Member State in which the purchaser is resident or […] of which he is national".

3. The Member States mostly transposed the requirement to provide written notice established by the Directives. With regard to doorstep selling, in BELGIUM, GREECE, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, ROMANIA and SPAIN, the whole contract has to be in writing. In other Member States, only the information on the right of withdrawal has to be in writing, e.g. AUSTRIA, BULGARIA, the CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, FINLAND, FRANCE, HUNGARY, IRELAND, LUXEMBOURG, LITHUANIA, POLAND, SLOVENIA SLOVAKIA and SWEDEN.

4. Several Member States require the trader to provide a separate document containing information on the right to withdraw. For example, FINNISH law has a general duty to provide a doorstep selling document in accordance with the model approved by the Ministry of Trade and Industry (ConsProtA art. 6(8)). Similarly to the Finnish regulation, FRENCH legislation requires, alongside a version of the contract, delivery of a detachable withdrawal document containing the information on the right of cancellation (ConsC art. R. 121-4). In CYPRUS, the trader must inform the consumer about the right of withdrawal in a separate written notice and attach a standard cancellation form, which the consumer can use to exercise the right of withdrawal (Doorstep Selling Act art. 7(1)). In LATVIA, upon entering into a contract, the seller or service provider must issue the consumer with a written withdrawal form identifying the specific contract involved. The consumer, in order to acknowledge the receipt of the withdrawal form, must make a note on a copy of that form (Cabinet Reg. 327 art. 5). Furthermore, in IRELAND and the UNITED KINGDOM, two written forms of information documents exist: a "cancellation notice" comprising the data set by the Directive and a "cancellation form", which is prescribed in an annex to the doorstep regulations (cf. United Kingdom Consumer Protection Reg. 1987 reg. 4(1)). ITALIAN regulations state that the notice of the right of withdrawal must be enclosed with the order form to be signed separately from any other contractual provisions and in print of the same size or larger than in the other parts of the form. A copy of the order form, containing details of the date and place of signature, has to be sent to the consumer. Under POLISH law, the consumer has to be provided with a standard withdrawal form even before the contract is concluded (ConsProtA art. 3(1)).

5. A number of legal systems require that the right of cancellation has to be stipulated in big letters. Cf. ROMANIAN law (Doorstep Selling Act art. 8(2)) which furthermore requires the information to be placed near the consumer's signature of the contract. Also the UNITED KINGDOM'S Timeshare Order 2003 s. 3(5) requires the information to be "immediately adjacent to the place where the offeree signs the agreement". The FRENCH ConsC art. R. 121-5 requires the information to be given "en caractères très lisibles". MALTESE law requires a clause accompanying the contract to be "set in clear, bold and highlighted letters", in which the right of withdrawal is communicated in writing (Doorstep Selling Act art. 7(h)). Furthermore, in BELGIUM, the information about the right of withdrawal and the text of provisions stating the right of withdrawal must be in bold letters and in a separate frame on the first page of the contract (Timeshare Act art. 7(1)). Also in LUXEMBOURG, this information has to be provided in bold (Timeshare Act art. 7(1), (3)).

II. Content of information

6. The common core of the Directives is the requirement to inform the consumer about the existence of a withdrawal right and the name and address of the person against whom that right may be exercised, see Art. 4 of Directive 85/577/EEC and Annex (l) of Directive 94/47/EC. Furthermore, Art. 5(1) of Directive 97/7/EC and Art. 3(1)(3)(a) of Directive 2002/65/EC state that the consumer has to be informed about "the conditions for exercising" the right to withdraw. Only Directive 2002/65/EC explicitly provides that information about the "duration" of the right of withdrawal must be given, but since the other Directives require information on the existence and/or the conditions of exercising the right to withdraw, it could also be argued that the length of the period must generally be indicated. Under some Directives more detailed information is required. Thus, Annex (l) of Directive 94/47/EC states that the consumer has to be provided with information on "the arrangements under which [letters of withdrawal] may be sent" and given a "precise indication of the nature and amount of the costs" which the purchaser will be required to defray" if he or she exercises the right to withdraw. Similarly, Directive 2002/65/EC requires further information on the amount which the consumer may be required to pay as a consequence of exercising the right to withdraw.

7. Most of the Member States have implemented provisions that require information on the right to withdraw to be given to the consumer. A number of states have additionally laid down precise provisions on how to inform the purchaser, e.g. by standard forms or precise wording. Such countries are, e.g., BELGIUM, CYPRUS, FRANCE, GERMANY, GREECE, LATVIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA and the UNITED KINGDOM. According to the Maltese Timeshare Act art. 4(4), a clause with the following wording must be included in the contract: "You as the buyer have the right to withdraw or cancel such a contract in accordance with 'The Protection of Buyers in Contracts for Time Sharing of Immovable Property Regulations, 2000'. These Regulations provide that a buyer may withdraw, without giving any reason, from such a contract within ten days from when the parties sign the contract." If the clause is missing, the buyer may claim that the contract is void. Under the law of the United Kingdom, timeshare contracts must include the following statement: "You have the right to cancel this agreement. You have until … in which to do so. (This date must be at least fourteen days after the day you signed the agreement)" (Timeshare Order 2003 s. 3(5)).

8. GERMAN law also prescribes that the vendor must formally inform the consumer about the right of withdrawal. For this purpose, the vendor can use an information form of withdrawal designed by the legislator (cf. Regulation on duties to supply information in civil law). This information does not necessarily have to be in written form, but must be sufficiently provided in textual form (email, fax, CD-ROM). Some authors assume that this is an infringement of EC law because Art. 4 of Directive 94/47/EC states that the contract with the information referred to in the Annex including the information on the right of withdrawal needs to be in writing (Kelp, Timesharing-Verträge, 63; Mankowski, VuR 2001, 364).

9. Other Member States oblige the supplier to provide more detailed information than prescribed by the Directives. For instance, in ROMANIA, the supplier's phone/fax and e-mail address also have to be provided (Distance Selling Act art. 4(1)(c)). Additionally, in ESTONIA, the confirmation has to provide information about the conditions of the supplier's liability (LOA § 55(2), (4)).

II.–5:105: Effects of withdrawal

(1) Withdrawal terminates the contractual relationship and the obligations of both parties under the contract.

(2) The restitutionary effects of such termination are governed by the rules in Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5, Sub-section 4 (Restitution) as modified by this Article, unless the contract provides otherwise in favour of the withdrawing party.

(3) Where the withdrawing party has made a payment under the contract, the business has an obligation to return the payment without undue delay, and in any case not later than thirty days after the withdrawal becomes effective.

(4) The withdrawing party is not liable to pay:

(a) for any diminution in the value of anything received under the contract caused by inspection and testing;

(b) for any destruction or loss of, or damage to, anything received under the contract, provided the withdrawing party used reasonable care to prevent such destruction, loss or damage.

(5) The withdrawing party is liable for any diminution in value caused by normal use, unless that party had not received adequate notice of the right of withdrawal.

(6) Except as provided in this Article, the withdrawing party does not incur any liability through the exercise of the right of withdrawal.

(7) If a consumer exercises a right to withdraw from a contract after a business has made use of a contractual right to supply something of equivalent quality and price in case what was ordered is unavailable, the business must bear the cost of returning what the consumer has received under the contract.

COMMENTS

A. Content and context

The Article seeks to provide for a complete set of rules for the effects of withdrawal on the contractual obligations and on the unwinding of the contractual relationship. Paragraph (1) terminates the obligations of both parties for the future, but says nothing on the restitutionary effects. Paragraph (2) refers to the rules on restitution after the termination of a contractual relationship under Book III Chapter 5 Section 5, i.e. the rules on termination for non-performance. Paragraphs (3), (4) and (5) contain some modifications of the restitutionary effects in favour of the withdrawing party. Paragraph (6) clarifies that the withdrawal as such does not lead to any liability of the withdrawing party for non-performance of the contractual obligations. Finally, paragraph (7) makes it clear that in the special case where a consumer exercises a right to withdraw from a contract after a business has made use of a contractual right to supply something of equivalent quality and price in case what was ordered is unavailable, the business must bear the cost of returning what the consumer has received under the contract

B. Termination of the obligations under the contract

Paragraph (1) provides that the withdrawal has the effect of terminating the contractual relationship and the obligations of both parties under the contract for the future. The withdrawal releases both parties from any obligations to perform. Any claim for performance of the contractual obligations becomes unjustified when the withdrawal becomes effective.

The precise moment when the withdrawal becomes effective is the moment when the notice of withdrawal reaches the addressee in the sense of I.–1:109 (Notice) paragraph (3).

If the entitled party has already revoked an offer to conclude a contract before the contract has been concluded, the offer ceases to have effect. Where there would have been a right to withdraw from the contract had it been concluded, there will be a right to revoke the offer even if it would otherwise be irrevocable. See II.–4:202 (Revocation of offer) paragraph (4).

The present Article presupposes that the parties to a contract from which one of them can withdraw have a right to claim performance of the contractual obligations during the withdrawal period. Such a contract is valid and enforceable despite the existence of the right of withdrawal. This seems to be in line with the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC (cf. Art. 6(1) Sentence 3 of this Directive). However, the validity and enforceability of a contract during the withdrawal period may differ from the solution chosen in some Member States where the contract may be considered as not being concluded as long as the withdrawal period is pending (cf. e.g. art. 89 of the Belgian Unfair Trade Practices Act with regard to doorstep selling).

C. Restitutionary effects of withdrawal

In general, the provisions on the restitution of benefits after the termination of a contractual relationship under III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) to III.–3:515 (Liabilities arising after time when return due) apply. Thus, both parties must return any benefit received in the course of the performance of the obligations under the contract. Each party must do so at its own expense. The contract can provide otherwise in favour of the party entitled to withdraw from the contract. Payments received must be repaid. Other benefits, if transferable, must be returned by transferring them, unless such a transfer would cause unreasonable expense. In that case, or if the benefit is not transferable at all, the recipient is obliged to pay the value of the benefit to the other party.

These model rules do not contain an express rule on the question of which party has to bear the expenses for the initial sending of the benefit (e.g. goods ordered at a distance) and for their return. This question is answered rather differently within the Member States, whereas the Directives applicable do not contain specific rules. Paragraph (2) of the present Article leads to the result that, in case of withdrawal, it is in any case the sender who will finally have to bear the expenses for shipment, e.g. a distance seller must bear the costs for shipping the goods to the client, but the client must bear the costs for sending them back (unless otherwise agreed or unless returning the goods would be unreasonable). This follows, for the seller, from the fact that the seller will have to return all payments made by the client in performing the contractual obligations under III.–3:510 (Restitution of benefits received by performance) paragraph (2). The client is obliged to return the goods by transferring them under paragraph (3) of that Article. This obligation to transfer includes the costs of transport.

D. Return of payments without undue delay

Paragraph (3) seeks to solve a problem which often surrounds returning goods and reimbursement. The provision that any payment made by the withdrawing party must be returned without undue delay, and in any case not later than thirty days after the withdrawal becomes effective, corresponds to Art. 6(2) of the Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC. The main function is to secure repayment at the latest within thirty days and to exclude a right to withhold performance against the withdrawing party under III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation) after the expiry of the thirty day period. The reason is that the party who has received a notice of withdrawal (i.e. usually a business, e.g. a distance seller of IT hardware) and who had also already received the price, might block the restitution by exercising a right to withhold performance. As the withdrawing party (i.e. usually a consumer) also has a right to withhold performance (i.e. returning the goods) in such a case, the contractual relationship might not be unwound for a long time, e.g. until the end of litigation. This could factually secure the economic profit of the other party (i.e. the seller) despite the withdrawal, as the withdrawing party might have to pay, e.g., for the reduction in value of the benefit received (e.g. a laptop) and for the value of any use made of it under III.–3:512 (Payment of value of benefit) to III.–3:514 (Liabilities arising after time when return due). The present Article avoids the possible deadlock by creating the obligation to return any payments received from the withdrawing party in advance. The reason is that, in the long run, the other party (i.e. the seller), if it has received the price, might have a greater interest in blocking the unwinding of the contract, Moreover, the party entitled to withdraw should not be discouraged from exercising that right by the factual need to return the goods received in advance of any return of payment. It should be noted that this applies only in so far the goods received still exist and are to be actually returned by transfer. If the recipient of the goods (e.g. because they do not exist any more) is obliged to pay their value, the rules on set-off (Book III Chapter 6 Section 1) apply. The same is true for any claim to pay for reduction in value or use of the goods where the goods still exist.

The thirty day period starts running when the withdrawal becomes effective, i.e. when the notice of withdrawal reaches the addressee (and not from the moment when it is dispatched). The period is to be calculated according to the rules in I.–1:110 (Computation of time).

E. Liability for loss, damage or diminution in value

Paragraphs (4) and (5) modify the general rules on restitution with regard to the specific function of withdrawal rights. These provisions are based on the principle which is implied in some provisions (e.g. in Art. 6(1) and (2) Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC) and in the jurisprudence of the ECJ – particularly case C-350/03 – Schulte and C-229/04 – Crailsheimer, that the entitled party must not be deterred from exercising the right of withdrawal by its factual consequences. On the other hand, abuse of the right of withdrawal must be avoided and the other party must not be made to bear excessive risks. Paragraphs (4) and (5) seek to balance these aspects.

Paragraph (4)(a) deals with the delicate problem of diminished value caused by inspection and testing of the goods. As the right of withdrawal is meant to enable the entitled party to make an informed choice, there should be no disincentive to inspecting and testing the goods. However, inspection and testing must be reasonable and appropriate. Any use that goes beyond the possibilities a consumer would have had in a shop buying the same goods should not fall under this rule.

> Illustration 1
> A woman buys clothes by mail order, unpacks the clothes and tries them on. She decides they do not flatter her and sends them back. She does not have to compensate for the damage caused by unpacking and trying on the clothes.

Paragraph (4)(b) excludes liability for loss of or damage to anything received under the contract, provided the entitled party used reasonable care to prevent such loss or damage. What can be considered to be reasonable care may vary depending on the circumstances. One of the circumstances that must be taken into account is whether the entitled party has been informed of the existence of a right of withdrawal. The standard of care which is considered to be reasonable will be lower if the entitled party was not aware of the possibility of returning the goods. If the consumer has not been informed of his or her right of withdrawal, the standard of care is the diligentia quam in suis, i.e. the level of care which the consumer exercises in his or her own affairs. However, if the consumer was informed of the right of withdrawal, no such privilege applies.

> Illustration 2
> A party buys a camera on the internet. The camera is delivered, but on the same day the buyer's house is struck by lightning and burns down. The camera is destroyed. The buyer can still withdraw from the contract and the seller will have to return the price although the buyer will be unable to return the camera.

Paragraph (5) deals with liability for the diminished value of the goods due to their normal use. If the withdrawing party was aware of the right to withdraw from the outset, it was in that party's power to use the goods during the withdrawal period only in a way that no diminution of value other than by inspection and testing occurred. So even a diminution of value by normal use (e.g. walking with shoes) must be compensated. But, if the entitled party has not been informed of the existence of a right of withdrawal, the balance of interests leads to a different solution: the entitled party will then not be held liable for diminished value due to normal use.

> Illustration 3
> A party buys a flat screen and uses it for a number of days, thus exceeding what is necessary to test it. The buyer then withdraws from the contract. He will have to return the screen at his own expense, and is liable to compensate for the loss of value, or damage caused to the screen caused by its use (cf. OGH (Austrian Supreme Court), 27 September 2005, 1 Ob 110/05s). No such compensation is due if the buyer has not been informed of his right of withdrawal.

In any event, paragraph (6) makes it clear that the withdrawing party does not incur any other liability because of the exercise of the right of withdrawal. No damages or penalty can be imposed on the withdrawing party for the sole reason that he or she has exercised a right of withdrawal. The ECJ held in Case C-423/97 – Travel Vac that a contract must not provide that the consumer must pay a specified lump sum for damage caused to the business on the sole ground that the consumer has exercised a right of withdrawal.

NOTES

I. Leeway for Member States according to the Directives

1. The Directives contain rather incomplete provisions on the effects of withdrawal. The Doorstep Selling Directive, for example, only states that, by exercising the right of withdrawal, the consumer is released from any obligations under the cancelled undertaking (art. 5(2)). A similar provision can be found in Art. 35(1)(2) of Directive

2002/83/EC. Likewise, Art. 6(1) sent. 1 of Directive 97/7/EC provides that the consumer may withdraw "without penalty". Thus, the Member States have been given leeway to shape and specify their provisions. Art. 7 of Directive 85/577/EEC states explicitly that the effects of withdrawal are governed by national laws, particularly regarding the reimbursement of payments for goods or services provided and the return of goods received. Similarly, Art. 35(1)(3) of Directive 2002/83/EC states that the legal effects are determined by the national law applicable to the contract. Art. 10 of Directive 94/47/EC leaves it to the Member States to enact provisions on the effect of non-compliance with the Directive.

2. For the Doorstep Selling Directive the ECJ stated in its judgments Schulte and Crailsheimer Volksbank, that it is up to the Member States to regulate the effects of withdrawal and that the transposition laws have to consider the aims of the Directive, essentially its effet utile (ECJ, C-350/03 – Schulte, no. 69).

II. Validity and termination of the contract

3. EC secondary law does not clarify whether the contract remains valid during the withdrawal period. Apart from the Timeshare Directive, which contains a prohibition of advance payments (art. 6), the Acquis does not regulate the rights and obligations of the parties to the contract for which the period for withdrawal is pending. Per argumentum e contrario, one could therefore conclude that in all other cases the Directives allow the business to claim payments during the period. This interpretation seems to be supported by the Distance Selling Directive (cf. Art. 6(1) sent. 3). By exercising the right to withdraw the consumer is released from the obligations under the contract (cf. Art. 5(2) of Directive 85/577/EEC). Thus, it can be argued that withdrawal terminates the contractual relationship.

4. Under most national laws, the contract is valid and enforceable despite the existence of the right of withdrawal. Thus, the parties to a contract from which one of them can withdraw have a right to claim performance of the contractual obligations during the withdrawal period. The validity and enforceability of a contract during the withdrawal period differs from the solution chosen in some Member States where the contract may be considered as not being concluded as long as the withdrawal period is pending. Notably, this includes BELGIUM where doorstep selling contracts are not regarded as having been concluded so long as the withdrawal period has not expired (ConsProtA art. 89). In FRANCE, no payments may be made, no goods delivered, nor services provided before the seven day withdrawal period has expired (ConsC art. L. 121-26). In GREECE, the trader may not receive any payments as long as the period of withdrawal has not expired.

5. All Member States provide that withdrawal releases the consumer from his or her obligations under the contract, e.g. BULGARIA ConsProtA art. 47(2); CYPRUS Doorstep Selling Act art. 8(5); ESTONIAN LOA art. 188(2); ITALY ConsC art. 66(1); LITHUANIA ConsProtA art. 15(4) and CC art. 6.357(9); SLOVENIA LOA § 111(1). According to the UNITED KINGDOM'S Consumer Protection Reg. 1987 reg. 4(6) the cancelled contract is "treated as if it had never been entered into by the consumer". Under GERMAN law the consumer is "no longer obliged by his declaration of intention to enter into the contract" (CC § 355(1) sent. 1). In IRELAND, the contract is rendered void on cancellation (European Communities Reg. 1989 reg. 5(3)), so that any sum paid by the consumer to the trader is subject to provisions governing unjustified enrichment. In the CZECH REPUBLIC and SLOVAKIA, the contract is void from the beginning (CC § 48(2)). Under POLISH law the contract is equally void, and the consumer is relieved of all obligations (CC art. 2(3)).

BULGARIAN law only states vaguely that the consumer will be released from any obligations under the contract.

III. Restitution

6. While the Doorstep Selling Directive expressly leaves the rules on the unravelling of a withdrawn contract to the Member States, the Timeshare Directive regulates some details on the costs of legal formalities (cf. art. 5(3) and 5(4); see notes on II.–5:202 (Timeshare contracts)). By contrast, the Distance Selling Directive already contains some basic general rules on reimbursements. According to its Art. 6(2) the supplier is obliged to reimburse sums paid by the consumer. The reimbursement must be carried out as soon as possible and in any case within 30 days. The consumer can be required to pay only the "direct cost of returning the goods". Art. 7(4) and (5) of Directive 2002/65/EC require both supplier and consumer to return any sums they have received from the other party "without any undue delay and not later than within 30 calendar days".

7. The obligation under the Distance Selling Directive to reimburse, free of charge, the sums already paid by the consumer has been transposed in all Member States. With regard to the deadline of 30 days at the latest to reimburse the sums, some Member States have adopted even stricter rules, e.g. CYPRUS, where the supplier has to reimburse the sum immediately (Distance Selling Act art. 11(1)), or LITHUANIA (ConsProtA art. 18(6)), SLOVAKIA (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act § 12(4)(b)), and SLOVENIA (ConsProtA art. 43d) where sums have to be reimbursed within 15 days. GERMANY has indirectly transposed Art. 6(2) of the Directive. The obligation to reimburse the sums paid has to be fulfilled within 30 days according to CC § 286(3) in conjunction with § 357(1) sent. 2 and 3. If the trader is late in reimbursing the sums already paid, the SLOVENIAN and SPANISH legislators have adopted special sanctions to enforce the Directive's provisions. Spain has established the right of the consumer to claim for double the sum if not paid within the specified time (ConsProtA art. 76). Slovenian law obliges the trader to pay, in addition to the legal interest on arrears, an additional ten percent of the total value for every 30 days of delay in reimbursing (ConsProtA art. 43d(2)).

8. With regard to the consumer's reciprocal obligation to return the goods received, some Member States have specified a time limit for the return. For instance, ITALIAN law obliges the consumer to return the goods within 10 days, if they have already been delivered (ConsC art. 67(1)); SLOVENIAN law stipulates a period 15 of days (ConsProtA art. 43d(1) and (2)) whereas according to the LATVIAN ConsProtA art. 12(5) the consumer has to return the goods within seven days from the sending of the withdrawal notice. In PORTUGAL, after having exercised the right of withdrawal, the consumer must keep the goods, so that he or she can return them to the supplier or person for this purpose appointed, in a good condition (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 8(2)). The consumer is obliged to store the products received by the supplier, to maintain their quality and ensure their safety during the withdrawal period in BULGARIA (ConsProtA art. 55(7)). Furthermore, the consumer is not obliged to pay a fine or damages. The supplier is obliged to return money paid by the consumer within 30 days. For doorstep selling contracts, DANISH law obliges the consumer to return the goods to the trader before the cancellation period expires in order to benefit from the right of withdrawal. In order to fulfil this requirement, it is sufficient that the consumer has delivered the goods to a courier who transports them back to the trader (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 19(2)).

9. The rule that only the costs of returning the goods can be charged to the consumer (Art. 6(2) of Directive 97/7/EC) has been implemented with some variations by most Member States. Under some legislations the trader is allowed to charge the costs to the consumer. For instance, in AUSTRIA (ConsProtA § 5g(2)) and ITALY (ConsC art. 67(3)), the consumer may be obliged to pay the cost of returning goods if this has been agreed by the parties. The BELGIAN legislator has limited this possibility, as the consumer may not be charged for the direct cost of returning the products when (1) the product or service did not match the offer, or (2) the seller did not fulfil information duties (ConsProtA art. 81(3). The POLISH provision is unclear. However, ConsProtA art. 12(3) and (4), referring to cases where alternative goods or services were provided, stipulate that in such cases the cost of returning the goods ought to be borne by the trader. One could, therefore, assume that in other cases the cost is to be borne by the consumer. In FINLAND, the supplier even has to compensate the consumer for the costs of returning the goods or other performances if goods and performances can be returned normally by post (ConsProtA art. 6(17)). However, in LITHUANIA, the legislator seems not to have transposed the limitation that the only charge that may be made to the consumer is the direct cost of returning the goods. Therefore, theoretically, the consumer may be charged with additional costs, too. Under GERMAN law the consumer must pay for any benefits he or she has gained as well as, in some cases, benefits not gained through his or her own failings (CC §§ 357(1) sent. 1, 346(1), 347). German commentators are divided on the extent to which these arrangements contravene the Directive. The fact that Art. 6(1) sent. 2 and Art. 6(2) sent. 2 of Directive 97/7/EC stipulate that the consumer should only be liable for the direct costs of returning the goods suggests that this does indeed constitute non-compliance. For a fuller assessment, see MünchKomm (-Wendehorst), BGB[5], § 312d nos. 10-11.

IV. Liability

10. The Directives do not contain provisions on the liability of the consumer for diminution in value, destruction or loss of anything received under the contract. The ECJ has provided some guidance on the issue of liability by stating that the entitled party must not be deterred form exercising the right of withdrawal by its factual consequence (cf. C-350/03 – Schulte; C-229/04 – Crailsheimer). It has been argued that this principle is also implied in some provisions of EC secondary legislation (cf. Art. 6(1) and (2) of Directive 97/7/EC).

11. Some Member States have stipulated express rules on additional costs, in particular if the consumer has made use of the goods or cannot return the acquired goods in their original state. For instance, in GERMANY, according to CC §§ 357(1) sent. 1, (3), 346(2), (3), the consumer is liable to cover the costs of any depreciation in value of the goods received. This obligation is restricted by imposing a duty on the seller to inform the consumer about this possible consequence at the latest by the time of the conclusion of the contract (CC § 357(3)). An exception is made for diminution of value caused by inspection and testing of the goods. The consumer is also not liable for loss and damage provided he or she showed the care customarily exercised in his or her own affairs ("diejenige Sorgfalt […], die er in eigenen Angelegenheiten anzuwenden pflegt") to prevent such loss or damage. Under AUSTRIAN law the consumer has to pay compensation for the use of the goods, mainly in the case of depreciation in value (ConsProtA § 5g(1)(2)). Austrian case law has held that, where the purchase item (a monitor) had been used for many hours and far in excess of the time one might reasonably take for a product trial, leading to wear and tear and a reduction in the item's value, the consumer had to pay compensation for the use of the monitor (OGH judgment of 27 September 2005, 1 Ob 110/05s). In HUNGARY, the consumer has to compensate the seller if he or she caused damage due to the improper use of the goods (Distance Selling Act art. 4(5)). The CYPRIOT (Distance Selling Act art. 7(6)) and ITALIAN (ConsC art. 67(2)) legislators saddle the consumer with the obligation to take good care of the goods while in his or her possession. According to the LATVIAN ConsProtA art. 12(6) a consumer is bound to maintain the quality, and ensure the safety, of the goods during the withdrawal period. In GREECE, the same rule applies during the period of withdrawal: the consumer is obliged to take any necessary measures to keep the product in good repair.

12. In some Member States the issue of diminution of value is dealt with in a different way. Under LITHUANIAN law, the consumer may exercise the right to withdraw from doorstep selling contracts only if the goods received from the trader have not been damaged or their appearance has not been substantially altered. Damage that was necessary in order to examine the received thing is not treated as material and does not preclude the right to withdraw (CC art. 6.357(7)). This provision might inhibit the consumer in exercising the right of withdrawal. The HUNGARIAN Doorstep Selling Act art. 4(6) and (7) states that, after withdrawal, the parties have to return any goods received or other contractual agreements performed. The consumer has to compensate for any depreciation in value only where he or she has defaulted on the contract. If the consumer is not able to return any goods received in full or if services have already been performed in full, it is not possible to withdraw from the contract (CC § 320(3)). In contrast to these rather restrictive provisions, the consumer is entitled to keep the goods received in CYPRUS and SWEDEN even if he or she has exercised the right of withdrawal. This is subject to the trader's not requesting the goods within a period of 21 days (Cyprus) and three months (Sweden). In Cyprus, the consumer can treat the goods as an unconditional gift after another period of 21 days has expired (Doorstep Selling Act art. 11(7)). The consumer is entitled to keep the goods and deal with them as he or she likes if the trader has not requested their return within a total of 42 days from the day the right of withdrawal is exercised. Under SPANISH law, the consumer does not have to compensate for any depreciation in value if the goods have only been used in accordance with the terms of the contract (ConsProtA art. 74(2)).

V. Further national notes

13. ESTONIAN LOA § 188(2) corresponds to paragraph (1) of the present Article. Similarly to paragraph (2), LOA § 194(1) as a special provision on the consumer's right to withdraw refers to general provisions on the termination of contractual relationships. The restitutionary effect of such termination is covered by LOA §§ 189-191. The requirement stated in paragraph (2) sent. 2 can be found in LOA § 49(4) for doorstep contracts and in LOA § 56(3) for distance contracts. In other cases, withdrawal must be performed by the parties simultaneously and the provisions on withholding performance in case of reciprocal contracts (LOA § 111) apply mutatis mutandis (LOA § 189(1)). Interest must be paid on money refunded as of the moment of receipt of the money (LOA § 189(1) sent. 3). The general liability standard prescribed in paragraph (3) and (4) is regulated in LOA § 189(4)-(5) and § 190(1) 3), i.e. the withdrawing party is liable for deterioration (except where it is the result of the regular use) of the thing if the party has not exercised at least such care as the party would exercise in the party's own affairs or, in case a party who, under the circumstances, should have reasonably foreseen the possibility of withdrawal from the contract has not ensured that it is possible to return that which was received in the case of withdrawal from the contract. If a claim is excluded under these provisions, the other party may have a claim based on unjustified enrichment (LOA § 190(2)). LOA §

194(5) as a specific provision for withdrawal from consumer contracts prescribes that in case the consumer has not been notified of the right of withdrawal, the consumer is liable only for damage caused to the thing intentionally or through gross negligence. However, as according to LOA § 189(1) in addition to claiming the return of the subject matter of the contract, a party may claim delivery of the fruits and other gain received, the diminution in the value caused by normal use may be indirectly recoverable regardless of the liability standard described above (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kõve), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 194, no. 10). The mandatory and exclusive nature of the provisions of LOA § 194 is prescribed in LOA § 194(3) and (7).

14. According to § 48 of the SLOVAK CC withdrawal terminates the contract from its conclusion (effects “ex tunc”). The opposite is the case under the Ccom. The contract is terminated from the moment of effectiveness of the withdrawal (effects “ex nunc”). In a case of withdrawal the contractual parties are obliged to return any benefits received under the contract (legal act no. 108/2000 prescribes the seller`s obligation to return money received under the consumer contract in a 15 day period). The provisions on unjustified enrichment are relevant (CC §§ 451- 459). Also liability for damages (CC §§ 420–420a) is considered to be one of the possible effects in the case of the right of withdrawal (if one of the contractual parties cause a damage to property which creates an object of the contract).

15. The BULGARIAN law contains provisions only on the “free” right of withdrawal and has no provisions similar to paragraphs (2)–(4) and (6) of this Article. Such rules can be however derived from the general provision on unjustified enrichment. There is no respective court practice on that matter at the moment.

II.–5:106: Linked contracts

(1) If a consumer exercises a right of withdrawal from a contract for the supply of goods, other assets or services by a business, the effects of withdrawal extend to any linked contract.

(2) Where a contract is partially or exclusively financed by a credit contract, they form linked contracts, in particular:

(a) if the business supplying goods, other assets or services finances the consumer's performance;
(b) if a third party which finances the consumer's performance uses the services of the business for preparing or concluding the credit contract;
(c) if the credit contract refers to specific goods, assets or services to be financed with this credit, and if this link between both contracts was suggested by the supplier of the goods, other assets or services, or by the supplier of credit; or
(d) if there is a similar economic link.

(3) The provisions of II.–5:105 (Effects of withdrawal) apply accordingly to the linked contract.

(4) Paragraph (1) does not apply to credit contracts financing the contracts mentioned in paragraph (2)(f) of the following Article.

COMMENTS

A. Extension of the withdrawal right to linked contract

The contract from which the consumer withdraws often does not stand alone. A credit contract may have been concluded to finance the price for goods or services. Specific provisions are then needed to determine the effect of withdrawal from one contract on linked transactions. The effect on linked contracts determines to a large extent the effectiveness of a right of withdrawal. Therefore, the present Article extends the effects of the withdrawal from a contract to any linked contract.

The Article is modelled on Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC art. 6(4). Similar rules regarding linked contracts are provided for in Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC art.6(7), Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC art. 7, Proposal for a Revision of the Timeshare Directive (COM (2007) 303) art. 7 and arts. 3(1) and 14 of the Second Revised Proposal for a Consumer Credit Directive (COM (2005) 483). In contrast, the Doorstep Selling Directive 85/577/EEC has no explicit provision on linked contracts.

The general rule on the fate of linked contracts avoids the uncertainty that presently governs the matter. Cases C-350/03 – Schulte and C-299/04 – Crailsheimer have illustrated that, in the absence of explicit provisions in a Directive, the general concept of effectiveness of Community law, in principle, cannot be relied on for determining the fate of linked contracts, as this remains a question of national law. In these cases, the effect which the withdrawal from a secured credit contract concluded in a doorstep selling situation has on the contract for the sale of immovable property was at stake. The ECJ held in Schulte that 'although the Directive does not preclude national law from providing, where the two contracts form a single economic unit, that the cancellation of the secured credit contract has an effect on the validity of the contract for sale of the immovable property, it does not require such an effect in a case such as that described by the referring court'. The ECJ nevertheless did impose some limits on the discretion of the national legislator to determine the effects of the exercise of the right of withdrawal in case the necessary information with regard to the right of withdrawal had not been provided.

Paragraph (1) sets out the general principle. Paragraph (2) gives further guidance for the interpretation and application of the concept of "linked contracts" to linked credit contracts. Paragraph (3) makes it clear that the effects of withdrawal on the linked contract are the same as for the main contract. In order to avoid abuse for the purpose of speculation, paragraph (4) provides for an exception regarding contracts for goods or services whose price depends on fluctuations in the financial market as defined in II.–5:201 (Contracts negotiated away from business premises) paragraph (2)(f).

Withdrawal from the main contract automatically entails withdrawal from the linked contract. No separate notice of withdrawal is needed. It is a different question whether in cases where the supplier under the main contract is not the same person as the supplier under the linked contract, one may want to consider imposing an obligation on the supplier under the main contract to inform without delay the supplier under the linked contract of the notice of withdrawal. The present Article which only deals with the relation between the supplier(s) and the consumer, does not provide an answer to this question.

Illustration 1
Consumer A is contacted on her doorstep by a salesman of business B. She concludes a contract for the installation of a burglary alarm by business B as well as a separate five year contract for the maintenance of this system with business C, the latter being represented by business B. She withdraws from the contract for the installation of the alarm by sending a registered letter to business B. As the maintenance contract is a linked contract in the sense of paragraph (1) of the present Article, the consumer will automatically no longer be bound by the maintenance contract.

B. The concept of "linked contracts"

For two contracts to be considered as "linked contracts" under paragraph (1) it is necessary that the connection between the two contracts is close enough to justify the solution that the withdrawal from one contract has legal consequences for the other contract. This is the case if the two contracts form an economic unit from an objective point of view. It is the close economic link from the commercial point of view, and not the exact legal constellation, that determines whether the contracts can be considered to form a unit. This concept leaves some discretion to the judge who will have to decide, on the basis of objective factors, depending on the specific circumstances of the case, whether the contracts can be considered to form linked contracts. This will be so when both contracts are linked in such a way that one contract could not have been concluded without the other or when one contract only has reason to exist because of the existence of the other contract. Reference to objective factors bars businesses from avoiding this effect on a linked contract by pointing out to consumers that they cannot expect the contracts to be linked. The criteria specifically set out in paragraph (2) for credit contracts are also to be taken into account in the application of paragraph (1).

Linked contracts will most often be credit contracts financing sales contracts, but it is not excluded that other contracts, such as e.g. maintenance contracts (cf. Illustration 1) or insurance contracts are also linked contracts. Contracts between the same parties can form linked contracts. It is also possible that contracts in a tripartite relationship form linked contracts. In particular, this may be the case if a third party provides goods, other assets or services to a consumer on the basis of a contract with a business with whom the consumer has concluded the main contract.

C. Linked credit contracts

Paragraph (2) provides a non-exhaustive list of situations in which a credit contract forms a linked contract with a contract that is wholly or partially financed by this credit contract. The elements in this list, which give further guidance for the interpretation of the term "economic unit", are based on German CC § 358 and the Proposal for a Directive on Consumer Credit (cf. Art. 3 lit. (l) of the Draft, COM (2005) 483), except that the aforementioned list is exhaustive.

> Illustration 2
> A consumer is contacted by car dealer 'CNX' and concludes in her house a contract for the sale of a CNX car. A credit contract between the consumer and CNX-Bank for financing the sale of the car is concluded on the same day, and the consumer fills out the forms with the help of car dealer CNX. The contract for the sale of the car and the contract financing that sale are linked contracts (cf. LG Braunschweig (German Regional Court), judgment of 16 June 1994, 7 S 7/94). Withdrawal from the contract for the sale of the car will entail automatic withdrawal from the credit contract.

D. Legal consequences of the withdrawal for the linked contract

The legal consequences of withdrawal from the main contract for the linked contract are determined by paragraph (3). This rule refers to II.–5:105 (Effects of withdrawal) which deals with the effects of withdrawal on the obligations of the parties that stem from the main contract. Withdrawal has the same effect on the obligations stemming from the linked contract. It follows from II.–5:105 in conjunction with paragraph (3) of the present Article that the obligations to perform the linked contract are terminated and that both parties have to return what they received under the linked contract. Payments received under the linked contract will have to be returned in accordance with II.–5:105 paragraph (2). Liability for damages to goods that may have been received under the linked contract will be governed by II.–5:105 paragraphs (3) and (4).

E. Exception for speculative contracts

The present Article does not exclude that withdrawal from a credit contract (as may be, for instance, possible under the future Consumer Credit Directive) may have consequences for a linked sales contract. Speculation by the consumer should, however, be excluded. Therefore, if a consumer can withdraw from a credit contract that forms a linked contract with a contract for the supply of goods or services whose price depends on fluctuations in the financial market which are outside the supplier's control and which may occur during the withdrawal period under II.–5:201(Contracts negotiated away from business premises), paragraph (2)(f), withdrawal from the credit contract will not affect this linked speculative contract.

NOTES

1. Apart from the Doorstep Selling Directive (and the Life Assurance Directive where it is not appropriate) all the other Directives which contain a withdrawal right comprise a rather similar provision on credit agreements. For example, Art. 6(4) of Directive 97/7/EC calls on the Member States to regulate the automatic and immediate cancellation of a credit agreement if the credit is either granted by the supplier or by a third party on the basis of an agreement between the third party and the supplier, and in the case that the consumer exercises the right to withdraw from the credit financed main contract. Similar provisions can be found in Art. 7 of Directive 94/47/EC and Art. 6(7) of Directive 2002/65/EC. Furthermore, Art. 7 of the Proposal for a Revision of the Timeshare Directive (COM (2007) 303) provides that in the event of withdrawal "any ancillary contracts" are "automatically terminated". Art. 3(l)(ii) Second Revised Proposal for a Consumer Credit Directive (COM (2005) 483) describes linked contracts as agreements that form, from an objective point of view, a "commercial unit". Most Directives require the Member States to lay down detailed rules for the cancellation of the linked contract (cf. Art. 7 sent. 2 of Directive 94/47/EC; Art. 6(4) sent. 2 of Directive 97/7/EC).

2. ECJ case law (C-350/03 – Schulte and C-299/04 – Crailsheime) has illustrated that, in the absence of explicit provisions in a Directive, the general concept of effectiveness of Community law, in principle, cannot be relied on for determining the fate of linked contracts, as this remains a question of national law. In these cases, the effect which the withdrawal from a secured credit contract concluded in a doorstep selling situation has on the contract for the sale of immovable property was at stake. The ECJ held in Schulte that "although the Directive does not preclude national law from providing, where the two contracts form a single economic unit, that the cancellation of the secured credit contract has an effect on the validity of the contract for sale of the immovable property, it does not require such an effect in a case such as that described by the referring court". The ECJ nevertheless did impose some limits on the discretion of the national legislator to determine the effects of the exercise of the right of withdrawal in case the necessary information with regard to the right of withdrawal had not been provided.

3. As most Directives require detailed provisions on that question the countries are given leeway, so that a huge variety of solutions can be found. This can be particularly examined with regard to the Distance Selling Directive. All Member States except SLOVENIA have implemented provisions transposing Art. 6(4) of the Directive. LUXEMBOURG (Distance Selling Act art. 5(5)) and MALTA (Distance Selling Act art. 11) transposed the mentioned article literally using the copy and paste technique. Other Member States like FINLAND (ConsProtA art. 6(24)), GREECE (ConsProtA art. 4(1)), LITHUANIA (ConsProtA art. 18(5): "without any additional commitments on the side of the consumer"), PORTUGAL (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 8(3): "automatically and simultaneously") and SPAIN (ConsProtA art. 77) have implemented variations but these differences seem to be deviations in wording, but not in substance.

4. Whereas in most countries the credit contract is automatically cancelled when a consumer withdraws from the distance contract, in some member states like ESTONIA (LOA § 57), LATVIA (ConsProtA art. 31(1)) and the NETHERLANDS (CC book 7 art. 46e) the consumer has to withdraw from both agreements, the distance contract and the credit agreement. In BELGIUM, two kinds of solutions can be examined. Whereas under the Unfair Trade Practices Act art. 14(4) sent. 1 the credit agreement is automatically cancelled, without any charges or damages for the consumer, the consumer has a only right of withdrawal according to the ConsProtA (ConsProtA art. 81(4) read in conjunction with the Consumer Credit Act art. 20bis). AUSTRIAN, ESTONIAN and GERMAN law require, additionally, the credit contract to be regarded as economically linked with the distance contract (cf. Austria ConsProtA § 5h(1) and German CC § 358(3) sent. 1: "wirtschaftliche Einheit") This is, e.g. in ESTONIA, the case if the third party used the assistance of the supplier in the preparation of or entry into the contract (LOA § 57). Furthermore HUNGARY (Distance Selling Act art. 6), ITALY (ConsC art. 67(6)) and the UNITED KINGDOM (Consumer Protection Reg. 2000 reg. 15(2)) impose a duty on the supplier to inform the creditor that the consumer has withdrawn from the distance contract.

5. Most other Member States seem to refer to their general civil law for the reimbursement of the money already paid. Some Member States have fixed the period for the reimbursement of the money already paid to the supplier or creditor. In LATVIA, the supplier has to reimburse the amount of money, together with interest, that has been paid for the goods or services up to the moment of withdrawal from the contract within a period of seven days (ConsProtA art. 31). In FINLAND (ConsProtA art. 6(24)) and IRELAND (European Communities Reg. 2001 reg. 8(3)), the money has to be repaid "without delay and in any time within 30 days after being informed of the withdrawal of the distance contract".

6. Art. 6(4) sent. 1 of Directive 97/7/EC states that the credit agreement is cancelled without penalty. Most of the Member States have transposed this provision, e.g. BELGIUM, ESTONIA, GREECE, ITALY, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL and ROMANIA. POLISH and SLOVAKIAN law have left out the terms "without penalty", whereas BULGARIA ConsProtA art. 56 replaces the notion by ensuring that the consumer is not liable for any damages or compensation.

7. Member States differ on whether the consumer can be required to pay further costs. In some states, e.g. IRELAND, the consumer can be obliged to pay interest and other costs if agreed in the contract. According to the CYPRUS Distance Selling Act art. 12(2), the supplier or the consumer is liable to pay the interest that has accrued on the sum paid. In HUNGARY, claims regarding costs and interest from the consumer are expressly excluded (Distance Selling Act art. 6(2)). However, damage related to the conclusion of the contract may be demanded. In AUSTRIA, the consumer can be made to bear the costs of an eventual necessary notarisation of signature and compensation for the discharged expenses of the supplier or third party due to the grant of credit, but solely under the condition that the parties have agreed this. Claims regarding other costs or interest are expressly excluded (ConsProtA § 5h(2) sent. 3). In the UNITED KINGDOM no charges can be put on the consumer. Nevertheless, a special rule concerning interest exists. Only if the whole or a portion of the credit is repaid, either before the expiry of one month following the cancellation of the credit agreement, or in the case of a credit repayable by instalments before the date on which the first instalment is due, is no interest payable on the amount repaid (Consumer Protection Reg. 2000 reg. 16).

Section 2: Particular rights of withdrawal

II.–5:201: Contracts negotiated away from business premises

(1) A consumer is entitled to withdraw from a contract under which a business supplies goods, other assets or services, including financial services, to the consumer, or is granted a personal security by the consumer, if the consumer's offer or acceptance was expressed away from the business premises.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply to:

(a) a contract concluded by means of an automatic vending machine or automated commercial premises;

(b) a contract concluded with telecommunications operators through the use of public payphones;

(c) a contract for the construction and sale of immovable property or relating to other immovable property rights, except for rental;

(d) a contract for the supply of foodstuffs, beverages or other goods intended for everyday consumption supplied to the home, residence or workplace of the consumer by regular roundsmen;

(e) a contract concluded by means of distance communication, but outside of an organised distance sales or service-provision scheme run by the supplier;

(f) a contract for the supply of goods, other assets or services whose price depends on fluctuations in the financial market outside the supplier's control, which may occur during the withdrawal period;

(g) a contract concluded at an auction;

(h) travel and baggage insurance policies or similar short-term insurance policies of less than one month's duration.

(3) If the business has exclusively used means of distance communication for concluding the contract, paragraph (1) also does not apply if the contract is for:

(a) the supply of accommodation, transport, catering or leisure services, where the business undertakes, when the contract is concluded, to supply these services on a specific date or within a specific period;

(b) the supply of services other than financial services if performance has begun, at the consumer's express and informed request, before the end of the withdrawal period referred to in II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period) paragraph (1);

(c) the supply of goods made to the consumer's specifications or clearly personalised or which, by reason of their nature, cannot be returned or are liable to deteriorate or expire rapidly;

(d) the supply of audio or video recordings or computer software

(i) which were unsealed by the consumer, or

(ii) which can be downloaded or reproduced for permanent use, in case of supply by electronic means;

(e) the supply of newspapers, periodicals and magazines;

(f) gaming and lottery services.

(4) With regard to financial services, paragraph (1) also does not apply to contracts that have been fully performed by both parties, at the consumer's express request, before the consumer exercises his or her right of withdrawal.

COMMENTS

A. Purpose and general scope

Paragraph (1) grants a consumer a right to withdraw from a contract if he or she expresses the offer or acceptance away from business premises. This right of withdrawal includes and slightly broadens the situations covered by Art. 5(1) Doorstep Selling Directive 85/577/EEC, Art. 6(1) Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC and Art. 6(1) Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC. Paragraphs (2), (3) and (4) reorganise the exceptions established in these Directives. The parties can agree to deviate from the exceptions of paragraphs (2) to (4) in favour of the consumer.

The provision only requires that the consumer actually concluded the contract outside of business premises. He or she need not be influenced or put under pressure by the business (Case C-423/97 – Travel Vac). Where the contract has been concluded with the help of an intermediary, it is also not a prerequisite that the business was aware, or should have been aware, that the consumer expressed his or her consent outside the normal business premises (Case C-299/04 – Crailsheimer).

Illustration 1
A consumer concludes a contract in the course of a visit by a salesman at his workplace, thus, outside of business premises. He decides to exercise the right of withdrawal. The business alleges that no undue pressure was exercised and that no aggressive sales practices were used in the circumstances. The consumer can exercise his right of withdrawal without having to prove that the opposite is true. It suffices that the consumer was in a situation described in paragraph (1) of the Article.

Illustration 2
A consumer is contacted at home by an independent agent acting on behalf of a business. The consumer signs a contract but later on exercises the right of withdrawal. The business claims that the consumer does not have a right of withdrawal as it was not aware that the agent had contacted consumers in a doorstep selling situation. The consumer has nevertheless a right of withdrawal. When a third party intervenes in the name of (or on behalf of) a business in the negotiation or the conclusion of a contract, the right of withdrawal is not subject to the condition that the business was or should have been aware that the contract was concluded in circumstances such as those as described in the present Article. The legal position of the third party intervening in the conclusion of the contract is irrelevant for the application of the provisions protecting the consumer with respect to contracts concluded away from normal business premises (ECJ, Case C-299/04 – Crailsheimer; Commercial Court Leuven (Belgium), 1 June 1993, Droit de la Consommation – Consumentenrecht (DCCR) 1993-94, 527).

B. Slightly broader scope than the Directives

By the general rule in paragraph (1), some particular situations which are not covered by the three Directives mentioned above are also included (particularly the supply of goods, other assets and services on public streets and spaces). But this extension is in line with the situation in several Member States. Moreover, the general rule also allows a gap to be bridged in the current Directives: contracts that were negotiated in a doorstep situation but concluded afterwards by means of distance communication, for example by phone, were not covered by either of these Directives.

Paragraph (1), together with II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period) paragraph (2)(a) also implies that the period for withdrawal will be calculated differently for doorstep selling in comparison with the Doorstep Selling Directive 85/577/EEC. Differing from these model rules and the rules in several Member States, this Directive does not require the goods to be delivered for the withdrawal period to start.

C. Justification of the withdrawal right

The Doorstep Selling Directive 85/577/EEC concerns "contracts negotiated away from business premises" according to its official title. But the contracts within the scope of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC and the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC are not negotiated in the professional supplier's business premises either. In these cases the consumer also expresses the intention to conclude the contract away from the professional supplier's business premises. The rights of withdrawal granted under these Directives are concordant in this respect: they all recognise that risks exist for consumers when a contract is concluded away from the professional supplier's business premises ('out of shop contracts'). In these situations, it is assumed that consumers are usually less prepared for (or focused on) contractual negotiations, or are less informed about relevant contractual circumstances, than they are when they enter the professional supplier's business premises. This is why a structural imbalance in the negotiations can arise. Each of the three Directives seeks to counter this imbalance by introducing a 'cooling off' period and a right of withdrawal for a specific situation.

The consumer buying on the doorstep or in another face-to-face situation outside of business premises is usually unable to compare products and prices. He or she will also often not be able to really inspect the goods offered on sale. The extra time provided by the withdrawal period allows him or her to compare products or services and prices. However, in doorstep selling and similar situations, the cooling off period does not only cure a problem of asymmetric information. Since in a doorstep selling situation consumers are more easily influenced by aggressive sales practices, the cooling off period also allows consumers to consider the merit of the contract they concluded without being subject to the pressure exercised by a salesperson. This function of the cooling off period is relevant to both contracts for goods and contracts for services that are concluded in a doorstep situation.

In distance selling situations, asymmetric information is due to the fact that the contract is concluded by means of distance communication and that the consumer is unable to inspect or test the goods, contrary to what happens for contracts concluded at the seller's business premises. There is no problem here of pressure exercised by a business. The cooling off period allows the consumer to verify the quality or to test the goods as she or he could have done if the contract had been concluded at the business premises.

When contracting for (financial) services at a distance, the means of communication used are not the primary reason for an informational asymmetry. Concluding the contract at the business premises would generally not give much more information on the services offered. With respect to the distance selling of financial services, it is therefore harder to justify the right of withdrawal based on the situation in which the contract was negotiated. Financial services are intangible. They are a bundle of contractual rights and obligations. It is perfectly possible to provide all the information needed to be informed of this bundle of rights and obligations even through means of distance communication. A cooling off period does not seem to put the consumer in a much better position in any way. It may well be that there are advantages in receiving information on financial services in a face-to-face context, but the cooling off period does not remedy this possible shortcoming. If it is the complexity of the contract that justifies granting the consumer the right of withdrawal, one could argue that the consumer should have this right irrespective of the circumstances in which the contract was concluded. Finally, one could argue that a consumer may not be fully aware that a contract has been concluded through the clicking of a button, but the provisions in II.–3:105 (Formation by electronic means) should provide for sufficient protection in this regard. One may therefore want to reconsider whether the right of withdrawal is an efficient means at all for the purpose of enhancing consumer protection with respect to distance selling of services and of financial services in particular. However, the present Article reflects the current situation in EC law.

D. Exemptions from the right to withdraw

Paragraphs (2), (3) and (4) exempt certain contracts from the right to withdraw. These exemptions are necessary to achieve a balance between the interests of businesses and consumers. The consumer will not have the right of withdrawal if such a right would systematically lead to substantial losses for the business, or if such a right is likely to lead to abuse by the consumer or, if the protection afforded by the right of withdrawal is unnecessary for the specific contract. Whereas the exemptions in paragraph (2) are applicable to all contracts irrespective whether the contract has been concluded in a face-to-face situation or at a distance, paragraph (3) only applies to contracts concluded at a distance. Paragraph (4) only applies to financial services.

E. General exemptions (paragraph 2)

Paragraph (2)(a) and (2)(b) are based on Art. 3(1), 2nd and 3rd indent Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC. These exemptions for automatic vending machines and public payphones are transposed by the large majority of Member States and concern contracts that are not considered to be problematic. The same rationale underlies paragraph (2)(d) on regular roundsmen (in particular the English milkmen) which combines Art. 3(2)(b) Doorstep Selling Directive 85/577/EEC and Art. 3(2), 1st indent of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC.

Paragraph (2)(c) on immovable property combines Art. 3(2)(a) of the Doorstep Selling Directive 85/577/EEC and Art. 3(1), 4th indent of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC. These contracts are excluded as the genuine consent of parties to these contracts is warranted by other instruments of protection in accordance with national legislation, such as the conclusion of the contract before a public notary or other formal requirements. The counter-exception for tenancies, which stems from Art. 3(1) 4th indent Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC, comes in here and not under paragraph (3), because it is incoherent to grant the consumer a right to withdraw from rental contracts concluded in distance selling situations, but not to grant him or her the right of withdrawal for rental contracts concluded in one of the other situations covered by the present Article.

Paragraph (2)(e) corresponds to the current definition of distance contract in Art. 2(1) of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC and Art. 2(a) of the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC. Contracts in which the business uses means of distance communication as an exception to conclude the contract are outside the scope of application of these provisions. The term ‘means of distance communication’ refers to any means which, without the simultaneous physical presence of the supplier and the consumer, may be used for the conclusion of a contract between those parties in the sense of Art. 2(4) sentence 1 Distance Selling Directive 1997/7/EC.

F. In particular: exemptions for financial services (paragraphs (2) and (4))

Paragraph (1) clarifies that the right to withdraw is in principle also granted for contracts under which financial services are provided. The term ‘financial services’ means any service of a banking, credit, insurance, personal pension, investment or payment nature in accordance with Art. 2(b) of the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC.

Paragraph (2)(f) states an important exemption for many financial services. In accordance with Art. 6(2)(a) Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC, financial services whose price depends on fluctuations in the financial market outside the supplier’s control which may occur during the withdrawal period, are exempted. This may be services related to foreign exchange, money market instruments, transferable securities, units in collective investment undertakings, financial-futures contracts, including equivalent cash-settled instruments, forward interest-rate agreements, swaps, or options to acquire or dispose of any such instruments including equivalent cash-settled instruments, in particular options on currency and interest rates.

Paragraph (2)(h) reflects the exception in Art. 6(2)(b) of the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC. Due to the nature of the contract and in order to avoid speculation by the consumer, it is reasonable to exclude short-term insurance policies from the right of withdrawal.

Paragraph (4) is based on Art. 6(2)(c) of the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC (cf. with regard to this rule below under H.).

G. In particular: auctions

Paragraph (2)(g) is based on Art. 3(1) 5th indent Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC. It is an open question whether this provision of the Distance Selling Directive only refers to traditional auctions (such as a fine art auction in one of the major auction houses, or a racehorse auction) or whether it also applies to internet auctions (such as eBay™ “auctions”). In the case of traditional auctions it would be entirely impractical if a bidder who participates in the auction via phone could benefit from the right of withdrawal, while bidders who are present at the auction do not have such a right. With regard to internet auctions, in which all bidders participate via means of distance communication, one might argue that there is no such issue of unjustified unequal treatment of present and absent bidders. While the Acquis does not provide a clear answer to the question of how the term “auction” is to be understood, the Member States seem to be moving towards a narrow interpretation of the term and thus towards limiting it to traditional auctions as described above.

H. Particular exemptions for distance contracts (paragraph (3))

Paragraph (3) supplements paragraph (2) with particular exceptions for contracts concluded by the business exclusively by means of distance communication. The term ‘means of distance communication' refers to any means which, without the simultaneous physical presence of the supplier and the consumer, may be used for the conclusion of a contract between those parties in accordance with Art. 2(4) sentence 1 Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC.

Paragraph (3)(a) is based on Art. 3(2), 2nd indent of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC. The scope and rationale of this exemption was set out by the ECJ in the case C-336/03 – EasyCar. It is aimed at exempting suppliers of services in certain sectors because the requirements of the Directive could affect those suppliers disproportionately. In particular, where the request of a service resulted in a booking and that booking is cancelled by the consumer at short notice before the date specified for the provision of that service. The ECJ therefore considered that car hire undertakings are transport services for the purposes of this exception. The exception applies when the time of performance was agreed upon at the time of the conclusion of the contract.

> Illustration 3
> A consumer hires a car through the internet for a specific period. She wants to withdraw from the contract. The consumer does not have a right of withdrawal because these contracts fall under the exception of paragraph (3)(a) of the Article (cf. ECJ, C-336/03 – EasyCar).

Paragraph (3)(b) is based on Art. 6(3), 1st indent of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC. The provision should be read in relation to paragraph (4), which is based on Art. 6(2)(c) of the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC. Art. 6(3), 1st indent of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC provides that the consumer may not exercise the right of withdrawal in respect of contracts for the provision of services if performance has begun, 'with the consumer's agreement', before the end of the withdrawal period. Art. 6(2)(c) of the Financial Services Distance Selling Directive 2002/65/EC states that the right of withdrawal shall not apply to contracts that have been fully performed by both parties 'at the consumer's express request' before the consumer exercises her or his right of withdrawal. Paragraph (3)(b) aligns and clarifies the two provisions. The right of withdrawal will be lost 'at the consumer's express and informed request' for performance. Since the request needs to be informed, the consumer needs to be aware that performance (for distance selling of services other than financial services; full performance for financial services) during the period for withdrawal at her or his request extinguishes the right of withdrawal.

It should be noted that the requirement of an 'informed' request also avoids uncertainty (with regard to services other than financial services) about what acts constitute performance for the purposes of this rule (i.e. any small partial performance after the conclusion of the contract, or only performance of the 'characteristic' service). A Belgian Court held that booking a flight service by a business provider constituted performance. Consequently, the right of withdrawal was extinguished; provision of the flight service during the withdrawal period was not required (Judge of the Peace Ghent (Belgium), eerste kanton, 7 April 2003, A.R. 010617 – Airstop). The wording of this rule prevents businesses from claiming that a minor act of performance during the withdrawal period extinguishes the right of withdrawal if the consumer was not informed of this consequence.

In the case of paragraph (3)(b), i.e. services other than financial services, performance just by the business before the end of the period for withdrawal extinguishes the right of withdrawal.

In the case of financial services, paragraph (4) stipulates that only full performance by both parties before the end of the withdrawal period extinguishes the right of withdrawal. The right of withdrawal is in any case preserved if (other) pre-contractual information which was required has been omitted. In such a case, the withdrawal period is extended under II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (1) and II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period).

Paragraph (3)(c) is based on Art. 6(3), 3rd indent of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC. Allowing the consumer the right of withdrawal for these categories of goods would result in significant losses for businesses. If such an exemption were absent, it may well be that businesses would decline to sell these categories of goods through means of distance communication.

Illustration 4
A consumer buys curtains through the internet and specifies length and width. The consumer will not have a right of withdrawal.

Illustration 5
A consumer buys a laptop through the internet and specifies the operating system, memory and hard disk capacity required. The laptop is delivered and the consumer then decides to exercise the right of withdrawal. The exemption of paragraph (3)(c) for goods made to the consumer's specifications does not apply if the goods were made out of standard units and can be disassembled with relatively minor costs and efforts (cf. BGH (German Supreme Court), judgment of 19 March 2005, VIII ZR 295/01, Neue Juristische Wochenschrift (NJW) 2003, 1665-1667).

Illustration 6
A business sells horticultural products by mail-order. Its catalogue states that consumers do not have a right of withdrawal. Such a statement is too general as not all horticultural products deteriorate rapidly and are therefore exempted from the right of withdrawal under Art. II.–5:201(4)(c) (cf. Hof van Beroep/Cour d'appel Brussels (Belgium) 21 January 1999, P. Bakker Hillegom / Ets. Gonthier).

Paragraph (3)(d) is based on Art. 6(3), 4th indent of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC. The rationale for this exemption is the prevention of possible abuse from the consumer. The exemption is, however, broadened as it also applies to the supply of audio, video and computer software supplied by electronic means if the consumer is in a position to download or reproduce the data. The rationale for this exemption is identical: prevention of possible abuse from the consumer. Such an exemption already exists in several Member States.

Illustration 7
A consumer downloads music against payment. It can be copied on any medium . The consumer will not have the right of withdrawal.

Paragraphs (3)(e) and (3)(f) are based on Art. 6(3) 5th indent and Art. 6(3) 6th indent of the Distance Selling Directive 97/7/EC. Again, these exemptions seek to balance the interests of businesses and consumers. Allowing the right of withdrawal for these goods could lead to substantial losses by businesses and possible abuse from consumers in the case of gaming and lottery services.

Illustration 8
A consumer buys a lottery ticket using the internet. The contract is not subject to the right of withdrawal because the exemption in paragraph (3)(f) applies.

I. No exception for expressly requested business visits

In contrast to Art. 1(1) 2nd indent of the Doorstep Selling Directive 85/577/EEC, the present Article does not stipulate for an exception from the right to withdraw from contracts concluded in a doorstep situation where the consumer had expressly requested the visit. This follows a tendency visible in several Member States. Consumers may be subject to high pressure selling even when they requested the business visit themselves. Thus, consumers enjoy protection in doorstep cases irrespective whether the visit was unsolicited or solicited.

J. No exemption for low value contracts

The present Article does not contain an exemption for low value contracts as can be found in Art. 3(1) sentence 1 of the Doorstep Selling Directive 85/577/EEC. Although it can be argued that consumers who conclude low value contracts need less protection than in cases where high value goods are marketed, nearly half of the Member States have not transposed this exemption. The others stipulate for such an exemption, whereby the threshold varies between 10 and 50 Euro. Contracts with a price up to that amount concluded in a doorstep situation cannot be withdrawn in these States. However, it might be confusing for consumers that there is a withdrawal right only for contracts of a value above the threshold. The consumer might expect that such a threshold, if he or she actually happens to know about it, is much lower than 40 or 50 Euros. Businesses will not be burdened very much by the lack of such exemption for low value contracts, as consumers may not have a great interest to withdraw if the price of the goods was low. Moreover, it would not be appropriate to extend this option to distance selling contracts anyway, as in such cases the impossibility to inspect the goods and to verify their quality deprives the consumer of the information needed to make an informed choice. For these reasons a uniform rule for all contracts which fall under the present Article seemed preferable.

NOTES

I. Scope of the right of withdrawal

1. Art. 5(1) of Directive 85/577/EEC, Art. 6(1) of Directive 97/7/EC and Art. 6(1) of Directive 2002/65/EC grant a consumer a right to withdraw from a contract which has been concluded, generally speaking, “away from business premises”. Directive 85/577/EEC concerns “contracts negotiated away from business premises” according to its official title. Under this Directive the contract has to be concluded either during an excursion organised by the trader away from business premises, or during a visit by a trader. In the latter case, the Directives’ provisions are only applicable if the trader visits the consumer at his or her home or at the home of another consumer, or if the trader visits the consumer at his or her place of work (art. 1(1)). According to this provision contracts concluded on business premises are not covered, even if the consumer has previously been influenced in a doorstep situation. The ECJ has clarified some details with regard to the situations covered by the Directive. In its judgment Travel VAC, C-423/97, the ECJ held that where a contract is concluded after a trader has invited a consumer to go in person to a specified place at a certain distance from the place where the consumer lives (other than the premises where the trader usually carries on business and not clearly identifiable as premises for sales to the public), in order to present the products and services offered, this contract must be considered to have been concluded during an excursion organised by the trader away from the trader's business premises within the meaning of the Directive. In the same judgment, the ECJ clarified that the consumer need not prove that he or she was influenced or manipulated by the trader. It is sufficient that the contract is concluded in circumstances such as those described in the Directive. Moreover, in its judgment Crailsheimer Volksbank, C-229/04, the ECJ held that, when a third party intervenes in the name or on behalf of a trader to negotiate or conclude a contract, the application of the Directive cannot be made subject to the condition that the trader was, or should have been, aware that the contract was concluded in a doorstep selling situation.

2. For distance selling contracts Art. 2(1) of Directive 97/7/EC states that the contract has to be concluded between a supplier and a consumer under an organised distance sales or service-provision scheme run by the supplier, who, for the purpose of the contract, makes exclusive use of one or more means of distance communication up to and including the moment at which the contract is concluded. Art. 2(4) sent. 1 of the Directive specifies that the contract has to be concluded "without the simultaneous physical presence of the supplier and the consumer". Thus, the contracts within the scope of Distance 97/7/EC (and Directive 2002/65/EC) are equally not negotiated in the professional supplier's business premises.

3. The Doorstep Selling Directive applies to "contracts under which a trader supplies goods and services to a consumer" (art. 1(1)) whereas according to art. 2(1) of Directive 97/7/EC "any contract concerning goods and services" is covered. The Directives are unclear with regard to the kind of contracts or other transactions that are covered. In Bayerische Hypotheken- und Wechselbank (case C-45/96) the ECJ has stated that, in principle, a guarantee falls under the scope of the Doorstep Selling Directive. Directive 2002/65/EC applies to contracts "concerning financial services" (art. 2(a)).

II. Exceptions for doorstep selling contracts

4. The Doorstep Selling Directive provides for several exceptions. According to its art. 3(1) Member States are free to apply the provisions of the Directive only to contracts "for which the payment to be made by the consumer exceeds a specified amount". This amount must not exceed the sum of € 60. Specific exceptions are laid down in art. 3(2). In particular the Directive does not apply to contracts concerning immovable property (art. 3(2)(a)) and to contracts for the supply of foodstuffs and beverages or other goods intended for current consumption in the household and supplied by regular roundsmen (art. 3(2)(b)).

5. The option for Member States to exclude contracts that do not exceed the sum of € 60 from the scope of their national transposition law has been made use of by the majority of states. Member States which have not exercised this option are, for instance, CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, FRANCE, GREECE, HUNGARY, LATVIA, LUXEMBOURG and SLOVAKIA. Other Member States have fixed different limits varying from € 10 (POLAND) up to € 50 (BELGIUM). In BELGIUM, additionally, the sale must be made for non-commercial and exclusively charitable purposes. In ESTONIA, there is a limit of € 15 which only applies where the consumer pays the sum at the moment the contract is concluded (ConsProtA art. 46(2)). PORTUGUESE law is applicable to contracts under € 60, although some provisions (regarding contract form, content and terms) are applicable only to contracts exceeding this amount (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 16(4)).

6. The Member States have not consistently exercised the specific options to limit the scope as provided for in art. 3(2) of the Directive. For instance, in GREECE, ITALY, IRELAND (exclusion of insurance and assurance contracts), PORTUGAL, POLAND, ROMANIA and the UNITED KINGDOM, the same situations are basically exempt from protection as provided for under the Directive. In contrast, LATVIAN law does not contain any restrictions in the general definition of the contract. With regard to the exception of contracts related to immovable property some variations may be highlighted. GERMANY (CC § 312(3) no. 3), LITHUANIA (CC art. 6.357(3) 6th indent), MALTA (Doorstep Selling Act art. 3(c)) and SPAIN (ConsProtA art. 108(f)) exclude contracts concluded before a notary public. This exclusion is broader than what is provided for in Art. 3(2)(a) and may therefore infringe the Directive. On the other hand this exception can also be narrower than the one provided for in the Directive. For example, in Germany, there is no requirement for authentication before a notary public in the case of contracts for the building or rent of immovable property; accordingly, such contracts generally fall within the scope of the right of withdrawal in doorstep selling situations). The Maltese law, in implementing the exemptions laid down in art. 3 of Directive 85/577/EEC, goes beyond the Directive's scope by excluding contracts negotiated solely in writing and contracts concluded before a court, notary or another person who is bound to inform the parties of their rights and obligations even if they are concluded in a doorstep situation (Doorstep Selling Act art. 3(c)). The Maltese legislator has presumed that these contracts would not generally stem from a doorstep situation. This exemption may be considered to be necessary because the definition of "doorstep contract" includes contracts that have been negotiated at any other place or premises other than the door-to-door seller's business premises. Moreover, the Maltese Minister is empowered by law to make other contracts exempt from the national Doorstep Selling Act (art. 3(f)).

7. Apart from AUSTRIA, FINLAND and GERMANY, all Member States have implemented an exception for contracts for the supply of food and beverages. In the NETHERLANDS, contracts in the case of an ongoing relationship between the parties concerning the sale of food are exempt (Doorstep Selling Act art. 1(3)). The LITHUANIAN (CC art. 6.357(3) 1st indent) and SLOVENIAN (ConsProtA art. 46a no. 2) derogation for the supply of foodstuffs, beverages or other goods intended for current consumption in the household does not require that the goods were supplied by "regular roundsmen". Under POLISH law the exception only refers to food products which are supplied regularly and does not mention "regular roundsmen" (ConsProtA art. 5(2)). The MALTESE Doorstep Selling Act art. 2 excludes vendors who sell foodstuffs and drinks from "door-to-door" regardless whether they are supplied regularly and frequently. The SWEDISH exception only applies to the rules on the trader's duty to inform the consumer and the rules about the right to withdraw from the contract (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 4(2)(2)).

III. Exceptions for distance selling contracts

8. With regard to distance selling contracts three kinds of exceptions can be examined. According to art. 3 of Directive 97/7/EC all the Directive's provisions do not apply to contracts concluded by means of automatic vending machines (art. 3(1) 2nd indent), to contracts concluded through the use of public payphones (art. 3(1) 3rd indent), to contracts concluded for the construction and sale of immovable property or relating to other immovable property rights, except for rental (art. 3(1) 4th indent), and to contracts concluded at an auction (art. 3(1) 5th indent). With regard to the latter exception it is an open question whether this provision of the Directive 97/7/EC only refers to traditional auctions (such as a fine art auction in one of the major auction houses, or a racehorse auction) or whether it also applies to internet auctions (such as eBay™ "auctions"). Secondly, art. 3(2) of Directive 97/7/EC lists partial exceptions for contracts for the supply of foodstuffs etc. supplied by regular roundsmen (1st indent) and for contracts for the provision of accommodation, transport, catering or leisure services, where the supplier undertakes, when the contract is concluded, to provide these services on a specific date or within a specific period (2nd indent). To these contracts Art. 4 (prior information), 5 (confirmation), 6 (right of withdrawal) and 7(1) (obligation to execute the order within a maximum of 30 days) of the Directive do not apply. Thirdly, Art. 6(3) of Directive 97/7/EC lists several exceptions that apply only to the right of withdrawal. Thus, art. 6(3) 1st indent of Directive 97/7/EC provides that the consumer may not exercise the right of withdrawal in respect of contracts for the provision of services if performance has begun, "with the consumer's agreement", before the end of the withdrawal period. Similarly, art. 6(2)(c) of Directive 2002/65/EC states that the right of withdrawal does not apply to contracts that have been fully performed by both parties "at the consumer's express request" before the consumer exercises the right of withdrawal. Furthermore, the Distance Selling Directive does not give a right to withdraw from a contract if the price of goods and services provided under the contract is dependent on fluctuations in the financial market (art. 6(3) 2nd indent). With regard to financial services a similar provision can be found in art. 6(2)(a) of Directive 2002/65/EC. According to art. 6(3) 3rd indent of Directive 97/7/EC the right of withdrawal is not given in the case of goods that were made to the consumer's specifications. Regarding this exception the Directive refers to five alternatives: goods made to the consumer's specifications, goods clearly personalised, goods which, by reason of their nature, cannot be returned, goods which are liable to deteriorate, and, finally, goods which perish rapidly. Other exceptions to the right of withdrawal apply with respect to audio and video recordings or computer software which were unsealed by the consumer (art. 6(3) 4th indent), to newspapers and periodicals (art. 6(3) 5th indent) and to gaming and lottery services (art. 6(3) 6th indent).

9. Until now, the exception contained in art. 3(2) 2nd indent (contracts for the provision of accommodation, transport, catering or leisure services) is the only provision of Directive 97/7/EC which had to be applied by the ECJ (judgment of 10 March 2005 C-336/03 EasyCar (UK) Ltd v Office of Fair Trading; see in particular nos. 28, 29). The Court held that Art. 3(2) of the Directive is to be interpreted as meaning that 'contracts for the provision of transport services' includes contracts for the provision of car hire services. The reasoning offers some guidance for the future application of this provision. The Court stated that the exemption has the purpose of protecting the interests of suppliers of certain services in order that they should not suffer the disproportionate consequences arising from cancellation at no expense and with no explanation. An example of this would be a booking which is made and then cancelled by the consumer at short notice before the date specified for the provision of that service. In the view of the ECJ, car hire undertakings carry out an activity which the legislature intended to protect against such consequences by means of the exemption. The reason is that those undertakings must make arrangements for the performance, on the date fixed at the time of booking, of the agreed service and, therefore, suffer the same consequences in the event of cancellation as other undertakings operating in the transport sector or in the other sectors listed in the exemption.

10. The exemption concerning contracts concluded by means of automatic vending machines or automated commercial premises has been adopted by a great majority of Member States, with the exception of BELGIUM. AUSTRIA has, in general, transposed this exemption, but the specific protection with regard to fraudulent use of credit cards according to art. 8 of Directive 97/7/EC has been transposed in a way that it is also applicable to contracts concluded by means of automatic vending machines (ConsProtA § 31a). ESTONIA (LOA § 53(2), (1)), HUNGARY (Distance Selling Act art. 1(3)(b)), LITHUANIA (ConsProtA art. 17(3) 5th indent) and SLOVENIA (ConsProtA art. 43a(1), (5) 1st indent) did not implement the exemption for "automated commercial premises", but only for "automatic vending machines". LITHUANIA exempts these contracts from the application of art. 4 (prior information), 5 (confirmation), 7(1) (obligation to execute the order within a maximum of 30 days) and art. 11(3)(a) of Directive 97/7/EC (ConsProtA art. 17(3); CC art. 6.366(3)).

11. The exemption for contracts concluded through the use of public payphones has been transposed in all countries except for AUSTRIA, BELGIUM and GREECE. The LITHUANIAN legislator did not restrict the provision to the use of public payphones, but excludes all contracts concluded with telecommunications operators. In ESTONIA (LOA § 53(2), (3)), GERMANY (CC § 312b(3), (7)) and ROMANIA (Distance Selling Act art. 6(c)), the transposition law only exempts contracts concluded with telecommunications operators through the use of public payphones in so far as they concern the use of those payphones.

12. Contracts concluded for the construction and sale of immovable property are exempt under nearly all national laws. Only GREECE, LATVIA and LITHUANIA did not make use of this exemption. Whereas ESTONIA did not implement the part "except for rental" (LOA § 53(2) no. 3), SPAIN did not include the entire part relating to "other immovable property rights, except for rental" (ConsProtA art. 93(1)(d)). The NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:46i(2)(b)) and SWEDEN (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act chap. 2 art. 1(2) 1st indent) only exempt contracts for the construction of immovable property. In contrast, FINLAND ConsProtA art. 6(6) does not refer to the construction of immovable property. Swedish law also mentions, besides the construction of buildings, "other fixed plant on land or in water". Member states like GERMANY (CC § 312b(3) no. 2), Finland and SLOVENIA (ConsProtA art. 43a(1) no. 2) explicitly exempt timeshare contracts besides contracts concluded for the construction and sale of immovable property.

13. Art. 3(1) 5th indent of the Distance Selling Directive, which exempts contracts concluded at an auction, has been implemented by all Member States, except BELGIUM, BULGARIA and GREECE. However, BELGIUM has not totally exempted auctions, as the ConsProtA (art. 83 undecies(1) no. 6) and the Liberal Professions Act (art. 11 sent. 3) only contain provisions that empower the King to lay down specific provisions for public auctions organised by means of distance communication. Again, a significant number of Member States have deviated from the Directive. According to the LATVIAN Cabinet Reg. 207 art. 8(3) and art. 19(5), the supplier is disburdened from any duties of information and from a right of withdrawal, when the contract has been concluded at an auction, whereas the other provisions of the distance selling law seem to be applicable. GERMANY and ESTONIA have not completely exempted auctions. In ESTONIA, auctions are only exempted from the right of withdrawal (LOA § 53(4) no. 8). This is similar in GERMANY, where the rules on distance contracts in principle apply to auctions, but the consumer does not have the right of withdrawal (CC § 312d(4) no. 5). The Federal Supreme Court has held in this context that an EBay "auction" is not to be considered as an "auction" in this sense (judgment of 3 November 2004, VIII ZR 375/03, NJW 2004, 53-56). Consequently, EBay auctions fall under the distance selling laws. The same result with regard to EBay auctions should be reached in the following countries. DENMARK exempts auctions where "a significant number of bidders is normally present at the place of the auction" (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 2(1), (4)). The FINNISH ConsProtA does not apply to contracts concluded at an auction, "if participation in the auction is also possible without using a means of distance communication" (ConsProtA art. 6(6)). SWEDISH law does not apply to contracts concluded at auctions where the bidding could be made by means other than at a distance (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act chap. 2 art. 1(2) 4th indent). In FRANCE (ConsC art. L. 121-17), SLOVAKIA (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act § 9(4) lit. g) and SLOVENIA (ConsProtA art. 43a(1) no. 5) only public auctions are exempted.

14. The exception of contracts for the supply of foodstuffs by regular roundsmen has been implemented by all Member States, except for BELGIUM (on the implementation of this exception with regard to doorstep selling contracts see above under II.). FINLAND has also implemented the exemption for the supply of foodstuff by regular roundsmen, but has narrowed it slightly. If the supplier offers those goods and services by way of "cold calling", the provisions on prior information, the confirmation and the right of withdrawal all apply (ConsProtA art. 6(7), (2)). According to LITHUANIAN law, no reference to the supply by regular roundsmen is made (CC art. 6.366(3)). By contrast, some member states, such as the CZECH REPUBLIC, GREECE, SLOVAKIA and SLOVENIA, have widened the exemption and completely excluded these contracts from the scope of application of their transposition laws. Contrary to the Directive, ESTONIA has broadened the exemption by also excluding the provisions transposing art. 7(2) of the Directive (LOA § 53(3)). The IRISH transposition law states that Reg. 4, 5, 6 and 7(1) shall not apply to the contracts for the supply of foodstuff etc. supplied by regular roundsmen. Reg. 7(1) of the Irish Protection of Consumers in Respect of Contracts made by Means of Distance Communication Regulation does not contain the obligation to execute the order within a maximum of 30 days. This is a wrong transposition – probably a drafting mistake – because this obligation is stated in Reg. 9(1) of Irish transposition law. Some Member States have different rules concerning the place of the supply of the goods. HUNGARIAN law only refers to the "foodstuff and contracts concerning the regular delivery of everyday consumer goods" (Distance Selling Act art. 1(3) lit f.). Also, the GREEK legislator did not explicitly lay down the consumer's residence or workplace as places that the food could be supplied to (ConsProtA art. 4(13)(γ)). According to the CYPRUS Distance Selling Act art. 4(2)(a), the scope has been widened to the supply of goods by regular roundsmen at all places other than the supplier's workplace.

15. Only four Member States, i.e. CYPRUS, PORTUGAL, ROMANIA, and the UNITED KINGDOM, have transposed art. 3(2) 2nd indent of Directive 97/7/EC (exemption of contracts for the provision of accommodation, transport, catering or leisure services) faithfully. Many other Member States have chosen different methods of transposing this exemption. For instance, the CZECH REPUBLIC, GREECE, LITHUANIA, SLOVAKIA and SLOVENIA have completely exempted the contracts regulated in Art. 3(2) 2nd indent of Directive 97/7/EC. As this provision allows only a partial exemption, such member states are in breach of EC law. This may also be the case with ESTONIA, which has broadened the exemption by also excluding the provisions transposing Art. 7(2) of Directive 97/7/EC (LOA § 53(3)). One core element of the partial exemption of contracts for the provision of accommodation etc. is that the date of execution must be fixed at the time of the conclusion of the contract. AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, CYPRUS ("upon conclusion of the contract"), DENMARK, ESTONIA ("upon conclusion of the contract"), FINLAND, GERMANY, GREECE, IRELAND, ITALY, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL, SPAIN ("upon conclusion of the contract"), SWEDEN ("in the contract") and the UNITED KINGDOM have implemented this clause. Others, for example, the CZECH REPUBLIC, FRANCE, HUNGARY, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, POLAND, SLOVAKIA and SLOVENIA have extended the exemption to contracts where the date of execution is fixed after the conclusion of the contract.

16. Most Member States have transposed the exception to the right of withdrawal if performance of services has begun before the end of the seven working day period. This can be observed for AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, BULGARIA, CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, ESTONIA, FRANCE, GERMANY, HUNGARY, IRELAND, ITALY, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, POLAND, PORTUGAL, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA, SPAIN and SWEDEN. However, GREECE, LITHUANIA and SLOVENIA have not transposed this exception. Some countries have implemented provisions differing from the Directive. FINLAND, LATVIA and the UNITED KINGDOM have supplemented this exemption with a provision which obliges the supplier to inform the consumer that he or she will not be able to withdraw from the contract if performance of the service has begun. In FINLAND, this information must be given in the confirmation of the information, while in LATVIA (ConsProtA art. 55(2)(a)) and the UNITED KINGDOM (Consumer Protection Reg. 2000 reg. 13(1)(a)), this is to happen prior to the conclusion of the contract. According to the BELGIAN ConsProtA art. 80(4) sent. 2, the consumer is granted a right of withdrawal if the supplier has not informed him or her of the absence of the right of withdrawal.

17. The exception to the right of withdrawal in the case of goods or services, the price of which is dependent on fluctuations in the financial market, has been transposed by the majority of Member States. Only in ESTONIA, GREECE and LITHUANIA is there no corresponding provision. It cannot be assessed how these legal systems organise the unravelling of such contracts. GERMANY and SLOVENIA have given some examples of goods and services which fall under this exception. The German CC § 312d(4) no. 6 lists, inter alia, tradable securities, foreign currency, derivatives or money market instruments. In LATVIA, the supplier has to inform the consumer about the absence of a right of withdrawal prior to the conclusion of the contract. FRANCE (ConsC art. L. 121-20-2 no. 2) and POLAND (ConsProtA art. 10(3) no. 3) have omitted the clause "which cannot be controlled by the supplier". HUNGARY has implemented a clause stating that goods or services are exempted where the price cannot be "controlled" by the supplier and BULGARIA uses the expression "beyond the control of the supplier". Such variations seem to be more a difference in the wording than in the substance. However, in Bulgaria this exception is made binding on the parties. The SPANISH ConsProtA art. 102(a) does not refer to services and consequently limits the exception to goods. In the case of services the position of the consumer is therefore better than foreseen in the Directive, as there is a right of withdrawal.

18. The exception to the right of withdrawal in the case of goods made to the consumer's specifications is part of most Member States' laws. Only ESTONIA, GREECE and LITHUANIA have not implemented any provisions transposing this exception. Several countries have not implemented all alternatives regulated in the Distance

Selling Directive. DANISH and SWEDISH law does not mention the alternative No. 1 (consumer's specification). However, in Denmark, the parties can agree that the supplier may initiate the production of the goods before the expiration of the withdrawal period, in which case, the right of withdrawal also expires at the date the production is initiated (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 18(6)). FINLAND, LATVIA and SWEDEN have not transposed the alternative No. 2 (clearly personalised). The CZECH transposition law (CC art. 53(8) lit. c) does not refer to products which, by reason of their nature, cannot be returned (No. 3). LATVIAN, POLISH and SLOVAKIAN law does not mention the rapidly perishable criterion (No. 5). The Latvian Cabinet Reg. 207 art. 15(3) instead exempts products which can be "quickly utilised", which is somewhat different and, therefore, may be an infringement of the Directive. FINLAND (ConsProtA art. 6(16), (3)) has clarified alternative No. 1 by exempting "goods manufactured to the consumer's specifications so that they cannot be resold without incurring considerable loss or that they cannot be resold at all" and thereby perhaps slightly enhancing consumer protection. Some Member States have regulated additional criteria. The practical relevance of this exemption is illustrated by some case law of national courts. For instance, the GERMAN Federal Court of Justice stated that the consumer's right of withdrawal is not exempted if the product (in this case a laptop which has been constructed out of prefabricated standard units according to the consumer's wishes) can be disassembled with minor effort and without interference to its (the standard unit's) functional capability (judgment of 19 March 2003, VIII ZR 295/01, NJW 2003, 1665-1667). The court held that the exemption only covers products which are personalised in such a way that they can only be sold to other consumers with a significant reduction of price. In BELGIUM, the CA Brussels judged that plants, flowers, fruit trees and similar products – as a general rule – cannot be considered as products that age or deteriorate easily (judgment of 21 January 1999; P. Bakker Hillegom v Ets. Gonthier).

19. Most Member States have transposed the exception for audio or video recordings, or computer software, namely AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, BULGARIA, CYPRUS, DENMARK, FRANCE, GERMANY, HUNGARY, IRELAND, LITHUANIA, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA, SLOVENIA, SWEDEN and the UNITED KINGDOM. However, ESTONIA and GREECE have not incorporated this exemption into their laws. Some variation can be observed with regard to the term "which were unsealed by the consumer": LATVIA (Cabinet Reg. 207 art. 15(4): "the consumer opened the packaging") and POLAND (ConsProtA art. 10(3), (2): "the consumer has removed the original packaging") refer to the packaging, which at least comes close to the Directive. Also the CZECH transposition law (CC art. 53(7)(d): "if the consumer damages the original packing") may perhaps be interpreted in the same sense. In PORTUGAL, the consumer may not withdraw from the contract if he or she removes a certain kind of seal (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 7(d): "selo de garantia de inviolabilidade"), which may just be seen as a clarification of the function of the seal referred to in the Directive. Some Member States have broadened the exemption. The LUXEMBOURG Distance Selling Act art. 5(4)(d), for example, also exempts software that has been downloaded by the consumer. This is more or less the same in SPAIN, where electronic files supplied via electronic means, able to be downloaded or reproduced immediately to be used permanently, are exempted from the withdrawal right (ConsProtA art. 102(c)).

20. Most Member States have transposed the exemption with respect to newspapers, periodicals and magazines. However, DENMARK, ESTONIA and GREECE have not transposed this exemption. Some Member States have implemented provisions deviating from the Directive. In AUSTRIA, contracts for the supply of periodicals ("Verträge über periodische Druckschriften") are not exempted from the right of withdrawal (ConsProtA § 5f no. 5). FINLAND only excepts these products if they are not offered by way of cold calling. CYPRUS grants no right of withdrawal for the supply of newspapers and any form of periodicals. POLAND uses the term "the press" (ConsProtA art. 10(3), (6)). In PORTUGAL (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 7(e)) and SWEDEN (Distance and Doorstep Selling Act art. 2(4) 4th indent), the legislator only exempted newspapers and magazines, but not periodicals.

21. The exception to the right of withdrawal with respect to gaming and lottery services has been implemented by most Member States. Only ESTONIA and GREECE refraining from doing so. Some variations of the wording can be observed, e.g. BULGARIA (games of hazard and lotteries), HUNGARY (exempts gaming agreements, which also includes the lottery), POLAND (games and betting), SLOVAKIA (lottery and other similar games), SLOVENIA (games of chance and lottery services) and SWEDEN (gaming or other lottery services). The UNITED KINGDOM (Consumer Protection Reg. 2000 reg. 13(1)(f)) adds betting to the services which are exempted. A clear difference can be stated for FRANCE, which only makes authorised lotteries exempt (ConsC art. L. 121-20-2 no. 6).

II.–5:202: Timeshare contracts

(1) A consumer who acquires a right to use immovable property under a timeshare contract with a business is entitled to withdraw from the contract.

(2) Where a consumer exercises the right of withdrawal under paragraph (1), the contract may require the consumer to reimburse those expenses which:

(a) have been incurred as a result of the conclusion of and withdrawal from the contract;
(b) correspond to legal formalities which must be completed before the end of the period referred to in II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period) paragraph (1);
(c) are reasonable and appropriate;
(d) are expressly mentioned in the contract; and
(e) are in conformity with any applicable rules on such expenses.

The consumer is not obliged to reimburse any expenses when exercising the right of withdrawal in the situation covered by paragraph (1) of II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties).

(3) The business must not demand or accept any advance payment by the consumer during the period in which the latter may exercise the right of withdrawal. The business is obliged to return any such payment received.

COMMENTS

A. Purpose and structure

The present Article, which grants consumers the right of withdrawal for timeshare contracts, is based on the provisions of the Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC, in particular Arts. 5 and 6 and Recitals 11 to 14. For timeshare contracts, the complex provisions of the contract create a structural imbalance between the parties. The cooling off period gives the purchaser the chance to understand better what the obligations and rights under the contract are (Recital 11 of the Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC). Timeshare contracts are, moreover, often concluded abroad and may be governed by foreign laws (Recital 11 of the Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC). Extra time may therefore be required to consult a local lawyer to understand the content of the contract. In addition, timeshare contracts are sometimes sold through aggressive sales practices. A cooling off period allows the purchaser to assess the merit of the contract without being subject to any external pressure. Finally, personal preferences during a holiday may vary from preferences in everyday life. A cooling off period allows consumers to reconsider their decision in the light of more usual conditions.

Paragraph (1) sets out the objective situation in which the consumer has the right of withdrawal. Paragraph (2) limits the costs of legal formalities that the consumer may be required to defray in case of withdrawal. This paragraph balances the need not to unduly hamper the conclusion of timeshare contracts with the need to ensure that the costs related to legal formalities imposed on the consumer do not deter her or his exercise of the right of withdrawal. Paragraph (3) intends to enhance the efficiency of the right of withdrawal. It prohibits the demand or acceptance of advance payments during the withdrawal period for these contracts. The prohibition protects the consumer against the risk of being deterred from exercising the right of withdrawal because of the uncertainty of whether these payments can be easily recovered.

B. Definition of timeshare contracts

The wording of paragraph (1) (a right which allows him or her to use immovable property under a timeshare contract) is deliberately chosen to cover a wide variety of situations. Thus this provision applies irrespective of the particular contractual construction chosen by the parties, be it the transfer of a real property right or any other right relating to the use of the timeshare property (cf. Art. 2, 1st indent Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC). Furthermore, the provision also applies to binding preliminary contracts.

However, for a future revision of these rules extending the right of withdrawal might have to be considered. According to the recent Proposal for a revision of the Timeshare Directive (COM (2007) 303) the definition of timeshare would no longer exclusively be linked to immovable property. Thus, contracts for accommodation in canal boats, caravans or cruise-ships would also be covered. In addition, the right of withdrawal would also be granted for timeshare-like products, e.g. discount holiday clubs (so-called "long term holiday products", cf. Art. 2 (1) (b) of the Proposal). Yet, for the time being, the present Article reflects the current acquis communautaire as stated in the existing Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC. Also the majority of Member States did not go beyond this scope.

C. Length and beginning of withdrawal period

The withdrawal period granted in these rules is fourteen days. Under Art. 5(1) 1st indent Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC the consumer has ten days from the signing of the contract to exercise the right of withdrawal. In contrast to this, the length of the withdrawal period for timeshare contracts has been harmonised. Thus, the general rule of II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period) now also governs timeshare contracts to which, therefore, the uniform regular period applies.

One may, however, consider an even longer period to allow withdrawal from timeshare contracts. A period of fourteen days will not always ensure that consumers can reflect on their decision once at home. In this period the consumer may still be on holiday or abroad. A period of one or several months may be more adequate. In addition, fourteen days may not be sufficient for a consumer to obtain the advice that is needed to make a well-considered decision. Finally, one may want to consider if the withdrawal period should run from the day of the first inspection of the property, or possibility to use the property (similar to distance selling cases, cf. Art. II.–5:103(1) sent. 2). This would better ensure that the consumer is fully aware of the exact scope and object of the timeshare contract. However, the acquis communautaire presently does not provide sufficient basis for such a prolongation of the withdrawal period. Also the laws of the Member States currently do not provide a longer withdrawal period. In addition, the approach followed by these rules is in line with the Proposal for the revision of the Timeshare Directive, which also provides for a fourteen day withdrawal period (cf. Art. 5(1) of the Draft, COM (2007) 303).

The withdrawal period starts in accordance with the general rule in II.–5:103 (Withdrawal period). Therefore the date of the conclusion of the contract and the notice of the right of withdrawal are decisive. In general, the period starts after the conclusion of the contract and after the consumer has received notice of the right of withdrawal in textual form on a durable medium in accordance with II.–5:104 (Adequate information on the right to withdraw). This approach brings the computation of the withdrawal period for timeshare contracts in line with other withdrawal rights in these rules and abandons the deviating solution provided for in Art.

5(1) 1st indent Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC according to which the withdrawal period starts from the signing of the contract or the signing of a binding preliminary contract.

When determining the beginning of the withdrawal period, consideration must also be given to the fulfilment of the pre-contractual information duty under II.–3:103 (Duty to provide information when concluding a contract with a consumer who is at a particular disadvantage). According to II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (1) the withdrawal period does not commence until the information required under II.–3:103 has been provided. However, even in such a case the right of withdrawal lapses at the latest after one year from the time of the conclusion of the contract. The present Article thus abandons the complicated rules introduced by Art. 5(1) 2nd and 3rd indent of the Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC that prolong the withdrawal period in cases where the required information was omitted. The information duty under II.–3:103 and the corresponding remedy for its violation provided in II.–3:109 paragraph (1), offer a satisfactory and consistent solution on the point. Moreover, the consumer is better protected by these general rules as they prolong the withdrawal period to up to one year. According to Art. 5(1) 2nd and 3rd Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC the withdrawal period is prolonged only up to a maximum of three months and ten days.

D. Reimbursement of expenses

Paragraph (2) rephrases Art. 5(3) and (4) of the Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC. The expenses that the consumer may be required to defray include the costs of notarisation and attestation of the contract and the duties and taxes charged for it. Such expenses must be expressly mentioned in the contract. Consequently, the same formal requirements that apply to timeshare contracts in general also apply to the information about expenses. The requirements laid down in paragraph (2)(a) to (2)(e) are therefore cumulative and not alternative. Art. 5(4) of the Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC provides that the purchaser may not be required to defray certain expenses when the right of withdrawal is exercised during the prolonged period for withdrawal. The last sentence of paragraph (2) reaches the same outcome.

> Illustration 1
> A consumer concludes a timeshare contract but then withdraws from it. The other party is entitled to the costs of notarisation and attestation of the contract, as well as to the pertinent duties and taxes, provided that the expenses are reasonable and appropriate (paragraph (2)(c)), if they are expressly mentioned in the contract (paragraph (2)(d)) and conform to any applicable rules on such expenses (paragraph (2)(e)).

E. Prohibition of advance payments

Paragraph (3), which is based on Art. 6 Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC, prohibits the demand or acceptance of any advance payment by the consumer while the withdrawal period is running. This prohibition enhances the effectiveness of the right of withdrawal. With regard to Art. 6 of the Timeshare Directive 94/47/EC, it is debated whether the prohibition on advance payments should only apply during the initial ten day withdrawal period, or also during the prolonged withdrawal period. Since the withdrawal period is prolonged because the business failed to provide certain information, it is preferable to hold that such prohibition should be extended accordingly. Thus, the prohibition established by paragraph (3) of the present Article should be interpreted accordingly. This interpretation is in line with the Proposal for a revision of the Timeshare Directive (COM (2007) 303), which contains a clarification on this issue. In addition, the prohibition of advance "payments" also prohibits the provision of guarantees, reservation of money on a credit card, explicit acknowledgement of debt or any other consideration to the business (cf. Draft Art. 6(1) from the Proposal, COM (2007) 303).

Illustration 2
A consumer signs a timeshare contract. The price is only due when the withdrawal period is over. The deposit by the consumer of a sum as a guarantee for the payment of the deferred price is also prohibited under paragraph (3) (cf. Audiencia Provincial Las Palmas (Spain) 22 November 2003, 682/2003 Benedicto and Margarita v Palm Oasis Maspalomas S.L.).

Illustration 3
A consumer signs a timeshare contract but does not receive the information required. This prolongs the withdrawal period according to II.–3:109 (Remedies for breach of information duties) paragraph (1). The prohibition on demanding or accepting advance payments under paragraph (3) of the present Article also applies during the prolonged withdrawal period. (cf. Audiencia Provincial Cantabria (Spain) 24 May 2004, 196/2004 - Sergio and Carmela v. "Free Enterprise S. L.).

Illustration 4
The prohibition on demanding or accepting payments is also infringed when a consumer is required to pay advance money in trust to a lawyer during the withdrawal period (cf. Fővárosi Ítélőtábla (Court of Appeal, Hungary), 1 December 2004, 2. Kf.27.379/2003/3, Holiday Club Hungary Kft, Proinvest 2001 Kft vs. Wirtschaftswettbewerbsamt (GVH).

Illustration 5
The prohibition on demanding or accepting payments is also infringed when the business accepts a cheque during the withdrawal period, even if it did not explicitly request it and even if it was not cashed during the withdrawal period (cf. Cour de Cassation (French Supreme Court), 1re chamber, 22 November 1994, 1995, Somm.Comm., 311).

The second sentence of paragraph (3) is justified (a) because a business might breach the prohibition (when it becomes desirable to regulate the private law consequences of such a breach) and (b) because a business may receive money (e.g. cash sent by post or deposited in the letter-box when the office is closed) without having demanded it or actively accepted it. This provision is, of course, without prejudice to any criminal law or other non-private-law sanctions which may be imposed for a breach of the prohibition.

NOTES

I. Length and beginning of withdrawal period

1. The Timeshare Directive provides in art. 5(1) 1st indent for a period of withdrawal of 10 calendar days after the signature of the contract by both parties or the signature of a binding preliminary contract. If the last day of the period is a Sunday or a holiday, the period is prolonged to the next working day. The Commission's Proposal for a new timeshare directive (COM(2007) 303 final) extends the withdrawal period to fourteen days (art. 5(1)).

2. The 10 calendar days period has been adopted by DENMARK, ESTONIA, FINLAND, FRANCE, GREECE, IRELAND, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, POLAND, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA, SPAIN and SWEDEN. Many member states have used the minimum clause to prolong the withdrawal period. The period lasts for 10 working days in BULGARIA, ITALY and PORTUGAL, 14 calendar days in AUSTRIA, LATVIA and the UNITED KINGDOM, two weeks (in some cases one month) in GERMANY, 15 calendar days in CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC, HUNGARY and SLOVENIA and even 15 working days in BELGIUM.

3. In BULGARIA, CYPRUS, FINLAND, IRELAND, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, ROMANIA and SPAIN (Finland, Spain and LITHUANIA not referring to the preliminary contracts), the beginning of the withdrawal period is regulated as in the Directive. Alternatively in Bulgarian law, the period starts with the end of the precontract. Many member states do not refer to the signing of the contract but to the conclusion of the contract. They are: the CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, ITALY, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, PORTUGAL, SLOVAKIA, SLOVENIA and the UNITED KINGDOM. In BELGIUM and SWEDEN, the period begins the day after the signature of the contract by both parties. In FRENCH law, the 10 day period starts when the purchaser sends the accepted offer to the professional. In addition to that, France attempts to improve the protection of the consumer by requiring that the offer should be maintained for at least seven days (ConsC art. L. 121-63). However, this provision just regulates the period during which the vendor is bound by the offer (Cf. Calais-Auloy, Steinmetz, Droit de la Consommantion, no. 483) The consumer is not prevented from accepting the offer before the seven day period expires. In AUSTRIA, GERMANY, GREECE, ESTONIA, HUNGARY, the NETHERLANDS and POLAND, the withdrawal period starts running from the day when the contract document is delivered to the purchaser. In Germany, the period does not start running before the vendor additionally has informed the purchaser on the right of withdrawal and provided some further information (cf. BGB-InfoV § 2). These provisions improve the position of the consumer and are therefore in accordance with the Directive.

4. Only some member states have seen the necessity to include an explicit provision on the signature of a binding preliminary contract in their national law, e.g. BULGARIA, CYPRUS, GREECE, HUNGARY, IRELAND, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, ROMANIA and SLOVENIA.

II. Reimbursement of expenses

5. Art. 5(3) and (4) of Directive 94/47/EC state what costs the consumer who exercises the right to withdraw has to bear. According to art. 5(3) of Directive 94/47/EC, the purchaser may, where he or she exercises the right of withdrawal provided for in the 1st indent of paragraph (1), be required to defray, where appropriate, only those expenses which, in accordance with national law, are incurred as a result of the conclusion of and withdrawal from the contract and which correspond to legal formalities which must be completed before the end of the period referred to in the 1st indent of art. 5(1) of Directive 94/47/EC (the 10 calendar day period). Such expenses must be expressly mentioned in the contract. According to art. 5(4) of Directive 94/47/EC, the purchaser is not required to make any defrayal where he or she exercises the right of cancellation provided for in the 2nd indent of paragraph 1 (the case of missing information).

6. Member States like BULGARIA, the CZECH REPUBLIC, GREECE, LUXEMBOURG, ROMANIA and SWEDEN have transposed art. 5(3) of Directive 94/47/EC by using nearly exactly the Directive's wording. Furthermore, GREECE has stated that the costs must not exceed 3 % of the purchase price (Timeshare Act art. 4(3)). A remarkable number of Member States has increased the consumer protection level by ruling that no costs and damages can be charged to the consumer, e.g. BELGIUM (Timeshare Act art. 9(2) sent. 3), CYPRUS (Timeshare Act art. 10), DENMARK (Timeshare Act art. 10), the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 48c(3)), PORTUGAL (Timeshare Act art. 16(1)), SPAIN (Timeshare Act art. 10(1) sent. 3) and the UNITED KINGDOM (Timeshare Act 1992 s. 5(8). The ITALIAN (ConsC art. 73(1)), HUNGARIAN (Timeshare Act art. 10(2)), POLISH (Timeshare Act art. 7(2)) and SLOVENIAN (ConsProtA § 60c(3)) laws allow only the costs of entering into the contract to be imposed on the purchaser, but not the costs of withdrawal.

7. Contrary to these countries, in SLOVAKIA (CC § 59(3) sent. 1), the vendor can only request reimbursement of "demonstrably expended unavoidable costs connected with withdrawal from the contract". Some Member States have specified which costs the purchaser has to defray, e.g. AUSTRIA (Timeshare Act § 6(4): the costs of a notarisation or necessary translation of the contract and the duties and taxes that result from agreeing on the contract, if the purchaser has been informed of this possibility in the contract), ESTONIA (LOA § 383(5): the costs for notarisation and attestation of the contract), FINLAND (ConsProtA art. 10(14): costs that must be paid before the end of the cooling-off period and because of formal requirements "or are otherwise of a public nature"), GERMANY (CC § 485(5) sent. 1 and 2: the costs for a necessary notarisation of the contract) and HUNGARY (Timeshare Act art. 10(2): costs for preparation and translation of the contract). In Austria, Germany, Hungary and SLOVENIA (ConsProtA art. 60c(3)), the law explicitly states that the vendor cannot demand rent for the use of the immovable property.

8. In IRELAND and MALTA, this provision has not been transposed. In Malta, the intention was to maintain the more favourable rights the purchaser has under the general rules.

9. Art. 5(4) of Directive 94/47/EC, which makes an exception from the purchaser's obligation to reimburse expenses, has been transposed in a substantially equivalent way by the following Member States: AUSTRIA, BULGARIA, the CZECH REPUBLIC, GREECE, IRELAND, ITALY, LUXEMBOURG, POLAND, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA, SPAIN and SWEDEN. In GERMAN (CC § 485(5) sent. 3) and HUNGARIAN (Timeshare Act art. 10(3)) law, it is additionally stated that the consumer can claim damages from the vendor. In BELGIUM, CYPRUS, DENMARK, LITHUANIA, MALTA and the NETHERLANDS, the general rule on costs for every case of withdrawal is applicable (see above). In PORTUGAL (Timeshare Act art. 16(7)) and the UNITED KINGDOM (Timeshare Act 1992 s. 5(8)(a)), the Directive's provision is transposed indirectly, as all sums paid by the consumer must be refunded by the vendor. Thus, in consequence, no costs are left with the consumer. In SLOVENIA, the provision is not explicitly transposed, but can be deducted from the general provision (ConsProtA § 60c(3), (2)). According to the LATVIAN regulation, the consumer need not pay any costs except those for returning the goods to the vendor (ConsProtA art. 12 (1) and (4)). In FINLAND, the provision, which also transposes Art. 5(3) of the Directive, applies. According to ConsProtA art. 10(14), the costs which must be paid before the end of the cooling-off period are imposed on the consumer. In FRANCE, the provision is not specifically transposed, but as the contract is void anyway (cf. ConsC art. L. 121-76 and L. 121-61), the result should be the same.

III. Prohibition of advance payments

10. According to art. 6 of Directive 94/47/EC, the Member States must make provision in their legislation to prohibit any advance payments by a purchaser before the end of the period during which he or she may exercise the right of withdrawal. It is debated whether the prohibition on advance payments should only apply during the initial ten day withdrawal period, or also during the prolonged withdrawal period (three months plus 10 days period provided for in art. 5(1) 2nd and 3rd of Directive 94/47/EC). Since the withdrawal period is prolonged because the business failed to provide certain information, it is preferable to hold that such prohibition should be extended accordingly. This interpretation is in line with the Proposal for a revision of the Timeshare Directive (COM(2007) 303 final), which contains a clarification on this issue. In addition, the prohibition of advance "payments" also prohibits the provision of guarantees, reservation of money on a credit card, explicit acknowledgement of debt or any other consideration to the business (cf. Draft Art. 6(1)). It goes without saying that, if any advance payments have been made by the consumer, the vendor has to return them. The Timeshare Directive does not contain any provisions dealing with this matter but states in its art. 10 that the Member States shall enact provisions for the "consequences of non-compliance with this Directive."

11. All Member States have transposed the prohibition of advance payments provided in Art. 6 of Directive 94/47/EC. In BELGIUM (Timeshare Act art. 9(3)), FINLAND, FRANCE (ConsC art. L. 121-66) and PORTUGAL (Timeshare Act arts. 53 and 14), the prohibition only applies to the regular period of withdrawal (which is 15 days in BELGIUM and 10 days in the other countries mentioned), but not to the longer periods (e.g. three months plus X days) in the case of non-compliance with information duties. According to the wording of the ESTONIAN regulation (LOA § 385), payments must not be received within ten days after the submission of the signed contract to the consumer. In SLOVENIAN law, any contract clause stipulating that the consumer must pay a partial amount of the price or costs before the expiry of the cancellation period (usually 15 days) is void (CC art. 60c(3) sent. 1, and art. 45d). In SWEDEN, advance payments are prohibited during the normal period of withdrawal and in the time until a surety is provided in the case of property still under construction (Timeshare Act art. 13(1)).

12. In CYPRUS (Timeshare Act art. 11), the CZECH REPUBLIC (CC art. 61), DENMARK (Timeshare Act art. 12), GREECE (Timeshare Act art. 5), HUNGARY (Timeshare Act art. 11(1)), IRELAND (European Communities Reg. 1997 and 2000 reg. 10(2)), ITALY (ConsC art. 74), MALTA (Timeshare Act art. 10(1)), the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 7:48d), SLOVAKIA (CC § 57(b)), SPAIN (Timeshare Act art. 11) and the UNITED KINGDOM (Timeshare Act 1992 s. 5B(1)), payments are prohibited for the duration of the normal and of the prolonged period of withdrawal in the case of missing information, which can be up to three months and 10 days.

13. In a number of Member States the transposition laws just read "withdrawal period", not specifying whether the normal or the prolonged period is meant. This applies to AUSTRIA (Timeshare Act § 7(1)), BULGARIA (ConsProtA art. 156), LUXEMBOURG (Timeshare Act art. 10(6)), LATVIA (ConsProtA art. 11(3)), POLAND (Timeshare Act art. 8(1)), and SLOVENIA (ConsProtA § 60č). It is assumed that this has to be interpreted in line with the Directive and therefore means for the full duration of the withdrawal period, even if prolonged. The same applies to ROMANIA (Timeshare Act art. 7) where clauses which require advance payments by the purchaser before the end of the withdrawal period are void.

14. In LITHUANIA (ConsProtA art. 22(5) sent. 1) and GERMANY (CC § 486), the prohibition also applies within the whole period of withdrawal, which can, in the case of missing information, be up to 4 months in Lithuania and up to 6 months in Germany. In GREECE, the prohibition of advance payments does not apply to the costs of the contract, the costs of withdrawal and the cost of acts which have to take place within the cooling-off period of ten days (which may be a maximum 3 % of the agreed price). In SPAIN, the parties can make appropriate agreements to guarantee the payment. These must not be contrary to the prohibition of advance payments and must not mean a direct or indirect compensation for the vendor in case of withdrawal (Timeshare Act art. 11).

15. With regard to the refund of sums paid, many Member States rely on their general rules (e.g. BULGARIA, GERMANY, where the refund has to be made immediately). Others have specific rules, for instance, LITHUANIA (refund within a period of ten days) or SLOVENIA (ConsProtA § 60c(3) sent. 1, § 43d). In some Member States, the obligation to return the amount, which has already been paid, is aggravated. In AUSTRIA, the vendor is obliged to pay interest on the sum amounting to 6 percentage points above the base rate, which means a total of about 8 % at the moment (Timeshare Act § 7(1)). In HUNGARY, the vendor has to pay additional default interest, too (Timeshare Act art. 11(2)). The interest on the sums starts with the day of their payment. In SPAIN, the vendor is obliged to return double the amount of the sum which the consumer has paid in advance (Timeshare Act art. 11(2)). In addition, the consumer is given a period of three months within which he or she can choose to terminate the relationship or claim performance.

16. Some Member States have provided for fines if the vendor infringes the prohibition on demanding and receiving any advanced payment. In SWEDEN (Timeshare Act art. 13(2)), a person is liable to a fine in case of a deliberate infringement of the prohibition. In AUSTRIA, the obligation to pay the interest described above is combined with a fine (for an administrative offence) of up to € 7 260 (Timeshare Act § 13(2)). In FRANCE, ConsC art. L. 121-71 states that if the seller asks for or receives any payment before the 10 day withdrawal period ends, the seller will have to pay a fine of € 30 000. GREECE provides for fines between € 1 467 and € 58 694 and other public law sanctions. In PORTUGAL, the fine is between ca. € 10 000 and ca. € 100 000 (Timeshare Act art. 54(1), art. 55). Under ITALIAN law, a penalty between € 500 and € 3 000 is foreseen. In case of repeated infringements an additional administrative penalty or a suspension of pursuit of business between 15 days and three months can be imposed (ConsC art. 81). In the UNITED KINGDOM (Timeshare Act 1992 s. 5B(2)), the infringement constitutes a criminal offence. It is the same in IRELAND (European of the Communities Reg. 1997 and 2000 reg. 16(1), (2)), where the fine amounts to € 1 904,61 (1500 pounds). In MALTA, too, any violation of the prohibition an offence (Timeshare Act art. 10(1) and (2)). Similar provisions can be found in the laws of LUXEMBOURG (Timeshare Act art. 12), BELGIUM (Timeshare Act art. 17), and CYPRUS (Timeshare Act art. 18(2)).

CHAPTER 6: REPRESENTATION

II.–6:101: Scope

(1) This Chapter applies to the external relationships created by acts of representation – that is to say, the relationships between:

(a) the principal and the third party; and
(b) the representative and the third party.

(2) It applies also to situations where a person purports to be a representative without actually being a representative.

(3) It does not apply to the internal relationship between the representative and the principal.

COMMENTS

A. General

This chapter deals mainly with the effect of an act done by a representative, or a person purporting to be a representative, on the legal position of the principal or purported principal in relation to the third party. However, some Articles deal with the effect of an act of representation or purported representation on the legal position of the representative or purported representative in relation to a third party.

In general the Articles of this Chapter reflect the principles that are to be found in the large majority of laws of the Member States, even if the ways of expressing these principles differ from law to law. Where the Chapter adopts an approach that is not known in all the laws (for example, some do not apply the same rules to representation where the authority is granted by a contract or other juridical act and where it is given by law (see II.–6:103 (Authorisation)), this will be noted.

B. Restrictions on scope

The general restrictions on the intended scope of the model rules apply to this Chapter. So the rules on the authority of representatives in this Chapter are not intended to be used, or used without modification or supplementation, in relation to (1) representatives appointed by public or judicial authorities to perform public law functions (2) those, such as parents, tutors or guardians, acting as the legal representatives of children or of adults with incapacity (3) executors of deceased persons. (See I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)). Another important restriction in that paragraph relates to “the creation, capacity, internal organisation, regulation or dissolution of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate”. It follows from this that the authority of directors and other company officers in the internal affairs of a company are not intended to be covered by the present Chapter. However, the authority of representatives of a company in dealings with the outside world is intended to be covered and it is important that it should be covered because this is one of the most important practical applications of the rules on the authority of representatives. Companies can engage in juridical acts only through representatives.

C. Internal relationship not covered

The chapter does not govern the internal relationship between the principal and the representative. That is governed by later Books.

D. Application of general rules on contracts and other juridical acts

The Chapter does not deal with the way in which a principal may grant authority. That will be by a contract or unilateral juridical act, very often the latter. The general rules on contracts and other juridical acts apply, including the rules on formation, interpretation and grounds of invalidity. The general rules are also relevant in relation to contracts concluded, or acts done, by the representative on behalf of the principal.

NOTES

I. Internal and external relations not clearly distinguished

1. Following the Roman tradition of mandate, the older European codifications (FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs arts. 1984-2010; See on Belgium: Wéry, Le mandat, no. 88; Tilleman, Lastgeving, 1997; SPAIN: CC arts. 1709-1739; AUSTRIA: CC §§ 1002-1034) do not distinguish between the internal relationship between representative and principal on the one hand and the external relationship between principal and third party on the other hand. This separation has, however, been developed in these countries by legal writers.

2. Under ENGLISH and IRISH LAW, treatments of the law of agency cover the relations both between principal and third party and between principal and agent. This is also so for SCOTTISH law see SME Reissue, 'Agency and Mandate' (Macgregor).

II. Internal and external relations distinguished

3. By contrast, several Civil Codes or special legislation enacted since the start of the 20th century do make a distinction between the external and the internal relationship. The rules on representation govern the relationship between principal and third party whereas the internal relationship between principal and representative is regulated by contract law in general. ITALY, for example, distinguishes expressly between mandate as a type of specific contract (CC arts. 1703-1730) and representation as a category of the general law of obligations (CC arts. 1387-1400). Similar distinctions are made by other Codes (GERMANY: CC §§ 164-181 [representation], 662-676 [mandate]; ESTONIA: GPCCA §§ 115-131 [representation], LOA §§ 619-634 [mandate]; GREECE: CC arts. 211-235 [representation], 713-729 [mandate]; THE NETHERLANDS: CC arts. 3:60 - 3:67 [representation], 7:400-7:427 [mandate]; PORTUGAL: CC arts. 258-269 [representation], 1157-1184 [mandate]); POLAND CC: arts. 95-109[9] [representation], 734-751 [mandate]; SLOVENIA: LOA §§ 69-81 [representation], 766-787 [mandate]; BULGARIAN LOA arts. 36-43 [representation] and arts. 280-292 [mandate]; and the HUNGARIAN CC §§ 219-225 [representation], CC §§ 474-483 [mandate]. The NORDIC Contract Acts of DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN of 1915-1917 deal in their chapters 2 only with the external relation between principal and third party. Italy (CC arts. 1704-1705) and PORTUGAL (CC arts. 1178, 1180) distinguish between the mandates with and without power of representation. The CZECH CC § 23 provides that representation arises on the basis of an agreement on authorisation, which clearly indicates the distinction between the representation and the mandate (further see Supreme Court Odon 28/95). Most other countries also regard direct representation as a general category of private law or at least of patrimonial law. In SLOVAKIA direct representation is regulated in CC §§ 22-33 as an external relationship. The internal relationship is regulated by the rules on the contract of mandate (CC § 724-736, Ccom §§ 566-576).

III. Representatives with limited authority

4. A representative normally has the power to bind the principal to a contract with the third party, but there are also classes of representatives whose authority is often more limited. For example Handelsvertreter often have authority only to solicit offers, and not to sell.

IV. Convention on Agency in International Sale of Goods

5. The scope of the Unidroit Convention on Agency in the International Sale of Goods, concluded in Geneva on 17 February 1983 (cited here: Geneva Convention on Agency), is confined to the external relationship between the principal and the representative on the one hand and the third party on the other (art. 1(3)). The Convention has, however, not (yet) entered into force; it has been signed and ratified by three Member States of the European Union (France, Italy, and the Netherlands).

V. Authority based on contract and based on law

6. In some jurisdictions the rules on representation only apply to authority based upon contract (DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN: Contract Acts §§ 10-27). Similarly the Geneva Convention on Agency is not applicable in a number of cases where the agency arises from statutory or judicial authorisation (art. 3(1)(d)). In other jurisdictions a statutory power of representation is governed by the same rules as the authority of a representative conferred by contract (e.g. GERMANY: CC § 164; GREECE: CC art. 211; ITALY: CC art. 1387; DUTCH: CC arts. 3:78-3:79; also in SLOVAKIA: CC §§ 22-33; ESTONIA: GPCCA § 117(2); BULGARIA: LOA art. 36; and SLOVENIA: LOA §§ 69-73. In POLISH law there is a presumption that a person active on premises of an enterprise whose purpose is to serve the public is authorised to perform such legal transactions as are usually concluded with persons using the enterprise's services (CC art. 97).

7. In FRANCE, the rules governing representation vary according to the sources of the representation power and especially according to the fact that the representation is perfect (the representative is "transparent") or imperfect (the representative acting on behalf of the principal hides that fact from the third party).

8. In AUSTRIA authority is normally granted by a juridical act. However, there are situations where the existence of authority is derived from a certain situation which was created earlier by the principal, e.g. in the case of a shop-assistant who is assumed to have the necessary powers to conclude contracts for the principal if that is normally done in that type of business (see CC §§ 1017 ff and Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 205 et seq.).

II.–6:102: Definitions

(1) A "representative" is a person who has authority to affect directly the legal position of another person, the principal, in relation to a third party by acting on behalf of the principal.

(2) The "authority" of a representative is the power to affect the principal's legal position.

(3) The "authorisation" of the representative is the granting or maintaining of the authority.

(4) "Acting without authority" includes acting beyond the scope of the authority granted.

(5) A "third party", in this Chapter, includes the representative who, when acting for the principal, also acts in a personal capacity as the other party to the transaction.

COMMENTS

The term "representative" is used rather than "agent" in order to focus more sharply on the situation where one person represents the other in legal transactions or the doing of juridical acts. No term is ideal because ordinary language is rather loose. It is common for the word "agent" to be used of people who have no authority to affect the principal's legal position. A detective agent, for example, might be employed to make enquiries about something or locate a missing person but might have no power to conclude contracts or do other juridical acts on behalf of the principal. An estate agent might be authorised to search for a suitable property but might have no authority to make an offer for it on behalf of the principal. It is true that the word "representative" is also often used in ordinary language to refer to those who speak for others but do not have power to affect their legal relations. However, "representative" seems closer to the desired meaning than "agent". The important point is that the term used has to be defined so that it is clear what it means in the present context. This is the purpose of paragraph (1).

So far as the definition is concerned a choice has to be made between defining a "representative" as a person who actually is authorised to affect the legal relations of another person (the principal) and defining a "representative" as a person who is or purports to be so authorised. The first alternative looks at the position from the point of view of the principal: the second more from the point of view of the third party. Either definition can be made to work but the choice affects the drafting of subsequent Articles. One slight advantage of including the person who purports to be authorised is that this makes it easier to talk later of representatives acting without authority. On the other hand using the word "representative" to cover a person who does not have authority would have the consequence that "authorised representative" would frequently have to be used elsewhere in the text if the intention was to cover only those who could directly affect the principal's legal position. This latter consideration seems more important than a slight drafting convenience in the present Chapter. So "representative" is defined here as a person who has authority to affect the legal position of another person (the principal) in relation to a third party. II.–6:103 (Authorisation) makes it clear that the authority need not be derived from an express or tacit grant of authority by the principal. It may also be conferred by law.

The definition of "representative" is functional and applies whatever name is given to the representative.

The words “affect directly the legal position of the principal” are used rather than some shorter expression such as “bind the principal” because the word “bind” might be thought to refer only to the process of creating an obligation for the principal. The representative’s acts may, however, acquire a right for the principal or liberate the principal from an obligation or simply fulfil a requirement which the principal has to fulfil before taking some other legal step. The representative’s act may be, for example, the giving or receipt on behalf of the principal of a notice which has a legal effect. The general effect of representation is that the act of the representative is attributed to the principal as if done by the principal and therefore affects the principal’s legal position just as an act by the principal in person would have done. The word “directly” is included so as to exclude agents acting under mandates for indirect representation – such as commission agents employed to conclude transactions in their own name but with the expectation that the principal will take them over. Such agents have no authority to bind the principal directly but may in certain circumstances affect the principal’s legal position indirectly.

Paragraphs (2) and (3) deal with the distinction between the “authority” of the representative (that is to say, the power to affect the principal’s legal position by means of a juridical act) and the “authorisation” of the representative (that is to say, the granting of the authority or the process by which the representative obtains and continues to have authority).

Paragraph (4) is probably not necessary because in relation to any particular juridical act a person acting as a representative will either have authority to do it or will not. One situation where the person will not have authority is where the act is beyond the scope of the authority granted by the principal or the law. However, the paragraph may help to remove any doubts or hesitations on this point.

Paragraph (5) is necessary because there are occasions when a representative acting for the principal contracts with himself or herself acting in a personal capacity and there is a need for rules to cover that situation. There may also be cases where the representative, acting for the principal, concludes a contract with himself or herself acting as representative for another principal. However, no special provision is needed for this second type of case because the second principal is already in law the third party.

II.–6:103: Authorisation

(1) The authority of a representative may be granted by the principal or by the law.

(2) The principal's authorisation may be express or implied.

(3) If a person causes a third party reasonably and in good faith to believe that the person has authorised a representative to perform certain acts, the person is treated as a principal who has so authorised the apparent representative.

COMMENTS

A. How representative can obtain authority

This Article sets out the ways in which a representative may obtain authority. Essentially authority may be derived from the principal or from the law.

B. Express or implied grant of authority by principal

A representative's authority may be granted by the principal expressly or impliedly.

In giving express authority to the representative, no particular form needs to be observed. It is important that this should be the general rule because in ordinary life there are many informal situations where, for example, one private individual asks another to buy something for him or her or to conclude on his or her behalf some service contract such as one for the dry cleaning of clothes or the development of photographs. In more formal situations, however, a written grant of authority will almost invariably be regarded as essential for the protection of all the parties involved. Frequently, but not necessarily, the authorisation of the representative will be communicated by the principal to others.

Express authority may be granted by using, or making reference to, a standard form listing the powers of representative of a certain type. The use of such standard forms has many advantages for all the parties involved. The Conférence des Notariats de l'Union Européenne (CNUE) has published a collection of such standard forms for different situations and plans to publish a new collection.

In many situations there is no express grant of authority but the principal intends the representative to have authority and impliedly grants it, often by placing an employee in a position where the granting of authority must be implied from the circumstances. This way of granting authority plays an important role in practice.

> Illustration
> A store which employs a salesperson in its sales department impliedly authorises that person to transact any business relating to the merchandise offered for sale and to bind the shop by any such transaction.

An implied authority may well be subject to express limitations by the principal; such express limitations may even indicate the authority which is otherwise implied.

Usages and practices are often very important in deciding whether a principal has impliedly granted authority to a representative. The appointment of a person as an agent of a certain type may by usage, or by practices established between the parties, confer on that agent authority to act as the principal's representative in relation to certain types of legal transaction.

C. Authority granted by law

The representative may derive authority from a rule of law. For example, directors of a company may have authority by law to bind the company or otherwise affect its legal relations. Partners may have a similar authority to act as representatives of the partnership. National laws frequently grant powers of representation to persons in certain positions or situations. Some of the rules of this Chapter can themselves be regarded as conferring authority even if they do not always do so in so many words. For example, paragraph (3) of this Article in effect confers authority based on the appearance of things. The Article on ratification by the principal in effect confers authority retrospectively once ratification occurs. The Article on the effect of termination of authorisation confers authority by law to do certain things even after the principal has recalled the representative's authorisation.

It is important that the rules of this Chapter should apply to representatives who are granted their authority by a rule of law (provided the situations are within the intended scope of the model rules). In these cases the law (e.g. a Company Law) often merely deals with the grant of authority for the legal representatives of the company, but impliedly leaves the consequences of the exercise of the authority to the general rules on representation. This gap can and should be filled by the general rules of this Chapter on representation except in so far as the respective law contains specific restrictions or other qualifications.

D. "Apparent" authority

A representative's authority is not necessarily based on statements or acts by which the principal intended to grant authority. Even without the principal's express or implied intention, a representative's authority may come into being by law if the principal has induced a third party reasonably and in good faith to believe that the representative has been granted authority to represent the principal. This type of authority is called, perhaps slightly misleadingly, "apparent" authority because it is authority based on the appearance of things.

A representative who has this type of authority will have power to bind the principal as much as if the principal had expressly granted the representative authority. This rule is designed to protect the third party who has relied, reasonably and in good faith, upon the impression that the principal had in fact granted authority.

On the other hand, the possibly countervailing interest of the principal not to be bound by the representative's act also deserves to be taken into account. Paragraph (3) balances these two interests by requiring that the person who is treated as a principal must have caused the third party reasonably and in good faith to believe that the person had granted the representative authority to perform the relevant acts.

A specific situation in which an apparent authority may arise is the case where authorisation is recalled by the principal but this is not made known to third parties. Because of its importance, this situation is specifically regulated by a later Article (II.–6:112 (Effect of ending or restriction of authorisation)).

It will be noted that paragraph (3) goes further than saying that the principal is precluded from invoking against the third party the representative's lack of authority. The representative actually has authority no matter who invokes the fact that there was no express or implied grant of authority by the principal.

The provision in paragraph (3) may be supplemented by provisions of national or European law dealing with particular situations. For example Article 8 of the First Company Directive 68/151/EEC provides that completion of the formalities of disclosure of the particulars concerning the persons who, as an organ of the company, are authorised to represent it shall constitute a bar to any irregularity in their appointment being relied upon as against third parties unless the company proves that such third parties had knowledge thereof. See also EC Directive 89/666/EEC.

NOTES

I. Express and implied authority

1. In most European Member States, the representative's authority generally may be granted not only expressly but also impliedly (SPAIN: CC art. 1710(1); PORTUGAL: STJ 8 February 1979, Revista de legislação e jurisprudencia 112, p. 219; FRANCE: Benabent no. 638; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:61(1); GERMANY: Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB (2004), § 167 no. 13; BULGARIA (no form generally required – LOA art. 37, see also Takoff, Dobrovolno predstavitelstvo, 3.3); AUSTRIA: Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I[3], § 1002 nos. 43 et seq., see also AUSTRIA: CC § 1005 (no form) and § 863; DENMARK: see Ussing, Aftaler[3], 299 and Lynge Andersen, 304; ENGLAND: Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], no. 3-003). SCOTLAND SME Reissue, paras. 49-50. The same is true under the Geneva Convention on Agency art. 9(1). It is also a general rule under POLISH law (CC art. 96 in connection with art. 60 § 1) as well as under ESTONIAN law (GPCCA §§ 68(3), 118(1)).
2. Some countries, although they seem to accept the "mandat tacite", distinguish between "acts of administration" and "acts of disposition": a general authority covers only the former but not the latter acts, for which "express" authority should be given (FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 1988; SPAIN: CC art. 1710(1); ITALY: CC art. 1708(2); cf. also NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:62) and SLOVENIA: LOA § 76. In Belgium this distinction has, however, been overruled by the courts (Cass. 3 May 1955, Pas. belge 1955 I 962; Cass. 13 April 1984, Arr.Cass. 1983-84, 1078, Cass. 20 Jan. 2000, Arr.Cass. 2000, 156): it is a mere interpretation rule intended to help the courts in finding the common intention of the parties and they may even conclude that a general authority was in fact intended to cover acts exceeding administration (see Wéry, Le mandat, no. 35; Tilleman, Lastgeving, no. 296). It is also the majority opinion in Belgium that when an "express" authority is required (see CC art. 1988) it means only that the scope of the authority must be defined clearly and precisely and be certain. Writing is therefore not required, but it will help to evidence the authority (see Wéry, Le mandat, no. 30).
3. Formal requirements may limit the implied granting of authority. In some countries the granting of authority must fulfil the formal requirements prescribed for the authorised act (ITALY: CC art. 1392; BULGARIA, LOA art. 37; GREECE: CC art. 217(2); IRELAND: Athy Guardians v. Murphy [1896] 1 I.R. 65, 75 (V.C.);

SLOVENIA: LOA § 75; PORTUGAL: CC art. 262(2); the same is in some cases true if a writing is required for proof of the underlying act, e.g. when granting a mortgage. (FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs arts. 1985(1), 1341). Under ESTONIAN law, the authorisation must be in the same form as the authorised act if the latter is subject to such formal requirements that failure to follow the form would render the transaction void (GPCCA § 118(3)). Under the Geneva Convention on Agency art. 10, as well as in GERMANY and the NORDIC countries, no form is required for the grant of authority (Germany: CC § 167(2), but see Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB (2004), § 167 nos. 18 et seq. for the exceptions to that rule; NORDIC Contract Acts § 10(2)). The same goes for AUSTRIA (see CC § 1005). Under POLISH law, the granting of so-called general authority should be made in writing ad solemnitatem (CC art. 99 §2), and – if a particular form is required for the transaction to be effected by the agent – the grant of authority should be made in that particular form (CC art. 99 § 1). The SLOVAK CC § 31(3) requires that the power of representation must be conferred in writing where an act in law is required to be executed in writing, or if it concerns more than one specific act in law (general power of representation). In CZECH law, implied authority may be granted only to represent the principal in one certain legal act which, furthermore, may not be made in writing; otherwise it is necessary to grant the authority in writing (CC § 31(4)) and the implied authority would mostly be out of the question. See Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 219. This principle does not concern certain special commercial authorities as defined by the law (as e.g. Ccom art. 15)

II. Interpretation of principal's statement

4. As a general rule, the scope of a representative's authority is defined by the principal's statement and its interpretation. According to the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 120(2) sent. 2. rules of objective interpretation apply. Some countries distinguish between general and specific authority, "specific" meaning that only a particular act is authorised or a certain kind of act (FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 1987; ITALY: CC art. 1708; SPAIN: CC art. 1712; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:62). POLISH law (CC art. 98) distinguishes between general authority, specific authority for a certain type of transaction and specific authority for a particular act. The position is the same in SLOVAKIA (CC § 31(3)) and in BULGARIA, although no express legal rule on this matter exists, see Takoff, Dobrovolno predstavitelstvo, 3.5.3-3.5.5. AUSTRIAN law also distinguishes between general and specific authority (CC § 1006) as well as between full and restricted authority (CC § 1007) concerning the concrete acts of the representative. For some transactions (e.g. sales contracts, loans, donations) a general authorisation is not enough unless the type of transaction is specifically defined in the grant of authorisation (§ 1008). Similar rules apply for SLOVENIA: LOA § 76. (excluded from general authority: e.g. suretyship, bill of exchange, settlement, sale or pledge of immovable property).

III. Authority defined by legislation

5. There are also certain types of authority whose scope is defined by statute. The GERMAN, AUSTRIAN, BULGARIAN, DANISH, ESTONIAN, FINNISH, SLOVENIAN, SLOVAK and ITALIAN commercial authority (Prokura) authorises all transactions required in a commercial undertaking, except the selling of real estate (Germany: HGB §§ 48-53; Austria: UGB §§ 48-53); Danish Act on Public Companies, §§ 60-62; Finnish Act on procura no. 130/1979; Italy: CC arts. 2203-2204; CZECH Ccom art. 14; Slovakia Ccom art. 14; ESTONIA: Ccom §§ 16-21); SLOVENIA: Companies Act arts. 33-38, for representation of company in general, see art. 32). Germany, Austria and Italy also provide for another commercial authority with a somewhat narrower statutory scope, i.e. limited to ordinary commercial transactions (Germany: HGB § 54 (Handlungsvollmacht); Estonia: GPCCA § 121; AUSTRIA: UGB §§ 54 ff (Handlungsvollmacht); Italy: CC arts. 2210-2213 (commessi)). The CZECH Ccom art. 15 and CC § 20(2) have something similar – the latter provision extends the authority to represent to employees and members of all legal persons, so it somewhat overreaches the commercial sphere. Contractual limitations upon these types of authority agreed between principal and representative have no effect toward third parties. Similar provisions (CC arts. 109^{1}-109^{9}) refer to "prokura" (commercial authority) under POLISH law – see CC art. 109^{1} § 2 on the effect of contractual limitations. The SLOVAK regulation of legal entities is found in the Ccom provisions on entrepreneurs' conduct (arts. 13-16). These state that a person entrusted to carry out certain tasks in the operation of the enterprise is considered authorised (art. 15). In BULGARIA, the statutory representatives of commercial companies (limited liability and share-holders companies) – as in all the other member states of the European Union – have a strictly defined scope of authority which cannot be extended or restricted.

IV. Apparent authority

6. The idea of apparent authority is almost nowhere laid down in legislation except in the Geneva Convention on Agency art. 14(2) and in the DUTCH CC art. 3:61(2) (cf. for PORTUGAL the special provision of Decree-Law no. 278/86 on commercial agents art. 23; cf. P.M. Pinto, Aparencia). The ESTONIAN GPCCA § 118(2) provides that if the statement or conduct of a person acting as a representative lead another person to reasonably believe that the person is validly authorised, and the principal knows or ought to know that the person is acting as a representative on behalf of the principal and the principal tolerates such activities, the principal is deemed to have authorised the person. This principle is supported by the presumption that the transaction is entered into on behalf of the person engaged in economic or professional activity if a transaction is entered into by an employee or by any other person for whom that person is responsible, and the transaction is related to such economic or professional activity (GPCCA § 116(2)). The idea is very well known in ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law: see Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], nos. 8-013 - 8-049 and SME Reissue, paras. 75-83 (ostensible authority). It is also accepted by BELGIAN and ITALIAN courts (Belgium: Cass. 20 June 1988, Pas. belge 1988, 1258, RW 1989/90, 1425; Cass. 20 Jan. 2000, Arr.Cass. 2000, 163, Pas. belge 2000, 163; Cass. 25 June 2004, RGDC/TBBR 2004, 457; Italy: Cass. 12 January 2006, no. 408, Guida al Diritto 2006, fasc. 11, 86; Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 156); and see the FRENCH theory of mandat apparent, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 177. This theory necessitates that all believe that the principal had a legitimate power to act and this belief is legitimate only if third parties were, in the circumstances, allowed not to check that these powers were existing. See in LUXEMBOURG, Cass. 13 January 1998, 30, 465. Its essential elements are defined as being a declaration or conduct of the "principal" which induces a reasonable inference in the third person that a sufficient authority has been granted (for IRELAND: Barrett v. Irvine [1907] 2 IR 462 (KB) and Allied Pharmaceutical Distributors Ltd. v. John F. Walsh [1991] 2 IR 8 at 15 and 17 (HCt)). GERMAN law distinguishes between two types of apparent authority: authority by knowingly tolerating the representative's conduct (Duldungsvollmacht), cf. BGH 22 October 1996, NJW 1997, 312, 314) and authority by causing a misconception about the representative's authorization (Anscheinsvollmacht) (Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB

(2004), § 167 nos. 28 et seq.). This distinction has been adopted by some writers in SWEDEN (Grönfors, Ställningsfullmakt 79-102, 164-194; Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 68. In Sweden, it is controversial whether a principal can be bound contractually due to conduct of the second kind.) In DANISH law both types of apparent authority are known, see on the latter type UfR1969 380 H. In AUSTRIA the Anscheinsvollmacht is derived by analogy from specific provisions in the CC (§§ 1027 ff): apparent authority is drawn from a former act or creation of a situation and therefore a certain ostensible existence of a legal situation; the term Duldungsvollmacht has a twofold meaning: tolerating certain acts of representation might create a situation that justifies the existence of the aforementioned apparent authority; however, it may also constitute either an implied grant of authorisation or the ratification of authority (see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 205 et seq.). In SLOVENIA the concept is recognised, the rules applying primarily to commercial contracts; see Usages for trading with goods No. 21 and Cigoj: Komentar I, pp. 328-329). In BULGARIA the concept is recognised by doctrine (Takoff, Dobrovolno predstavitelstvo, 3.3.2.1-3.3.2.3), but no related court decisions can be adduced.

7. In several countries specific situations are circumscribed by statute in which an authority is deemed to be present. Regardless of the principal's true intentions the principal may then be bound by the representative's acts. Under the NORDIC Contract Acts (§ 10(2)) everyone in the typical position of a representative is supposed to be authorised. The clerk in a shop or an open warehouse may be treated as being authorised to make ordinary sales and receive payments (GERMANY: HGB § 56. AUSTRIA: UGB § 56 and CC §§ 1027-1031 gives supplementary detailed rules. Similarly in POLISH law: CC art. 97 and in ESTONIAN law: GPCCA § 121(2)); as well as in SLOVENIAN law, LOA §§ 80 and 81). In ENGLISH and IRISH law, but by case law not statute, the appointment of a person to a particular position normally gives rise to apparent authority to do what a person in that position would normally be empowered to do, e.g. Waugh v. HB Clifford & Sons Ltd [1982] Ch 374, CA, unless the third party knows that the person does not have the usual authority. In SLOVAKIA, conduct of a person within an entrepreneur's establishment may give rise to authority unless the third party knows that the person does not have the usual authority. (Ccom art. 16)

8. Relying on arts. 1734 and 1738 of the SPANISH CC, which provide for particular cases, the Spanish Supreme Court has decided that the principal may be bound by the representative's act, even in absence of a grant of authority, if the principal, by conduct or omission creates in third bona fide parties the confidence that they may rely on the representative's authority. (Supreme Court Judgments 18 September 1987, RAJ (1987) 6067, 22 June 1989, RAJ (1989), 4776, 1 March 1990, RAJ (1990) 1656.

9. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 219(1) it is possible to conclude a contract or do other juridical acts through another person (representative), unless the law provides otherwise of a particular kind of act. Persons with limited capacity can represent competent persons. The person who is represented becomes debtor or creditor on the basis of the representative's actions. § 220(1) Employees or members of a legal person that is regularly engaged in buying or selling goods or providing other services who work in the customer area of the legal person are regarded as representatives of that legal person in concluding and performing the contracts that are customary in that place, unless otherwise provided by legal regulation or otherwise indicated by the circumstances. Restrictions on the scope of authority of an employee or member have no effect on third persons, unless the third person is or could have been aware of the restrictions. These provisions also apply to the employees of private persons. The CC

§ 222 states that in addition to representation that is based on the law, official orders, or statutes; the right to represent may be established by a statement (power of attorney) addressed to the representative, the other party, or the authority involved. The CC § 223 has the following rules on powers of attorney. A power of attorney is subject to the same formal requirements as prescribed by legal regulation for contracts to be concluded on the basis of the power of attorney. A general power of attorney is valid unless it is in writing. A power of attorney remains valid until withdrawn, unless otherwise provided; withdrawal is effective in relation to a third party who is in good faith only if the third party has been informed of it. The right of withdrawal cannot be validly waived. A power of attorney ceases to exist with the death of either party.

II.–6:104: Scope of authority

(1) The scope of the representative's authority is determined by the grant.

(2) The representative has authority to perform all incidental acts necessary to achieve the purposes for which the authority was granted.

(3) A representative has authority to delegate authority to another person (the delegate) to do acts on behalf of the principal which it is not reasonable to expect the representative to do personally. The rules of this Chapter apply to acts done by the delegate.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of authority depends on terms of grant

The scope of a representative's authority depends primarily on the terms in which it is granted or conferred. This is confirmed by paragraph (1). In several Member States commercial law statutes provide standardised forms of authority defining exactly the contents and limits of the powers conferred if, for example, an employer decides to grant authority to employees in a certain category.

B. Authority to do incidental acts Paragraph (2) applies only where the grant of authority, or the circumstances of the case, do not indicate the contrary. It deals with one limited matter - namely, the representative's authority to do incidental acts which are necessary to achieve the purposes for which the authority was granted. In the absence of such a provision express grants of authority might have to be excessively detailed so as to cover every possible incidental act which the representative might have to do. Such careful provision may be expected in legally drafted grants of authority but cannot reasonably be expected of informal grants of authority by lay persons acting without legal advice.

C. Delegation of authority

Frequently, a representative cannot reasonably be expected to perform personally the acts or all the acts required and may wish to involve other persons. This may occur, in particular, because of distance from the place where the necessary acts have to be performed or because of the representative's lack of specific competence. In these cases, it may be reasonable for the representative to delegate authority to do the acts, and although not all the laws permit delegation (or do so only in certain cases), this Chapter provides for it.

Delegation of authority must be distinguished from delegation of performance – where a debtor consents to the obligation being performed by someone else. Delegation of authority relates not to the performance of an obligation but to the actual doing of a juridical act for the principal

The representative may have express authority to delegate. Indeed it is to be recommended that the principal clarify expressly whether or not the representative is so authorised. In order to clarify a situation where the principal has failed to do so, paragraph (3) establishes a default rule which will apply unless otherwise provided in the grant or indicated by the circumstances.

Illustration

An old lady P living in a small European town has given a general power to her representative A living in the same town. She directs A to invest a substantial sum of money by acquiring an apartment house in New York. A has power under this Article to appoint a qualified person in New York to do the necessary juridical acts.

The person to whom the authority is delegated ("the delegate") acts on behalf of the principal. All the provisions of this chapter apply to the acts done by that person. This rule is laid down by the second sentence of paragraph (3).

The delegate's authority is derived directly from the representative and only indirectly from the principal. The representative cannot delegate more authority than the representative already has. It follows that, for the delegate to effect the same consequences that are achieved by the acts of the representative, the acts of the delegate must be within both the delegated authority and that of the representative. If the acts of the delegate are to affect the legal position of the principal directly it is also necessary that the delegate should act in the name of the principal or otherwise in such a way as to indicate an intention to affect directly the legal position of the principal.

Under these conditions the acts of the delegate have the same effects as if these acts had been done by the representative. They bind the principal and the third party directly, while the representative is not bound.

The appointment of a delegate must be distinguished from the replacement of the original representative by a new representative. The new representative assumes (usually) the same position as the predecessor. The acts of the new representative are fully subject to the rules of this chapter; no special rule is required to express this idea.

NOTES

I. Authority to do incidental acts

1. The general formula of paragraph (2) on the scope of a representative's authority corresponds to the Geneva Convention on Agency art. 9(2). Similar provisions can be found in ITALY (CC art. 1708), in PORTUGAL (CC art. 1159(2), Ccom. arts. 233, 249) and in ENGLAND: Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], no. 3-003. For AUSTRIA see CC § 1009. The ESTONIAN GPCCA § 121(2) creates a similar presumption for a representative who sells goods or provides services at the request of another person in the economic or professional activities of that person. The idea is supported by the rules of objective interpretation of the grant of authority (GPCCA § 120(2)).

II. General rule against delegation

2. Some European countries have statutory provisions on the delegation of authority: SPAIN: CC arts. 1721 ff; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:64; AUSTRIA: CC § 1010; BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 1994; ITALY: CC art. 1717; GREECE: CC arts. 715-716; POLAND: CC art. 1061; PORTUGAL: CC art. 264; SLOVAKIA: CC §§ 24, 33a; SLOVENIA LOA § 71 and Companies Act art. 37. As a general rule, delegation of authority regularly is not allowed. On the other hand, in SPAIN the representative is allowed to appoint a substitute, unless prohibited by the principal (CC art. 1721).

3. The AUSTRIAN CC § 1010 generally decides against delegation. The representative may, however, use an ancillary person for whose actions or omissions the representative is fully liable. In the case of unallowed (full) delegation the representative is liable for the result. If delegation is expressly allowed in the authorisation the representative is only liable for negligence in the process of selecting a delegate (see CC § 1010 and P. Bydlinski in Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger, ABGB, 2nd, ed., § 1010). Special rules of delegation can be found e.g. in RAO (Rechtsanwaltsordnung, the professional rules for counsel) § 14 or BTVG (Bauträgervertragsgesetz) § 13(1), (2).

III. Delegation permitted in certain situations

4. Under GERMAN law the possibility of a delegation (which is strictly separated from substitution and leads to a "sub-authority") in general depends on the interpretation of the authority and there is an implied term that delegation is possible unless there is a reasonable interest of the principal that the representative acts personally, see Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB (2004), § 167 no. 63 (and nos. 64 et seq. to the exceptions). Even though delegation of authority is in most legal orders not allowed in general, certain exceptions from this principle are frequently admitted.

5. In the first place, the principal may expressly allow substitution (AUSTRIA: CC § 1010; BULGARIA, LOA art. 43; PORTUGAL: CC art. 264(1); SLOVAKIA CC § 33a); cf. implicitly BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 1994(1); ITALY: CC art. 1717(1)-(2); GREECE: art. 715; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:64; POLAND CC art. 106 and SLOVENIA, LOA § 71(1)). An implied permission may result from an interpretation of the principal's grant of authority. Under Polish law such permission may derive from the legal relationship constituting the basis of the authority.

6. Also in DENMARK it depends on the circumstances whether the representative has power to delegate authority. If authority is given to a private representative in a personal relationship there is a presumption against such powers; if it is given to a professional delegation is often permitted. An attorney may, for instance, let a colleague in the same firm act for the client see Bryde Andersen Grundlæggende 294.

7. Moreover, certain statutory authorizations may also be found in some countries. Thus the representative may delegate authority if the representative is unable or not authorised by law to perform certain necessary acts and delegation therefore is unavoidable ((AUSTRIA: CC § 1010, see Schwimann (-Apathy), ABGB IV[3], § 1010 no. 4); THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:64 lit. b; GREECE: CC art. 715 and Athens 612/1974, NoB 1974.1077 I; ENGLAND: Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], no. 5-001 lit. b); BULGARIA LOA art. 43; SLOVENIAN LOA § 76(2)) or if the principal has no interest in the transaction in question being carried out by the representative personally (GERMANY: OLG Frankfurt 28 November 1974, VersR 1974, 173; OLG München 30 March 1984, WM 1984, 834; England: Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], no. 5-003). The Netherlands also allows delegation of authority if the agency relates to goods located outside the representative's country of residence (CC art. 3:64 lit. c). Under ESTONIAN law, a right of representation granted by law may be delegated (GPCCA § 119(2)), while the authority granted by the principal may be delegated only if so prescribed by the authorisation (GPCCA § 119(1) sent. 1). However, such right is presumed if authorisation is granted for entry into a transaction which cannot be reasonably expected to be entered into by the representative personally ((GPCCA § 119(1) sent. 2).

IV. Usage

8. The appointment of a subagent may also be justified by usage (ENGLAND: De Bussche v. Alt (1878) 8 ChD 286, 310-311; SCOTLAND: SME Reissue para. 99; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:64 lit. a).

V. Direct links

9. Some systems establish direct bonds between the principal and the delegate. In particular, the principal is often authorised to bring claims directly against the delegate whom the representative has substituted (FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 1994(2); SPAIN: CC art. 1718; ITALY: CC art. 1717(4); and GREECE: CC art. 716(2). However, in FRENCH law, this “action directe” is contained within some limits. Cass.com. 3 Déc. 2002. D. 2003.786 note Mallet-Bricout. In AUSTRIA the principal – if having no contract with the delegate – is seen as a beneficiary of the contract between the representative and the delegate, see Schwimann (-Apathy), ABGB IV^{3}, § 1010 no. 3.

10. French courts have extended this rule by allowing the substituted delegate to bring claims against the principal: Cass.com. 9 November 1987, Bull.civ. 1987 IV no. 233, and 19 March 1991, Bull.civ. 1991 IV no. 102.

II.–6:105: When representative's act affects principal's legal position

When the representative acts:

(a) in the name of a principal or otherwise in such a way as to indicate to the third party an intention to affect the legal position of a principal; and

(b) within the scope of the representative's authority, the act affects the legal position of the principal in relation to the third party as if it had been done by the principal. It does not as such give rise to any legal relation between the representative and the third party.

COMMENTS

A. Basic effect of representation

This Article deals with the normal basic effects of a juridical act by a representative. The rule is that where the representative has acted openly as such (i.e. in the name of the principal or otherwise in such a way as to indicate an intention to affect directly the legal position of the principal) and has acted with authority, the representative's act directly affects the legal relationship between the principal and the third party but does not give rise to any legal relation between the representative and the third party. In other cases, the basic rule is that the principal's legal relations are not directly affected by the representative's act. The consequences for the representative are dealt with in succeeding Articles.

B. Representative must act as such if principal is to be affected

The act of the representative will bind the principal or otherwise affect the principal's legal relations only if the representative acts in the name of the principal or otherwise in such a way as to indicate to the third party an intention to directly affect the legal relations of a principal. It is not necessary that the representative should say "In the name of …" or use any other special form of words. Indeed the name of the principal need not even be mentioned. However, if the representative wishes to avoid personal liability it will be important to make it clear by one means or another that the act in question is being done in a representative capacity.

If paragraph (1)(a) of the Article is complied with, the third party will know, or at least could reasonably be expected to know, that the representative is acting as a representative of a principal and not in a personal capacity.

C. Representative must have authority if principal is to be affected

The act of the representative will bind the principal or otherwise affect the principal's legal position only if it is done with authority. As we have seen, the representative (or the person purporting to be a representative) will not have authority to do the act either if there is no authority at all or if the particular act is beyond the representative's authority.

D. Special situations

The Article deals with the basic and normal position. Of course, the representative and the third party or the principal and the representative may by agreement depart from the normal rules and impose personal liability upon the representative. The representative may become a co-debtor or a guarantor of the principal's obligations. The following Article establishes another exception.

NOTES

I. Authorised act binds principal and third party

1. The general principle laid down in this Article is to be found in many European codifications (GERMANY: CC 164(1); FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 1998; ITALY: CC art. 1388; BULGARIA: LOA art. 36(2); PORTUGAL: CC art. 258; SPANISH: CC art. 1727(1); THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:66(1); AUSTRIA: CC § 1017; NORDIC Contract Acts § 10(1); for ENGLAND, see Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], art. 73 (no. 8-050); for SCOTLAND SME Reissue para. 127 for POLAND, see CC art. 95 § 2; for ESTONIA, see GPCCA § 115(2) sent. 2; for SLOVENIA, see LOA § 70 and for SLOVAKIA, see CC § 32(2). Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 219(2) the person who is represented becomes a debtor or creditor on the basis of the representative's actions.

2. Under the Geneva Convention on Agency the principal and the third party are bound to each other if and only if the third party knew or ought to have known that the representative was acting as a representative, unless it follows from the circumstances that the representative is willing to contract as a principal only (art. 12).

II. Exceptional circumstances when principal not bound

3. As an exception to the aforementioned general rule the representative cannot bind the principal - even though acting within authority - if the representative cooperates with the third party in order to harm the principal (collusion) (GERMANY: BGH 17 May 1988, NJW 1989, 26; AUSTRIA: cf. OGH 10 July 1985 SZ 58/123 and 13 February 1991, SZ 64/13; GREECE: Thessaloniki Court of Appeal 1010/1993 Arm. 48 (1994) 1019, 1020-1021; BULGARIA: LOA art. 40).

4. A related idea which probably leads to the same results is expressed by GREEK law under the heading "abuse of right" (CC art. 281): if the third party knows or should know that the representative acts against the principal's interest or against the purpose of the representative's authority and the principal never would have concluded the contract if acting alone, such an act is not binding upon the principal and the third party (A.P.: 213/1965 EEN 33 (1966) 36; 466/1977 NoB 26 (1978) 47, 48 I). A similar rule prevails in PORTUGAL: the representative's acts are treated as being unauthorised if the third party knew or should have known about an abuse of the representative's authority (CC art. 269). The same opinion is found in AUSTRIAN case law and expressed by some authors, c.f. Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 215 with references to case law and literature.

II.–6:106: Representative acting in own name

When the representative, despite having authority, does an act in the representative's own name or otherwise in such a way as not to indicate to the third party an intention to affect the legal position of a principal, the act affects the legal position of the representative in relation to the third party as if done by the representative in a personal capacity. It does not as such affect the legal position of the principal in relation to the third party unless this is specifically provided for by any rule of law.

COMMENTS

If the representative acts in his or her own name or otherwise in such a way as not to indicate to the third party an intention to affect directly the legal relations of a principal, then the representative will be regarded as acting in a personal capacity and the act, if it is valid, will establish direct legal relations between the representative and the third party. The Act will not directly affect the legal position of the principal in relation to the third party unless this is specifically provided for by a special rule of law for a particular situation. For example, there may be cases where it would be safe and appropriate for a special rule to provide for the ownership of property bought by the representative for a hidden principal to pass directly to the principal, or at least to do so in certain clearly identified circumstances.

It is important to note that the representative may be personally bound even if the existence of a principal is disclosed to the third party. Everything depends on whether the representative acts in such a way as to indicate to the third party an intention to affect directly the legal relations of a principal. A representative may, for example, say "I am instructed and authorised to buy this item for a collector who prefers to remain anonymous. However, any contract for its purchase will be concluded by me in a personal capacity and will not directly affect my principal." In such a case the third party must decide whether to accept the risk of contracting only with the representative. In the absence of any special rule on the question of passing of ownership in such a situation the manner in which, and terms on which, the item acquired by the representative would be passed on to the principal would be regulated by the contract between the representative and the principal.

NOTES

I. Representative and third party bound

1. The general rule that the representative and the third party are bound to each other in the circumstances covered here is accepted everywhere in Europe. Differences exist, however, on the question of a contractual relationship between the principal and the third party.

II. Geneva Convention on Agency

2. The Geneva Convention on Agency has a rule similar in effect to the one in the present art. 13(1).

III. Undisclosed principal: third party and principal bound

3. Under the undisclosed principal doctrine of ENGLISH law the principal may sue the third party on a contract made by an agent on the principal's behalf, if the agent was acting within the scope of the authority (Siu Yin Kwan v. Eastern Insurance Co. Ltd. [1994] 2 WLR 370, 376 (PC)). Equally the third party may sue the undisclosed principal. English law does not prescribe any further conditions for the direct relationship between the undisclosed principal and the third party. SCOTTISH law also has an undisclosed principal doctrine: SME Reissue paras. 147-163.

4. The Common Law does not prescribe any further conditions for the direct relationship between the undisclosed principal and the third party.

IV. Principal and third party generally not bound

5. The usual rule is that the principal and the third party are not bound by a legal relationship in the circumstances covered here. In ITALY, PORTUGAL and SPAIN the general rule is laid down that if the representative was acting in his or her own name there is no direct relationship between the third party and the principal (Italy: CC art. 1705(2) first sentence; Portugal, CC art. 1180; Spain: CC art. 1717(1). Likewise in FRANCE see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 181 and GERMANY see Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB (2004), § 164 no. 3 and CC § 164(2).

6. Nevertheless, in some specific situations direct relations between the principal and the third party are recognised in a number of countries (for AUSTRIA see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 200 et seq., for GERMANY Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB (2004), Pref. to § 164 nos. 51 et seq.). Except for THE NETHERLANDS, however, no country provides a full set of conditions for direct relations between principal and third party. Typically the principal's right to sue the third party, on the one hand, and the third party's right to sue the principal, on the other, are regulated differently (see on BELGIUM and FRANCE: Samoy, Middellijke vertegenwoordiging, 2005).

7. In SLOVAK law, the principal and the third party are not generally bound in this situation, but in the commission agent contract (Ccom §§ 577-590) the principal has some special cases rights against the third party (claim delivery or a performance of an obligation).

8. Under ESTONIAN law, the principal and the third party are not bound by a legal relationship if the representative acts in his or her own name. If the representative acts in his or her own name but does so on account of the principal, an obligation to reveal the name of a third party may be based on the internal relationship between the principal and the person acting on account of the principal (see LOA §§ 624(1) and 692(2) for contract of commission, LOA §§ 624(1), 854(2) and 858(1) for forwarding contracts). The principal's interests are protected generally by LOA § 626(1) which states that an agent has an obligation to hand over anything received or created in connection with performance of the mandate to the principal. In addition, LOA § 626(3) prescribes that claims and movables which an agent acquires when performing a mandate in the agent's name but on account of the principal are not included in the bankruptcy estate of the agent and they cannot be subject to a claim against the agent in an enforcement procedure. Thus, the principal has a right to claim an assignment of rights against the third party, but does not have any direct right against the third party (for express provision to that effect for forwarding contracts see LOA § 858(3)).

9. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 507 under a commission agency contract the commission agent is obliged to conclude a sales contract in the agent's own name, in favour of the principal in return for a commission. Under § 513(1) a contract in which a commission agent assumes an obligation to conclude a contract other than a sales contract is also deemed to be a commission agency contract. Under § 509(1) a sales contract concluded under a commission agency contract entitles and binds the commission agent against the party contracting with the commission agent; (2) the commission agent is responsible to the principal for performance of all of the obligations that are undertaken by their contracting partner in the contract; (3) creditors of a commission agent have no rights against (a) claims against the party contracting with the commission agent and due to the principal; (b) things bought by the commission agent in the case of consignment purchases; or (c) amounts of money received by the commission agent and kept or handled separately, which are apparently due to the principal.

II.–6:107: Person purporting to act as representative but not having authority

(1) When a person acts in the name of a principal or otherwise in such a way as to indicate to the third party an intention to affect the legal position of a principal but acts without authority, the act does not affect the legal position of the purported principal or, save as provided in paragraph (2), give rise to legal relations between the unauthorised person and the third party.

(2) Failing ratification by the purported principal, the person is liable to pay the third party such damages as will place the third party in the same position as if the person had acted with authority.

(3) Paragraph (2) does not apply if the third party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the lack of authority.

COMMENTS

A. Consequence of lack of authority

This Article deals with the consequences which follow if a person purporting to act for a principal does an act without authority. It does not matter whether the person is a representative who is acting beyond authority or a person who has no authority at all. The basic rule is that the act does not bind the purported principal or otherwise affect the legal relations between the purported principal and the third party. The act does not directly bind the person acting as a representative either. The third party has no reason to suppose that that person is acting in a personal capacity and no reason to rely on that person's credit or reputation. The third party intends to transact with the supposed principal, not the purported representative. The person purporting to act as a representative with authority may, however, be liable in damages to the third party. (See paragraph (2)).

There may be ratification by the purported principal. When that occurs the act of the representative will affect the principal's legal relations but only as a result of the ratification and not as a result of the act itself.

B. Partial lack of authority

Where an existing authority of a representative covers an act in part only, the effect of such partial lack of authority depends upon whether the legal relationship or effect involved is divisible or indivisible. In the latter case, the principal is not bound at all. In the former case, the authorised part of the act will bind the principal and the third party but not the unauthorised part.

Illustration

If a representative has power to overdraw the principal's account to an amount of €10,000 and overdraws €11,000, the principal is bound to repay €10,000 only.

C. Liability for damages

By acting in a principal's name or otherwise in such a way as to indicate an intention to affect a principal's legal relations, a person can be regarded as warranting to the third party that there is authority to do so. If the person does not in fact have this authority, this does not mean that the person is bound by the contract or act; but only that there is an obligation to pay damages to the third party. The compensation must put the third party into the same position as if the person had acted with authority. If the person proves that the principal could not have performed the contract, nor have paid compensation (for instance because the principal is insolvent) the person need not even pay damages.

D. Effect of ratification or third party's knowledge

The person is not liable under paragraph (2) if the purported principal ratifies the act. There is no need for liability in such a case and no justification for it. Nor is the person liable if the third party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the lack of authority. In such a case the third party must be regarded as having taken the risk that the supposed representative had no authority or that the purported principal would not ratify.

NOTES

I. Principal not bound by unauthorised acts

1. The Geneva Convention on Agency (art. 14(1) and many European codifications provide for a rule comparable to the one contained in paragraph (1) (GERMANY: CC § 177(1); AUSTRIA: CC § 1016; GREECE: CC art. 229; FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 1998(2); SPAIN: CC art. 1259; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:66(1); POLAND: CC art. 103; PORTUGAL: CC art. 268(1); SLOVAKIA CC § 33(1); ESTONIA: GPCCA § 129(1); SLOVENIA: LOA § 72-73. The same rule is implied in ITALY (CC art. 1398); in BULGARIA (non explicitly LOA art. 42) and in the Nordic Contract Acts (§§ 10, 11 etc.) and is adopted by IRISH law as well (Xenos v. Wickham (1866), LR 2 HL 296; British Bank of the Middle East v. Sun Life Assurance Co [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 9, HL). SCOTTISH law is to the same effect: SME Reissue para. 60.
2. In case of a partial lack of authority, the contract may be completely or partially invalid depending on whether it would have been concluded without the unauthorised part (GERMANY: CC § 139; GREECE: CC art. 181; ESTONIA: GPCCA § 129(2)); BULGARIA: LOA art. 26(4); AUSTRIA: Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I^3, §§ 1016, 1017 no. 10).

II. Unauthorised representative liable to third party

3. The unauthorised representative's liability for damages as a consequence of acting without authority is, in principle, recognised by all Member States. However, the details of this liability vary to some degree. In ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law, as under paragraph (2) of the Article and under the very similar Geneva Convention on Agency art. 16(1), the representative is liable even in the absence of knowledge of the lack of authority, since the representative's liability is strict and not based upon fault (SME Reissue para. 165). The representative's ignorance of the lack of authority is irrelevant also under the NORDIC Contract Acts of DENMARK, SWEDEN and FINLAND (§ 25(1)) and in THE NETHERLANDS (CC art. 3:70). The Dutch Supreme Court has confirmed that the representative is liable for the full damage suffered by the third party (including the expectation interest) (HR 28 March 1997, NedJur 1997 no. 454). In SLOVENIA both the purported principal and representative are liable for damages from acts beyond authority (LOA § 72(5)). Only the purported representative is liable when acting without authority (LOA § 73(4)).
4. In GERMAN and GREEK law, if the representative was aware of the lack of authority, the third party may claim performance of the contract or damages, see CC §

179(1) and CC art. 231(1) respectively. If the representative did not know of the lack of authority, the representative's liability is limited to reliance damages, which, however, cannot exceed the interest the third party would have if the contract was valid CC § 179(2), CC art. 231(2). The same is true in ESTONIA, except for the right to require performance (GPCCA § 130(1),(2)) and in ITALY and PORTUGAL the representative is held liable for violation of precontractual obligations so that the third party can only recover reliance damages (Italy: Cass. 29 September 2000, no. 12969, Foro it. 2001, I, 1658; Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto II[2], 192; Galgano, Il negozio giuridico, 406; PORTUGAL: C.M. Pinto, General Theory 549). The same limitation also prevails in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, where the representative is liable in delict (France: Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[8], no. 575 Belgium: Tilleman, Lastgeving, nos. 387 & 391; Luxembourg: Supreme Court 7 January 1975, Pas. belge 23, 68), and as well in SPAIN. In POLAND the representative's liability is always limited to reliance interest (CC art. 103 § 3), the same applies to SLOVENIA, see Juhart and Plavšak, Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 451. In SLOVAKIA (CC § 33(2)), the third party may demand from the purported representative either performance of the obligation or compensation for any damage caused by such negotiations provided there was negligence or intention. In AUSTRIA the general rules were clarified in 2007 with the introduction of a new CC § 1019. Now in both commercial and general civil matters the purported representative can be held liable only for reliance damages. The amount payable is limited by the expectation interest (BGBl I 2005/120). According to BULGARIAN law, the representative is liable only if aware of the lack of authority (argument from LOA art. 81 – principle of liability only for fault). The third party may claim damages only if the third party was in good faith (LOA art. 42(1)) and if the purported principal refuses to confirm the contract. A claim against the falsus procurator for performance of the contract concluded without authority is however not possible.

5. However, in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG the representative is liable for the third party's full damage if the representative had expressly or impliedly guaranteed that there was authority, see CC art. 1997 last clause. The same solution has been proposed in PORTUGAL if the representative knew of the lack of authority (C.M. Pinto, General Theory 549).

6. The HUNGARIAN CC § 221 provides as follows. (1) A person who, in good faith, exceeds the scope of the authority to represent or who concludes a contract in the name of another person without having the authority to do so must pay compensation to the other contracting party for damages incurred as a result of the conclusion of the contract (on the assumption that the purported principal does not ratify the action). However, the court may grant exemption from this liability, particularly if the person had previously been a representative and was, through no fault of their own, unaware of the cessation of the right to represent at the time the contract was concluded. (2) A mala fide false representative is liable for full compensation.

III. Third party knew of lack of authority

7. All countries agree on the exception contained in the last paragraph of the Article. The same solution is to be found in the Geneva Convention on Agency art. 16(2). Nowhere is the representative liable if the third party knew or could reasonably have been expected to know of the lack of authority (GERMANY: CC § 179(3); GREECE: CC art. 231(3); ESTONIA: GPCCA § 130(3)); THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:70; ITALY: CC art. 1398; BULGARIA: LOA art. 42(1); NORDIC Contract Acts § 25(2); FRANCE: Cass.civ. 16 June 1954, Bull. civ. 1954 I no. 200; ENGLAND: Beattie v. Ebury (1872) LR 7 CA 777, 800; Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], no.

9-067; SCOTLAND: SME Reissue para. 170; SLOVAKIA CC § 33(3). Cf. also AUSTRIA CC § 1304; SLOVENIA: LOA §§ 72(5) and 73(4). In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, CCs art. 1997 is based upon the same principle. (Belgium: Tilleman, Lastgeving, no. 378). Under ESTONIAN law, liability is also excluded, if the active legal capacity of the person without the right of representation was restricted and he or she acted without the consent of his or her legal representative (GPCCA § 130(3)).

II.–6:108: Unidentified principal

If a representative acts for a principal whose identity is to be revealed later, but fails to reveal that identity within a reasonable time after a request by the third party, the representative is treated as having acted in a personal capacity.

COMMENTS

A. Unidentified principal

The act of a representative may affect the principal's legal position and not the representative's even if the representative, although acting expressly for "a" principal, does not at first reveal the principal's identity. But such secrecy cannot be continued for ever if the third party demands to be told the principal's identity.

B. Representative failing to identify principal

If the third party has asked for identification of the principal and the representative fails or refuses to reveal that identity (possibly on the principal's instruction), the representative becomes personally bound to the third party. This rule, which is not found in all the laws, is justified because the representative assumed that risk by refusing to reveal the principal's identity.

Binding the representative to the third party is also justified by the fact that the representative usually will be able to transfer to the principal any assets received from the third party, and conversely the principal will usually reimburse the representative for the charges incurred vis-à-vis the third party. This distinguishes the cases covered by this Article from those in which the representative acts without authority where by virtue of the warranty of authority the representative is merely obliged to pay damages to the third party.

NOTES

I. Rules on unidentified principal

1. Some Civil Codes have rules which correspond to this Article (ITALY: CC art. 1405; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:67(2). In other countries, the rule is recognised without statutory authority (FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG [déclaration de command/commandverklaring]: Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[8], no. 535). However, in Belgian law the "representative" has a faculty to reveal the identity. If he does not do so, the rule applies and he will stay personally bound (see Samoy (2005) nos. 641 & 672).

II. "Contracts for a person to be nominated": Italy and Portugal

2. As mentioned before, in ITALY and PORTUGAL the case of an unidentified principal is not governed by the rules on representation. The special rules of both countries on the "contract for a person to be nominated" practically lead to the same result as that reached under this Article: once nominated, the person acquires the rights and assumes the obligations of the original party who has made the nomination (Italy: CC art. 1404; Portugal: CC art. 455(1). However, this nomination is subject to several requirements: it must be communicated to the other party within three or five days, unless another term has been agreed; and, to be effective, this communication must be accompanied by the nominee's acceptance or of a power of attorney issued before the conclusion of the contract (Italy: CC art. 1402; Portugal: CC art. 453). If the person is not validly nominated, the original parties to the contract remain bound by it (Italy: CC art. 1405; Portugal: CC art. 455(2).

III. Principal must be identified

3. In GERMANY, GREECE, AUSTRIA and the NORDIC countries the representative who fails to disclose the principal's identity is not necessarily bound. Under German law the representative is treated as if acting without authority (BGH 20 March 1995, NJW 1995, 1739, 1742). Therefore the representative is, at the choice of the third party, liable either to perform the contractual obligations or to pay damages (details in German CC § 179). The same rule applies in Greece (CC art. 231(1)) and in the Nordic countries (Nordic Contract Acts § 25 on the duty of the falsus procurator to compensate expectation interests). By contrast, in Austria in civil transactions the representative may only be liable for reliance damages provided there was negligence or intention. A representative sued for such damages may still avoid this liability for damages by identifying the principal until the opening of trial at first instance. In AUSTRIA the "Transaction for whom it may concern" is recognised if the third party agrees that the identity of the principal is not disclosed (see Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I[3], § 1002 no. 50). Then the undisclosed principal is bound. In no case is the contract effective for the representative. Similarly, under ESTONIAN law, while there is neither express regulation nor relevant court practice, it could be inferred that a representative who fails to disclose the principal's identity is treated as a purported representative without authority together with the relevant consequences, i.e. nullity of contract and liability for damages (GPCCA §§ 129(1), 130).

4. Under ENGLISH common law the agent may incur personal liability under a contract where the principal is not named (The Virgo [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep 135, CA). But the presumption is against the representative being liable (The Santa Carina [1977] 1 Lloyd's Rep 478, CA; Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], no. 9-045).

5. Under POLISH and SLOVENIAN law – despite the lack of an express regulation – it is accepted that a representative who fails to disclose the principal's identity is personally bound. This is the same in SLOVAKIA.

II.–6:109: Conflict of interest

(1) If an act done by a representative involves the representative in a conflict of interest of which the third party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known, the principal may avoid the act according to the provisions of II.–7:209 (Notice of avoidance) to II.–7:213 (Partial avoidance).

(2) There is presumed to be a conflict of interest where:

(a) the representative also acted as representative for the third party; or
(b) the transaction was with the representative in a personal capacity.

(3) However, the principal may not avoid the act:

(a) if the representative acted with the principal's prior consent; or
(b) if the representative had disclosed the conflict of interest to the principal and the principal did not object within a reasonable time;
(c) if the principal otherwise knew, or could reasonably be expected to have known, of the representative's involvement in the conflict of interest and did not object within a reasonable time; or
(d) if, for any other reason, the representative was entitled as against the principal to do the act by virtue of IV.D.–5:101 (Self-contracting) or IV.D.–5:102 (Double mandate).

COMMENTS

A. The basic issue

In the triangular situation of representation, the representative is exposed to the usually diverging interests of three persons. While being obliged to promote and preserve the principal's interests, the representative may be approached by the third party who is seeking to pursue other interests. In addition, the representative may be tempted to pursue the representative's own interests at the expense of the principal. The situation creates so much danger for the principal that, although not all the laws currently provide a solution, or do so only in some cases, it is important to provide the principal with an appropriate remedy.

B. Relevant conflict of interests

Sanctions affecting a contract concluded by the representative or other act done by the representative can be imposed only if this is equitable in relation to the parties to the transaction.

The principal's interests in this respect are protected by allowing the principal to decide whether or not to avoid the act.

The third party's interest in preserving the act is protected by the requirement that the third party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the conflict of interests.

C. Consequences of a relevant conflict of interests

Paragraph (1) provides that the principal may avoid the act if the representative had concluded it in spite of a relevant conflict of interests.

D. Special cases

Paragraph (2) deals with two specific instances of a potential conflict of interests. A conflict may arise if the representative for principal A acts at the same time as representative for principal B and as such a dual representative concludes a transaction. Since in this situation the representative must take care of the potentially opposite interests of two persons, a risk of neglecting the interests of one of the two principals is often present.

The same duality and therefore potential conflict of interests exists if the transaction is between the representative, acting as representative, and the representative in a personal capacity, i.e. if the representative is also the "third party" in relation to the principal.

In these two situations, a material conflict of interests is presumed to exist. This presumption of a conflict of interests is, however, rebuttable.

> Illustration
> Representative A is instructed by the principal to buy 50 shares of X Corp. at the current market price. Since A wishes to dispose of A's own holding of shares in X Corp., A sells these shares to the principal for the current market price. The latter fact neutralises the conflict of interests.

E. Consequences of a conflict of interests

Where a representative in concluding a transaction acts for both contracting parties or with himself or herself, the act can be avoided by the principal, unless one of the justifications enumerated in paragraph (3) applies. In the case dealt with in sub-paragraph (a) of paragraph (2), where the representative also acts as representative for the third party, each of the two principals is entitled to avoid the act.

F. Exceptions

Customs and national legislation may give certain types of representatives the option of dealing with themselves under certain conditions.

G. Avoidance excluded

The third paragraph lays down four instances in which avoidance of the act is excluded. The first - prior consent of the principal - is self-evident. The second and third - disclosure of the conflict of interests by the representative, or knowledge or constructive knowledge of it by the principal - require a brief explanation. The disclosure, or actual or constructive knowledge, must occur in advance of the representative's act so that the principal is in a position to prevent the representative from acting. Disclosure or actual or constructive knowledge suffices to bar avoidance, unless the principal concerned objects within a reasonable time.

Where there are two principals (in the situation covered by paragraph (2) (a)), and only one has the knowledge, as a result of disclosure or otherwise, only that one is barred from avoiding the act.

In addition to the three instances regulated in paragraph (3), avoidance is also excluded if the representative was entitled to do the act by virtue of the rules in IV.D.–5:101 (Self-contracting) or IV.D.–5:102 (Double mandate). It is also excluded if the principal, or both principals, has or have confirmed the act expressly or impliedly after learning of the ground for avoidance. This follows from the general rules on the avoidance of contracts and other juridical acts which are covered in later Articles.

NOTES

I. Contract voidable or ineffective where conflict of interest

1. A few systems provide that where there is a conflict of interest, the contract may be avoided by the principal (ITALIAN CC art. 1394, ESTONIAN GPCCA § 131, and see also art. 1395; PORTUGUESE CC art. 261, or is ineffective (DUTCH CC art. 3:68). The solution is similar in BULGARIAN law, where acting against the interest of the principal makes the contract voidable (LOA art. 40, Takoff, Dobrovolno predstavitelstvo, 4.8). There is however a separate regulation on self-contracting cases (LOA art. 38(1)) and the effect is voidability of the concluded contract (Takoff, Dobrovolno predstavitelstvo, 4.7.3); SCOTTISH law holds that an agent cannot adopt a position where there would be a conflict of interest with the principal and cannot profit from any contract concluded personally with the principal. A transaction entered into in breach of this duty is voidable (SME Reissue, para. 97).

II. No rule that contract affected by conflict

2. No conflict-of-interest rule is contained in the Geneva Convention on Agency. ENGLISH law does not seem to know a rule comparable to paragraph (1). The contract concluded in a conflict of interests situation of which the third party knew is therefore not voidable. There is, however, English authority allowing the avoidance of the contract in the more extreme case where the third party bribes the representative (Panama & South Pacific Telegraph Co. v. India Rubber Co. (1875) LR 10 CA 515).

III. Partial recognition of rule

3. In some European countries, the invalidity (GERMANY: CC § 181; GREECE: CC art. 235; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:68; POLAND CC art. 108; SLOVAKIA CC § 22(2) in connection to § 39)) or voidability (ITALY: CC art. 1395; PORTUGAL: CC art. 261(1) of a representative's transactions with himself or herself is prescribed. The FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG) CC's merely regulate the special case of a sale by public auction (CCs art. 1596), but this provision is considered to express a general principle (France: Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 182 and note (4); Belgium: Cass. 7 December 1978, Pas. belge 1979 I 408, 410; Wéry, Le mandat, no. 105); violation of the prohibition entails voidability of the contract (France: Cass. 29 November 1988, Bull.civ. 1988 I no. 341; Belgium: Cass. 7 December 1978, supra). Also, SPANISH law prescribes the invalidity of the contract of sale when a representative acts in a personal capacity or on behalf of another. See: SPANISH CC art. 1459.

IV. In fact no conflict

4. In legal systems predicated on prohibiting conflicts of interests, a representative's transaction with himself or herself is valid if in fact there can be no conflict of interests (ITALY: CC arts. 1394, 1395; The NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:68; PORTUGAL: CC art. 261(1); BULGARIA: Takoff, Dobrovolno predstavitelstvo, 4.7.2.1; AUSTRIA cf. Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 215 et seq.; and for POLAND CC art. 108).

The ESTONIAN GPCCA § 131(1) sent. 2. provides for a presumption similar to the one in paragraph (2) of the Article.

5. By contrast, under GERMAN CC § 181, contracts which the representative makes with himself or herself or as representative for the third party are ineffective whether there is a conflict of interests or not. For this reason CC § 181 provides that there may be conflicts of interests which do not preclude the representative from representing the principal; on the other hand, in some cases the representative cannot bind the principal even though a conflict of interests is impossible (BGH 24 January 1991, NJW 1991, 982, 983).

V. Principal's consent

6. The principal's consent, of course, validates the contract. A specific provision comparable to paragraph (3) seems to exist only in GERMANY (CC § 181, "soweit nicht ein anderes ihm gestattet ist"), PORTUGAL (CC art. 261(1)) and in ESTONIA (GPCCA § 131(2)). Under POLISH law a similar rule is accepted in connection with CC art. 103.

7. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 221(3) a representative must not proceed if the other interested party is the representative personally or another person whom the representative also represents. The representative, if a legal person, may however proceed in a case of conflicting interests with the express consent of the principal.

II.–6:110: Several representatives

Where several representatives have authority to act for the same principal, each of them may act separately.

COMMENTS

It is common in practice for principals to grant authority to two or more representatives. The same result may follow in situations where authority is conferred by law. The purpose may be to spread the workload or simply to ensure that if one representative is unable to act the other will be able to do so. In some cases the double appointment may be seen as a safeguard against abuse, both representatives being required to act together before the principal will be bound. In this situation, their authority is said to be joint. It is necessary to have a default rule for this situation.

The default rule chosen here is that each representative may act separately unless otherwise provided. The reason for choosing this as the default rule is that it leads to greater freedom of action. A requirement of joint action could be restrictive in many situations. A principal who wishes to require joint action as a safeguard against abuse can easily do so.

NOTES

1. A similar provision can be found in ITALY (CC art. 1716), in the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 3:65), in BULGARIA – LOA art. 39(2); and in ESTONIA (GPCCA § 122(1)). The Estonian GPCCA § 122(2) further specifies that if several representatives may represent a principal only jointly, each of them may, however, separately accept declarations of intention on behalf of the principal.
2. In SLOVAKIA (CC § 31(3)) A power of representation may be conferred jointly upon several representatives. Unless otherwise determined in the power of representation, all of them must act jointly
3. Under POLISH law, this is provided for in CC art. 107, and the rule applies also to further representatives appointed by the original representative (where there is authority to make such further appointments).
4. In DANISH law there are no similar legislative provisions but the rule must be presumed to be same.
5. In ENGLISH law, several representatives may act for a principal either jointly or both jointly and separately. Where a principal gives authority to act, without further instruction, the authority is "joint" and can only be acted on by the representatives jointly (Brown v. Andrew (1849) 18 LJQB 153). Authority given jointly and separately may be acted upon by all or any of the representatives and bind the principal (Guthrie v. Armstrong (1822) 5 B & Ald 628).
6. Under GERMAN law basically the question is one of interpreting the authorisation: no general priority of the one or the other sort of authority exists (Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB (2004), § 167 no. 52). But in all cases joint representatives are able accept declarations of other parties separately (Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB (2004), § 167 no. 56).

II.–6:111: Ratification

(1) Where a person purports to act as a representative but acts without authority, the purported principal may ratify the act.

(2) Upon ratification, the act is considered as having been done with authority, without prejudice to the rights of other persons.

(3) The third party who knows that an act was done without authority may by notice to the purported principal specify a reasonable period of time for ratification. If the act is not ratified within that period ratification is no longer possible.

COMMENTS

A. The principle of ratification

The first paragraph establishes the general principle that, by ratification, a purported principal may cure any lack of authority on the part of a person who has purported to act as his or her representative.

Ratification may be made by express declaration addressed to the representative or the third party. Ratification may also be implied from acts of the purported principal which unambiguously demonstrate an intention to adopt the contract made or act done.

> Illustration 1
> In the name of a principal P, who is a merchant, representative A has contracted with T, also a merchant, for the purchase of the most recent model of a computer for €2,500 although the authority was limited to €2,000, which T did not know. After learning what A has done, P sends instructions about delivery of the machine. This implies ratification of A's act.

B. The effect of ratification

The effect of ratification is stated by paragraph (2): the act is regarded as having been authorised from the beginning. The principal takes over the benefits as well as the burdens produced by the act.

> Illustration 2
> The facts are as in Illustration 1. The market price rose the day after P had sent the letter of confirmation. Three days later T, alleging A's lack of authority, purports to avoid the contract. That is unjustified since P had ratified the contract and T can no longer invoke the lack of authority to escape the contract.

The purported principal may not yet be in existence or may not yet be identifiable at the time of the act (e.g. where a person acts in the name of a company which is not yet created or of a subcontractor who has yet to be selected). In such a case, the purported principal may still ratify the act later and will then be bound as from the moment of coming into existence or becoming identified. Special rules of the applicable company law with respect to pre-incorporation contracts take, of course, precedence.

C. Protection of other persons' rights

The question of the rights which other persons may have acquired is outside the scope of this Chapter.

D. Third party's right to set reasonable time for ratification

Paragraph (3) provides that the third party may by notice to the purported principal specify a reasonable period of time for ratification. If the purported principal does not ratify within that period ratification is no longer possible. The purpose of this rule, which is derived from the Unidroit Principles Article 2.2.9, is to prevent the principal from being able to keep a third party in a state of legal uncertainty for an indefinite time. The paragraph applies only if the third party knows that the representative had no authority. If the third party has reason to be uncertain, the appropriate course is for the third party to ask the representative to produce evidence of authority or to seek clarification of the position from the principal and in the meantime to withhold performance.

NOTES

I. Ratification: the general rule

1. The principle of ratification is generally accepted in the law of Member States (GERMANY: CC § 177; AUSTRIA: CC § 1016; NORDIC Contract Acts § 25(1); THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:69(1); FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 1998(2); ITALY: CC art. 1399(1); BULGARIA: LOA art. 42(2); SPAIN: CC art. 1259(2); PORTUGAL: CC art. 268; GREECE: CC art. 229; ENGLAND: Bird v. Brown (1850) 4 Exch 786, 798; SCOTLAND: SME Reissue paras. 61-74; POLAND CC art. 103 § 2 and § 3; SLOVAKIA CC § 33; ESTONIA: GPCCA § 129(1); and SLOVENIA: LOA §§ 72(1) and 73(1). HUNGARIAN CC § 221(1). The same principle is expressed in the Geneva Convention on Agency, art. 15(1).

2. Under ENGLISH law, however, an undisclosed principal may not ratify (Keighley Maxsted & Co. v. Durant [1901] AC 240, HL). It has been held that a principal who could not have been identified at the time the agent made the purported contract with the third party is also unable to ratify, Southern Water Authority v. Carey [1985] 2 AllER 1077, QBD., but this is doubtful, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 16-045; compare Chitty on Contracts II[27], no. 31-028. The position, although less certain on the authorities, is probably the same in SCOTTISH law: SME Reissue, paras. 73-74.

II. Implied ratification

3. The ratification may be express or implied (Geneva Convention on Agency art. 15 para. 8; FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC art. 1998(2); GERMANY: BGH 2.11.1989, BGHZ 109, 177; GREECE: Thessaloniki Court of Appeal 2966/1992 EllDik 35 (1994) 636 I; IRELAND: Bank of Ireland Finance Ltd. v. Rockfield Ltd [1979] IR 21 at 35-36 (SC)); ESTONIA GPCCA § 68(3); SCOTLAND: SME Reissue, para. 61. If the principal accepts the benefits arising from the unauthorised contract, this can be regarded as an implied ratification (AUSTRIA: CC § 1016). This doctrine is also fully recognised in SPANISH law (TS 1 March 1988, RAJ (1988), 1541, TS 23 October 1990, RAJ (1990) 8040, TS 19 July 1999, RAJ (1999) 6772. The same is true if the principal voluntarily performs the obligations towards the third party (see on Belgium: Wéry, Le mandat, no. 205). In POLAND an implied ratification may take place in the contract of agency (CC art. 760^3). In SLOVAKIA (CC § 33) when the principal does not communicate disapproval to the person with whom the representative negotiated without undue delay after learning of the representative's act outside the scope of the latter's authority , the principal is deemed to approve such act. The same is true under ESTONIAN law for the contract of agency (LOA § 676(4)). Generally, if ratification has not been granted within two weeks after receipt of the proposal for ratification, the person is deemed not to have ratified the transaction (GPCCA § 129(4)). Until ratification of a transaction, the declaration of intention made by the other party for entry into the transaction may be withdrawn unless the party knew or should have known of the absence of the right of representation upon entry into the transaction (GPCCA § 129(5)). In SLOVENIAN law LOA § 72(2) provides that if the principal does not ratify the act within a reasonable time, the principal is deemed to have refused it.

4. An implied ratification is, however, excluded where the observation of a form is prescribed for the ratification, either the same formality as is required for the contract to be ratified (ITALY: CC art. 1399(1) or that for the grant of authority; BULGARIA: LOA art. 42(2); NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:69(2); PORTUGAL: CC art. 268(2); ESTONIA: GPCCA § 129(6)); SLOVENIA: LOA § 75; GERMANY: Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB (2004), § 177 no. 10).

III. Effect of ratification

5. The effect of ratification as expressed in paragraph (2) corresponds to the Geneva Convention on Agency (art. 15(1) second sent.) and to the laws in many countries (GERMANY: CC § 184(1); THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:369(1); AUSTRIA: Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I^3, §§ 1016, 1017 no. 12; FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG: Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux $VIII^8$, no. 585; BELGIUM: Cass. 6 Feb. 1953, Pas. belge 1953, 436; Cass. 13 Jan. 2003, JTT 2003, 268; ITALY: CC art. 1399(2); BULGARIA – no special rule, s. Takoff, Dobrovolno predstavitelstvo, 5.3.4.1; GREECE: Balis 319; POLAND: CC art. 103; PORTUGAL: CC art. 268(2); ENGLAND: (Koenigsblatt v. Sweet [1923] 2 chap. 314, 325); ESTONIA: GPCCA § 113; SCOTLAND: SME Reissue, para. 60; and SLOVENIA: LOA § 72(3). However, the rights acquired by third persons are not affected (Portugal: CC art. 268(2); Belgium: Cass. 6 February 1953, Pas. belge 1953 I 436, 437). This conclusion may also follow from general rules on the effect of an approval (France, Belgium, Luxembourg: CCs art. 1338(3); Greece: CC art. 238 sent. 2). In SLOVAKIA, upon ratification the act is considered] as having been done with authority, ex tunc. (Svoboda, J: Civil Code – commentary. 5^{th} Edition, Eurounion. Bratislava, 2004, p.78).

II.–6:112: Effect of ending or restriction of authorisation

(1) The authority of a representative continues in relation to a third party who knew of the authority notwithstanding the ending or restriction of the representative's authorisation until the third party knows or can reasonably be expected to know of the ending or restriction.

(2) Where the principal is under an obligation to the third party not to end or restrict the representative's authorisation, the authority of a representative continues notwithstanding an ending or restriction of the authorisation even if the third party knows of the ending or restriction.

(3) The third party can reasonably be expected to know of the ending or restriction if, in particular, it has been communicated or publicised in the same way as the granting of the authority was originally communicated or publicised.

(4) Notwithstanding the ending of authorisation, the representative continues to have authority for a reasonable time to perform those acts which are necessary to protect the interests of the principal or the principal's successors.

COMMENTS

A. Basic idea

This Article deals with a predicament which may arise in several typical situations when a representative's authorisation comes to an end or is restricted. A third party who knew of the authority may not know of the ending or restriction; or the ending or restriction may be prohibited by a contract between the principal and the third party; or the ending of the authorisation may be so sudden that it does not allow the principal sufficient time to provide for a substitute. For the purposes of this Article it does not matter how the representative ceases to be authorised. The reason for the loss of authorisation does not matter. It may, for example, be an avoidance of the act granting the authority, or the expiration of a period of time, or termination or restriction by the principal.

In these cases, the interests of the third party and those of the principal, respectively, must be protected by providing for a limited continuation of the representative's authority.

B. Grounds for termination or restriction

The grounds for termination or restriction of the representative's authorisation are part of the law on the internal relationship between representative and principal and are dealt with in the Book on that topic (see Book IV.D. (Mandate)).

C. Continuation of authority in relation to third party

The effect of paragraph (1) is that the representative's authority, notwithstanding that authorisation has come to an end or been restricted, continues in relation to the third party until the third party knows or can reasonably be expected to know of the ending or restriction. This is an example of so-called "apparent" authority – authority derived by operation of law from the appearance of things

Paragraph (2) deals with the situation where the principal is under an obligation to the third party not to terminate or restrict the representative's authorisation. There are several situations where this sort of arrangement is of practical importance and where the third party has to be able to rely on the grant of authority being irrevocable. Therefore, although it is not clear that the notion of irrevocable authorisation is known in all Member States' laws, paragraph (2) provides that in this case the authority of the representative continues notwithstanding the termination or restriction of the authorisation even if the third party does know of it. See also IV.D.–1:105 (Irrevocable mandate) for the internal relationship.

D. Communicated or publicised ending of authority

Paragraph (3) deals with a specific case of "constructive knowledge". An authorisation which has been addressed to a third party can be ended or restricted in the same manner in which it was granted. This is of particular importance if the grant of authority has been publicised, e.g. by a notice in a newspaper.

E. Continuation of an authority of necessity

Paragraph (4) adopts a useful innovation which goes beyond the law of most Member States but which is found in the Geneva Convention on Agency. It extends the representative's authority for a reasonable period, provided this is necessary for the protection of the principal's (or, in case of the principal's death or other extinction, a successor's) interests. There is no necessity if another representative has been granted authority immediately upon extinction or if the principal (or a successor) is in a position to undertake all necessary and urgent acts.

The extension of the representative's authority is only in time. By contrast, in substance it is restricted because it is limited to acts which are necessary for the preservation of the principal's interests.

NOTES

I. Authority normally depends on duration of internal relationship

1. Even if a national law distinguishes between the internal and the external relationship, the duration of the authority is, as a rule, made dependent upon the duration of the underlying internal relationship (GERMANY: CC § 168; GREECE: CC art. 222; ITALY: CC art. 1396(2); PORTUGAL: CC art. 265(1); ESTONIA: GPCCA § 125(2) and (8). In Portugal, the reverse is also true: the mandate ends if the representative's authority is revoked or renounced (CC art. 1179). However, even though terminated the authority may well still deploy effects vis-à-vis third persons (cf. infra no. 2).
2. In general, revocation by the principal, renunciation by the representative or contractual termination agreed between them are considered to be grounds for the extinction of authority (Geneva Convention on Agency art. 17 lit. a, c; FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 2003; SPAIN: CC art. 1732 nos. 2, 3; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:72 lit. c, d; AUSTRIA: CC § 1020, 1021; GERMANY: CC §§ 168, 671, 675(1) together with §§ 620 et seq. or §§ 643, 649; GREECE: CC arts. 222, 724, 725; ITALY: CC art. 1722 nos. 2, 3; BULGARIA: LOA art. 41(1); PORTUGAL: CC art. 265; ENGLAND: Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], § 122; POLAND CC art. 101; ESTONIA: GPCCA § 125(2), (5), (6); SLOVAKIA CC § 33b death of representative), SLOVENIA LOA §§ 77 and 79. In addition, the authority may be limited in time or made dependent upon certain conditions by stipulation. The agent's or the principal's insolvency are mostly grounds for termination of authority. In ENGLISH law insolvency may have this effect: Chitty on Contracts II[29], no. 31-160.

3. The Geneva Convention on Agency refers to the applicable national law with respect to further grounds for termination of the representative's authority (art. 18).

II. Third party protected

4. Everywhere in Europe there is some protection for the third party who is unaware of the termination of the authority. In effect, the authority regularly is deemed to subsist until the third party knows or ought to know about the termination - either in the form of actual authority or as an apparent authority (Geneva Convention on Agency art. 19; GERMANY: CC §§ 170-173, 674; AUSTRIA: CC § 1026; DENMARK, SWEDEN, FINLAND: Nordic Contract Acts §§ 12 ff.; THE NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:76(1); FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CC arts. 2005-2006, 2008-2009; ITALY: CC art. 1396; BULGARIA: LOA art. 41(2); SPAIN: CC art. 1738; PORTUGAL: CC art. 266; SLOVENIA: LOA § 78(1); ESTONIA: GPCCA § 127; ENGLAND: Drew v. Nunn (1879) 4 QBD 661; Pole v. Leask (1862) 33 LJCh 133, 162-163; SCOTLAND: SME Reissue, paras. 75-76 (ostensible authority and personal bar). As an exception, under GREEK law the principal is not bound by acts of the representative if the latter knew about the termination of the authority, but the principal may be liable to the third party for damages if the principal could have easily notified the third party of the termination of the authority (CC arts. 224, 225). Under POLISH CC art. 105, if after the expiration of the authority the agent concluded a legal transaction in the name of the principal within the limits of the original authorisation the legal transaction is valid (i.e. the principal is bound) unless the other party knew about the expiration of the authority or could easily have obtained that knowledge, also in SLOVAKIA CC § 33b(4)).

5. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 223(2) a power of attorney is valid until withdrawn, unless otherwise provided; in relation to a bona fide third person withdrawal is effective only if the third party has been informed of it. The right of withdrawal cannot be validly waived. Under § 223(3) a power of attorney ceases to exist with the death of either party.

III. Authority normally revocable

6. The laws of all Member States agree on the principle that a representative's authority is revocable. Sometimes this principle is expressed by statute (FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG: CCs art. 2004; SPAIN: CC art. 1733; ITALY: CC art. 1723; BULGARIA: LOA art. 38(2) which rule is mandatory and cannot be abrogated by the parties); PORTUGAL: CC art. 265(2); AUSTRIA: CC § 1020; GERMANY: CC § 168 sent. 2; POLAND: CC art. 101 § 1; SLOVENIA: LOA § 77(1); ESTONIA: GPCCA § 126). The Geneva Convention on Agency provides that revocation by the principal terminates the authority even if this is not consistent with the terms of the agreement between principal and representative (art. 17 lit. c). Authority is, as a rule, revocable at any time. In SLOVAKIA (CC § 33b(3)) The principal may not validly waive the right to revoke the power of representation at any time.

IV. Irrevocable authority

7. Exceptionally, an authority may be granted as irrevocable. In GERMANY, ITALY and PORTUGAL, the irrevocability of the authority is a matter of agreement between representative and principal (see Staudinger [-Schilken] BGB (2004), § 168 nos. 8 et seq.). It is similar in POLAND, where the irrevocability has to be justified by the nature of the legal relationship constituting the basis of the authority (CC art. 101 § 1). However, such a clause has different effects: while in Germany a revocation is ineffective (CC § 168 sent. 2), in the other two countries the principal's revocation (Italy and Geneva Convention, supra) or either party's revocation terminates the representative's authority (Italy: CC art. 1723(1); Portugal: CC art. 265(2). But in Italy the principal is liable to compensate the representative for any damage suffered, unless there was an important reason for the revocation; in Portugal, the revoking party is liable to the other party (CC art. 1172 lit. b).

8. In most countries the granting of an effective irrevocable authority is possible only in certain conditions. One typical condition is an authority granted in the representative's interest (The NETHERLANDS: CC art. 3:74(1); GREECE: CC art. 218 sent. 2 and A.P. 187/1983, NoB 1983.1550-1551; DENMARK: Ussing, Aftaler[3], 309 f; FINLAND: Kivimäki & Ylöstalo 271 - 272; ENGLAND: Bowstead (-Reynolds and Graziadei), Agency[16], no. 10-007). Under the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 126(2) an irrevocable authority, which may be withdrawn only with good reason (GPCCA § 126(3)), may be granted in the interest of a representative or a third person. In AUSTRIA an irrevocable authority may be against good faith, see OGH 1 October 1958 EvBl 1959/3; 15 December 1966 MietSlg 18.101). In GERMANY and GREECE, irrevocability of an authority given in the representative's interest may even be implied (Germany: BGH 13 December 1990, NJW-RR 1991, 439; Greece: Thessaloniki Court of Appeal 1236/1990 Arm 44 (1990) 214, 215 I). In ITALY and PORTUGAL an authority granted in the representative's or a third party's interest cannot, as a rule, be revoked without the consent of the person interested in its granting (Italy: CC art. 1723(2); Portugal: CC art. 265(3). FRANCE and BELGIUM have come to the same result by declaring an authority given in the common interest of principal and representative to be irrevocable (France: Benabent, Specific Contracts nos. 678 ff see the "mandat d'intérêt commun" nos. 682 ff; Belgium: Cass. 28 June 1993, Pas. belge 1993 I 628, 630). In AUSTRIA, an authority granted for a limited period of time may be made irrevocable (Rummel (-Strasser), ABGB I[3], §§ 1020-1026 no. 4).

9. However, exceptionally even an irrevocable authority may be revoked for an important reason (GERMANY: BGH 12 May 1969, WM 1969, 1009; BGH 8 February 1985, WM 1985, 646; AUSTRIA: OGH 1 September 1954, SZ 27/211; 15 December 1966 MietSlg 18.101; GREECE: A.P. 1108/1984, NoB 33 (1985) 771 (772 I); ESTONIA, ITALY AND PORTUGAL: cf. provisions cited supra). In THE NETHERLANDS, an irrevocable authority may only be terminated by a court decision upon an important reason; the principal has to file a petition at the rechtbank (CC art. 3:74(4)).

10. According to SPANISH case law and scholarly literature, though not mentioned in the SPANISH CC, there are two types of irrevocable authority. Firstly, when parties agree to no revocation. Secondly, when the mandate or grant of authority is the mere vehicle for satisfying the representative's legitimate interest. In this last case the irrevocability becomes "absolute" or "of the essence". (Supreme Court judgments 20 April 1981, RAJ (1981) 1658, 27 April 1989, RAJ (1989) 3269, 30 January 1999, RAJ (1999) 331. According to BULGARIAN law authority is revocable at any time (LOA art. 38(2)). The rule is mandatory. Doctrine maintains the same point of view (Takoff, Dobrovolno predstavitelstvo, 6.1.4).

V. Manner of revocation

11. Provisions similar to paragraph (2) can be found in some European countries. Nowhere, however, is this rule expressed in a comparably general manner. Commonly it is provided that the revocation of authority has to take place in the same manner as that used in granting the authority (GERMANY: CC §§ 170-172; GREECE: CC arts. 219-221; DENMARK, SWEDEN and FINLAND: Nordic Contract Acts §§ 12-16; ESTONIA: GPCCA §§ 126(1), 127). In PORTUGAL the third party has to be informed by suitable means (CC art. 266(1). Under POLISH law it is accepted that the authority can be revoked in any form, irrespective of the form required for the grant of authority (Pietrzykowski, Kodeks cywilny I, p. 358). In SLOVAKIA authority may be revoked in any form, irrespective of the form required for the grant of authority (Svoboda, J et col.: Civil Code – commentary. 5th Edition, Eurounion. Bratislava, 2004, p. 80. According to BULGARIAN law, no formal requirements are set for revocation vis-à-vis the representative; towards the third party the requirements of the forma ad probationem (CPC art. 164) should be however observed. The entry into a public register (as far as foreseen for the respective kind of representation) replaces the forma ad probationem for effectiveness towards third persons. Upon entry the revocation is opposable to everybody independent of knowledge (LOA art. 41(2)).

VI. Acts necessary to protect principal's interests

12. The Geneva Convention on Agency art. 20 is very similar to paragraph (4). In the Member States there are no comparable general rules. There are, however, provisions of a more limited scope. In GERMANY CC §§ 169, 674 provide for a continuing apparent authority where the authority has ended in another way than by revocation. Under the CCs of FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, in case of danger the representative has to complete the tasks already begun even after the principal's death (art. 1991(2)). In THE NETHERLANDS and in ITALY, after the principal's death or incapacitation, the representative is still authorised to perform certain acts: in the Netherlands those acts that are necessary for the management of a business enterprise or acts which cannot be put off without detriment (CC art. 3:73(1), (2)); in Italy the representative has to continue performance of acts already begun, provided delaying them would be dangerous (CC art. 1728(1)). Under the NORDIC Contract Acts, § 24, after the principal has become bankrupt or incapacitated, the representative may on the strength of the authority perform such acts as are necessary to protect the principal or the bankrupt estate against losses, until necessary measures can be taken by the person who according to law has the right to act on the principal's behalf. The PORTUGUESE law of mandate provides that mandate and authority are extinguished by the principal's death or incapacitation, unless the extinction would harm the principal or the heirs (CC art. 1175). In SLOVAKIA (CC § 33b(6)) if the principal dies or if the representative terminates the power of representation, the representative is nonetheless bound to perform an immediate act in law in order to prevent detriment to the rights of the principal or the principal's legal successor. Acts thus performed have the same legal effects as if the representation had continued, unless such acts are in conflict with the arrangements made by principal or the legal successor. In AUSTRIA two provisions of the CC are relevant in this respect: According to CC § 1022 authority continues despite the death of the principal, if the interests of the principal or the principal's successors require that the legal transaction is brought to an end. For any case of termination of authority CC § 1025 imposes a duty on the representative to continue to represent the principal until the principal or the principal's successors can take over. For similar rules in SLOVENIAN law, see LOA §§ 79(3), 783(3), 784(4).

13. The ESTONIAN LOA § 632(1) and GPCCA § 125(3) state that it is presumed that a contract of mandate (and therefore authorisation) does not expire upon the death of the principal. If the contract of mandate does expire upon the death or bankruptcy of the principal the contract of mandate (and therefore also the authorisation) is nevertheless deemed to be in force until such time as the representative becomes aware or ought to become aware of the death of the principal or of the declaration of the principal as bankrupt. Also LOA § 630(2) states that a representative has the right to cancel an authorisation agreement entered into for an unspecified term only on condition that the principal can receive the service or enter into the transaction which is the object of the mandate in another manner. This is aimed at protection of the principal's interest. On continuance of the rights of representation in civil procedure, see CCP § 225.

CHAPTER 7: GROUNDS OF INVALIDITY

Section 1: General provisions

II.–7:101: Scope

(1) This Chapter deals with the effects of:

(a) mistake, fraud, threats, or unfair exploitation; and

(b) infringement of fundamental principles or mandatory rules.

(2) It does not deal with lack of capacity.

(3) It applies in relation to contracts and, with any necessary adaptations, other juridical acts.

COMMENTS

This chapter deals with various grounds on which a contract or other juridical act may be invalid. It deals not only with the invalidity as such but also with other effects of the ground of invalidity, including the possibility of obtaining damages whether or not the contract is avoided. Section 2 deals with what are often called vices of consent – mistake, fraud, threats or unfair exploitation - which have in common that they vitiate the consent which one party has given or apparently given to the conclusion of the contract or the making of the juridical act and make the contract or act voidable. The relevant intention to bring about a legal result was present and was duly manifested but it was there because of some reason which makes it objectionable to hold the party to it. Section 3 deals with what are often called illegality and immorality – namely the effects of an infringement of fundamental principles or mandatory rules. Here there may be no defect of consent or intention but the contract or other juridical act may nonetheless be so objectionable for other reasons that it should be void or voidable.

Although a lack of capacity may be a ground of invalidity, and may negate or vitiate consent or intention, this chapter does not deal with that topic because it is more a matter of the law of persons than of contract proper.

The question of unfair contract terms is covered in the next chapter. It involves rather different considerations and techniques.

It is important that the rules on grounds of invalidity should be capable of applying to juridical acts other than contracts and, in particular to unilateral promises intended to be binding without acceptance. Such acts may be the result of mistake or fraud or threats or unfair exploitation. They may infringe fundamental principles or mandatory rules. Paragraph (3) provides for the necessary extension. The rules of the Chapter can generally be applied without difficulty to juridical acts other than contracts. However, II.–7.203 (Adaptation of contract in case of mistake) will disapply itself because it depends on there being reciprocal obligations.

NOTES

1. In many of the national laws it is customary to refer to a general notion of vices of consent (vices de consentement, Willensmängel) under which mistake, threats and fraud are factors which prevent there being valid consent to a contract and thus give rise to a right to avoidance. This notion may be explicit in the Civil Codes: for example, ITALIAN CC arts. 1427-1440 are contained in a section headed Dei vizi del consenso. The FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CC's simply list erreur, violence and dol as grounds on which there may be no valid consent (art. 1109) and provide common rules as to their consequences (art. 1117). See also AUSTRIAN CC §§ 869-877; BULGARIAN LOA art. 27; GERMAN CC §§ 119-124; GREEK CC arts. 140-157; PORTUGUESE CC arts. 240-257 (which cover also simulation and temporary incapacity) and ESTONIAN GPCCA §§ 90-101. The French jurisprudence admits that the grounds listed are a single form of action and are to some extent fungible: Ghestin, La formation du contrat[3], no. 481. The Belgian case law and legal writers admit also abuse of circumstances (lésion qualifiée) as an additional vice of consent: Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 124. The DUTCH CC art. 3:44 deals with threat, fraud and abuse of circumstances, but mistake is dealt with in Book 6 on contracts (art. 6:228). The notion of vices of consent is also familiar in SCOTTISH law (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 13-17; MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, §§ 4.1-4.66).
2. The NORDIC laws allow relief under broadly the same circumstances but under separate provisions, mainly contained in Chapter 3 of the Nordic Contract Acts (1915-29), or in case law. The courts employ the notion of an invalid declaration of will or legal act.
3. CZECH law uses the concept of requisites of will. These are the freedom of will, the seriousness of will and absence of error and duress, see Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 151 et seq. Statutory expressions of this concept can be found in CC §§ 37, 49 and 49a. If any of the requisites is missing, the juridical act is invalid or at least avoidable.
4. The POLISH CC deals with defects in a declaration of will in one section (arts. 82-88) and abuse of circumstances in a separate article applicable to contracts only (art. 388). Similarly, the SLOVENIAN LOA deals with vices of consent (threat, mistake and fraud), in one section (§§ 45-50), whereas abuse of circumstances ("usury") is dealt with within the chapter on reciprocal contracts (§ 119). In another section, invalidity as such and its consequences are dealt with (nullity: LOA §§ 86-93, avoidability: LOA §§ 94-99).
5. ENGLISH and IRISH law do not recognise a unitary concept. Rather, there are several separate grounds on which a contract may be set aside because of some impropriety in the making of the contract or some problem over consent: mistake, misrepresentation, duress, undue influence and unconscionable advantage-taking. However, all but mistake are subject to apparently common rules about loss of the right to set aside, and the same is even true of certain of the rules on mistake: see further below.
6. Grounds of invalidity are not separately and systematically regulated in the SLOVAK CC. The CC deals with grounds of invalidity within its fourth head ("Juridical Acts" §§ 37-42) that regulates juridical acts in general. These grounds of invalidity are common for contracts (bilateral and multilateral juridical acts) as well as unilateral juridical acts. The fourth head deals also with lack of capacity. Some grounds of invalidity (abuse of circumstances, mistake and fraud) are provided under the subhead on "Contracts" §§ 47-49a.

7. In most systems, threat, fraud and (where applicable) abuse of circumstance are grounds for avoiding unilateral juridical acts (including a notice to determine a contract) as well as contracts. In ESTONIAN law, LOA § 12(1) states that the validity of a contract is not affected by the fact that, at the time of conclusion of the contract, performance of the contractual obligations was impossible or one of the parties did not have the right to dispose of the thing or right which is the object of the contract. However, this does not preclude the voidability of the contract on the ground of fundamental mistake (GPCCA § 92).

8. Some of the matters covered by this chapter are not always subsumed within the notion of vices of consent. Thus the existence of a mistake in the communications between the parties may be seen as preventing the formation of a contract (e.g. FRENCH erreur obstacle, see Nicholas 98-100, though the notion of erreur obstacle is wider than this, Benabent no. 76. Some English writers also explain the effect of such a mistake as resting on the absence of a valid offer and acceptance, see Atiyah, Essays 253-260 and the discussion in Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 8-054).

9. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 200(2) contracts in violation of legal regulations and contracts concluded by evading a legal regulation are void, unless the legal regulation stipulates another legal consequence. A contract is also void if it is manifestly in contradiction to good morals. Usurious contracts are governed by CC § 202. This states that if a contracting party has gained excessive benefit or unfair advantage at the conclusion of the contract by exploiting the other party's situation, the contract is void. Mistake, fraud and threats are governed by CC § 210. Under paragraph (1) a person acting under a misapprehension regarding any essential circumstance at the time a contract is concluded is entitled to contest their offer or acceptance if the mistake had been caused or could have been recognised by the other party. Under paragraph (2) an offer or acceptance may be contested on the grounds of misapprehension of a legal issue if such misapprehension is deemed significant and if competent legal advice to the parties affected has been patently erroneous. Under paragraph (3) if the parties had the same mistaken assumption at the time the contract was concluded, either of them may contest the contract. Under paragraph (4) a person who has been persuaded to conclude a contract by deception or duress by the other party is entitled to contest the offer or acceptance. This provision applies also if deception or duress was committed by a third person and the other party had or should have had knowledge of such conduct. Under paragraph (5) a gratuitous contract may be contested on the grounds of mistake, deception or duress even if these circumstances could not have been recognised by the other party.

10. All the legal systems now provide some relief against harsh contract terms but it is not clear to what extent there is a common conceptual basis underlying the various provisions.

II.–7:102: Initial impossibility or lack of right or authority to dispose

A contract is not invalid, in whole or in part, merely because at the time it is concluded performance of any obligation assumed is impossible, or because a party has no right or authority to dispose of any assets to which the contract relates.

COMMENTS

In some legal systems initial impossibility may preclude the formation of a contract or make a purported contract invalid. This approach is not taken here. Very often such cases will be ones of mistake under which either party affected may avoid the contract, but there may be cases when a party takes the risk of impossibility or should be treated as taking that risk. An order for specific performance of the obligation will of course be unobtainable if performance is still impossible at the time when it falls due, but the party who has taken the risk may be liable in damages for non-performance.

Illustration
A sells to B, who is a salvage contractor, the wreck of an oil tanker which A says is at a particular location. As A should have known, there never was an oil tanker at that location, but B does not discover this until B's preliminary salvage expedition searches the area. The contract is valid and A is liable in damages to B.

The second situation covered by the Article – namely, where the seller of an asset, at the time of conclusion of the contract, has no right or authority to dispose of it – is an even more clear case where it would be bad policy to preclude the formation of a contract. It might be perfectly possible for the seller to obtain the asset, or to acquire authority to dispose of it, by the time the obligation to transfer ownership falls to be performed. In practice many contracts are entered into in relation to assets which do not yet exist but which are expected to exist by the time when the obligation falls to be performed.

NOTES

1. In many of the legal systems a contract which, at the time it was made, provided for obligations impossible to perform is not voidable but absolutely void: e.g., in the case of "evident" impossibility, AUSTRIAN CC § 878 (this includes only cases which are legally impossible and factually absurd, such as the promise of an eternal life; a "simple" initial possibility - e.g. the sale of goods that belong to another – is subject to the legal consequences of bad performance); ITALIAN CC art. 1346; and so did the former § 306 of the GERMAN CC in case of "objective" impossibility. FRENCH law, and the law of BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, require "un objet certain qui forme la matière de l'engagement" (CC art. 1108). Thus a contract to supply a specific object which does not exist is void (nullité absolue), unless it is a future object (art. 1130(1)). See Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux VIII[8], no. 598. The situation is similar in BULGARIA, where the "impossible object" is ground for nullity, LOA art. 26(2); PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law are broadly similar, see Portuguese CC arts. 280, 399 and 401; Spanish CC arts. 1184, 1272 and 1460. French and Belgian law treat the sale of an item which belongs to another in a broadly similar way, but the contract is voidable (nullité rélative) (CC art. 1599). Italian CC art. 1478 differs in not treating this last case as one of impossibility and so did the former German CC in § 437. In GERMAN and AUSTRIAN law, if one party knew or ought to have known that the performance was impossible, the other may recover reliance interest damages: German CC § 307; Austrian CC § 878 3rd sentence. There may also be delictual liability in French law if the conditions for such liability are satisfied (i.e. if there is a fault) see Benabent no. 84 (for a comparison of French law and PECL). In GERMANY the rule was not only abolished in 2002 but the legislator felt a need to establish an explicit rule similar to PECL art. 4:102 (and hence similar to the present Article) in CC § 311a(1).

2. POLISH civil law differentiates between "objective" impossibility (nobody can perform the contract) and "subjective" impossibility (the party cannot perform the contract). In the former case, the contract is invalid (POLISH CC art. 387 § 1). A party who at the time of concluding the contract knew about the impossibility of performance of an obligation, and did not inform the other party, is bound to redress the damage which the other party sustained by concluding the contract without knowledge of the impossibility of performance (art. 387 § 2). The same distinction between "objective" (nullity) and "subjective" impossibility (rescission) is made in BULGARIAN law. CZECH law is similar. The CC § 37(2) provides that if the object of performance of a juridical act is impossible, the juridical act is invalid (absolutely), however it is interpreted rather restrictively, i.e. the impossibility must be objective and definite – e.g. a contract for delivery of goods may not be held invalid for impossibility of performance if the goods are designated generically; for details see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 248. In SLOVENIA too, "objective" impossibility of performance at the time of conclusion is a ground for the nullity of the contract or other juridical act, see LOA §§ 34 and 35. The party who knew or ought to have known about the impossibility is liable for damages arising out of nullity of contract, sustained by the other party, not knowing about the impossibility, see LOA § 91. Mere "subjective" impossibility does not prevent the contract coming into existence. For details, see Možina, p. 334.

3. In SLOVAKIA initial impossibility is a ground for the invalidity of the juridical act (CC § 37(2)). If damages arise due to invalidity of the juridical act, the liability for that damage is regulated by the provisions of the CC on liability for damage (CC § 42). If the creation, change or extinction of a right or obligation is linked to fulfilment of an impossible condition, the condition is not taken into consideration (CC § 36(1)).

4. In other systems the same results do not necessarily follow. Thus in GREEK law initial impossibility is a ground for avoidance but does not render the contract void, CC arts. 362-364. In NORDIC law impossibility does not invalidate the contract: see Ramberg, Köplagen, 314. DUTCH law resembles the commented Article in that a contract is not invalid merely because at the time of the conclusion of the contract performance is impossible (Parlementaire Geschiedenis Boek 6, pp. 485 and 896 and Asser-Hartkamp, 4-I, De verbintenis in het algemeen, no. 26). The same holds true for the situation that a party is not entitled to dispose of any assets to which the contract relates: a contract is according to Dutch law not invalid merely on this latter ground either.

5. In ENGLAND and IRELAND there are traces of the traditional civil law doctrine. First, a contract to sell specific goods which without the knowledge of the seller have perished at the time the contract is made is void: Sale of Goods Act 1979, s. 6. However it is now widely accepted that the common law is more flexible; a contract for non-existent goods may be void for common mistake but is not necessarily so. Thus in a case in which a seller purported to sell goods which, as the seller should have known, had never existed at all, the High Court of Australia held that the contract was not void; the seller was liable for non-delivery: McRae v. Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1950) 84 CLR 377 (the illustration in the comment is based on this case). Secondly, the doctrine of common mistake (the "common law" rule) results in the contract being void, not voidable. It had been said that there is a separate rule in equity that a contract may be voidable for common fundamental mistake: see Solle v. Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671, CA, but the Court of Appeal has now held this to be incorrect: Great Peace Shipping Ltd. v. Tsavliris Salvage (International) Ltd. (The Great Peace) [2002] EWCA Civ 1407, [2003] QB 679. See Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 5-009 and 5-043-5-049.

6. SCOTTISH law holds that impossibility at the time of the contract can in certain circumstances make it void (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.34-38). The concept of common error making the resultant contract void has been adopted, the error being in the “essentials” or the “substantial’s” of the contract (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.35-39; Stair, The Laws of Scotland XV, paras. 690-691); but parties may contract to undertake the risk of the impossibility of the performance required (e.g. Gillespie v. Howden (1885) 12 R 800; Pender-Small v. Kinloch’s Trustees 1917 SC 307).

7. In ESTONIAN law, LOA § 12(1) expressly states that the validity of a contract is not affected by the fact that, at the time of entry into the contract, the performance of the contract was impossible or one of the parties did not have the right to dispose of the thing or right which is the object of the contract. However, this does not preclude the voidability of the contract on the ground of fundamental mistake (GPCCA § 92).

8. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 227(2) contracts providing for the performance of impossible services are void.

Section 2: Vitiated consent or intention

II.–7:201: Mistake

(1) A party may avoid a contract for mistake of fact or law existing when the contract was concluded if:

(a) the party, but for the mistake, would not have concluded the contract or would have done so only on fundamentally different terms and the other party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known this; and

(b) the other party;

(i) caused the mistake;

(ii) caused the contract to be concluded in mistake by leaving the mistaken party in error, contrary to good faith and fair dealing, when the other party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the mistake;

(iii) caused the contract to be concluded in mistake by failing to comply with a pre-contractual information duty or a duty to make available a means of correcting input errors; or

(iv) made the same mistake.

(2) However a party may not avoid the contract for mistake if:

(a) the mistake was inexcusable in the circumstances; or

(b) the risk of the mistake was assumed, or in the circumstances should be borne, by that party.

COMMENTS

A. General

It frequently happens that a party concludes a contract on the basis of a misapprehension about the facts or the law affecting the contract. As will appear from the Notes, there are substantial differences between the laws of the Member States in the way in which such cases are conceptualised and also in the substantive outcomes. In particular, some systems are very reluctant to grant relief when a party has concluded the contract as the result of a "self-induced" mistake, rather than as the result of incorrect information given by the other party. Moreover, even if the other party becomes aware of the first party's mistake, the other party may not be required to point it out. Others laws treat such conduct, depending on the circumstances, as contrary to good faith; and may allow a party to avoid a contract on the ground of a serious mistake even if it was self-induced and unknown to the other party. This Article (along with the following four Articles) seeks to set out principles which strike a fair balance between the voluntary nature of contract and protecting reasonable reliance by the other party. It does not purport to lay down rules which are "common principles" to be found in the different laws, though it reflects what is found in many of them. In appropriate cases, particularly in consumer contracts, the provisions of this Article will fall to be supplemented by rules on pre-contractual information duties, see Chapter 3, Section 1 (Information duties).

While the principle of freedom of contract suggests that a party should not be bound to a contract unless the consent to it was informed, the need for security of transactions suggests that the other party should in general terms be able to rely on the existence of the contract unless that other party:

(a) has not acted in good faith; or
(b) has taken deliberate advantage of the first party in circumstances in which standards of fair dealing would not permit this; or
(c) has behaved carelessly or in some other way which was unreasonable.

Further, a party who has entered a contract under some mistake or misapprehension should not normally be entitled to avoid a contract unless the misapprehension was very serious. Thus a contract may be set aside for mistake only if the mistake is such that but for the mistake the mistaken party would not have concluded the contract or would have done so only on fundamentally different terms. The only exception is the case of fraud, where the intention to deceive is itself a sufficient ground to justify the innocent party having the power to avoid the contract.

If one of the conditions (a) - (c) above is satisfied, and, even on a correct interpretation of the contract, a party has made a mistake which is to something fundamental (see D below), there may be a case for a remedy.

It may also be appropriate to allow the contract to be avoided when a mistake which both parties shared has made the contract fundamentally different to what was anticipated. Here there was usually no bad faith, advantage-taking or careless behaviour at the time the contract was made, but this is a risk which neither party anticipated and which the contract did not allocate. In such a case it may be bad faith to insist on the contract being carried through when it has turned out to be fundamentally different from what either party anticipated.

B. Priority of interpretation

Before a remedy on the ground of mistake is allowed, it is frequently necessary to consult the contract and to interpret its provisions to see whether it in fact covers the situation which has now been revealed. If it does, there will be no ground for invoking mistake.

Illustration 1
A builder employed to build a house finds, when starting to dig the foundations, that across the site runs an old sewer which is not marked on the maps and which neither it nor the employer had ever expected. This will make completion of the task very much more expensive. It must first be determined whether the contract, as properly interpreted, covers the problem. If the contract provides that in the event of "unforeseeable ground conditions" the contractor is entitled to extra time and extra payment, and a correct interpretation of "unforeseeable ground conditions" would include the sewer, there is no basis for the contractor to invoke this Article.

C. Mistake must make contract fundamentally different

Security of transactions demands that parties should not be able to escape from contracts because of misapprehensions as to the nature or quality of the performance unless the mistakes are very serious. It is only in the case where the seller knows that the buyer would not enter the contract at all, or would only do so on fundamentally different terms, that the seller should be required to point out the buyer's mistake. Less important misapprehensions must be borne by the party on whom they fall. Equally only very serious shared mistakes should give rise to relief. The Article therefore confines relief for mistake to cases where the other party knew or should have known that the mistaken party, if aware of the true situation, would not have entered the contract or would have done so only on fundamentally different terms.

It is not sufficient that the matter in question should have been "material" in the sense of being such as to merely influence the decision as to whether to contract or as to the terms on which to contract. A matter may be material in this sense without being fundamental. For example it might have slightly affected the price the mistaken party would have agreed to pay. A material difference between offer and acceptance may prevent the formation of a contract; but a mistake as to something which is material but not fundamental will not give rise to a right of avoidance under the present Article.

D. Mistakes caused by other party

Perhaps the most likely reason for a mistake is that the mistaken party has been given incorrect information by the other party, which has thus caused the mistake. When the resulting misapprehension is fundamental, the first party should be permitted to avoid the contract. Not only was the party not properly informed, but that resulted from the behaviour of the other party.

Even if the party giving the information reasonably believed it to be true, that party chose to give the information; and cannot complain if the recipient is allowed to avoid the contract provided that the resulting misapprehension was serious enough.

> Illustration 2
> The seller of the lease of a property which he had used for residential purposes told a prospective purchaser that the purchaser would be able to use it as a restaurant, which was the purchaser's main object. In fact the seller had forgotten that there was a prohibition on using the property other than for residential purposes without the landlord's consent and the landlord refuses consent. The purchaser of the lease may avoid the contract.

Depending on the facts of the case, the mistaken party may have a remedy under other Articles. For example, if the statement gave rise to a contractual obligation there will be a remedy for non-performance of the obligation. Even if the statement did not give rise to a contractual obligation there may be a remedy for fraud or a right to damages for loss caused by incorrect information which the party giving it had no reasonable grounds for believing to be true.

In these cases the misapprehension which results from the incorrect statement need not be fundamental. But if the conditions of (i) - (iv) are not met, or if there has been no fundamental non-performance or fraud and the mistaken party wants to avoid the contract, that may be done only on the basis of fundamental mistake under this Article.

There will also be ground for avoidance if the mistake was caused by the other party in some other way than by the giving of false information. For example, a party may have set up a website in such a way as to induce parties entering into contracts through that website to make certain errors.

E. Mistake known to other party

A party should not normally be permitted to remain silent, with the deliberate intention of deceiving the other party, on some point which might influence the other party's decision on whether or not to enter the contract. It is true that some legal systems within the EU as a general rule do allow a party to remain silent about important information, even if aware that it would influence the other's decision. That may be appropriate in certain cases, for example when the knowledgeable party has only gained the knowledge at considerable expense, or in highly competitive commercial situations (see Illustration 2 below), but as a blanket rule it is not appropriate. It does not accord with either commercial morality or what contracting parties will normally expect of each other. Unless there is a good reason for allowing the party to remain silent, silence is incompatible with good faith and will entitle the other party to avoid the contract under this Article.

The Article recognises a general principle that a party should not be entitled knowingly to take advantage of a serious mistake by the other as to the relevant facts or law. The same applies when it cannot be shown that the non-mistaken party actually knew of the mistake but where that party could reasonably be expected to have known of the mistake because it was obvious.

Illustration 3
A sells her house to B without revealing to B that A knows there is extensive rot under the floor of one room. She does not mention it because she assumes B will be aware of the risk of it from the fact that there are damp marks on the wall and will have the floor checked. B does not appreciate the risk and buys the house without having the floor checked. B may avoid the contract.

Illustration 4
Through extensive research, A discovers that demand for a particular chemical made by X Corporation is about to rise dramatically. A buys a large number of shares in X Corporation from B without revealing his knowledge, which he knows B does not share. B has no remedy.

F. Breach of pre-contractual information duties etc.

Paragraph (1)(b)(iii) deals with a situation where there is a breach, not of a general duty of good faith, but of a particular pre-contractual information duty or a duty to make available a means of correcting input errors and where that breach has caused the contract to be concluded. This provision therefore provides a sanction for duties laid down elsewhere in these rules (see Chapter 3, Section 1 (Information duties) and Chapter 3, Section 2 (Duty to prevent input errors) of this Book and the pre-contractual information duties laid down in Book IV in relation to specific contracts).

G. Shared mistake

When both parties conclude a contract under a serious misapprehension as to the facts the question is a different one. It must be asked whether the contract was intended to allocate the risk of the loss caused by the facts turning out to be different. Sometimes the parties realised that their knowledge was limited, or the contract was by its nature speculative; then it can be said that the contract was intended to apply despite the difference between what the parties assumed and reality. But sometimes it is more realistic to say that the risk of the facts turning out to be different was not allocated by the contract. If the result is that the contract would be very seriously different for one party, that party should have the right to avoid it. This usually results in the resulting losses being divided between the parties, if only in a very rough and ready way.

Illustration 5
An Englishwoman who owns a cottage in France agrees to rent it for one month to a Danish friend, although the Englishwoman does not normally rent the cottage. The lease is to start five days later. The Dane books non-refundable air tickets to fly to France. It is then discovered that the cottage had been totally destroyed by fire the night before the contract was agreed. The contract may be avoided by either party, with the result that no rent is payable and the Dane gets no compensation for the wasted air tickets.

H. No special categories

It is not necessary to lay down categories of misapprehension which will give rise, or not give rise, to a remedy for mistake. So the Article provides that the mistake may be about the facts surrounding the contract or the law affecting it. The Article does not apply to cases in which one party has performed the contract or intends to do so knowing that it involves an illegal act. The effects of illegality are covered separately.

Mistakes which relate to the mere value of the item sold are not usually fundamental. There is no explicit rule refusing any relief in this case.

Illustration 6
A woman pays €200,000 for an antique desk made by Chippendale. She agrees to this price because she has read that such prices were commonly paid for Chippendale desks a few years ago. She does not know that subsequently the market prices for antique furniture of all types have declined dramatically and that the desk is much less valuable than she supposed. She may not avoid the contract.

Cases of initial impossibility and the non-existence of a thing sold are treated in the same way as other mistakes. The contract may be avoided for mistake but it is not void for lack of an object. Indeed there may be cases in which a sale of a non-existent object is valid and the seller is liable for non-performance, because the court concludes that in the circumstances the seller should bear the risk.

Illustration 7
J sells K a piece of used equipment which is on a remote construction site from which K is to collect it; it is not feasible for K to inspect the equipment before agreeing to purchase. When K arrives there it finds that the equipment had been destroyed by fire some time before the contract was made. J should have known this. J is liable for non-performance and cannot avoid the contract for mistake.

See also Illustration 5 above.

Mistakes as to the person are treated in the same way as other mistakes.

I. Mistakes in communication

A frequent form of mistake is that one party makes some slip in communicating intentions, e.g. by writing 10,000 instead of 100,000. Such mistakes may be brought within the Article by virtue of the following Article.

J. Mistake inexcusable

It does not seem appropriate to allow a party who was a major cause of the mistake to avoid the contract because of it unless the other party was at least equally to blame. That would allow the first party to shift the consequences of the carelessness on to the other party. The other should not normally bear the burden of checking that the first party has not made careless mistakes. On the other hand, if the second party is aware that the first has made a mistake and it would take little trouble to point it out, the fact that the first party has been careless should not prevent relief and the mistake should not be treated as inexcusable.

> Illustration 8
> N asks for bids for a piece of construction work. The information given to tenderers indicates that the contractor will probably strike rock at one point on the site. O sends in a tender which has no item for excavating rock, only for excavating soil. N should point this out, and if it does not and the mistake is sufficiently serious, O should be able to avoid the contract.

K. Risk

There are some contracts under which the parties are deliberately taking the risk of the unknown, or should be treated as so doing. In such a case a party should not be able to avoid the contract for mistake if the risk eventuates. One example of this is where one party is well aware that the contract is being concluded without knowledge of an important matter but proceeds to conclude the contract anyway.

> Illustration 9
> A decides to sell at an auction the entire contents of a house he has inherited. He is conscious that he does not know the value of the items, but he deliberately decides not to bother to have them valued first. At the auction B buys a picture for a low price. B knows that it is by Constable but does not point this out. A cannot avoid the contract for mistake.

In other cases one party should be seen as taking the risk.

> Illustration 10
> A yacht chandler in England charters to a German amateur sailor a yacht which both parties believe to be moored at Marseilles. Unknown to either party, shortly beforehand the yacht had been sunk when it was rammed by another vessel. The chandler, being a professional dealing with a non-professional, and moreover being in a position to know the facts whereas the other party had no possibility of this, may not avoid the contract but is liable for non-performance of the obligations under it.

L. Remedies

The normal remedy for mistake is for the mistaken party, or the one who wishes to escape from a contract entered under a shared mistake, to avoid the contract as a whole or in part.

The question of damages is dealt with in other Articles but it may be noted here that the mistaken party may be able to recover damages where the mistake was the result of incorrect information given by the other party, or where the mistake was or should have been known to the other party, or was caused by the other party.

NOTES

In all the systems, a contract which one or both parties have entered into as the result of a mistake may, under varying conditions, be escaped from by the mistaken party or, where the mistake is shared, by either of the parties. This includes cases in which the "mistake" involved some error in expression or communication, so that the question relates to the terms of the contract; this is dealt with in the following Article. This note deals with mistakes as to the facts or the law.

I. Mistake, misrepresentation and other doctrines

1. In many systems, the doctrine of mistake is available in a wide range of circumstances and is a ground on which relief is given quite frequently (for AUSTRIA and GERMANY see CC §§ 871 et seq. and CC §§ 119 et seq. for mistakes in communication and mistakes regarding essential elements of the contract or the scope of the contract, but in general not for mistakes as to the motive). In contrast, the ENGLISH and IRISH doctrines of mistake as to facts are very narrow and there are few cases. The principal reason for this is that the doctrines are limited to cases of shared (or "common") mistake. In practice, many of the cases that in some other systems would fall under the doctrine of mistake will be dealt with in the English and Irish systems under the doctrine of "innocent" misrepresentation. This is an equitable extension of the rules of fraud to cover cases in which one party has misled the other into making the contract by giving, innocently (i.e. without fraud), incorrect factual information: see Redgrave v. Hurd (1880) 20 Ch. D 1. Thus if a seller of land has (without fraud) given the buyer incorrect information about it, in many systems the case is likely to be dealt with via mistake (e.g. in FRENCH law, The Villa Jacqueline case, Civ. 23.11.1931, DP 1932.1.129, note Josserand); in the English and Irish law the mistaken party would be permitted to avoid the contract on the ground of misrepresentation. SCOTTISH law in principle allows relief on the ground of a mistake more readily than does English law and Irish law, but in practice relief is more often obtained on the ground of misrepresentation and there have been very few cases in which mistake has been pleaded successfully without a preceding misrepresentation (though see Angus v. Bryden 1992 SLT 884).
2. In some systems, what in functional terms may be cases of mistake may be covered by separate rules. Thus in some systems, as an alternative to relief on the ground of mistake, relief may be given on the basis of clausula rebus sic stantibus: e.g. GERMAN law, where the doctrine may apply to changes which have already occurred when the contract was made if the parties were not aware of the change, see CC § 313(2); POLISH CC (art. 357^1); PORTUGUESE CC art. 252(1); SPANISH case law, TS 6 October 1987, 16 October 1989, 10 December 1990 and 8 July 1991; ESTONIAN LOA § 97; BULGARIAN law LOA art. 210 (on sale of land with an area different from the promised one – actio de modo agri). NORDIC law has a doctrine of "failure of assumptions" or implied conditions: see Dahl 250-252. However, in Sweden the matter is controversial, see Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 235-246, and in FINLAND the applicability of this principle is more limited, Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 402-411; relief is also possible via interpretation or via the general clause on unfair contract terms in Contracts Act § 36. In AUSTRIA the ConsProtA contains special rules in relation to mistake, which allow avoidance of the contract if expected circumstances in the future are not met (§ 3a KSchG). In SLOVENIA, the rules on the avoidability of contract in case of "lesion" (laesio enormis, LOA § 118) are considered to be a special kind of mistake, see Juhart and Plavšak, Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 621.

3. Rules requiring a contract to have an object and a cause can also be used as a functional equivalent of rules on mistake. In a French case M agreed with R (as was legally permissible) to do R's military service in R's place. Unknown to either of them, R was not liable for service. It was held that the agreement lacked both objet and cause: Req. 30 July 1873, S. 1873.1.448, D. 1873.1.330. Under the present Article this would be dealt with as a case of mistake.

4. A different example is that many systems preserve special regimes for defects in property sold, e.g. GERMAN CC §§ 434 ff.; FRENCH and BELGIAN CC arts. 1641-1649; BULGARIAN LOA arts. 191 ff; POLISH CC arts. 556-581 and special statutes concerning consumer sales (French law: L.211-1 and L.221-1 C. conso.); CZECH law: Supreme Court 25 Cdo 1454/2000 (the buyer may claim a remedy for defects in goods only under the rules on liability for defects and not under the rules on mistake); ESTONIAN LOA §§ 217 ff; PORTUGUESE CC arts. 913-921 and Decree-Law 63/2003, 8 April 2003 concerning consumer sales. There are major differences as to whether these special rules prevail over the general rules on mistake or whether a buyer who is disappointed with the qualities of the property purchased may claim on either ground.

II. Mistake as to any matter which was fundamental to the mistaken party

5. In all the systems a party who has entered a contract under a serious mistake as to the substance of the subject matter of the contract may, subject to differing conditions, avoid the contract. In the majority of systems the party seeking avoidance must show, broadly speaking, (i) that the mistake was sufficiently serious that the mistaken party would not have entered the contract on the terms it did had it known the truth, and (ii) that the other party knew or should have known that the matter was of importance to the mistaken party. Thus the systems draw a contrast with cases of fraud, where any fraud will entitle the innocent party to avoid the contract. In many systems there is a strong tradition that, to be a ground for avoidance, the mistake must relate to the subject matter of the contract, as opposed to a motive for entering the contract, but this restriction is not universal. It is discussed in Note 6(a) below.

6. In FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG, CCs art. 1110 allow relief for erreur in cases of mistake as to the substance of the subject-matter of the contract. Case law has interpreted this broadly. Thus, in France, provided that the error was déterminant for the party seeking to avoid the contract and this was known to the other party, relief may be given, see Civ. 17 November 1930, S. 1932.1.17, DP 1932.1.161, GazPal 1930.2.1031, Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], nos. 497-507; Civ. 23 November 1931, DP 1932.1.129, n. Josserand; Civ. 27 April 1953, D. 1953 Somm.Comm. 97; Paris 14 October 1931, D. 1934.2.128. When the characteristic is objectively non-essential but has nonetheless determined the consent of the mistaken party, the contract can be avoided for mistake only if the mistake has entered the contractual field, that is to say only if the other party knew that the characteristic which, in actual fact, did not exist, was of importance to the mistaken party. The rules on error are interpreted similarly in Belgium: the error was related to an element that convinced the mistaken party to conclude the contract (Cass. 31 Oct. 1966, Arr.Cass. 1967, 301; Cass. 3 March 1967, Arr.Cass. 1967, 829; Cass. 27 Oct. 1995, Pas. belge 1995, 950) and the importance of that element "entered the contractual sphere" (the other party did know it or ought to know it); a party should not be able to rely on the absence of some characteristic which would not be important to the normal person unless its importance to him had been indicated to the other party, see De Boeck, Informatierechten en –plichten, no. 539; Storme, Invloed Nos. 180 ff; and Luxembourg, Tribunal Luxembourg 1 March 1966, Pasicrisie 20, p. 142 and, on the other party's knowledge, Cour, 30 June 1993, Pasicrisie 29, p. 253; 9 February 2000, 31, 956. The situation is similar in BULGARIA too, but the knowledge of the other party of the mistake has no independent and governing meaning in respect of the importance of the mistake.

7. In GERMAN law the relevant provision of the CC (§ 119), has two paragraphs; and the situations envisaged by the present Article may fall under either. CC § 119(1) deals with errors as to the content of the declaration. If a party's mistake leads to stipulation x when in fact y is intended (see RG 11 March 1909, RGZ 70, 391 ff) there may be a mistaken declaration under § 119(1). Other situations envisaged by the present Article (except those involving error in motive, see Note 6(a)), would fall under CC § 119(2). This covers errors relating to any characteristic of the subject matter, e.g. the age of a car sold (BGH 26 October 1978, NJW 1979, 160, 161), provided the quality is essential for the contract in question and the parties concerned: BGH 22 September 1983, BGHZ 88, 240. The test under § 119(2) is whether the error concerns qualities that business regards as essential; and there has been a debate as to whether this refers to the objective perception of business in general or that of the parties concerned (Flume AT II, § 24 2a). The BGH has ruled that a quality is essential for business if the mistaken party has based its declaration on the quality in question and that was discernable by the other party, even if it was not agreed on or made part of the mistaken party's declaration (BGH 22 September 1983, BGHZ 88, 240, 246). Under CC § 119(1) the test is whether the person would have made the declaration if he or she had known and reasonably understood the situation. GREEK law is similar: CC arts. 140, 141; A.P. 1109/1976 EEN 44 (1977) 311-312.

8. The ITALIAN CC art. 1428 requires that the mistake be essential and recognisable by the other party; arts. 1431 and 1429 state explicitly that the importance of the mistake must be apparent to the other party. PORTUGUESE law requires that the error as to the quality of the subject matter be as to a matter which determined the assent of the aggrieved party and that the importance of the matter was known or should have been known to the other party, CC art. 247. The SPANISH CC art. 1266 provides that an error may invalidate a contract; the error must be substantial or essential and these requirements are interpreted strictly, Morales, Comentario del Codigo Civil, Ministerio de Justicia, art 1266, p. 459. The SPANISH Supreme Court has long held the persuasive doctrine that mistake is only excusable if it can be attributed to the conduct of the other party. Only a few cases have held that a contract can be avoided by mistake alone: (TS 14 June 1943, RAJ (1943) 719, TS 18 February 1994, RAJ (1994), 1096, TS 28 September 1996, RAJ (1996), 6820; De Castro, El negocio jurídico, p. 102; Morales, El error en los contratos, 1988, pp. 215 ff). The AUSTRIAN law of mistake generally only recognises mistakes as to the subject matter or content of the contract, mistakes regarding the other party and mistakes in the declaration. Mistakes regarding the motive are only relevant under certain circumstances, if e.g. the motive is made a condition for the conclusion of the contract, in cases of fraud or coercion or with donations (see also note 22 below). The mistake must have been decisive for the mistaken party to conclude the contract. Austrian law distinguishes between "essential" (CC § 871) and "non essential" (CC § 872) mistakes. The former give a right to avoid the contract; the latter to a claim of adaptation, if the non-mistaken party would also have agreed to the different content, see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 147 et seq.

9. POLISH CC art. 84 requires the mistake to be essential. Where a declaration of will containing a mistake is made to another person, the mistake must be caused by that person (even if without fault) or must be one which was known to, or could easily have been noticed by, that person. The latter limitations do not apply to gratuitous juridical acts.

10. In the NORDIC Contract Acts § 33, which regulate mistakes other than errors in communication, the question is whether good faith and honesty require that the contract be annulled. The mistake must concern some fact which fundamentally influenced the contract (e.g. Finnish CC 1972 II 84, CC 1970 II 38 and CC 1998:150 e.g. in Sisula-Tulokas, Contract and tort law: twenty cases from the Finnish Supreme Court) and good faith will not be contravened unless the non-mistaken party knew or must have known of the importance of the matter to the other (see Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 196; a more liberal test, 'ought the party to have known?', may be applied under the doctrine of 'failure of assumptions', Note 1 above, Lynge Andersen 189 and 193 ff). The NORDIC Contract Acts § 36 allow for a general possibility to adopt contracts due to unreasonableness which may include mistakes. According to BULGARIAN law the mistake is relevant only if it is "material" in relation to the contract's object or if it relates to the person of the other party in the case of intuito personae contracts. The knowledge of the other party of the mistake is not important except in relation to damages in case of avoidance of the contract, where the other party can seek damages only if it was in good faith. Doctrine has unfortunately not yet explored all of the problem areas in this field.

11. In ENGLAND and IRELAND relief for mistake (which as noted earlier, must be shared mistake) only applies when the mistake is as to the existence or ownership of the subject matter of the contract, or "as to the existence of some quality which makes the thing without the quality essentially different from the thing it was supposed to be": Lord Atkin in Bell v. Lever Bros. [1932] AC 161, 218, HL This requirement seems to be interpreted very strictly. Lord Atkin said that there would be no relief if the parties mistakenly bought and sold a horse that they thought was sound when it was not, or leased a house that they thought was habitable when it was not; in neither case would the subject-matter (the horse or the house) be essentially different. In Great Peace Shipping Ltd. v. Tsavliris Salvage (International) Ltd. (The Great Peace) [2002] EWCA Civ 1407, [2003] QB 679 the Court of Appeal said that the mistake must make the "contractual adventure" impossible: at [70]. See Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 5-040. IRISH law may be more liberal: see Western Potato Co-operative v. Durnan [1985] ILRM 5, CC. So were some of the English cases which allowed relief in equity for common mistake: e.g. Grist v. Bailey [1967] Ch 532, ChD; but these can no longer be regarded as good law: see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 5-009 and 5-043-5-049. As stated earlier, in English and Irish law, in cases where only one party is mistaken, any relief is given on the basis of misrepresentation. Originally, the misrepresentee could rescind as of right provided the misrepresentation was material (i.e. not so unimportant that no reasonable person would be influenced by it: see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 9-013 – 9-016) and it had been at least one factor which had induced the conclusion of the contract; it did not need be of particular importance or the main reason for the decision (see Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 6-033). However since the passing of the (English) Misrepresentation Act 1967, s. 2(2) the court has power to declare the contract subsisting, and to award damages in lieu of rescission, if that would be more equitable. The fact that the representation was relatively unimportant is one reason for refusing to permit rescission: William Sindall v. Cambridge C.C. [1994] 1 WLR 1016, CA

12. SCOTTISH law also limits relief on the ground of mistake to "essential error", which must be as to something essential to both parties, Bell, Principles, s. 11; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.04 f. However it also gives more liberal relief for error induced by misrepresentation: see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.43-15.73; Stair, The Laws of Scotland XV, paras. 680-685. It has been suggested that the Scottish case law can be best explained by using the distinction between error in transaction and error in motive, with the latter only relevant if caused by the other party's misrepresentation: SME, vol. 15, paras. 686-694. MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, chaps. 4.35-4.66; Gloag & Henderson (12th edn), chaps. 6.21-6.33.

13. The SLOVAK CC requires the mistake to be essential. This means that the acting person made the juridical act in mistake arising from a circumstance decisive for the making of the act (CC § 49a). This is interpreted very broadly. The mistake may be as to the subject matter of the contract (error in corpore), as to quality (error in qualitate), as to the party to the contract (error in persona), as to the legal interpretation of the juridical act etc. Error must be essential objectively with regard to all the circumstances. (see Lazar, J. et al.: Občianske právo hmotné. 1. zväzok, Iura Edition 2006, p. 128)

14. A liberal approach on the question of the other party's knowledge is that of DUTCH CC art. 6:228(1). This requires that the contract was entered into under the influence of error and would not have been entered into had there been a correct assessment of the facts. Relief will not be given if the other party was justified in assuming that the mistake was not important to the other party. When this party knew or ought to have known that the mistaken party, had it known the truth, would have entered into the contract on only slightly different terms, this is sufficient for avoidance of the contract (Asser-Hartkamp II, Verbintenissenrecht, no. 177 and HR April 3, NedJur 2003, 361) (In Dutch law relief is limited in other ways.)

15. In relation to additional prerequisites that the fact of the mistake is known or caused by the non-mistaken party (GPCCA § 92(3), 1), 2)), the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 92(1)-(2) adopts a general objective criterion, requiring that the mistake as an erroneous assumption relating to existing facts was of such importance that a reasonable person similar to the person who entered into the transaction would not have entered into the transaction in the same situation or would have entered into the transaction under materially different conditions. A subjective criterion restricts the right to avoid the contract in cases of shared mistake as GPCCA § 92(3) 3) provides that the mistaken party may not seek relief if the other party could have presumed, having the correct perception of the circumstances, that the mistaken party would have entered into the transaction even if aware of the mistake

16. In CZECH law, only a decisive error counts (CC § 49a), i.e. the party would not have entered the contract or at least not under the same conditions if the party had not been mistaken. Errors are classified into errors in legal title (error in negotio), errors in the object of a contract (error in corpore), errors in quality of the object of a contract (error in qualitate), errors as to the person of the contractual partner (error in persona) and errors in other circumstances which are decisive according to the expressed will of the mistaken party, see Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 154. The courts have held that the contractual partner's false assurance of solvency may lead to a decisive mistake (Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 315).

17. SLOVENIAN law requires the mistake to be essential (and excusable), see LOA § 46(2). Essential mistake is defined as relating to circumstances considered to be decisive from the viewpoint of the intention of the parties (subjective criteria) or the usages of the trade (objective criteria), i.e. the party would not have entered the contract or not under these terms, see LOA § 46(1). In this article, two cases of per se essential mistake are mentioned: mistake relating to essential characteristic of the object and mistake relating to a person, when the contract is concluded in view of this person. According to legal scholars the subjective criteria (i.e. the decisive criteria for one party of which the other party was aware or could not have been unaware) takes precedence – the parties can elevate a circumstance, which would not be considered essential under objective criteria, to be the decisive one, see Juhart and Plavšak (-Dolenc), Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 347).

III. Fact of mistake known to, or caused by, other party

18. This note and the next consider the position of the party against whom relief is sought. One possibility is that that party has made the same mistake: this is dealt with in the next note. Another is that that party caused the mistake, e.g. by giving incorrect information. Or perhaps that party knew or should have known of the mistake. Are any of these essential before the mistaken party can avoid the contract?

19. As we have seen, some systems require that a party has made a serious mistake and that the non-mistaken party knew that the matter about which there was a mistake was determining; but they do not require that the non-mistaken party knew there had been a mistake or contributed to it. In GREEK law it is not necessary that the non-mistaken party knew of the mistake. Similarly, in GERMAN law, though some writers have argued that relief should be given only when the mistake was caused by the other party or where the latter at least ought to have realised the mistake (MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, § 119 nos. 113 et seq.), the courts and the prevailing opinion have not required that the other party knew of the mistake. This may seem liberal, but it should be noted that in both systems the mistaken party may be required to compensate the non-mistaken party for losses thereby caused (Greek CC art. 145; German CC § 122). The non-mistaken party's knowledge is relevant to this; under Greek CC art. 145 and German CC § 122(2) the mistaken party is not liable for damages where the other party knew or should have known of the mistake. The solution is the same in BULGARIA, LOA art. 28(3). Also in PORTUGUESE law, and in FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law, as well as in SLOVENIAN law, a mistaken party may get relief even though the other party did not know of the mistake (if there was such knowledge, there may be dol) and did not cause it. Thus in French law, mistake is treated as a defective consent and not as a defective behaviour. It is a matter of protecting the mistaken party, not of punishing the other party for it. The mistaken party might be liable for having committed a pre-contractual fault but it is said that in practice this is not found: Rodière, Vices 23. However, in Belgium the tendency is to treat a mistake as excusable when it was the result of the fault (incorrect information or failure to disclose) by the other party (De Boeck, Informatierechten en –plichten, no. 544; but where the mistake was the consequence of one's own failure to investigate, or perhaps to check the information given, to hold that the mistake was inexcusable and thus that there is no right to avoidance (see note 12 below). See Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994, p. 338; Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 107; Luxembourg, 1 March 1966, 20, 142.

20. CZECH law (CC § 49a) sets forth three situations in which an error is legally relevant: (i) the party knew or must have known about the mistake of the other party, (ii) the party induced the mistake of the other party (even if the former party did not know about the mistake or if the mistake was not the former party's fault), and (iii) the party intentionally induced the mistake of the other party (fraud). In the first two cases the mistake must concern a fact which was (objectively) decisive for the conclusion of the contract; in the third case the mistake may concern any fact relevant to the contract.

21. Some systems are less ready to grant avoidance (but they have no provision for damages to the non-mistaken party). Thus under AUSTRIAN CC § 871(1) a claim for avoidance on the ground of mistake may be brought only if the mistake was or should have been known to the other party, or was caused by the other party, or if the mistaken party notified the other promptly of the mistake. This last requirement is deemed satisfied if the mistake is notified before the non-mistaken party has made a disposition in reliance on the contract (see Bydlinski, Bürgerliches Recht I[3], no. 8/19). ITALIAN CC arts. 1429, 1431 require that a mistake by one party be patent, i.e. one that should be apparent to the other party. DUTCH CC art. 6:228(1) requires that the mistake either have been caused by incorrect information given by the other party, or be one that the other party, in view of what that party knew or should have known of the error, should have pointed out to the mistaken party. Similarly, the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 92(3) provides for the right for avoidance only if the mistake was caused by circumstances disclosed by the other party to the transaction, or non-disclosure of circumstances by the other party if disclosure of the circumstances was required pursuant to the principle of good faith; the other party knew or should have known of the mistake and leaving the mistaken party in error was contrary to the principle of good faith; or parties share the mistake. In the case of a unilateral transaction, the person to whom the declaration of intention is directed and the person who acquires rights on the basis of the transaction is deemed to be the other party within the meaning of those requirements (GPCCA § 92(4)).

22. The NORDIC systems base relief for mistake on the principle of good faith. Thus relief will be refused unless the non-mistaken party actually knew of the mistake, see Contract Acts § 33. In some decisions this rule has been extended to situations where the party "must have known" of the mistake, and FINNISH courts have extended it to situations where the party "ought to have known" (e.g. CC 1968 II 33). Relief will also be given in Nordic law if the non-mistaken party caused the mistake (see Swedish Sup.Ct. NJA 1985 p. 178, Kalmar varv; Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 227 f).

23. As stated earlier, ENGLISH and IRISH law will not allow escape from the contract on the ground of mistake unless the mistake was shared. Avoidance may be given for misrepresentation but only where one party misled the other, see above. SCOTTISH law generally requires that the error have been induced by the other party's misrepresentation (Stewart v. Kennedy (1890) 17 R (HL) 25; Menzies v. Menzies (1893) 20 R (HL) 108) and has been reluctant to recognise uninduced unilateral error (Spook Erection (Northern) Lyd v. Kaye 1990 SLT 676; but there may be an exception where the other party knew and took advantage of the other party's essential error about the meaning of the contract (Steuart's Trustees v. Hart (1875) 3 R 192; Angus v. Bryden 1992 SLT 884). See Stair, The Laws of Scotland XV, para 694; MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, §§ 4.45-4.56; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.30-15.33.

24. For HUNGARIAN law see Notes to II.–7:101 (Scope).

IV. Shared mistake

25. All the systems allow avoidance by either party where the parties have entered the contract under a shared fundamental mistake; see, e.g., on ITALIAN law, Pietrobon 517, 527 and Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 191 with further references; on AUSTRIA, OGH 2 September 1980, SZ 53/108; 15 June 1983, SZ 56/96; 3 March 1988, SZ 61/53 (but discussed controversially in the literature see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 871 no. 18); in ESTONIA: GPCCA § 92(3) 3); on FRENCH law, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 217; on SCOTTISH law, Hamilton v. Western Bank of Scotland (1861) 23 D 1033.

V. Relief where the other party has not yet relied on the contract

26. UNIDROIT art. 3.5.1(b) adds an additional circumstance in which the mistaken party may escape: if the other has not yet relied on the contract. Of the European systems, this seems to be paralleled only in AUSTRIAN law as one of the cases, which justify avoidance (see above), though in certain cases the same result may follow under the NORDIC Contract Acts § 39 but the courts in SWEDEN have been hesitant to apply the rule, see NJA 1999 s. 575 (Swedish Supreme Court), as opposed to the Danish courts, U2001.42 (Danish Supreme court). As noted earlier, GERMAN and GREEK law require the mistaken party to compensate the other for reliance loss in some circumstances. In FRANCE, the mistaken party can put in a plea of avoidance based on mistake in order to bring to a halt an action for specific performance of the obligations under a contract affected by a cause of avoidance.

VI. Particular types of mistake

(a) Mistaken motive

27. As mentioned in Note 2, there is a strong tradition excluding relief when an error relates merely to motive. Thus in FRANCE, doctrine is divided but the courts have regularly refused to permit contracts to be annulled on this ground; Benabent no. 81. Errors as to the facts which fall under GERMAN CC § 119(1) (for an example, see Note 2 above) clearly relate to the subject matter of the agreement. § 119(2) deals with errors in motivis, but to count as a sufficient error of motive under § 119(2), the mistake must be reflected in the contractual agreement. Thus someone who buys a wedding present may not avoid the contract on discovering that the wedding had in fact been called off. See also AUSTRIAN CC § 901(2); and PORTUGUESE CC art. 252(1). The Austrian Supreme Court has applied the test whether the mistake is as to what the party wants or merely as to why it is wanted: OGH 23 January 1975, EvBl 1975/205, JBl 1976, 145. In BULGARIA also a mistake in the motive is irrelevant. In GREEK law a mistake exclusively as to motive is not substantial (CC art. 143; see A.P. 268/1974, NoB 22 (1974) 1269; Balis No. 42), unless the motives have been discussed by the parties beforehand or good faith and business usage would require it to be taken into account: Full Bench of A.P. 5/1990, NoB 38 (1990) 1318 (1319 I). ITALIAN CC art. 1429 seems to exclude mistakes as to motive, since it lists ways in which a mistake may be essential and mistake as to motive is not one of them; whether the mistake may relate to a circumstance extraneous to the content of the contract is disputed; see, P.Barcellona 148, Rossello, L'errore nel contratto, 64. According to the POLISH CC the mistake must concern the essence of the juridical act (art. 84 § 1). Mistakes relating to motive are excluded. According to the SLOVAK CC and doctrine, error in motive does not make the legal act invalid. In SCOTTISH law, error in motive must be caused by the other party's misrepresentation before the contract can be avoided: Stair, The Laws of Scotland XVIII, paras. 680-686. CZECH CC § 49a stipulates that an error in motive does not invalidate the juridical act.

28. In a few systems relief may be given for errors in motive. DUTCH CC art. 6:228 is not restricted in this way. In Nordic Contract Act § 33 it does not matter that the error was in motivis; the important question is whether good faith and honesty require that the contract be annulled (e.g. FINNISH CC 1977 II 76). In SLOVENIAN law relief for a mere mistaken motive of one party is generally not granted, but an exception applies to gratuitous contracts (donations): here a mistake in the motive of one party which was decisive for assuming an obligation is relevant, too, see LOA § 47. However, the contract can only be avoided if an essential mistake is excusable, see LOA § 46(2).

29. In Bell v. Lever Bros. [1932] 161, 224 Lord Atkin gives examples of mistakes which, in English law, would not invalidate a contract. Many of these involve errors of motive. But for rescission for innocent misrepresentation, it does not matter whether the misrepresentation relates directly to the subject matter or not: e.g. Redgrave v. Hurd (1880) 20 ChD 1, where the misrepresentation related to a separate but linked transaction.

(b) Mistake as to value

30. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law refuse relief when the mistake is simply as to the value of the subject-matter of the contract, save where there has been fraud or where a narrower ground such as lésion applies (CC arts. 1118, 1674) Benabent no. 80; similarly AUSTRIAN law (OGH 30 November 1966, JB1 1967, 620) where the same is true for a mistake as to the calculation of costs. Only if the contract – visibly for both parties – is based on the calculation, is relief granted. However, a mistake as to the subject-matter may be grounds for avoidance even though the most obvious reason that this concerns the avoiding party is that the subject-matter is not worth the buying price, or is worth more than the selling price: e.g. the celebrated Poussin case in which the seller of a painting was allowed to avoid the contract when it was shown to be by that artist and not by some lesser mortal as the seller had supposed, Civ. 13 February 1983, D. 1984.340, JCP 1984.II.20186; Versailles 7 January 1987, D. 1987.485, GazPal 1987.34. Belgian case law allows relief based on the same reasons when land was sold as building land and it seems to be an error and the land is not worth the price paid (e.g. CA Brussels 28 Nov. 1987, T. Not. 1988, 39). In BULGARIA the value is obviously considered to be part of the motivation and, for this reason, no relief is granted in such cases. A mistake in calculation is not a ground for avoidance either; such a mistake should simply be corrected – LOA art. 28. Under GERMAN jurisprudence error as to mere value or market price does not give rise to relief under CC § 119(2) (BGH 18 December 1954, BGHZ 16, 54, 57), whereas an error as to the facts from which value is derived may do so; e.g. in the case of sale of a company, an error as to the possible profits from the business may be grounds for avoidance (OLG Düsseldorf, 8 November 1991, NJW-RR 1993, 377). See also Witz § 332. The position is similar in GREEK law: Georgiadis/Stathopoulos, Art. 142 no. 4; A.P. 268/1974, NoB 22 (1974) 1269; ITALIAN law, e.g. Cass. 3 April 2003, no. 5139, Foro it. 2003, I, 3047 and Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto, 516 ff; PORTUGUESE law, STJ 12 January 1973, BolMinJus 223, pp. 181 ff: and SLOVENIAN law, see e.g. Supreme Court No. II Ips 347/2004 from 18 April 2005. In Slovenian law, a contract can be challenged on the grounds of mistake as to value according to the rules on "gross disparity" (laesio enormis), see LOA § 118. Price is one of the essentials of a contract in SCOTTISH law, but this does not extend merely to making a bad bargain: before there can be avoidance there must be common error, or misrepresentation inducing the error, or a party knowing and taking advantage of the other party's error in circumstances such that the party cannot be held to be taking the risk of making an error (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.30-15.33). Other systems have no specific rule on mistakes as to value but would not normally give relief for such an error. E.g. in DUTCH law a seller would not be expected to point out such a mistake under CC art. 6:228(1)(b). There is no specific rule in ENGLISH law but it seems that a mistake merely as to something's value would never render it "essentially different from what the parties supposed it to be", see above, 2. There could be an actionable misrepresentation as to the value of the object, provided that the statement was not merely an expression of opinion but one of fact (e.g. as to the current market price). In NORDIC law, Contract Acts § 33 could be applied to a question of value (cf. FINNISH CC 1968 II 33). In POLISH law there is no specific rule on mistake as to value. However, in some contracts (e.g. sale) value can be regarded as an essential feature and a party may raise an argument that there was no consent, and hence no contract. In CZECH law, the value – if not guaranteed by the non-mistaken party in some way – would be a question of motive and thus cannot qualify as a legally relevant error (CC § 49a).

31. The present Article does not necessarily exclude mistakes as to value.

(c) Mistake as to the identity of the other party

32. The majority of systems treat a mistake as to the identity of the other party as a form of mistake as to the facts and give relief accordingly. Thus FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1110 allow mistake as to the person as a ground on nullity when the 'consideration of the person was the principal cause of the agreement' see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 219. Attributes as well as identity may be sufficiently fundamental. Similarly AUSTRIAN CC § 873; BULGARIAN LOA art. 28; CZECH law, Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 314; GREEK law, Georgiadis/ Stathopoulos, Art. 140 no. 10; ITALIAN CC art. 1429(3); SCOTTISH law, see Morrisson v. Robertson 1908 SC 332, MacLeod v. Kerr 1965 SC 253 and McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.82-15.85; SLOVENIAN LOA § 46(1); SPANISH CC art. 1266. DUTCH law treats mistaken identity as a normal case under CC art. 6:228, and NORDIC law seems to accept error in personam as falling within Contracts Act § 32, see Ussing, Aftaler[3], 179. In GERMAN law mistake as to the person is covered by CC § 119. A mistake as to the identity of the other party is treated as a mistake in the declaration under § 119(1); while a mistake as to attributes is explicitly dealt with by § 119(2). Portuguese CC art. 251 also treats a mistake as to identity as a mistake in declaration, so the contract may be annulled under art. 247; see C.M. Pinto, General Theory 517. In ENGLISH and IRISH law the case of mistaken identity does not fall under the doctrine of mistake as to the facts considered here, since mistake as to the facts has no effect on the contract unless the mistake is shared. Rather it is dealt with as a mistake over the terms: the question is whether the non-mistaken party knew or should have known that the offer was open only to the individual he was supposed by the offeror to be (Ingrams v. Little [1961] 1 QB 31, CA). Thus the mistake must normally be as to the identity, rather than the attributes, of the other party. The fact that a party wrongly assumed the other party to be credit-worthy is not a sufficient ground for relief. However, if the offer is in writing it is likely to be treated as open only to the person named in the writing: Shogun Finance v. Hudson [2003] UKHL 62, [2004] 1 AC 919 (see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 5-076 and 5-085). An incorrect statement by one party as to one of the party's attributes (e.g. the party's qualifications) could give rise to avoidance for misrepresentation, see above.

33. The present Article covers mistakes as to the identity or attributes of the other party.

(d) Mistake as to law

34. In most systems the fact that a party's mistake is as to the legal position, rather than as to the facts, is irrelevant if the other conditions for relief are fulfilled. Thus for GERMAN law see Staudinger [-Singer] BGB (2004), § 119 nos. 67 et seq.; but contrast the case of a pregnant worker who agrees to cancel her contract of employment without knowing that she thereby loses her legal protection (BAG 16 February 1983, AP CC § 123 no. 22, mistake as to motive only). Under GREEK law the Supreme Court has held that a mistake of law is to be treated in the same way as a mistake of fact; and similarly with a mistake as to the kind of juridical act or its legal effect: A.P. 374/1974, NoB 22 (1974) 1364 and Full Bench of A.P. 3/1989 NoB 38 (1990) 606 II, 607 I). See also ITALIAN CC art. 1429(4); on FINNISH law, CC 1960 II 47; on DANISH law, Lynge Andersen 189; on DUTCH law, Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht II, No. 196; on PORTUGUESE law, Cordeiro 616; Fernandes 149 f; Vasconcelos 498. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law allow relief for a mistake of law except where the agreement concerned is a compromise, CC arts. 2052(2); Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 224. However, in Belgian law the cases are rare because this kind of mistake is not often accepted as an excusable mistake (see Cass. 10 April 1975, RCJB 1978, 198, note Coipel). In contrast, ENGLISH and IRISH law have in the past refused relief (either via mistake or via misrepresentation) when the mistake is purely one of law, though a mistake or misrepresentation as to "private rights" (e.g. the legal effect of a document) is different. In England this rule has changed; after the decision of the House of Lords in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v. Lincoln City Council [1999] 1 AC 153 that a payment made under a mistake of law may be recovered, it has been accepted that a mistake of law may render a contract void: Brennan v. Bolt Burdon [2004] EWCA Civ 1017, [2005] QB 303: (See Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 5-042 and 29-040–29-51). For Ireland, see Friel 199. SCOTTISH law seems to say that an error of law is generally not sufficient unless shared by both parties (Dickson v. Halbert (1854) 16 D 586; Mercer v. Anstruther's Trustees (1871) 9 M 618). An error as to the content or nature of a deed being signed is generally irrelevant unless there has been misrepresentation or other fault by the other party (Royal Bank of Scotland plc v. Purvis 1990 SLT 262). Payments made under error of law may be recovered in the law of unjustified enrichment (Morgan Guaranty Trust Co of New York v. Lothian Regional Council 1995 SC 151). In POLISH law a mistake must concern the juridical acts (facts) to give relief. In AUSTRIA a mistake as to law is generally not relevant if not explicitly made part of the agreement (see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 871 no. 13; Apathy/Riedler, ABGB IV, 3rd ed., § 871 no. 13). In CZECH law, an error in legal title is accepted as a cause for avoidance of the juridical act (Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 314), but there is little experience with other mistakes as to law. In BULGARIA, a mistake of law is generally irrelevant – the rule ignoratio juris nocet is strictly observed.

35. The Article applies to both mistakes as to the facts and mistakes as to the law.

VII. Cases in which one party takes the risk

36. Some systems acknowledge explicitly that relief will not be given where one party has clearly undertaken the risk that the facts will not turn out to be as hoped, or the court thinks that the risk should be on that party: e.g. the case of the bookseller who is unaware of the value of a book, when the purchaser/collector does know it, which is discussed in SCOTTISH law, see Stair, The Laws of Scotland XV, para. 694; MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, §§ 4.53-4.55; and McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.30-15.33. The contract will be upheld if the parties have contracted on the basis of a particular allocation of risk: Pender-Small v. Kinloch's Trustees 1917 SC 307.

37. Perhaps the clearest statement of this is in DUTCH CC art. 6:228(2): annulment will not be given for an error for which, given the nature of the contract, common opinion or the circumstances of the case, the party in error should remain accountable. Similarly, the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 92(5) provides that a person may not avoid the contract if according to the circumstances under which the transaction was entered into and the content of the transaction, the risk of mistake was to be borne by that person. In FRENCH law relief for error will not be given if the question of substantial quality was obviously aleatory: e.g. if the relevant characteristic of the subject matter was explicitly stated not to be guaranteed: Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 220. It has been held that a contract for the sale of a picture "attributed to Fragonard" could not be annulled by the seller when it was later concluded by experts that the picture was indeed by that artist; the parties had both known it might or might not be genuine. Civ. 24 March 1987, D. 1987.488.

38. The Spanish Supreme Court has held that in the paintings market the purchaser takes the risk of untrue authorship, where the seller did not act with fraud (Supreme Court Judgments 9 October 1981, RAJ (1981) 3595, 2 September 1998, RAJ (1998) 7546 and Note by Verda y Beamonte en Cuadernos Civitas de Jurisprudencia Civil no. 49, 1999, pp. 175 ff). Likewise it is recognised that a mistake concerning the financial means of the principal debtor is borne by the guarantor, not by the beneficiary of the surety contract (Carrasco, Tratado de los Derechos de Garantía, 2002, p. 197).

39. Under GERMAN law a party who bears a legal risk may not avoid the contract on account of a mistake with respect to that risk. Thus a surety may not avoid the contract of suretyship if it turns out that the debtor is in fact unable to pay, so that the surety will become liable to the creditor, even if the creditor knew of the debtor's inability: Staudinger [-Singer] BGB (2004), § 119 no. 102.

40. It is thought that other systems would reach similar results by other means; e.g. if one party knew or should have known that there was a risk that the subject matter would not have the hoped-for quality, there is no mistake or the thing is not substantially different from what was expected. In ENGLISH law, the courts have also posed the question in terms of whether as a matter of construction the contract is dependent upon the facts assumed - see Associated Japanese Bank (International) Ltd v. Crédit du Nord SA [1989] 1 WLR 255, QB– which is rather the same question: see Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. § 5-015 and Smith, Implied terms.

41. In NORDIC law generally it would not be contrary to good faith for one party to insist on the other respecting a contract which the latter entered knowing the risk being taken.

42. The present Article is explicit that relief may not be given when one party assumed the risk of the mistake.

VIII. Inexcusable error

43. Relief on the ground of mistake is generally denied when the mistake was primarily the fault of the mistaken party. Thus in FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law the erreur must not be inexcusable: see for France Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 223. According to Belgian case law, the mistake is excusable if a normally careful person in the same circumstances would have made the same mistake: Cass. 6 January 1944, Arr.Cass. 1944, 66; Cass. 10 April 1975, RCJB 1978, 198 note Coipel; Cass. 20 April 1978, Arr.Cass. 1978, 960; Cass. 28 June 1996, Pas. belge 1996, 714; Luxembourg, Cour 16 June 1970, Pasicrisie 21, p. 362; and see Note 7 above. In SPANISH law there is no doubt among courts and scholars that an inexcusable mistake is given no relief. In ENGLISH law it seems that relief will not be given to a party whose mistake was that party's own fault: see The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407 at [76],. and see Associated Japanese Bank (International) Ltd. v. Crédit du Nord SA [1989] 1 WLR 255, QB where Steyn J. referred to McRae v. Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1950) 84 CLR 377, HCt of Australia. SCOTTISH law also denies relief on the ground of uninduced error to a party at fault: see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.33, 15.42. In GREEK law rescission is permitted only if this is consonant with good faith (CC art. 144; Balis, No. 144); this might exclude rescission in the situation being considered. In DUTCH law a mistake for which the party seeking relief was largely responsible would be treated as one for which that party is accountable under CC art. 6:228(2), so that relief will be denied. For the similar outcome under ESTONIAN law, see GPCCA § 92(5). CZECH courts take the position that a contract may be avoided for a mistake only if the mistaken party exercised due care while concluding the contract, i.e. the mistaken party verified all circumstances essential to the contract, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 315. Similarly, in SLOVENIAN law, avoidance can be sought only if a mistake is excusable, i.e. the mistaken party exercised due care while concluding the contract, see LOA § 46(2).

44. In NORDIC law the fault of the mistaken party is not an absolute bar to avoidance but is a factor taken into account by the court in deciding whether to grant a remedy.

45. In a minority of systems the fault of the mistaken party is irrelevant, e.g. ITALIAN law, in AUSTRIAN law, POLISH law and in GERMAN law (RG 22 December 1905, RGZ 62, 201, 205). However it should be remembered that German law may require the mistaken party who avoids the contract to compensate the non-mistaken party, CC § 122, above. In PORTUGUESE law avoidance may be permitted even if the error was inexcusable, but it has been suggested that in extreme cases avoidance might be prevented as being an abuse of right, C.M. Pinto, General Theory 511 ff. Again, the mistaken party might incur pre-contractual responsibility, ibid.; Fernandes 156. The BULGARIAN doctrine has not dealt with the excusability of the mistake. However, inexcusable mistakes are generally irrelevant, because otherwise there will be a danger of abusive argumentation relying on affirmed – but in fact not present – mistake.

46. ENGLISH and IRISH law also allow rescission for misrepresentation even though the party who was misled could have discovered the truth by taking reasonable steps: Redgrave v. Hurd (1880) 20 ChD 1. However it has been argued that this rule may not apply to cases in which the incorrect information was given without negligence: Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 9-020, but compare Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 6-039.

IX. The effect on the contract

47. In FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law the existence of a vice de consentement, gives rise to relative rather than absolute nullity; i.e., only the party affected by the vice may invoke it Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 227. GERMAN law, CC §§ 119-124, 142; GREEK law, CC art. 140; POLISH law, CC art. 84; ITALIAN law, CC arts. 1427, 1441; BULGARIAN law, LOA art. 28; CZECH law, CC § 40a; PORTUGUESE law, CC arts. 247, 251, 287; SLOVENIAN law, LOA § 46(2) and DUTCH law, CC art 3:49 are similar in effect, which means that the contract has to be avoided. So are the NORDIC laws (except where the contract is modified under Contract Act § 36). Provided that all other prerequisites are met, in AUSTRIA the existence of a mistake entitles the mistaken party to avoid or adapt (see note 8 above) the contract. Any transferred property automatically falls back to the other party.

48. In ENGLISH law the effect of an operative mistake at common law is that the supposed contract is void, and cases suggesting that the contract might be voidable in equity have been held to be incorrect: Great Peace Shipping Ltd v. Tsavliris Salvage (International) Ltd (The Great Peace) [2002] EWCA Civ 1407, [2003] Q.B. 679. Misrepresentation makes the contract voidable and a party who has a right to rescind on either ground may lose that right through affirmation, lapse of time and other bars to rescission (see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 9-094–9-111. In SCOTTISH law, essential error is traditionally said to make a contract void; but in cases of error in motive induced by misrepresentation the contract seems to be voidable only. This is probably also the outcome in the rare cases of error in transaction known to and wrongfully taken advantage of by the other party. See Stair, The Laws of Scotland XV, paras. 680, 690, 691, 694; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 15.72, 15.85-15.87.

X. Damages for the mistaken party

49. In many systems a party who has caused the other party's mistake by culpably (intentionally or negligently) giving incorrect information may be liable to the other party in delict. See on Belgium: Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 108. In AUSTRIAN law this is regarded as a form of pre-contractual liability (see Bollenberger in Koziol/Bydlinski/Bollenberger, § 874 no. 2). Under GERMAN law the liability for the other party's mistake may follow from the rules on culpa in contrahendo, CC §§ 311(2), 280, 276.

50. In BULGARIAN law, the mistaken party should indemnify the other party for the damages arising from the avoidance of the contract, unless the other party knew or ought to have known of the mistake. The contrary cases – indemnification of the mistaken party by the other party (if it caused or knew of the mistake) – are not generally regulated. A remedy can be however found in LOA art. 12 (precontractual liability).

51. On mistake generally see Kötz, European Contract Law I, chap. 10.

II.–7:202: Inaccuracy in communication may be treated as mistake

An inaccuracy in the expression or transmission of a statement is treated as a mistake of the person who made or sent the statement.

COMMENTS

A. No common intention: objective interpretation normal rule

It sometimes happens that because of an inaccuracy of expression in a communication, or an inaccuracy in its transmission, the communication does not express a party's true intention. For example, in an offer a party may write the price as €10,000 in mistake for €100,000. If the other party simply accepts this offer without noticing or pointing out the mistake, what should be the position should there later be a disagreement over the amount?

If the parties do not have a common intention, a party is normally bound by the apparent meaning of the expressions used, because the other party will reasonably have taken them at face value. So if the offeree does not know and has no reason to know that the offer contains a mistake, the offeree may hold the mistaken party to the contract.

This follows from the rules on interpretation in the next chapter.

B. Inaccuracy in communication may not prevent parties' having common intention

If in fact the recipient of the offer knows what the offeror meant, and accepts the offer without comment because the recipient too intended the price to be €100,000, the case is simply resolved: the parties' common intention was that the price should be €100,000 and the contract is for that sum even if the other party later uses the inaccuracy as a pretext for avoiding the contract.

This also follows from the rules on interpretation in the next chapter.

C. Objective rule does not apply if other party not misled by inaccuracy

A non-mistaken party who does not intend to accept an offer at €100,000, but knows that this is what was meant and simply accepts without pointing out the inaccuracy, should not be able to take advantage of the inaccuracy. On the contrary, such a party should be bound to a contract at that price. Although a party is normally bound by the objective meaning of words used, the meaning that a reasonable person would give to them, this does not apply when the recipient of the words does not understand them in this sense but as they were in fact intended. A contract results on the terms actually intended by the non-mistaken party.

This also follows from the rules on interpretation.

Illustration 1

A offers to sell B, another fur trader, hare skins at £1.00 per kg; this is a typing error for £1.00 per piece. Skins are usually sold by the piece and, as there are about six skins to the kilo, the price is absurdly low. B knows what A meant as skins are never sold by the kilo, always by the piece, but nonetheless B purports to accept. He cannot hold A to supplying skins at £1.00 per kilo; instead there is a contract at £1.00 per piece.

D. Party knows of inaccuracy but not what was intended

It sometimes happens that a party knows there has been an inaccuracy but not what was meant. Nonetheless the party simply accepts the offer or other communication without pointing the inaccuracy out. Then it would not be feasible to hold the party to whatever the mistaken party actually meant. Nonetheless, provided the mistake is fundamental the mistaken party should be able to avoid the contract. The present Article treats this as a form of mistake so that the mistaken party can seek to avoid the contract.

Illustration 2
A and B have been negotiating for a lease of A's villa; A has been asking 1,300 per month, B has offered 800 per month. A writes to B offering to rent him the villa for 100 per month; this is a slip of the pen for 1,000. B realises that A must have made a mistake but does not know what it is. He writes back simply accepting. A may avoid the contract.

E. Inaccuracy should have been known to other party

Even if a party did not know that the other had made an inaccuracy in a communication, that party should not necessarily be able to hold the mistaken party to the normal meaning of the words used.

If in the circumstances a reasonable person would not have interpreted the words in their usual meaning, but in the way in fact intended by the party making the communication, then under the rules on interpretation the other party will be held to this interpretation.

Illustration 3
As Illustration 1 above but it is not proved that B knew of the mistake. If, given the custom in the trade and the price offered, the meaning of A's communication should have been known to any reasonable person in the same circumstances, B cannot hold A to the apparent contract and is bound to buy at £1 per piece.

If it is not clear what the intended meaning was, the mistaken party may again seek to avoid the contract.

F. Mistake caused by other party

Sometimes a party makes a mistake in apparently agreeing to something because of the conduct of the non-mistaken party. The non-mistaken party cannot hold the mistaken party to the apparent agreement if the non-mistaken party should have realised that the other might be agreeing to something in error.

Illustration 4
A books a package holiday with B Company. B offers various tours as well as the flight and hotel accommodation. A does not want these tours as they are very expensive, but the booking form used by B is very hard to follow and by mistake A checks a box indicating that she wants all the tours. B cannot hold A to this.

G. Fault of mistaken party

Under the preceding Article, relief is denied to a party if the mistake was inexcusable. This is justified by the need for security in transactions; the other party should not be put to the burden of investigating all the many possible misapprehensions that the other party might be labouring under; but should at least be able to ignore any which could only arise through gross carelessness. Usually mistakes in communication of the kind discussed above are careless, but this does not necessarily mean that they are inexcusable. In any event the concept of "inexcusable" is a relative one. When the mistake is not about the facts or law but is a problem of the accuracy of the communication, it is much less burdensome to ask the other party just to check any apparent statement which looks as if it might be a mistake, even when the mistake was due to the mistaken party's carelessness. The non-mistaken party has only to ask, "You do mean what you say on page 2?", or "You are aware of clause x?" The fact that the mistaken party was seriously at fault is not necessarily a bar to relief.

H. Seriousness

It is necessary to restrict relief to mistakes which make the contract fundamentally different. To allow relief for lesser mistakes would undermine the security of transactions. This applies equally to relief where there has been an inaccuracy in communication.

I. Mistake in communication treated as mistake of sender

It sometimes happens that a mistake occurs in the transmission of a communication sent via a third party, such as a telegraph company, without any fault on the part of the sender. Nonetheless the sender, having chosen that form of communication must bear the risk. Under these rules the situation is treated just as if the mistake had been caused by the sender, except in one situation. This is where the need for a notice has been caused by the recipient's non-performance of an obligation. Here, by virtue of a later Article (III.–3:106 (Notices relating to non-performance)) the dispatch principle applies and the risk of an inaccuracy in the transmission of the notice is borne by the recipient.

NOTES

1. All the systems by one means or another give relief when one party has made a mistake as to the terms of the contract being concluded; but the conditions under which relief will be given differ markedly.
2. If the other party makes the same verbal mistake, so that in fact they intend the same thing, or if the other party spots the verbal mistake and knows what was meant, it is generally accepted that the contract stands on the terms actually intended; falsa demonstratio non nocet. It is in the case in which the other party did not know of the mistake that the differences between the systems appear.
3. In some systems, the party who has made the verbal mistake may avoid the contract even though the other party did not know and had no reason to know of the mistake. For example, in GERMAN law CC § 119(1) covers cases of mistakes in the act or declaration, so that a slip of the tongue may entitle the mistaken party to avoid the contract. (Errors in the transmission of a declaration to the other party are treated similarly, CC § 120.) There is no requirement that the other party knew or ought to have known of the mistake. The same is true in AUSTRIA, where a mistake in the declaration is treated as a relevant mistake just as a mistake in regard to the subject matter of the contract. No additional requirements have to be met. Similarly, in FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law it is sometimes said that a mistake in an offer or acceptance (often referred to as erreur matérielle) will give rise to an erreur obstacle which prevents the formation of a valid contract, though this concept is not mentioned in the CC. But it usually results only in the relative nullity of the contract (e.g. French Cass.com. 15 February 1961, Bull.civ. IV no.19; Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 210 and 227); on Belgium: Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 106). In practice the jurisprudence usually gives relief under the normal conditions for mistake (see e.g. Civ. 15 April 1980, D. 1981 IR 314 and cases cited in Nicholas 99-100). In French law the fact that a mistake has been made need not be known to the other party, but Belgian case law has tended to apply the principle of legitimate confidence and to refuse relief where the other party did not know and had no reason to know of the mistake (Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994, p. 325 No. 108). In Luxembourg, the knowledge of the other party on the essential character of the quality of the goods or other relevant considerations is often required Cass. 30 June 1993, 29, 253. In PORTUGUESE law the same conditions apply as to errors in general; that is the error must be determining for the mistaken party and this must have been apparent to the other party, CC arts. 247, 250(1). Although art. 27 of the BELGIAN Decree-Law 7/2004, 7 January (e-commerce law), states a duty of the provider to offer technical means to identify and correct mistakes when introducing data, the law does not establish a specific consequence concerning invalidity due to mistake. POLISH law does not have a specific regulation on this issue. Rather, it should be treated not as mistake but as a matter for interpretation of the declaration of will. The court will look for the consent between parties that is necessary to conclude a contract. Generally, to protect the other party, the will expressed will prevail over the "will in the mind". The solution in BULGARIAN law is probably the same although no doctrinal discussion on this matter has so far taken place.

4. SLOVAK law does not have a specific regulation on this issue. An inaccuracy in the expression of a statement may be treated as a matter of interpretation of the declaration of will. In the case of a clear inaccuracy the concluded contract is void as a juridical act contra bonos mores (contrary to good morals) or on the ground of uncertainty. However if an expression of will is affected by an error in transmission caused by the means used by the sender by other circumstances arising in the course of transport, the provision on error will apply (CC § 45 2nd clause). The viewpoint of SLOVENIAN law is very similar, see Juhart and Plavšak (-Dolenc), Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 342.

5. In contrast, several systems, though applying the usual rules of mistake to this situation, limit mistake generally to cases in which the other party knew or should have known of the mistake (or caused it or shared it, which are not relevant here): e.g. DUTCH CC art. 3:35; GREEK CC art. 146; ITALIAN CC art. 1433; CZECH CC § 45(2); ESTONIAN GPCCA § 92; NORDIC Contract Acts § 32(1) which provides that if a message, because of a misprint or other error, differs from what the sender intended, the message does not bind the sender if the recipient knew or ought to have known of the misprint or error. In addition § 32(2) provides that if a message sent by telegram or by "bud", i.e. a person transferring the message to another person is garbled in the transmission, the sender will not be bound by what the message appears to say. It is uncertain if "bud" includes internet providers. In SCOTTISH law, if an offer is transmitted inaccurately, acceptance does not create any contract (Verdin Brothers v. Robertson (1871) 10 M 35). Under ESTONIAN law, however, an inaccuracy in the expression of a statement should first be treated as a matter of interpretation of the declaration of will (GPCCA § 71: if the content of a declaration of intention is altered due to the circumstances for which the recipient bears the risk, the declaration of intention is deemed to be made with such content as was expressed; GPCCA § 75: if the recipient of the declaration did not know nor should have known the actual intention of the person making the declaration, the declaration of intention is interpreted according to the understanding of a reasonable person similar to the recipient under the same circumstances; LOA § 29(2)-(3): falsa demonstratio non nocet).

6. ENGLISH and IRISH law, by a different route again, produce a similar outcome. Mistakes as to the terms of the contract (bidding for the wrong item or expressing the price wrongly, for example) are also treated under the rubric of mistake, but a quite different type of mistake which may 'negative' (prevent there being) consent - in other words, prevent there being offer and acceptance. And offers, acceptances and other declarations are interpreted objectively - that is, parties are bound by what they reasonably appear to be saying. Thus if one party made a mistake but the other had no reason to know it, no relief will be given. The only case in which relief will be given is the one where the mistake was known to the other party (e.g. Hartog v. Colin & Shields [1939] 3 AllER 566, QB), or possibly where the other party suspected a mistake and deliberately distracted the mistaken party's attention from the matter (cf. Commission for New Towns v. Cooper (GB) Ltd [1995] 2 AllER 929, CA). (It is not clear whether the contract is void or whether the non-mistaken party simply cannot hold the mistaken party to what they appeared to say, but is bound by what the mistaken party (as the non-mistaken party knew) actually meant: see Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 5-068; Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 8-053.)

7. The case where one party has made a mistake as to the terms is the only one in which English and Irish law allow relief on the ground of mistake where only one party has made a mistake. A unilateral mistake which is as to the facts and which was not induced by misrepresentation gives no remedy: Smith v. Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597. This can produce nice distinctions as to whether the mistake was about, for example, the amount of work to be done or the total price to be charged, see Imperial Glass Ltd. v. Consolidated Supplies Ltd (1960) 22 DLR (2d) 759 (CA, British Columbia). Similar distinctions appear in other systems: thus AUSTRIAN law has special rules for so-called Kalkulationsirrtum (mistake as to the underlying calculation). A mistake in stating the price, e.g. in a building contract, will be a mistake of expression, but a mistake in the underlying calculation will only be one of motive (OGH 6 November 1986, WB1 1987, 62; 26 January 1988, JBl 1988, 714); see also notes on II.–7:201 (Mistake) above. However if the basis of calculation has been disclosed to the other party and the latter has agreed that the contract is on this basis, relief may be given as for an error of expression. Elsewhere, under PORTUGUESE law, a simple mistake in calculation or writing, revealed in the declaration or clear in those particular circumstances, does not allow relief but only a correction of that declaration (CC art. 249). In SCOTTISH law, a similar distinction is recognised in building contracts, where an error in calculation in a contract where payment is to be made in accordance with schedules of rates is one which a court may correct, but not so if the work to be done was for a lump sum, where an error in the calculation of that sum is irrelevant (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 8.99 note 369). These distinctions need not be made under the present rules, since errors in expression are treated in the same way as errors as to facts or law.

II.–7:203: Adaptation of contract in case of mistake

(1) If a party is entitled to avoid the contract for mistake but the other party performs, or indicates a willingness to perform, the obligations under the contract as it was understood by the party entitled to avoid it, the contract is treated as having been concluded as that party understood it. This applies only if the other party performs, or indicates a willingness to perform, without undue delay after being informed of the manner in which the party entitled to avoid it understood the contract and before that party acts in reliance on any notice of avoidance.

(2) After such performance or indication the right to avoid is lost and any earlier notice of avoidance is ineffective.

(3) Where both parties have made the same mistake, the court may at the request of either party bring the contract into accordance with what might reasonably have been agreed had the mistake not occurred.

COMMENTS

A. Mistake which was or should have been known to other party

The most obvious application of this Article is when a party is entitled to avoid a contract because there was an error in communication, but the non-mistaken party did not know what the mistake was. If, when told what the mistake was, that party offers to perform according to what the mistaken party actually intended, the latter's right to avoidance should be lost.

The Article may also apply to mistakes as to facts or law.

Illustration 1
A flooring contractor employed to floor a large building makes a fundamental mistake over the amount of work needed. This mistake should have been known to the other party. So the contractor has the right to avoid the contract. The employer offers to release the contractor from the extra work without any reduction in the payment. The contractor cannot avoid the contract.

B. Shared mistake

In cases in which the contract may be avoided because both parties have made the same mistake, paragraph (1) applies. Thus if one party seems to stand to benefit from the mistake and the other to lose, the first may offer to perform in the way the contract was originally understood. But if it is not clear that one stands to lose more than the other, or the gaining party is not prepared to perform the contract as it was originally understood, it may be more appropriate to adjust the contract than simply to avoid it. In this case paragraph (3) permits either party to apply to the court for the contract to be adjusted in such a way as to reflect what might have been agreed had the mistake not occurred.

Illustration 2
The facts are as in Illustration 1 except that both parties were mistaken as to the amount of work needed. The employer may indicate a willingness to release the contractor from the extra work under paragraph (1). Alternatively, either party may request the court to adapt the contract under paragraph (3). In such a case the court might apply the contract rates to the additional work, with appropriate adjustments for the volume of work involved.

Sometimes it will be clear that, but for the mistake, the parties would not have entered the contract. In this case adaptation will not be appropriate.

Illustration 3
A sells a painting, which the parties think is by a little known artist, to B for €500. It is then discovered that the painting is by a very well known artist and is worth €50,000. B could not possibly have paid €50,000. A may avoid the contract; it should not be adapted so that B has to pay A the true value of the painting.

Equally a subsequent change in one party's position may make adaptation inappropriate

Illustration 4
The parties to a building contract were both mistaken in thinking that it would involve less work than is actually the case. Had the true quantity of work been known, the builder would have agreed to do all the work at the same unit prices as in the contract, but subsequently it has taken on other work and cannot do the extra work on this contract. Adaptation is not appropriate and the contract may be avoided.

C. Damages after adaptation of contract

The adaptation of the contract by the other party or by the court under this Article does not preclude the mistaken party claiming damages for any loss which is not compensated by the adaptation of the contract.

NOTES

1. The GREEK CC art. 144.1, the ITALIAN CC art. 1432 and the SLOVENIAN LOA § 46(4) have a provision parallel to paragraph (1) of the present Article. GERMAN law would reach the same result but by invoking the principle of fair dealing: see Lobinger, AcP 195 (1995) 274, 278; MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, § 119 no. 142. The PORTUGUESE CC art. 248 is broadly similar in approach to the present Article. The same is true under ESTONIAN law for GPCCA § 93.
2. In German, Portuguese and SPANISH law a contract entered under a shared mistake may be adapted under the principle of the clausula rebus sic stantibus; again, the doctrine of mistake would not be invoked.
3. In ENGLISH law the court has no power to adapt the contract; it is either valid or void. Earlier cases apparently holding that a contract may be held to be voidable in equity for fundamental mistake, and the court may impose terms upon the party seeking rescission (e.g. Solle v. Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671, CA), are now held to be wrong: Great Peace Shipping Ltd. v. Tsavliris Salvage (International) Ltd. (The Great Peace) [2002] EWCA Civ 1407, [2003] QB 679. Ironically, in that case (at [161]) the Court called for legislation to give greater remedial flexibility.
4. Although in BELGIUM the general remedy for mistake is the relative nullity, some legal writers would prefer the adaptation of the contract (e.g. reduction of the price) and suggest to reach this solution when the mistaken party invokes a partial nullity (Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht, 2006, 121).

5. FRENCH law does not permit adaptation of the contract in case of error but it admits partial nullity see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 227; but in LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1118 on Lésion has been amended and now it would be possible for the victim of an abuse of circumstances which has resulted in 'des obligations lésionnaires' to demand that they be reduced by the court.

6. Some systems go rather further than the present Article. The DUTCH CC art. 6:230(2) gives the court a general power, at the request of either party, to modify the contract instead of annulling it (see also art. 3:53). In NORDIC law the court may adapt the contract on the basis of the doctrine of failed assumptions or under the general clause under Contracts Act § 36, but only at the request of the mistaken party.

7. The AUSTRIAN CC § 872 allows claims for adaptation of the contract when there has been a non-essential error, to bring the contract into line with what would have been agreed had the mistake not occurred. The adaptation is only possible if it reaches a result that both parties would have accepted n the first place. Similarly, PORTUGUESE CC art. 293 allows modification of the contract when the scope of the parties allow to consider that they would have wanted that adaptation had they previewed the invalidity.

8. There is no special regulation or case law on the subject under POLISH law. However, on the principle of favouring contractual relations (favour contracti) it seems that the courts would allow performance of the contractual obligations in the way understood by the party entitled to avoid the contract for mistake. There is the same situation in CZECH law.

9. SLOVAK law has no special provisions on this issue. But the concluded contract will be considered valid unless the affected person challenges the validity of the act (see CC § 40a). The court may not bring the contract into accordance with what might reasonably have been agreed had the mistake not occurred.

10. In SCOTTISH law, errors of expression obvious on the face of a concluded contract will be corrected as a matter of construction, while at common law a latent defect in a document's expression is a ground for reduction of a contract along with a declarator of the parties' true agreement (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 8.98-8.101). An erroneously expressed written contract may also be rectified to conform to the parties' proved common intention under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1985, s. 8.

11. BULGARIAN law has no analogue of the provisions of this article. Adaptation of contract is possible in cases of clausula rebus sic stantibus; correction of "purely arithmetical" mistake is also possible (LOA art. 28) and interpretation of the wrongly expressed will of a party is a must (LOA art. 20).

II.–7:204: Liability for loss caused by reliance on incorrect information

(1) A party who has concluded a contract in reasonable reliance on incorrect information given by the other party in the course of negotiations has a right to damages for loss suffered as a result if the provider of the information:

(a) believed the information to be incorrect or had no reasonable grounds for believing it to be correct; and

(b) knew or could reasonably be expected to have known that the recipient would rely on the information in deciding whether or not to conclude the contract on the agreed terms.

(2) This Article applies even if there is no right to avoid the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General effect of Article

This Article reflects the idea that a party to contractual negotiations should not act in an irresponsible way in giving information to the other party on which the other party may rely. The Article can be regarded as a concretisation of the requirement of good faith and fair dealing. It would be possible to locate this provision in the Book on Non-contractual Liability for Damage Caused to Another but, because it is so closely related to the conduct of a party in contractual negotiations, it seems likely to be for the convenience of users to place it here

A party who gives information to the other during the course of negotiations may in some circumstances be treated as undertaking a contractual obligation by making the statement. But not all statements of fact are treated as giving rise to a contractual obligation.

Even if the statement does not give rise to a contractual obligation, a party should not necessarily be expected to take the risk of the information given by the other party being incorrect. If the incorrect information leads the recipient party to make a mistake justifying avoidance of the contract, or if it amounts to fraud on the recipient party, that party will have a right to avoid the contract for mistake or fraud and to damages for loss under the rules on those topics. But even if the matter is not such as to give rise to a right to avoid the contract, the misled party should have a right to reparation if the other party has given incorrect information recklessly or carelessly.

B. Who should bear the risk of information being incorrect?

Where there is no fraud, the incorrect information is in a sense an accident which befalls the making of the contract. In some cases the party providing the information may have believed it to be correct and had good reason to believe it was correct. In those circumstances, it seems fair to leave the loss caused where it falls (unless it makes the contract fundamentally different, in which case the contract may be avoided under the rules on mistake). If, on the other hand, the party who has given the information believed the information to be incorrect or had no reasonable grounds to believe it to be correct, [and knew or could reasonably be expected to have known that recipient would rely on it], then the misled party should have a remedy. The Article confers a right to damages where incorrect information has been given in these circumstances.

The remedy will apply even if the incorrect information was not the only or principal reason the misled party entered into the contract. However the damages should compensate only for the loss which has been caused by the incorrect information.

The first limb of the double test (believed the information to be incorrect or had no reasonable grounds to believe it to be correct) is necessary because there could be cases where a person has reasonable grounds for believing information to be correct but has other grounds for believing it to be incorrect and actually believes it to be incorrect. For example, a seller of livestock may have had it inspected by a government inspector who pronounced it healthy. This provides reasonable grounds for believing it to be healthy. However, the seller may be more knowledgeable and experienced than the inspector and may actually believe, with good reason, that it is unhealthy. In such circumstances it would be contrary to good faith to say that the livestock was healthy. The second limb is necessary because a person involved in negotiations should not be so irresponsible as to provide information to the other party which the provider has no reasonable grounds for believing to be correct, even if the provider has no knowledge or belief either way on the question of its correctness.

C. Party could have discovered truth

Even when the party giving the information believed the information to be incorrect or had no reasonable grounds to believe it to be correct, it would not be appropriate to give damages if, in the circumstances, it was unreasonable for the party given the information to rely on it, or to rely on it without checking it. This is why the Article refers to "reasonable" reliance.

> Illustration 1
> E, an elderly lawyer who wishes to retire, invites F to buy his practice. He tells F that the income of the practice is €90,000 per year. It is normal for the buyer of such a practice to have the account books checked very carefully before deciding to purchase. E makes the books available. In fact, as an examination of the accounts would have shown, the practice has suddenly become much less valuable, though E does not know this because, due to illness, he has not been paying attention to the figures. F buys the practice without checking the accounts. It is so unreasonable to buy a practice without checking the accounts that F could not recover damages.

D. Information given by the other party

The Article applies only to incorrect information given by the other party to the contract. This, however, must be read with the Article which attributes to a person the statements or conduct of certain other persons for whom that person was responsible. A party misled by information provided by a third person falling outwith these categories cannot recover damages.

> Illustration 2
> G leased a machine from H, relying on a statement made by J, a friend who has a similar machine, that its fuel consumption was 5 litres per hour. In fact the fuel consumption was much higher. G may not recover damages from H.

However, if the party who was given the information was dealing with a professional supplier and the information was given by someone earlier in the business chain (e.g. a party buys goods from a retailer relying on information from the manufacturer), the party will have a remedy for non-performance under the Article on Statements giving rise to contractual obligations.

E. Remedies

The party misled by incorrect information is entitled to reparation for the loss which the incorrect information has caused. As the assumption for present purposes is that the incorrect statement did not give rise to a contractual obligation, the injured party is not entitled to damages on the normal contractual basis (that is, the difference between the value of what was received and the value of what would have been received had the information been correct), but only to compensation for the loss actually caused by the incorrectness of the information (that is, the difference between the value of what was received and the amount paid).

Illustration 3
A sells B a used car, telling B that the car has done only 50,000 kms. B agrees to pay €100,000 for the car, although the market price for that model of car with 50,000 kms on the clock is €105,000. In fact the car has done 150,000 kms and is worth only €85,000. On the assumption that the statement does not in the circumstances give rise to a contractual obligation, B may recover damages of €15,000 (and not the €20,000 which would have been due if the statement had given rise to a contractual obligation).

Where the incorrect information causes the misled party loss beyond the difference in value between what was given and what was received (this further loss is sometimes called "consequential" loss), the party may recover this also.

Illustration 4
C employs D, a firm of contractors, to lay a road across a field. C tells D that the ground all over the site has been investigated and is quite firm. In fact part of it is a quagmire. D discovers this when one of its machines sinks into it. Not only does the soft ground make the job much more expensive but D has to pay €100,000 to have its machine recovered. It may recover the €100,000.

F. Relationship to other rights to reparation

Book IV (Non-contractual Liability for Damage Caused to Another) has a provision on liability for loss caused by detrimental reliance on incorrect advice or information. The provision applies, however, only if the advice or information is provided by a person in pursuit of a profession or in the course of trade. It is therefore narrower in scope than the present Article in that respect but wider in others. It provides expressly that the present Article is unaffected by its provisions. Clearly, therefore, there could be an overlap between the two provisions. That does not matter: the aggrieved person could choose which Article to rely on.

NOTES

1. The majority of systems will allow a party who has entered a contract on the basis of incorrect information supplied by the other party to recover damages from the other if the other was at fault, even though there was no fraud involved. For example FRENCH and BELGIAN law grant damages on the basis of pre-contractual liability: e.g. Orléans 21 January 1931, D.H. 1931. 172; Civ. 29 November 1968, GazPal 1969 January 63 see also Cass.civ. 1ère 14 nov. 1979: Bull.civ. 3, no. 279; Belgium: De Boeck, Informatierechten en –plichten, nos. 455-505. In theory the liability is delictual rather than contractual. The measure of damages is the ordinary one for delictual responsibility, and is within the discretion of the trial judge. This is also the solution in BULGARIAN law, where precontractual liability is considered to be delictual (LOA art. 12). This text governs all cases of precontractual relationships where there is a duty to act according to good faith; there is however no special rule similar to the present Article of the DCFR. AUSTRIAN law at one time allowed damages only in cases of fraud but now awards Austrian law formerly allowed damages only in cases of fraud (see CC § 874) but now awards damages for culpa in contrahendo; the party is to be placed in the position which would have existed, if the incorrect information had not been given (see Bydlinski, Bürgerliches Recht I[3], nos. 6/36 et seq.). See also GREEK CC arts. 197-198 and 914; A.P. 1505/1988, NoB 1990.62; in ITALY, Mengoni, Pre-contractual responsibility, Castronovo, Obbligazione 147, 160 ff, Roppo, Il contratto, 878; DUTCH CC art. 6:162; POLISH CC art. 72 (§ 2 – culpa in contrahendo); PORTUGUESE CC art. 227 (culpa in contrahendo, considered by part of the doctrine as a "third way", distinct either form delictual and contractual liability; see Almeida, Contracts 173; Leitão 312, 317) and SWEDEN, Sup.Ct. NJA 1989 p. 156. In FINLAND culpa in contrahendo has less importance as the statement will normally be treated as a contractual promise, but see Supreme Court KKO 1999: 48 and Hemmo, Sopimusoikeuden oppikirja, 122. In DENMARK the courts will only grant damages for culpa in contrahendo if a party has committed fraud or has been guilty of a clear violation of the rules governing contracting see Bryde Andersen Grundlæggende 116 ff. SPANISH literature and practice knows as "incidental mistake" the situation where inaccurate information given by the vendor (or fraudulent silence), even though not amounting to fundamental mistake, allows the affected party to recover damages (CC art. 1270).

2. In GERMAN law the remedies would be based on the principle of culpa in contrahendo, which was laid down by the new law of obligations in §§ 311(2), 280, 276. The aggrieved party should be restored to the position he or she would have been in had the contract not been concluded. The aggrieved party may seek rescission of the contract (e.g. BGH 31 January 1962, NJW 1962, 1196; BGH 27 February 1974, NJW 1974, 849, 851; BGH 24 May 1993, NJW 1993, 2107), or claim damages to the extent of the reliance interest (e.g. BGH 14 March 1991, BGHZ 114, 94; BGH 21 March 2005, NJW 2005, 1787. If the aggrieved party, but for the incorrect information, would have contracted with a different party, the damages may include profit that would have made on such a contract (BGH 2 March 1988, NJW 1988, 2236). For CZECH law, the delictual liability analogous to the present article rests in part on the culpa in contrahendo doctrine and in part on CC § 43 according to which the parties must take care to eliminate everything which could give rise to conflicts in regulating their contractual relationships.

3. In ENGLISH and IRISH law the victim of a pure mistake cannot recover damages; but the victim of a mistake which was induced by a misrepresentation may recover damages if the person who gave the incorrect information had no reasonable grounds for believing what was said to be true: English Misrepresentation Act 1967, s. 2(1), Irish Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1980, s. 45 (1). It may also be possible for the victim to sue on the basis of liability in tort for negligent misrepresentation, under the doctrine of Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1963] AC 465, HL; and for Ireland, Bank of Ireland v. Smith [1966] IR 646 and, generally, McMahon & Binchy 150 ff. However this requires a "special relationship" between the parties and, while there may be such a relationship between contracting parties (as *Esso Petroleum CoLtd*v. Mardon [1976] QB 801, CA) this will not always be the case: see Howard Marine & Dredging Co. Ltd. v. A Ogden & Sons Ltd. [1978] QB 574, CA. Damages cannot usually be recovered if the misrepresentor acted without negligence; but exceptionally, if an English court exercises its discretion under Misrepresentation Act 1967, s. 2(2) to refuse to allow rescission on the ground of an innocent, non-negligent, misrepresentation, it may give damages instead of rescission. See also the Irish Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1980, ss. 44, 45(2).

4. In SCOTLAND pre-contractual negligent misrepresentation may give rise to a delictual damages claim: Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1985, s. 10.

5. SLOVAK law has no special provisions on this issue. So the liability for loss by reliance on incorrect information is regulated by the provisions on liability for loss and unjustified enrichment. (CC Sixth part §§ 415 et seq.).

6. The ESTONIAN LOA § 14(1) sent. 2 provides for an obligation of a party to ensure that information provided in the course of preparation of the contract is accurate. Under the majority view, negotiations create a legal relationship between the parties and breach of any of the obligations under this relationship should be treated similarly to the breach of a contractual obligation (LOA § 100), incl. non-fault liability (see LOA §§ 103, 115(1)). Recoverable damage is, however, generally limited to the reliance interest (see Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 15 January2007, civil matter no. 3-2-1-89-06, p. 16). For discussion on the nature of the precontractual liability see Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 14, no. 4.6.2.

7. In SLOVENIAN law, there are no statutory provisions on liability for incorrect information, apart from fraud and contractual liability for statements, giving rise to contractual duties. Liability for incorrect information could be construed on the basis of precontractual liability for culpa in contrahendo e.g. for negotiations contrary to good faith (LOA § 20), and, possibly, also on contractual liability of each party for breach of duty to notify the other party of all circumstances, influencing their relationship, see LOA § 245.

II.–7:205: Fraud

(1) A party may avoid a contract when the other party has induced the conclusion of the contract by fraudulent misrepresentation, whether by words or conduct, or fraudulent non-disclosure of any information which good faith and fair dealing, or any pre-contractual information duty, required that party to disclose.

(2) A misrepresentation is fraudulent if it is made with knowledge or belief that the representation is false and is intended to induce the recipient to make a mistake. A non-disclosure is fraudulent if it is intended to induce the person from whom the information is withheld to make a mistake.

(3) In determining whether good faith and fair dealing required a party to disclose particular information, regard should be had to all the circumstances, including:

(a) whether the party had special expertise;
(b) the cost to the party of acquiring the relevant information;
(c) whether the other party could reasonably acquire the information by other means; and
(d) the apparent importance of the information to the other party.

COMMENTS

A. General policy

In a case of fraud there is no reason to protect any interest the fraudulent party may have in upholding the contract; nor is the risk of being deliberately misled one that a party should be expected to bear.

B. Nature of representation

A representation is a definite statement that something is the case. It does not matter whether the fraudulent statement is as to facts or law.

The statement must be as to matters existing at the time of the contract. A statement that a party intends to do something does not become a false representation within the Article simply because the party has a change of mind. For such a change of mind to give rise to a remedy, it will have to be shown that the party's statement of intention amounted to a contractual promise. However, if a person states that he or she holds an intention which in fact is not held, that is a false representation within this Article.

Statements which are obviously mere sales talk are not representations within this Article.

> Illustration 1
> A leases a computer to B. A casually remarks that the computer is "the best of its size on the market". In fact a more powerful machine of similar size is available. As buyers may disagree over whether a more powerful machine is necessarily "better", B does not have a remedy.

A statement of opinion does not normally amount to a representation of fact or law. The fact that the statement is expressed as an opinion should warn the other party that it may or may not be accurate. However, a false statement that a party thinks something will be a false statement of fact.

Illustration 2
C rents a country cottage to D, telling D that in C's opinion the cottage is a very quiet spot. In fact C knows that it is under the flight path of the nearest airport and at certain times is very noisy. C has made a fraudulent misrepresentation.

C. Form of the misrepresentation

It does not matter whether the incorrect information is given by words or takes the form of misleading conduct.

Illustration 3
A leases a house to B. The house suffers severely from damp but just before leasing it A has had the walls repainted to conceal the damp, which B therefore does not notice. B may avoid the contract.

D. Fraud must be intentional

The effect of paragraph (2) is that a party's misrepresentation or non-disclosure is fraudulent if it was intended to deceive – that is, to cause the other party to make a mistake. This is in accordance with the definition of fraudulent for other purposes of the model rules. It is not fraud, however, to fail to point out some fact of which the other party is ignorant if there was no intention of deception. The mistake need not be such a mistake as would justify avoidance in itself.

E. Reliance

The party given incorrect information will not have a remedy unless that party has relied on the information in deciding to enter the contract.

Illustration 4
A sells a used car to B after turning back the odometer so that it shows that the car has done much less than the distance the car has been driven. However B never looks at the odometer until after she has bought the car. B has no remedy for fraud.

F. Non-disclosure

A party should not normally be permitted to remain silent, with the deliberate intention of deceiving the other party, on some point which might influence the other party's decision on whether or not to enter the contract. Unless there is a good reason for allowing the party to remain silent, silence is incompatible with good faith and will entitle the other party to avoid the contract under this Article.

Often a party to whom a fundamental fact has not been disclosed will be entitled to avoid the contract for mistake. There may also be a right to damages. Otherwise there is no general duty to point out to the other party possibly disadvantageous facts, but still a party should not normally be entitled to keep quiet with the intention of deceiving the other party.

G. Non-disclosure consistent with good faith and fair dealing

The duty to disclose is part of a general notion of good faith and fair dealing and may not always require a party to point out facts of which the other is known to be ignorant. For example, while a professional party will often be required by good faith and fair dealing to disclose information about the property or services to be supplied under the contract, the same may well not be true of a non-professional party. (See paragraph (3)(a).)

Further, a party may fairly be expected to provide information about the performance that party is undertaking, but is less likely to be required to do so about the performance the other party is to make. The latter is normally expected to know or find out relevant facts about such performance. (See paragraph (3)(c). In particular there may not be any obligation to disclose information which concerns the other party's performance and which the informed party had to make a great investment in order to acquire. (See paragraph (3)(b).)

The list in paragraph (3) is not intended to be exhaustive.

H. Remedies

Fraud gives the misled party the right to avoid the contract, if notice is given within a reasonable time. Where the fraud relates to an individual term of the contract, the party may be able to avoid the contract partially. In addition to, or instead of, avoiding the contract the party may recover damages. These will be limited to recovery of the amount the party is out of pocket, since it is assumed for present purposes that the other party did not give a contractual undertaking that the representation was true.

> Illustration 5
> C, an art dealer, sells a picture to D stating that in his opinion, but not undertaking that, it is by a well-known artist. D pays €5,000 for the picture. D later discovers that it is not by that well-known artist but is by a lesser known artist, as C knew perfectly well. It is worth only €1,000. If it had been by the well-known artist it would have been worth €9,000. If D decides to keep the picture she may recover damages limited to €4,000.

I. Incorrect information amounts to non-performance

In some cases the giving of incorrect information may give rise to a contractual obligation. The fact that the information is incorrect will amount to a non-performance of the obligation. In this case the party misled will have the usual remedies for non-performance.

> Illustration 6
> As in 5 but C states categorically that the picture is by the well-known artist. B may obtain remedies for non-performance which may include damages of €8,000.

J. Remedies cannot be excluded

Fraud can never be justifiable and therefore it is provided later that the remedies for it cannot be excluded or restricted.

NOTES

I. Fraud need not be as to an important matter

1. Fraud is a situation in which one party has been led into a mistake by the trickery of the other. Almost all the systems allow avoidance more readily than for a mere mistake. Thus in most systems it is not necessary to show that the fraud was as to an important matter. GERMAN CC § 123 allows avoidance for every kind of fraud (see Flume AT II, § 29 2, p. 543); similarly, AUSTRIAN CC § 870, (where avoidance is also granted despite a mere mistake as to the motive); GREEK CC art. 147, and see A.P. 249/1976 NoB 24 (1976) 785, 290/1989 EEN 57 (1990) 69; POLISH CC art. 86; DUTCH CC art. 3:44; CZECH CC § 49a (error which is intentionally induced and concerns any contractually relevant fact, not necessarily a substantial one); SLOVAK CC § 49a 2nd sentence; SLOVENIAN LOA § 49(1), (intentionally induced error need not be substantial); ESTONIAN GPCCA § 94. The same rule is applied in NORDIC law under the Contract Acts § 30; and in ENGLISH and IRISH law the victim of any fraudulent statement is entitled to rescission provided it influenced in any way the decision to conclude the contract (see, for England, Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 6-034; and, for Ireland, Friel 226). For avoidance in SCOTTISH law the fraud must induce the contract (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 14.38).

2. The FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1116 on dol refer to manoeuvres without which the other party would not have contracted. It is clear that a contract may be set aside when fraud has produced a mistake without having to show that the mistake went to the substance of the subject-matter. Traditionally, however, a distinction was drawn between dol principal (without which the victim would never have entered the contract at all) and dol incident, where the victim would have entered the contract but on different, less onerous terms; avoidance was allowed only for dol principal, damages only being awarded for dol incident. This distinction is still applied in Belgian (see Cass. 1 Dec. 1997, Pas. belge 1997, 1315 but for criticism: Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994, no. 126; Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, nos. 113 & 115) and ITALIAN law (CC art. 1440); and in FRENCH courts, Cass.com. 8 juillet 2003, CCC 2003 no. 153 obs. Leveneur, but sometimes, this distinction is not applied, Cass.civ. 3è, 22 juin 2005 RDC 2005, 1025 obs. Ph. Stoffel-Munck. See Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 238. The SPANISH CC art. 1270 provides that an incidental deception gives only a right to damages.

II. Sales talk and opinion

3. Most systems do require that any incorrect statement be more than sales talk or dolus bonus (on which see Ghestin, La formation du contrat[3], no. 564); but increasingly consumer protection laws require that any factual information be correct (e.g. FRENCH Code de la Consommation, art. L121-1, see Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], §§ 521-522; BELGIAN Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 14 July 1991, art. 24; and the POLISH Consumer Sale Act of 27 July 2002, arts. 3 and 4, SLOVAK ObchZ § 45. In PORTUGAL it has been argued that the concept of dolus bonus does not apply in consumer transactions, Almeida, Consumer law 102; contra, Ascensão, 158. In any event, what appears mere advertisement may constitute fraud if it contains factual elements which can be verified (e.g. "a good price" that is in reality higher than other offers): see, in GERMAN law, OLG Saarbrücken, 7 October 1980, OLGZ 1981, 248; OLG Frankfurt, 12 May 1982, DAR 1982, 294; as to DANISH law, Lynge Andersen 162; in GREEK law, Karakatsanis in Georgiadis/Stathopoulos, AK 147 nos. 4, 7; as to LUXEMBOURG, see Cour 17 October 1919, Pasicrisie 11, p. 190.

In ITALIAN law modern case law and scholars favour the idea that the fraud must concretely affect the consent of the other party (see Cass., S.U., 11 March 1996, no. 1955, Giust.civ. 1996, I, 1284, and Bianca, Diritto civile III, 666). In ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law the statement must be one of fact, rather than opinion; but it is accepted that a statement of opinion may carry the implication that the speaker knows facts to justify the opinion, and that a statement of an opinion which the speaker does not actually hold is itself a false statement of fact. See for England, Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 6-004 - 6-006; or Scotland, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 14.09-14.18; and, for Ireland, Friel 213. Under SPANISH law, the Consumer Protection General Act 26/1984 states that commercial advertising always forms part of the contract in consumer transactions, even if not expressly incorporated into the contract by the parties. PORTUGUESE law adopts the same solution under Law 24/96 of 31 July art. 7 (5) and so does the ESTONIAN LOA § 217(2) 6).

III. Reliance

4. The systems also require that the party seeking to avoid the contract was actually influenced by the fraud. In some systems, the burden of proving reliance is on the party seeking avoidance (e.g. GERMAN, AUSTRIAN, ESTONIAN, GREEK and PORTUGUESE law; and see for LUXEMBOURG, Cour 16 June 1970, 21, 362); in others, once it is proved that an incorrect statement was made deliberately, it is presumed that the statement influenced the party to whom it was made: e.g., for ENGLISH law, Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 6-035; for SCOTTISH law, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 14.51-14.54; for IRELAND, Smith v. Lynn [1954] 85 ICTR 737; and for NORDIC law, Contract Acts § 30(2)

IV. Dishonesty

5. It is the deliberate nature of the fraud which justifies the ready grant of avoidance, and the systems agree that the test of fraud is dishonesty, the intention to trick the other party: e.g. FRENCH Req. 27 January 1874, D.P. 1874.1.452; 3 January 1900, S. 1901.1.321 note Wahl; Civ. 1, 12 November 1987, D. 1987, I.R. 236; Bull.civ. I no. 293; BELGIUM (the intention to trick the other is not presumed and is to be proved by the victim): Cass. 25 Feb. 2000, Arr.Cass. 2000, 478); LUXEMBOURG, 9 February 2000, 31, 356; NORDIC law, Lynge Andersen 160 and Telaranta, Sopimusoikeus 329-330); SPANISH CC art. 1269. In GERMAN law the party must have known that the statement was untrue or have turned a blind eye to the truth: BGH 16 March 1977, NJW 1977, 1055, 1056; cf BGH 21 January 1975, BGHZ 63, 382, 388. The party must also have acted intentionally, that is, with the aim of influencing the other party or knowing that the trickery might influence the other party: BGH 28 April 1971, LM no. 42 to CC § 123; but it is not necessary that there be an intention to cause loss to the other or to gain from the fraud: BGH 14 July 1954, LM no. 9 to CC § 123. AUSTRIAN law (see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 870 no. 2), GREEK law (see A.P. 249/1976 NoB 24 (1976) 785; Court of Appeal of Larisa 565/2000 EllDik 43 (2002) 793), PORTUGUESE law (see C.M. Pinto, General Theory 522), POLISH law (CC art. 86 § 1), SLOVAK law (CC § 49a 2[nd] sentence), SLOVENIAN law (LOA § 49(1)) and ITALIAN law (Cass. 20 April 2006, no. 9253, Rep.Foro it. 2006, 799; Bianca, Diritto civile III, 665; Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto, 549) law are similar. So it seems is ENGLISH law: Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 6-029 and 6-046. In SCOTTISH law the classic definition of fraud is “a machination or contrivance to deceive” (Erskine, Institute III, i, 16).

V. Non-disclosure

6. A major difference between the systems is that in most cases there can be fraud when a party deliberately does not point out some relevant fact to the other party, who is ignorant of it. In FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law manoeuvres may cover any kind of dishonest conduct; and, though traditionally merely acquiescing in the other party's self-deception was not fraud, it is now often held that there was a duty to disclose information and a party who deliberately keeps silent is guilty of dol par réticence: e.g. for France: Civ. 2 October 1974, D. 1974, I.R. 252; Civ.1, 12 November 1987, Bull.civ. I no. 293, Cass.civ. 1ère, 13 mai 2003 Bull.civ. 5, no. 144; Cass.civ. 3è, 11 mars 2005; D. 2005, I.R. 1451 and see Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], no. 510; for Luxembourg, Tribunal Luxembourg, 24 June 1959, Pasicrisie 17, p. 495; for Belgium, see Cass. 8 June 1978, RCJB 1979, 525 note Masson; Cass. 21 April 1988, TBH 1991, 203; Cass. 16 Sept. 1999, Pas. belge 1999, 1160. The factors taken into account in deciding whether there is a duty to disclose in Belgian law are broadly similar to those listed in paragraph (3) of the present Article: see Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994, Nos. 75 ff; De Boeck, Informatierechten en –plichten, nos. 671 & 665.

7. In GERMAN law, keeping silent may amount to fraud under CC § 123 when there was a duty to disclose. There is no general duty, but there is one where the other party relies on the knowledge or expertise of the contracting partner or where there is already a relationship based on mutual trust and good faith (MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, § 123 nos. 16, 17.) There is a rich case law, e.g. the seller of a used car was held to be under a duty to tell the buyer that the car had been in a serious accident which had caused permanent damage to the chassis: BGH 8 January 1959, BGHZ 29, 148, 150; an estate representative had to disclose a suspicion that a house suffered from rot (OLG Celle, 6 November 1970, MDR 1971, 392). There are similar duties to disclose in AUSTRIAN law (see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], § 870 no. 4); GREEK law, see CC art. 147; ITALIAN law, CC art. 1439; DUTCH law, see CC art. 3:49 and Vranken; PORTUGUESE law, see CC art. 253; SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 49(1) and 625(2); and NORDIC law, where Contract Acts § 30 may apply when a party in bad faith fails to reveal a fact, and the Sale of Goods Act in force in Finland and Sweden may make a seller who has sold "as is" nonetheless liable for non-conformity if there was a failure to fulfil the duty of disclosure. Under ESTONIAN law, GPCCA § 95 closely resembles paragraph (3) of the present Article. Court practice insists that without request, the party has to disclose only information the importance of which to the other party is recognisable to the first party (Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 19 October 2005, no. 3-2-1-93-05, p. 17).

8. ENGLISH, IRISH, SLOVAK and SCOTTISH law, in contrast, do not recognise any general duty of disclosure, even when the party knows that the other party is ignorant of a critical fact and would not contract if aware of the truth: Smith v. Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597, QB There is a duty to disclose only if the contract is one of a very limited number of contracts uberrimae fidei (insurance contracts are the most important example); or if there is a confidential relationship between the parties: Tate v. Williamson (1866) LR 2 CA 55. For English law see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 6-0139 - 6-0157; on Irish law, Friel 217; on Scottish law, Gloag 480. Thus in ENGLAND and IRELAND there is fraud only if a party has made a positive representation by words or conduct. However, conduct may carry an implication of fact and, if the implication is misleading, the party must correct the impression created. Thus in the Irish case of Gill v. McDowell [1903] 2 IR 295, KB it was held that a seller of a hermaphrodite animal was under a duty to disclose this fact because he was selling it in a market where only cows and bulls were normally sold. In SCOTTISH law the possibility of fraudulent concealment, where silence is part of a 'machination or contrivance to deceive' a party into entering a contract, has also been recognised (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 14.13-14.18).

VI. Fraud by a third party

9. Systems differ on the question whether a contract may be avoided because of fraud by a third party. This is dealt with below, see notes to II.–7:208 (Third persons).

VII. Effect of fraud

10. In most systems the effect of fraud is to give the party who has been deceived the right to avoid the whole contract, even if the fraud related only to a part of it. In ENGLISH, IRISH, SCOTTISH, POLISH, CZECH, SLOVAK, SLOVENIAN and NORDIC law fraud as to any part of the contract entitles the victim to escape the whole. Provided that the fraud was the reason the party entered into the contract, the same is true under GREEK CC art. 181 (Karasis in Georgiadis/Stathopoulos art. 184 no. 3). In FRANCE, the effect of fraud is the nullity of the contract and/or damages. Traditionally, the victim of an intentional mistake caused by fraud, has a right to the nullity of the contract if he or she would not have concluded the contract but for the mistake. Conversely, should he or she have only concluded the contract on different conditions, the victim of the mistake has only a right to damages. In some cases, the Cour de Cassation makes no distinction and the contract is avoided even when the victim of the mistake caused by fraud would have, but for the mistake, concluded a contract on different conditions (Cass.civ. 3è, 22 juin 2005: RDC, 1025, obs. Ph. Stoffel-Munck). In BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law the relative nullity applies; however, the general rules on partial invalidity may apply: the question is whether the fraud relates to an essential part of the contract or overturns its whole economy. The DUTCH CC art. 3:44 is to the same effect; see Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht II, no. 490. In GERMAN law the part to which the fraud relates may be annulled leaving the rest of the contract standing if it is severable and this is what the parties are assumed to want: BGH 5 April 1973, LM HGB § 119 no. 10, MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, § 143 no. 11. According to AUSTRIAN case law partial avoidance is only possible if the remaining contract would have been agreed upon by both parties (OGH 17 February 1966, EvBl 1966/255). The ESTONIAN GPCCA § 90(3) provides for a similar rule.

11. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 210(4) a person who has been persuaded to conclude a contract by deception by the other party is entitled to challenge the contract. This provision also applies if the deception was committed by a third person and the other party had or should have had knowledge of such conduct.

12. On fraud generally see Kötz, European Contract Law I, pp. 196-208.

II.–7:206: Coercion or threats

(1) A party may avoid a contract when the other party has induced the conclusion of the contract by coercion or by the threat of an imminent and serious harm which it is wrongful to inflict, or wrongful to use as a means to obtain the conclusion of the contract.

(2) A threat is not regarded as inducing the contract if in the circumstances the threatened party had a reasonable alternative.

COMMENTS

A. Introduction

The notion of freedom of contract suggests that a party should only be bound by actions which were both voluntary and free, in the sense that the party had some choice. In practice the notion of freedom has to be tempered. On the one hand, a person who is made to sign by the other grabbing the arm and moving it simply does not consent and has not even appeared to agree. In such a case there would not be an agreement within these rules. On the other hand, there are frequent occasions when the choices facing a person are so constrained by circumstances as to give rise to a feeling that he or she has to agree to a contract. During food shortages a hungry person may have little choice but to pay the high market price for food. The law of contract, dependent as it is on notions of the market, cannot insist that every contract should be free from such constraints. In some such cases the following Article (Unfair exploitation) may apply.

The law can insist that a party should not be constrained by the actions of the other party when those actions are unjustifiable. A person should not be bound if the person's consent was obtained by coercion or by threats of an unjustifiable type.

B. Coercion

Consent is vitiated if a person is coerced into doing something. Normally coercion will involve the use of threats but this is not necessarily so. There may be a situation of such dominance that one party can force the other person to act by simply giving an order. Often there will be implied threats in the background but it should not be necessary to imply threats artificially if there was factual coercion in the absence of threats.

C. Threats of acts wrongful in themselves

A party should not be able to hold the other to a contract which the other agreed to as the result of a threat that some other legal wrong would be inflicted on the first party.

> Illustration 1
> A and B are partners. A wishes to buy B's share of the business and, in order to induce B to sell her share, threatens to have some goods belonging to B wrongfully seized and impounded if she does not sell. B agrees to sell her share to A. B may avoid the contract.

The same would follow if A had threatened a third party, e.g. a member of B's family. It is not only threats of physical violence or damage to property which constitute wrongful threats. A threat to inflict economic loss wrongfully, e.g. by breaking a contract, can equally constitute duress.

Illustration 2
X owes a large debt to Y. Knowing that Y desperately needs the money, X tells Y that he will not pay it unless Y agrees to sell X a house which Y owns at a price well below its market value. Faced with bankruptcy, Y agrees. X then pays the debt. Y may avoid the contract to sell the house.

In practice the threat of a breach of contract is often used in an attempt to secure re-negotiation of the same contract. In this case the re-negotiation agreement may be avoided.

Illustration 3
C has agreed to build a ship for D at a fixed price. Because of currency fluctuations which affect various subcontracts, C will lose a great deal if the contract price is not changed and it threatens not to deliver unless D agrees to pay 10% extra. D will suffer serious harm if the contract is not performed. D pays the extra sum demanded by C. D may recover the extra sum paid.

D. Not every warning of non-performance amounts to a threat

If one party genuinely cannot perform the contract unless the other party promises to pay an increased price and the first party simply informs the second of this fact, the second party cannot later avoid any promise to pay a higher price. The first party's statement was merely a warning of the inevitable; there is no threat within the meaning of this Article.

Illustration 4
A employs a company, B, to build a road across A's farmland at a fixed price. B finds that the land is much wetter than either party had realised and B will literally be bankrupt before it has performed the contract at the original price. B informs A of this and A agrees to pay an increased price. Although A had no real choice, A cannot avoid the agreement to pay the increased price.

E. Threats of lawful acts wrongfully used

Even a threat to do something lawful may be illegitimate if it is not a proper way of obtaining the benefit sought, as in blackmail.

Illustration 5
E threatens his employer F that he will reveal to F's wife F's affair with his secretary unless F increases E's wages. F complies. He may avoid the agreement to pay E the higher wages.

F. Threat must have led to the contract

Relief will not be given unless the threat did influence the threatened party's decision. If the primary reason for paying the amount demanded is to settle the dispute rather than to avoid the threatened action, relief will not be given.

Illustration 6
A company, E, employs a firm of contractors, C, to do some building work. C has underpriced the work and tells E that it will not do it unless the price is increased. E is not much affected by the threat, which it regards as a bargaining ploy, but feels that C has made a genuine mistake and deserves a better price. So it agrees to pay the extra. It cannot avoid the agreement to pay extra.

Provided the threat has some influence it need not be the only reason for the contract.

Illustration 7
A and B are partners. A wishes to buy B's share of the business and, in order to induce B to sell his share, threatens to have B murdered if he does not sell. B agrees to sell his share to A. Even if B also has good business reasons for selling to A, B may avoid the contract.

G. No reasonable alternative

Relief will not be given if a party gave in to a threat when there was a perfectly good alternative - e.g. the party could have found someone else to do the work, or could have obtained an order forcing the other party to do it. If there was a reasonable alternative, which suggests that the threat was not the real reason for the threatened party agreeing to the demand. The burden of proving that the threatened party had a reasonable alternative rests on the party making the threat.

H. Remedies

The party coerced or subjected to the threat may avoid the contract, provided notice is given within a reasonable time. There may also be a right to damages.

I. No exclusion of remedies

Coercion or threats are forms of wrongful behaviour and therefore it is provided later that the remedies cannot be excluded or restricted by contrary agreement.

NOTES

1. All the systems recognise that a contract which is procured by one party making an illegitimate threat against the other may be avoided by the latter. For example, AUSTRIAN CC § 870 (if illegal threat and well-founded fear); POLISH CC art. 871; NORDIC Contract Acts §§ 28, 29; DUTCH CC art. 3:44; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1112 (avoidance if violence produces in the victim a fear of present and considerable harm to person or property); GERMAN CC § 123(1) (party may avoid a contract induced by illicit threats); GREEK CC arts. 150 and 151; ITALIAN CC art. 1434; PORTUGUESE CC arts. 246 and 256; SPANISH CC arts. 1267 and 1268, SLOVAK CC § 37 1st clause; SLOVENIAN LOA § 45(1); ESTONIAN GPCCA § 96. For ENGLISH law ("duress") see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 7-001 - 046; for IRISH law, Clark 260-268; for SCOTTISH law ("force and fear" or "extortion") see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 17.01-17.11 for CZECH law see Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 151 (inferred from the concept of the freedom of will), see also Supreme Court 3 Cdo 1522/96. There are some variations in the conditions under which relief will be granted.

I. Threat must have influenced the party seeking to avoid

2. In most systems the party seeking to avoid must have actually been influenced by the threat: GERMAN law: BGH 22 January 1964, NJW 1964, 811 (though the threatening party must have acted with the intention of obtaining the other party's consent: MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, § 123 no. 40); LUXEMBOURG, Cour, 29 April 1904, 6, 477, LUXEMBOURG, 7 April 1948, 14, 399; NORDIC law (Lynge Andersen 156 and Telaranta, Sopimusoikeus 320); PORTUGUESE CC art. 255; ESTONIAN GPCCA § 96(1). SCOTTISH law McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 17.03. In ENGLISH law the threat must have influenced the party seeking to avoid the contract; thus a payment which the threatening party had demanded and which was not due, but which was paid not because of the threat but to save trouble ("voluntarily to close the transaction"), is not recoverable: Maskell v. Horner [1915] 3 KB 106, CA However the burden of proving that the threat did not influence the threatened party is a heavy one (Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 7-020 - 7-07-022). In cases of physical duress it suffices that the threat had some effect on the victim's consent; the threat need not be the only or even the main reason the victim agreed to the contract. See Barton v. Armstrong [1976] AC 104, PC It does not appear that the threat must have been one which would have influenced a reasonable person.

3. Under FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art.1112 it seems that the test is not purely subjective: the threat must have been one that would influence a reasonable person of the same age, sex and condition (and see also ITALIAN CC art. 1435). See also SCOTTISH law: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 17.03. But it is said that the courts in France take a subjective approach (e.g. Cass.com. 28 May 1991, D. 1992.166, note P. Morvan; Nicholas 106, citing Req. 27 January 1919, S. 1920.1.198; Req. 17 November 1925, S. 1926.1 121.) AUSTRIAN law also seems to take a subjective approach in practice; the fear must be "well-founded" but the physical and mental state of the threatened person is taken into account as well as the gravity and probability of danger.

4. POLISH CC art. 87 sets the test as both subjective and objective. The threat must be illegal and it must appear from the circumstances that the threatened party had reason to fear, because they themselves or another person was in serious danger either with regard to their persons or their property. CZECH law takes the subjective approach (see CC § 37(1)), but the courts apply also an objective-circumstances corrective (Supreme Court 3 Cdo 1522/96 or 22 Cdo 752/99) – the threat must be of such kind and intensity as to – under the circumstances and nature of the particular case – objectively incite understandable apprehension in those against whom the threat was used (Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 152). In SLOVENIAN law, too, the threat must actually influence the conclusion of the contract by the threatened party but it must also be objectively recognizable from the circumstances, see LOA § 45(1) and (2).

5. DUTCH law takes an objective approach in that the threat must be one that would have influenced a reasonable person CC art. 3:44(1).

6. Under the SLOVAK CC § 37 1st clause the juridical act must be done in a free way, seriously, definitely and intelligibly; otherwise, it will be invalid. Legal theory interprets free will as a will without direct coercion (vis absoluta) and unjustified threat (vis compulsiva). Slovak legal theory considers both objective and subjective factors relevant (see Lazar et al. p. 126).

7. The present Article applies whenever the threat was imminent and serious and actually led to the conclusion of the contract which the party threatened is seeking to avoid.

II. The threat may be of physical or financial harm

8. Most systems do not limit relief to cases of threats of physical harm, but also include threats of causing financial or moral harm provided that the threat is illicit: for example FRENCH, see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 246ff, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1112 (fear of harm to person or fortune); PORTUGUESE CC arts. 246 (contract made under physical threat null) and 256 (if under moral threat, which comprises most cases of physical harm, avoidable); in GERMAN law, BGH 25 June 1965, LM § 123, no.32 (threat not to pay bill of exchange in order to induce other party to sell real estate); GREEK CC art. 151; ITALIAN CC art. 1435; POLISH CC art. 87 (a serious threat to the person or property); SLOVENIAN LOA § 45(2); THE NETHERLANDS, HR 27 March 1992, NedJur 1992, 377, HR 29 May 1964, NedJur 1965, 104; ESTONIA, Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 21 May 2004, no. 3-2-1-66-04. SCOTTISH law McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 17.06. The NORDIC Contract Acts § 28 deals with constraint caused by physical violence or by threats involving imminent use of physical harm, and § 29 with threats of causing other kinds of harm. In ENGLISH law it at one time seemed that the threat had to be one of physical violence or of wrongful seizure of property, but it is now recognised that a contract may be avoided in cases of "economic duress": that is, where the contract was made as the result of a threatened wrong, such as a breach of contract, and the party seeking relief gave in to avoid suffering serious losses if the threat was carried out and had no real alternative: e.g. obtaining effective protection by taking legal action. See North Ocean Shipping Co. Ltd. v. Hyundai Construction Co. Ltd., The Atlantic Baron [1979] QB 705, QB, which is the source of Illustration 3. Economic duress has not yet been recognised in IRISH law. For CZECH law see Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 152 (any illegal threats of a mental character – i.e. inducing fear). The present Article applies to all kinds of wrongful threats.

III. The threat must be illegitimate but need not be one of an act itself unlawful

9. The threat must be illegitimate, but most systems recognise that it may be illegitimate to use a threat of something itself not unlawful to extract a payment or promise. In FRENCH law, the threat to use a legal procedure (criminal proceedings, execution) does not generally amount to duress which would cause the avoidance of the contract (Cass.civ. 3è, 1è janvier 1984, Bull.civ. III, no. 13). Nonetheless, the threat to use a legal procedure can amount to duress if it is improper ("abusive") and if the author of the threat used it to obtain an excessive benefit (Cass.civ. 1ère, 3 novembre 1959: D. 1960, 187, note Holleaux); similarly LUXEMBOURG law, Cour, 10 May 1929, Pasicrisie 11, p. 459; in BELGIAN and GERMAN law, to threaten criminal proceedings against a relative of the other party, see respectively CA Brussels, 7 Feb. 1980, Pas. belge 1980, II, 55; CA Brussels 25 Feb. 1987, Soc. Kron. 1988, 129; OLG Karlsruhe, 11 January 1991, VersR 1992, 703; PORTUGUESE CC art. 255; ESTONIAN GPCCA § 96(2) 3); SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 45(1) and Juhart and Plavšak (-Dolenc), Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 339. SCOTTISH law McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 17.03. In English law, a contract made in similar circumstances was held to be voidable (Williams v. Bayley (1866) LR 1 HL 200, HL). In Universe Tankships of Monrovia Ltd. v. ITWF [1983] 1 AC 366, HL, Lord Scarman recognised that a threat to do something itself legal for an improper purpose ("blackmail") would amount to duress, but it is doubtful whether threats of lawful action which do not amount to a crime would suffice. In CTN Cash & Carry Ltd. v.

Gallaher Ltd. [1994] 4 AllER 714 the Court of Appeal has said that it will be slow to accept cases of "lawful act duress". Similarly, in AUSTRIAN law the threat must be "illegal", which may mean that the threat must amount to the crime of extortion (CP § 144) or the misdemeanour of compulsion (CP § 105). POLISH law takes the same position (CC art. 87 refers to "illegal threat"). Threats of lawful actions may also be illegitimate under Nordic Contract Acts § 29 e.g. FINNISH Supreme Court, CC 1997:67 in Sisula-Tulokas, Contract and tort law: twenty cases from the Finnish Supreme Court. In SPANISH law there have been cases where a creditor has threatened civil enforcement or foreclosure of a matured debt if the debtor does not provide a guarantee. A guarantee given under such a threat is deemed valid (Provincial Court Alicante 23 April 1999 (El Derecho 2686), Provincial Court Valencia 12 January 2000, Aranzadi Civil 2000) 392). For more complete information as to the case law, see García Vicente, La intimidación en los contratos (Estudio jurisprudencial), Rev. Der. Patrim. 9, 2002, 117 ff. In CZECH law the unlawfulness of a threat is interpreted as meaning that either the threat is unlawful in itself or the threat in itself is not wrongful but is used for a purpose which it should not serve (e.g. a threat to report a crime to the authorities in order to make the offender conclude a contract), see Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 152.

IV. A demand for extra payment in exchange for performing a contractual obligation will not necessarily be treated as wrongful

10. Some systems recognise explicitly that a party who is faced with unforeseeable expense in performing may state truthfully that performance will be impossible unless there is extra payment and that, if the other party promises the extra payment, the promise will not be avoidable on the ground of duress. See on DANISH law Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 155. Similarly in ENGLISH law it has been argued that there is no duress if the party claiming an inability to perform is merely stating the inevitable (e.g. that he or she will go bankrupt if not paid extra) or perhaps if the threatening party acts in good faith in demanding more (see the discussion in Burrows 215 - 216). Under the Article a truthful statement to the effect that the party will be unable to perform unless paid extra will not amount to a threat, see Comment B.

V. Threat made by a third party

11. On this point there are considerable differences between the systems. In ENGLISH law a threat made by a third party only gives a right of avoidance if the other party had actual or constructive notice of it, or the person making the threat was the other party's agent. The AUSTRIAN CC § 875 and DUTCH CC art. 3:44(5) are to similar effect. In contrast, art. 1111 of the FRENCH (see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 246), BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs explicitly covers the case of a threat made by a third party, and so do the POLISH CC art. 87, ITALIAN CC art. 1434, SLOVENIAN LOA § 45(1) and PORTUGUESE CC art. 256. The latter requires that, in the case of a threat by a third person, the harm threatened be serious and the victim's fear justified, whereas these conditions do not apply to a threat made by the other party. GERMAN law also covers threats made by third parties and it does not matter that the other party to the contract acted in good faith (BGH 6 July 1966, NJW 1966, 2399, 2401; contrast to CC § 123(2) which explicitly states the opposite rule for fraud). ESTONIAN law is to the same effect (GPCCA § 96 for threat, contra special rule for fraud: GPCCA § 94(4)). SCOTTISH law is to the same effect: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 17.03. The GREEK CC arts. 150 and 153 and SLOVAK law are still more liberal: the victim of a threat by a third party has an unqualified right to avoid the contract but the other party may, at the judge's discretion, be compensated for reliance loss in the absence of knowledge or constructive knowledge of the threat (see Maridakis 195, 196). CZECH jurisprudence holds that the threat may come from a third person but the culpable party must know about the threat and use the situation to its own advantage, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 245.

12. NORDIC law takes an intermediate position. Under the Contracts Act § 28, the party who was threatened with imminent violence may avoid the contract even if the threat was by a third party; other threats (§ 29) are only a defence against a party who knew or ought to have known of them.

13. The present rules adopt the position that if a threat is made by a third person for whom a party is responsible, or if a party knew or ought to have known of a threat made to the other party by some third person, the position will be as if the first party had made the threat. See Notes to II.–7:208 (Third persons) below.

14. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 210(4) a person who has been induced to conclude a contract by an unlawful threat by the other party is entitled to challenge the contract. This provision also applies if the duress was committed by a third person and the other party had or should have had knowledge of such conduct.

15. On duress generally see Kötz, European Contract Law I, 209-213.

II.–7:207: Unfair exploitation

(1) A party may avoid a contract if, at the time of the conclusion of the contract:

(a) the party was dependent on or had a relationship of trust with the other party, was in economic distress or had urgent needs, was improvident, ignorant, inexperienced or lacking in bargaining skill and

(b) the other party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known this and, given the circumstances and purpose of the contract, exploited the first party's situation by taking an excessive benefit or grossly unfair advantage.

(2) Upon the request of the party entitled to avoidance, a court may if it is appropriate adapt the contract in order to bring it into accordance with what might have been agreed had the requirements of good faith and fair dealing been observed.

(3) A court may similarly adapt the contract upon the request of a party receiving notice of avoidance for unfair exploitation, provided that this party informs the party who gave the notice without undue delay after receiving it and before that party has acted in reliance on it.

COMMENTS

A. Binding force of contracts and unfair exploitation

Contract law does not in general insist that bargains be fair in the sense that what is to be supplied or provided by each party should be objectively of equal value. Although some systems allow contracts, or certain types of contract, to be avoided simply on the ground that the price is grossly unfair (lésion), it is commonly held that the parties are the best judges of the relative values of what is to be exchanged. However many systems refuse to uphold contracts which involve an obviously gross disparity in these values when this appears to be the result of some bargaining weakness on one side and conscious advantage-taking on the other. This is the approach taken by this Article

The Article adopts the principle that a contract which gives one party excessive advantage and which involved unfair exploitation may be avoided or modified at the request of the disadvantaged party.

B. Weakness or need essential

It would create too much uncertainty if a party could escape from a contract, even if it is disadvantageous, when there is no apparent reason why the party did not take better care when agreeing. Relief should only be available when the party can point to some need, weakness or disability to explain what happened. This may include the fact that the party had a confidential relationship with the other party and was relying on the other for advice, if this meant that the party was not exercising independent judgement.

C. Knowledge of party obtaining advantage

It would also create too much uncertainty to upset contracts which are one-sided when the party who gains the advantage neither knew nor could reasonably be expected to have known that the other party was in a weaker position. In such circumstance the stronger party cannot reasonably be required to have any special regard to the weaker party's interests.

D. Excessive benefit

The Article applies where the benefit gained by one party is demonstrably excessive in comparison to the "normal" price or other return in such contracts. The fact that a shortage of supply has led to generally high prices is not a ground for the application of this Article, even if the sudden price increase has allowed one party to make an abnormally high profit.

Illustration 1
During a sudden cold snap during early summer the price of tomatoes increases dramatically. B agrees to buy tomatoes from A at the increased price. B cannot avoid the contract under this Article even though B discovers that A had bought the tomatoes at a much lower price earlier in the summer and had kept them in cold store.

Where however a party takes advantage of another's ignorance or need to make a particularly one-sided contract, this Article will apply.

Illustration 2
X, an uneducated person with no business experience, is left some property. He is contacted by Y who offers to buy it for a sum much less than it is actually worth; telling X that he must sell quickly or he will lose the chance. X agrees without consulting anyone else. X may avoid the contract.

Illustration 3
U and her family are on holiday abroad when they are involved in a car crash and U's husband is badly hurt. He urgently needs medical treatment which is not locally available. V agrees to take the man by ambulance to the nearest major hospital, charging approximately five times the normal amount for such a journey. U is so worried that she agrees without getting other quotations; she does not discover until later that she has been overcharged. She may obtain relief.

Illustration 4
The facts are as in the last Illustration. U realises that V is demanding an extortionate price but his is the only ambulance available. She may obtain relief.

E. Grossly unfair advantage

The Article may apply even if the exchange is not excessively disparate in terms of value for money, if grossly unfair advantage has been taken in other ways. For example, a contract may be unfair to a party who can ill afford it even if the price is not unreasonable.

Illustration 5
X, a widow, lives with her many children in a large but dilapidated house which Y, a neighbour, has long wanted to buy. X has come to rely on Y's advice in business matters. Y is well aware of this and manipulates it to his advantage: he persuades her to sell it to him. He offers her the market price but without pointing out to her that she will find it impossible to find anywhere else to live in the neighbourhood for that amount of money. X may avoid the contract.

F. Risk taking

Relief should not be given when the apparent one-sidedness of the bargain is the result of a party gambling and losing. The contract was not unfair when it was made, even though it may have turned out badly for one party.

G. Remedies

It may not be appropriate simply to set aside the contract which is excessively advantageous. The disadvantaged party may wish the contract to continue but in modified form. Under paragraph (2) the court may therefore substitute fair terms. This goes further than a right of partial avoidance, since it allows the substitution of a fair term.

Conversely it may not be fair to the party who gained the advantage simply to avoid the whole contract; that could result in unfairness the other way. So the court has power to adapt the contract at the request of either party, provided the request so to do is made promptly and before the party who has received a notice of avoidance has acted on it.

The court should adapt the contract only if this is an appropriate remedy in the circumstances. For example, adaptation would not be appropriate in a case like Illustration 5 above.

In addition to or instead of avoidance the disadvantaged party may recover damages; these are limited to the amount by which the party is worse off compared to the position before the contract was made (the "reliance interest"). Damages are dealt with later.

H. Remedies cannot be excluded

Since unfair exploitation of another's weakness or distress in the circumstances covered by this Article is unconscionable, it is provided later that the remedies for unfair exploitation cannot be excluded or restricted by agreement.

NOTES

1. All the systems in some circumstances permit avoidance of a contract which has been obtained by unfair means, but some allow relief simply because the substance of the contract is unfair. Most systems have fairly broad rules permitting avoidance where one party has deliberately taken advantage of the other party's need or circumstances to obtain a very one-sided contract (see note 1), but some do not insist on the aggrieved party having been in a vulnerable position (see note 2) or grant relief simply on the basis of great disproportion in value (lesion; see note 3). A few systems give relief primarily in cases of abuse of a special relationship between the parties, and in the absence of such a relationship allow a remedy only under very limited conditions. Many systems have particular rules governing loans or consumer credit transactions.
2. SLOVAK law has a different approach on this ground. Two provisions of the CC are applicable, depending on the contractual terms. Under CC § 49 the participant who concluded an agreement in pressure under strikingly disadvantageous conditions is entitled to withdraw from the agreement. The pressure may be economic or social. The pressure is considered objectively. It does not matter whether the other contractual party knew about it or not or whether it was induced by the affected party or another person. The right to withdraw from the agreement is not the same as a right to avoid the contract. This ground is provided only for lesser gross disparity. In the case of greater gross disparity the juridical act is contrary to good morals (contra bonos mores) and so it is void (see Svoboda, J. et al.: Občiansky zákonník. Komentár a súvisiace predpisy. p. 117). The CC § 39 is applicable.

I. Taking advantage of a vulnerable party

3. Many systems give relief when one party has taken advantage of the other's particular circumstances to obtain an unfair contract. Thus FRENCH jurisprudence, treats exploitation of a party's economic necessity or other circumstances as a form of violence: Soc. 5 July 1965, Bull.civ. IV no. 545; Civ. 1, 24 May 1989, Bull.civ. I, no. 212; Cass.civ. 1ère, 30 may 2000: Bull.civ. I, no. 169; Cass.civ. 1ère, 3 avril 2002: Bull.civ. I, no. 108. Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 248 and Ccom art. 420-2 al 2; compare in BELGIUM, CA Brussels 7 February 1964, Pas. belge 1965 II 70. Otherwise relief is only given for error, threat or fraud and, in very limited circumstances, for lésion (see below). Belgian doctrine and case law gives relief for abuse of right (or: abuse of circumstances) when it gives rise to a disproportionate transaction, under the doctrine of qualified lesion, whereas relief for lesion without abuse of right (see Note 3 below) is rare: see Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 124; Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994 no. 149 and Cass. 21 Sept. 1961, Pas. belge 1962 I 92; Cass. 25 Nov. 1977, Arr.Cass. 1978, 343; Cass. 29 April 1993, JT 1994, 294. The new art. 1118 of the LUXEMBOURG CC gives a remedy for abuse of circumstances generally. The DUTCH CC similarly allows annulment of a juridical act where there has been threat, fraud or abuse of circumstances; the latter is defined as being induced to execute a juridical act as a result of special circumstances such as state of necessity, dependency, wantonness, abnormal mental condition or inexperience (art. 3:44(4)). In NORDIC law, Contract Act § 31 applies where one party has taken advantage of another party's economic or personal difficulties, want of judgment, recklessness or state of dependence to acquire a disproportionate benefit; but there is also the possibility of the setting aside or adjustment of an unfair contract under § 36 without the need for special circumstances, see below. Both approaches exist also in SLOVENIAN law: according to LOA § 119, a contract is void (null), if a party takes advantage of personal or economic necessity, inexperience, want of judgement or state of dependence to acquire an obviously disproportionate benefit. On the other hand, a party can avoid the contract merely on the grounds of obvious disproportionality according to LOA § 118 (laesio enormis), see below. SCOTTISH law allows a remedy in cases of "facility and circumvention" when advantage was taken of a person who was "facile"- for example, elderly and confused or unwell (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 16.12-16.21).

4. In ENGLISH and IRISH law, relief may be given under two separate rules, each involving the exploitation of a person who is particularly vulnerable. The first is the doctrine of undue influence where one party has exercised, or is in a position to exercise, a high degree of influence over the other. Relief may be available if it is shown either that one party exercised such a degree of influence over the other that the latter's independence of mind was undermined ("actual" undue influence: see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 7-053 -7-057), or that the parties were in a confidential relationship. In the latter situation, if the weaker party enters into a contract which "calls for explanation" with the stronger, a presumption arises that undue influence has been used: Royal Bank of Scotland v. Etridge (No.2.) [2001] UKHL 44, [2002] 2 AC 773. Some relationships (e.g. doctor and patient) are treated as always giving rise to a confidential relationship; in other cases such a relationship may be proved (e.g.

between husband and wife, see Barclays Bank v. O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180, HL or bank manager and client, see Lloyd's Bank Ltd. v. Bundy [1975] QB 326, CA For Ireland, see Bank of Ireland v. Smyth [1993] 2 IR 102, affirmed on other grounds [1996] 1 ILRM 241; Annual Review of Irish Law 1993, 194.). The doctrine of undue influence is also known in SCOTLAND but the presumption of undue influence is not used and the influence must always be proved. Secondly, the doctrine of unconscionable bargains states that if a party takes deliberate advantage of the other party's poverty and ignorance to buy property from the poor and ignorant person at much less than its true value, the weaker party may have the contract set aside (see Fry v. Lane (1888) 40 ChD 312). The doctrine is old and not much used in England, though see Boustany v. Piggott [1993] EGCS 85, PC, and the parallel rule in a case where a party, though not completely incapable of transacting, is suffering from some mental disability, see Hart v. O'Connor [1985] AC 1000, PC In Ireland the doctrine of unconscionability is used more frequently, e.g. Grealish v. Murphy [1946] IR 35 (HC), Lyndon v. Coyne (1946) 12 IrJurRep. 64 (HC); JH v. WJH (unrep., 20 Dec. 1979, (HC). English, Irish and Scottish law do not recognise any general doctrine of abuse of circumstances. Relief in this kind of case is limited to salvage on the high seas (e.g. The Port Caledonia and The Anna [1903] P 184) and to cases of consumer credit agreements. The Consumer Credit Act 1974, new ss. 140A-140D (inserted by Consumer Credit Act 2006, ss. 19-22), gives the court extensive powers to intervene if it determines that there was an "unfair relationship" as between the creditor and the debtor, or an associate of the creditor and the debtor. This replaces the provisions on "extortionate credit bargains" in former ss. 137-140 of the 1974 Act.

5. Other systems seem to follow the notion of limiting relief to abuse of circumstances but give relief in more limited conditions. Thus ITALIAN law recognises that a contract made in circumstances of economic distress may be avoided but only if the performances are disproportionate in a ratio of greater than 1:2 (art. 1448); or if the contract was made in a situation of danger and on iniquitous terms (art. 1447). The PORTUGUESE CC arts. 282 and 283 apply when the victim is inexperienced, imprudent or in a state of necessity, but it may be possible to interpret the provisions to cover all the situations referred to in the Article, see Eiró, Do negocio usurário 45; Cordeiro 158; Vasconcelos 465. The ESTONIAN GPCCA § 97 is similar to paragraph (1) of the present Article but limits the right to avoid on this basis to natural persons.

6. The POLISH CC has an express provision (art. 388) concerning the issue. If one of the parties, taking advantage of the involuntary situation, disability or inexperience of the other party, in exchange for its performance accepts or stipulates for itself or for a third party a performance, the value of which at the moment of concluding the contract grossly exceeds the value of its own performance, the other party may demand a reduction of its own performance or an increase in the performance due to it, and in the event one or the other would be excessively difficult, it may demand invalidation of the contract. The above rights cease to exist on the passing of two years from the day the contract was concluded.

7. CZECH law has a concept of duress (CC § 49) which is explained as social (especially economic) or mental state of a person which – from the objective point of view - bears on the person to such a serious extent that he or she, without free formation of will, concludes a contract which obviously causes harm to him or her and which he or she would not have concluded under normal circumstances (Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 311). So, the formulation is quite wide and covers all known cases of unfair exploitation, such as usury, confusion, dependency etc. Application of duress is completely excluded in commercial relations – Ccom § 267(2).

II. Excessive advantage-taking rather than protection of particularly vulnerable parties

8. In contrast there are systems in which the position of the aggrieved party is not so important as the disparity between the obligations. The AUSTRIAN CC § 879, GERMAN CC § 138(2) and GREEK CC arts. 178 and 179 treat contracts which involve a gross disparity as contrary to good morals and therefore voidable. The cases concentrate on the excessive disparity rather than the particular vulnerabilities of the weaker party; the most important group of cases in German law are those dealing with consumer credit and hire-purchase agreements, which are void if the overall interest rate to be paid is deemed to be excessive, e.g. if it is 100% above the average rate (BGH 24 March 1988, BGHZ 104, 102, 105; BGH 13 March 1990, BGHZ 110, 336, 338, which refer to exploitation of the needs, inexperience, lack of judgement or weakness of will of the losing party, are consequently rarely applied. The vulnerability of the weaker party is, however, important in cases of sureties who have given guarantees without the means to meet their possible liability (e.g. BVerfG 19 October 1993, NJW 1994, 36; BGH 24 February 1994, NJW 1994, 1278). In NORDIC law a contract which is substantively unfair may be set aside or adjusted under Contracts Act § 36 without the need to show that the gaining party took advantage of the other's circumstances. In CZECH law contracts concluded under manifestedly unfair terms may be void as such (so not only voidable as in case of simple unfair exploitation) on the basis of being contrary to good morals, Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 312.

III. Lesion

9. FRENCH (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 248 and Rep. Civ. Droit civil, Dalloz, D.Mazeaud) and BELGIAN CCs art. 1118 state that a contract may be set aside on the ground of lesion only in certain situations, principally if in sales of immovables the price paid is less than 5/12ths of the value (arts. 1674-1685), in the case of division between heirs (arts. 887 and 1079) or where the contract is with a minor or someone who is incapable (art. 1305). LUXEMBOURG law foresees the same solution also in the broader hypothesis of abuse of circumstances, see Note 1 above. AUSTRIAN CC §§ 934, 935 recognise lesion as a ground for avoidance or adaptation of a contract where a party to a synallagmatic contract receives a counter-performance of less than 50% of the value of the performance, judged by the relative values at the time the contract was made. The rule cannot be excluded by contrary stipulation and has become an important remedy in consumer protection. According to the SLOVENIAN LOA § 118 a party can avoid the contract within one year after conclusion if the performances of the parties were grossly disproportionate at the time of conclusion and the party did not know and could not reasonably have known the true value. The rule does not apply to gambling contracts, public auctions or contracts where the price was higher because of personal circumstances (pretium affectionis); it cannot be excluded by contract. The SCOTTISH doctrine of lesion gives spasmodic control in some cases but no general principle has been established (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 17.12-17.22).

10. The Article follows what seems to be the majority position in requiring one party to have taken advantage of the other's special weakness to obtain an unfair contract, rather than giving relief simply on the basis of a disproportion in values between the performances.

IV. Deliberate exploitation

11. Apart from the cases of lesion described in the last note, the majority of systems agree that it is only when one party has deliberately taken advantage of the other that relief will be given. Thus in ENGLISH law it has been said that relief o7n the grounds of mental incapacity or unconscionability can be given only where one party consciously took advantage of the other's weakness: Hart v. O'Connor [1985] AC 1000, PC But this is not required in IRISH law. DUTCH CC art. 3:44 applies when the gaining party ought to have known of the other's weakness. For PORTUGUESE law see Eiró 51, 57. In practice courts in the various systems will infer advantage-taking from the objective facts of gross disparity: e.g. in GERMAN law BGH 14 June1984, NJW 1984, 2292; BGH 10 July 1986, BGHZ 98, 174, 178; in ENGLISH law, the presumption of undue influence which arises from a manifestly disadvantageous transaction, above, and see Crédit Lyonnais Bank Nederland NV v. Burch [1997] 3 AllER 144, CA

V. The contract must be excessively one-sided

12. In all systems the transaction must be excessively one-sided or unfair before relief will be given. In some systems it seems that the unfairness must be measured by an objective criterion such as the market price: e.g. GREEK law, A.P. 281/1968 NoB 16 (1968) 815, 529/2001 ChrID A/2001, 694; and NORDIC law, Contracts Act § 31 ("obviously disproportionate", see Telaranta 336-337). In ENGLISH law for the presumption of undue influence to arise, the transaction must be one that cannot be explained by ordinary motives (Turkey v. Awadh [2005] EWCA Civ 382, [2005] 2 FCR 7,CA); to be unconscionable it must involve a sale at undervalue. But "objective unfairness" is not always required: e.g. in DUTCH law, if the old widow did not want to sell her house it is no excuse to say that she received a fair price, HR 27 March 1992, NedJur 1992, 377. See also HR 29 May 1964, NedJur 1965, 104; in English law in cases of actual undue influence the weaker party may set aside the transaction without showing that it was manifestly disadvantageous: CIBC Mortgages Ltd v. Pitt [1994] 1 AC 200, HL The POLISH CC refers to the gross imbalance of the two performances (art. 388). In CZECH law, a contract is voidable for duress (unfair exploitation) only if concluded under conspicuously disadvantageous terms (CC § 49), which should be judged from the objective point of view.

13. The HUNGARIAN CC § 201(2) states if at the time of the conclusion of the contract the difference between the value of a service and the consideration due, without either party having the intention of bestowing a gift, is grossly unfair the injured party may contest the contract. CC § 202 states that if a contracting party has gained excessive benefit or unfair advantage at the conclusion of the contract by exploiting the other party's situation, the contract is void (usurious contract).

VI. Adaptation of the contract

14. Although the traditional remedy granted is simply avoidance of the contract, some systems permit in some cases the court to adapt the contract to remove the disproportion: e.g. when lesion is admitted; FRENCH and BELGIAN CCs art. 1681; LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1118 (at the request of the disadvantaged party only); similarly, DUTCH CC art. 3:54; AUSTRIAN CC § 935 (laesio enormis); NORDIC Contract Acts § 36 and in Denmark, § 31 (see Lynge Andersen 171); PORTUGUESE CC art. 283(1) and (2) and SLOVENIAN LOA § 119(3), where the disadvantaged party can demand adaptation within 5 years after conclusion. BELGIAN case law reaches a kind of adaptation of the contract by applying reduction as a form of partial nullity or as a sanction for a culpa in contrahendo or for abuse of right (see on reduction for abuse of right: Cass. 18 Feb. 1988, RW 1988-89, 1226. Additionally, many systems allow the court to reduce excessive interest rates on loans, e.g. Belgian CC art. 1907(3); Luxembourg CC art. 1907-1; U.K. Consumer Credit Act 1974, s. 140B (inserted by Consumer Credit Act 2006, s. 20). In POLISH law adaptation of the contract has priority. Where this is impossible or too difficult, a party may plead for the contract to be nullified (art. 388).

15. The idea that a party who has received notice of avoidance may maintain the contract by offering an amendment which would remove the injustice is found in ITALIAN law (CC. art. 1450).

16. The sanctions of violence, in FRENCH law, are either absolute or relative nullity and, if a fault has been committed, damages can also be granted (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 250): it is a kind of indirect adaptation of the contract.

II.–7:208: Third persons

(1) Where a third person for whose acts a party is responsible or who with a party's assent is involved in the making of a contract:

(a) causes a mistake, or knows of or could reasonably be expected to know of a mistake; or

(b) is guilty of fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation, remedies under this Section are available as if the behaviour or knowledge had been that of the party.

(2) Where a third person for whose acts a party is not responsible and who does not have the party's assent to be involved in the making of a contract is guilty of fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation, remedies under this Section are available if the party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the relevant facts, or at the time of avoidance has not acted in reliance on the contract.

COMMENTS

A. Responsibility for agents, employees and others

A party is generally treated as responsible for not just the actions of employees but also of those whom the party involves in the making of the contract or to whom performance is delegated. This applies just as much to behaviour or knowledge which might invalidate a contract as to other things. The contracting party will be liable just as the third person would have been had the contract been made with the third person. Normally the third person will be acting on behalf of the party against whom the remedy is sought, but this need not be so if the third party was involved with the party's assent; it need not be shown that the third party was acting for the party.

Illustration 1

A supplier of goods holds an informal negotiation with a buyer; another customer is present and with the supplier's assent joins in the discussion. Out of the supplier's hearing, the other customer gives the buyer some inaccurate information. The buyer should have a remedy just as if the information had been given by the supplier, without having to show that the other customer was acting on the supplier's behalf.

B. Remedies where fraud, etc. by a third person for whom party is not responsible

There are some legal systems within Europe which allow a party to avoid a contract concluded as the result of an improper threat whoever made the threat. However, it is more generally considered that a party should not be fixed with the consequences of improper or careless behaviour of a third person for whom that party is not responsible and who does not fall into the other categories mentioned in Comment A. To permit avoidance of the contract for such reasons risks undermining the party's reasonable reliance on the contract and might deter people from making contracts that in fact would benefit all parties. Thus if a contract to provide personal security for a loan made by a bank could be avoided by the security provider on the ground that the security provider had been threatened by the debtor or some third party, even though the bank had no way of discovering that fact, banks might be deterred from making loans which need to be secured in this way. The result would be a reduction in the availability of credit.

In contrast, the party should not be allowed to enforce a contract if the party knows or should know that the contract was concluded only through behaviour by a third person which, if by a contracting party, would give rise to a remedy under the foregoing provisions of this Chapter

Illustration 2
A bank lends money to a husband's business on the strength of a charge, signed by the wife, over the family home. The charge is very much against the wife's interest and the husband has procured the wife's signature by duress. The bank ought to know that it is most unlikely that the wife would sign voluntarily and the bank cannot enforce the charge. It should have made enquiries to ensure that the wife was acting freely.

The party should also be liable for damages if the party knows of the ground for avoidance, but does not inform the other party that the information is incorrect.

C. Remedy when party knows of mistake

A party may also know of a mistake which was known to or caused by a third person. There is no need for a special rule to cover this case since a party may avoid a contract entered under a mistake if the mistake was known to the other party.

D. No reliance on contract by other party

It also seems fair to allow a party who has concluded a contract because of the fraud, etc of a third person, or because of a mistake which was or should have been known to the third person, to avoid the contract, even if the other party to the contract did not know or have reason to know of the circumstances, provided the party seeking to avoid the contract can prove that the other party has not yet acted in reliance on it, even by passing up other opportunities.

NOTES

I. Actions by a third person for whom a party is responsible

1. All Member States adopt the principle that a contract may be avoided against a party whose employee or representative has behaved in such a way that, if the representative or employee had been the party to the contract, it could have been avoided on one of the grounds described in this chapter. E.g. AUSTRIAN CC § 1313(a); ITALIAN law, CC art. 1390; ESTONIAN GPCCA §§ 132-133; ENGLISH law, see Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 7-090; BELGIAN case law: Cass. 9 Nov. 1987, Pas. belge 1988, 298; GERMAN law, see MünchKomm (-Kramer), BGB, § 123 no. 23 (for cases of fraud). CZECH law makes one exception from this principle, namely that the principal's good faith acting or knowledge or ignorance of certain circumstances should be taken into consideration also with regard to the representative, unless it concerns circumstances about which the representative had learned before the authority was granted (CC § 32(3)); so, in this case the representative's knowledge is not imputed to the principal. In all other situations CZECH law conforms to the basic concept. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 315a person who employs another person to perform obligations or exercise rights of the first person is liable for the conduct of that person.

II. Actions by a third person for whom the party is not responsible

2. As noted earlier, some systems allow avoidance of a contract entered as the result of a threat by a third person for whom the other party was not responsible, even if the other party did not know and had no reason to know of the threat. The majority of systems, however, hold that the contract may be avoided for duress or any other factor mentioned in this chapter only if the other party participated in the misbehaviour or knew or should have known of what was happening: e.g. AUSTRIAN CC § 875 (participation or actual knowledge); DUTCH CC art. 3:44(5). Some of the systems which do not require knowledge in the case of duress do require it in case of fraud. In FRENCH law, as a rule, fraud by a third party does not make the contract void. The rule is different if the other party of the victim of the fraud has been an accessory to the third party or if the litigious act is a unilateral act (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 235) or a unilateral contract. Besides, in the event of duress, the contract can be declared void if it comes from a third party BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law (CCs art. 1111 cover only violence by a third person); in SLOVENIAN law, threat and fraud as well as unfair exploitation by a third party are relevant, if the party knew or should have known about them, with the exception of fraud with regard to unilateral contracts (e.g. donation), see LOA §§ 45, 49(3) and (4) and 119; GERMAN CC § 123(2) (for cases of fraud); POLISH CC art. 87; ITALIAN CC art. 1434 (duress is cause for annulment of a contract even if exerted by a third person); art. 1439 (when the deception was employed by a third person, the contract is voidable if it was known to the party who derived benefit from it); arts. 1447, 1448 (in cases of danger or need, relief only when known to party or to third person who was acting as representative); Nordic Contract Acts §§ 29-31 on threats, fraud and unfair exploitation (knew or ought to have known); PORTUGUESE CC art. 254(2) (fraud; not required in cases of exploitation of the weak position of a contracting party under art. 282, Mendes 129; Eiró 69); ESTONIAN GPCCA § 94(4). In SPAIN, the courts have interpreted CC art. 1269 as limited to cases of fraud by one of the contracting parties but this approach is criticised, e.g. by Lasarte Álvarez, § 3.6(c). Pursuant to CZECH jurisprudence, an avoidance ground may come from a third person, for whose actions no party is responsible, but the culpable party must know about it and use the situation to its own advantage, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 245.

3. In ENGLISH law it has been held that if a lender is given a guarantee or security by a party whose relationship with the debtor is non-commercial (e.g. they are husband and wife), the lender must ensure that the surety has had independent advice. If the lender fails to do this, it will be fixed with constructive notice of any impropriety which has occurred: Barclays Bank v. O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180, HL; Royal Bank of Scotland v. Etridge (No 2) [2001] UKHL 44, [2002] 2 AC 773. In SCOTLAND a similar result has been reached but via the different route of recognising a duty of good faith by the creditor towards the surety: Smith v. Bank of Scotland 1997 SC (HL) 111. The HUNGARIAN CC § 210(4) on deception or duress applies if the deception or duress was committed by a third person and the other party had or should have had knowledge of this conduct.

III. Fraud etc by a third person where the party against whom avoidance is sought did not know of the fraud but has not relied on the contract

4. The question whether the party has relied on the contract may exceptionally be taken into account in NORDIC law, Contract Acts § 39. It is not relevant in BELGIAN, DUTCH, ENGLISH, ESTONIAN, FRENCH GERMAN, GREEK, SLOVAK or LUXEMBOURG law.

II.–7:209: Notice of avoidance

Avoidance under this Section is effected by notice to the other party.

COMMENTS

Avoidance may be effected by the party entitled to avoid the contract; it is not necessary to seek a court order to avoid the contract.

Under the normal rules on notice, the receipt principle applies and the avoidance will not be effective unless the notice reaches the other party. Under the normal rules on notice, the notice may be given by any means appropriate to the circumstances. In informal circumstances it need not be in writing and need not use technical legal terms. The requirement of good faith and fair dealing will often require the notice to give some indication, even if only in lay person's language, of the reason for the avoidance, unless this can be regarded as already obvious to the receiving party. Statements or conduct by a party unequivocally indicating that, because of the facts giving ground for avoidance, the party is no longer to be regarded as bound by the contract may amount to notice of avoidance if made known to the other party.

> Illustration
> A takes a job as manager with B's firm after B makes fraudulent statements about the commission which previous managers have made with the firm. After A discovers the truth, he protests about B's dishonesty and says he is considering what to do. He then takes a job with another firm and informs B of this. Taken together A's statements and conduct amount to notice of avoidance.

Provided the time limit for avoidance has not passed, a party may give notice of avoidance by raising the ground of avoidance as a defence to an action on the contract brought by the other party.

NOTES

1. In some systems the effect of some of the grounds for invalidity mentioned in this chapter is that the contract is altogether void (e.g. for erreur obstacle in FRENCH law, or if contra bonos mores or induced by threat and coercion in SLOVAK law, or in the case of mistake at common law in ENGLISH law). In such case the party need not take any step to avoid the contract, though action may be necessary to recover property, money or payment for services rendered.
2. Where the contract is merely voidable, in many of the legal systems of Member States, a contract may be avoided on the traditional grounds of invalidity by simple notice to the other party: e.g. GERMAN CC § 143; DUTCH CC art. 3:49; POLISH law (CC art. 88 § 1); ESTONIAN GPCCA § 98(1); NORDIC law (Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 142); ENGLISH and IRISH law (notice normally required but dispensed with if third party has deliberately gone into hiding and party seeking to avoid has taken all reasonable steps such as notifying police: Car & Universal Finance Co Ltd. v. Caldwell [1965] 1 QB 625, CA); SCOTTISH law (notice to police insufficient, McLeod v. Kerr 1965 SC 253). However a court action is required in GREECE, CC art. 154; in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG (CCs art. 1117), unless the annulment is accepted by the other party; and similarly in ITALIAN law (CC art. 1441) and PORTUGUESE law, Ascensão 378; Cordeiro 648, Vasconcelos 587 (but supporting, depending on the circumstances, a simple notice or an agreement). In AUSTRIAN doctrine and court practice the opinion prevails that avoidance on the ground of error requires a court decision, and that it is not sufficient to direct an informal notice to the other party. However this is doubtful as the CC does not require court proceedings. The situation in SLOVENIAN law with regard to avoidability (the consequence of fraud, threat, mistake and lesion, whereas contracts made by unfair exploitation are per se null) is similar: the LOA does not directly address this issue; the court practice demands court action, and there are different opinions among scholars. This is doubtful also in SLOVAK doctrine. However the party may always avoid the contract by filing an action or taking appropriate steps during court proceedings. There is also the right to withdraw, noted above, in the case of one ground for invalidity Under SPANISH law the avoidance can only be brought about by court judgment.

3. CZECH law distinguishes between particular situations. Defective contracts are either per se invalid (e.g. in case of threats) or voidable (e.g. in case of error) or may be withdrawn from (in case of duress). To avoid a contract, it suffices to claim the invalidity against the other party. But not only parties to the voidable contract may raise the claim, but every person legally affected by the contract (except for those who caused the voidability). See CC § 40a.

4. Several systems have a different regime for unfair terms, under which the term is simply of no effect and so notice of avoidance is not needed. In practice, it is for the courts to avoid the unfair term, even if it is considered to be an unwritten term. E.g. FRENCH CC in art. L.132.1; LUXEMBOURG; PORTUGUESE Act of 25 October 1985; POLISH law on consumer contracts; and GERMAN CC; also ESTONIAN LOA § 42(1). Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 236(1) the other party must be given written notification of avoidance within one year, and if the notification is not successful, avoidance should be immediately sought in court. Under the Directive, Member States are to provide that unfair terms will not be binding on consumers, art. 6(1).

II.–7:210: Time

A notice of avoidance under this Section is ineffective unless given within a reasonable time, with due regard to the circumstances, after the avoiding party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the relevant facts or became capable of acting freely.

COMMENTS

A. Party must take avoiding action with reasonable speed

The need for security in transactions requires that the party entitled to avoid a contract should do so within a reasonable time after learning of the relevant facts or becoming free of the coercion, threats or influence of the other party, rather than within the much longer time limits allowed by some laws.

B. Knowledge of facts

The party should act within a reasonable time of learning the relevant facts; it is not necessary that the party should know that the facts give rise to a right to avoid the contract. If in doubt, the party should take legal advice. A reasonable time will include time to take advice and consider the position.

NOTES

I. Avoidance for defect in consent

1. There is wide variation between the systems on the time within which avoidance must be sought. In ENGLISH law it has been held that the right to avoid a contract for misrepresentation may be lost within a matter of weeks, even though the misrepresentation has not been discovered (see Leaf v. International Galleries [1950] 2 KB 86, CA and Bernstein v. Pamson Motors (Golders Green) Ltd. [1987] 2 AllER 220, QBD), or within months of the cessation of duress (North Ocean Shipping Co. Ltd. v. Hyundai Construction Co. Ltd. [1979] QB 705, QBD). In cases of fraud time will not run until the fraud has been discovered but then prompt action will be required: see Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 6-124. At the other extreme, the BELGIAN CC art. 1304 (as am. in 1976) gives 10 years from the discovery of the fraud or error or the cessation of the threat, and even after that time the error, fraud or threat may be raised as a defence.
2. Other systems take intermediate positions. The FRENCH CC art. 1304 allows 5 years from cessation of a threat or from discovery of fraud or error when the sanction is relative nullity. In the event of absolute nullity, the time of action runs for 30 years from the day of conclusion of the contract; ITALY CC art. 1442 similarly, and in other cases five years from date of contract; LUXEMBOURG, as French law but one year in cases of unfair advantage, CC art. 1118; SPAIN, four years from end of threat or, in cases of fraud and error, from date of contract, CC art. 1301; POLAND, 1 year from discovery of fraud and mistake and also 1 year from cessation of threat (CC art. 88 § 2); GERMANY: mistake, without delay (§ 121; two weeks was regarded as the upper limit by OLG Hamm 9 January 1990, NJW-RR 1990, 523); fraud or threat, one year from discovery or cessation, CC § 124; AUSTRIA, threat or mistake, 3 years CC §

1487; fraud or usury, 30 years (CC § 1478). GREECE, two years after error, fraud or threat has ceased and in any event within 20 years from the conclusion of the contract (CC art. 157); the NETHERLANDS: 3 years from date of discovery of fraud or error or cessation of threat, CC art. 3:52; otherwise three years from when right of avoidance arises; ESTONIA: six months from cessation of the influence of the corresponding circumstance (threat, violence or abuse of circumstances) or discovery of the fraud or mistake, but maximum of 3 years from the day of contract (10 years in case of a threat); NORDIC law: Contract Acts §§ 28(2) (physical violence) and 32(2) (message incorrectly communicated by intermediary), notice of avoidance must be given without unreasonable delay; otherwise, general limitation period. However, in Denmark the right to avoid may be lost if not exercised for a long period, see Lynge Andersen 121; in FINLAND, the party wishing to avoid will lose the right to avoid if the party knows that the other has acted in reliance on the contract and yet does not react within a reasonable time: Ämmälä, Helsinki 1993). SCOTTISH law has no set time limits except a general prescription period of twenty years (Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973, s. 8.), but a right to avoid may be lost by failure to exercise it promptly (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 13.22). In PORTUGAL, the contract must be avoided within a year from discovery of fraud and mistake or from cession of threat if it has been executed but if it has not been executed there is no time limit (CC art. 287(1) and (2)). In SLOVAKIA the contract must be avoided generally 3 years from the day when the right (right to avoid or right to withdraw) could be exercised for the first time (CC § 101) and 4 years in commercial contracts (ObchZ § 397). In CZECH law the right to avoid a contract is limited by the general prescription period of 3 years running from the first day on which the right could have been exercised, Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 275. In case of absolute invalidity (as for threats), the invalidity is effective permanently independently of any parties' actions; in these cases, a limitation effect is attained by the prescription of the right to a return of the consideration provided under the contract (unjustified enrichment), Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 244. In SLOVENIAN law the right to avoid the contract is lost one year after the party has discovered the error or the threat has ceased but in any event in 3 years from the day when the contract was concluded (LOA § 99); a time-limit of one year applies in case of "obvious disproportionality" (laesio enormis, LOA § 118). The right to adaptation of the contract in case of unfair exploitation is lost 5 years after the time of conclusion, see LOA § 119(4). According to LOA § 92 there is no time-limit in cases of nullity (e.g. unfair exploitation) However, claims with regard to the consequences of nullity are subject to prescription.

3. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 236(1) a written notification of avoidance must be given within one year, and if the notification is not successful, avoidance should be immediately sought in court. The time limit for avoidance begins (a) upon recognition of the mistake or deception;)b) in the case of unlawful threat, upon the cessation of duress; (c) in the event of any apparent discrepancy between the services of the parties or an unfair contractual condition [§ 209/A (1) and § 301/A (4)], on performance by the injured party (in the case of performance by instalments at the time of first performance) or, if this party was under duress at the time of performance, upon cessation of the duress. The provisions pertaining to the suspension and interruption of prescription are applied to the time limit for avoidance. The party entitled to avoid a contract may challenge a claim originating from the contract, even if the time limit for avoidance has already expired.

II. Avoidance of an individual unfair term

4. Several systems simply apply the same general rule to avoidance of an individual unfair term e.g. GERMANY (but under CC simply void); HOLLAND, CC 6:235(4), which starts time running from the date the clause was invoked by other party; in ITALY, the previous debate was settled for consumer contracts by art. 36 d.lgs. no. 206/2005 (see Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 232); semble in NORDIC law. In others the unfair term is simply of no effect, e.g. LUXEMBOURG; PORTUGAL Law of 25 October 1985; CZECH CC §§ 41 and 55(2); U.K. Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. Under the Directive, Member States are to provide that unfair terms will not be binding on consumers, art. 6(1), which seems to imply that the clause may be challenged at any time.

II.–7:211: Confirmation

If a party who is entitled to avoid a contract under this Section confirms it, expressly or impliedly, after the period of time for giving notice of avoidance has begun to run, avoidance is excluded.

COMMENTS

A party cannot be allowed to avoid a contract after indicating a wish to continue with it, since the other party may act in reliance on the contract continuing. The first party's indication may be made expressly or impliedly by conduct, e.g. by continued use of goods.

In cases of mistake and fraud, this rule only applies once the party who may have been entitled to avoid knows of the relevant facts and, in cases where there has been some form of coercion, it only applies when the party becomes capable of acting freely.

NOTES

1. This provision is broadly the same as FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law (CC art. 1338); GERMAN law, CC § 144 (confirmation may be implicit, e.g. by continuing to use goods, BGH 28 April 1971, NJW 1971, 1795, 1800, provided that the party knew there was a right of avoidance or expected to have such a right, BGH 8 March 1961, WM 1961, 785, 787); ITALIAN CC art. 1444 (but confirmation is not recognised in cases of lesion or of iniquitous terms accepted in situations of danger: see CC art. 1451); PORTUGUESE CC art. 288; SPANISH CC artss 1309 ff. DUTCH CC arts. 3:55 and 3:35 (act which reasonably appears to be a confirmation); ESTONIAN GPCCA § 100. In ENGLISH and IRISH law the right to avoid may be lost through election, which in principle requires knowledge of the right to avoid, though an act which is done without knowledge of the right to avoid but which reasonably leads the other party to believe that the contract will not be avoided may give rise to an estoppel, see The Kachenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep 391, HL, per Lord Goff at 399). It appears that NORDIC law reaches this result also: Ämmälä, pp. 222-224; Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 141, Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 137 and 142. In SCOTTISH law a party may homologate (affirm) the voidable contract (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 13.16-13.17, 13.22). There is no similar express provision in the POLISH CC or SLOVAK CC and SLOVENIAN LOA. However, it is recognised that the lapse of time for avoidance, or a waiver of the right to avoid, result in the validation of the defective declaration of will. There is no provision on this issue in the CZECH CC, so the right to avoid a contract may be lost before expiration of the limitation period only in flagrant situations on the basis of the good morals clause (CC § 3(1)). It is also accepted that the party entitled to avoid may ratify the contract (Knappová (-Knapp and Knappová), Civil Law I, 165); the ratification may take place explicitly or in any other manner which leaves no doubt as to what the ratifying person wanted to express (CC § 35(1)). The HUNGARIAN CC § 236(4) states that the right of avoidance is suppressed if the party entitled to avoid the contract confirms the contract in writing or otherwise waives the right to avoid in writing after the expiration of the time limit for avoidance

II.–7:212: Effects of avoidance

(1) A contract which may be avoided under this Section is valid until avoided but, once avoided, is retrospectively invalid from the beginning.

(2) The question whether either party has a right to the return of whatever has been transferred or supplied under a contract which has been avoided under this Section, or a monetary equivalent, is regulated by the rules on unjustified enrichment.

(3) The effect of avoidance under this Section on the ownership of property which has been transferred under the avoided contract is governed by the rules on the transfer of property.

COMMENTS

A. General effect

Avoidance has retrospective effect. It is distinct from termination, which has only prospective effect. Avoidance involves setting aside the contract, or the part of it avoided, as if it had not been made.

B. Personal right to restitution

The mutual restoration of benefits, or where the benefits themselves cannot be returned, their value, is a natural consequence of avoidance; it would not be right that avoidance should leave either party with a benefit at the other's expense. This is a clear case of unjustified enrichment. The rules on this matter are contained in Book VII. The general position is that the benefit obtained or retained by one party at the expense of the other as a result of avoidance will be an unjustified enrichment and that the disadvantaged party will have a right to have the enrichment reversed, either by the re-transfer of property (if that does not happen automatically, see below) or by a monetary equivalent, or monetary remuneration of services rendered.

C. Proprietary effects

The effect of avoidance on property is governed, in the case of movables, by Book VIII (Acquisition and Loss of Ownership in Movables). The general rule under that Book is that ownership does not pass under an avoided contract. The avoidance has retrospective proprietary effect. The property will be deemed never to have left the transferor. In the case of types of property not covered by that Book, the rules of the applicable law will govern.

NOTES

I. Restitution after avoidance

1. The legal systems of the Member States agree that avoidance has retrospective effect and that after avoidance of a contract the parties may recover the value of performances they had rendered before avoidance by way of restitution.
2. There are no particular differences between the systems in two situations. First, when money has been paid over, under all systems it must be repaid. Second, when services have been performed, the recipient must make restitution by paying their reasonable value.

3. However there are differences in the way in which the systems treat restitution of property which was purportedly transferred under the avoided contract.

II. Does avoidance revest property?

4. Many legal systems of the Member States apply generally the rule that property which was transferred automatically revests in the transferor. So, in FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law the theory of nullity holds that the parties are to be treated as if the contract had never existed, see in France: Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], 674; in Belgium: de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge I[3], nos. 95-99, 809, 812-815; Van Gerven, Algemeen deeel, no. 129, p. 407. ITALIAN and PORTUGUESE law adopt a similar principle. In AUSTRIAN law, invalidation of the contract itself invalidates the transfer of title and the transferor remains legal owner (Austrian Supreme Court OGH 30 January 1980, JBl 1981, 425). The same is true for SLOVENIAN law, see art. 40 Property Code and Tratnik, Introduction, p. 62. According to SPANISH law (CC art. 609) property is transferred by the existence of an "obligatory" contract and the delivery of the asset. On avoidance of the contract, the transferee does not keep the property as it reverts to the transferor. Also in ENGLISH and IRISH law, if the contract is void for mistake no property is transferred (e.g. Ingram v. Little [1961] 1 QB 31, CA); if the contract is voidable and is validly avoided, the property revests in the transferor (e.g. Car & Universal Finance Co. Ltd. v. Caldwell [1965] 1 QB 625, CA), but if an innocent third party has bought the property before notice of avoidance has been given, the right to avoid is lost. In DANISH law each party must return what has been received, see Lynge Andersen 114. In DUTCH law the retroactive effect of avoidance (CC art. 3:53(1)) does not only lead to the conclusion that performance has been undue (CC arts. 6:203 ff), but in so far as the contract led to a transfer of the ownership of property, also to the conclusion that this transfer never took place (CC art. 3:84(1)). In other systems, avoidance of the contract is not necessarily seen as having retroactive effect on property rights which have been transferred. Thus in GERMAN law, according to CC § 142(1), a contract which has been avoided is treated as being void from the time of conclusion of the contract; but in cases of avoidance for mistake, for example, this does not itself affect any transfer of property since German law separates the passing of property from the underlying contract. The transferor must rely on a claim in unjustified enrichment under CC § 812(1) and, if the recipient is bankrupt, the claimant will receive only a dividend in the bankruptcy. Where services are provided for by one party CC § 812(1) is frequently replaced by the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs under §§ 677 et seq., cf. BGH 2 April 2007, NJW 2007, 1483, 1485. However, a different rule is applied in cases of fraud and threat. Here, since these grounds for avoidance are strongly tainted, avoidance of the contract extends to the transfer of property also, so the avoiding party may vindicate the property itself even if the other party is bankrupt (CC § 985). ESTONIAN law follows the principle of separation with the result that avoidance of the underlying contract does not itself affect the transfer of property. Property should be returned pursuant to provisions concerning unjustified enrichment (GPCCA § 90(2)), unless, exceptionally, both transactions may be avoided (e.g. in case of threat). SCOTTISH law also, in principle, treats the contract and the transfer of property as distinct juridical acts (see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 13.01-13.11) but this is modified by statute in the case of sale of goods. The POLISH CC does not have any separate provision. However, mistake, fraud and threat are thought to be defects in the declaration of will. Thus, from the time of conclusion up to the time of avoidance the contract is regarded as valid (but voidable). When a party exercises the right to avoidance, the contract is treated as invalid from the beginning. Any performance rendered under such a contract is undue performance in the meaning of the provisions of the code on unjustified enrichment (CC art. 410 § 2). The SLOVAK CC has no special provision on this issue. However if the contract is invalid any property must be returned regardless of a subsequent transfer of the property. But if the ground for invalidity was less gross disparity and social or economic pressure, the property is returnable only if there was no subsequent transfer. Failing return monetary compensation must be paid. For CZECH law, a lawfully avoided juridical act is invalid ex tunc, Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 274, so the contractual consideration is seen as never having been transferred.

III. Impossibility of restoring the property transferred

5. Under ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law, if the property cannot be restored in substantially the same condition as when it was transferred, for example through being used up, the right of avoidance is lost. (though the rule is applied flexibly, see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 6-112–115, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 13.22).

6. Other systems generally allow avoidance in such a case; they may require the party who received the property, instead of returning it, to make restitution of its value. (Under art. 1308 of the SPANISH CC restitution is no longer required when the other party cannot give back what that other party received under the contract.) Under the present Article, inability to restore property transferred is not a bar to avoidance; the party who received the property may have to make restitution of the value of the benefits received. These same rules apply in THE NETHERLANDS (see CC arts. 6:204 ff as for the rule on restitution of the value). In AUSTRIAN law in the cases of mistake and fraud it is possible that in the meantime a third party acquires property bona fide (CC § 367).

II.–7:213: Partial avoidance

If a ground of avoidance under this Section affects only particular terms of a contract, the effect of an avoidance is limited to those terms unless, giving due consideration to all the circumstances of the case, it is unreasonable to uphold the remaining contract.

COMMENTS

A. Party wishes to avoid only part of the contract

The ground of avoidance may relate only to a particular term which the avoiding party wishes to avoid without affecting the remainder of the contract. The party should be permitted to do this.

Illustration 1
C takes a dress to be cleaned. She is asked to sign a contract limiting the cleaner's liability for any damage to the dress. She asks why she has to agree to this and is told that it is just to protect the cleaners if any of the sequins on the dress come off in the cleaning. She signs. The dress comes back with a large stain on it and the cleaners try to rely on the clause. C may avoid the clause without avoiding the whole contract.

B. Appropriate to limit avoidance to part of contract

An incorrect statement or a mistake in communication may relate to a minor term of the contract. In such a case it may not be necessary or desirable to permit the party affected to avoid the whole contract if it is feasible to allow avoidance of the term involved and if this would not result in the contract being unbalanced in that party's favour.

Illustration 2
B, a building company, submits a bid for a major project. The total of its tender is made up of a number of items shown in the bid. There is clearly a mistake in one of these items, though it is not clear what the correct figure should be. The employer accepts the bid without pointing out the mistake. B may not avoid the whole contract but, on the assumption that the requirements of the rules on avoidance for mistake are satisfied, it can avoid the term fixing a mistaken price for the item in question. It will be paid a reasonable sum for the item.

Illustration 3
D buys a household insurance policy. Because the clauses of the contract are confusingly written he does not realise that the policy has an exclusion of any loss caused by theft which does not involve forcible entry. Such clauses are common in insurance policies of the type he is sold given that he lives in a high crime area; insurance against theft without forcible entry is much more expensive. D, on the assumption that the necessary requirements are satisfied, may avoid the whole contract and recover his premium but he cannot avoid just this exception, since the effect would be to give him "expensive" cover at a low price.

In some cases a mistake as to a single term may make it reasonable to avoid the whole contract. The burden of proving that it would be unreasonable to uphold the remainder of the contract is on the party who argues that it should be avoided as a whole.

One of the circumstances which is relevant is the behaviour of the party against whom avoidance is sought. In cases of fraud or duress, it may well be appropriate to allow the other party to avoid the whole contract if so wished.

NOTES

1. In some systems, when there is a ground of validity affecting only part of the contract, and the term affected is not essential to the rest of the contract, the contract may be upheld without the offending clause. This is the case with unfair clauses, both under the Directive on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts and many national laws; but it is in some systems true for other grounds of invalidity, e.g. in FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law (see in France: Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], nos. 717-721; in Belgium: Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 182); in GERMAN law, if the clause is severable within CC § 139; similarly in DUTCH law, CC art. 3:41 and in ESTONIAN law: GPCCA §§ 85, 90(3). Other systems allow avoidance of the whole contract if the avoiding party would not have entered the contract at all without the offending part: e.g. GREEK CC art. 181; ITALIAN CC art. 1419 (partial nullity); PORTUGUESE CC art. 292 and SLOVENIAN LOA § 88 (partial nullity). This is the result reached by BELGIAN case law. Similarly in SLOVAK law if the reason for invalidity is related only to a part of the legal act, only this part is invalid unless it follows from the nature of the legal act or from its content or from the circumstances under which the act was done that this part cannot be separated from the other content. (CC § 41) In CZECH law, a part of a contract may be held invalid if its content or the circumstances under which it has been concluded enable this part to be separated from the rest (CC § 41); pursuant to the court practice, the purpose of the contract and the common will of the parties are also taken into the account (Supreme Court 3 Cdo 1248/96).
2. In NORDIC law the remedy is in principle avoidance of the whole contract but in practice there have been cases in Finland in which partial avoidance has been used (CC 1961 II 100 and 1962 II 80) and in all Nordic countries the aggrieved party may ask for adjustment of the contract under Contracts Act § 36. In ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law the remedy is usually thought of as avoidance of the whole contract, and in a recent case of misrepresentation as to the content of a contract, the court refused to enforce the contract in the form that the misrepresentee had been led to expect (TSB Bank plc v. Camfield [1995] 1 WLR 430, CA) But where a party misrepresented the effect of an exclusion clause in a contract the court simply enforced the rest of the contract without the clause, Curtis v. Chemical Cleaning Co. Ltd. [1951] 1 KB 805, CA. In POLISH law the remedy is avoidance of the whole contract.
3. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 239(1) in the event of limited invalidity of a contract, the entire contract falls only if the parties would not have concluded it without the invalid part. Legal regulation may provide otherwise.

II.–7:214: Damages for loss

(1) A party who has the right to avoid a contract under this Section (or who had such a right before it was lost by the effect of time limits or confirmation) is entitled, whether or not the contract is avoided, to damages from the other party for any loss suffered as a result of the mistake, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation, provided that the other party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the ground for avoidance.

(2) The damages recoverable are such as to place the aggrieved party as nearly as possible in the position in which that party would have been if the contract had not been concluded, with the further limitation that, if the party does not avoid the contract, the damages are not to exceed the loss caused by the mistake, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation.

(3) In other respects the rules on damages for non-performance of a contractual obligation apply with any appropriate adaptation.

COMMENTS

A. Liability in damages

It is not sufficient that the party who has concluded a contract because of a mistake which the other party did not share, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation should only have a right to avoid the contract or part of it. First, the party may not wish to exercise the right of avoidance. In such a case it would be harsh to leave the party without any remedy, although that is the position under the laws of some Member States. The Article gives a right to damages.

Illustration 1
L tells the prospective tenant of a house that the drains are in good order. Relying on this the tenant signs the lease. They are not and the tenant becomes ill as a result. Whether L was fraudulent or merely careless, L should have to compensate the tenant.

Illustration 2
O employs P to build a house for it on a particular site. O knows that under the site there is an old sewer which is in danger of collapsing. It is obvious that P does not know this but O says nothing. One of P's lorries gets stuck when the sewer gives way under its weight and P has to pay a large sum to have it pulled out. O is liable for this cost.

It may be that on some facts the tenant in Illustration 1 would have a claim for non-performance of a contractual obligation. In this case the damages would include any higher cost involved in finding another house with drains which are in good order.

B. Measure of damages where contract avoided

Damages for non-performance of a contractual obligation aim to put the aggrieved party into the position it would have been in had the obligation been performed. In cases within this Section there has not been a non-performance, or at least not necessarily so: even in cases of fraud, the person making the statement is not necessarily giving a contractual undertaking that it is true. If there was no such undertaking, the untrue statement should not have caused any loss of expectation and the damages should not include an element for this. The aim, when the contract is avoided, should be to put the party in the same position as if the contract had not been concluded.

Sometimes a statement which is made fraudulently, or which is incorrect, does also give rise to a contractual obligation. In this case the creditor in the obligation may choose between remedies under this chapter and remedies for non-performance of the obligation.

If the contract has been avoided and the aggrieved party suffered no consequential loss, there may be no further loss for which damages could be obtained under this Article.

> Illustration 3
> A leases a used car to B, fraudulently telling B that it has only done 20,000 km when in fact the odometer has been "clocked" and it has done 70,000 km. Because the car has covered such a great distance, a fair rental would be much less than B agreed to pay. Soon after he has taken delivery of the car, B discovers the truth and avoids the contract. His money is refunded. He has not suffered any further loss for which damages can be recovered under this Article, even if it costs him more to lease a car from another company.

"Loss" includes economic and non-economic loss. "Economic loss" includes loss of income or profit, burdens incurred and a reduction in the value of property. "Non-economic loss" includes pain and suffering and impairment of the quality of life. See Annex 1. It follows that damages under the Article may include compensation for opportunities which the party passed over in reliance on the contract.

> Illustration 4
> E accepts an offer of employment from F after F fraudulently tells her that the job carries an index-linked pension. E finds that the job does not have such a pension scheme and she avoids the contract. To take the job she had passed up another job offer at a much better salary than she can now get elsewhere. E may recover as damages the difference between what she would have earned in the other job and the salary she can now get.

C. Measure of damages where the contract is not avoided

A party who has the right to avoid the contract but does not do so, for instance because of a failure to act quickly enough to avoid the contract, should be able to recover damages. However, the party should not necessarily be put into the same position as if the contract had not been concluded. To allow this might permit the party to throw other losses, such as a decline in the value of the property, on to the other party, when that item of loss was in no way related to the ground for avoidance.

> Illustration 5
> A, a developer, buys a plot of land for €5 million, relying inter alia on a statement by the seller that the land is not subject to any rights in favour of third parties. Later A finds that there is a right of way running across part of the site. This is serious enough to constitute a mistake which would justify avoidance of the contract but A decides not to avoid the contract. It will cost €10,000 to divert the path. Meanwhile, because of a slump in property prices, the value of the site has fallen from €5 million to €2.5 million. A's damages are limited to €10,000.

D. Cases where no fault

In cases of mistake as to the nature or circumstances of the obligation where the mistake was shared, there is not the same reason to make either party liable, except where one of them was at fault.

E. Contributed to own loss

Sometimes the victim of a fraud or mistake contributed to the loss suffered. In such a case the damages may be reduced. This is one the effects of applying the general rules on damages for non-performance of a contractual obligation except as modified in the Article.

NOTES

I. Availability of damages

1. It is widely recognised that damages are available where the ground for avoidance of the contract was the result of the fault of one of the parties. This may be based on general principles of delictual responsibility (as in FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG law, CCs art. 1382; in POLISH law, CC art. 415; in BELGIAN law, culpa in contrahendo is seen as an application of general delictual principles); ITALIAN law, the majority of case law and scholars agrees on the extra-contractual nature of this liability (see Cass., S.U., 16 July 2001, no. 9545, Foro it. 2002, I, 806; Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto II[2], 260, 595 ff; contra Castronovo, L'obbligazione senza prestazione) (as in SLOVAK law, CC § 420 and SLOVENIAN law, see Juhart and Plavšak (-Polajnar-Pavčnik), Obligacijski zakonik I, p. 520). In other systems grounds of liability may be contractual or delictual. Thus in GERMAN law, in a case of excessive advantage taking, the victim may recover damages if the requirements of CC § 826 or those of culpa in contrahendo are fulfilled, BGH 12 November 1986, BGHZ 99, 101, 106. PORTUGUESE law is similar: STJ, 13 January 1993; O Direito 125, I-II, pp. 145 ff; Almeida, Contracts 174, 187 ff; Cordeiro 698 ff. NORDIC law probably also allows claims on either basis, though there is little authority; in Danish law it is accepted that the aggrieved party may recover reliance losses if the other party has acted negligently or in bad faith, Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 140. See also Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 99 and Kleineman. In some systems general principles may be supplemented by special provisions on particular topics, as in AUSTRIAN law, where CC § 874 covers fraud and coercion, but error is dealt with by culpa in contrahendo; GREEK law, where a provision on error (CC art. 145) supplements the general delictual provisions (CC arts. 149, 152). SPANISH law also has rules on these situations. Although SPANISH CC art. 1270 contemplates a situation in which damages are granted in lieu of avoidance, it is currently recognised that the innocent avoiding party may also recover damages, based on the "reliance interest" of this party. Under a special provision in ESTONIAN law the party who has avoided the contract is entitled to damages for loss from the other party if the latter knew or should have known of the mistake, fraud or threat (GPCCA § 101). The measure of damages is the negative interest (GPCCA § 101(1) sent. 2). For CZECH law, see CC § 42; the liability is classified as culpa in contrahendo (Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 280), however culpa in contrahendo is regarded as a kind of delictual liability. The liability depends on the fault of the liable party.
2. ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law do not have rules applicable generally to cases covered by this Section. Damages may be recovered for fraud and for negligent misrepresentation (e.g. English Misrepresentation Act 1967, s. 2(1); Irish Sale of Goods and Supply of Services Act 1980), s. 45; Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1985, s. 10.) Duress may in certain circumstances amount to a tort or delict: see Carty and Evans. Even in the rare cases in which English law recognises a duty of disclosure, non-disclosure is normally only a ground for avoidance of the contract and not for damages, unless the non-disclosing party has assumed responsibility towards the other within the doctrine of Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465, HL: see Banque Financière de la Cité SA v. Westgate Insurance Co. Ltd. [1989] 2 AllER 952, CA, at p. 1007. It does not appear that damages can be given in other cases of mistake not involving misrepresentation, nor in cases of undue influence.

II. Measure of damages

3. In those systems in which the measure of damages is discussed, it is generally accepted that in cases of culpa in contrahendo and delictual claims only the aggrieved party's negative interest, or reliance loss, will be compensated: GERMAN law; AUSTRIAN law; SLOVENIAN law, NORDIC law (see on Finnish law Taxell, Avtal ach rättsskydd 391); ENGLISH law (fraud: East v. Maurer [1991] 1 WLR 461, CA; negligent misrepresentation, Royscot Trust Ltd. v. Rogerson [1991] 2 QB 297, CA). See also ITALIAN law (Cass. 30 July 2004, no. 14539, Foro it. 2004, I, 3009 and Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto II^2, 605). It has been argued that in DUTCH law a mistaken party may be able to claim the expectation interest: Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht II no. 487. n PORTUGUESE law, most writers and court decisions accept that negative interest damages are sufficient, e.g. Almeida, Contracts 192 ff if the contract is avoided; Almeida Costa, RLJ 114 (1983-84), 73 ff; Vasconcelos, 241 ff; others argue that the positive interest should be protected, Cordeiro 609; Prata, Notas sobre responsabilidade pré-contratual, 176 ff. In POLISH law damages cover damnum emergens and lucrum cessans – as far as a party can prove them; and the same holds true for CZECH law.

4. Illustration 6 is modelled on the English case of Sindall (William) plc v. Cambridgeshire County Council [1994] 1 WLR 1015, CA, and the Article produces a similar result to that which the court indicated it would have reached if there had been a misrepresentation. On the facts, no misrepresentation had been made.

II.–7:215: Exclusion or restriction of remedies

(1) Remedies for fraud, coercion, threats and unfair exploitation cannot be excluded or restricted.

(2) Remedies for mistake may be excluded or restricted unless the exclusion or restriction is contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

COMMENTS

Fraud, coercion, threats and unfair exploitation are of such seriousness that a party should not be able to exclude or restrict liability; they are all forms of bad faith.

Mistake does not involve bad faith and it is permissible to exclude or restrict remedies for mistake provided that the term doing so is consistent with good faith and fair dealing and not for instance, one which was hidden in small print or over which the party relying on it refused to negotiate.

The burden of proving that the clause is contrary to good faith and fair dealing should rest on the party seeking to avoid its effect.

This Article does not prevent a party agreeing to a settlement of a claim which in effect involves surrendering rights under this Section.

NOTES

1. Those legal systems in which this question has been discussed have generally held that remedies for grounds of invalidity involving immoral behaviour cannot be excluded, but that remedies for others may be. In FRENCH law, the parties cannot provide, from the conclusion of the contract, for a term excluding remedies for defects of consent,. However, they may confirm a voidable contract ("nullité relative"); on Belgium: De Boeck, Informatierechten en –plichten, nos. 576-580). In GERMAN law, remedies for mistake may be excluded by an individually negotiated term, though generally not by standard terms, BGH 28 April 1983, NJW 1983, 1671; exclusion is not possible if an agreement is contra bonos mores within CC § 138. In DUTCH law remedies for mistake may be excluded not only by an individually negotiated term, but also by standard terms; this exclusion does however not apply when this would be unacceptable according to the criteria of reasonableness or equity (CC art. 6:248(2)) or in case of the standard terms when this would be unreasonably onerous vis-à-vis the other party (CC art. 6:233 under (a)). SPANISH CC art. 1102 prevents exclusion of liability for fraud. PORTUGUESE law would appear to prevent exclusion of liability for what is contrary to good morals, CC art. 280(2). In AUSTRIAN law, remedies for mistake caused by simple negligence may be excluded, OGH 20 March 1968, SZ 41/33; 7 March 1978, RZ 1979/14, but remedies for fraud cannot be and the same is argued for gross negligence, OGH 19 December 1991, SZ 64/190; however, in consumer contracts no remedies for mistake can be excluded ex ante (see ConsProtA § 6 para. 1 no. 14). In NORDIC law the rules on avoidance in the Contract Acts §§ 28-36 are mandatory; but liability for misrepresentation by simple negligence may sometimes be excluded (see e.g. Swedish Supreme Court NJA 1987 ss. 692, 703; the clause must be reasonable, Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 187). In ENGLISH law and SCOTTISH law, remedies for fraud cannot be excluded (Pearson v. Dublin Corp. [1907] AC 351, HL; Boyd & Forrest v Glasgow & SW Railway Co. 1915 SC (HL) 20, 35-36) It may be possible to exclude liability for the fraud of one's agent, see HIH Casualty and General Insurance Ltd. v. Chase Manhattan Bank [2001] EWCA Civ 1250 , [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep 483 rev'd in part [2003] UKHL 6, [2003] 2 Lloyd's Rep 483; a clause excluding or restricting remedies for any other type of misrepresentation will be valid only if it is fair and reasonable, Misrepresentation Act 1967, s. 3 (as amended by Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s. 8; see also for Scotland s. 16). Unfair Terms in Consumer Contract Regulations 1994, S.I. 1994 no. 3159 may also apply. For IRELAND, see Sale of Goods and Supply of Services Act 1980 and EC Unfair Terms in Consumer Contract Regulations, SI 27 of 1995. The matter is not settled under POLISH law and ESTONIAN law. Any remedies may not be excluded or restricted beforehand under SLOVAK law generally (CC § 574 second clause). The CZECH CC disallows any waiver of rights which can arise in the future (§ 574(2)), including a prospective right to damages (see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 1019). The scope of this provision is discussed and it is interpreted rather restrictively so as not to prohibit a non-abusive contractual arrangement of rights. However, the requisites of consent represent the very basics of juridical acts, so it can be deduced that CC § 574(2) applies in full and no remedy can be excluded. Under SLOVENIAN law only remedies for unfair exploitation and lesion are explicitly mandatory, however according to a general principle liability and remedies for intended and reckless acts cannot be excluded.

II.–7:216: Overlapping remedies

A party who is entitled to a remedy under this Section in circumstances which afford that party a remedy for non-performance may pursue either remedy.

COMMENTS

In some situations the same facts may be analysed either as a case of mistake, or as one in which there is a non-performance of a contractual obligation. For example there may be a remedy for non-performance because the performance of one party is not of the required quality; or one party may have given a contractual undertaking that a particular fact relating to the performance is true.

Although some systems prevent the aggrieved party from choosing which set of remedies to pursue in cases of this type, there seems no good reason to do so provided that there is no "double recovery" and the choice does not have the effect that a claim escapes contractual or other restrictions which should properly apply to it. Normally the remedies for non-performance will give a fuller measure of recovery, but the aggrieved party may find it simpler to exercise rights under this Section, e.g. just to give notice of avoidance on the ground of mistake.

Needless to say, the aggrieved party will still have to choose remedies which are compatible. It would not be possible, for example, both to avoid the contract and claim damages for non-performance of an obligation under it.

NOTES

1. In GERMAN law, when the case falls within the special rules on defective goods, the buyer's only remedy is under those provisions; the same holds true for CZECH law – see Supreme Court 25 Cdo 1454/2000 or 33 Odo 513/2004. In FRENCH law, when both types of action are potentially available the case law now provides that, as a rule, the aggrieved party does not have a choice: he or she must bring an "action en garantie" and cannot bring an action to avoid the contract (Cass.civ. 1ère, 7 juin 2000, CCC 2000. no. 159). The rule is different in the event of fraud: Cass.civ. 1ère, 6 novembre 2002, CCC 2003. no. 38; contra; Cass.civ. 3è, 17 novembre 2004: Bull.civ. III, no. 206 (Bénabent, Contrats Spéciaux[6], no. 235). See generally Tallon, Hamel. Other systems accept that there may be overlaps between the various sets of rules and allow the aggrieved party to choose which remedy to use. For BELGIAN law see Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 181, and for LUXEMBOURG law, Cour 30 June 1993, Pasicrisie 29, p. 253; Cour, 16 March 1900, Pasicrisie 5, 245. A choice of remedies is also permitted in AUSTRIA, GREECE, ITALY, THE NETHERLANDS, POLAND, SLOVENIA and the NORDIC countries. In SPANISH law, too, there is an overlap between remedies for misrepresentation or error and contractual remedies for hidden defects or non-conformity. The Supreme Court has upheld the compatibility of both remedies. Supreme Court Judgment 18 March 2004, RAJ (2004), 1904. In ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law the principal overlap is between remedies for misrepresentation and for non-performance; here the English Misrepresentation Act 1967, s. 1, confirms that the aggrieved party may choose. In PORTUGAL it appears that the party may choose between remedies for non-performance and for error, but that the same short limits laid down by CC arts. 916 and 917 and Ccom art. 471 will be applied whichever remedy is chosen, Martinez, 413. However a different solution, based on non-performance, applies to consumer contracts under the Decree-Law no. 63/2003, 8 April 2003. In ESTONIA, there is no explicit rule or court practice on this matter. Writers tend to support the free choice of remedies (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kõve), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 101, no. 8). In SLOVAK doctrine if the contract is invalid any contracting party is not entitled to a remedy for non-performance generally.

2. See generally Kötz, European Contract Law I, 175-178.

Section 3: Infringement of fundamental principles or mandatory rules

II.–7:301: Contracts infringing fundamental principles

A contract is void to the extent that:

(a) it infringes a principle recognised as fundamental in the laws of the Member States of the European Union; and

(b) nullity is required to give effect to that principle.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of section

This Section deals with the effects on a contract of infringement of fundamental principles or mandatory rules. Like the rest of the chapter it also applies, with appropriate adaptations, to other juridical acts. See the first Article of the Chapter. The subject matter is sometimes described as "illegality" and was so described in the Principles of European Contract Law, from which this Section is derived. However, "illegality" is not necessarily the most appropriate term for some infringements of fundamental principles or mandatory rules. In some cases the contract may be immoral rather than illegal and in some cases it may just suffer from a defect of a rather formal or regulatory character. So the present title of the Section is descriptive and neutral.

B. Contrary to principles recognised as fundamental in the laws of the Member States

The formulation of the first Article is similarly intended to avoid the varying national concepts of immorality, illegality at common law, public policy, ordre public and bonos mores, by invoking a necessarily broad idea of fundamental principles found across the European Union, including EU law. Guidance as to these fundamental principles may be obtained from such documents as the EC Treaty (e.g. in favour of free movement of goods, services and persons, protection of market competition), the European Convention on Human Rights (e.g. prohibition of slavery and forced labour (art. 3), and rights to liberty (art. 5), respect for private and family life (art. 8), freedom of thought (art. 9), freedom of expression (art. 10), freedom of association (art. 11), right to marry (art. 12) and peaceful enjoyment of possessions (First Protocol, art. 1)) and the European Union Charter on Fundamental Rights (which includes many of the rights already mentioned and adds such matters as respect for personal data (art. 8), freedom to choose an occupation and right to engage in work (art. 15), freedom to conduct a business (art. 16), right to property (art. 17), equality between men and women (art. 23), children's rights (art. 24), rights of collective bargaining and action (art. 28), protection in the event of unjustified dismissal (art. 30), and a high level of consumer protection (art. 38).

Merely national concepts as such have no effect under the Article and may not be invoked directly, although comparative study can give further help in the identification and elucidation of principles recognised as fundamental in the laws of the Member States. Thus the Article extends to contracts placing undue restraints upon individual liberty (for example, being constraints of excessive duration or covenants not to compete), upon the right to work, or being otherwise in restraint of trade, contracts which are in conflict with the generally accepted norms of family life and sexual morality, and contracts which interfere with the due administration of justice (e.g. champertous agreements in England, pacta de quota litis elsewhere). See further Kötz and Flessner 155-161.

Many infringements of principles mentioned in the preceding paragraphs might not be such as to justify automatic nullity of the contract. Sub-paragraph (b) therefore provides that the contract will be void only to the extent that nullity is required to give effect to the fundamental principle.

The public policy underpinning principles recognised as fundamental may change over time, in accordance with the prevailing norms of society as they develop.

Situations covered by the rules on vices of consent or unfair contract terms fall outside the scope of the present Article.

C. Void

A contract which infringes fundamental principles, and the nullity of which is required by the Article, is void from the beginning and not merely voidable by a party or by a court. Unlike the position under the following Article, the judge or arbitrator is given no discretion to determine the effects of the contract: such a contract is to be given no effect at all. The intentions and knowledge of the parties are irrelevant.

NOTES

1. All European systems make provision for the nullity of contracts which are contrary to fundamental principles of morality or public policy. The terminology varies.
2. The FRENCH code, which locates its treatment of immorality in the doctrines of cause and objet, makes use of two concepts: bonnes moeurs and ordre public (CC arts. 6, 1133, 1172, 1217, 1218) and the same goes for BELGIUM (Van Gerven (2006) 78) and LUXEMBOURG. In practice the first concept has been subsumed in the second. The ITALIAN CC (art. 1343) is framed in terms of ordine pubblico and buon costume. The PORTUGUESE CC (arts. 280, 281) is framed in terms of ordem pública and bons costumes: a special rule provides that voluntary limitations of fundamental civil rights are void if contrary to the public interest (CC art. 81 no. 1). In the NETHERLANDS the CC (art. 3:40) talks of violation of good morals and public order; as does GPCCA § 86 in ESTONIA. In SLOVENIAN law juridical acts are void if contrary to the constitution, mandatory rules or moral principles (LOA § 86).
3. The SPANISH code (CC art. 1275) talks of a cause being unlawful when it is contrary to good morals. A contract may also be declared void and without effect (1) when the parties do not keep within the limits of freedom of contract, morals or ordre public being among these limits (CC art. 1255); (2) when the object of the contract is unlawful because it deals with services which are contrary to bonos mores (CC art. 1271(3)).
4. The GERMAN (CC § 138) and AUSTRIAN (CC § 879) codes speak of violation of good morals. The SWISS obligations code (LOA art. 20) speaks simply of immorality. See also the GREEK CC art. 178.

5. In FINNISH law contracts against bonos mores are held to be invalid. See e.g. Telaranta 250-274, and Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 445-447. Under DANISH law, the rule in Danske Lov (1683) art. 5.1.2 provides that contracts which violate public policy are void. This covers contracts to commit a crime or to reward a person who commits a crime. It also covers promises whereby the promisor undertakes to limit inappropriately his or her freedom of action, such as a promise to vote for a certain political party or to change or not change religious faith. A promise to pay a person for doing something which the law favours or requires may be immoral and unenforceable: e.g. a promise to pay a person to speak the truth as a witness in a litigation. The courts apply this rule ex officio (see Andersen & Madsen 247 and Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 195 ff).

6. In POLISH law a juridical act is null and void if it breaches the law or the principles of social co-existence (in case law and the legal doctrine, this general clause is interpreted to mean bonos mores and good faith) – (CC art. 58). A contract is also invalid where its contents or purpose exceed the limits of freedom of contract (CC art. 353^1): law, principles of social co-existence and the nature of the legal relation created by the contract.

7. In CZECH law, a juridical act is null and void if it contravenes good morals (CC § 39). Good morals are understood as a complex of social, cultural and moral rules, which show a certain stability in the course of history, represent substantial historical tendencies, are shared by a dominant part of the society and have the character of basic rules (Supreme Court 3 Cdo 69/96). Conflict with good morals is an objective condition which does not depend on the fault or good faith of any party, see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 265.

8. In ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law the subject matter of the present Article is often presented under such headings as “illegality at common law”, “immoral contracts” or contracts “contrary to public policy”. While such a contract may be void, it is more often presented as “unenforceable”. See Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 16-001-16-16-012;16-141;16-159-16-172. MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, §§ 7.1-7.9; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 13.25-13.28, 19.14-19.27. English law remains under review by the Law Commission after its Consultation Paper on Illegal Transactions (No. 154, 1998). The Commission's provisional proposals were to the effect that courts should have discretion to decide whether or not illegality or infringement of public policy should act as a defence to a claim for contractual enforcement.; Clark 323-7; 9. In SLOVAK law a legal act whose content or purpose are at variance with a statute, circumvent the statute or are at variance with good morals is invalid. In the HUNGARIAN CC § 200(2) contracts in violation of legal regulations and contracts concluded by evading a legal regulation are void, unless the legal regulation stipulates another legal consequence. A contract is also void if it is manifestly contrary to good morals.

II.–7:302: Contracts infringing mandatory rules

(1) Where a contract is not void under the preceding Article but infringes a mandatory rule of law, the effects of that infringement on the validity of the contract are the effects, if any, expressly prescribed by that mandatory rule.

(2) Where the mandatory rule does not expressly prescribe the effects of an infringement on the validity of a contract, a court may;

(a) declare the contract to be valid;
(b) avoid the contract, with retrospective effect, in whole or in part; or
(c) modify the contract or its effects.

(3) A decision reached under paragraph (2) should be an appropriate and proportional response to the infringement, having regard to all relevant circumstances, including:

(a) the purpose of the rule which has been infringed;
(b) the category of persons for whose protection the rule exists;
(c) any sanction that may be imposed under the rule infringed;
(d) the seriousness of the infringement;
(e) whether the infringement was intentional; and
(f) the closeness of the relationship between the infringement and the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General

Many contracts infringe a mandatory rule of law without being contrary to any fundamental principle. This Article deals with such contracts. If the infringement also involves a violation of a fundamental principle within the meaning of the preceding Article it is that Article which applies. In practice, therefore, the present Article deals with less important violations of the law. Indeed, given the extent of statutory regulation in modern States, some infringements covered by the Article may be of a merely technical nature. This means that a flexible approach has to be taken to the effects of an infringement.

B. Mandatory rules of the applicable law

The Article does not declare when a contract infringes a mandatory rule of law. Although the model rules constitute a self-contained system applying to contracts governed by them, it is not possible to ignore altogether the provisions of national and other positive laws otherwise applying to such contracts, in particular those rules or prohibitions expressly or impliedly making contracts null, void, voidable, annullable, or unenforceable in particular circumstances. Where such rules are applicable to the contract the present Article is to be brought into play. The Article is however concerned only with the effects of the infringement.

C. Infringement

An infringement of a mandatory rule of law may arise in respect of who may conclude the contract, how it may be concluded, the contents or purpose of the contract, or (exceptionally) the performance of the contract.

The clearest case is where an applicable mandatory rule as to who may make certain contracts is infringed.

Illustration 1
A statute provides that a company may provide credit to consumers only if it holds a licence granted by the government, and that consumer credit agreements entered into by unlicensed providers are unenforceable by the provider. The unlicensed provider of consumer credit is also guilty of a criminal offence. Here the making of a consumer credit agreement by an unlicensed provider would infringe the rule of law.

More difficult is the issue of the contract with an illegal purpose. In general, for an illegal purpose to impact upon the effectiveness of the contract, it would seem that this must be the common purpose of the parties, at least in the sense that the illicit purpose of one is known to or ought to be known to the other.

If it is only the performance of the contractual obligation which infringes the mandatory rule, the contract itself may well be unaffected by the infringement. Thus if a haulier breaks the speed-limit from time to time, or jumps a stop light, while performing a contract for the carriage of goods by road the contract remains unaffected by the rules in this Article. The contract itself does not infringe the mandatory rules of the road traffic law. Only if it was intended by one or both parties from the outset that a contractual obligation be performed in an illegal manner do questions arise about whether and to what extent the contract is voidable. The situation is then similar to that of a contract with an illegal purpose.

Illustration 2
A buyer, who is in urgent need of the seller's goods, persuades the seller to promise to break the speed limit when bringing the goods. This promise by the seller is within the scope of the rules on illegality.

D. Effects of infringement

In determining the effects of an infringement upon a contract under this Article, regard is to be had first to what the mandatory rule in question provides upon the matter.

If the mandatory rule provides expressly for the effect of an infringement then that effect follows. If the relevant rule expressly states that infringement invalidates a contract, or if it provides that contracts are not to be invalidated by any infringement, then these consequences follow. For example, Article 81 of the EC Treaty prohibits agreements between undertakings which have as their object or effect the prevention, restriction or distortion of competition within the common market and declares such prohibited agreements to be "automatically void". Conversely, the legislation may provide that the criminal offence which may be committed in the course of concluding a contract or performing an obligation under it does not of itself make the contract void or unenforceable or prevent any cause of action arising in respect of any loss (see e.g. UK Package Travel, Package Holidays and Package Tours Regulations 1992 reg. 27, implementing Council Directive 90/314/EEC on package travel, package holidays and package tours).

The rule in question may not provide expressly for the effects upon a contract of an infringement of the rule. It is necessary for the Article to deal with this second situation. It does so by making reference to a person (judge or arbitrator) with power to determine matters arising under the contract. If the matter is never referred to a judge or arbitrator (and is not within the preceding Article) then the contract is not affected by the infringement. Contracts are valid unless otherwise provided, and in this situation there is no Article or mandatory rule of law which provides for invalidity.

Where paragraph (2) is brought into operation, the judge or arbitrator is given a discretion to declare the contract to be valid, to avoid the contract with retrospective effect in whole or in part, or to modify the contract or its effects. The power to modify would include power to dispense with future performance of obligations under the contract but to let matters otherwise rest as they are, without any restitution. Equally, the contract may be given some but not complete future effect: for example, it may be made enforceable by one of the parties only, or only in part, or only at a particular time. It may be that some remedies, such as an order for specific performance, are not to be available, while others, such as damages for non-performance, are to be. The decision must be an appropriate and proportional response to the infringement having regard to all the relevant circumstances and, in particular, to those spelled out in paragraph (3).

E. Factors to be taken into account in determining effect of infringement

Paragraph (3) enjoins the judge or arbitrator to take into account all the relevant circumstances in determining the effect of the infringement of the law upon the contract. To assist in this process, a number of factors are listed. The list is not exclusive, and the factors mentioned may well overlap in application.

Purpose of the rule. Where the rule in question contains no express provision about the effect on the validity of a contract which infringes the rule, the legislative intent will have to be determined in accordance with the usual rules on the interpretation of the law. A purposive approach is to be adopted. Consideration should always be given to whether, in the absence of an express statement on the point, enabling the rule to take full effect requires the contract to be set aside. Examples where the purpose of the legislation should be considered might include whether a piece of domestic legislation was intended to apply to a trans-national or cross-border transaction, or whether an international or European rule was to apply to a purely domestic transaction.

For whose protection does the rule exist? This factor is closely related to the issue of the purpose of the rule. If, for example, the rule in question merely prohibits one party from entering or making contracts of the kind in question, it does not follow that the other party may plead the illegality to prevent the contract taking effect.

> Illustration 3
> A statute lays down that domestic construction work is only to be carried out by registered builders, but does not say what effect the prohibition has upon contracts made by unregistered builders. 75% of a contract to build an extension to a private dwelling house is completed by an unregistered builder, who then abandons the job. If the court or arbitrator concludes that the main purpose of the rule is to protect clients then, while the client may not be able to insist on specific performance of the contract by the unregistered builder, the client may have a claim against the builder for damages in respect of defective work or the additional cost of having the work completed by a registered builder.

Illustration 4
In breach of companies legislation, a company agrees to provide financial assistance to shareholders to enable them to purchase more of the company's shares. The purpose of the legislation is the protection of shareholders and creditors of the company. The agreement may be upheld if all the shareholders in the company are purchasers and no creditors are adversely affected by the transaction.

Illustration 5
A consumer protection statute prohibits the negotiation or conclusion of loan agreements away from business premises. The aim of the statute is to protect consumers from 'cold selling' by home-visiting or telephoning salesmen of credit acting on behalf of consumer credit companies. While such companies are unable to enforce agreements entered in such circumstances, the consumer for whose protection the prohibition exists may do so.

Sanctions already incurred. If the rule in question provides for a criminal or administrative sanction against the wrongdoer, the imposition of that sanction may be enough to deter the conduct in question without adding the nullity of the contract. The goal of deterrence is usually better achieved through such criminal or administrative sanctions than by way of private law. Often such sanctions will take into account the degree of blameworthiness of the party concerned, and this may be a more appropriate response to the conduct than avoiding the contract in whole or in part.

Illustration 6
A statute provides that ships of a certain size must not carry cargoes above a certain quantity. Criminal sanctions are provided, but the statute says nothing about any civil consequences of infringement of the prohibition. A, a shipowner, contravenes the statute in carrying a cargo for B. B invokes the illegality of the performance and refuses to pay the freight. Because the aim of the statute is sufficiently fulfilled by the imposition of the criminal sanction upon A, the contract would be unlikely to be avoided by a court. B must pay the freight.

Illustration 7
Legislation prohibits court officials from engaging in remunerated activities outside their employment. The purposes of the rule are protection of the professional integrity of officials and deterring them from entering such arrangements, but this can be achieved by the application of disciplinary sanctions adjusted to take account of the degree of guilt, rather than by enabling the other party to the transaction to have the official's services for nothing.

Seriousness of the infringement. The judge or arbitrator is able to consider the seriousness of the infringement of the rule in assessing what if any effect it should have upon the contract. If the infringement is minor or very slight, that may point to the contract being declared valid and given effect.

Illustration 8
A shipowning company is in breach of statutory regulations as to the maximum load to be carried by ships but only by a very small amount. It should not be disabled on this ground alone from recovery of freight for the voyage.

If on the other hand the infringement had major or serious consequences that might suggest that there should be some effect upon the contract.

Was the infringement intentional? This enables the judge or arbitrator to take account of the knowledge or innocence of the parties with regard to the infringement of the rule. Subject to the other factors in the case, in particular the purpose of the law in issue, there is a stronger case for the infringement rendering the contract invalid if it was known to or intended by the parties than if both were unaware of the problem. More complex is the situation where one party knows of the infringement and the other does not, where much may depend upon which of them is trying to enforce the contract.

> Illustration 9
> A contract of carriage involves illegal performance of the obligations under it by the carrier, who is aware of the requirements of the law in question. The customer who is aware of the proposed illegality when the contract is concluded cannot sue for damages for non-performance of the contractual obligation by the carrier, unlike the customer who is not so aware. Whether or not the carrier can sue for payment of the price under the contract once the obligations under it are fully performed may additionally depend upon factors such as the purpose of the prohibition and the other sanctions available, e.g. under the criminal law.

The most difficult situation is the contract for an illegal purpose. If it is lawful for A to sell a weapon or explosive material to B, and these materials may be lawfully used (for example, in self-defence or in construction work), the fact that B intends to use the goods illegally ought not to affect the validity of the contract of sale. If however at the time of contracting A is aware of or shares B's illicit purpose (e.g. supplies Semtex to a person whom A knows to be an active member of a terrorist organisation), then there may be some deterrence from entering the contract (on credit terms at least) if A cannot compel B to pay for material supplied.

Relationship between infringement and contract. This factor requires examination of whether or not the contract expressly or impliedly stipulates for an illegal performance by one or both of the parties. Thus a contract of carriage which can only be performed by overloading the ship or lorry may be more readily avoided by a court (although possibly the case might be addressed by an appropriate modification of the contract).

NOTES

I. Contracts contrary to law

1. All European systems deal with contracts which contravene some rule of law, as opposed to contracts which are contrary to fundamental principles of morality or public policy.
2. In a number of systems the relevant rules are contained in the rules on the limits of contractual freedom or on the cause or object of the contract. See e.g. the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CC (art. 6; art. 1129; art. 1133 - cause illicit when prohibited by the law); BELGIAN law makes a distinction between imperative statutory provisions (in case of violation: relative nullity) and provisions of public policy (in case of violation: absolute nullity); the ITALIAN CC (art. 1343 - cause unlawful when it is contrary to mandatory rules; art. 1344 - cause also unlawful when the contract constitutes the means for evading the application of a mandatory rule; art. 1345 - contract unlawful "when the parties are led to conclude it solely by an unlawful motive, common to both"; art. 1346 unlawful object; Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto, 559-572; Mariconda 367-400; Bianca, Diritto civile III, 616 ff); the SPANISH CC (arts. 1255, 1271, 1275; Díez-Picazo I, 4th ed., 242-243); and the PORTUGUESE CC (art. 280 no. 1; Hörster 526) and the SLOVENIAN LOA (§§ 35 and 39 - object or cause (purpose) contrary to constitution, mandatory rules or moral principles, § 40(3) – decisive unlawful motive, shared by the parties).

3. GERMAN law (CC § 134) speaks of violation of a statutory prohibition; as does the AUSTRIAN law (CC § 879) and ESTONIAN law (GPCCA § 87). The ITALIAN CC (art. 1418(1)) is framed in terms of mandatory rules, while the law in the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 3:40) has the concept of violation of an imperative statutory provision. The SWISS law (LOA art. 20) speaks simply of illegality.

4. FINNISH law has no general statutory provision on the validity of illegal contracts, but both doctrine and court practice accept that contracts infringing legal rules can be invalid. See Telaranta 250-274, and Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 435-445.

5. In ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law the standard texts all include chapter headings such as "Illegality", or "Statutory Invalidity". See further Enonchong, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 19.28-19.36, and, for the confused development of Scottish law, Macgregor in Reid & Zimmermann vol. II, chap. 5.

6. In SLOVAK law the object of the juridical act must be lawful. An unlawful juridical act is a) a juridical act whose content or purpose is at variance with a statute, b) a juridical act whose content or purpose circumvent the statute c) a juridical act whose content or purpose is contrary to good morals (contra bonos mores) (see Lazar et al. p. 130, and CC § 39).

7. The CZECH CC makes invalid every juridical act whose content or purpose contradicts or circumvents the law (§ 39). The contradiction is judged objectively, so it does not matter whether the parties or any of them knew about the contradiction, Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 256. Circumvention of the law is construed by reference to the purpose of the law (ratio legis), Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 257.

II. Effects of infringement

8. The general starting point in most European legal systems is that contracts violating legal rules are void. There is often, however, considerable flexibility in the law.

9. Art. 1418 of the ITALIAN CC provides that: "A contract that is contrary to mandatory rules is void, unless the law provides otherwise." And in the case of violation of a prohibition imposed by law, if this law explicitly provides for nullity the contract is void; but if the prohibition concerns the content, or the subjects of the contract, and in case of violation it provides an administrative or criminal sanction, without saying anything about the contract, nullity is ascertained having regard to the case in point (see Cass. 24 May 2003, no. 8236, I Contratti, no. 1/2004, 46; Gazzoni 988-989).

10. FRENCH, BELGIAN, LUXEMBOURG, SLOVENIAN and AUSTRIAN law distinguish between "absolute" and "relative nullity" Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 357. Absolutely null and void are agreements violating statutes that aim at the protection of interests of the general public and safety. Everyone may resort to the nullity; no specific act of avoidance is necessary. However in FRENCH law, "absolute nullity" must be sought in court. Besides, the judge may choose to raise the nullity ("soulever d'office"), should the nullity be absolute or relative (NCPC arts. 12 and 16). However, if the violated statute aims at nothing more than the protection of a party to the contractual agreement, that party has to claim that the contract is null and void before a competent court. So, a victim of usurious activity [cf. AUSTRIAN CC 879(2) No. 4 see Bydlinski, Bürgerliches Recht I[3], nos. 7/43 et seq.] who wants to have the agreement declared null and void has to invoke nullity of the bargain. (See Appel Luxembourg, 29 march 2000, LJUS 99819186). In Belgium however both, absolute and relative nullity, must be claimed in court (Cornelis, Algemene theorie van de verbintenis, no. 557; Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, nos. 50 & 176; Van Gerven (2006) 146). In SLOVENIAN law, relative invalidity (avoidability) must be claimed in court, whereas the absolute invalidity (nullity) exists per se and the decision of the court is declaratory.

11. SLOVAK law also distinguish between absolute and relative nullity. But relatively null juridical acts are only those expressly mentioned as such in the statutes (CC § 40a).

12. CZECH law knows the categories of absolute and relative nullity – juridical acts affected by absolute nullity are void, while relatively null juridical acts are merely voidable. Grounds causing relative nullity are expressly enumerated in the CC (§ 40a); all other nullity grounds result in absolute nullity. Absolutely null juridical acts (and relatively null juridical acts as well, if the nullity has been rightfully claimed) have no legal consequences: it is as if they had never been made. Everybody who has a sufficient legal interest may claim the absolute nullity at the court, but the nullity exists independently of court proceedings, Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 243. In commercial relationships, on the contrary, it is held that where a sanction of nullity is laid down for the protection of one of the parties only, the nullity may be claimed only by this party (Ccom § 267(1)).

13. The GERMAN CC § 134, the SPANISH CC (art. 6.3), the PORTUGUESE CC (art. 294), the POLISH CC (art. 58 § 1), the SLOVENIAN LOA (§ 86) and the GREEK CC (art. 174) state that a juridical act which violates a statutory prohibition is void unless a contrary intention appears from the statute. In AUSTRIA not every contractual agreement that is concluded in violation of a statutory provision is null and void. Unless a statute expressly provides that an agreement by which it is violated is null and void the effect of the illegality of an agreement depends on the normative goal and purpose of the violated statute. That need not necessarily entail nullity but may suggest other sanctions. Thus the validity of an agreement violating statutory rules not affecting its content but only the manner, place and time of its conclusion is upheld (see Bydlinski, Bürgerliches Recht I[3], no. 7/36). Somewhat similarly, in the NETHERLANDS, the CC art. 3:40(2) and (3), while stating that violation of an imperative statutory provision entails nullity, also provide that if the statute is for the protection of only one of the parties to a contract, the contract can only be annulled (i.e. it is not absolutely void). This does not apply if the necessary implication of the statute produces a different result, while statutory provisions which do not purport to invalidate juridical acts contrary to them will not have the above rule applied to them. The basic thrust of these provisions is to ensure judicial consideration of whether giving effect to the statute requires the nullity of the contract as a supporting sanction. Again, in PORTUGAL, in consumer credit transactions the omission of certain elements makes the contract void, avoidable or partially unenforceable according to the nature of the omitted elements (Decree-law no. 349/91, 21 Sept 1991, art. 7 nos. 1, 2, 3). But where the statute is silent, the effect upon the contract may be inferred from the purpose of the rule: e.g. a contract of sale of goods made after the shop's legal closing time is valid, since the applicable mandatory rule concerns fair competition only (Hörster 521). But if a contracting party does not have the professional qualifications required by law the contract is void (STJ 05.11.74). The ESTONIAN

GPCCA § 87 is to the same effect: a transaction contrary to a statutory prohibition is void only if the purpose of the prohibition is to render the transaction void upon violation of the prohibition, especially if it is provided by law that certain legal consequence must not arise. In SLOVENIAN law, if the violated statutory prohibition is "less important" and the contract was performed, nullity cannot be invoked, see LOA § 90(2).

14. In ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law, while an illegal contract may be void, it is more often presented as "unenforceable", in that neither specific performance nor damages are available to the parties. Thus a party may withdraw from an illegal contract with impunity. Courts will take notice of illegality of their own motion and dismiss actions accordingly (Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 16-199; MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, § 7.15; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 13.31-13.34, 19.17-19.27).). Again, however, there is flexibility in the law on contracts infringing statutory provisions. There are several cases in which the courts have considered whether giving effect to the statute requires the nullity of the contract as a supporting sanction (see e.g. St John Shipping Corp. v. Joseph Rank Ltd. [1957] 1 QB 267; Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd. v. S Spangletts Ltd. [1961] 2 QB 374, CA). English law is currently under review by the Law Commission: see its Consultation Paper on Illegal Transactions. The Commission's provisional proposals were to the effect that courts should have the discretion to decide whether or not illegality should act as a defence to a claim for contractual enforcement. But the discretion should be structured by requiring the court to take account of specific factors: (1) the seriousness of the illegality involved; (2) the knowledge and intention of the party seeking enforcement; (3) whether denying relief will act as a deterrent; (4) whether denial of relief will further the purpose of the rule rendering the contract illegal; and (5) whether denying relief is proportionate to the illegality involved.

15. In DANISH law, the effect upon the contract of a violation of a rule of law is the effect declared by the rule in question. If the rule is silent on this point the effect depends upon the circumstances. The issue mainly arises when a prohibition dictated by the public interest is violated. Some infringements do not entail invalidity. Purchases made after business hours in violation of the Danish Shop Act, and moonlight agreements have not been considered invalid. However it is maintained in Andersen & Madsen (244 note 265) that a party who has only promised to perform but not actually performed the illegal act may refuse to do so. However, it is submitted that a party who has received the performance will often have to pay for it. On the other hand agreements which violated the price ceilings fixed by law, and an agreement to evade the prohibition upon selling land to foreigners by agreeing on a tenancy for life (decision by the Western High Court in Ugeskrift for Retsvæsen 1972 794) has been declared unenforceable. See generally, Ussing, Aftaler[3], 186 ff; Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 195, and Lynge Andersen 242 f and 244 ff.

16. In SWEDEN there is no general statutory provision. Some statutes explicitly declare that contracts involving illegal acts or tainted by illegality are null and void but other statutes do not deal with the legal effects at all. Generally, Swedish law seems to be in line with the Article (see, in particular the principles referred to by the Supreme Court in NJA 1997 p. 93 and the principle of partial invalidity in Jordabalken chap. 4 § 1(2); a comprehensive study by Jan Andersson appears in TfR 1999, 533-752).

17. In FINLAND the effect of illegality on a contract depends upon the situation. See Telaranta 250-274 and Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 435-445.

18. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 200(2) illegal contracts void, unless the legal regulation infringed or evaded stipulates another legal consequence. A contract which is manifestly contrary to good morals is void.

II.–7:303: Effects of nullity or avoidance

(1) The question whether either party has a right to the return of whatever has been transferred or supplied under a contract, or part of a contract, which is void or has been avoided under this Section, or a monetary equivalent, is regulated by the rules on unjustified enrichment.

(2) The effect of nullity or avoidance under this Section on the ownership of property which has been transferred under the void or avoided contract, or part of a contract, is governed by the rules on the transfer of property.

(3) This Article is subject to the powers of the court to modify the contract or its effects.

COMMENTS

A. Restitution

If the prohibitions and rules of other legal orders commonly fail to state the effect upon contracts that infringe their requirements, it is even more common for them to fail to state what are the remedial consequences of a finding of invalidity for the contract where one or both parties have commenced performance of the obligations under it. In general, for reasons ranging from deterrence, punishment or protection of the dignity of the courts to a notion that parties to an illegal or immoral transaction have placed themselves outside the legal order, the national systems of Europe have commenced their analysis of this problem from the traditional basis of Roman law, which denied restitution and left the parties in whatever position had been achieved at the time the invalidity was recognised (ex turpi causa melior est conditio possidentis). But restitution, or unwinding the performances rendered under the illegal contract, appears to be a more appropriate response to the invalidity. The problems to which denial of restitution can lead, namely leaving the effects of the invalidity standing, may be illustrated by the following example:

> Illustration
> A statute declares that any contract using an abolished system of weights and measures is to be void. A sells goods to B in a contract using the abolished system of weights and measures to determine the quantity of goods to be delivered and the price. B, having taken delivery and consumed the goods, refuses to pay. If A has no action for the contract price, denial of restitution would allow B to have the benefit of the infringing transaction without paying for it.

This Article therefore recognises in principle that restitution of performances rendered under the invalid contract may be available but refers to the rules on unjustified enrichment for the detailed rules.

Similarly, the Article refers to the law on the transfer of property for the proprietary effects of a contract which is void or avoided under this Section. In cases of transfer of movables regulated by the later Book on that subject the effect is that there will normally be no effective transfer of the property. The nullity or avoidance has retrospective proprietary effect. The property will remain in the ownership of the party who owned it before it was transferred under the void or avoided contract.

The rules here are the same as in Section 2 of this chapter but their effect may be modified by the powers of the court to modify a contract, or the effects of a contract, which infringes mandatory rules.

NOTES

1. The starting point for many systems is that restitutionary as well as contractual remedies are unavailable to parties in a transaction tainted by illegality or immorality (as in AUSTRIA, CC § 1174, but with a limited scope of application, as it applies only to cases in which the party knew of the illegality and performed to realise the illegal or immoral action; see Rebhahn in Schwimman, ABGB V, 3rd ed., § 1174 nos. 3 et seq.); SWITZERLAND, LOA art. 66; ITALY, CC art. 2035). In FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG and BELGIUM this approach has also been developed by the courts. This is usually taken to follow from the application of two principles ultimately derived from Roman law: (1) no claim can be based upon the claimant's own wrongdoing; (2) in cases of equal wrongdoing, there is no recovery (D 12.5.4.3). There is often a distinction drawn between illegality and immorality, with restitution being easier to obtain in the former case. This approach is much used in FRANCE, but leads to difficult borderline questions about whether a transaction is illegal or immoral. Refusal of restitution is now largely at the discretion of the court and this refusal is becoming exceptional (in France: Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 428 ff with the developments on Nemo Auditur and in pari causa turpidunis, two maxims which constitute the basis of the refusal as well of its limits; in Belgium: Cass. 8 Dec. 1966, Pas. belge 1967, 434; Cass. 24 Sept. 1976, Pas. belge 1977, 101; Cass. 5 Sept. 1996, Pas. belge 1996, 760; Cornelis, Algemene theorie van de verbintenis, no. 567; Kruithof & Bocken, TPR 1994, no. 164;). See for Luxembourg, Cour 26 march 1998, 31, 13; 1 March 2000, 31, 367. In SPAIN, under CC arts. 1305, 1306, recovery depends on whether or not the illegality is a criminal offence, and whether or not the illicit purpose is attributable to both parties. Where the illegality is a criminal offence attributable to both parties, they will have no actions against each other and the things which were the object of the contract will be treated as instruments of the criminal offence (CC art. 1305(1)). If only one of the parties is to blame for the criminal offence, then that party will not be granted the right to recover anything rendered in execution of the contract, but the other party will be able to recover and will not be compelled to perform (CC art. 1305(2)). Where the illegality does not constitute a criminal offence, the following rules apply: if both parties are to blame for the illegality, neither is entitled to demand recovery or ask for performance (CC art. 1306(1)); if only one of them is to blame, that party is not entitled to demand recovery or ask performance, while the innocent party may recover what was rendered and cannot be compelled to fulfil what was promised under the contract (CC art. 1306(1)).). In AUSTRIA restitution depends on the scope of the norm that was infringed. Restitution is granted if the transfer or supply as such is not tolerated (see Schwimann (-Apathy and Riedler), ABGB IV[3], § 879 no. 39).
2. The starting rule in GERMANY is that restitution is allowed, and the ex turpi causa non oritur actio defence in CC § 817, second sentence, is the exception to the general rule. It is regarded as a rule of a punitive character and applied rather restrictively. Furthermore, the provision requires actual knowledge that the contract was void: even knowledge of the factors that render the contract void does not suffice if the party did not know the prohibitory rule; in any case "ought to have known" does not suffice. § 817 is applied by analogy if only the party rendering performance knew that the contract was illegal. In SLOVENIA, restitution is generally allowed, but when a contract has immoral content or cause (purpose), the court may, with regard to fairness to the parties and the scope of the norm infringed, refuse restitution, see LOA § 87. In the NETHERLANDS, the CC, following the jurisprudence of the Hoge Raad under the old Dutch code, rejects a general rule against restitution: restitution is allowed unless the court finds it morally unacceptable to assess the value of a particular act or performance (CC art. 6:211). The GREEK CC requires restitution of a prestation the cause of which is illegal or immoral (art. 904), although this is restricted in immorality cases if the immoral cause also affected the party making the prestation (art. 907). In ESTONIAN law, there is a general clause stating that transferor may not claim restitution if it would be contradictory to the provision which prescribes the nullity of the transaction or to the normative purpose of it (LOA § 1028(2) 3)). In PORTUGAL there are no special rules about restitution in the case of a contract which is illegal or contrary to good custom or public policy: the general rules are applicable. This is also the position under POLISH, SLOVAK law and CZECH law (which fully follows the unjustified enrichment regulation).

3. The ITALIAN CC (art. 2035) provides that a person who has made a performance for a purpose which, as it affects both parties, is contrary to morals cannot demand return of what has been paid. Art. 2035 is not applicable to a contract in fraud of law (art. 1344), because in this case the right to restitution of what was paid is admitted according to art. 2033.

4. As far as illegal contracts in DANISH law are concerned, restitution will be granted only when it serves the purpose of the prohibition to grant it, e.g. when the purpose is to prevent the recipient from acquiring the property in question such as an unlicensed person buying a gun or a foreigner purchasing Danish land (Ussing, Aftaler[3], 201). With contracts against morality, it is generally held that restitution will be granted when by accepting the performance the recipient acted contra bonos mores and the supplier did not. Thus restitution will be denied if both parties acted immorally. However, if only the recipient acted inappropriately restitution will often be granted, as in cases where a person has received money for doing something which the law favours, e.g. abstention from committing a crime (Ussing, Aftaler[3], 199).

5. In ENGLISH law the general rule is against restitution but it is possible in exceptional cases where the claimant is not in pari delicto with the recipient, or the transaction has not been completely executed, or if the claim can be formulated without reference to the prohibited contract (Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], 490-504). IRISH law is similar (Clark 314-19), and so is SCOTTISH law (Stair Memorial Encyclopaedia vol. 15, paras. 764-765), although in one Scottish case where, by statute, contracts using old Scottish measures were void, restitutionary recovery was allowed in respect of a sale of potatoes by the Scottish acre, on the ground that there was no moral turpitude in such a transaction (Cuthbertson v. Lowes (1870) 8 M 1073; see further Macgregor, (2000) 4 ELR 19-45*; McBryde*, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 13.31-13.34, 19.22-19.26). The English Law Commission in its Consultation Paper on Illegal Transactions suggested that a court should have discretion to decide whether or not illegality should be recognised as a defence to a claim for restitution, various factors being taken into account. In addition the court should have a discretion to allow a party to withdraw from an illegal contract and to have restitution where this will reduce the likelihood of the completion of an illegal act or purpose, although it must be satisfied that the contract could not be enforced against the claimant, that there is genuine repentance of the illegality, and that it is not too serious.

6. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 237 the state of affairs which existed prior to the conclusion of the invalid contract is to be restored. If it cannot be, the court is to declare the contract effective for the period up to the date of judgment. An invalid contract may be declared valid if the cause of invalidity can be eliminated, in particular by eliminating the excessive benefit in the case of a usurious contract or the unreasonable advantage between the services of the parties. In such cases, it may be necessary to provide for the return of any services that might remain without consideration. With regard to usurious contracts, the court may cancel reimbursement in full or in part if the aggrieved party would find itself in dire straits. Nevertheless, the party who caused the injury is obliged to reimburse the aggrieved party for that part of the received services that is equivalent to the excessive advantage. On application by the public prosecutor, the court may award to the state the performance that is due to a party who has concluded a contract that is contrary to good morals, who has deceived or illegally threatened the other party, or who has otherwise proceeded fraudulently. In the case of a usurious contract, the performance to be returned to the party who caused the injury is to be awarded to the state. Anything due to the state under these provisions is usually awarded in cash.

7. For a comparative view see Schlechtriem, Restitution und Bereicherungsausgleich in Europa, pp. 216 et seq.

II.–7:304: Damages for loss

(1) A party to a contract which is void or avoided, in whole or in part, under this Section is entitled to damages from the other party for any loss suffered as a result of the invalidity, provided that the first party did not know and could not reasonably be expected to have known, and the other party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known, of the infringement.

(2) The damages recoverable are such as to place the aggrieved party as nearly as possible in the position in which that party would have been if the contract had not been concluded or the infringing term had not been included.

COMMENTS

Restitution will not be possible in every case, since benefits will not necessarily have been transferred between the parties when the invalidity takes effect; yet one of the parties may be unfairly out of pocket as a result of concluding the invalid contract. Not every law has in the past provided a remedy in such a case and, in the case of an unlawful competitive agreement, the ECJ has said that a remedy in damages against the other party to the illegal agreement should be provided. (Courage Ltd v Crehan [2001] All ER (EC) 886; and see the Advocate General's opinion at para 41). The Article accordingly provides for a right to damages. It would be inappropriate for the damages to extend to the positive or expectation interest of the party, since putting the party in the same position as if the obligations under the contract had been performed would be to enforce the invalid contract. The aim of the damages should therefore be to place the aggrieved party in the same position as if the contract had not been concluded. A party who knows or ought to have known of the infringement cannot, however, recover damages.

> Illustration
> Legislation requires the suppliers of certain chemicals to hold licences indicating compliance with safety and environmental standards. Contracts made by suppliers holding no licence are declared to be null. Company A, which has recently been deprived of its licence by government action, nevertheless concludes a contract for the supply of the chemicals to Company B, which is unaware of A's fall from grace and buys from it because its price is lower than that of the only other licensed supplier, C. B intends to use the chemicals for industrial purposes leading on to profitable contracts of its own, and spends money preparing its premises to handle the material safely. A's illegal conduct is discovered and the contract with B is declared null before either delivery or payment have taken place. B is unable to make the intended further contracts. While B cannot recover the expectation loss of profit on these further contracts, it may recover its incidental reliance expenditure on preparing its premises and any other costs associated with having contracted with A. These might include a figure for the loss of the opportunity to contract with C (as distinct from the extra cost of contracting with C or the profits which would have been earned had B concluded the contract with C rather than A).

The solution here is similar to that adopted for avoidance for a vice of consent under Section 2.

NOTES

1. In former times GERMAN law by CC §§ 309, 307 enabled a party to a contract contrary to a statutory provision to recover damages protecting that party's negative interest if the other party knew or should have known of the illegality and the first party did not; today the same may follow from general rules of culpa in contrahendo, §§ 311(2), 280, 276. Also see ESTONIAN law (LOA § 15). The same is true for GREEK law only when the contract itself is void (CC arts. 174, 180); in other cases of legal impossibility, which exists when the fulfilment of the performance is prevented on legal grounds, if there is a fault on the part of the debtor, then the interest owed is a positive one (CC arts. 365, 362, 363). Under AUSTRIAN and CZECH law a claim for damages is available only in the case of fault of the party responsible for the infringement of the law. In PORTUGUESE law there are no special rules about damages for contracts which are illegal or contrary to good custom or public policy: the general rules are applicable. This is also the position under POLISH, SLOVAK and HUNGARIAN law. DANISH law will only compensate for the reliance interest and only if this is not inconsistent with the law or with morality (Ussing, Aftaler[3], 259 ff).
2. The ITALIAN CC (art. 1338) provides that "A party who knows or should know the existence of a reason for invalidity of the contract and does not give notice to the other party is bound to compensate for the damage suffered by the latter in relying, without fault, on the validity of the contract." See Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto I[2], 605-608; Bianca, Diritto civile III, 170-173). The compensation is aimed at recovering the loss suffered, (so called "negative interest") and putting the party as far as possible in the same position as if the contract had not been made. This means that positive interest (what the party would have gained if the contract had been performed) is excluded (Cass. 30 July 2004, no. 14539, Corr.giur. 2005/8, 1099). The same is true for SLOVENIAN law, see LOA § 91.
3. ENGLISH, IRISH and SCOTTISH law do not have rules applicable generally to cases covered by these articles. In ENGLISH law, where the illegality was the fault of one party and the other party was innocent, the party at fault has been held liable for breach of a "collateral contract" (e.g. Strongman (1945) Ltd. v. Sincock [1955] 2 QB 525, CA (employer liable for failure to obtain licence needed for building work) (see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 11-121). As explained earlier (see Notes to Article II-7:214), damages may also be recovered if there has been fraud or negligent misrepresentation. But generally "English law does not allow a party to an illegal agreement to claim damages from the other party for loss caused to him by being a party to the illegal agreement" (Gibbs Mew plc v. Gemmel [1999] 1 EGLR 43, 49). This may lead to a party who has entered an illegal contract as the result of economic pressure from the other being unable to claim, an outcome which has been criticised by the ECJ (Courage Ltd. v. Crehan, Case C-453/99 [2001] ECR 1-6297).
4. In FRENCH law, if the nullity of the contract causes a prejudice to one party because of expenses incurred in view of the conclusion of the contract, he or she is entitled to damages from the party liable for the nullity, provided fault is proved. If both parties know the cause of nullity, a partition of liabilities will be pronounced (Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], no. 730).

CHAPTER 8: INTERPRETATION

Section 1: Interpretation of contracts

II.–8:101: General rules

(1) A contract is to be interpreted according to the common intention of the parties even if this differs from the literal meaning of the words.

(2) If one party intended the contract, or a term or expression used in it, to have a particular meaning, and at the time of the conclusion of the contract the other party was aware, or could reasonably be expected to have been aware, of the first party's intention, the contract is to be interpreted in the way intended by the first party.

(3) The contract is, however, to be interpreted according to the meaning which a reasonable person would give to it:

(a) if an intention cannot be established under the preceding paragraphs; or
(b) if the question arises with a person, not being a party to the contract or a person who by law has no better rights than such a party, who has reasonably and in good faith relied on the contract's apparent meaning.

COMMENTS

A. General

Contracts are interpreted in order to determine their contents. This is particularly the case when the contract contains a term which is ambiguous, obscure or vague; that is, when one cannot immediately see the exact meaning. But interpretation will also be necessary if terms which seem clear enough in themselves contradict each other, or cease to be clear when the general setting of the contract is taken into account.

When a contract contains gaps which need to be filled, the process is sometimes referred to as completive interpretation (ergänzande Auslegung) or the addition of implied terms. This is covered in II.–9:101 (Terms of a contract).

Determining the exact meaning of the contract may be necessary before it can be determined whether the contract is valid or whether there has been a non-performance. For example, it may be necessary to decide whether the debtor's obligation was one to produce a particular result (obligation de résultat) or only one to use reasonable care and skill (obligation de moyens).

Any kind of contract may need interpretation, from a very formal contract drawn up by, and concluded in the presence of, a notary to a very informal contract concluded orally. Similarly, the rules of interpretation apply to contracts made on standard forms. In fact some of the rules apply particularly to these types of contract. Interpretation may be needed for the whole or part of a contract and for any term or expression used in it. And it may be needed for non-verbal expressions of intention such as symbols, signs or gestures.

It is not only judges who are called on to interpret contracts. Indeed one of the functions of rules of interpretation is to enable the parties and their advisers to apply the rules and arrive at an agreed interpretation in the light of them, thus possibly avoiding the need for litigation.

B. The search for common intention

Following the majority of laws of EU Member States, the general rules on interpretation combine the subjective method, according to which pre-eminence is given to the common intention of the parties, and the objective method which takes an external view by reference to objective criteria such as reasonableness, good faith etc. The person interpreting the contract (the "interpreter") is thus encouraged to start by looking to see what was the parties' common intention at the time the contract was made. This is normal because the contract is primarily the creation of the parties and the interpreter should respect their intentions, expressed or implicit, even if their will was expressed obscurely or ambiguously. One of the clearest cases for the application of the rule in paragraph (1) is where the parties have, perhaps for reasons of commercial secrecy, deliberately used code words in contracting.

In seeking this common intention the interpreter should pay particular attention to the relevant circumstances as set out in the next Article.

There may be a common intention of the parties even in the case of a contract of adhesion, in so far as the party who was not responsible for drafting the contract had a sufficient knowledge of the clauses and adhered to them.

The search for common intention is compatible with rules which forbid the proof of matters in addition or contrary to a writing, for example if the parties have negotiated a merger clause to the effect that the writing contains all the terms of the contract, as it refers to external elements only to clarify the meaning of a clause, not to contradict it.

The Article states another important point: the interpreter should give effect to the common intention of the parties over the letter of the contract. This means that in a case of conflict between the words written and the common intention, it is the latter which must prevail. Thus if a document is described as a loan but its content indicates that it is really a lease, the interpreter should not attach importance to the description in the document.

> Illustration 1
> The owner of a large building employs a painting firm to repaint the "Exterior window frames". The painters repaint the outside of the frames of the exterior windows and claim that they have finished the job; the owner claims that the inside surfaces of the frames to exterior windows should also have been painted. It is proved by the preliminary documents that the representatives of the owner and of the painting firm who negotiated the contract had clearly contemplated both surfaces being done. Although the normal interpretation might suggest that only the outside surfaces were within the contract, since exterior and interior decoration are usually done separately, the parties' common intention should prevail.

All the same, the interpreter must not, under the guise of interpretation, modify the clear and precise meaning of the contract where there is nothing to indicate that this is required by the Article. This would be to ignore the principle of the binding force of contract.

C. Party knows the real intention of the other party

If one party's words do not accurately express that party's intention, for instance because the intention is expressed wrongly or the wrong words are used, the other party can normally rely on the reasonable meaning of the first party's words. But this is not the case if the second party knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the first party's actual intention. If the second party concludes the contract without pointing out the problem the first party's intended interpretation should be binding.

> Illustration 2
> A, a fur trader, offers to sell B, another fur trader, hare skins at so much per kilo; this is a typing error for so much a piece. In the trade, skins are usually sold by the piece and, as there are about six skins to the kilo, the stated price is absurdly low. B knows or could reasonably be expected to know what A really meant but nonetheless purports to accept. There is a contract at the stated price per piece as A intended.

One may see in this rule also a consequence of the rule that the intention of the parties prevails over the letter of the contract.

D. Objective method

The interpreter should not try to discover the intentions of the parties at any price and end up deciding what they were in an arbitrary way. When a common intention cannot be discerned, and paragraph (2) of the Article does not apply, paragraph (3) comes into operation. This refers not to fictitious intentions but to the meaning which a reasonable person would have given to the contract. A reasonable person would, of course, take into account the objective circumstances in which the contract was concluded and the nature of the parties between whom it was concluded. This provision will be of very wide application because in practice it is quite common for parties to have no special intention as to the meaning of expressions used in their contract. But equally this use of objective interpretation does not empower the judge to overturn the contract under the guise of interpretation and to go against the unequivocal will of the parties.

Paragraph (3) also applies in a question with a third party who has reasonably and in good faith relied on the apparent objective meaning of the contract. Third parties who rely, reasonably and in good faith, on the apparent meaning of contracts cannot be expected to be bound by special meanings secretly attached to terms or expressions by the parties. Paragraph (3) provides protection for third parties in this type of case. It will be remembered also that many contracts of a type which are intended from the outset to be relied on by third parties (such as negotiable instruments and contracts registered in a land register) are outwith the scope of the model rules and will be regulated by special rules.

However, paragraph (3) preserves the rule that an assignee has no better right against the other party to the original contract than the assignor. An assignee has to take many risks, including the risk that a contract has been modified by agreement between the parties since it was concluded, and has appropriate rights against the assignor who conceals the existence of defences or exceptions available to the other party to the contract. To allow an assignee to take advantage of the apparent meaning of a term, when its real meaning as between the parties was something else, would be to allow one party to a contract to cheat the other party by the simple expedient of an assignment. This would be contrary to the requirements of good faith and fair dealing. Of course, if the other party to the contract participated in a fraud on the assignee there would also be delictual remedies against that party based on the fraud.

NOTES

I. General

1. Some legal systems have detailed legislative provisions on interpretation: FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs arts. 1156 - 1164 (see in France Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 418-436; in Belgium: Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, nos. 73-81; Stijns-Van Gerven-Wéry, JT 1996, 716-718); SPANISH CC arts. 1258 and 1281 - 1289, and see Ministerio de Justicia II, 509 ff; ITALIAN CC arts. 1362- 1371 (see Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto II[2], 369 ff, Bianca, Diritto civile III, 414 ff, Roppo, Il contratto, 465 ff and Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 251 ff); SLOVENIAN LOA §§ 82-85; ESTONIAN GPCCA § 75 (interpretation of declaration of intent), LOA § 29 (interpretation of contracts), LOA § 39 (interpretation of standard terms); also UNIDROIT arts. 4.1-4.8.
2. Others content themselves with statements of general principle: e.g. GERMAN CC §§ 133 and 157 (see Staudinger [-Singer] BGB (2004), § 133 no. 3; AUSTRIAN CC §§ 914, 915; GREEK CC arts. 173 and 200; POLISH CC art. 65; PORTUGUESE CC arts. 236-238 (see Fernandes II, 409 ff).; CZECH CC § 35(2) and (3); CISG art. 8.
3. The DUTCH CC deliberately omits rules of interpretation as being too general and too well-known. They are to be found in the case law (Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht II, nos. 279 ff). Similarly, in the NORDIC countries rules of interpretation are to be found in case law and doctrine. See for Denmark, Lynge Andersen 374 ff and Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 245 ff; for Finland, Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 561-664 and Wilhelmsson, Standardavtal, passim; for Sweden, Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt II[4], 31 ff and Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 179 ff.
4. ENGLISH, SCOTTISH and IRISH rules of interpretation are derived from case law and are sometimes not clearly distinct from rules of evidence and rules about mistake (for England, see McKendrick 95-202; Scotland, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 8; see also Scottish Law Commission, Report on Interpretation (1997), which proposes a systematisation of the rules on Interpretation which is very much on the lines of this Chapter; and MacQueen & Zimmermann (-Clive) 176-203.
5. In FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG the rules of interpretation are considered to be mere guidelines which do not have to be followed (see for France, Cass.req. 24 February 1868, D.P. 1868.1.308 and for Luxembourg, 24 December 1896, 4, 230, Cour, 18 June 1987, 27, 117, Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 458 ff). The BELGIAN case law has abandoned this position and violation of one of the rules on interpretation by a judge can be invoked before the Cour de cassation (Cass. 22 March 1979, Arr.Cass 1978-79, 860; Cass. 27 Nov. 1986, Pas. belge 1987, 392; Cass. 24 March 1988, Arr.Cass. 1987-88, 972; Cass. 10 Jan. 1994, Arr.Cass. 1994, 16), as has the ITALIAN doctrine and case law (see Scognamiglio 179, Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto II[2], 371 ff and, e.g., Cass. 30 January 1995, no. 1092; Cass.sez.lav. 4 July 2005, no. 14158). Similarly, violation of the rules on interpretation may be bases for appeal to the Supreme Court in ESTONIA (e.g. Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decisions from 30 November 2004, no. 3-2-1-129-04 and 11 June 2007, no. 3-2-1-64-07).

6. In France, interpretation is a question of fact which is not reviewed by the Cour de cassation, unless clear and unambiguous clauses of the agreement have been "denatured" (since Cass.civ. 15 April 1872, D.P. 1872.1.176) and the scope of this control of "denaturation" has constantly been broadened. The position is similar in Italy (Bianca, Diritto civile III, 413 ff) and generally also in Germany, see Staudinger [-Singer] BGB (2004), § 133 no. 79. In England, on the other hand, interpretation is a question of law, as it is in Greece (A.P. 1176/1997, NoB 1977.709) and Portugal (STJ 8 May 1991, BolMinJus 407, 487 ff).

7. See generally Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative law[3], 400-409; Kötz, European Contract Law I, chap. 7.

II. Principle of common intention

8. The most generally accepted principle, which flows from the will theory of contract (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 20 ff) is that of interpretation according to the common intention of the parties, complemented sometimes by the warning that "one should not simply take the words in their literal meaning" (FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1156). See also GERMAN CC § 133; AUSTRIAN CC § 914; ITALIAN CC art. 1362; GREEK CC arts. 173 and 200; DUTCH CC art. 3:33 (by implication) and the case law, e.g. the Haviltex case, HR 13 March 1981, NedJur 1981, 635; SPANISH law, CC art. 1281; POLISH CC art. 65 § 2; SLOVENIAN LOA § 82(2). and ESTONIAN LOA § 29(1). The NORDIC laws are to the same effect, Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 249. See also UNIDROIT art. 4.1(1) and CISG art. 8.1.

9. In contrast, ENGLISH and IRISH law traditionally did not permit a search for the intentions of the parties outside the document which contains their agreement (Lovell & Christmas Ltd. v. Wall (1911) 104 LT 85, CA. However, if the meaning of the words is not clear, one must take into account commercial certainty and the factual matrix of the contract (Prenn v. Simmonds [1971] 1 WLR 1381, HL). More recently the courts have softened their approach. The contract must be interpreted in a way that will make commercial sense, even if that means disregarding the literal meaning of the words used; Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd. v. West Bromwich Building Society [1998] 1 WLR 896 (HL). See Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 12-050 ff. The CZECH CC in § 35(2) expressly provides that the will may be taken into account only to such extent as not be contrary to the wording of the juridical act.

10. In SCOTTISH law the contract is to be interpreted according to the common intention of the parties as expressed in the contract; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 8.02-8.04. The old doctrines of excessive concentration on the "ordinary" meaning of words and on not going outside the terms of a contract document unless there was ambiguity have now been replaced by an approach which stresses interpretation in the whole context, including relevant surrounding circumstances. See e.g. Credential Bath Street Ltd. v Venture Investment Placement Ltd. [2007] CSOH 208.

11. The SLOVAK CC and Ccom deal with the interpretation of contracts under the general rules on the interpretation of juridical acts and also specifically. In CC § 35 there is the fundamental principle of interpretation, but it refers to all juridical acts, not only contacts. According to § 35(2) "Legal acts expressed in words shall be interpreted not only according to their linguistic expression but in particular also according to the will of the person who did the legal act unless this will is at variance with the linguistic expression." As we can see, a legal act is interpreted according to the will of the person who did it only if this is not at variance with the linguistic expression. But we can also say that the "linguistic expression" is not the same as the literal meaning of the words. Only if the will of parties is sternly different in comparison with the linguistic expression, can the contract not be interpreted according to their will. A rule of interpretation of contracts according to the common intention of the parties is not given expressly in the CC or the Ccom, but the importance of the common will in interpretation is clear from theory and decisions of courts and also for example from CC § 41a: "(1) If an invalid legal act has the essentials of another act that is valid, this act may be appealed to if it obviously follows from the circumstances that it expresses the will of the acting person. (2) If a legal act is to cover up another legal act, this other legal act is valid if it corresponds to the will of participants and all its requisites are met. The invalidity of such legal act cannot be appealed to vis-à-vis a participant who considered it not to be covered up."

III. One party aware of the other party's real intention (paragraph (2))

12. This rule is to be found in ENGLISH and IRISH law: Centrovincial Estates plc v. Merchant Investors Assurance Ltd. [1983] Com LR 158, CA (illustration 2 is derived from Hartog v. Colin & Shields [1939] 3 AllER 566, QBD and SCOTTISH law (Muirhead & Turnbull v. Dickson (1905) 7 F 686 at 694 per Lord President Dunedin); though in that case it was said that the contract was void for mistake, it is thought that the mistaken party (the seller) could have held the non-mistaken party (the buyer) to a contract on the terms the seller intended: see Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 5-068), and it seems that the contract document can be rectified accordingly, cf. Commission for New Towns v. Cooper [1995] 2 WLR 677, CA. The rule is also clearly established in SCOTTISH law, Sutton v. Ciceri (1890) 17R (HL) 40. In CZECH law the rule of paragraph (2) is expressly formulated for commercial relations only (Ccom § 266(1)), but may be probably deduced also from the CC's more general rules. In SLOVENIAN law this rule can be deduced from LOA §§ 82(2) and 459 no. 2.

13. A similar rule is to be found in CISG art. 8, and see also SPANISH CC art. 1258 and ESTONIAN LOA § 29(3). It is also to be found in the DUTCH and AUSTRIAN jurisdiction (see respectively the Haviltex case, above, and OGH 11 July 1985, JBl 1986, 173. It is generally accepted in NORDIC law, based on Contract Acts § 32(1), see Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 169; Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 129, and in FINLAND, Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 624-631. GERMAN law is to the same effect: RG 8 June 1920, RGZ 99, 147.

14. In FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG law, the rule in paragraph (2) does not appear openly in the jurisprudence, nor is it discussed in doctrine. These laws rely on general rules on interpretation (e.g. the common intention will prevail over the letter of the contract), good faith and error. It is the same in ITALIAN law.

15. This rule appears in the SLOVAK Ccom § 266: "(1) The manifestation of will shall be interpreted according to the intention of the acting person, if this intention was known or must have been known to the party to which the manifestation of will was directed."

IV. Principle of objective interpretation (paragraph (3))

16. Interpretation according to the meaning which would be given to the words by a reasonable person in the same situation is the basic rule in some systems: PORTUGUESE CC art. 236(1) (theory of the "impression gained by the recipient"); ENGLISH law, which applies the normal meaning of the words in the context in which they were used (see Lord Wilberforce's judgments in Prenn v. Simmonds [1971] 1 WLR 1381, HL and in Reardon Smith Line Ltd. v. Yngvar Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 898, HL, especially at 995-996), unless it is clearly established that the parties shared a different intention (see The Karen Oltmann [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep 708, QBD).The rule is expressly stated to apply when it is not possible to discover any common intention of the parties by CISG art. 8(2) and Unidroit art. 4.1(2); see also AUSTRIAN CC § 914 (objektiver Erklärungswert; the contract has to be interpreted according to how a reasonable person would have understood the declarations of will); ESTONIAN LOA § 29(4) and NORDIC law, (Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 251). The same holds true for POLAND where courts and legal writers hold that objective standards should be applied only if it is impossible to discover any common intention of the parties (see e.g. the Supreme Court decisions of June 13, 1963, II CR 589/62, OSNCP 1964/10, poz. 200, and February 20, 1986, III CRN 443/85, OSNCP 1986/12, poz. 211). More frequently, the principle of reasonable interpretation is not formulated explicitly but is applied in the guise of good faith: this is the case in GERMAN law, FRENCH and BELGIAN law, DUTCH law (see Haviltex, supra), ITALIAN law (see CC art. 1366 and also arts. 1367-1371), SPANISH law (on the latter see CC art. 1258) and GREEK law (Balis § 90). In DUTCH law, objective interpretation is the overriding approach to be used in cases where the contract is intended to affect the position of (a potentially large number of) third parties who were not involved in the conclusion of the contract and could not be aware of the intention of the parties (Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht II, no. 286a and DSM v. Fox, HR 20 February 2004, RvdW 2004, 34). In CZECH law the principle of objective interpretation generally takes a subsidiary role to the regard to the will of the parties (see e.g. Ccom § 266(2)); on the other hand, it takes a primary significance in the interpretation of unilateral juridical acts (CC § 35(3)). The position is similar in SLOVENIAN law, where there are no explicit rules, but the general principle is recognized, see Schlechtriem/Možina, p. 43.

17. The principle of objective interpretation is given in the SLOVAK Ccom § 266(2) "(2) In the event that it is impossible to interpret the manifestation of will under subsection 1 above, the manifestation of will shall be interpreted according to the meaning, which as a rule is assigned to it by a person of the same status as the status of the person to which the manifestation of will was directed. The terms, used in business, shall be interpreted according to the meaning which business circles usually attribute to them."

18. The HUNGARIAN CC § 207(1) states that in the event of a dispute, the contractual statements are to be interpreted as the other party must have understood them in the light of the presumed intent of the person issuing the statement and the circumstances of the case, in accordance with the general accepted meaning of the words. A waiver of rights is not to be broadly construed. The parties' secret reservations or concealed motives are immaterial with regard to the validity of the contract.

II.–8:102: Relevant matters

(1) In interpreting the contract, regard may be had, in particular, to:

(a) the circumstances in which it was concluded, including the preliminary negotiations;

(b) the conduct of the parties, even subsequent to the conclusion of the contract;

(c) the interpretation which has already been given by the parties to terms or expressions which are the same as, or similar to, those used in the contract and the practices they have established between themselves;

(d) the meaning commonly given to such terms or expressions in the branch of activity concerned and the interpretation such terms or expressions may already have received;

(e) the nature and purpose of the contract;

(f) usages; and

(g) good faith and fair dealing.

(2) In a question with a person, not being a party to the contract or a person such as an assignee who by law has no better rights than such a party, who has reasonably and in good faith relied on the contract's apparent meaning, regard may be had to the circumstances mentioned in sub-paragraphs (a) to (c) above only to the extent that those circumstances were known to, or could reasonably be expected to have been known to, that person.

COMMENTS

A. Relevant matters

Paragraph (1) of the Article gives the interpreter a non-exhaustive list of matters which may be relevant in determining either the common intention of the parties or the reasonable meaning of the contract.

Thus the interpreter may consider the preliminary negotiations between the parties (paragraph (a)): for example, one of the parties may have defined a term in a letter and the other not have contested this interpretation when an opportunity arose. The interpreter may do this even where the parties have agreed that the written document embodies the entirety of their contract (merger clause), unless in an individually negotiated clause the parties have agreed that anterior negotiations may not be used even for purpose of interpretation. This sort of clause may be very useful when long and complicated negotiations were necessary for the contract.

The conduct of the parties, even after the making of the contract, may also provide indications as to the meaning of the contract (paragraph (b)).

Illustration 1

A German manufacturer of office supplies has engaged B to represent A in the north of France. The contract is for six years but the contractual relationship may be terminated without notice if B commits a serious non-performance of its obligations. One of these obligations is to visit each of the 20 universities in the area "every month". Assuming that this obligation applies only to the months, in the country concerned, when the universities are open and not to the vacations, B only visits each one 11 times a year, and A knows this from the accounts which are submitted to it by B. After 4 years A purports to terminate the contractual relationship for serious non-performance by B of B's obligations. Its behaviour during the four years since the conclusion of the contract leads to the interpretation that the phrase “every month” must be interpreted as applying only to the months when universities are active.

Not all the laws of the Member States allow evidence to be given of pre-contractual negotiations, on the grounds that what one party said was meant is not useful evidence as the other might not have agreed with the interpretation. A better approach is not to exclude the evidence but to allow the court to assess it for what it is worth. Similarly with subsequent conduct.

The practices established between the parties (paragraph (c)) are often decisive.

Illustration 2
A has made a franchise contract with B. A clause provides that B is to pay within ten days for goods received from A. For a three month period B pays within 10 working days. Then A demands payment within ten days including holidays. The practice adopted by the parties indicates that this is not a correct interpretation.

The reference (paragraph (c)) to the interpretation which has already been given by the parties to terms or expressions which are the same as, or similar to, those used in the contract is particularly relevant in relation to standard terms.

Paragraph (d) (concluding words) extends the same idea to terms or expressions which have already been the subject of interpretation by courts. This obviously may inform the interpreter’s decision. The meaning generally given to terms and expressions in a particular sector may also be useful when one is dealing with terms which have a technical meaning different to their ordinary meaning, for example the “dozen” which is understood in a particular trade to mean thirteen (the “baker’s dozen”).

The nature and the purpose of the contract may also be considered (letter (e)).

Illustration 3
The manager of a large real estate development makes a fixed price contract with a gardening company for the maintenance of the "green spaces". The manager later complains that A has not repaired the boundary wall. The contract cannot be interpreted as covering this as it is a contract for gardening.

Furthermore, it is normal to refer to usages whether the parties may be considered to have contracted with reference to them or whether these usages form the basis of a reasonable interpretation used to resolve an uncertainty in the meaning of the contract.

The Article refers in principle to usages which are current at the place the contract is made, although there may be difficulty in establishing this place.

Illustration 4
A wine merchant from Hamburg buys 2,000 barrels of Beaujolais Villages from a co-operative cellar B. In Beaujolais a barrel contains 216 litres, whereas a Burgundian barrel contains more. A cannot claim that the barrels referred to in the contract are Burgundian barrels.

Illustration 5
A film producer A and a distributor B make a distribution contract in which there is a clause providing for payment of a certain sum if the number of exclusive screenings (i.e. screenings only in a single cinema or chain of cinemas) is less than 300,000. A meant exclusive for the whole of France, B only for the Paris region. According to usages of the French film industry, exclusivity means exclusivity only in the Paris region. It is this meaning which applies.

Finally, good faith and fair dealing will often determine the interpretation of the contract.

B. Third parties

In a question with third parties, where an objective interpretation is adopted, it would be unreasonable to refer to circumstances such as the negotiations or the subsequent conduct of the parties unless the third party knew of them or could reasonably be expected to have known of them. This is provided for by paragraph (2).

NOTES

1. The circumstances which are to be taken into account in discovering the common intention of the parties are indicated in some of the laws of the EU Member States. They may be found either in legislative texts or in the case law. E.g.: ITALIAN CC arts. 1362(2) (behaviour), 1368 (usage), 1369 (nature and purpose of the contract) (see Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto II[2], 403 ff and Antoniolli and Veneziano, Principles of European contract law and Italian law, 254 ff); FRENCH and BELGIAN CC art. 1159 (usage; see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 451; SPANISH CC arts. 1282 (behaviour), 1258 (nature of contract); GERMAN CC § 157 (usage; see MünchKomm (-Busche), BGB, § 157 nos. 16 et seq.; AUSTRIAN CC § 914 and UGB § 346 (both provisions refer to fair practices; the latter provision specifies them as usages between entrepreneurs). PORTUGUESE doctrine and the jurisprudence look at the same indicators, see Fernandes 416 ff; GREEK case law is to the same effect, as is DANISH law (Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 251 ff); FINNISH law (Commission Report 17 ff); and SWEDISH law, Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 90 ff. UNIDROIT art. 4.3 refers to six factors; CISG art. 8.3 to four (the negotiations, practices between the parties, usages and subsequent conduct of the parties). CZECH law enumerates the circumstances to be taken into account in the interpretation process (similarly as in paragraph (1) of the Article) in the Ccom only (§ 266(3)); for the CC, the factors must be derived from case law (e.g. Supreme Court 1 Odo 95/97 – the will of the parties may be disclosed also from their subsequent conduct). The circumstances to be taken into account in the interpretation process according to DUTCH (case)law resemble those mentioned in paragraph (1) of the commented Article (Asser-Hartkamp, 4-II, Algemene leer der overeenkomsten, no. 287).
2. ENGLISH and IRISH law are different in that they show a marked reluctance to rely on the pre-contractual negotiations as being an unreliable guide to the interpretation of a formal contract document (see Prenn v. Simmonds [1971] 1 WLR 1381, HL); and the subsequent conduct of the parties is not taken into account; James Miller & Partners v. Whitworth Street Estates (Manchester) Ltd. [1970] AC 583, HL. However, the circumstances in which the contract was made and its aim and purpose are considered (see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 12-118 – (12-120). The elements listed under (e) (meaning given to the provision previously) and (f) (usages) are also accepted by English law, and even a usage may not be accepted if it is not consistent with the written agreement (Palgrave Brown & Sons v. SS Turid [1922] 1 AC 397, HL.

3. SCOTTISH law has in the past been reluctant to refer to prior negotiations in the interpretation of a formal contract document, but this has been criticised and many exceptions are now recognised. There are conflicting authorities on the question of referring to subsequent conduct of the parties. See McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 8.11-8.17.

4. In SLOVAKIA the circumstances which are to be taken into account are indicated from decisions of courts and are also stated in many texts on the theory of law and legal literature. The rules of interpretation in the Ccom § 266 continue with "(3) All circumstances, which are associated with the manifestation of will, including the negotiations about the contract and practice, which the parties introduced between themselves, as well as the subsequent conduct of the parties, shall be duly considered when interpreting the manifestation of will under subsection 1 and subsection 2 above." In § 266 we can find rules on preliminary negotiations, the conduct of the parties, the meaning commonly given to such terms, the circumstances, and also the practices parties have established between themselves.

5. The ESTONIAN LOA § 29(5) lists the factors similarly to paragraph (1) (a)-(f) of the present Article. The requirement of good faith derives from general principles (LOA § 6).

6. The SLOVENIAN LOA § 82(2) states that contracts are to be interpreted in a way which complies with general principles of the law of obligations. Factors to be taken into account include negotiations, practice established among the parties and usages, see LOA § 22(2). According to the supplementary rule in LOA § 84, unclear statements in unilateral contracts (e.g. donation) are to be interpreted in a way which is favourable for the promisor, whereas in reciprocal contracts, they are to be interpreted in a way which favours an equitable relation between obligations.

II.–8:103: Interpretation against supplier of term or dominant party

(1) Where there is doubt about the meaning of a term not individually negotiated, an interpretation of the term against the party who supplied it is to be preferred.

(2) Where there is doubt about the meaning of any other term, and that term has been established under the dominant influence of one party, an interpretation of the term against that party is to be preferred.

COMMENTS

The rule in paragraph (1), often called the contra proferentem rule, is widely recognised both in legislation and in case law in the different national and international laws. It rests on the idea that the party who has drafted a clause, or the whole contract, unilaterally should normally bear the risk of any defect in the drafting. The rule applies not only against the author but also against anyone who supplies pre-drafted clauses. This will be the case when the clauses have been prepared by a third party, for example the professional association to which the party employing the clauses belongs.

It applies in particular to standard terms drawn up unilaterally by one party, but it may also apply to a contract of adhesion which has been drawn up for the particular occasion but which is non-negotiable.

> Illustration
> An insurance contract contains a clause excluding losses caused by "floods". The insurance company which drafted the contract cannot maintain that this exclusion applies to damage caused by water escaping from a burst pipe, since it has not made this clear.

It should be noted that the Article states only that the interpretation against the party who supplied the term "is to be preferred". An interpreter could, in appropriate circumstances, interpret a clause which has not been individually negotiated in favour of the party who proposed it.

Paragraph (2) is an extension of the rule to cases where, even if a term has been individually negotiated, it has been established under the dominant influence of one party. In such a case an interpretation against that dominant party is to be preferred. This could find application not only in contracts between businesses and consumers but also in, for example, contracts for the provision of personal security where the creditor may have exerted a strong influence on a non-professional security provider to provide the security. Where the security provider is a professional acting for remuneration it is much more likely that an interpretation against the security provider will be preferred, either because of the application of paragraph (1) or because of the application of paragraph (2).

Both paragraphs apply only where the meaning of a term is doubtful. In many, if not most, cases the general rules on interpretation in the two preceding Articles will enable a clear meaning to be arrived at. The scope for the application of the present Article is therefore limited.

NOTES

1. This rule, or some variant of it, is very widely recognised, either explicitly or implicitly; it appears frequently in texts on consumer protection, particularly in those which consider the Directive 93/13/EEC of 5 April 1993 on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts, art. 5 and the legislation which implements it. See for GERMANY: CC § 305c(2), following earlier case law, which continues to apply to non-consumer contracts; AUSTRIA, CC § 915 which applies to both ordinary contracts and consumer contracts; for the latter also the transparency rule of ConsProtA § 6(3) has to be taken into consideration, applying to all pre-formulated contracts; ENGLAND: Hollier v. Rambler Motors (AMC) Ltd. [1972] 2 QB 71, CA (English law has sometimes applied the rule in an exaggerated way to restrict the effect of clauses limiting liability, but this approach is no longer to be followed: Photo Productions Ltd. v. Securicor Transport Ltd. [1980] AC 827, 851 (HL)); DENMARK: ContrA § 38(b) on consumer contracts and generally Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 257; FINLAND: ConsProtA chap. 4, § 3 and for other applications see Wilhelmsson, Standardavtal 91; SWEDEN: see Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 173-177; SPAIN: CC art. 1288, General Contract Terms Act art. 6 and ConsProtA 1984 art. 10(2); FRANCE, case law applying CC arts. 1162 (interpretation against the stipulator) and 1602 (interpretation against the seller), ConsC art. L. 133-2, al 2 (Cass.civ. 1ère 21 January 2003: Bull.civ. I, no. 19), avant-projet de réforme du droit des obligations et de la prescription arts. 1140 and 1140-1, and see, for a proposal which inspired the form of the present Article, Fauvarque-Cosson et Mazeaud, Principes Contractuels Communs 478); BELGIUM: case law which applies the rule of interpretation against the stipulator (CC art. 1162) only if the other rules do not give a result, case law which also applies CC art. 1602 (against the seller) and Commercial Practices and ConsProtA art. 31, § 4 (interpretation contra proferentem); LUXEMBOURG, case law which applies CC arts. 1162 and 1602; ITALY: CC art. 1370, which the case law applies only to 'mass contracts' (see also CC art. 1469(4), 2nd co.); THE NETHERLANDS: the rule, which has not yet been adopted legislatively, is viewed by the recent decisions of the Hoge Raad as 'one point of view', see HR 12 January 1996, NedJur 1996, 683); SCOTLAND: McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 8.38-8.43. In GREECE and POLAND the rule is recognised only for consumer contracts, for Greece see: Law 2251/1994, art. 2.5; for Poland see: CC art. 385 § 2; CZECH REPUBLIC: for commercial relations see Ccom § 266(4) (applies not only to not individually negotiated but to all contract terms) and for other civil relations see Švestka/Jehlička/Škárová, OZ[9], 237 (although the contra preferentem rule is not expressed in the CC, it can be deduced from general provisions). In PORTUGAL the contra proferentem rule applies only to standard terms (DL 446/85 of 25 October 1985, art. 11(2); in other cases the judge may, if in doubt, choose the meaning which will give better balance to the contract. In ESTONIAN law, the rule applies to interpretation of standard terms (regardless of the qualification of the parties), LOA § 39(1) sent. 2. In SLOVENIA the contra preferentem rule (LOA § 83) is a supplementary rule, it applies if the general rules on interpretation fail to deliver a clear result. See also ConsProtA art. 22(5). See also UNIDROIT art. 4.6 and for the CISG see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), CISG, art. 8 nos. 47 et seq.

2. The SLOVAK Ccom § 266(4) expressly provides that expressions in any manifestation of will which may lead to different interpretations should, in any case of doubt, be interpreted to the disadvantage of the party who first used the expressions in negotiations.

3. For HUNGARIAN law see CC § 207(2) which applies to standard contract terms and consumer contracts.

II.–8:104: Preference for negotiated terms

Terms which have been individually negotiated take preference over those which have not.

COMMENTS

If in an otherwise non-negotiable contract (standard form or otherwise) there is, exceptionally, a term which has been negotiated, it is reasonable to suppose that this term will represent the common intention of the parties, other indications apart. This rule complements the rule in the preceding Article.

The preference given to negotiated terms applies also to modifications made to a printed contract, whether by hand or in any other way (e.g. typed or stamped on). One may in effect assume that these modifications were negotiated. However, it is a rebuttable presumption.

> Illustration
> A printed form is used for the conclusion of an option to purchase land. One of the clauses provides that the eventual buyer will deposit a cheque for 10% of the price with an intermediary until the option is either taken up or is refused. The parties agree to replace the requirement for a cheque with a bank guarantee. The intermediary writes this change on the margin of the document but omits to cross out the printed clause. The contradiction between the two clauses is to be resolved in favour of the hand-written clause.

The rule applies even if the modification was oral.

NOTES

1. This rule is sometimes formulated only in legislation on consumer protection or on particular contracts, for example on insurance contracts. See for GREECE: ConsProtA art. 2(4); SPAIN: General Contract Terms Act art. 6.0; PORTUGAL: General Contract Terms Decree Law art. 10. In other laws the rule applies generally; see for GERMANY CC § 305b and for POLAND CC art. 385(1); for AUSTRIA see OGH ÖBA 1989/135; the idea behind rule II.–8:104 is also expressed in the ConsProtA § 6, which provides for the validity of otherwise invalid clauses, if they are individually negotiated (see § 6(2)); on NORDIC law see for Denmark, Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 254; Sweden, Ramb Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 178 and NSA 1993, 436; Finland, Hoppu, Handels-och förmögenhetsrätten i huvuddrag, 46. ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law are to the same effect, Glynn v. Margetson [1893] AC 351, HL*; Taylor v John Lewis Lt.d* 1927 SC 891 at 898. In FRENCH and BELGIAN case law (for France see Cass.com. 7 January 1969, JCP 1969.II.16121 and rappr. 1162 C. civ) the same result is reached by application of the common intention test; similarly the DUTCH case law, see Asser-Hartkamp, Verbintenissenrecht II, no. 287. In ITALY the rule is formulated in CC art. 1342 in a section on "Agreement of the parties"; this is an imperative rule and not a presumption left to the appreciation of the judge (Cass. 5 April 1990, no. 2863, Rep.Foro it., Contratto in genere, no. 240). This rule is not formulated explicitly in SLOVAK law, but the contract will be interpreted in accordance with what was negotiated either in writing or orally because of emphasis on the will of the person who did the legal act. In ESTONIAN law, the rule is expressly stated in LOA § 38, but has been previously supported by court practice on the basis of the supremacy of the intent of the parties (Supreme Court Civil Chamber's decision from 1 April 2003, civil matter no. 3-2-1-34-03). No clear conclusion on the subject can be found in CZECH law: the CC does not contain a provision similar to the present Article. So the precedence of individually negotiated terms would have to be based on the assumption that they better represent the parties' will than the not negotiated ones. In SLOVENIAN law the rule is formulated in LOA § 120(4).

II.–8:105: Reference to contract as a whole

Terms and expressions are to be interpreted in the light of the whole contract in which they appear.

COMMENTS

It is reasonable to assume that the parties meant to express themselves coherently. It is thus necessary to interpret the contract as a whole and not to isolate clauses from each other and read them out of context. It must be presumed that the terminology will be coherent; in principle, the same word or expression should not be understood to have different meanings in different parts of the same contract. The contract must be interpreted in a way that gives it basic coherence, so that the clauses do not contradict each other.

There is normally no particular hierarchy between the elements of a contract, save under special circumstances: for example, particular emphasis should be given to any definition of terms or to a preamble which could have been introduced into the contract.

This Article may also be applied to groups of contracts. For example one can treat a frame-work (master) contract and the various contracts made under it as a whole. By the "whole contract" must be understood the "whole group of contracts".

Illustration
Miss A, an inexperienced singer, is taken on for six months by B, the manager of a cabaret on the Champs-Elysées. The contract contains a clause authorising the manager to end the contract in the first three days of the singer starting work. Another clause allows either party to determine the contract on payment of a significant sum of money as a penalty. Miss A is fired after one day and claims payment of the sum. Her claim should fail because the penalty clause is to be read in the light of the clause allowing determination within three days, which is a trial period.

NOTES

1. This rule is stated in a number of texts: ITALIAN CC art. 1363; FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1161 (and also art. 1158); ESTONIAN LOA § 29(6)-(7); SPANISH CC art. 1285; UNIDROIT art. 4.4 and for the CISG see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), CISG, art. 8 no. 29. In PORTUGAL it is found in General Contract Terms Decree Law and has been extended to all contracts. It is also found in NORDIC law: Swedish Supreme Court, NJA 1990, 24; for Denmark, see Lynge Andersen, 390 ff; for CZECH law, see Supreme Court 2 Cdo 386/96. The rule is also found in ENGLISH law (Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 12-063 - 12-071 and refs. there), SCOTTISH law (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 8.17-8.21), GERMAN and AUSTRIAN law (see OGH 4 December 1985, JBl 1978, 387; cf. MünchKomm (-Busche), BGB, § 157 no. 6), and GREEK and SLOVENIAN law.
2. The illustration is inspired by French Cass.soc. 7 March 1973, B 73 V no.145.
3. This rule is stated in many texts on the theory of law and legal literature in SLOVAK law: all legal texts – laws, legal acts, contracts - have to be interpreted as a whole.

II.–8:106: Preference for interpretation which gives terms effect

An interpretation which renders the terms of the contract lawful, or effective, is to be preferred to one which would not.

COMMENTS

The parties must be treated as sensible persons who intended that their contract should be fully effective (magis ut res valeat quam pereat). Thus if a term is ambiguous and could be interpreted in one way which would make it invalid or another which would make it valid, the latter interpretation should prevail (favor negotii).

> Illustration 1
> Architect A assigns his practice to architect B and undertakes not to exercise his profession for five years "in the region". If region is interpreted to mean the administrative region which contains several departments, the clause would be invalid as too wide. If region is interpreted in a less technical and more reasonable sense (a reasonable area) the clause will be valid and fully effective.

For identical reasons, if one of two possible interpretations would lead to an absurd result the other must be taken.

> Illustration 2
> A grants B a licence to produce pipes by a patented method. B must pay a royalty of €500 per 100 metres if annual production is less than 500,000 metres and €300 if it is over 500,000 metres. To calculate the royalties on 600,000 metres, one can interpret the clause as fixing the price at €500 per metre for the first 500,000 metres and €300 per metre for the remainder, or the rate of €300 per metre could be applied to the whole quantity. The latter interpretation is not valid because it leads to an absurd result: the royalty for a production of 600,000 m. would be less than that for 400,000 m.

NOTES

1. The rule in favour of full effect is to be found in several codes: FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1157; ITALIAN CC art. 1367; SPANISH CC art. 1284. See also indirectly PORTUGUESE CC art. 237. It is adopted by UNIDROIT art. 4.5 and under the CISG, see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), CISG, art. 8 no. 49. It is recognised by case law in GERMANY, MünchKomm (-Busche), BGB, § 157 no. 14; AUSTRIA, OGH 4 December 1985, JBl 1987, 378; ENGLAND, e.g. NV Handel Smits v. English Exporters Ltd. [1955] 2 Lloyd's Rep 317, CA; Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 12-072. IRISH and SCOTTISH (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 8.16)) law are similar. For DUTCH law see Asser-Hartkamp, Algemene leer der overeenkomsten, no. 287 sub (b) and the former CC art. 1380). For DANISH law see Lynge Andersen 442; for FINLAND, Hoppu, Handels-och förmögenhetsrätten i huvuddrag, 47; for SWEDEN, Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 178. For ESTONIAN law, see LOA § 29(8), except when the special rule for standard terms applies (see LOA § 39(2)). Only some more or less remote hints of this principle can be found in CZECH law: e.g. from the Constitutional Court's rulings in favour of constitutionally compliant interpretation of the law (e.g. Constitutional Court Pl. ÚS 5/05) may be deduced a need of legally compliant interpretation of all juridical acts (which thus as far as possible avoids invalidity of juridical acts).

2. It should be noted that for the purposes of article 7(2), collective action, of the Directive on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts of 5 April 1993 (93/13/EEC), the interpretation in favour of full effect is not applied because in this case the Article intends to strike down abusive clauses.
3. Illustration 2 is taken from Restatement of Contracts 2d, § 206, comment (c).
4. The SLOVAK CC regulates the lawfulness or effectiveness of juridical acts in various ways but this rule of interpretation does not appear in the codes. In SLOVENIAN law this rule is recognized and can be derived from LOA §§ 88-89.

II.–8:107: Linguistic discrepancies

Where a contract document is in two or more language versions none of which is stated to be authoritative, there is, in case of discrepancy between the versions, a preference for the interpretation according to the version in which the contract was originally drawn up.

COMMENTS

International contracts are sometimes drafted in more than one language and there may be divergences between the different linguistic versions. The parties may provide a solution by stating that one version is to be authoritative, in which case that version will prevail. If nothing is provided and it is not possible to eliminate the divergences by other means (e.g. by correcting obvious errors of translation in one version), the present Article gives a reasonable solution by providing that the original version is to be treated as the authoritative one, since it is likely to express best the common intention of the parties.

> Illustration
> A French business and a German business make a contract in French and in German. The contract contains an arbitration clause. The French text provides that the arbitrator "s'inspire" from the rules of the ICC, i.e. may follow them. The German version provides "er folgt", i.e. the arbitrator must follow the ICC rules. The French version was the original and this is the one which should prevail.

If the contract provides that the different versions are to be equally authoritative, the will of the parties must be respected by observing this and resorting to the general rules of interpretation. It is not possible simply to give precedence to one version. It must be decided which version corresponds better to the common intention of the parties or, if this cannot be established, what reasonable persons would understand.

It is important to read this provision along with the contra proferentem rule if the original version was drafted by one of the parties.

NOTES

1. The nearest provision to this Article is UNIDROIT art. 4.7, which deals only with discrepancies between versions which are stated to be equally authoritative. For the CISG see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), CISG, art. 8 nos. 41-43. The national laws, except for ESTONIAN law (LOA § 29(9)), do not appear to contain any rules on the points covered by the Article applying specifically to contracts.

Section 2: Interpretation of other juridical acts

II.–8:201: General rules

(1) A unilateral juridical act is to be interpreted in the way in which it could reasonably be expected to be understood by the person to whom it is addressed.

(2) If the person making the juridical act intended the act, or a term or expression used in it, to have a particular meaning, and at the time of the act the person to whom it was addressed was aware, or could reasonably be expected to have been aware, of the first person's intention, the act is to be interpreted in the way intended by the first person.

(3) The act is, however, to be interpreted according to the meaning which a reasonable person would give to it:

(a) if neither paragraph (1) nor paragraph (2) applies; or
(b) if the question arises with a person, not being the addressee or a person who by law has no better rights than the addressee, who has reasonably and in good faith relied on the contract's apparent meaning.

COMMENTS

A. General

The rules on the interpretation of contracts cannot all be applied directly to the interpretation of unilateral juridical acts. The primary rule in the interpretation of contracts refers to the common intention of the parties. That in itself introduces an element of objectivity. The "common intention" is not the same as secret uncommunicated individual intentions, even if they happen to be identical.

B. Reliance interest

Although some systems appear in principle to take a subjective approach, it seems inappropriate to interpret a unilateral juridical act according to the subjective intention of the maker. A person could not be allowed to say that he or she meant something entirely different to the ordinary meaning of the expressions used and expect this secret subjective meaning to have a legal effect on other people. So paragraph (1) lays down the general rule that a unilateral juridical act is to be interpreted in the way in which it could reasonably be expected to be understood by the person to whom it is addressed. This does not allow the subjective meaning placed on the act by the recipient to govern. That would be just as unreasonable as giving preference to the subjective intention of the maker of the act. However, it does allow account to be taken of the characteristics of the recipient. For example, a notice given by one trader to another trader in the same line of business would be interpreted as a trader in that line of business could be expected to interpret it, not as an ordinary citizen might be expected to interpret it. Paragraph (1) reflects the policy that a person receiving a communication which is intended to have legal effect is entitled to rely on its having the meaning which any recipient of the same type could reasonably be expected to place on it. The recipient is not at the mercy of the secret intentions of the sender; and the sender is not at the mercy of any unreasonable interpretation placed on the act by the recipient.

C. Recipient knows real intention of maker

Paragraph (2) of the Article is very similar to the equivalent provision for the interpretation of contracts and reflects the same policy. It clarifies a point which might have been unclear if paragraph (1) were left to apply on its own. It can be regarded as a particular application of the requirement of good faith and fair dealing. It would be contrary to good faith for a person who knows that the maker of an act attached a particular meaning to an expression, and who does nothing to indicate that this is not acceptable, to argue later that this meaning was different to the meaning which the recipient could reasonably be expected to give to the expression in other circumstances. The same applies if the recipient could reasonably be expected to know the particular meaning which the maker attached to the act or to any expression in it. In such circumstances the act is to be interpreted in the way intended by the maker.

D. Objective interpretation for all other cases

If neither paragraph (1) nor paragraph (2) applies, the act is to be interpreted according to the meaning that a reasonable person relying on the act would give to it in the circumstances. In most cases this rule will produce the same results as paragraph (1) but the rule is necessary to cover cases where there is no identifiable addressee – for example, cases of offers addressed to the public.

This rule of objective interpretation also applies in a question with any person, not being the person to whom the act was addressed, who has reasonably and in good faith relied on its apparent meaning. Again, however, the rule that an assignee has no greater rights than the assignor is preserved.

NOTES

1. The rules in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article are to the same effect as those in the UNIDROIT Principles Article 4.2.
2. In FRANCE since 1808 (Cass. Sect réun, 2 février 1808 S. Chron., Grands arrêts no. 159) interpretation of any juridical acts is not under the control of the Cour de Cassation. There is currently no general theory on unilateral juridical acts but CC arts. 1156-1164 contain some rules on the interpretation of contracts. In art. 1136 of the Catala Project, it is stated that “one must in conventions seek what is the common intention of the contracting parties, rather than adhere to the literal meaning of the words. Likewise, in a unilateral act the true intention of its author must prevail”.
3. In GERMAN law unilateral acts are interpreted according to CC §§ 133 and 157 notwithstanding that § 157, considering its wording, only applies to already concluded contracts (see MünchKomm (-Busche), BGB, § 133 nos. 10 et seq.). A distinction has to be drawn between declarations of intention (or unilateral juridical acts) which have to be acknowledged by the addressee and declarations to the public. The latter have to be interpreted according to the comprehension of an average participant or a member of the addressed group of persons (MünchKomm (-Busche), BGB, § 133 no. 11). The meaning of acts which have to be acknowledged has to be determined in the sense in which the addressee had to understand the declaration given good faith and common usage (perspective of the addressee of the declaration – “Empfängerhorizont”) (MünchKomm (-Busche), BGB, § 133 nos. 12 et seq.). The German approach to the situation covered in paragraph (2) of the present Article is not so clear cut, but following the argumentation under Comments C, German law would give the declaration the meaning intended by the party tendering the declaration.

4. In DUTCH law it follows from CC art. 3:35 that interpretation of unilateral juridical acts is to take place in conformity with the sense the person to whom it is addressed could reasonably attribute to it in the circumstances. According to CC art. 3:36 a third person who under the circumstances reasonably bases an assumption as to the creation, existence or extinction of a juridical relationship on a declaration or conduct of another, and has acted reasonably on the basis of the accuracy of that assumption, cannot have invoked against him the inaccuracy of that assumption by the other person.

5. As noted above, SLOVAK law looks, in this situation, only to the will of the person who did the unilateral juridical act.

6. The rules in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article generally correspond to the principle of objective interpretation stated in the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 75(1)-(2).

7 In DANISH law there is no general theory on unilateral juridical acts. The rules on interpretation of contracts apply to the extent they are appropriate.

8. In so far as ENGLISH law recognises other juridical acts (such as contractual notice), the courts apply the same rules of interpretation as they do for contracts. Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 5-069;12-050. See the leading case of Mannai Investments Co Ltd v. Eagle Star Life Assurance Co Ltd [1997] AC 749. This case is also regarded as a leading case in SCOTLAND. See Credential Bath Street Ltd v Ventura Investment Placement Ltd [2007] CSOH 208, quoting Lord Steyn's statement (at [1997] AC 767): "The question is not how the landlord [the sender] understood the notices. The construction of the notices must be approached objectively. The issue is how a reasonable recipient would have understood the notices." The result is that the approach taken is essentially the same as in paragraph (1) of the Article.

II.–8:202: Application of other rules by analogy

The provisions of Section 1, apart from its first Article, apply with appropriate adaptations to the interpretation of a juridical act other than a contract.

COMMENTS

Application by analogy of other rules on interpretation of contracts

The preceding Article replaces only the first Article of Section 1 on the interpretation of contracts. The other Articles of Section 1 apply with appropriate adaptations. For example, references to the parties to the contract in Section 1 might have to be read as references to the person making the juridical act and the person to whom it is addressed. The references to negotiations would not always apply to unilateral juridical acts but might do so. For example, the scope of the authority to be granted to an agent might have been the subject of negotiations even if the eventual grant of authority was done by a unilateral act of the principal.

NOTES

Application of contract rules by analogy

1. It is not uncommon for legal systems to provide that the rules on formation, validity, authority of representatives, interpretation and contents of contracts also apply with appropriate modifications to other juridical acts.
2. In AUSTRIA this result follows from the general principle of analogous application of the Civil Code, see CC § 7. In the NETHERLANDS the CC provides in art. 6:126 that the rules on contracts apply to agreements other than contracts. For unilateral acts the same rules are adopted in the legal writing, see Asser-Hartkamp, Algemene leer nos. 83 ff). FRENCH and BELGIAN law apply the rules on contracts by way of an analogy to statements and conduct indicating an intention to establish legal relationships (on Belgium: Stijns, Verbintenissenrecht I, no. 368. See also ITALIAN CC art. 1324 according to which "unless otherwise provided in the law, the rules that regulate contracts apply, to the extent compatible, to unilateral inter vivos acts having patrimonial content". See also PORTUGESE CC art. 295 and SLOVENIAN LOA § 14. In CZECH law all juridical acts (i.e. contracts as well as unilateral juridical acts) are subject to the same general interpretation rules – see CC § 35(2, 3), Ccom § 266.
3. ENGLISH law is thought to be broadly the same in so far as it recognises unilateral juridical acts as affecting contractual rights; thus a notice of withdrawal of a ship under a charterparty was treated as analogous to acceptance of an offer in Brinkibon Ltd. v. Stahag Stahl und Stahlwarenhandelsgesellschaft mbH (The Brimnes) [1983] 2 AC 34, HL.
4. Other systems have rules applying directly to juridical acts as such e.g. NORDIC Act on Contracts and other Legal Acts; GREEK CC arts. 127 ff; DUTCH CC arts. 3:32 ff; ESTONIAN GPCCA §§ 67 ff.
5. In the SLOVAK legal system there are only a few specific provisions on the interpretation of contracts. So the provisions on juridical acts are used or apply also for the interpretation of contracts.

CHAPTER 9: CONTENTS AND EFFECTS OF CONTRACTS

Section 1: Contents

II.–9:101: Terms of a contract

(1) The terms of a contract may be derived from the express or tacit agreement of the parties, from rules of law or from practices established between the parties or usages.

(2) Where it is necessary to provide for a matter which the parties have not foreseen or provided for, a court may imply an additional term, having regard in particular to:

(a) the nature and purpose of the contract;
(b) the circumstances in which the contract was concluded; and
(c) the requirements of good faith and fair dealing.

(3) Any term implied under paragraph (2) should, where possible, be such as to give effect to what the parties, had they provided for the matter, would probably have agreed.

(4) Paragraph (2) does not apply if the parties have deliberately left a matter unprovided for, accepting the consequences of so doing.

COMMENTS

A. Sources of contract terms

The terms of a contract are not only those expressly agreed by the parties. They may also include terms only tacitly agreed by the parties, terms supplied by law and terms supplied by usages or practices. In most cases those sources will supply all the terms necessary. Exceptionally, however, even those terms may leave a gap caused by some unforeseen contingency which has not been provided for. Paragraph (2) enables a court to imply an additional term in such exceptional circumstances, having regard in particular to the nature and purpose of the contract, the circumstances in which it was entered into and the requirements of good faith and fair dealing. Such implied terms may impose additional obligations but they need not be limited to the imposition of additional obligations. They may, for example, affect the circumstances or manner in which existing obligations have to be performed in unforeseen circumstances.

B. Express agreement of the parties

This is the most obvious and normal source of the terms of a contract, particularly in the case of more formal contracts. The terms need not all be recited or set out at length. They may be imported by reference to other terms such as, for example, standard terms drawn up by trade associations or similar bodies.

C. Tacit agreement of the parties

There are many everyday contracts where expressly agreed terms are of a minimal nature and where a great deal depends on tacit agreement. For example, in a contract for the purchase of a newspaper from a newsagent only the name of the newspaper may be spoken but there will normally be a tacit agreement that the newspaper to be supplied will be the current edition and not yesterday's or last week's and that the price payable will be the price marked on it. In a contract with a licensed taxi driver the only express term may be the destination but there will normally be a tacit agreement that the driver will follow a more or less direct route to the destination and that the fare payable will be that shown on the meter.

The distinction between terms based on tacit agreement and terms implied by a court under paragraph (2) is that there is nothing exceptional about the first category. Indeed the reverse is true. The matters which any reasonable observer would say had been tacitly agreed will be matters which are so ordinary and so obvious that they are simply taken for granted.

There are no restrictions on the ascertainment of what the parties tacitly agreed. In deciding what may be held as tacitly agreed regard may be had to any relevant circumstances. II.–8.102 (Relevant matters) on matters relevant to the interpretation of contracts may provide some guidance here. The factors mentioned there include – the circumstances in which the contract was concluded; the conduct of the parties, even subsequent to the conclusion of the contract; the nature and purpose of the contract; the practices the parties have established between themselves (which may, however, also bind the parties directly, as noted below); usages; and good faith and fair dealing. There is an overlap between the ascertainment of tacit agreement and the interpretation of expressions used in concluding the contract and also with the effect of usages or practices, but there are cases where the tacit agreement route will be the most obvious way to a conclusion. It can be difficult or artificial, for example, to use the interpretation route if no words or other expressions are used by the parties. And there are cases where tacit agreement is so obvious that it is unnecessary to investigate the question of usages or practices.

D. Terms derived from other legal rules

Several of the provisions in these rules help to determine the terms of the contract where matters are not fully regulated by express terms or by usages or practices. Some of these deal with specific types of contract. Others, however, deal with general issues which do not depend on the nature of the contract and which may arise in many types of contract: e.g. the price, the quality of what is to be supplied or provided under the contract and what is to happen if an agreed mechanism for determining the price or some other term fails. It is not only the present rules which may supply a term in the absence of express regulation in the contract. There may be national or other laws which apply to the contract and which supply a term or terms.

E. Usages and practices

These are an important source of implied terms in their own right, quite apart from their role in ascertaining the tacit agreement of the parties. It will be remembered that Article II.–1:104 (Usages and practices) provides that:

> (1) The parties to a contract are bound by any usage to which they have agreed and by any practice they have established between themselves.
>
> (2) The parties are bound by a usage which would be considered generally applicable by persons in the same situation as the parties, except where the application of such usage would be unreasonable.

F. Filling gaps

Even when all the possible sources of terms listed in paragraph (1) are taken into account there may be cases where there is an obvious gap in the contract. There may be some matter which the parties simply did not foresee or provide for and where it would be unrealistic to assert that there was any tacit agreement. There may simply have been no agreement at all on the matter, express or tacit, and there may be no rule of law, usage or practice to provide a solution. In such circumstances paragraph (2) allows a court to imply an additional term, having regard in particular to the nature and purpose of the contract, the circumstances in which it was concluded and the requirements of good faith and fair dealing. The additional term need not be an independent term: it may be a term which is dependent on, and adjusts the effect of, an existing term. The reference to the court does not, of course, mean that the parties have to resort to litigation to resolve every unforeseen contingency. It is always open to them to modify or supplement the terms of their contract by agreement.

G. Exceptional nature of the power

Because of the danger of giving courts too much power to rewrite contracts according to their own ideas of what the parties should have provided, paragraph (2) limits this power to cases where it is necessary to provide for a matter which was not foreseen or provided for by the parties. The word "necessary" serves two functions. First it makes it clear that the power under paragraph (2) cannot be exercised if the matter is already regulated by a term derived from any of the sources mentioned in paragraph (1). Secondly, it indicates that the court should not exercise its power merely to "improve" the operation of the contract. It will be for the court to decide whether an additional term is necessary, having regard in particular to the factors mentioned in paragraph (2). One criterion will be whether the contract would be workable without the term but that is not an exclusive criterion. There may be cases where the contract as a whole would be workable after a fashion without the additional term but where some particular aspect of it is unregulated and where the lack of regulation causes an obvious problem or gross distortion in the balance of the contract.

The extent to which gaps in the parties' agreed terms are likely to be already filled by rules of law, usages or practices, and the fact that the parties can always agree to modify or supplement the terms of their contract, means that resort to paragraph (2) is likely to be unusual. This can be illustrated by the sort of fact situation which occurred in the classic English case on implied terms (The Moorcock (1899) 14 P.D. 64).

> Illustration
> A ship-owner contracted to unload the ship alongside a wharf in the Thames, where at low tide the ship will rest on the river-bed. The state of the river-bed was unknown to the ship-owner. In fact there was a ridge of rock across it which damaged the ship. The wharfinger was held to be under an implied obligation to warn the ship-owner of the danger.

Under these rules a more direct route to the same result is provided by the Article on the obligation to co-operate to give effect to the contract. There would be no need to resort to the exceptional power to imply an additional term in order to impose such an obligation. It should also be noted that the rules on service contracts provide expressly for certain obligations to inform.

H. The nature and purpose of the contract

The reference to the nature and purpose of the contract allows consideration to be given to how the contract can best be carried out if there are gaps in the terms agreed by the parties or supplied by the law or by usages and practices. Considerable guidance may be obtained by looking at terms usually contained in similar contracts, or laid down in international conventions dealing with analogous contracts.

I. The circumstances in which the contract was concluded

The circumstances in which the contract was concluded, including the negotiations, may provide a good indication of what the parties would probably have agreed had they foreseen and provided for the contingency which has arisen.

J. Good faith and fair dealing

The reference to the requirements of good faith and fair dealing allows a court, in exercising its limited gap-filling function under paragraph (2), to look in an objective fashion at what good faith and fair dealing would require. If the matter which has not been provided for would pose an unacceptable risk for one party unless a term is implied to give that party some protection, a suitable term may be implied.

K. The probable intention of the parties

Paragraph (3) provides that any term implied under paragraph (2) should, where possible, be such as the parties, had they provided for the matter, would probably have agreed. In some cases there may be evidence which would enable the probable agreement of the parties to be determined with some confidence. For example, the parties may have consistently rejected one type of solution and consistently opted for another type of solution in relation to a range of foreseen problems. In such circumstances it might be reasonable to conclude that they would probably have applied the same approach to an unforeseen problem. In other cases the assessment of what the parties would probably have agreed will have to be based on more general considerations. For example, it would usually be justifiable to assume that the parties would have wished the contract to be carried out in a way which is fair, reasonable and practicable. The words “where possible” are inserted to provide for the situation where it is not possible to reach any conclusion about what the parties would probably have agreed within a range of fair, reasonable and practicable solutions but where it is still necessary to imply an additional term to give effect to the contract.

L. Matter deliberately left unprovided for Paragraph (4) deals with the situation where the parties have foreseen a contingency and have deliberately left it unprovided for, accepting the risks and consequences of so doing. The principle of autonomy of the parties means that it must be open to the parties to do this if they wish. This situation falls to be contrasted with the situation where the parties foresee a situation but either think it will not materialise or “forget” to regulate it, without intending to accept the risks.

NOTES

I. General

1. The topics dealt with in the different paragraphs of this Article are not always kept separate in the national systems but the results reached are generally similar.

2. The AUSTRIAN CC § 863(1) expressly recognises that a party's intention may be declared not only expressly by words and standardised signs but also tacitly by acts which, having regard to all the circumstances, clearly reveal an intention. Para. 2 substantiates this by saying that whether a term forms part of an agreement on this basis must be scrutinised by taking "[t]he practices and usages established in such transactions" into consideration. A term will be regarded as tacitly agreed upon only if there is no doubt at all about the significance of the relevant act or omission (see e.g. OGH 21 December 1987, MietSlg 39.008; 6 October 2000, wobl 2002/69). SLOVENIAN law is to the same effect.

3. The DUTCH CC, art. 6:248(1) is similar in that it provides that a contract has not only the juridical effects agreed to by the parties, which includes tacit agreement, but also those which, according to the nature of the contract, result from the law and usage. In so far as this article also mentions the juridical effects resulting from the requirements of reasonableness and equity, it differs from the commented Article from a theoretical point of view, since these effects are according to Dutch law supposed to operate ex jure, whereas the commented Article requires a decision of a court.

4. PORTUGUESE law reaches a result similar to that of the Article by the application of the general principles on tacit declarations, interpretation and the filling of contractual gaps, and the execution of obligations in good faith (Pinto, Declaraçâo tácita 138). In SPANISH law, CC art. 1258 provides that contractual duties can also arise even if they have not been agreed expressly; so long as they are in accordance with usage and practice, the law and good faith. Even in ENGLAND, it is recognised that "[t]erms implied by law are, in truth, simply duties prima facie arising out of certain types of contracts, or, as it has been put, 'legal incidents of those kinds of contractual relationship'" (Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 6-042, quoting Mears v. Safecar Securities Ltd. [1983] QB 54, 78, CA)

5. The FRENCH, LUXEMBOURG and BELGIAN CCs arts. 1135 provide that "the obligations under a contract extend not only to what is expressly stipulated, but also to everything which by law, equity or custom must follow from the nature of the particular contract". See on French law Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 453. On the basis of CC art. 1135 french judges have implied certain terms such as an obligation of security and an information obligation. On Belgian law: Cass. 22 June 1978, RW 1978-79, 1443 (duty derived from the requirements of good faith); Stijns-Van Gerven-Wéry, JT 1996, p. 702, no. 35; Vermander, "De interpretatie en aanvulling" (2005), 21. The same provision is set forth by the ITALIAN CC art. 1374: "A contract binds the parties not only as to what it expressly provides, but also to all the consequences deriving from it by law or, in its absence, according to usage and equity". (Gazzoni 772; Roppo Il contratto, 455-456). For law intended as including also regulations see Cass. I, 29-9-2004, no. 19531.

6. The rules in the Article are in accordance with SWEDISH law, see Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt II[4], 32 ff. SCOTTISH law is also to the same effect, see Stair, The Laws of Scotland XV, paras. 711-717; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 9. The rules are also in accordance with DANISH law, see Bryde Andersen, Grundlæggende aftaleret, 2nd ed., 2002, p. 320, Lynge Andersen and Madsen, Aftaler og Mellemmænd, 5th ed, 2006, p. 374. The same is true in FINNISH law, see Hemmo, Sopimusoikeuden oppikirja, 315 ff.

7. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 216(1) the idea of tacit agreement is accepted. A contract need not be concluded in writing, unless otherwise provided by legal regulation. The intention to conclude a contract can be expressed by conduct which implies such intention.

II. Filling gaps

8. The phrase "implied terms" derives from ENGLISH law and refers to the process by which the courts supply terms to fill lacunae in the contract. The approach of Article 9:101 is in accordance with the ENGLISH law except that (1) the latter does not normally refer to good faith and fair dealing; and (2) the English courts are reluctant to imply terms into a contract. This is particularly the case when the term is an unusual one (a term to be 'implied in fact') which would not be applicable to the general run of contracts of that type. Then the term will be implied only if it is necessary to give the contract business efficacy or is so obvious that it goes without saying. In the case of terms of a more general nature (terms to be 'implied in law') it has sometimes been said that the test is again one of necessity (e.g. Lord Wilberforce in Liverpool CC v. Irwin [1977] AC 229, HL; other judges have taken a less restrictive approach, e.g. Lord Denning M.R. in Shell UK Ltd. v. Lostock Garage Ltd. [1976] 1 WLR 1187, CA.See Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 6-042; Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 13-003–13-004 and, for illustrative cases, The Moorcock (1889) 14 PD 64; Thake v. Maurice [1986] QB 644, CA; and Young & Marten Ltd. v. McManus Childs Ltd. [1969] 1 AC 454, HL

9. The GERMAN courts use the term "constructive interpretation". "Where the parties have omitted to say something", the judge must "discover and take into account what, in the light of the whole purpose of the contract, they would have said if they had regulated the point in question, acting pursuant to the requirements of good faith and sound business practice", see BGH 18 December 1954, BGHZ 16, 71, 76. For ITALIAN law see CC art. 1367, regulating preservation of contract. In AUSTRIA this method is also applied with the interpretation of the agreement (ergänzende Vertragsauslegung, complementary interpretation) where also the parties' hypothetical intention is scrutinised. Practices and usages as well as good faith and fair dealing are also taken into consideration (see Rummel (-Rummel), ABGB I[3], nos. 11 et seq.).

10. The FRENCH courts have also resorted to "constructive interpretation" by referring to CC art. 1135 (see note 4 above).

11. The SLOVAK CC § 35 provides expressly that the expression of will may be done by acting or omitting and that it may be done explicitly or in any other way which does not cast doubt on what the participant wanted to express.

12. The ESTONIAN LOA § 23(1) generally corresponds to paragraphs (1) and (2) of the present Article.

13. In DANISH law the court may under special circumstances imply an additional term to the contract according to § 36 of the Contracts Act.

14. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 206(4) if the parties' agreement fails to provide for an issue of minor importance, and if this issue is not addressed by any legal regulation or other statutory provision, the court may, with due regard to the purpose and contents of the contract, supplement the contract terms on the basis of standard measures.

15. See generally Kötz, European Contract Law I,117-120.

II.–9:102: Certain pre-contractual statements regarded as contract terms

(1) A statement made by one party before a contract is concluded is regarded as a term of the contract if the other party reasonably understood it as being made on the basis that it would form part of the contract terms if a contract were concluded. In assessing whether the other party was reasonable in understanding the statement in that way account may be taken of:

(a) the apparent importance of the statement to the other party;

(b) whether the party was making the statement in the course of business; and

(c) the relative expertise of the parties.

(2) If one of the parties to a contract is a business and before the contract is concluded makes a statement, either to the other party or publicly, about the specific characteristics of what is to be supplied by that business under the contract, the statement is regarded as a term of the contract unless:

(a) the other party was aware when the contract was concluded, or could reasonably be expected to have been so aware, that the statement was incorrect or could not otherwise be relied on as such a term; or

(b) the other party's decision to conclude the contract was not influenced by the statement.

(3) For the purposes of paragraph (2), a statement made by a person engaged in advertising or marketing on behalf of the business is treated as being made by the business.

(4) Where the other party is a consumer then, for the purposes of paragraph (2), a public statement made by or on behalf of a producer or other person in earlier links of the business chain between the producer and the consumer is treated as being made by the business unless the business, at the time of conclusion of the contract, did not know and could not reasonably be expected to have known of it.

(5) In the circumstances covered by paragraph (4) a business which at the time of conclusion of the contract did not know and could not reasonably be expected to have known that the statement was incorrect has a right to be indemnified by the person making the statement for any liability incurred as a result of that paragraph.

(6) In relations between a business and a consumer the parties may not, to the detriment of the consumer, exclude the application of this Article or derogate from or vary its effects.

COMMENTS

A. Certain pre-contractual statements may become part of contract

Paragraph (1) reiterates the rule that certain statements made before the time of conclusion of the contract may become part of the contract even though not expressed as terms of the contract. Whether or not this is the case is dependent upon the circumstances and the reasonable expectations of the party to whom the statements are made. The paragraph enumerates some circumstances which may be particularly relevant.

Even without this paragraph the same results could often be reached by relying on the rules on unilateral promises and the interpretation of offers and other juridical acts. Also relevant would be rules on the reasonable expectations of the parties to contracts such as sales contracts. However, the rule provides a focussed way of achieving reasonable results in a common type of situation.

A misrepresentation by a party may also give rise to a right to avoidance on the grounds of a mistake or to a right to damages for incorrect information. The fact that there are overlapping remedies does not matter. The other party may choose between remedies.

B. Special rules for professional suppliers

The rule in paragraph (2) relates only to statements by a professional supplier about the specific characteristics of what is to be supplied under the contract. Very often the statements will relate to the quality or use of goods or services but the paragraph is deliberately expressed in wide terms so as to catch whatever might be supplied under the contract. The statements may be made to the other party or publicly (e.g. in advertisements or in the course of marketing). They must be made before the contract is concluded.

Under the rule in paragraph (2) any such statement by a supplier becomes part of the contract unless one of the exceptions applies. If information given in the statement is incorrect or if an undertaking given in the statement is broken, the other party may resort to the normal remedies for non-performance of a contractual obligation.

The first exception applies if the other party to the contract was aware when the contract was concluded, or could reasonably be expected to have been so aware, that the statement was incorrect or could not otherwise be relied on as such a term. This would cover, for example, the situation where a misleading advertising statement had been publicly corrected before the contract was concluded. It would also prevent parties from creating contractual obligations out of mere advertising "puff", or obviously outdated statements, or very vague and general statements, or statements qualified by a warning that special terms might apply.

The second exception applies if the other party's decision to conclude the contract was not influenced by the statement. This is essential in order to introduce a causal connection between the statement and the decision to conclude the contract.

C. Liability for others

Paragraph (3) extends the liability of a professional supplier to statements made by a person advertising or marketing the services or property for the professional supplier. This goes beyond those acting as agents for the supplier and extends to independent contractors supplying services to the supplier.

D. Extended liability for others in consumer contracts

The rule in paragraph (4) applies only to contracts between professional suppliers and consumers. It extends the liability of a supplier under paragraph (2) to public statements made by a producer, professional distributor or other person in the business chain between producer and consumer. The Article goes somewhat beyond what is currently found in the laws of most Member States but the policy is similar to that underlying Article 2(2)(d) of the Consumer Sales Directive of 25 May 1999 (Directive 99/44/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council) which provides that any public statements on the specific characteristics of the goods made about them by the seller "the producer or his representative, particularly in advertising or labelling" can be taken into account in deciding whether consumer goods are in conformity with the sale contract.

The provision in paragraph (4) is confined to consumer contracts because in the case of contracts between professionals it is expected that the purchaser of the goods or services who wishes to rely on statements made by such third parties will ask the supplier if responsibility is accepted for the statements.

Statements made by producers, distributors or other persons in the business chain are such as is supplied in advertisements, in the press or in advertising matters distributed by manufacturers or wholesale dealers.

The rule in paragraph (4) applies even though the supplier has not invoked the statement, or referred to it, when marketing the goods or services or when making the contract.

Paragraph (4) does not apply if, at the time of conclusion of the contract, the supplier did not know and could not reasonably be expected to have known of the statement.

> Illustration
> Before buying type Z fibreboard from S, B asks the manufacturer M whether the fibreboard, which B intends to use in the construction of a building, is fireproof. M by an error transmits the information on fibreboard T which is fireproof. S, who knows nothing of the information given to B, is not responsible for the error.

E. Right of indemnity

It could be harsh to fix a supplier with liability for incorrect statements made by others, such as manufacturers further up the business chain, if the supplier did not know and had no reason to suppose that the statements were incorrect. While it may be justifiable to give the consumer a remedy against the supplier, there is no reason why the supplier should bear any resulting loss in a question with the person who has actually made the incorrect statement. Accordingly paragraph (5) gives a right of indemnity in such circumstances.

The policy underlying this rule may be compared with the policy underlying Article 4 of the Consumer Sales Directive of 25 May 1999 (Directive 99/44/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council) which provides that:

> "Where the final seller is liable to the consumer because of a lack of conformity resulting from an act or omission by the producer, a previous seller in the same chain of contracts or any other intermediary, the final seller shall be entitled to pursue remedies against the person or persons liable in the contractual chain. The person or persons liable against whom the final seller may pursue remedies, together with the relevant actions and conditions of exercise, shall be determined by national law."

F. Merger clauses

The effect of this Article could be displaced by a merger clause stating that the terms of a contract were to be found exclusively in the contract document.

NOTES

I. Statements become part of the contract

1. The rule in paragraph (1) is part of the common core of the legal systems of the Union, see for example CISG art. 8(3) and for GERMANY, Larenz and Wolf, Allgemeiner Teil des deutschen Bürgerlichen Rechts[8], pp. 520 f, and for FRANCE Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], nos. 187-189; also Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], nos. 462-463. It is also in accordance with DANISH law, see Lynge Andersen 396 f. The legislation of the last decades imposing penal sanctions for misleading marketing has made civil liability for marketing information more stringent; statements made by a party as marketing information will now more often than before become contractual undertakings – see Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 117 and the decision of the Supreme Court in Ugeskrift for Retsvaesen 1984, 384. For AUSTRIA see CC § 914: the contract also has to be seen in the light of reliable statements made in the pre-contractual stage (see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB IV[3], § 914 no. 180).

2. In ENGLISH law, a statement made by one party, if it is a statement of fact, may amount to a representation. If it is not correct, there will then be a remedy for misrepresentation (avoidance and damages if there was fault. However, a statement may also amount to a contractual undertaking that what is stated is true. The question is one of the intention of the party (Heilbut Symons & Co. v. Buckleton [1913] AC 30, HL), but this is judged objectively, as the other party should reasonably understand the statement. In practice, the courts look at whether the statement was particularly important (e.g. Bannerman v. White (1861) 10 CBns 844); whether the person speaking was expert in relation to the other party or vice versa (see Oscar Chess Ltd. v. Williams [1975] 1 WLR 370, CA and Dick Bentley Productions Ltd. v. Harold Smith Motors Ltd. [1965] 2 AllER 65, CA; and similar factors, see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], para. 9-042–9-049; Chitty on Contracts I[27], no. 12-003. SCOTTISH law is broadly similar, see SME, vol. 15 §§ 698-701; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 5.45-5.55.

3. PORTUGUESE law also looks to the intention of the parties to determine the existence and content of contractual declarations, P.M.Pinto, Declaracão tácita these are judged by the reasonable understanding of the recipient, Almeida 177 ff.

4. As to Italian law, lacking a general provision concerning pre-contractual statements as part of the contract, reference should be made to the more general provision of good faith and fair dealing during negotiation and formation of the contract (art. 1337) under which scholars regulate liability for incorrect information (Roppo Il contratto, 179). However, as to consumer protection, see the Consumer Code (d.lgs. 6-9-2005, no. 206). CZECH law is similar: a party's pre-contractual statements constitute a part of the contract if it can be deduced (by the help of the interpretation rules) that there has been a common intention to make such statements a part of the contract. Otherwise the statements do not fall within the contractual terms, but if they prove to be false there may be liability for damages or defects (see e.g. Supreme Court 29 Cdo 2228/2000).

5. In FRENCH law, the case law provides that advertising documents which have been given by a professional to the other party at the time of conclusion of the contract are included as part of the content of the contract (Le Tourneur, no. 3713; Cass.civ. 3è, 17 juillet 1997: Bull.civ. III, no. 174).

6. In SLOVENIAN law a statement of intention may be made expressly, by signs or by any conduct that reliably reveals intention, see LOA § 18(1). As to the implied term about the quality of goods in a sales contract, see LOA § 459(1) and (3) and Appellate Court Ljubljana No. I Cp 2087/98, 6. Oct. 1999.

II. Advertising by manufacturers and producers

7. A rule similar to paragraph (2) covering warranties by the seller is found in the U.S., UCC Article 2-313. FINNISH and SWEDISH Sale of Goods Acts, §18 provides:

   (1) Goods are to be considered defective if they do not conform with information about their quality or use which the seller has supplied before the conclusion of the contract and which must be presumed to have influenced the buyer when making the purchase.

   (2) Goods are to be considered defective if they do not conform with information about their quality or use supplied by other persons than the seller in earlier links of the sales chain or on account of the seller when marketing the goods, and which must be presumed to have influenced the buyer when making the purchase. There is, however, no defect if the seller did not know or ought not to have known of the said information.

   (3) The rules in paragraph (1) and (2) do not apply if the information has been corrected in time and in clear terms.

8. A similar provision is also found in the chapters on consumer sales in the Nordic Countries. In the DANISH Sale of Goods Act, this rule is given only for consumer contracts, see § 76(2), but Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 118 assumes that the rule also applies to business- to- business sales of goods and supply of services. For SLOVENIAN law, see ConsProtA art. 37.

9. A rule similar to para. (3) is found in DUTCH CC, art. 7:18, where it only applies to protect the consumer (and only in the case of sale of goods); and in the PORTUGUESE Law 24/96 of 31 July 1996, art. 7, No. 6. In AUSTRIA the law of malperformance takes publicly made statements of the supplier as well as the producer into consideration, see CC § 92(2). If a good supplied is not in conformity with such statements, the other party is given a choice of remedies. This provision does not distinguish between consumer contracts and others. However, in cases with consumer participation the rule is of mandatory character (see ConsProtA § 9(1). GERMANY provides the same rule in CC § 434(1) sent. 3 for sales contracts, but a similar rule applies to other contracts as well, BGH 25 October 2007, NJW-RR 2008, 258.).

10. Under art. 24(3) of the BELGIAN Trade Practices and ConsProtA of 14 July 1991, contracts may be interpreted in the light of the factual elements contained in advertisements (including the qualities and use of the products offered).

11. Other laws do not have similar provisions; but in some, doctrine has developed a similar approach, particularly as a way of protecting consumers against misleading advertising, treating what was said in the advertisement as part of the contract. See for SPAIN, Lasarte, RPD (1980) 50 ff; Font Galán, CDC (1988) 7 ff. In ENGLISH law there is no direct equivalent to the present Article but, as stated earlier, (see note 2), a statement by a party who is relatively expert (e.g. a professional supplier) is likely to be treated as a term of the contract. English law does not recognise the rule in paragraph (3) except in consumer sales, where new sections 14(2D) – (2F) of Sale of Goods Act 1979 (inserted to implement directive 1999/44) are to similar effect. (See also Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973 s. 10 (2D) – (2E) (hire purchase) and Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 4 (2B) –(2D) (other contracts for the supply of goods). There is no equivalent to the Article in non-consumer contracts; the seller or supplier will not be liable for the statement made in advertising by another party unless the seller or supplier expressly or implicitly adopted the statement.

12. In CZECH law the supplier's statements, as such, are not regarded as contractual terms. Nevertheless they may be a cause for the supplier's liability for defects (see CC §§ 597(2) and 616, § 3(b) of the ConsProtA, or Supreme Court 29 Cdo 2228/2000).

13. See generally: SWEDISH Regeringens Proposition 87-90; McGregor, Contract Code §103; Asser-Hijma No. 341.

14. Only a general rule on preliminary negotiations is given in the SLOVAK Ccom § 266(3) which refers to "all circumstances, which are associated with the manifestation of will, including the negotiations about the contract etc". There are also some provisions protecting consumers against misleading advertising.

15. In POLISH law there is no regulation corresponding directly to the rule in the present Article, the general rules of CC arts. 60 and 65 remaining relevant. According to these regulations, a declaration of will can be expressed in any conduct revealing the party's will in a sufficiently clear manner (CC art. 60); it should be interpreted in the light of the circumstances in which it was made (CC art. 65 para. (1)). In contracts the aim of the contract should prevail over the literal expression (CC art. 65 para. (2)). However, in relations between consumers and professional suppliers, the Act on Sale of Goods to Consumers imposes further duties on the professional supplier (art. 3), who has to provide complete information on the object of the contract. Any non-compliance may give rise to claims, according to art. 4-12 of the Act.

16. The ESTONIAN LOA §§ 217(2) 6), 217(3) for sales and LOA § 641(5) for contracts for services provide a rule similar to paragraphs (2) and (3) of the present Article. However, the applicability of those provisions is restricted to consumer contracts.

II.–9:103: Terms not individually negotiated

(1) Terms supplied by one party and not individually negotiated may be invoked against the other party only if the other party was aware of them, or if the party supplying the terms took reasonable steps to draw the other party's attention to them, before or when the contract was concluded.

(2) If a contract is to be concluded by electronic means, the party supplying any terms which have not been individually negotiated may invoke them against the other party only if they are made available to the other party in textual form.

(3) For the purposes of this Article

(a) "not individually negotiated" has the meaning given by II.–1:110 (Terms "not individually negotiated); and

(b) terms are not sufficiently brought to the other party's attention by a mere reference to them in a contract document, even if that party signs the document.

COMMENTS

A. General purpose

The Article is not phrased as a comprehensive rule on the incorporation of non-negotiated terms into a contract. Instead, it is intended to supplement the rules governing the formation of contracts. It is applicable in addition to these general rules. Thus, consent of both parties, as defined in II.–4:101 (Requirements for the conclusion of a contract) and II.–4:103 (Sufficient agreement), is necessary to include non-negotiated terms into a contract in all cases. Consequently, the provisions on the formation of contracts in Book II, Chapter 4 apply in addition to this Article.

Based on the rules on formation of contracts, it could be sufficient for the incorporation of non-negotiated terms that the parties merely refer to these terms in their contract document or in the offer, e.g. if the offer refers to the standard terms of the offeror and the other side accepts this reference without asking to see the terms. Thus, without the provision at hand, the other party could be bound by terms without having had the opportunity to take notice of their content. The purpose of the general rule in paragraph (1) is to require the supplier to take reasonable steps to draw the other party's attention to the terms. It is then the other party's responsibility to take actual notice of the terms. In particular if the other party is a business, it can expected to take the trouble to become acquainted with the terms as far as necessary once the terms have been drawn to its attention.

B. Meaning of "terms not individually negotiated"

Paragraph (3)(a) refers to the definition in II.–1:110 (Terms "not individually negotiated") Thus, a term supplied by one party (the supplier) is not individually negotiated if the other party has not been able to influence its content, in particular because it has been drafted in advance, whether or not as part of standard terms. The main field of application are standard terms, which are, according to the definition in Annex 1, terms which have been formulated in advance for several transactions involving different parties, and which have not been individually negotiated by the parties.

C. Before or at the time of conclusion

Non-negotiated terms must be brought to the attention of the other party when, or before, the contract is concluded. This requirement is met if the terms are attached to the offer or to the contract form used. Standard terms sent with a supplier's acceptance of the customer's offer may be treated as a modified acceptance under II.–4:208 (Modified acceptance). Terms which the seller sends with the goods the buyer has ordered may be considered as accepted by the buyer when the buyer accepts the goods. However, terms sent with a supplier's bill which the customer receives after having received the performance will not bind the customer.

D. Reasonable steps

If the other party is unaware of the terms, the supplier has to take reasonable steps to draw the other party's attention to them. This requirement is met if the supplier has communicated the terms to the other party and has taken steps which, under normal circumstances, are sufficient to let the other party know that there are non-negotiated terms and where to find them. Usually, it will be sufficient:

- if the terms are part of the document signed by the parties,

- if the terms are reprinted on the reverse side of an offer with the offer referring to them,

- if they are attached to an offer or a contract document with the offer or contract referring to them, or

- if they are communicated to the other party and if the contract or the declarations forming the contract refer to them so that it is sufficiently clear that the terms should be incorporated.

Paragraph (3)(b) is a clarification of paragraph (1). It makes clear that a mere reference to terms in the contract document by the supplier, even if the document is signed by the other party, is not sufficient to draw the other party's attention to these terms. Whilst a mere reference to certain terms may be sufficient to draw the attention to the fact that those terms exist, such a reference cannot draw any attention to the terms themselves. This may be different if the other party knew of the terms beforehand – for instance, because in earlier similar contracts between the parties the supplier brought the terms to the other party's attention; then a reference to them may suffice. If the other party does not know of the terms referred to, they must be included in the document or other steps must be taken to inform this party of them.

Illustration 1
The parties sign a contract drafted by A. In bold letters above the signature line, the contract refers to A's standard terms. B signs the contract without having received the terms previously. Despite its bold print, the reference in the contract is a mere reference. The terms are not included.

Paragraph (1) applies only if the other party is unaware of the terms. It does not apply if the other side knows the terms and the supplier refers to them. This may be the case if the other party knows the terms from previous contracts or if the terms are generally known in a certain industry or by the customers of a certain industry (and the other party is such a customer).

Illustration 2
In the construction industry of a Member State, most contracts refer to certain standard terms (known as the "Construction Standard Terms"). A construction company C wishes to use these terms in a subcontract with another domestic construction company S. It is sufficient to refer to the "Construction Standard Terms" in the contract between C and S. C does not have to communicate these terms to S.

Illustration 3
The facts are as in Illustration 2; but C wishes to use the Construction Standard Terms in a contract with a foreign company F which has no experience in this Member State's market. C has to take reasonable steps pursuant to paragraph (1).

E. Waiver

A party cannot unilaterally meet the requirement of bringing standard terms to the attention of the contracting partner by a term in its offer or at a notice board in its premises. However, before or after the conclusion of the contract, the other party may waive the right to be informed of the terms, and such a waiver can be implied when under the circumstances it would not be reasonable to require such information.

Illustration 4
On Friday A sends an advertisement to B, a newspaper, asking B to publish it on Sunday. B receives A's letter on Saturday. It cannot be required to inform A about its general conditions regarding advertising before it publishes the advertisement in the paper.

According to the rationale of the present Article, a waiver included in non-negotiated terms of the party supplying the terms is not sufficient.

F. Usage

It may follow from a usage that terms which have not been individually negotiated may be binding upon a party who did not know of them. Thus, in a particular trade, terms which have been published by the association of suppliers as the terms which its members will apply, may be binding upon customers without further steps by suppliers who are members of the association. Such usages may even bind foreign customers, cf. II.– 1:104 (Usages and practices).

G. Effects

Terms which have been duly brought to the attention of a party will become part of the contract. If a party has not taken appropriate steps to bring the terms to the other party's attention the contract is treated as having been made without the terms, if the other party wishes this result. It should be noted that the rules on non-negotiated terms clearly distinguish between the incorporation of such terms into the contract (which is dealt with in the present Article) and their fairness. Terms may be incorporated into a contract and may nevertheless be not binding on the party who did not supply them according to II.–9:408 (Effects of unfair terms). If, on the other hand, the terms are not part of the contract under the present Article, the question of fairness does not arise.

H. Textual form required for a contract to be concluded by electronic means Paragraph (2) supplements II.–3:105 (Formation by electronic means), paragraphs (1)(e) and (2), which reflect Art. 10 paragraph (3) of the E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC. However, the Directive does not make clear which sanction for the violation of the duty to provide contract terms in electronic form applies (besides the possibility to file injunction proceedings against the supplier). Paragraph (2) of the present Article imposes on the supplier, who did not make the terms available in electronic form, the same sanction provided in paragraph (1), i.e. the terms do not become part of the contract if the other party wants this result. Following the model of the E-Commerce Directive 2000/31/EC, paragraph (2) of the present Article is not limited to consumer contracts but applies to all contracts.

Electronic means include electrical, digital, magnetic, wireless, optical, electromagnetic, or similar means, cf. I.–1:107 ("Signature" and similar expressions), paragraph (4). The terms are made available if the recipient is able to read them before the conclusion of the contract with the use of standard technical equipment. Textual form is defined under I.–1:106 ("In writing" and similar expressions), paragraph (2) and means a text which is expressed in alphabetical or other intelligible characters by means of any support that permits reading, recording of the information contained therein and its reproduction in tangible form. This includes the presentation of the terms on an internet site in a such a way that they can be downloaded, stored and printed by the other party.

I. Particular requirements for consumer contracts

The present Article does not contain stricter requirements for the incorporation of terms into consumer contracts. However, according to II.–9:407 (Factors to be taken into account in assessing unfairness), paragraph (2), it can lead to the unfairness of a term, if the consumer was not given a real opportunity to become acquainted with the term before the conclusion of the contract.

NOTES

I. In general.

1. The mere reference in the contract document to terms which were not included in the document and which the stipulator had not brought to the notice of the adhering party will generally bind the latter if the latter knew of them.

2. In ENGLAND, if a party has signed a contract document, all the terms in the document, or referred to in it, form part of the contract (L'Estrange v. F Graucob Ltd. [1934] 2 KB 394, CA) However, the degree of notice given will be highly relevant to whether the terms are unfair under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contract Regulations 1999 (S.I. 1999 No. 2083, implementing Directive 93/13) or unreasonable under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. If the terms were not in a signed document, they will not form part of the contract at all unless either reasonable notice was given of them when or before the contract was made (Parker v. South Eastern Railway Co. (1877) 2 CPD 416) or they are incorporated by a course of previous dealing (Hollier v. Rambler Motors AMC Ltd. [1972] 2 QB 71, CA) or trade understanding (British Crane Hire Corp. Ltd. v. Ipswich Plant Hire Ltd. [1975] QB 303, CA) The "red hand rule", to the effect that the stipulator must give the other party a particularly clear and perceptible notice of unusually burdensome terms, applies in ENGLAND, see Interfoto Picture Library Ltd. v. Stiletto Visual Productions Ltd. [1989] QB 433, CA, and probably also in SCOTLAND. However, unless the contract is a consumer contract governed by the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, the "red hand rule" does not apply if the party against whom the clause is invoked has signed the contract document.

3. For GERMANY a similar rule may be found in CC § 305(2) and (3), which in part is excluded for terms used against a business and for employment contracts by CC § 310(1) and (4).

4. Some laws, like the ITALIAN CC art. 1341(1), provide that standard contract terms prepared by one party are binding upon the other party if at the time of the conclusion of the contract the latter knew them or, using ordinary diligence, should have known them.

5. Other countries have general rules which protect both businesses and consumers. Under the AUSTRIAN CC § 864a, enacted in 1979, unusual terms in standard form contracts which a party uses do not become part of the contract, if considering the circumstances and the appearance of the contract document, they are disadvantageous and surprising for the other party, unless the stipulator has explicitly referred to them. LUXEMBOURG CC art. 1135-1, as amended in 1987, provides that standard contract terms which have been established in advance by one of the parties are not binding upon the other party unless the latter had the opportunity of becoming acquainted with them when concluding the contract, or must be considered to have accepted them.

6. The DUTCH CC art. 6:233(b) lays down that standard contract terms are voidable if the stipulator has not offered the other a reasonable opportunity to take notice of the general conditions. CC art. 6:235 enumerates the ways in which the stipulator gives the other party a reasonable opportunity. One way is to give the other party a copy of the terms before or at the time of the conclusion of the contract. These provisions protect consumers and smaller enterprises.

7. Under the PORTUGUESE Decree Law 446 / 85 of October 25 1985, art. 5 the stipulator is to communicate the standard contract terms in their entirety to the adhering party, and the communication is to be made in an adequate manner and at such an early stage that, taking into consideration the importance, the length and the complexity of the terms, it is possible for a person using ordinary care to acquire complete and effective knowledge of them. Under art. 6 the stipulator must also where appropriate supply all the explanations necessary for their clarification.

8. The ITALIAN CC art. 1341(2) provides that in order to be valid, certain contract terms which have been drafted in advance by one of the parties must be specifically approved in writing by the other party. This applies, inter alia, to exemption clauses, cut-off clauses, and jurisdiction and arbitration clauses.

9. In SLOVAK law, according to Ccom § 273(1) a certain part of the contents of the contract may be specified by reference to general commercial clauses which have been worked out by expert organisations or societies, or by reference to other commercial rules, which are known to the contracting parties or are attached to the contract. Some specific provisions can be found in 250/2007 Z.z. (Consumer protection act) and in 258/2001 Z.z. (Consumer credit contract act), but there is no such general provision.

10. ESTONIAN law broadly corresponds to paragraphs (1) and (3) (b) of the present Article. Pursuant to LOA § 37(1), standard terms become part of a contract only if the party supplying the terms clearly refers to them as part of the contract before entering into the contract or while entering into the contract or their existence could be presumed from the manner in which the contract was entered into and the other party has real opportunity to examine their contents. It is recognised that mere reference to standard terms in a contract document is not sufficient, unless the other party knows the terms from previous similar contracts (Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Kull), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 37, no. 4.1.1.3.) According to the ESTONIAN LOA § 62^1(5), if a contract is to be concluded through the computer network, the terms of the contract, including standard terms, must be presented to the customer in a manner which enables them to be saved and reproduced.

II. The "red hand rule"

11. In GERMANY and the NORDIC COUNTRIES the stipulator must give the other party a particularly clear and perceptible notice of unusually burdensome terms. In GERMANY, General Conditions of Business Act of 1976, § 3 protects both consumers and businesses. In the Nordic countries the rule is based on case law, see for DENMARK, Lynge Andersen 78 ff, for FINLAND, Wilhelmsson, Standardavtal 87 and for SWEDEN, Grönfors, Avtalslagen 40 f.

12. This rule, which is sometimes called the "red hand rule", applies also in ENGLAND, see Interfoto Picture Library Ltd. v. Stiletto Visual Productions Ltd. [1989] QB 433, CA, and probably also in SCOTLAND. However, unless the contract is a consumer contract, the "red hand rule" does not apply if the party against whom the clause is invoked has signed the contract document.

III. Rules covering consumers only.

13. § 2 of The GERMAN General Conditions of Business Act of 1976 requires that the stipulator makes express reference to his general conditions of business, and that the other party agrees to them, an agreement which does not need to be express and may be implied from the circumstances, see MünchKomm (-Kötz), BGB, 1816. This provision protects only consumers, see § 24 of the Act.

14. AUSTRIAN ConsProtA § 6 contains a provision similar to CC § 864a dealt with at note 5 supra.

15. Under art. 30 of the BELGIAN Act of 14 July 1991 on Commercial Practices and Information and Protection of Consumers, the supplier, acting in accordance with the requirements of good faith, must provide the consumer with correct and useful information on the characteristics of the goods or services supplied and the conditions of supply, having regard to the information needs expressed by the consumer and the use which the consumer has indicated will be made of the goods and services or which were foreseeable for the supplier (italics added).

16. The SPANISH Act of 19 July l984 on Consumers and Users art. 10(1)(a) requires the clauses, terms or stipulations generally applied by the suppliers to be written in a specific, clear and simple language which may be easily understood without resort to texts or documents not provided prior to or at the time of conclusion of the contract, and to which in all events an express reference shall be made in the contractual document.

17. The GREEK Law 2251/1994 on Consumer Protection requires that the stipulator brings the standard terms to the consumer's attention so that the consumer is able to learn their contents.

II.–9:104: Determination of price

Where the amount of the price payable under a contract cannot be determined from the terms agreed by the parties, from any other applicable rule of law or from usages or practices, the price payable is the price normally charged in comparable circumstances at the time of the conclusion of the contract or, if no such price is available, a reasonable price.

COMMENTS

A. Introduction

This Article and the Articles which follow it are intended to govern cases in which there is no doubt that the parties intended to be bound by the contract, but some element of it is not determined sufficiently precisely for it to be given effect on the basis only of what is expressed in it. The Articles create rules which can be used to "save" the contract in those cases in which it seems reasonable to do so because it is probable that the parties meant there to be a binding contract. This is in accordance with the approach taken in many Member States' laws. Others require that the price be determined or determinable from the terms of the contract.

The commonest case of a need for supplementation of the express terms is where the price is not fixed, and it is this which is covered by the present Article.

B. Requirements for rule to apply

Firstly, there must be a contract. The Article never applies if the parties have never reached agreement and therefore have not concluded a contract at all; if, for instance, during the negotiations the parties have been unable to come to any agreement over the price. Similarly, if the parties left the question open for future negotiation and when this took place they were unable to reach an accord, the court may not intervene to fix a reasonable price. However, the subsequent behaviour of the parties may show that they did intend to enter contractual relations. In this case, the rule in the Article can be applied to fill the gap.

> Illustration 1
> Construction Company A normally hires the cranes it uses for its works from Company B. The latter informs A that it is increasing its prices "to a figure to be agreed by the parties". Before any agreement on the price has been reached A orders a further crane. The crane is delivered and put into use. The contract may be considered as concluded at a normal or reasonable price.

Secondly, the contract must be of a type where a price is payable – not, for example, a contract to give something or a contract of barter.

Thirdly, the Article applies only where the price cannot be determined from the terms agreed by the parties (expressly or tacitly) or from any other rule of law (that is, other than the current rule) or from usages or practices. Usually the price will be fixed by the express terms of the contract. Quite often it will be fixed by tacit agreement. For example, there may be a price list on display. Even if nothing is expressly said about price it may be clear that the tacit agreement was that the listed price should be payable. In such cases of clear tacit agreement the present Article does not need to apply and will not apply. In a free market economy it is rare for the price to be fixed by law but this could happen. For example, there may in certain countries be a fixed price payable for prescription medicines bought by certain categories of people from pharmacists, the State making up any difference. Usages and practices established between the parties may also enable the price to be precisely determined. Where this is the case there is no need for the present Article to apply and it would be inappropriate for it to apply. For example, if it is customary for a contract with an architect to be at the scale fee established by the architects' professional association, the price is already determinable.

C. Practical applications

Notwithstanding these essential restrictions, there are many cases where the Article could apply. The Article may, for example, find application in situations of emergency.

> Illustration 2
> A helicopter carrying urgently needed medical supplies has to land after having engine trouble. The carrier telephones the helicopter manufacturer and asks for a repair engineer to be sent as soon as possible. Nothing is said about the price. The contract is valid nonetheless and is considered to be one for a reasonable price.

In some other contracts it is not the custom to ask the price in advance; or the debtor leaves it to the creditor to fix the price (e.g. when an opinion is sought from a professional person).

In yet other cases the parties may think they have agreed on the price and may perform the contract and may then discover that there was in fact no agreement.

D. The rule

Where the Article does apply, the price payable is the price normally charged in comparable circumstances. If there is no such price then a reasonable price is payable.

On what constitutes a reasonable price, see the definition of "reasonableness" in Annex I.

NOTES

I. Agreement on subject matter

1. Parties who wish to make a contract must determine its subject matter; they must agree on what is to be performed. All the laws agree on that. Several of the legal systems call this subject matter the "object" of the contract and insist that the object must be possible and lawful.

II. Price as a requirement

2. Systems also differ as to whether a price must be determined by the parties, or be determinable, in order for a contract (or certain types of contract) to be valid. The latter applies e.g. in AUSTRIA (see Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht I[13], 27 et seq.) and GERMANY (see Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht, Allgemeiner Teil[6], no. 201). In some of the systems this question is linked to the object.

3. The laws of the countries which do not apply the concept of object do not require the parties to have agreed on price. The law will decide which price is to be paid, see below. Even some of the systems which require an object will make exceptions as far as the price is concerned, see ITALIAN CC art. 1474(1) for the sale of goods (with the exception in case of immovable, see Cass. I, 23-7-2004, no. 13807), art.1657 for supply of work and materials, art.1709 for mandate, art.1733 on factorage and art. 2233 for professional services; PORTUGUESE CC art. 883 for sale of goods and art. 1211 for work and materials; SPANISH CC art. 1447 for sale of goods, arts. 1543 and 1547 for locatio conductio rei, art. 1589 for work contracts and art. 1711 for mandate; and CZECH CC § 634(1) for work contracts, § 671(1) for lease contracts, and further broadly in the Ccom (e.g. § 409(2) for commercial sale of goods). In SLOVENIAN law the object must be determined or determinable LOA § 35, but exceptions apply to commercial sales (LOA § 442), where the price is determined by law (usual seller's price, or, if non-existent, market price) or by the court (in the absence of a market price) and contract for the supply of work, see LOA § 642(2).

4. In FRENCH law, since the decisions of "l'Assemblée Plénière" on the 1st December 1995, it has been considered that, in the absence of contrary specific statutory provisions, the price of the contract can be determined during the execution of the contract according to a term which enables one party to fix the price unilaterally. Should the price that has been unilaterally fixed be improper ("abusif"), the contract can be rescinded and the party who fixed the improper price can be liable for damages. In practice, this rule regarding the fixation of the price is now applied to most contracts that are scheduled to be performed over time ("contrats à exécution successive et échelonnée") such as framework contracts ("contrats-cadre") which plan for the conclusion of "contrats d'application" (franchise contracts) and contracts of loans (Cass.com. 9 juillet 1996: JCP 1996. II. 22721). But in some cases, according to specific rules, if the price has not been agreed upon from the conclusion of the contract and if it is only ascertainable at a later date, by referring to the unilateral undertaking of one party, the contract is void. The same rule applies to sales (art. 1591) and lease (art. 1709). However, the ambit of these cases is uncertain: in some specific contracts, the price still has to be agreed upon and this is notably still the case for leases and even for sales not concluded in the context of a "contrat cadre" (framework contract); see Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[6], no. 291. In BELGIUM the object must at least be determinable (CC arts. 1129 and 1591) meaning that it can be determined by using objective elements without any new agreement of the parties (Cass. 21 Sept. 1987, Arr.Cass. 1987-88, 84 (price fixation); Cass. 21 Feb. 1991, Arr.Cass. 1990-91, 679; Cass. 20 May 1994, Arr.Cass. 1994, 507). Belgian case law has also been ready to infer a reference to the current price, though sometimes the absence of an agreed price has been taken to mean that one party may determine it unilaterally: M.E. Storme, TPR 1988, 1259, nos. 29 ff. The LUXEMBOURG courts have been exacting in exclusive supply agreements which have been held void for lack of determination (Cass. 27 Sept. 1989, No. 10470; see however, Cour 17 December 1997, 30, 105; supply agreement which made reference to the price list of the supplier was declared valid) but have been less severe as regards contracts for exclusive dealership, which were held valid (Cass. 26 Oct. 1988, No. 9804) and other framework contracts, which need not fix the terms of the contracts to be made under them (Cour d'appel (commercial), 2 October 1996, Pasicrisie 30, p. 145). SPANISH courts favour a flexible approach under CC arts. 1539 and 1711: the court may fix the price according to the market price, uses or, preferably, the specific circumstances of the contract (See TS 21 May 1983, TS 12 June 1984, TS 16 January 1985 and TS 21 October 1985). POLISH law generally requires determination of the price in a sale contract (CC art.

535), but the price can be determined indirectly, by giving a basis for its determination (CC art. 536 § 1). If it appears that the parties were thinking of the usual price in relations of a given kind, in case of doubt it is assumed that they intended the price at the place and time of delivery (CC art. 536 § 2). In a contract for work the parties also have to determine the price, although they can give only a basis for the calculation (CC art. 628 § 1). If the price has not been determined, a normal, usual price has to be applied. If this is not possible, the court should fix a price corresponding to the expenditure of work, time and money. The latter rule – a price corresponding to the expenditure – is applied also in mandate (CC art. 736 § 2).

III. What price?

5. Those States which do not require an object and those which make exceptions as far as the price is concerned have often provided in their laws that if the parties have not agreed upon the price it is the one which is usually charged: see for AUSTRIA, CC § 1152 on labour contracts and § 1054 on sales contracts; for GERMANY CC § 612(2) on labour relationships, § 632(2) on supply of work and materials, § 653(2) on representatives' commissions and Ccom § 354 for several commercial activities; for PORTUGAL and ITALY see the provisions cited above; and for the NETHERLANDS see CC arts. 7:4 on sales, 7:405(2) on mandate and 7:601(2) on deposit. Under Dutch sales law, where the price has not been determined a reasonable price may be charged. In deciding what is reasonable regard is had to the seller's customary charges. In mandate and deposit the rule is reversed: the customary price may be charged unless it is unreasonable. CZECH law employs various formulations – the most common are "usual price" (e.g. lease contracts – CC § 671(1), or commercial sale of goods – Ccom § 448(2)) and "reasonable price" (e.g. work contracts – CC § 634(1)). SLOVENIAN law also employs various formulations – "usual price" of the seller, "reasonable price" – being the market price at the time of conclusion or is determined by the court (commercial sales, LOA § 442); "fair price" (mandate, LOA § 778) and the price corresponding to the reasonable and justifiable expenditure (contract for the supply of work, LOA § 642(2).

6. Under several provisions the parties are taken to have agreed upon a price which is fair and reasonable, and this seems to have been accepted as a general principle: see GREEK CC art. 371 which applies to specific contracts as well. See also Greek CC art. 288. Under the DANISH Sale of Goods Act § 5 the price is the one charged by the seller unless it is unreasonable, and this rule applies to other contracts as well. § 45 of the FINNISH and SWEDISH Sale of Goods Acts provides that if the price is not determinable from the contract, the buyer must pay what is reasonable with regard to the nature and condition of the goods, the current price at the time of the conclusion of the contract and other circumstances; § 47 treats the buyer as accepting the price stated on the seller's invoice if it is not unfair and the buyer does not object to it within a reasonable time. See Ramberg, Köplagen, 478 et seq. A similar rule applies in consumer sales, see § 35 of the SWEDISH Consumer Sales Act and Herre, Konsumentköplagen 397 et seq. and the FINNISH ConsProtA, Chapter 5 § 23. In DANISH law the equivalent principle is found in Sale of Goods act § 5, see Lookoksy and Ulfbeck, Køb, 2nd ed., 2008. In AUSTRIAN law the parties' intention to have agreed on a reasonable price can only be assumed if there is some indication that this was what they intended: Rummel (-Aicher), ABGB I[3], § 1054 no. 10. Under GERMAN law it is for the creditor of the price to determine it, if no other rule on implied agreements upon the price applies, see CC § 316.

7. Under ENGLISH law the price to be charged in the absence of an agreement is the reasonable price, see UK Sale of Goods Act 1979, s. 8 and British Bank for Foreign Trade Ltd. v. Novinex Ltd. [1949] 1 KB 623. The position is the same in SCOTLAND; Sale of Goods Act 1979, s. 8 and Avintair Lt.d v. Ryder Airline Services Ltd. 1994 S.C. 270 and IRELAND Sale of Goods Act 1893, s. 8.

8. In POLISH law there are no general provisions concerning determination of the price. Failing a contractual clause referring to the price, a normal, usual price has to be applied according to CC art. 536 § 2 for sale, CC art. 628 § 1 for contracts for work. Further, CC art. 628 § 2 and CC art. 736 § 2 (mandate) allows the court to fix a price corresponding to the reasonable and justified expenditure.

9. In SLOVAK law some contracts require the parties to have agreed on a price as a condition of the validity of the contract. A general rule about a reasonable price does not exist, but there are some specific provisions which adopt this idea. See e.g. CC § 634, Ccom §§ 448 and 546.

10. The ESTONIAN LOA § 28(2) states the rule for determining the price similarly to the present Article. According to LOA § 28(1) contracts entered into in the course of economic or professional activities are presumed to be entered into for a price.

IV. International instruments

11. A rule similar to the one stated in the Article is to be found in Art.6 of the EC Directive on the Co-ordination of the Laws of Member States Relating to the Self-employed Representative of 18 Dec. 1986 (OJEC No. L 382/17). CISG art.14 makes a fixed or determinable price a necessary element of the offer. Where a contract is nonetheless concluded without such a price, Art. 55 makes reference to the price generally charged for similar goods, see Honnold, §§ 137.4-137.8 and 324-325. Under the Unidroit Principles art. 5.7 (1) the parties are considered to have made reference to the price generally charged for such performance in comparable circumstances in the trade concerned, and if no such price is available, to a reasonable price.

12. See generally Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative law[3], 383-386; Tallon chap. 1; Nicholas 49-50.

II.–9:105: Unilateral determination by a party

Where the price or any other contractual term is to be determined by one party and that party's determination is grossly unreasonable then, notwithstanding any provision in the contract to the contrary, a reasonable price or other term is substituted.

COMMENTS

The text first of all recognises that the parties may leave the price to be determined unilaterally by one of them. As in the majority of Member States' laws, this does not prevent the formation of a contract. However, possibly unlike under some laws, the determination must be made in a reasonable manner. If it is not, the court may intervene to protect the debtor against the creditor fixing the price abusively. Thus if a broker were to fix its commission at a grossly unreasonable level, the court could reduce it to a reasonable level.

The rule may work the other way round if it is the debtor who is to fix the price. The court could then increase an unreasonably low price.

The operation of this Article cannot be excluded by contrary agreement; any clause (which might be a standard clause) which purported to exclude the jurisdiction of the court to review a price fixed unilaterally will be of no effect.

It should be noted that, to prevent abuse of this section, the section stipulates that the price or other term fixed must be grossly unreasonable.

As to what is reasonable, see the definition in I.–1:104 (Reasonableness).

NOTES

I. Unilateral determination allowed

1. Most of the Member States allow agreements whereby a party may unilaterally determine a contractual term, and therefore also the price: see GERMAN CC §§ 315, 316; GREEK CC art. 371 (where, however, according to art. 372, if the price is to be determined by one party with absolute discretion, the contract is void); PORTUGUESE CC art. 400; ESTONIAN LOA § 26(1); DANISH Sale of Goods Act, § 5; FINNISH AND SWEDISH Sale of Goods Acts, § 45. The term must be reasonable and is subject to the court's control. The latter rule also applies to those countries where in principle a unilateral determination is not allowed (see below) but where exceptions are made, in FRENCH law, when the price can unilaterally be determined, it must not give rise to an "abuse". When the price unilaterally fixed by one party is improper ("abusif"), the court does not have the power to substitute a reasonable price. The court may only decide that the author of the improper price be liable for damages (A.P. 1995). AUSTRIAN CC § 1056 provides expressly only for determination of the price by a third party, but unilateral determination is permitted provided the price fixed is reasonable: See OGH 10 July 1991 SZ 64/92, F. Bydlinski, JBI 1975, 245; Krejci, ZAS 1983, 204; Bürge, JBI 1989, 687. In the DUTCH CC there are no provisions which expressly allow unilateral determination, but one will be set aside by the courts only if it is unreasonable and unfair, CC art. 6:248(2). The same is true for BELGIAN law: M.E. Storme, TPR 1988, 1259; FINNISH law, see Wilhelmsson, Standardavtal 147; SWEDISH law, Ramberg, Köplagen, 485. The position of POLISH law is similar. There are no provisions expressly allowing unilateral determination, but this possibility is accepted (see T. Dybowski, System Prawa Cywilnego (t. III, part 1), Ossolineum 1981, p. 98). See also Unidroit art 5.7(2). For the requirement that the unilaterally determined term must conform to the principles of good faith and reasonableness and court discretion see LOA § 26(3) and (11) in ESTONIAN law.

2. In ENGLAND May & Butcher Ltd. v. R. (1929) [1934] 2 KB 17n. contains a dictum to the effect that the price may be left to the determination of one party. However there is no authority to the effect that the determination must be reasonable, nor does any such rule exist in SCOTTISH law or IRISH law, see Tradax (Ireland) v. Irish Grain Board [1984] IR 1.

II. Unilateral determination allowed in certain cases

3. Some legal systems only admit the validity of a contract which allows the price to be fixed by one party alone only in certain circumstances. Thus SPANISH CC art. 1449 forbids unilateral determination in the sale of goods context, but the rule has been construed narrowly in order to preserve the general principle stated in art. 1256: unilateral determination is allowed if accepted later by the other party or if related to objective circumstances such as prices in reasonably competitive markets (arts. 1447 and 1448). BELGIAN law applies the same rule but with greater flexibility. In FRENCH law, the possibility of a unilateral determination of the price has become the rule since the cases decided in 1995. Nevertheless, numerous significant exceptions remain such as sale, lease or insurance. LUXEMBOURG law does not permit one party to fix prices in a sales contract, CC art. 1591, but does in a service contract. French, Belgian and Luxembourg law have long accepted judicial reduction of excessive charges by mandataires, see note 1 above. 6.

III. Unilateral determination not allowed

4. In ITALY CC arts. 1349 and 1473 allow determination by a third person; the implication is that determination by a party is not permitted. See Sacco and De Nova, Il contratto II[2], 553 ff and Gabrielli 103 ff. Notwithstanding the absence of a general discipline, provisions granting one party the power to determine partially the content of obligations may be found in supply (art. 1560(2)) and construction contracts (art. 1661). In SLOVAK law it is possible for the price to be determined by a third person. This can be agreed as a "method of determining the purchase price", but determination by a party is not permitted. See Ccom § 269(3). In SLOVENIAN law unilateral determination of price is generally not allowed see LOA § 446 (sales contract).

5. Although the subject is not clearly regulated by CZECH law, scholars are reluctant to accept any concept of unilateral determination (see Pelikánová, Commercial Code III, 86), except for cases where it is provided by the law (e.g. CC § 779 for bank deposits – interest rates unilaterally determined by the bank) or where the contract gives clear guidelines for the determination (see Štenglová (-Plíva), Commercial Code, 1366). This position is supported by Ccom § 269(3) which provides that a method of additional determination of the contents of a contract (i.e. determination made after conclusion of the contract), may not depend on the will of one of the parties alone. However, the courts take the opposite view from time to time, see e.g. Supreme Court 29 Odo 503/2001 (unilateral determination of the purchase price by the seller is acceptable). There is little experience yet when the unilateral determination is unreasonable – the case should be probably judged under the good morals clause (CC § 3(1)).

6. See generally Tallon § 2.2.1.15.

II.–9:106: Determination by a third person

(1) Where a third person is to determine the price or any other contractual term and cannot or will not do so, a court may, unless this is inconsistent with the terms of the contract, appoint another person to determine it.

(2) If a price or other term determined by a third person is grossly unreasonable, a reasonable price or term is substituted.

COMMENTS

A. Term to be fixed by court

Using a variety of forms and types of clause, it is common practice in international contracts for the price or part of it to be fixed by a third person chosen by the parties.

It may be that the price for a work of art is to be fixed by an "expert opinion". The whole or a fraction of the price may be left to be determined either as at the date of the contract or later. For example in the FIDIC Conditions for Engineering Work it is provided that the engineer will fix the price for, among other things, additional work. If the engineer does not do so, or does not do it properly, the contract is not void: the contractor is entitled to a reasonable sum.

Frequently the third person is in a contractual relationship with one of the parties, but still acts as a third person if expected to act independently (for example, the consulting engineer under the FIDIC conditions).

The purpose of the Article is to save the contract in the case where the third person chosen cannot carry out the task or refuses to do it. Of course, the parties may agree on a replacement, but it can happen that one refuses to do so in order to escape a contract which has turned out to be disadvantageous.

One solution would be to hold that the contract fails to take effect. The preferred general policy is, however, to save contracts whenever this is likely to be in accordance with the wishes of the parties. It seems better to give the court power to replace the third person. Of course, if both parties wish to terminate their contractual relationship they can do so.

The rule does not apply where this would be inconsistent with the terms of the contract. The parties may expressly or implicitly agree that the third person is to be irreplaceable, for instance when an expert is chosen for unique personal qualities. In this case, if the third person does not act, the contract falls.

B. Term fixed by third person unreasonable

If the price or other term fixed by the third person is grossly unreasonable, it seems coherent, particularly in the light of the preceding Article which allows for the revision of a price fixed unilaterally by one party, to substitute a reasonable price or term. However, taking into account that the parties in choosing valuation by a third person have taken the risk of errors, a reasonable price or term will be substituted under this Article only when the error is manifestly unreasonable, such as a clear mistake of arithmetic or a grossly wrong valuation. If the parties cannot agree on what is a reasonable price or term, this will have to be fixed by a court.

NOTES

I. Determination by third person

1. All the legal systems permit the parties to appoint a third person to determine the price or any other contract term. However, they differ as to what will happen if the third person fails to fix the price or the term.

(a) Third person replaced.

2. The solution adopted by the Article, leaving it to the court to appoint another person to determine the price or the term in all cases where the third party fails to do so or fixes an unreasonable price or term, is in accordance with DUTCH law, see CC arts. 6:2 and 6:248, and BELGIAN law: there the judge will appoint another third person to act unless the parties agree that the court should act for him (M.L. and M.E. Storme TPR 1985, 732 nos. 15 and 16). It is probably not found in the other Member States.

(b) Court determination

3. In GERMANY, CC § 317(1), GREECE, CC art. 371, ITALY, CC art. 1349(1) and PORTUGAL, CC art. 400, there is a presumption that the third person was appointed to fix a reasonable price. If the third party fails to act the court will act and fix a reasonable price (see, for ITALY see also CC art. 1473 regulating determination of price entrusted to third person; see for GREECE, Full Bench of Areios Pagos 678/1977 NoB 26 (1978) 360-361, A.P. 36/1991 NoB 40 (1992) 543). In ENGLAND, where the agreement is generally avoided if the third party fails to fix the price, see below, the court will nevertheless fix the price or the term provided that the third party provision is subsidiary and inessential, and only made to provide a machinery for fixing a reasonable price or term, see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 2-128 -129 and Sudbrook Trading Estate Ltd. v. Eggleton [1983] AC 444 (HL); similarly for IRELAND, see Cotter v. Minister for Agriculture (High Court, 15 Oct. 1991, unrep.). Under ESTONIAN law LOA § 26(9) authorises a court, upon the request of a party, to determine a term if a third party fails to determine the term during the agreed period of time or, if no such agreement exists, during a reasonable period of time before the time by which performance of the obligation may be required. The courts determine the terms which have been left open by taking into account the nature and purpose of the contract (LOA § 26(10)), therefore the court may also appoint a third person to determine the terms of the contract if this best serves the purpose of the contract.

4. Under Unidroit art. 5.1.7 where the price is to be fixed by a third person, and that person cannot or will not do so, the price is to be a reasonable price. This means that in cases where the parties cannot agree on what is a reasonable price the court may have to decide it.

5. In POLISH law there are no provisions similar to those in the present Article, but the solutions adopted are nonetheless similar (see T. Dybowski, System Prawa Cywilnego (t. III, part 1), Ossolineum 1981, pp. 96-98).

(c) Contract void

6. Several legal systems treat the contract as void if the third person fails to determine the price: FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1592; AUSTRIA, CC §§ 1056, 1057;

ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, Sale of Goods Act 1979, s. 9 (1) (but see above); SPANISH CC art. 1447(2) for sale of goods, though the rule has been construed strictly in order to preserve the contract if possible. See further Tallon §§ 3.3.2.01 ff. The same rule applies in GERMANY under CC § 319(2) (only for the rare cases where the third person is completely free to determine and is not under control of the courts; the courts tend to rather replace the third person by drawing an analogy to CC § 319(1) sent. 2, see BGH 14 July 1971, BGHZ 57, 47, 52), GREECE under CC art. 373 and ITALY CC art. 1349(2), and BELGIUM in cases where the third person has a free discretion as to how to determine the price or term. Neither the SLOVAK CC nor Ccom foresee this situation, A contract without agreement on price will be treated as void. There is no possibility of replacing a third party who fails to determine the price by a decision of a court. Also a court cannot fix a reasonable price. CZECH Ccom declares the contract void if the obligation of the third person to determine contents of the contract lapses (§ 270(2)); in cases not covered by this provision, i.e. especially in all non-commercial contracts, the situation would be governed by the rules on subsequent impossibility of performance (CC § 575-577) – so, generally said, the obligation to render the performance terminates (in full or in part, depending on circumstances). In SLOVENIA LOA § 38(2) provides that if the third party cannot or will not determine the price, the contract is void, unless parties reach another agreement.

II. Determination by third person unreasonable.

7. If the price or term fixed by the third person is unreasonable the court will fix a reasonable price or term in GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY and PORTUGAL, see note 1(b) above. In ITALY a revision by the court is also possible if a third person who has unfettered discretion acts in a way which is contrary to good faith, and in GERMANY, if the third party's determination is contrary to law or good morals. A revision by the court seems also to be possible in Belgium if the third person acted in violation of the good faith or abused of his rights (Vanderschot, "De bindende derdenbeslissing…", 2005, (425), nos. 16-18.); but GREEK case law does not permit judicial intervention in such cases: A.P. 217/1974, NoB 22 (1974) 1164. In DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN the general fairness clause in Contract Act § 36 would apply in this situation. In POLISH law the court can fix a reasonable price or term (general rule), unless it clearly appears from the contract that this determination can be made only by a certain third party. In that case, the obligation depends on the reasonable determination made by the third party and the court has no power to fix the price (T. Dybowski, System Prawa Cywilnego (t. III, part 1), Ossolineum 1981, p. 97). In CZECH law courts do not have a power to determine new contract terms, but may refuse to enforce abusing terms, including those determined by third persons (see CC § 3 and Ccom § 292(1)).

8. FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG law do not permit the court to fix a reasonable price or term if the one fixed by the third person is unreasonable. "Having left the decision to fix the price to a third person in accordance with CC art. 1592 the parties have given his decision the force of law. The judge may not by modifying this decision impose upon the parties a contract different from their agreement": FRENCH Cour de Cassation, Civ. 2, 6 June 1950, Bull. II no. 205, p. 141. (The rule may differ in respect of service contracts.) ENGLISH law takes a similar attitude, see Collier v. Mason (1858) 25 Beav 200.

9. See generally Tallon §§ 3.3.2.01 ff.

II.–9:107: Reference to a non-existent factor

Where the price or any other contractual term is to be determined by reference to a factor which does not exist or has ceased to exist or to be accessible, the nearest equivalent factor is substituted unless this would be unreasonable in the circumstances in which case a reasonable price or other term is substituted.

COMMENTS

In periods of inflation it becomes common practice to use price fluctuation clauses. There are other circumstances where the price is to be determined by reference to an external factor. But it can happen that the index of prices, or other external factor, selected as the basis of the clause ceases to be available, perhaps because the organisation which published it stops doing so or because the components of the index are changed so that it no longer complies with the clause. It is not easy to determine the consequences of the disappearance of the index and thus of the indexation. Does the contract continue at a price fixed in accordance with the last price published in the index? Or does it cease to be enforceable? It seems preferable in this situation, unless it would be unreasonable in the circumstances, to use the nearest equivalent index, which if necessary can be determined by the court, so that the contract can continue more or less as intended by the parties.

> Illustration 1
> In a long-term lease the rent is indexed by reference to the index of construction costs published by the Academy of Architects. The latter discontinues publications of the index. The index of construction costs published by the National Statistical Institute may be substituted.

The rule can apply to factors necessary to determine other terms than price.

> Illustration 2
> An employment contract provides for holidays in accordance with the nationally agreed terms of employment of a certain category of employees. When this category of employees ceases to exist, there is no longer such an agreement. The nationally agreed terms on holidays for the nearest equivalent category of employees may be substituted.

Where it would be unreasonable to apply the nearest equivalent factor, a reasonable price or other term is substituted.

NOTES

I. Modification of the contract

1. When the price or another term is to be determined by reference to a factor and this factor proves not to exist or disappears, some of the legal systems provide for a modification of the contract. Thus in DENMARK the situation has been considered a "failure of assumptions", in GERMANY such a case may in certain cases be analysed as a Wegfall der Geschäftsgrundlage, see CC § 313(1) and (3) (but courts will rather apply rules on interpretation), and in the NETHERLANDS an unforeseen contingency under CC art. 6:258. In these countries the contract is modified and the missing factor is replaced by the nearest equivalent one, see e.g. DENMARK, Supreme Court 15 June 1977, UfR 1977 641 and Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 79. See also Unidroit art. 5.7(1). ITALIAN law does not contain a similar provision: the contract is considered void because the object is neither determined nor determinable (see CC art. 1346), unless art. 1374 on contract integration is applicable. The ESTONIAN LOA § 26(4) corresponds to the present Article.

II. Interpretation

2. The disappearance of a factor in LUXEMBOURG is considered to put an end to the contract because the object (price) has disappeared. In FRENCH law, in the event of a disappearance of a factor chosen by the parties at the time of conclusion of the contract, the courts have the power to substitute an existing factor. Besides, in the event of an illegal factor chosen by the parties, the Cour de Cassation has finally admitted that the courts could substitute a valid factor. (Cass.civ. 1ère, 9 novembre 1981, Bull.civ. I, no. 332). Relying on the presumed intention of the parties they have modified the contract, see e.g. Cass.civ. 3, 12 January 2005 D. 2005, panorama p. 2847 obs. B. Fauvarque-Causson, Bull. II no. 113 p. 84. The BELGIAN courts have taken the same attitude, see Cour de Bruxelles 29 Oct. 1962, JT 1963 102. Similar methods are used in PORTUGAL, GREECE and SPAIN where the courts may resort to the presumed intention of the parties and the good faith principle, see Portuguese CC art. 239; Greek CC art. 200; Spanish CC art. 1158. A similar approach may be taken by the AUSTRIAN courts on the basis of CC § 914 (see Schwimann (-Binder), ABGB IV[3], § 914 no. 186) and by the POLISH courts on basis of CC art. 65 § 2. In ENGLAND it is thought that the court would hold the contract to have become of no effect unless it is decided that the reference to the factor was merely a way of fixing a reasonable term or price, in which case the court would presumably either substitute an equivalent index or fix the reasonable price or term itself. SCOTTISH law seems to be to this effect. In Wight Civil Engineering v Parker (O.H.), 1994 SLT 140 the contract referred to interest fixed in accordance with the Minimum Lending Rate published by the Bank of England. When this ceased to be published the Average Base Lending Rate of four leading banks was substituted. In CZECH law the initial impossibility of performance (including the case where a reference to a non-existent factor disables determination of performance) leads to partial or entire invalidity of the contract (CC § 37(2)), unless the impossibility can be reasonably bridged by interpretation (as e.g. if a no-more-published index, which is referred to, is substituted by another analogous index). The situation is similar in case of subsequent impossibility of performance – the obligation entirely or partially terminates from the time when the impossibility occurred. If the impossibility concerns only one or several terms of the contract, the invalidated or terminated terms are replaced by the statutory default regulation (there is little experience yet if also substantial parts of the contract, like the price, may be replaced this way). In SLOVAK law this type of contract is void. CC § 37(2).

3. See generally Rodière & Tallon § 3.1.2.01 and Tallon 191 f.

II.–9:108: Quality

Where the quality of anything to be supplied or provided under the contract cannot be determined from the terms agreed by the parties, from any other applicable rule of law or from usages or practices, the quality required is the quality which the recipient could reasonably expect in the circumstances.

COMMENTS

It may be helpful to provide a rule to supplement the parties' agreement on the quality of what is to be supplied or provided under the contract. If the quality cannot be determined from the terms agreed by the parties, from any other applicable rule of law or from usages or practices, the quality must be what the recipient could reasonably expect.

The scope of this Article will depend on how many particular contracts are eventually regulated by Books of their own which provide default rules on quality. The Article may eventually have only a limited residual application.

One effect of the Article is that in a contract which does not make provision for quality, which cannot be supplemented by usages or practices on this point and which is of a type where there are no special default rules on quality, the supplier need not supply an abnormally high quality which could not reasonably be expected.

In some cases it may be easy to determine the quality which could reasonably be expected. For example, there may be evidence that contracts of that type normally provide for the quality to comply with a standard set by some regulatory body or respected institution. In other cases it may be necessary to refer to a range of factors. In particular, the nature of what is supplied or provided and the price paid will be of great importance. The circumstances in which the contract was concluded may also be of importance. For example, it may be clear that a particular service was required as a matter of urgency and that both parties placed the emphasis on speed rather than quality. On the other hand, the reverse may be true: both parties may have understood and accepted that some delay was acceptable in order to achieve a better than usual quality.

NOTES

1. Under Unidroit art. 5.1.6 where the quality of performance is neither fixed by nor determinable from, the contract a party is bound to render a performance of a quality that is reasonable and not less than average quality. No Member State has a statutory provision of this general nature. As for the delivery of goods the statutes either focus on the quality of the goods or the purpose for which they are meant. For services the requirements concern the care and skill with which the services are to be performed.
2. The ESTONIAN LOA § 77(1) sent. 2, subject to special regulation for contracts for sales or services (LOA §§ 217 and 641 respectively), provides a general rule that where the quality of the performance of a contractual obligation is not determinable from the contract or from law, the party must perform the obligation with a quality not less than average in the circumstances.

I. Average quality of goods

3. The GERMAN CC § 243 lays down that the performance of a generic obligation must be of average kind and quality, and GREEK CC art. 289(2) contains a similar provision. Likewise, art. 1167 of the SPANISH CC states the average quality rule. In AUSTRIA the same rule was formerly laid down in the Ccom § 360 and applied generally by way of analogy. Now – after the adoption of a new code – the rule is amalgamated into the CC where art. 905b provides that generic goods must be of average kind and quality. Under art. 1246(3) of the FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs a person who delivers generic goods must deliver the kind of goods that the parties agreed on, and of an average quality unless statutory dispositions or contractual terms state otherwise. In the NETHERLANDS and ITALY a person may not deliver goods which are below average good quality: Italian CC art. 1178, Dutch CC art. 6:28. ESTONIAN LOA § 77(2) has the same effect. The former rule in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND was that goods delivered should be of merchantable quality, but the reference is now to "satisfactory quality", Sale of Goods act 1979, s. 14(2)–(2c) as amended by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s. 1. In IRELAND the goods delivered must be of merchantable quality, IRISH SGA 1893, s. 14(2) as amended by Sale of Goods and Supply of Services Act 1980, s. 10. The general POLISH regulation of CC art. 357 provides that the performance of a generic obligation must be of average quality, unless the quality is defined by law or by contract or appears from the circumstances. CZECH CC speaks of the "average medium quality" (§ 496) and CZECH Ccom of the "quality appropriate to the purpose for which, as a rule, the goods are used" (§ 420(2)). SLOVENIAN LOA § 286 states that the performance of a generic obligation must be of medium quality.

4. In assessing whether goods delivered meet the requirements as to quality under PORTUGUESE law one has to take into account the purpose for which the goods are meant, CC art. 913(2); CISG art. 35(2)(a) and the NORDIC Sale of Goods Act, § 17 (in force in FINLAND and SWEDEN) provides that the goods must be fit for the purposes for which goods of the same description would ordinarily be used. The FINNISH and SWEDISH Sale of Goods Act, § 17 para. 3, also makes clear that the goods must conform with the buyer's reasonable expectations. See e.g. FINNISH Supreme Court case, CC 1991:153.

5. In some systems (e.g. English law) the same rules apply to specific and generic goods. In other systems (e.g. FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG) quality requirements for specific goods may be determined by statutory provisions (e.g. CC arts. 1693, 1694 and 1792 (durability)). In FRENCH law, the debtor of specific goods must carry out its obligation by performing exactly as promised. The debtor cannot carry out its obligation by delivering different goods even if they are similar or more attractive to the creditor (Bénabent, Les obligations[7], no. 795). In HUNGARY CC § 288 if the parties have not stipulated the quality of something defined by type and quantity, the quality of what is supplied must be that of commercially available things of standard good quality.

II. The good paterfamilias and services

6. If the obligation of a party is to provide services, the debtor must act as a bon père de famille: see for services in general ITALIAN CC art. 1176, under which the standard must be appropriate to the nature of the activity (Cendon -(Castronovo) art. 1176 no.6); on deposits FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURG CCs art. 1137(1); and Dutch CC art. 7:602. DANISH case law requires that a professional party renders a professionally satisfactory performance, see Gomard, Obligationsret I[2], 150 and GERMAN law seems to have the same requirement, see CC § 276 and Palandt § 276 Comment 4 B. The ENGLISH Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s. 13 provides that services must be carried out with reasonable care and skill; similarly the IRISH Sale of Goods and Supply of Services Act 1980, s. 39(b); SCOTTISH law is to the same effect (McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 9.37). In general, CZECH CC requires, in connection with performance, "due care" and CZECH Ccom "professional care". POLISH law requires the diligence generally required in relations of a given kind ("due diligence" – CC art. 355 § 1). The professional character of a party's activity determines the level of diligence of those engaged in economic activity (CC art. 355 § 2). In SLOVENIAN law the diligence standard varies with regard to the person providing services – generally it is the diligence of a good paterfamilias, but it can be the diligence of a good professional or expert, see LOA §§ 6 and 768(1).

7. The SLOVAK Ccom § 420(2) provides that unless the contract provides otherwise, the seller undertakes to deliver the goods in the quality and way which is suitable for the purpose stated in the contract, or, in its absence, for the purpose for which such goods are usually used. This rule can be applied generally by way of analogy.

8. See on sales generally Honnold nos. 233 ff; Bianca & Bonell (-Bianca) 268 ff.

II.–9:109: Language

Where the language to be used for communications relating to the contract or the rights or obligations arising from it cannot be determined from the terms agreed by the parties, from any other applicable rule of law or from usages or practices, the language to be used is that used for the conclusion of the contract.

NOTES

1. The same rule applies under the CISG, see Schlechtriem and Schwenzer (-Schmidt-Kessel), CISG, art. 8 no. 41. Under GERMAN law there is no general rule, but courts tend to solutions similar to the present Article, see CA Hamm 8 February 1995, NJW-RR 1996, 1271; CA Saarbrücken 29 June 2005, NJOZ 2006, 4479.

Section 2: Simulation

II.–9:201: Effect of simulation

(1) When the parties have concluded a contract or an apparent contract and have deliberately done so in such a way that it has an apparent effect different from the effect which the parties intend it to have, the parties' true intention prevails.

(2) However, the apparent effect prevails in relation to a person, not being a party to the contract or apparent contract or a person who by law has no better rights than such a party, who has reasonably and in good faith relied on the apparent effect.

COMMENTS

A. Definition and types of simulation

Simulation is the situation in which the parties, with the aim of concealing their real intentions, have made two agreements: an overt one (the sham transaction) and another which is intended to remain secret. This covert agreement is sometimes embodied in a document (variously called a back-letter, counter-letter or side-letter). The situation is therefore different to the case where there is a single agreement which is merely ambiguous or vague, so that its meaning falls to be discovered by interpretation. However, there is an overlap with the provisions on interpretation and it may be a matter of choice which rule to apply. For example, if the parties for reasons of commercial secrecy use the word "refrigerators" in their written contract so that clerks and secretaries seeing contractual documents will not know that it relates to some commercially sensitive new equipment, this could be regarded either as a case of simulation or as a case where the common intention of the parties is to use a word in a special sense. Because of this overlap it is important that the rules on simulation should be to the same broad effect as the rules on interpretation.

The simulation may have the aim of making it appear that there is a contract which in fact the parties have no intention of concluding. For example, a debtor who is threatened with distraint of goods by creditors may pretend to sell the goods to a friend, neither having any intention that ownership will be transferred. This type of situation is covered by the reference in the Article to "an apparent contract". The simulation may also relate to the nature of the transaction. For example, there may be a gift disguised as a sale with a secret agreement that the price will not be paid. Or it may be simply the content of the agreement (e.g. the price) which is disguised by the simulated contract. Finally, the simulation may relate to the true beneficiary of the contract. For example, a sale is apparently concluded with one person when the true buyer is another person. In this last type of case there may be, but will not necessarily be, an overlap with the rules on representation. In any case of conflict, the rules on representation will prevail because they are the special rules for the situation.

Although simulation is dealt with in different ways in different legal traditions, paragraph (1) represents what is found in most legal systems. There is even more divergence over the question of the effect as against third parties. Paragraph (2) adopts what is considered to be a fair and appropriate rule. See Comment C.

B. Effect as between the parties

As between the parties, it is the true agreement which prevails if the contract is otherwise valid. Thus simulation is not in itself a cause of invalidity when it does not have a fraudulent or illegal purpose. It is the covert act which expresses the real intentions of the parties and it follows from the principle of freedom of contract that it should govern.

> Illustration 1
> A, a wine merchant, is in urgent need of cash. As it does not want to drive down market prices and as it cannot find a buyer quickly at the current price in a dull market, it sells part of its stock to B, apparently at the current market price but with a counter-letter to the effect that the real price will be 30% lower than the market price. A cannot recover the full market price from B, only the price fixed in the counter-letter.

For the same reason one party cannot, as against the other, use the apparent agreement as a defence.

C. Effect as against third parties

It would, however, be contrary to the requirements of good faith and fair dealing to allow the parties or one of them to invoke the secret true agreement in a question with a third party who has reasonably and in good faith relied on the simulated contract. Paragraph (2) provides protection for the third party in this type of case. The rule that an assignee has no better right than the assignor is, however, preserved: an assignee who was met by a defence based on simulation would have remedies against the assignor, not the other party to the simulated contract. Any other rule would have the effect that a party to a simulated contract could cheat the other party by the simple expedient of assigning the apparent rights under the contract for their apparent full value.

> Illustration 2
> A contract between A and B apparently confers a right on C and is in such terms that C can enforce the right against A. C is informed of the right and, reasonably and in good faith, incurs expenditure in reliance on it. A and B then turn round and say that their true agreement was that the right conferred on C was only conditional and that the conditions have not been met. This argument based on simulation will not succeed. C is entitled to rely on the apparent effect.

> Illustration 3
> The facts are as in Illustration 1. Immediately after the conclusion of the contract with the simulated price, A assigns the right to payment under the contract to C for a fraction less than the full price apparently payable under the contract. C then attempts to recover the full price from B. B can reply that in a question with A he is only liable to pay the discounted price and that C, as A's assignee, has no better right. C will have a remedy against A.

The rule in paragraph (2) may however be displaced by special rules for special situations. In particular there may be situations involving deliberate simulations where it would be reasonable to provide that an innocent third party should have the option of invoking either the apparent effect or the true effect.

D. Risks of simulation

It is not the purpose of this Article to deal with the possible risks of simulation for the parties. In fact, however, such risks are often real, particularly if the parties are disguising a transaction for some illegal or fraudulent or tax-avoiding purpose. The contract may well be avoided under Chapter 7 (Grounds of Invalidity).

NOTES

1. The rule stated in the Article is recognised in all Member States. In contrast, the rules in relation to third parties differ.
2. ENGLISH law does not have a general theory of simulation; the problems are dealt with by way of proof of the true contents of the contract, of illegality and of estoppel (Nicholas 195); and by refusing to rectify a document to make it accord with the true agreement between the parties if a third party has relied on it: see Chitty on Contracts I[27], nos. 5-111.). For example, the court may "re-characterise" a contract that purports to be a sale and lease-back as a security agreement that must be registered rather than (See Goode, Commercial Law, 605-607); while the endorser of a bill of exchange may be stopped from denying certain facts as against third parties: see Goode, Commercial Law 501 ff. SCOTTISH law is similar. However, note the particular provision of the U.K. SGA 1979, s. 62(4) (Security disguised as a sale).
3. Some laws state that the apparent act is invalid, even in relation to third parties. Only the hidden act is valid. See for GERMANY, CC § 117 (the rule may apply even in cases of good faith, though this is discussed in the doctrine); for ESTONIA: GPCCA § 89(2) (apparent act is invalid even in relation to third parties); for AUSTRIA: CC § 916(1) stating that an apparent contract is void, and that – if it hides another contract – the latter contract is regarded valid; CC § 916(2) then protects the third party who acted in good faith; for GREECE: CC arts. 138 and 139 (the third party who acted in good faith may always invoke the apparent act, Karakatsanis, in Georgiadis/Stathopoulos art. 138 no. 8, or demand annulation of the contract: A.P. 475/1991 EllDik 34 (1993) 564); for PORTUGAL, CC arts. 240-242, although under art. 243 a party may not invoke the nullity of the apparent act against a third party who was unaware of the simulation when the rights accrued. In POLISH law – see CC art. 83. The apparent contract is invalid and the validity of the hidden act has to be judged by its character (art. 83 § 1). A third party may invoke the apparent act, if in reliance on a contract concluded on its basis, the third party has acquired a right or is released from an obligation, unless the third party acts in bad faith (art. 83 § 2). SLOVAK law is similar. (CC § 41a(2)).
4. Other laws have a more subtle theory which allows the third party or chirographic creditors a choice. Thus in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, CC art. 1321 and the jurisprudence allow the third party to invoke the apparent act and, if there is a conflict between third parties, preference is given to the one who relied on the apparent act (see in France: Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], nos. 765-771; in Belgium: Samoy, "De gevolgen van gesimuleerde rechtshandelingen", 2005, 249; Van Ommeslaghe, "La simulation …", 2000, 147). Some other systems produce similar results: ITALIAN CC arts. 1414-1417 (the hidden agreement will prevail on the simulated one if the latter is detrimental to third party, on the contrary, the simulated contract will prevail if the third party has relied in good faith on it. Specific rules are provided for creditors (CC art. 1416); Gazzoni 949-950, Roppo, Il contratto, 702-704); DUTCH law, see Hartkamp-Tillema no. 74 and SLOVENIAN LOA, § 50(3).

According to the SPANISH CC art. 1276; the hidden contract is valid as between the parties, but neither of them may claim avoidance of the apparent contract when a third party has relied on it in good faith. In NORDIC law the secret act is valid as between the parties but the third party who acquires in good faith is protected, particularly as a result of Contracts Acts § 34 (for DENMARK, see Gomard, Almindelig kontraktsret[2], 136; for SWEDEN, Ramberg, Allmän avtalsrätt[4], 288 and Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[10], 242; for FINLAND, see Hemmo, Sopimusoikeus I, 432. In POLISH law, the apparent contract is invalid, while the validity of the hidden contract depends on whether the form appropriate for that hidden contract has been observed. Invalidity of the apparent contract does not affect a bona fide third party who, for a value, acquires a right or is released from an obligation, based on the simulated act in law (CC art. 83). CZECH CC § 41a(2) clearly stipulates that invalidity of a simulated juridical act may not be raised against a person who considered it unconcealed.

5. The HUNGARIAN CC § 207(6) states that a simulated contract is void and, if such contract is intended to disguise another contract, the contract is to be judged on the basis of the disguised contract. Under § 238(2) a person who has, in good faith, believed in the existence of an invalid contract can demand compensation from the parties for damages that originate from the conclusion of the contract. However, if invalidity is attributable to the conduct of one of the parties, the court is not to condemn the other party. If either of the parties has acted in bad faith towards the third person, such party shall be liable for full compensation for damages even if invalidity is not attributable to that party's conduct. The court may also award such indemnification by maintaining the validity of the contract either in part or in full.

Section 3: Effect of stipulation in favour of a third party

II.–9:301: Basic rules

(1) The parties to a contract may, by the contract, confer a right or other benefit on a third party. The third party need not be in existence or identified at the time the contract is concluded.

(2) The nature and content of the third party's right or benefit are determined by the contract and are subject to any conditions or other limitations under the contract.

(3) The benefit conferred may take the form of an exclusion or limitation of the third party's liability to one of the contracting parties.

COMMENTS

A. Background, scope and purpose

All but a very few of the laws of the member States now recognise that a contract may create rights in a third party beneficiary. Even English law (for long hostile to the idea of third party rights under contracts) did so in the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.

The Principles of European Contract Law already contained an Article on this subject (Article 6:110). That provision was a considerable achievement at the time. Since then, however, there have been significant developments, including the English Act. On this subject the UNIDROIT Principles have also now an Article which in many ways is an advance on the PECL provision. In these circumstances it has been considered appropriate to reconsider and revise the treatment of stipulations in favour of a third party.

The Article deals with the situation which arises when a contract confers a right or benefit on a third party. This is not uncommon. For example, a contract between a man and an insurance company may provide for a benefit to be paid to the man's widow. Or a contract between a person and a carrier may provide for the goods to be delivered to a named third party. Or a transport insurance contract may provide for the insurance company to pay the amount insured to any person who becomes owner of the insured goods within the period covered by the contract and who suffers loss of a type covered by the policy. Or a contract with a florist may provide for flowers to be sent to a person named by the buyer. Or a grandparent may put money in a bank account for a grandchild, the contract with the bank providing for payments to be made to the grandchild. Or the parties to a contract may agree that one of them renounces a right or claim against the third party or agrees to a limitation of the third party's liability.

The purpose of the stipulation in favour of the third party is often to avoid an additional transaction. If such stipulations were not legally possible, the contracting party who wishes to confer a benefit on the third party would have first to receive performance from the other and then perform to the third party; or would have to assign the right to performance to the third party.

It is because the nature of the benefit depends entirely on the agreement of the contracting parties, and because the situations covered are so various, that the Article refers in paragraph (1) to a “right or other benefit”. The word “right” alone might not be read as covering for example the benefit of an immediate renunciation of a right against the third party, or the benefit of a limitation of liability clause in favour of the third party, or the benefit of an immediate grant of permission or authority to a third party. It might also be open to argument that a “right” which is available or removable at the sole discretion of someone else is not really a right so much as a mere expectation or interest. The use of the word “benefit” avoids these problems.

B. Agency and trusts not covered

The Article does not cover the case where the person who receives a contractual undertaking acts as a representative or legal representative of the “third person” since in that case the “third person” is in fact the other party to the contract. Nor does the Article cover the case where a trustee or fiduciary concludes, as such, a contract which is for the benefit of a beneficiary under the trust or fiduciary relationship. In such a case the agreement between the contracting parties is to confer a right or benefit on the trustee or fiduciary as such. The relationship with the beneficiary would be indirect and would be governed by the law governing the trust or fiduciary relationship.

C. "Legal beneficiaries" not covered

Nor does the Article deal with situations where the promisor did not intend to give third parties any rights under the contract but where the law extends the promisor’s obligation vis-a-vis the promisee to cover other persons as well. Under the laws of some countries the seller’s warranty to the buyer extends to members of the buyer’s household. If a breach of the warranty causes personal injury to them, they have a direct claim in contract against the seller.

D. The third party need not be identified at the time of conclusion of the contract

The beneficiary need not be known when the contract is concluded. An insurance company may promise the policy-holder to pay the insurance proceeds to any future owner of the goods insured. A bank may promise a customer to pay the purchase price to any seller who delivers a certain piece of equipment to the customer. A contract for the payment of a pension may provide for the beneficiary to be nominated by one of the parties at a later date. An employer who rents accommodation for workers may not know the identity of particular tenants at the time of the contract but may reserve the right to nominate tenants later. There are many similar examples. It goes without saying; however, that before a third party could enforce or assert a right under the contract the third party would have to be identified or identifiable under the contract. It also goes without saying that the third party need not be a single individual or legal person but could be several persons or a class of persons identified as such.

E. The contract determines the nature and content of the third party’s right or benefit

In many cases third parties have merely incidental or factual benefits under contracts and acquire no legal rights which they can enforce or assert. For example, a contract between a local authority and a developer for the development of a public park may provide benefit to many other people but they would not acquire rights which they could enforce or assert under the contract. Paragraph (2) of the Article makes it clear that the nature and content of the third party's right or benefit are determined by the contract. In particular, it is the intention of the contracting parties as expressed or implied in the contract which determines whether the third party acquires a right which can be enforced by the third party against a contracting party. In some cases, the contract may make it clear that it is only the other contracting party, and not the third party, who has direct rights against the other contracting party. In other cases, this result may follow from the nature of the contract and the absence of any clear intention to give the third party direct rights. For example, a contract between X and Y whereby X agrees to pay off Y's debts would not of itself give the creditors a direct right against X. In yet other cases, the nature of the contract may reveal an implied agreement that the third party is to have direct rights against a contracting party. Everything depends on the express or implied agreement of the contracting parties.

Illustration 1
P opens a bank account in her own name and pays €800 per month to the account. Under the contract between P and the bank, the bank promises to pay sums, up to the amount in the account, to P's son B on B's demand. B may claim performance.

Illustration 2
A landlord L gives P permission to erect high voltage lines over a quarry which is worked by T, a tenant. P has promised L to pay an indemnity for damage done to T's property. It can reasonably be concluded that there is an implied agreement that T has a direct claim against P when damage is done.

Illustration 3
When taking a lease P, which intends to carry on production of inflammables, promises the landlord L that it will compensate the other tenants for any increase of their household insurance premiums which is caused by P's dangerous activity. The tenants who are informed by L about P's promise have a direct claim against P to have the increase of their premiums reimbursed.

The governing principle is the autonomy of the contracting parties: it is up to them to shape the nature and content of the third party's benefit. They may provide, for example, that the benefit is to be subject to conditions which have to be fulfilled by either the other contracting party or the third party. For example, a contract between a man and a sporting coach for lessons to be given to the man's daughter may provide that each lesson will be provided only if the fee for it is paid by the daughter at the beginning of the lesson. The parties may provide for the right or benefit to be subject to revocation or modification by one of them or both of them. For example, a contract between an individual and a pension provider may enable the individual to change the beneficiary by nomination.

Third parties' rights often accrue in contracts for the carriage of goods. A carrier promises the consignor to deliver the goods to a consignee. The conditions under which the consignee may claim delivery of the goods are provided for in international conventions. They vary depending upon the special procedures followed for each means of transport. As a rule, however, the consignee acquires a right to have the goods delivered when they have arrived at the place of destination, see Article 13 of the Warsaw Convention on the International Carriage by Air, Article 16(4) of the Uniform Rules Concerning the Contract for the International Carriage of Goods by Rail (CIM) and Article 13 of the Convention on International Carriage of Goods by Road (CMR).

However, under most of the transport conventions the consignor has a right to dispose of the goods in transit. The carrier acting as representative of the consignor must follow the consignor's instructions, see Article 20 of CIM and Article 12 of CMR. This right to dispose of the goods ceases when the consignee claims the goods after they have arrived at the place of destination. It also ceases to exist when the carrier has handed over the transport document to the consignee, see e.g. Article 21(4) of CIM and Article 12(2) of CMR. These rules are consistent with the provisions of Article 6.203.

Another provision frequently found in contracts for the carriage of goods is a provision excluding or limiting the liability of third parties, such as the master and crew of the ship, or stevedores engaged in loading or unloading the goods. The benefit of such an exclusion or limitation of liability clause would be within the scope of the present Article. Paragraph (3) of the Article makes this clear for the avoidance of any doubt about this matter of practical importance. It is also expressly covered in the UNIDROIT Principles. (Article 5.2.3).

NOTES

General

1. A stipulation in favour of a third party beneficiary is recognised as valid in most systems; the stipulation gives the third party a right or benefit if certain requirements are met. See for AUSTRIA, CC § 881; DENMARK, Lynge Andersen 368 ff and FINLAND: Kivimäki & Ylöstalo 204 and Telaranta 446. In ENGLAND the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 is like the Article in that parties to a contract may confer a right or benefit on a third party if they do so expressly in the contract. These rights can then be enforced by the third party (s. 1(1)(a) – s. 1(1)(b); s. 1(2) of the Act). The Article differs from the Act, however, in that the third party must be "identified in the contract by name, as a member of a class or as answering to a particular description." However, like the Article, the third party does not need to exist when the contract is concluded (s. 1(3)). Part (2) of the Article is mirrored in the Act (s. 1(1), s. 1(2), s. 1(4)) in respect of rights and benefits being exclusively defined by the contract, subject to limitations in the contract (s. 1(2), s. 1(4), s. 2 (1) - (3). The Act is the same as Part (3) of the Article as a contract can exclude third party's liability (s. 1(6)). Stipulations in favour of third parties are also valid in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, CC art. 1121 as interpreted (and extended) by the courts, see for France Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], nos. 807-821 and for Belgium Dirix, 1984, no. 115; Cauffman, De verbindende eenzijdige belofte, nos. 349-374, and Belgian Insurance Contract Act of 25 June 1992, art. 22; GERMANY, CC § 328; GREECE, CC arts. 410 and 411 (see A.P. 1017/1990, EllDik 33(1992) 74-75); ITALY, CC art. 1411 (see also CC art. 1412 regulating performance to be executed after the death of stipulator, and CC art. 1413 stating that the promisor can raise against the third person defences based on the contract from which the third person derives his right, but not those based on other relationship between the promisor and the stipulator); NETHERLANDS, CC art. 6:253; POLAND, CC art. 393; PORTUGAL, CC art. 443; SCOTLAND, (see McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 10); SPAIN, CC art. 1257(2) (see Diez Picazo I, 398; Lacruz(-Rams) II, 1, 549); SWEDEN, Rodhe, Obligationsrätt 609, Adlercreutz, Avtalsrätt I[10], 142 et seq. and NJA 1956 p. 209; CZECH REPUBLIC, CC § 50; ESTONIA, LOA § 80(1); and SLOVENIA, LOA § 126(1).

2. In IRISH law the doctrine of privity of contract (and of consideration) is held to prevent stipulations in favour of third parties. In order to confer an enforceable right upon the third party it would be necessary for the promisor to execute a deed in the third party's favour, or for the promisee to make a declaration in trust in his favour, or (provided that the third party was furnishing some consideration) for the promisee to act as an agent of the third party. However, statute has created exceptions to the doctrine of privity, for instance in the field of insurance: see Clark 383-394. In ENGLISH law the doctrine of privity of contract (and of consideration) used to be held to prevent stipulations in favour of third parties. In order to confer an enforceable right upon the third party it would formerly be necessary for the promisor to execute a deed in the third party's favour, or for the promisee to make a declaration in trust in their favour, or (provided that the third party was furnishing some consideration) for the promisee to act as an agent of the third party. However, there were many statutory exceptions, for instance in the field of insurance: see Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 14-129–14-135 and now the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 provides that a third party may enforce a term, if the contract expressly so provides, or if the term purports to confer a benefit on them unless it appears that the parties did not intend the third party to have the right to enforce it. The third party must be "identified in the contract by name, as a member of a class or as answering a particular description " but need not be in existence at the time the contract was made (s. 1, see Tre Treitel, The Law of Contract[9], paras. 14-095–14-127).

3. Agreements in favour of third parties are permitted in SLOVAK law (CC § 50). The third party acquires rights under the agreement as from the time when the third party expresses consent. Until that time the agreement is valid only between those who concluded it; the right to the performance belongs to the party who reserved the performance in favour of the third person unless anything else was agreed. The debtor can raise the same objections against the third party as against the other contracting party. Specific provision for insurance agreements is made in CC § 794.

4. Under the HUNGARIAN CC § 233 if the parties have concluded a contract for services to be performed for a third party, the third party will be an immediate beneficiary only if the parties have expressly so stipulated. A third party is entitled to exercise the rights stipulated in its favour as of the date on which it receives notice of the contract from either party. If these rights are declined by the third party, they become the property of the party who has made the contract in favour of the third party.

II.–9:302: Rights, remedies and defences

Where one of the contracting parties is bound to render a performance to the third party under the contract, then, in the absence of provision to the contrary in the contract:

(a) the third party has the same rights to performance and remedies for non-performance as if the contracting party was bound to render the performance under a binding unilateral promise in favour of the third party; and

(b) the contracting party may assert against the third party all defences which the contracting party could assert against the other party to the contract.

COMMENTS

Once it has been decided that, under the contract, one of the parties owes an obligation to the third party and the third party has a corresponding right to performance, the question arises as to the remedies available to the third party for the enforcement of performance or in the case of non-performance. These are not necessarily the same remedies as the other contracting party would have if the obligation were owed to that contracting party. The significant difference between the two situations is that there will generally be some mutuality of rights and obligations between the contracting parties. As between one contracting party and the third party, however, there is not the same mutuality: the third party has a right but no obligations. Remedies which depend on mutuality – withholding of counter-performance, termination of the contractual relationship so as to put an end to the obligation to render counter-performance, reduction of price – have no application. The third party is much more in the position of the beneficiary under a unilateral juridical act.

This is why the Article provides that the third party is to have the same rights to performance and remedies for non-performance as if the contracting party was bound to render the performance under a binding unilateral promise. This means that the third party will be able to obtain a court order for performance, subject to the usual qualifications, or obtain an award of damages for non-excused non-performance. The third party will not, however, be able to withhold performance or terminate the contractual relationship between the two contracting parties, even if there is fundamental non-performance. That may seem self-evident. Nor will the third party be able to terminate, for fundamental non-performance, the legal relationship between the contracting party who owes the obligation and the third party. The main point of termination for fundamental non-performance is to relieve the aggrieved party of future obligations of reciprocal performance. This does not arise in the present situation. These rules are subject to any provision in the contract to the contrary. For example, the contract may provide that only the other contracting party is to be able to enforce the obligation owed to the third party.

Paragraph (b) regulates the question of the defences available to the contracting party who owes the obligation. The normal rule is that the contracting party may assert against the third party all defences which could be asserted against the other contracting party.

Illustration 1

P has taken out a single premium insurance policy on his own life for the benefit of B. P has, however, failed to disclose a significant medical condition which would, as between P and the insurance company, C, give C a defence to any claim under the policy. C can assert this defence against B.

Again, however, the rule in (b) is only a default rule. The contract may provide for another solution, expressly or by implication.

Illustration 2
A buyer and a bank contract for the bank to provide an independent personal security on first demand for the benefit of the seller. The whole point of the contract is to provide the seller with an absolute assurance of payment. The buyer has misled the bank as to the buyer's financial position. It is clear that the bank could not invoke this misrepresentation against the seller in order to refuse to meet its obligation to the seller. That would defeat the whole point of the contract. (See also IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) in relation to the nature of an independent personal security and IV.G.–3:104 (Independent personal security on first demand).)

The focus of the Article is on the position of the third party. The position of the contracting parties depends on the general contract rules and on the terms of the contract. In the absence of any provision to the contrary each contracting party will continue to have the normal rights and obligations of a contracting party towards the other contracting party. It will very often be the case that there will be rights and obligations between the contracting parties which are independent of the right or benefit conferred on the third party. For example, a man who concludes a contract with a pension provider for a pension for his widow may have rights under the contract to annual information about the value of the pension. A person who concludes a contract with a carrier may have rights against the carrier to have the goods picked up at a certain time and place and those rights may have nothing to do with the carrier's obligation to deliver the goods to a third party.

In some cases there is a theoretical risk of double liability. A contracting party might be liable to the other contracting party for not performing in favour of the third party and also liable to the third party. This is only a theoretical possibility, however, because the parties would be most unlikely to provide expressly for this and it would not be reasonable or in accordance with the requirements of good faith and fair dealing to imply an agreement to this effect.

NOTES

1. Paragraph (2) is similar to the UNIDROIT Principles art. 5.2.4.
2. PORTUGUESE law adopts a solution similar (CC art. 444), but it is not clear if some remedies to non-performance such as termination may also be invoked by a third party. Under CC art. 499 the contracting party may only assert against the third party the defences related to that contract. AUSTRIAN law (CC § 881(1) and (2)) makes it depend on the agreement whether only the other party or also the third party has a direct claim. The latter is presumed, if the performance is mainly in the interest of the third party. Under GERMAN law the solution depends on the interpretation of the contract, see Jauernig [-Stadler], BGB, § 328 no. 5; CC §§ 329, 330 contain presumptions for special cases.
3. For SLOVAKIA see the notes to II.–9:301 (Basic rules).
4. Under ESTONIAN law, the third party may require performance of an obligation under the contract only if this is so prescribed by the contract or determined by law (LOA § 80(2)). If the third party has the right to performance (e.g. in case of life insurance, LOA §§ 80(3), 532), similarly to the present Article sub-paragraph (b), LOA § 80(7) allows the debtor to invoke all defences that were available against the other party to the contract. Together with the right to require performance the third party acquires the right to use appropriate remedies in the event of the debtor's non-performance. Remedies like withholding of counter-performance, termination of the contractual relationship and reduction of price remain available only to the other party to the contact (see Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Varul), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 80 no. 4.4.4.).

5. In DUTCH law the third party, after having accepted the stipulation in its favour, has the same rights to performance and on account of non-performance as the stipulator does (CC art. 6:253(1)), but may terminate the contract for non-performance only together with the stipulator (Asser-Hartkamp, 4-II, Algemene leer der overeenkomsten, no. 425). The rule expressed in paragraph (b) of the commented Article holds true in DUTCH law as well, but has not been expressed in the CC.

6. CZECH law conforms (CC § 50): the third party acquires rights from the contract at the moment of expressing consent to it. The contracting party has the same defences against the third party as he has against the party with whom he concluded the contract. If the third party waives its right to performance, the debt is extinguished, unless agreed otherwise. Unless the third party expresses consent, the contract is effective only between the parties who concluded the contract and the party who reserves performance in favour of the third party has the right to performance, unless agreed otherwise; the same holds true if the third party refuses to give consent with the performance.

7. Under DANISH law it is assumed that a third party can claim performance under a third party contract. It is not a requirement that the third party has accepted the offer. However until the contract is performed the parties to it may change the contract if they agree to do so. See Ussing, Aftaler[3], 374.

8. Under SLOVENIAN law, in the absence of contrary provision, both the stipulator and the third person may require performance from the promisor (LOA § 126). The promisor can raise against the third person defences from the contract with the promisee (LOA § 128).

9. The Article corresponds to ENGLISH law. See Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act s. 1(5) for third party rights to performance and remedies. It corresponds also in terms of defences which may be asserted against a third party (s. 3 (2)–(4) of the Act).

10. For SCOTTISH law see MacQueen and Thomson, Contract Law in Scotland, § 2.82; McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], para. 10.24.

II.–9:303: Rejection or revocation of benefit

(1) The third party may reject the right or benefit by notice to either of the contracting parties, if that is done without undue delay after being notified of the right or benefit and before it has been expressly or impliedly accepted. On such rejection, the right or benefit is treated as never having accrued to the third party.

(2) The contracting parties may remove or modify the contractual term conferring the right or benefit if this is done before either of them has given the third party notice that the right or benefit has been conferred. The contract determines whether and by whom and in what circumstances the right or benefit can be revoked or modified after that time.

(3) Even if the right or benefit conferred is by virtue of the contract revocable or subject to modification, the right to revoke or modify is lost if the parties have, or the party having the right to revoke or modify has, led the third party to believe that it is not revocable or subject to modification and if the third party has reasonably acted in reliance on it.

COMMENTS

A. The third party may refuse the right or benefit

Paragraph (1) of this Article makes it clear that the beneficiary may refuse to accept the right or benefit. This is necessary because nobody has to accept an unwanted benefit. If the benefit is rejected, it is considered never to have accrued to the beneficiary. To be effective, rejection must, however, take place before the right or benefit has been expressly or impliedly accepted. It is not necessary, and would not be reasonable, to allow the third party to enjoy a right or benefit for many years and then to reject it with retrospective effect. Under paragraph (1) rejection is effected by notice to either of the contracting parties. Normally the third party would give notice of rejection to the contracting party who sent notice of the benefit. This could be either of them. In Illustration 1 to the preceding Article, for example, either the father might tell the son that he had opened the account for him or the bank might tell the son that the account had been opened and give him information about how to operate it. The obligation to co-operate would require the contracting party who receives notice of the rejection to convey this information to the other party. In some cases, rejection may amount to a breach of a separate contract between one of the contracting parties and the third party but this does not have to be regulated by the Article.

Illustration 1
A seller of goods contracts with a carrier to deliver them to the buyer. The buyer refuses to accept delivery. This may or may not be a non-excused non-performance of the buyer's obligation under the sales contract to take delivery of the goods but that is a question between buyer and seller, not between buyer and carrier.

Of course, the third party can, in accordance with general principles, renounce the right non-retrospectively at any time.

B. Revocation or modification by the contracting parties

The law on this question has to reconcile two doctrines. First, the terms of a contract can always be modified by the contracting parties and they can terminate their contractual relationship by agreement at any time. Second, a right is something on which the holder of the right can rely: once conferred it should take effect according to its content. That content may of itself provide for it to be revocable or modifiable. But if the right is conferred without any such qualifications it should not be within the control of anybody other than the holder of the right.

Paragraph (2) reconciles these two ideas in the following way. First, the contracting parties remain free to modify the terms of their contract so long as neither of them has notified the third party of the right or benefit conferred. Under the rules on notice in653Book I the notice would become effective when it reached the third party. Up until that time the terms of the contract are a matter entirely for the parties to it. There is no reason to modify the general rule that the parties control the terms of their contract. At that stage the third party has no reason to653suppose that a benefit is to be conferred and has no rights or expectation interests which demand protection. This approach is consistent with the approach taken under these Articles to unilateral juridical acts. A unilateral promise to pay X €100, even if written down and intended to be binding, has no effect until communicated to X. The promisor can have a change of mind after writing out the promise and can tear up the document. In the present situation the two contracting parties acting together have the same freedom of action. It will be noted that paragraph (2) says that the parties can remove or modify the contractual term. It does not say that they can revoke or modify the right or benefit because at this stage no right or benefit has yet been conferred.

Illustration 2
As part of a separation agreement a husband and wife agree that the husband will pay the wife's mortgage payments for a period of two years. The intention is for the husband to undertake a direct obligation towards the lender and for the lender to have a direct right against the husband. Before the agreement has been notified to the lender, the husband receives legal advice to the effect that it would be better from the tax point of view for him to make increased alimentary payments to the wife and for her to pay the mortgage herself. The husband and wife can tear up their agreement or modify it to provide for payments to be made to the wife herself. The third party has acquired no rights.

Illustration 3
The purchaser B has promised the seller V that B will pay the price to F which has financed V's acquisition of the goods. Later, but before any notification to F, B and V agree that B should pay the price to V. F, even if by chance becoming aware of what B and V had originally agreed, cannot claim the purchase price.

It should be noted that the rule in the first sentence of paragraph (2) does not say that once the conferral of the right or benefit has been notified to the third party it becomes irrevocable. Whether or not it is revocable at that stage depends, as we have seen, on the content of the right or benefit as determined by the contract. This is made clear, for the avoidance of any doubt, by the second sentence of paragraph (2). The right or benefit conferred may well be one which can be revoked or modified by one or both of the contracting parties.

Illustration 4
P has made B a beneficiary of a life insurance policy P has taken out with C, on terms that P may change the intended beneficiaries. B has been notified of this and informed of the terms of the policy. P may alter the beneficiary from B to D, but after P's death P's executors cannot do so.

If, however, the contract is to the effect that an irrevocable right is conferred on the third party and that the content of the right, once conferred, cannot be modified by either or both of the contracting parties then a new legal relationship is created which is quite distinct from the contractual relationship between the contracting parties. It is a relationship between the contracting party who undertakes an obligation to the third party and the third party who holds the corresponding right. That relationship is, in these circumstances, beyond the control of the contracting parties. The contracting parties could terminate their own contractual relationship by agreement at any time but this would not affect the relationship between one of them and the third party. In some cases both contracting parties may undertake obligations To the third party, but that does not affect the applicable principles.

It would be possible for the law to provide that the contracting parties could modify or revoke the right or benefit, even after it had been effectively conferred and even if it was in terms irrevocable, at any time before the third party had accepted it or reasonably acted in reliance on it. This is the solution adopted in the UNIDROIT Principles Article 5.2.5. It is not, however, the solution adopted by the present Article. It would not be coherent With the solution adopted for rights conferred by unilateral juridical acts or indeed with the general notion of a right, which is that the holder of the right is not subject to the mere whims of others. The approach adopted here is that if the parties want to be able, or if one of them wants to be able, to revoke or modify the right or benefit after it has been notified to the third party, this should be provided for in their contract.

Illustration 5
P has made B the beneficiary of a life insurance which P has taken out with C. B has been notified of this and sent a copy of the policy document. The policy provides that P may stop paying premiums at any time and that the surrender value of the policy will then be payable to P. The content of B's right has been determined by the contract. B's right will be dependent on P's continuing to pay the premiums.

Illustration 6
The facts are the same as in the preceding Illustration except that the policy is a single premium policy and does not allow P to modify its terms or otherwise affect B's right. P has paid the single premium and B has been notified of the benefit conferred and sent a copy of the policy. In this case P and C could not revoke or modify B's right. It is irrelevant whether B has accepted the right or acted in reliance on it.

C. Reliance on revocable right or benefit

In some cases it may not be clear to the third party that the right or benefit conferred is, under the contract, intended to be revocable by one or other of the contracting parties. In such cases the requirement of good faith and fair dealing would prevent revocation if the third party had reasonably acted in reliance on the right. Paragraph (3) makes this clear for the avoidance of any doubt. If, on the other hand, it had been made clear to the third party that the right was revocable then the third party would take the risk of acting in reliance on it.

NOTES

1. The conditions under which the third party beneficiary's right becomes irrevocable are treated differently in the legal systems.

2. Rules which agree with or which come close to the rules in the Article are found in AUSTRIA, CC § 881(3); BELGIUM, see Dirix, Obligatoire no. 123; DENMARK, see Lynge Andersen 373; GERMANY, see CC §§ 328(2), 331 and 332; NETHERLANDS, CC art. 6:253(2)-(4); PORTUGAL, CC art. 448; SCOTLAND, McBryde, Law of Contract in Scotland[1], paras. 10.25-10.32. In ENGLAND, under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, unless the contract provides otherwise, the third party's rights cannot be varied once it has communicated assent or it has relied on the term and the promisor knew that or should have foreseen it (s. 2).

3. Some of the laws seem to make the third party's right irrevocable only when it has been accepted: FRANCE, see Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations[9], no. 815; GREECE, CC art. 412; ITALY, CC art. 1411(3), but see the exception in art. 1412(1); POLAND, CC art. 393 § 2; SPAIN, CC art. 1257(2) (see Diez Picazo I, 398); CZECH REPUBLIC, CC § 50(2); and SLOVENIA, LOA § 127(1), with an exception for the case when the promise is to be fulfilled after the promisee's death, see LOA § 127(2). In ENGLISH law a person cannot be made to take a benefit he or she does not wish to accept (Thompson v. Leach (1690) 2 Vent 198) and on becoming aware of the benefit, is entitled to reject it.

4. In the case of life insurance contracts (or at least certain types of such contracts) the beneficiary generally acquires an irrevocable right at least upon the death of the promisee. This is provided in BELGIUM (irrevocable from the moment of acceptance): Insurance Contract Act of 25 June 1992, art. 112; DENMARK, Insurance Contract Act 1930, § 102; ENGLAND, Married Women's Property Act 1882, s. 11 (only in favour of spouses or children); FINLAND, Insurance Contract Act § 47; GERMANY, Insurance Contract Law, § 159; ITALY, CC art. 1921; SCOTLAND, Married Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland) Act 1880, s. 2; SWEDEN, Insurance Contract Act, (2005:104), chap. 14 §§ 1 and 2; SPAIN, Insurance Act 1980, art. 87; compare FRENCH Insurance Code (Code des assurances) art. L.132.9; CZECH REPUBLIC, Insurance Contract Act, § 51.

5. For SLOVAKIA see the notes to II.–9:301 (Basic rules).

6. According to ESTONIAN LOA § 80(6), the parties may amend or terminate the contract without the consent of the third party unless otherwise provided by law or the contract. This plain rule, which itself corresponds to the idea that the rights in favour of the third party are created without the consent of, or even notification to, the third party, may be qualified by the good faith principle if the third party has actually the right to claim performance and has accepted or partially received performance; or the benefit was given as the surety (see Varul/Kull//Kõve/Käerdi (-Varul), Võlaõigusseadus I, § 80 no. 4.5. and Supreme Court practice based on former law: decisions from 12 December2000, civil matter no. 3-2-1-142-00 and from 2 October 2002, civil matter no. 3-2-1-94-02)

7. See generally Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative law[3], 456 ff, Kötz, IECL s. II. ; Kötz, European Contract chap. 13.

Section 4: Unfair terms

II.–9:401: Mandatory nature of following provisions

The parties may not exclude the application of the provisions in this Section or derogate from or vary their effects.

COMMENTS

According to this Article the provisions of the DCFR on unfair terms have a mandatory character. Thus, parties may neither exclude their application nor vary their effects. Other issues of circumvention are addressed by way of interpretation of the individual provisions. For example, a standard term stating that the other party has confirmed that individual negotiations took place, is not sufficient to qualify the content of a contract term as having been negotiated (cf. comments to II.–1:110 (Terms "not individually negotiated"). It should be noted, that II.–9:401 only has an effect in favour of the party who did not supply an unfair term, and not of the supplier of the unfair term. This can be seen, for instance, in II.–9:408 (Effects of unfair terms) which provides that an unfair term "is not binding on the party who did not supply it". Hence, the unfair term is binding on the party who supplied it.

NOTES

1. The Unfair Contract Terms Directive (Directive 93/13/EEC) does not state that consumers may not waive the rights conferred on them. In its art. 6(2) the Directive only requires that its provisions may not be circumvented by choosing the law of a non-Member country. However, other consumer contract directives provide for the binding nature of the provisions in favour of the consumer, cf. Directive 85/577/EEC art. 6; Directive 97/7/EC art. 12(1); Directive 1999/44/EC art. 7(1).
2. Directive 93/13/EEC art. 6(2) has been implemented by the vast majority of Member States. Only LATVIA, POLAND and ROMANIA have refrained from granting protection against unfair clauses notwithstanding a choice of law purporting to prevent such protection. LITHUANIAN law does not provide for division between EU countries and other countries in this respect. All the provisions applicable in respect of consumers regarding unfair contract terms are applied equally to all consumers notwithstanding their country of origin.
3. Although not required by Directive 93/13/EEC many Member States declare that all consumer-protecting provisions, including the provisions on unfair terms, are mandatory, cf. AUSTRIA ConsProtA § 2(2); CZECH REPUBLIC CC § 55(1); SLOVENIA ConsProtA § 1. The SLOVAKIAN CC contains in § 54(1) a similar provision stating that: "The terms and conditions of contracts with consumers may not deviate from this regulation if such a deviation would be disadvantageous for the consumer. In particular, the consumer cannot waive the rights conferred by this regulation in advance or worsen his or her contractual position in any other way". This article relates to contracts in which the consumer is a contractual party. Another similar regulation is included in CC § 52(2) which stipulates that provisions on consumer contracts, as well as all other provisions regulating legal relationships in which the consumer is one of the parties, are to be used always when in the favour of the consumer. ESTONIA LOA § 51 states that all consumer-protecting provisions are mandatory and that agreements derogating from these provisions to the detriment of the consumer are void. In GERMANY, according to CC § 306a the provisions on unfair terms are mandatory, even in business to business transactions. Under LATVIAN law contract terms are be deemed to be in contradiction with the principle of legal equality of the contracting parties if the terms stipulate that the consumer is waiving his or her lawful rights (ConsProtA art. 5(2) and (4)). MALTESE law provides that the terms in the Consumer Affairs Act protecting a consumer against unfair terms prevail over anything to the contrary contained in the CC and the Ccom (Consumer Affairs Act s. 47B). In the NETHERLANDS the core provisions of the law on standard terms are mandatory according to CC art. 6:246. In BULGARIAN law there is no clear statement as to whether the provisions on standard terms are mandatory. However, LOA art. 16 states that in cases of discrepancy between general terms and particular provisions of law the latter prevail.

II.–9:402: Duty of transparency in terms not individually negotiated

(1) A person who supplies terms which have not been individually negotiated has a duty to ensure that they are drafted and communicated in plain, intelligible language.

(2) In a contract between a business and a consumer a term which has been supplied by the business in breach of the duty of transparency imposed by paragraph (1) may on that ground alone be considered unfair.

COMMENTS

A. General principle and scope

This Article, which is modelled on Article 5, sentence 1 of the Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC requires that terms which have not been individually negotiated have to be drafted and communicated in plain, intelligible language. Thus, in the case of non-negotiated terms, the party supplying the terms assumes responsibility for their quality. As a consequence, the supplier has to conceive the terms in a way that is sufficiently transparent for it to be possible for the other party to be familiar with the content of the contract before conclusion and to use the terms as a reliable source of information before and during the time of performance. The purpose of the Article is to ensure that the other party can figure out unaided the contractual rights and obligations from the contract terms.

While Article 5, sentence 1 of the Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC only refers to written terms, the present Article does not contain such a limitation of scope. Therefore, it applies to all terms. It seems likely that Art. 5 of the Unfair Terms D. assumes that non-negotiated terms will only or mostly be in writing, whereas oral terms were envisaged only in the context of negotiations. Member State experience, however, demonstrates that non-negotiated oral terms actually exist. Since it is even more difficult to memorise oral terms, it seems more coherent to apply this provision to all terms instead of only to written terms (cf. also Recitals 11 and 20 of the Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC which also refer to non-written contracts).

B. Plain, intelligible language

The requirements of paragraph (1) are met if the other party can see from the contract and its terms what the contractual rights and obligations of the parties are. Consequently, the wording must be plain and intelligible. The same applies to the textual organisation, which must guarantee that the relevant terms can be recognised and identified without any unnecessary difficulty. Any information given by the terms has to be correct and complete so that no term is misleading.

> Illustration 1
> The standard terms used by landlord X state that in the winter, tenant Y may require "heating in the rooms used most frequently". According to this term, it is unclear which rooms have to be heated. Assuming this situation cannot be resolved by interpretation, the term is not transparent. In consequence, heating has to be provided either in all rooms, or in those rooms to be heated under general rules.

While the scope of paragraph (1) is not limited to businesses, the standard for transparency may differ depending on whether the contract is between two business (business to business) or between a business and a consumer (business to consumer).

Illustration 2
In its terms for reservations, hotel company X limits refunds for cancellation to situations covered by "the recommendations of the national tourist and hotel association". The term is unclear since the other party is unable to discover the scope of the right to a refund from the contract itself. The situation is different if the other party is a travel agency which can be expected to know the "recommendations".

C. Sanctions and relationship to other provisions

According to paragraph (2), in business to consumer relations, a contract term may be considered unfair for the sole reason that the term is not transparent. In consequence, if a term is supplied in breach of the duty of transparency imposed by paragraph (1) it is not binding on the party who did not supply it, (see II.–9:408 (Effects of unfair terms)). In other cases the duty of transparency is to be taken into account in assessing the unfairness of a contract term (II.–9:407 (Factors to be taken into account in assessing unfairness)). The present Article is also complemented by II.–3:106 (Clarity and form of information) which requires that pre-contractual information must be clear and precise and provided in plain and intelligible language. Furthermore, II.–8:103 (Interpretation against supplier of term or dominant party) states a contra proferentem rule for ambiguous contract terms which have not been individually negotiated.

NOTES

I. Duty of transparency

1. According to Directive 93/13/EEC art. 5 sent. 1 terms must always be drafted in plain, intelligible language. Recital 20 additionally makes clear that the consumer should be given a genuine opportunity to examine all the terms. It has to be noticed that – unlike II.–9:402 – Directive 93/13/EEC art. 5 sent. 1 only refers to written terms. It seems likely that Directive 93/13/EEC art. 5 assumes that non-negotiated terms will only or mostly be in writing, whereas oral terms were envisaged only in the context of negotiations. However, since it is more difficult to remember oral terms, it seems more coherent to apply this provision to all terms instead of only to written terms (cf. also Directive 93/13/EEC recitals 11 and 20). Directive 93/13/EEC does not contain any clear guidelines on whether a term is formulated in plain and intelligible language. It is also unclear, whether and to what extent the benchmark of the average consumer who is reasonably well informed and reasonably observant and circumspect, developed in the ECJ's case law on the fundamental freedoms and interpreting directives of trade practices law (see also Directive 2005/29/EC recital 18) also applies in the context of control of unfair terms.
2. The vast majority of Member States, including the most recent new Member States BULGARIA and ROMANIA, have transposed Directive 93/13/EEC art. 5 sent. 1 word for word. After the ECJ in its judgment C-144/99 (judgment of 10 May 2001, C-144/99 - Commission v. Kingdom of the Netherlands [2001] ECR I-03541, para. 17), clarified that, to implement the principle of transparency in full, "it is essential that the legal position under national law is sufficiently precise and clear that individuals are made fully aware of their rights" and that "even where the settled case-law of a member state interprets the provisions of national law in a manner deemed to satisfy the requirements of a Directive, that cannot achieve the clarity and precision needed to meet the requirement of legal certainty", the principle of transparency was explicitly anchored in DUTCH and GERMAN law.

3. By contrast Directive 93/13/EEC art. 5 sent. 1 was not explicitly transposed in the CZECH REPUBLIC, ESTONIA, GREECE, HUNGARY, LUXEMBOURG and in SLOVAKIA. These countries do of course have rules on the incorporation and interpretation of pre-formulated terms, in the context of which the issue of whether the clause is formulated in plain, intelligible language also has a role to play. Whether this sufficiently accommodates the requirements of the ECJ is doubtful, however, since in those countries the danger exists that consumers and consumer associations do not know that they can take action against clauses which lack transparency.

4. The issue of whether a term is formulated in plain and intelligible language is assessed by reference to how it is understood. In this regard it is not surprising that the various benchmarks of the consumer in the individual Member States deviate considerably from one another. Clear differences in practice are above all evident in the extent to which legal terminology is permissible. In the UNITED KINGDOM, there is a clear tendency towards the fact that clauses must always be formulated in everyday layman's terms. In the guidance on unfair terms in consumer contracts issued by the Office of Fair Trading it is laid down that expressions such as "indemnity" must always be avoided, since such references can have onerous implications of which consumers are likely to be unaware (see 19.5 and 19.7 of the guidance, available at http://www.oft.gov.uk/Business/Legal/UTCC/guidance.htm). In place of such legal words, terms like "pay damages" are preferred. In GERMANY, by contrast, case law in this respect is more generous, but the BGH is however ready and keen to emphasise in a number of judgments, that the duty of the user to formulate the content of the clause clearly and intelligibly only exists within the bounds of what is actually possible. Should various kinds of legal and factual difficulties exist for the drafter, the terms will nonetheless be binding even if the other party has to make a certain effort in order to understand them rather than being able to understand immediately (BGH NJW 1998, 3114).

II. Consequences of lack of transparency

5. The wording of Directive 93/13/EEC does not specify the legal consequences which follow where the transparency requirement has been breached in the individual case. The sole legal consequence of failure to fulfil the requirement of transparency to be explicitly provided is the interpretation rule in Directive 93/13/EEC art. 5 sent. 2. This interpretation rule, however, only applies to clauses not drafted in plain language and which are capable of interpretation. However, the legal consequences of plain, but unintelligible clauses are not regulated (an example would be where, due to legal terminology or insufficient command of the language in which the terms are drafted, the clause is unintelligible to the consumer). Accordingly there are widely differing views on the legal consequences of a breach of the transparency imperative. Some assume that the Member States are free to decide on the legal consequences. However, others see the requirement of transparency, by reference to recital 20, as a condition for the incorporation of terms. Finally there is the view that clauses which lack transparency are to be assessed according to Directive 93/13/EEC art. 3. If one follows this latter view, it is furthermore doubtful whether lack of transparency per se results in the term being rendered unfair or non-binding according to Directive 93/13/EEC art. 3(1) in conjunction with art. 6(1) or whether there is a further condition that the content of the clause is disadvantageous, i.e. causes a considerable and unjustified imbalance in the contractual rights and obligations contrary to the principle of good faith.

6. The interpretation rule laid down in Directive 93/13/EEC art. 5 sent. 2, according to which any doubt on the meaning of a clause is always to be resolved in the manner most favourable to the consumer, has been transposed by all Member States, cf. e.g. BELGIUM ConsProtA art. 31(4); CZECH REPUBLIC CC art. 55(3); GERMANY CC § 305c(2); FRANCE ConsC art. L. 133-2(2); ITALY ConsC art. 35(2); LITHUANIA ConsProtA art. 11(5) sent. 2; POLAND CC art. 385(2) sent. 2; SPAIN ConsProtA art. 80(2). The implementation of the requirements of the Directive in ESTONIA however seems problematic. According to LOA § 39(1) sent. 2, "in the case of doubt, standard terms shall be interpreted to the detriment of the party supplying the standard terms." Directive 93/13/EEC however goes beyond a mere interpretation to the detriment of the user, in that it requires not only an interpretation favourable to the consumer, but an interpretation "most" favourable to the consumer.

7. In a few legal systems clauses in general terms and standard form contracts can be deemed unfair if they are not composed in plain intelligible language. In AUSTRIA, for example, unclear contract terms are ineffectual according to ConsProtA § 6(3). This rule has resulted in a certain confusion, as some authors assume that clauses lacking transparency are to be assessed according to this rule alone, so that the consumer cannot rely on the contra-proferentem rule in CC § 915 2nd alternative. The majority view, by contrast, holds that the consumer, even in the case of mere lack of transparency, can rely on an interpretation favourable to him or her. GERMAN law provides in CC § 307(1) sent. 2 that an unreasonable disadvantage may also result from the fact that the provision is not clear and comprehensible. This should make clear that, in the context of a content review, clauses lacking transparency are per se regarded as non-binding, without an additional criterion of unreasonable disadvantage to the contractual partner. Legal consequences of a breach of the transparency imperative therefore include not only an interpretation favourable to the consumer and non-incorporation into the contract, but also the ineffectuality of the clause within the content review.

8. The state of the law remains unclear in ITALY. Whereas some authors assume that lack of transparency implies nullity per se, for some commentators the infringements of the principle of transparency must be evaluated under ConsC art. 36(2) lit. (c) (binding the consumer to terms with which he or she had no real opportunity of becoming acquainted before the conclusion of the contract).

9. In LATVIA, although the legal consequences are not regulated in the ConsProtA, general norms of civil law could be nevertheless applied, particularly LOA art. 1506 stating that absolutely disreputable and unintelligible and also contradictory terms are not to be interpreted at all, but deemed null and void.

10. In MALTA, there are no express rules on the consequences of a lack of transparency for individual cases. However under general civil law rules, if the lack of transparency is such as to amount to fraud or bad faith on the part of a party to the contract, then that contract may be avoided by the choice of the other party. Moreover, the Director of Consumer Affairs in accordance with powers under Consumer Affairs Act art. 94 may issue a compliance order under that article if the Director considers that the term used is unfair to consumers and is in breach of art. 47. This article requires terms in a consumer contract to be written in plain and intelligible language "which can be understood by the consumers to whom the contract is directed."

11. For the non observance of the principle of transparency ROMANIA Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 14 provides that consumers prejudiced by contracts concluded in breach of the provisions of the law (including the breach of the transparency principle), have the right to file claims before the courts of law in accordance with the provisions of the CC. Therefore, it seems that the Romanian legislator chose not to regulate the consequences for breach of the transparency requirement in individual actions. It rests with the courts to apply the transparency principle and relevant sanctions in cases of breach.

12. In the UNITED KINGDOM, it is unclear whether a term is capable of being found to be unfair principally or solely because it is not transparent, but the Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission recommend in their final report on unfair contract terms that it should be possible for a contract term to be found to be unfair principally or solely because it is not transparent (See the final report of the Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission on unfair terms in contracts, LAW COM No. 292/SCOT LAW COM No. 199, paras. 3098-3102).

II.–9:403: Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer

In a contract between a business and a consumer, a term [which has not been individually negotiated] is unfair for the purposes of this Section if it is supplied by the business and if it significantly disadvantages the consumer, contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

COMMENTS

A. General principle and scope

This Article sets the standard for judicial control of terms in contracts between a business and a consumer. It is a highly controversial issue whether in business to consumer relations, the "content control" should only apply to terms which have not been individually negotiated or whether it should also cover individually negotiated terms. In the Acquis Principles prepared by the Acquis Group (which have been used as the model for these rules) the scope of the unfairness test is limited to non-negotiated terms. Thus, strictly speaking, the Acquis Group has only drafted rules on an unfairness test for non-negotiated terms, and has taken no position with regard to an unfairness control of individually negotiated terms. However, the majority of Study Group members wanted to extend this unfairness test to individually negotiated terms. Therefore, in the current version of the Article the words "which has not been individually negotiated" are put in square brackets. However, the practical consequence of this divergence is not to be overestimated considering the fact that II.–1:110 (Terms "not individually negotiated") provides a very broad definition of what a not individually negotiated term is. The practical relevance of the distinction is reduced even further by the burden of proof rule in paragraph 4 of that Article according to which, in business to consumer contracts the burden of proving that a term has been individually negotiated is imposed upon the business.

B. Significant disadvantage, contrary to good faith and fair dealing

The unfairness test in the present Article comprises two criteria: the "contrary to good faith and fair dealing" criterion as well as the "significant disadvantage" criterion. This structure is modelled on Article 3 Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC, according to which a term which has not been individually negotiated is considered unfair "if, contrary to the requirement of good faith, it causes significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract, to the detriment of the consumer." Compared to the Directive, the wording of the unfairness test in the present Article has been slightly altered. In particular, the term "good faith" has been replaced by the couplet "good faith and fair dealing". This brings the Article into line with other provisions of the model rules, e.g. II.–3:301 (Negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing), III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) which also use this pair of terms. The term "significant imbalance" has been replaced by the phrase "significantly disadvantages" in order to avoid the possible misunderstanding, that the price-performance ratio of the contract could be a measure to determine unfairness. The phrase "significantly disadvantages" should make clear, that a core element of the unfairness test is to compare the contract term in question with the default rules which were applicable if the term had not been agreed. In other words, the question is, whether the contract term in question significantly disadvantages the consumer in comparison with the default rule, which would be applicable otherwise. If the answer to this question is yes, the next question is whether this is contrary to good faith and fair dealing or whether there is a justification for this significant disadvantage. The good faith and fair dealing criterion allows a very flexible test: the more significant the disadvantage, the better the justification must be.

C. Relation to other provisions

More concrete criteria for the application of the unfairness test are provided in II.–9:407 (Factors to be taken into account in assessing unfairness). In addition, II.–9:406 (Exclusions from unfairness test) sets out the limits of the unfairness test. If a term is considered unfair under the present Article, according to II.–9:408 (Effects of unfair terms) it will not be binding upon the party who did not supply it.

In a more general perspective, the present Article can be interpreted as a derivative of the general principle of good faith. It is thus related to other provisions referring to good faith, e.g. II.–3:301 (Negotiations contrary to good faith and fair dealing), III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing). The Article does not exclude an application of these other provisions. It may be that a term is generally in accordance with the requirements of good faith but invoking this term in a certain exceptional and unforeseeable situation is contrary to good faith. However, unfair results, even if limited to certain situations, constitute a strong argument that the term as such is contrary to the good faith requirement in the present Article especially if changed wording of a term can easily exclude unfair effects of the term. Moreover, according to II.–9:407 (Factors to be taken into account in assessing unfairness)., the courts will also look at the circumstances at the time of the conclusion of the contract in order to determine the unfairness of the term.

NOTES

I. Terms not individually negotiated

1. Directive 93/13/EEC art. 3(1) excludes contractual terms which have been individually negotiated by the consumer from the unfairness test. According to Directive 93/13/EEC art. 3(2) sent. 3, a seller or supplier who claims that a standard term has been individually negotiated has the burden of proof in this respect.

2. 15 Member States have adopted the exclusion of terms which have been individually negotiated: AUSTRIA (CC § 879(3), ConsProtA § 6(2)), CYPRUS, ESTONIA (LOA § 35(1)), GREECE, , HUNGARY, IRELAND (European Communities Regulations 1995 and 2000 reg. 3(1)), ITALY (ConsC art. 33(1)), LITHUANIA (CC art. 6.188(2)), the NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6.231), POLAND, PORTUGAL (ConsProtA art. 9), ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA (CC § 53(1)), SPAIN (ConsProtA art. 82(1)) and the UNITED KINGDOM (Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 reg. 5(1)). In GERMANY, although “individually negotiated terms” are excluded from review (CC § 305(1) sent. 1), this is counterbalanced by a very narrow definition of that notion. The BGH held that for a term to be individually negotiated the customer has to fully understand the content of the contract and be aware of its legal consequences (BGH judgment of 19 May 2005, NJW 2005, 2543).

3. The remaining ten Member States, by not having transposed this exclusion, allow their courts or authorities to monitor individually negotiated terms. This is the case in the DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN, and also in BELGIUM (ConsProtA), the CZECH REPUBLIC, FRANCE, LATVIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA and SLOVENIA. The Belgian Unfair Trade Practices Act opts for the middle way. The unfair contract terms, mentioned in Directive 93/13/EEC annex no. 1 are sanctioned with relative nullity even when individually negotiated (Unfair Trade Practices Act art. 7(4)). The principle of Directive 93/13/EEC art. 3(1) (Art. 7(2) LPA) applies to other contractual terms. In BULGARIA, the general clause and even the black list of Art. 143 apply to all contract terms. However, as to the legal consequences Bulgarian law differentiates between individually and not individually negotiated terms: According to ConsProtA art. 146(1), which transposes Directive 93/13/EEC art. 6(1), terms not individually negotiated are automatically void. In contrast, unfair terms individually negotiated are remedied only by general contract law.

4. Although ten countries generally provide for a review of individually negotiated terms, of those only FRANCE and SLOVENIA have decided not to transpose Directive 93/13/EEC art. 3(2) sent. 3. It can be concluded that in the remaining countries which allow the monitoring of individually negotiated terms (BELGIUM, CZECH REPUBLIC, DENMARK, FINLAND, LUXEMBOURG, LATVIA, MALTA, SWEDEN) the distinction between standard and negotiated terms remains relevant for assessing unfairness, i.e. that different benchmarks apply. However Belgian practice does not show such a different approach.

II. Unfairness test in the Unfair Contract Terms Directive

5. According to Directive 93/13/EEC art. 3(1) a term (which has not been individually negotiated) is considered unfair "if, contrary to the requirement of good faith, it causes significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract, to the detriment of the consumer." The general clause according to its wording requires an "imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations" and, in addition, that the imbalance is "contrary to the requirement of good faith". The relationship of the principle of good faith to the criterion of "imbalance" remains unclear. The wording of the Directive suggests that a clause is unfair only if it causes an imbalance and this imbalance is furthermore contrary to the principle of good faith. Following this reading, a clause can therefore cause an imbalance without simultaneously being contrary to good faith. Others however, assume that any clause which generates a significant imbalance is always (automatically) contrary to the principle of good faith (cf. Tenreiro, ERPL 1995, 273, 279). It is ultimately worth considering whether the criteria "significant imbalance" and "good faith" are to be understood as alternatives in the sense that the two criteria operate independently of one another, so that a clause is unfair if it results in a significant imbalance, or if it is contrary to the requirement of good faith. In view of these multifarious interpretation possibilities it is not surprising that the member states have constructed their general clauses very differently.

III. "Significant imbalance to the detriment of the consumer"

6. The general clause has taken a number of very different forms in the Member States. The following countries make direct reference to "significant imbalance" in their general clauses: BELGIUM (ConsProtA art. 31(1)), BULGARIA, CYPRUS, DENMARK, ESTONIA, GREECE (ConsProtA art. 2(6) in conjunction with art. 2(1)), FRANCE (ConsC art. L. 132-1(1): "un déséquilibre significatif entre les droits et obligations des parties au contrat"), HUNGARY (CC art. 209(1)), IRELAND, ITALY (ConsC art. 33(1)), LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG (ConsProtA art. 1), MALTA, POLAND (CC art. 385/1(1) sent. 1), POTUGAL, ROMANIA (Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 4(1)), SLOVAKIA (CC § 53(1)), SLOVENIA (ConsProtA § 24(1)), GREECE, SPAIN (ConsProtA art. 82(1)) and the UNITED KINGDOM. However seven of these countries do not explicitly mention the additional criterion "good faith": BELGIUM, DENMARK, FRANCE, GREECE, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG and SLOVAKIA. This legislative technique tends to result in a lowering of the burden of proof for consumers.

7. Under the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:233 lit. (a), a standard contract term is considered voidable, if it is "unreasonably disadvantageous" (onredelijk bezwarend) to the other party. In addition to the possibility for the other party to annul a specific unfair clause, they can also argue that the stipulation – although valid – is not applicable in the sense that, in the given circumstances, this would be unacceptable according to the criteria of reasonableness and justice. There is no reference to good faith, significant imbalance or other related concepts.

IV. "Contrary to good faith"

8. The requirement of "good faith" is only explicitly mentioned in 15 Member States in total, namely in BULGARIA, CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC, GERMANY, HUNGARY, IRELAND, ITALY, LATVIA, MALTA, POLAND, PORTUGAL, ROMANIA, SLOVENIA, SPAIN and the UNITED KINGDOM. In FRANCE where the legislator refrained from making reference to "good faith" the concept of good faith exists as a general principle of interpretation (CC art. 1134(3)). It was deliberately not adopted in the framework of contract terms, as the view was held that a business which endeavours to achieve a significant imbalance cannot, by definition, be acting in good faith. Similarly, in FINLAND, the principle of good faith, although known in general contract law, is not applied when it comes to assessing unfairness. According to ConsProtA chap. 3 § 1 the assessment of unfairness is based on a reasonability test from the point of view of the consumer. In LITHUANIA CC art. 6.188(2) there is no reference to the principle of good faith, but ConsProtA art. 11(2) provides that contractual terms (other than those in the black list) may also be regarded as unfair, provided that they are contrary to the requirements of "good will" and cause inequality of mutually enjoyable rights and obligations between the seller, service provider and consumer. The DANISH legislature did not use the wording of the Directive ("god tro"), since according to Danish legal language the expression that a person is in "god tro" means that this person did not know and could not have been aware of a certain fact. Against this background the expression used in the Formation of Contracts Act art. 38c(1) seems to many authors to be a more adequate way of expressing the criterion of "good faith". In order to meet the requirements of the Directive, the legislator included a special provision (Formation of Contracts Act art. 38c(2)) which explicitly states that circumstances arising after the contract has been concluded cannot be taken into consideration to the detriment of the consumer.

9. In the NETHERLANDS the notion of good faith is equally not part of the law of unfair terms. However, a general rule outwith the law of unfair contract terms states that contractual regulations which are contrary to good faith are ineffective (CC art. 6:248(2). According to Dutch case law the general rule is not overruled by the specific provisions on standard terms and can be called upon in court by the parties at their discretion (Hoge Raad (NL) 14 June 2002 COO/315 HR Johannes Maria Bramer v. Hofman Beheer B.V. & Colpro B.V.).

10. BELGIAN law applies the principle of good faith indirectly. The key feature of the Belgian domestic legislation on unfair contract terms is the existence of two slightly different general clauses. According to ConsProtA art. 31(1), an unfair term is a clause or a condition which creates a "manifest" imbalance between the parties' rights and obligations. By contrast, in respect of the liberal professions the Unfair Trade Practices Act art. 7(2) defines an unfair term as a clause or a condition which has not been individually negotiated and which creates a "significant" imbalance between the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract, "to the detriment of the consumer". At present Belgian practice does not show any distinction between the application of these criteria (manifest imbalance versus significant imbalance).

11. GERMAN law attaches significant emphasis to the principle of good faith. The "significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract" is not named. According to the general clause of CC § 307(1) standard contract terms are invalid, if they "place the contractual partner of the user at an unreasonable disadvantage contrary to principles of good faith". CC § 307(2) lists examples of where this is presumed (incompatibility with the essential basic principles of the statutory rule from which it deviates, restriction of essential rights or duties resulting from the nature of the contract in such a manner that there is a risk that the purpose of the contract (Vertragszweck) will not be achieved). In making reference to the purpose of the contract ESTONIAN law resembles the German approach. Pursuant to LOA § 42(1) a standard term is deemed void if the term causes "unfair harm" to the other party, particularly if it causes a "significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations" arising from the contract to the detriment of the other party or if the standard term is "contrary to good morals". Additionally, according to LOA § 42(2) "unfair harm" is presumed if a standard term derogates from a fundamental principle of law or detrimentally affects the rights and obligations of the other party in a manner inconsistent with the nature of the contract in such a manner that it becomes questionable as to whether the purpose of the contract can be achieved.

V. Other concepts

12. The MALTESE Consumer Affairs Act arts. 44 and 45 contain a combination of different concepts. Firstly, the provisions refer to "a significant imbalance between the rights and obligations of the contracting parties to the detriment of the consumer" (art. 45(1)(a)), a verbatim transposition of the Directive. Secondly the legislator adopted the principle of good faith (art. 45(1)(d) "or is incompatible with the requirements of good faith"). Additionally, a term may be regarded as unfair if "it causes the performance of the contract to be unduly detrimental to the consumer" (art. 45(1)(b)); or causes the performance of the contract to be significantly different from what the consumer could reasonably expect" (art. 45(1)(c)). All these definitions are applied as alternatives, i.e. it is sufficient for a term to fulfil one of the criteria to be considered as unfair.

13. In SLOVENIA, according to the general clause of ConsProtA § 24(1), the terms of the contract are considered unfair (1) if they bring about a significant imbalance in the contractual rights and obligations of the parties to the detriment of the consumer or (2) if they cause the fulfilment of the contract to be detrimental to the consumer without good reason or (3) if they cause the fulfilment of the contract to differ substantially from what the consumer rightly expected or (4) if they go against the principles of fairness and good faith. The Slovenian approach combines the benchmarks prescribed by the Directive ("significant imbalance", "to the detriment of the consumer", "good faith") with the principle of fairness.

14. SWEDISH law contains no precise definition of unfairness. There is the Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 11 which makes reference to ContrA art. 36 which has been in force and unchanged since 1976. ContrA art. 36(1) sent. 1 states very broadly: "A contract term may be adjusted or held unenforceable if the term is unreasonable with respect to the contract's content, circumstances at the formation of the contract, subsequent events or other circumstances". Good faith, imbalance or other concepts do not form part of the law as far as unfair terms are concerned. Circumstances which occurred after the conclusion of the contract can only be considered if this would not be to the disadvantage of the consumer (Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 11(2)).

II.–9:404: Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between non-business parties

In a contract between parties neither of whom is a business, a term is unfair for the purposes of this Section only if it is a term forming part of standard terms supplied by one party and significantly disadvantages the other party, contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

COMMENTS

A. General principle

This Article sets the standard for judicial control of terms in contracts between parties, neither of whom is a business. This provision marks a sort of middle ground between the rather strict fairness test for business to consumer relations in II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer) and the more liberal fairness test for business to business relations in II.–9:405 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between businesses). Consequently, it combines elements from both of the two other provisions.

B. Scope

The personal scope of the Article is defined in a negative way by the expression "parties neither of whom is a business". The provision therefore applies to contracts e.g. between two consumers. It also applies to contracts between two non-profit organisations which are neither qualified as businesses nor as consumers, as the notion of consumers does not include legal persons. The scope of the Article is further limited to standard terms, i.e. terms which have been formulated in advance for several transactions involving different parties, and which have not been individually negotiated by the parties.

C. Significant disadvantage, contrary to good faith and fair dealing

The criteria of the fairness test under this Article are identical to the criteria used in II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer). Thus, the relevant comments to that Article apply accordingly. However, it has to be borne in mind that in the cases covered by the present Article the "content control" is not justified by the assumption of unequal negotiation power between a business and a consumer but by the assumption that the use of standard terms drafted in advance by one party enabled the party supplying these terms to restrict the other party's contractual freedom. This difference in the justification of the judicial control may lead to a difference in the application of the unfairness test between II.–9:403 and II.–9:404.

D. Relation to other provisions

More concrete criteria for the application of the unfairness test are provided in II.–9:407 (Factors to be taken into account in assessing unfairness). In addition, II.–9:406 (Exclusions from unfairness test) sets out the limits of the unfairness test. If a term is considered unfair under the present Article, according to II.–9:408 (Effects of unfair terms) it will not be binding upon the party who did not supply it.

NOTES

1. Directive 93/13/EEC is applicable to terms in contracts concluded between a seller or supplier and a consumer (business to consumer). At present, the Acquis does not provide for content review of person to person contracts.
2. In several Member States the general unfairness test is applicable regardless of the status of the parties, thus allowing a review of person to person contracts. Especially, in the Nordic states (DENMARK, FINLAND, SWEDEN), due to the general clause of ContrA § 36, a content review of unfair terms (even if they are individually negotiated) has always been possible in all manner of contractual relationships, thus also in person to person contracts.
3. In a series of Member States there are general clauses which provide for a content review of standard terms, which do not merely apply to business to consumer contracts, but also to person to person contracts. According to ESTONIAN law, for example, the requirements for a standard term to be part of the contract (LOA § 37) and the general unfairness test (LOA § 42(1)) are applicable regardless of the status of the parties. Similarly, in GERMANY the basic principles on general terms and conditions are not limited to business to consumer situations, thus the same rules apply in other situations. Similar concepts, which allow a content review of P2P contracts, exist in AUSTRIA, HUNGARY, LITHUANIA, the NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL and SLOVENIA.
4. In the UK, a review of standard contract terms for person to person contracts is possible, since the Unfair Contract Terms Act also applies to certain “private” contracts for the sale of goods where neither of the two parties is a business. However, the Unfair Contract Terms Act applies only to exclusion and limitation of liability clauses and indemnity clauses.
5. In contrast, BELGIUM, BULGARIA, CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC, FRANCE, GREECE, IRELAND, ITALY, LATVIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, SLOVAKIA and SPAIN do not provide for a content review of person to person contracts.

II.–9:405: Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between businesses

A term in a contract between businesses is unfair for the purposes of this Section only if it is a term forming part of standard terms supplied by one party and of such a nature that its use grossly deviates from good commercial practice, contrary to good faith and fair dealing.

COMMENTS

A. General principle

This Article sets the standard for judicial control of terms in contracts between businesses. Compared to the unfairness tests in II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer) and II.–9:404 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between non-business parties) this is the most liberal of the three provisions on contractual "content control". It is a controversial political issue in itself whether the judicial control of contract terms should be extended to business to business relations. Several Member States also have such control for business to business contracts. The acquis communautaire also seems to provide a basis for such an extension. While the Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC only applies to business to consumer contracts, Article 3(3) of the Late Payment Directive states the criteria for judicial control of certain terms in business to business contracts ("grossly unfair" with regard to "good commercial practice"). The present Article reflects these guidelines by introducing limited "content control".

As in the case of II.–9:404 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between non-business parties) the "content control" is not justified by a general assumption of unequal negotiation power between the parties but by the assumption that the use of standard terms drafted in advance by one party enabled the party supplying these terms to restrict the other party's contractual freedom.

B. Scope

The personal scope of the Article covers contracts between businesses, i.e. any natural or legal person, irrespective of whether publicly or privately owned, who is acting for purposes relating to the person's self-employed trade, work or profession, even if the person does not intend to make a profit in the course of the activity. As in II.–9:404 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between non-business parties) the scope of the present Article is limited further to standard terms, i.e. terms which have been formulated in advance for several transactions involving different parties, and which have not been individually negotiated by the parties. Thus, terms which have been formulated in advance by one of the parties but only for a single transaction, are not subject to the "content control" under this Article.

C. Significant disadvantage, contrary to good faith and fair dealing

The criteria of the fairness test under the Article are different from the criteria used in II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer) and II.–9:404 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between non-business parties). While under these provisions a term is considered unfair if it "significantly disadvantages the other party, contrary to good faith and fair dealing", the present Article requires the term to "grossly deviate from good commercial practice, contrary to good faith and fair dealing". The reference to "good faith and fair dealing", which is the common element of the three unfairness tests, indicates that in all three cases the "content control" is a derivative of the general principle of good faith. Nevertheless, the standard applied under the present Article is considerably different from the one used in the two preceding ones. In effect, under the present Article a term is considered unfair only "if it grossly deviates from good commercial practice". This standard is derived from Article 3(3) Late Payment Directive.

Illustration
According to the standard term of supplier A, a set-off against the claim of the supplier for payment is excluded. Whilst such a term would be presumed to be unfair in business to consumer cases under II.–9:403 (Terms which are presumed to be unfair in contracts between a business and a consumer) paragraph (1)(b), a set-off may be excluded in business to business contracts in order to prevent a buyer from invoking an unfounded set-off as a means to delay court proceedings. The buyer may raise separate court proceedings to enforce the right on which the set-off is based, which is no undue burden in business to business cases.

D. Relation to other provisions

More concrete criteria for the application of the unfairness test are provided in II.–9:407 (Factors to be taken into account in assessing unfairness). In addition, II.–9:406 (Exclusions from the unfairness test) sets out the limits of the unfairness test. If a term is considered unfair under the present Article, according to II.–9:408 (Effects of unfair terms) it will not be binding upon the party who did not supply it.

NOTES

1. While Directive 93/13/EEC only applies to business to consumer contracts, Directive 2000/35/EC art. 3(3) states criteria for the judicial control of certain terms in business to business contracts ("grossly unfair" with regard to "good commercial practice").

I. Member States that provide for a contents review of business to business contracts

2. In a series of Member States a review of business to business contracts is possible at different levels. In the Nordic states (DENMARK, FINLAND, SWEDEN), due to the general clause of ContrA § 36, a content review of unfair terms (even if they are individually negotiated) has always been possible in all manner of contractual relationships, thus also in business to business contracts. However, according to ContrA § 36, in determining what is unfair, regard must be had not only to the content of the contract and to the circumstances prevailing at and after the conclusion of the contract, but also to the positions of the parties. This means that in business to business contracts, very strict requirements must be overcome to render a clause unfair.
3. In some Member States, including ESTONIA, GERMANY and PORTUGAL as well as AUSTRIA, HUNGARY, LITHUANIA, the NETHERLANDS and SLOVENIA, there are general clauses which provide for a content review of standard terms, which do not merely apply to business to consumer contracts, but also to business to business contracts:
4. According to the AUSTRIAN CC § 879(3), a contractual term contained within the general conditions of business or contractual forms which does not make clear one of the party's ancillary performance duties, is void, if, in consideration of all the circumstances of the case, it grossly disadvantages ("gröblich benachteiligt") one party. This rule does applies not only to business to consumer but also to business to business contracts.

5. The HUNGARIAN CC contains general provisions applicable to all persons on the incorporation and interpretation of standard contract terms (CC arts. 205a et seq.). According to CC art. 209(1), a standard contract term is unfair if, contrary to the requirement of good faith, it causes a considerable and unjustified disadvantage to the other party.

6. In LITHUANIA in general, applying to all situations, including business to business, a contract term which limits or excludes a party's liability for non-performance of an obligation, or which allows performance to be made in a substantially different manner from what the other party reasonably expected is not valid if such condition, having regard to the nature of the contract and other circumstances, is unfair (CC art. 6.211). Moreover, CC art. 6.186(3) provides a right to dissolve or modify a pre-drafted contract even after its conclusion if this contract excludes the rights and options commonly granted to the other party in a contract of that particular class, or excludes or limits the civil liability of the party who prepared the standard terms or establishes other provisions which violate the principle of equality of parties, cause imbalance in the parties' interests, or is contrary to the criteria of reasonableness, good faith and justice.

7. The SLOVENIAN legislator transposed Directive 93/13/EEC by amending ConsProtA arts. 22-24. Terms used in other contracts (business to business or person to person) can be reviewed under LOA art. 121 which provides that standard terms which oppose the actual purpose for which the contract was concluded or good business customs are null and void.

8. The scope of the DUTCH provisions on unfair terms also extends to business to business transactions. However, contractual parties who employ more than 50 staff cannot seek review of either incorporation or content (CC art. 6:235). The black list and the grey list (CC arts. 6:235 and 6:236) on the other hand relate only to consumer contracts.

9. Several Member States also employ a grey list and black list with regard to business to business contracts. The GERMAN provisions for monitoring of standard terms (CC §§ 305 et seq.), in principle, protect all contractual parties against whom standard terms are used. So far as standard terms are being used against a business, certain specific provisions do not have any direct application, especially the grey list (CC § 308) and black list (CC § 309), which apply to business to consumer contracts (CC § 310(1)). However, where the use of a particular clause against consumers would be prohibited according to CC §§ 308, 309, in a business to business situation the judge must examine whether the clause is also to be considered void in the business sphere. According to the case law of the BGH, the black list especially (CC § 309) has an indicative effect of whether the relevant rule leads to a disproportionate imbalance to the detriment of the business. PORUGUESE law, in addition to the general clause applying to all transactions (Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 15), also has a grey and a black list, which are applicable to all contractual relationships (Unfair Contract Terms Act arts. 18, 19). In ESTONIAN law requirements for a standard term to be part of the contract (LOA § 37) and pass the general unfairness test (LOA § 42(1)) are applicable regardless of the status of the parties. The black list, which applies to business to consumer contracts (LOA § 42(3)) is, pursuant to LOA § 44, to be considered as a grey list in respect of business to business contracts.

10. The scope of the GREEK ConsProtA, which also transposed the requirements of Directive 93/13/EEC, is extended to all natural and legal persons who are the end recipients of goods or services, irrespective of the purpose or nature of the transaction (ConsProtA art. 1(4)). It thus goes considerably further than the Directive. POLISH law distinguishes between forms used in all contracts, those used in contracts between professionals (traders) and those used in contracts with consumers. A review of the incorporation of standard terms is according to CC art. 384 in principle not confined to business to consumer relationships, but yet stronger provisions on incorporation apply to consumer contracts.

11. In the UNITED KINGDOM only the Unfair Contract Terms Act also applies to business to business contracts, unless stated otherwise in the Act. Therefore terms of such contracts, even if they are not standard terms of business, fall within the Act's scope of protection. Hence, the clauses must not equal those on the black list and must prove to be reasonable. Since the Unfair Contract Terms Act mainly focuses on such terms that restrict or exclude liability, these terms in business to business contracts are subject to review under the Act. However, in business to business contracts a higher level of the parties' independence as professionals is applied when reviewing a questionable clause. "In commercial contracts negotiated between businessmen capable of looking after their own interests and of deciding how risks inherent in the performance of various kinds of contract can be most economically borne it is wrong to place a strained construction on words in an exclusion clause which are clear and fairly susceptible of one meaning" (Photo Production Ltd. v. Securicor Transport Ltd. [1980] AC 827). However, the fact that two business parties are dealing with each other does not automatically exclude any argument on a certain clause. In Edmund Murray Ltd. v. BSP International Foundations Ltd. [1992] 33 Con LR 1 as well as in Lease Management Services Ltd. v. Purnell Secretarial Services Ltd. [1994] 13 Trad LR 337 exclusion clauses of different types were subject to review by the court, although these clauses formed part of a business to business contract.

II. Member States that do not explicitly provide for a content review of business to business contracts

12. In contrast, there are no special clauses providing for a content review of pre-formulated terms in business to business contracts in BELGIUM, BULGARIA, CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC, FRANCE, IRELAND, ITALY, LATVIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, SLOVAKIA and SPAIN.

13. It is nevertheless worth noting that in some of these member states a content review is possible indirectly. Many Member States regulate the incorporation of standard terms in a way which has a general application to all kinds of contractual parties. In LUXEMBOURG, for example, parallel to the provisions on business to consumer contracts, provisions on the distinction between individual agreements and pre-formulated clauses were introduced into CC art. 1135-1 and a new rule on the incorporation of standard terms was adopted: according to CC art. 1135-1 standard terms are binding only as long as the other party has had the possibility of becoming acquainted with the terms at the time of signing, and if in the prevailing circumstances is to be treated as having accepted them. Whereas the review of content provided in the ConsProtA is only applicable in the context of business to consumer relationships, the incorporation rules of CC art. 1135-1 apply to all persons. In SPAIN, the provisions of Directive 93/13/EEC have been implemented into the General Contract Terms Act and the ConsProtA, in which the list of unfair clauses was extended by a further 29 clauses. Both Acts are different in terms of scope and content. The Act on standard contract terms deals with standard terms in contracts in general, its provisions apply equally to business to consumer contracts and business to business contracts. This Act however only regulates the incorporation and interpretation of standard terms, and does not review content.

14. Furthermore, the process of reviewing incorporation and interpretation often represents a hidden form of content review, in which not only formal aspects are examined. Thus, in a number of Member States the incorporation of standard terms does not merely depend upon whether the other party has had the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the contractual terms (such formal requirements are e.g. the duty of the user to inform the other party of its use of standard terms; the duty of the user to give the other party a genuine opportunity to become acquainted with the terms; the duty of the user to communicate the standard terms; the duty of the user to draft the terms transparently). Rather, in some of the Member States the content of the clause (and thus its fairness) are considered as well when deciding whether or not a term has been incorporated into the contract.

15. Finally it should be noted that some Member States apply general concepts, which can be used to correct an extremely disproportionate imbalance in the main performance duties, also in business to business contracts, such as on the basis of the laesio enormis or the benchmark of "public policy/good morals". SPANISH courts, for example, quite often use "indirect control" by applying the general theory on vices of consent (mistake, fraud, etc.). Moreover, the Civil law of Navarre and Catalonia admits a laesio enormis (but not the Spanish CC). In FRANCE, the Cass.civ. has sporadically allowed a review of clauses between two businesses (via the doctrine of cause, CC art. 1131), although the French provisions on content review are in principle limited to consumer contracts (see Cass.civ. 22 October 1996 D. 1997, 121 Société Banchereau v. Société Chronopost ; in later decisions however the Cass.civ. placed limitations on the extent of the principles developed in Chronopost, see Chambre mixte 22 April 2005, pourvoi nos. 02-18326 and 03-14112; Chambre commerciale 21 February 2006, pourvoi no. 04-20139).

II.–9:406: Exclusions from unfairness test

(1) Contract terms are not subjected to an unfairness test under this Section if they are based on:

(a) provisions of the applicable law;

(b) international conventions to which the Member States are parties, or to which the European Union is a party; or

(c) these rules.

(2) For contract terms which are drafted in plain and intelligible language, the unfairness test extends neither to the definition of the main subject matter of the contract, nor to the adequacy of the price to be paid.

COMMENTS

A. General principle and scope

This Article limits the scope of application of the unfairness test under the preceding three Articles. It contains two different exclusion rules. According to paragraph (1) contract terms which are based on statutory or international "background law" are excluded from the unfairness test. If a term is identical to a statutory provision or a provision in an international convention which is applicable to a contractual relationship, it does not make sense to control the term. If such a term were held invalid, the (identical) statutory provision or provision from a convention would apply. The unfairness tests in this Chapter give no power to control provisions of applicable law.

According to paragraph (2), the terms defining the subject matter and stating the price are excluded from the unfairness test. There are two reasons for this. First, judicial control of the quality of the goods or services as well as control of the adequacy of the price is incompatible with the needs of a market economy. Usually, the choice of the parties to enter into an exchange of goods and services for a certain price will be made individually so that there is neither room nor need for judicial control. Secondly, such control would require an application of legal criteria which do not exist (for fixing the subject matter of a contract) or an inappropriate and potentially burdensome application of legal criteria which do exist but which are intended to be invoked only in very rare cases where these matters cannot be determined from the contract terms (see e.g. II.–9:104 (Determination of price) and II.–9:108 (Quality)). These criteria are not intended to be used every time one party claims that the contractually agreed terms on price or quality are unfair.

The situation is different, however, if the requirement of transparency is not met. In the case of terms which are insufficiently transparent, an informed market decision has not been made so that it is adequate to apply judicial control. Furthermore, there is an interest to eliminate terms lacking transparency in collective proceedings.

Illustration 1

In its terms, Bank X states that securities are sold at their actual price on the stock exchange with an additional commission of 1%. The term is not subject to a review of its content under II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer) or II.–9:405 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between businesses). However, if the term is found to be lacking in transparency, it can be reviewed under II.–9:402 (Duty of transparency in terms not individually negotiated) according to II.–9:406(2).

B. Terms based on statutory provisions or international conventions

Paragraph (1) applies to terms which reflect an identical provision in a statutory or international instrument provided, however, that this provision would be applicable if the contract term did not exist. If this is the case, the term is not subject to the fairness test in this Section. In the case of international conventions, it is, therefore, not necessary for all Member States to be a party. It is sufficient that the convention is applicable because one or more Member States are a party. The provision applies to international conventions only, and not to private instruments.

Illustration 2
Airline X claims that its terms are based on the recommendations of the International Air Travel Association which are partly based on the Warsaw and Montreal Conventions. As far as the terms are identical to these conventions, the exception is applicable. This does not apply to other terms because a mere reflection of recommendations of a private association is insufficient.

It is not necessary for the statute or provision to be of a mandatory nature. Paragraph (1) only requires statutory or conventional "background law" which is identical to the contract terms so that the term is merely a restatement of an (otherwise applicable) provision or statute. Common law, customary law and case law have the same effect as statutes or conventions.

C. Terms defining the main subject matter of the contract or price

Paragraph (2) refers to the definition of the main subject matter of the contract or the adequacy of the price. The exception for subject matter of the contract means terms which identify and describe the subject matter of the contract, i.e. (in most cases) the goods or services to be delivered.

Illustration 3
In its terms X, a seller of furniture, states that the colour of the furniture actually delivered may slightly differ from the colour seen in the seller's shop or catalogue. The term does not define the colour (and thereby, the delivered goods as the subject matter of the contract) but allows the seller to deviate from this definition. The term is subject to control.

The "main subject matter of the contract" refers to the obligation characteristic of the contract (cf. Art. 4(2) of the Rome Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations). Since the present Article is based on the theory that the main subject matter is individually negotiated, where the other party has made an individual choice that a certain object has been accepted, the provision applies only as far as this individual choice has not been altered or modified by the terms of the contract. Paragraph (2) requires a distinction between the definition of the subject matter and terms which alter subject matter already defined by the parties. Whereas the former falls under paragraph (2), the latter does not. Paragraph (2) moreover, does not apply to the terms dealing with the legal effects of a definition, e.g. terms limiting the effect of a contractual warranty.

The same principles apply to terms determining the price.

Illustration 4
In its terms, a manufacturing company states that the price will be determined according to its newest price list after the conclusion of the contract. The term is subject to control because it gives the manufacturer the right to change the price unilaterally.

NOTES

I. Terms based on statutory provisions etc.

1. According to Directive 93/13/EEC art. 1(2) contractual terms which reflect mandatory statutory or regulatory provisions and provisions or principles of international conventions, particularly in the transport area, are excluded from the scope of the Directive.

2. Roughly half of the Member States have implemented this exclusion, namely BELGIUM (Unfair Trade Practices Act art. 2(2)), CYPRUS, the CZECH REPUBLIC (CC art. 64), ESTONIA (LOA § 36(1)), HUNGARY (CC § 209(5)), IRELAND (European Communities Regulations 1995 and 2000 reg. 3(1)), ITALY (ConsC art. 34(3)), PORTUGAL, ROMANIA (Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 3(2)), SPAIN (General Contract Terms Act art. 4(2)) and the UNITED KINGDOM (Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 reg. 4(2)). Under SLOVAKIAN law only legislative rules on the creation of legal instruments are excluded; however, according to the Slovakian Constitution art. 7(5) certain international conventions take priority over laws of the Slovak republic. In GERMANY, CC § 307(3) sent. 1 excludes mandatory provisions from content review (via the general clause assessing unfairness and the black and grey lists). Nevertheless, clauses repeating mandatory legislative provisions may be reviewed in terms of incorporation and transparency.

3. The remaining Member States, i.e. AUSTRIA, BELGIUM (ConsProtA), BULGARIA, DENMARK, FINLAND, FRANCE, GREECE, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, the NETHERLANDS, POLAND, SLOVENIA and SWEDEN have decided not to transpose Directive 93/13/EEC art. 1(2) at all. To some extent the exclusion of mandatory provisions may nonetheless be established as an unwritten principle through case law or legal literature, for example in the Nordic countries (Denmark, Finland, Sweden) and also in Greece and Lithuania. In AUSTRIA, following a judgment of the OGH, there is a clear assumption that the applicability of the Directive, and thus of the national implementation, is limited where contract clauses are based on national law or international conventions (judgement of 7 October 2003 – 4 Ob 130/03a).

II. Main performance duties

4. According to Directive 93/13/EEC art. 4(2) the definition of the main subject of the contract and the adequacy of the remuneration for the delivered goods or services provided are excluded from the general unfairness test established by the Directive. Therefore, the unfairness test only relates to the remaining rights and duties arising out of the contract. However, even terms defining the main subject matter or the adequacy of the price have to be in plain intelligible language.

5. In most Member States the definition of the main subject and the adequacy of the price payable for the goods or services are excluded from the unfairness test given that these clauses are drafted in plain and intelligible language, cf. BELGIUM ConsProtA art.

31(3) sent. 2; BULGARIA ConsProtA art. 145(2); CYPRUS Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 3(2); ESTONIA LOA § 42(2); FINLAND ConsProtA chap. 4 § 1; FRANCE ConsC art. L. 132-1(1) and (7); GERMANY CC § 307(3); HUNGARY CC art. 209(4); IRELAND European Communities Regulations 1995 and 2000 reg. 4; ITALY ConsC art. 34(2); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.188(5) sent. 2; MALTA Consumer Affairs Act s. 45(2); NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:231(a); POLAND CC art. 385/1(1) sent. 2; PORTUGAL ConsProtA art. 9(2)(a); ROMANIA Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 4(6); SLOVAKIA CC § 53(2); UNITED KINGDOM Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 reg. 6(2).

6. In AUSTRIA, DENMARK, GREECE, LATVIA, LUXEMBOURG, ROMANIA, SLOVENIA, SPAIN and SWEDEN Directive 93/13/EEC art. 4(2) has not been transposed, so that in principle, the monitoring of the main subject matter of the contract and the adequacy of price is possible. However, in some Member States, for example GREECE and SPAIN, this silence has produced uncertainty in interpreting national law with the result that academia and case law use different approaches to solve the problem with contradictory solutions.

II.–9:407: Factors to be taken into account in assessing unfairness

(1) When assessing the unfairness of a contractual term for the purposes of this Section, regard is to be had to the duty of transparency under II.–9:402 (Duty of transparency in terms not individually negotiated), to the nature of what is to be provided under the contract, to the circumstances prevailing during the conclusion of the contract, to the other terms of the contract and to the terms of any other contract on which the contract depends.

(2) For the purposes of II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer) the circumstances prevailing during the conclusion of the contract include the extent to which the consumer was given a real opportunity to become acquainted with the term before the conclusion of the contract.

COMMENTS

A. General principle and scope

This Article provides the criteria for the unfairness tests contained in II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer), II.–9:404 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between non-business parties) and II.–9:405 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between businesses). While these provisions define the standard of fairness, i.e. "good faith and fair dealing" in II.–9:403, and II.–9:404 and "good commercial practices" in II.–9:405, the present Article determines which factors have to be taken into account in assessing unfairness. Paragraph (1) contains a general rule which is applicable to all three unfairness tests mentioned above. Paragraph (2) concretises this rule for the unfairness test under II.–9:403, which is applicable for contracts between a business and a consumer.

B. Factors to be taken into account for all contracts

The list of factors to be taken into account when assessing the unfairness of a contract term is based on Article 4(1) Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC, and it has been clarified that the transparency of the term is also included as a factor. It has to be borne in mind that the starting point and the subject of the unfairness test is an abstract assessment of the relevant single term in question and not on "overall acceptability" of the contract as a whole. Nevertheless, other terms of the contract and terms of any other contracts on which the contract depends are also included into the assessment. This approach, however, may not compromise the principle that the subject of control is each individual term. Thus, in principle, each term has to be considered separately. An "overall acceptability" of the contract as a whole is irrelevant. Consequently, the supplier of terms is not allowed to justify an unfair term by including other terms which are favourable to the other party unless there is a close connection between the subject matter of both terms so that the favourable term constitutes an effective compensation. In particular, a low price cannot justify unfair terms unless this arrangement is the result of an individual negotiation. In summary, the reference to other terms in paragraph (1) only means that the effect of one term may be influenced by other terms.

As the unfairness test starts from an abstract assessment of an individual term, the "circumstances prevailing during the conclusion of the contract" might only influence the result of the test in exceptional cases. For instance, if the abstract fairness test has the result that the term in question lies on the borderline between fair and unfair, the term may be considered as 'only just' fair, if the party supplying the term has made a particular effort to explain the consequences of the term to the other party.

C. Additional rule for contracts between a business and a consumer

According to paragraph (1) when assessing the unfairness of a contract term regard is to be had to the duty of transparency under II.–9:402 (Duty of transparency in terms not individually negotiated). Thus, one of the factors to be taken into account is whether the term has been drafted in plain, intelligible language. This question has to be distinguished from the question regulated in paragraph (2), according to which (in consumer cases), another relevant factor is the extent to which the consumer was given a real opportunity to become acquainted with the term before the conclusion of the contract. This rule is based on several provisions of the acquis communautaire, in particular, Annex I (i) Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC, Article 4(2)(b) Package Travel Directive, Article 3 Cross-Border Credit Transfers Directive and Article 5 Financial Services Distance Selling Directive, which confirm that this aspect is a key fairness requirement (at least) in business to consumer contracts.

Paragraph (2) stipulates an intensification of the general rule in II.–9:103 (Terms not individually negotiated), according to which the supplier of non-negotiated terms has to draw the other party's attention to the terms before the conclusion of the contract. Paragraph (2) requires the business to do more, namely to give the consumer a real opportunity to become acquainted with the term.

> Illustration 1
> In a shop, there is a clear reference to the standard terms available at the cash desk. A copy of these terms is attached to the cashier's desk. It is only possible for the consumer to read these when standing immediately next to the cashier and not while waiting in line. Once the consumer has reached the cashier, there is not enough time to read the terms, since there are other clients waiting behind. The requirements of the general incorporation rule in II.–9:103 (Terms not individually negotiated) are met, because the supplier has drawn the other party's attention to the terms before the conclusion of the contract. But the requirements of paragraph (2) of the present Article are not met.

It should be noted that the consequences of II.–9:103 (Terms not individually negotiated) and of paragraph (2) of the present Article are different. If the supplier of the terms does not take reasonable steps to draw these terms to the attention of the other party, the supplier may not invoke the terms against the other party. Thus, the terms are not part of the contract unless the other party so desires. However, if the business takes reasonable steps to draw the attention of the consumer to the terms, but the consumer is not given a real opportunity to become acquainted with the term, the terms become part of the contract. Nevertheless, the lack of this opportunity is a factor which has to be taken into account when assessing whether a term is to be considered unfair.

Under paragraph (2) the supplier has to ensure that the consumer actually takes notice of the terms and has a real opportunity to read them. A real opportunity to read is both necessary and sufficient. Whether the consumer takes this opportunity or not is irrelevant.

> Illustration 2
> An online shop offers mobile phones to private customers. The active website shows a hyperlink to standard terms prior to the conclusion of the contract. It accepts orders only if the consumer confirms that the standard terms have been read. Customer B confirms that they have been read but actually has not read them. The requirements of paragraph (2) are met although B's confirmation was incorrect. B had a real opportunity to read the terms.

The requirement of a real opportunity relates to all aspects relevant to this opportunity, especially to the availability and readability of the terms. In most cases, it will be necessary to provide a readable print version of the terms prior to the conclusion of the contract and to give the consumer enough time to carefully read the terms.

Illustration 3
In a department store, the standard terms are posted on the wall right beside the cashier so that it is impossible to overlook them and consumers have a good opportunity to read them. In this case, the requirements of paragraph (2) are met.

If a term is used for several contracts in a continuing relationship between the same parties who always use the same standard contract, it will generally be sufficient if the consumer had a real opportunity to become acquainted with the term at the beginning of the relationship.

NOTES

I. Assessing the unfairness of a contract term

1. According to Directive 93/13/EEC art. 4(1) the unfairness of a contractual term is to be assessed (1) by taking the nature of the goods or services for which the contract was concluded into account, and (2) by referring to all the circumstances attending the conclusion of the contract (as at that time) and (3) in relation to all the other terms of the contract or of another contract upon which it is dependent. Recital 16 of the Directive further provides that in making an assessment of good faith, particular regard shall be given to the strength of the bargaining positions of the parties, whether the consumer had an inducement to agree to the term and whether the goods or services were sold or supplied to the special order of the consumer. Additionally, the annex to Directive 93/13/EEC has a certain indicative effect in the assessment of the fairness of a clause.
2. Directive 93/13/EEC art. 4(1) has been implemented by the Member States. Several of them make reference to all the criteria established by the Directive. Thus BELGIUM (ConsProtA art. 31(3) sent. 1), BULGARIA (ConsProtA art. 145(1)), CZECH REPUBLIC (CC art. 56), DENMARK (ContrA § 38c(2) and § 36(2)), GREECE (ConsProtA art. 2(6) sent. 2), HUNGARY (CC art. 209(2)), ITALY (ConsC art. 34(1)), LATVIA (ConsProtA art. 6(4)), LITHUANIA (CC art. 6.188(5) sent. 1), NETHERLANDS (CC art. 6:233(a)), POLAND (CC art. 385/2), ROMANIA (Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 4(5)), SLOVAKIA (CC § 54(1) and (2)), SLOVENIA (ConsProtA § 24(2)) and SPAIN (ConsProtA art. 82(3)) provide that the unfairness of a term has to be assessed by taking into account the nature of the goods or services for which the contract was concluded and all circumstances attending the conclusion of the contract and all other terms of the contract or of another contract on which it is dependent.
3. Some Member States amplify the guidance of Directive 93/13/EEC art. 4(1) by also implementing the indications given in recital 16 of the Directive. CYPRUS Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 5(2), IRELAND European Communities Regulations 1995 and 2000 schedule 2 and UNITED KINGDOM Unfair Contract Terms Act schedule 2 contain guidelines for the assessment of a term such as inter alia the strength of the bargaining positions of the parties relative to each other, whether the consumer had an inducement to agree to the term or whether the goods or services were sold or supplied to the special order of the consumer and the extent to which the seller or supplier have dealt fairly with the consumer. The MALTESE legislator gives some examples of the circumstances attending the conclusion of the contract. According to Consumer Affairs Act art. 45(2)(c) such circumstances may also include: the bargaining power of the parties; whether a consumer was subjected to undue pressure; and whether the lack of knowledge or skill of a consumer was improperly taken advantage of. In the NETHERLANDS a possibly unfair standard term has to be assessed taking into account also the identifiable mutual apparent interests of the parties (CC art. 6:233(a)).

4. Several Member States slightly deviate from the requirements of Directive 93/13/EEC art. 4(1). Thus, AUSTRIAN law only states that the circumstances of the conclusion have to be taken into account as well as the special situation of the contractual parties (CC § 879(3)); no reference is made to other terms of the contract or to the nature of the goods and services. In ESTONIA (LOA § 42(1)), FRANCE (ConsC art. 132-1(5)) and LUXEMBOURG (ConsProtA art. 1) no reference is made to the nature of the goods and services sold under the contract. GERMAN law only provides that the circumstances surrounding the conclusion of the contracts have to be taken into account for the assessment of a possibly unfair term (CC § 310(3) no. 3).

5. There is uncertainty whether changes of the circumstances can also be taken into account to the detriment of the consumer. While under FINLAND ConsProtA chap. 4 § 1 those changes may not be taken into consideration, GERMAN academics argue that taking into account those individual circumstances can also be disadvantageous for the consumer (see Ansgar Staudinger, RIW 1999, 921).

II. Consumer's possibility to become acquainted with a contract term

6. At EC level Directive 93/13/EEC annex 1(i) states that irrevocably binding the consumer to terms with which the consumer had no real opportunity of becoming acquainted before the conclusion of the contract may be regarded as unfair. Similarly, Directive 90/314/EEC art. 4(2)(b) provides that all the terms of the contract must be communicated to the consumer before the conclusion of the contract. Similarly, Directive 2002/65 art. 5(1) confirms the view that the consumer must have a real opportunity to become acquainted with the terms before the conclusion of the contract.

7. Most Member States have transposed Directive 93/13/EEC annex 1(i) and thus provide that a term irrevocably binding the consumer although he or she had no real opportunity of becoming acquainted with the content may be considered as unfair. Only DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN have not explicitly transposed the provision but the annex to the Directive was reproduced in the preparatory work for the Acts implementing the Directive.

8. In several Member States the clauses in the annex to Directive 93/13/EEC are always regarded as unfair (black list), i.e. if the consumer was not given a possibility to become acquainted with a contract term, the respective clause is deemed unfair. This applies to AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, the CZECH REPUBLIC, ITALY, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA and SLOVENIA.

9. In some legal systems standard terms only become a part of a contract if the party supplying the standard terms clearly refers to them as part of the contract before concluding the contract (or while concluding it) and the other party has an opportunity to examine their contents, cf. ESTONIA LOA § 37(1) sent. 1; GERMANY CC §

305(2); GREECE ConsProtA art. 2(7) lit. κδ. In Estonia and Germany, this rule applies not only to business to consumer but to all contracts. Similarly, HUNGARY CC art. 205/B states that "standard contract terms will become part of a contract only if they have previously been made available to the other party for perusal and if the other party has accepted the terms explicitly or through conduct that implies acceptance". Under SLOVENIAN law, the terms of a contract are binding on the consumer only if the consumer was acquainted with the complete text of the terms prior to concluding the contract. The consumer is deemed to have been acquainted with the complete text of the terms of a contract if the enterprise expressly notified him or her of, and provided easy access to, the terms (ConsProtA § 22).

10. A series of Member States, e.g. CYPRUS, FRANCE, IRELAND, the NETHERLANDS, POLAND, PORTUGAL, SLOVAKIA and the UNITED KINGDOM, have implemented the annex of Directive 93/13/EEC in the form of a non-binding grey list. Thus, terms which the consumer had no opportunity to become aware of before conclusion of the contract are only presumed to be unfair.

II.–9:408: Effects of unfair terms

(1) A term which is unfair under this Section is not binding on the party who did not supply it.

(2) If the contract can reasonably be maintained without the unfair term, the other terms remain binding on the parties.

COMMENTS

A. Purpose and scope

The provision states the legal effects of unfairness on contracts. Paragraph (1) deals with the effect of unfairness on the term itself. It follows a unilateral solution, according to which the other party is not bound to an unfair term whereas the supplier is. This means that it is for the other party to decide whether the term, regardless of its unfairness, should be applied or not. Paragraph (2) deals with the effects of paragraph (1) on the remaining contract. The contract is binding for both parties if it can be maintained without the unfair term. It is the purpose of this provision simply to strike out the unfair term so that the other side is not deprived of the advantages of a contract and to maintain the remaining contract as far as this is possible.

B. Effect of unfairness on the term considered unfair

According to paragraph (1), a term which is unfair is not binding for the other party, i.e. the party who did not supply it. Not binding means that no legal effects can be based on such a term: neither any rights against the other party nor any exclusion or limitation of rights or defences of the other party.

> Illustration 1
> In its sales terms, a seller excludes all rights of the buyer in cases of a defect except for the right to terminate the contractual relationship. A right to terminate, even without giving the seller an opportunity to cure the defect, is however expressly conferred by the term. The term is not binding on buyers, even in business to business contracts, since it excludes all rights to claim damages even in cases of gross negligence or even intent. A buyer gives notice of termination. The seller invokes the unfairness of the term, arguing that the buyer has no rights to terminate under it and must allow an opportunity for repair or replacement. According to paragraph (1), the seller is barred from invoking the unfairness of its own terms. The term is binding on the seller.

> Illustration 2
> Based on the same circumstances as in Illustration 1 but the defect was caused by the seller's negligence. As a consequence of the defect, the buyer could not resell the goods to a third party. The buyer may claim damages for lost profits from the seller. The unfair term is not binding on the buyer.

The provision can operate without any further definitions of "not binding". Not binding "on a party who did not supply them" means that the term has no legal effect against this party whereas it may be invoked against the supplier of the term, if the other party so desires. Thus, the other party, especially a consumer, has no obligation to invoke the non-binding effect in a legal proceeding. However, as stated by the ECJ in Océano Grupo (C-240/98 to C-244/98), Cofidis (C-473/00) and Mostaza Claro (C-168/05), a consumer has to be protected, even if he or she fails to raise the unfair nature of the term, either because unaware of available rights or because deterred from enforcing them. Therefore, if the consumer does not take an explicit decision as to whether to be bound to the term or not, courts have to decide on their own accord about the consequences of unfairness.

C. Effect of unfairness on the remaining contract

According to paragraph (2), a contract can be maintained without the unfair term if the content of the remaining contract without the term is legally viable. This may be the case because the term addresses a question which does not need a contractual answer either because the question is not essential or because there is a default rule or statutory background provision to fill the gap. The non-binding effect is thus as a rule limited to the unfair term. Consequently, it is no defence against a binding effect of the remaining contract that the remaining contract is less advantageous for the supplier. It is up to the supplier to supply adequate terms in order to avoid this effect.

> Illustration 3
> X buys goods from seller Y. The standard terms of Y include a general and unlimited right for the seller to change the price stated in the contract. The term is not binding. The contract, however, can be maintained without the unfair term. The seller may not claim that it is more burdensome to be bound at the initial price and that the contract would not have been concluded without the invalid term: there may be an exception when doctrines of general contract law, e.g. good faith because of hardship, apply.

A contract cannot be maintained without the unfair term if this term is essential for the contract and cannot be supplied by reference to default rules or background provisions.

NOTES

I. Consequences for the term considered unfair

1. Directive 93/13/EEC art. 6(1) provides that Member States shall lay down that unfair terms used in a contract concluded with a consumer by a seller or supplier shall, as provided for under their national law, not be binding on the consumer and that the contract shall continue to bind the parties upon those terms if it is capable of continuing in existence without the unfair terms. The ECJ first addressed the legal consequences of unfairness in Océano (judgment of 27 June 2000, joined Cases C-240/98 to C-244/98 – Océano Grupo Editorial SA v. Murciano Quintero [2000] ECR I-04941). The case concerned the procedural issue of the reviewability of a jurisdiction clause, disadvantageous to the consumer. In this decision the ECJ held, that "the protection provided for consumers by the Directive entails the national court being able to determine of its own motion whether a term of a contract (…) is unfair when making its preliminary assessment as to whether a claim should be allowed to proceed before the national courts". In Cofidis (judgment of 21 November 2002, C-473/00 – Cofidis v. Fredout, [2002] ECR I-10875) the ECJ extended the competence to review further and stated that the protection of the consumer precludes any national provision which prohibits the national court, on expiry of a limitation period, from finding that a term of the contract is unfair. In contrast to the Océano case, the dicta of the ECJ relate not only to the issue of whether the member state court can review its jurisdiction "on its own motion", but on the nullity of clauses generally. It is therefore to be assumed that, according to the view of the ECJ, national courts must have the power to review the fairness of a clause on their own initiative generally (and not only for the special case of jurisdiction clauses). In Mostaza Claro (judgment of 26 October 2006, C-168/05 – Elisa María Mostaza Claro v. Centro Móvil Milenium SL [2006] ECR I-10421, para. 36), the court clarified that Directive 93/13/EEC art. 6(1) "is a mandatory provision which, taking into account the weaker position of one of the parties to the contract, aims to replace the formal balance which the latter establishes between the rights and obligations of the parties with an effective balance which re-establishes equality between them."

2. The open wording of Directive 93/13/EEC does not clarify how the Member States shall establish the form of the non-binding nature. Many member states have decided to adopt or maintain the concept of absolute nullity. In ESTONIA, GERMANY, IRELAND, PORTUGAL, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA, SLOVENIA and SPAIN, a contractual term considered unfair will be automatically deemed null and void. In MALTA (Consumer Affairs Act s. 44(1)), FRANCE (ConsC art. L. 132-1) and LUXEMBOURG (ConsProtA art. 1), unfair clauses are regarded as non-existent or "non écrites". Apart from the wording and creation of a legal fiction, no significant practical differences between nullity and non-existence can be identified. As to the legal consequences BULGARIAN law differentiates between individually and not individually negotiated terms. According to ConsProtA art. 146(1), which transposes Directive 93/13/EEC art. 6(1), terms not individually negotiated are automatically void. In contrast, unfair terms individually negotiated are remedied only by general contract law.

3. In some Member States, however, there exists the more flexible concept of relative nullity, according to which the unfair term initially remains in force, so long as this suits the contractual partner of the user (i.e. generally the consumer), who alone can unilaterally assert its nullity. This concept of relative nullity can be found in the CZECH REPUBLIC, LATVIA and the NETHERLANDS with different specifications. According to Czech Republic CC art. 55, an unfair term is only relatively ineffectual, i.e. ineffectual only upon assertion by the consumer. According to Latvian ConsProtA art. 6(8), unfair terms included in a contract entered into between a seller or service provider and a consumer shall be declared null and void upon the consumer's request. The consumer is the one who needs to initiate particular actions in order to trigger the procedure that could ensure that the Consumer Rights Protection Centre (State Institution) or the court will declare the contractual term in question is unfair. Also in the Netherlands, CC art. 6:233 provides that an unfair term is merely voidable (vernietigbaar).

4. In a series of Member States it remains controversial whether or not the domestic provisions can be interpreted in such a way as to provide for relative nullity. In AUSTRIA, it is recognised that the jurisdiction of the relevant court is in principle to be exercised on its own motion. The unfairness of other (substantial) clauses by contrast is in principle not assessed ex officio, but rather only on a plea raised by the consumer. Under the BELGIAN ConsProtA the nullity of terms considered unfair is compulsory. However, there is some discussion on the nature of nullity. In a case concerning an infringement of the general clause of former ConsProtA art. 31, the CA Mons (judgment of 29 March 1999, Journal des Tribunaux 1999, 604) pointed out that given the relative nullity it did not have the competence to assess the unfair character of terms on its own motion. On the other hand, the CA Ghent (judgment of 3 March 2003, Algemeen Ziekenhuis St-Lucas VZW/R. Jonckheere, Tijdschrift voor Gentse rechtspraak 2003, 162) stated that although most of the provisions on unfair contract terms only concerned private interests, and consequently are sanctioned by relative nullity, there are some provisions which do concern public policy and are therefore sanctioned by absolute nullity. There are also legal scholars who proclaim absolute nullity as a general consequence of unfairness.

5. In CYPRUS, the transposition law copies the Directive, thereby stating that an unfair term does not bind the consumer (Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 6(1) and (2)). In POLAND, CC art. 385/1(1) stipulates that "prohibited contractual clauses" do not bind the consumer and no absolute nullity is expressly provided. Therefore, it remains controversial in both countries whether or not the domestic provisions can be interpreted in such a way as to provide for relative nullity.

6. According to the GREEK ConsProtA art. 2(8), the supplier cannot claim nullity of the contract as a whole if one or more terms are unfair and therefore considered void. Some authors regard this provision as an argument for relative nullity, others argue that, due to the public law character of the provisions and the lack of an explicit claim for damages for the use of unfair terms, only absolute nullity would match the intention of the domestic legislator. In HUNGARY, the legislator changed the consequences of unfairness in 2006, however, without clarifying whether the consumer can influence the validity of the term in question. CC art. 209a(2) provides that unfair clauses in consumer contracts are void. On the other hand the same article states that the unfairness of a clause can only be asserted to the advantage of the consumer. In ITALY, the legislator changed the legal consequences of the use of unfair terms by introducing the concept of protective nullity (nullità di protezione). This provides that the nullity of a clause can only occur to the advantage of the consumer, whereby the court has jurisdiction to declare the term void on its own motion (ConsC art. 36(3): "La nullità opera soltanto a vantaggio del consumatore e può essere rilevata d'ufficio dal giudice"). Against this background it remains unclear in Hungary and Italy whether, according to the present state of the law, the court can also declare nullity if the consumer expressly wishes to be bound by the clause.

7. The Nordic countries DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN traditionally apply a more flexible approach based on the vast usage of general clauses. The courts are entitled not only to declare an unfair term null and void, but also to alter, amend and adjust the particular term, other terms or the entire contract, thereby taking into account circumstances that have arisen after the contract was entered into. Although there is no relative nullity in the strict sense, this discretionary power allows the Courts to decide in the interests of the consumer. In the course of the implementation of Directive 93/13/EEC, Denmark introduced a special provision enabling the consumer to demand that the remaining part of the contract is upheld without any amendment if it is possible (ContrA art. 38c(1) referring to the general clause in art. 36(1)). Similarly in PORUTGAL, the consumer may choose to keep the contract itself in force, in accordance with the principle of conservation. Under LITHUANIAN law, the consumer is entitled to apply to a court for invalidation or alteration of any unfair term (ConsProtA art. 12(1); CC art. 6.188(6)).

II. Splitting terms

8. The possibility of a so-called partial retention, i.e. a preservation of the unfair clause with content which is still permissible, is not mentioned in Directive 93/13/EEC. One argument against a partial retention is that the clause would thereby, contrary to the prescription in Directive 93/13/EEC recital 21 and art. 6(1) not be rendered "non-binding" but merely "partly binding". Additionally, such a possibility would reduce the risk of use of unfair terms from the point of view of the business and thereby run contrary to consumer protection. It nonetheless remains unclear whether a partial retention is admissible.

9. The question whether it is admissible – if possible – to split a contract term into a valid and an unfair part i.e. to reduce an unfair term to its legally permitted core, has been regulated and discussed only in a few Member States. In SLOVAKIA, it is not expressly stated that if the contract can reasonably be maintained without the unfair terms, the other terms remain binding on the parties. However the CC establishes partial nullity of the contract, thus it is possible to split a contractual term into valid and void parts, in order to keep the valid parts. In ESTONIA, LOA § 39(2) sent. 2 states that if a term can be divided into several independent parts and one of them is void, the other parts remain valid. Similarly, under NETHERLANDS CC art. 3:42 a contractual, invalid (annulled) term can be legally replaced by a contractual term that would have been agreed on by the parties. In AUSTRIA and the UNITED KINGDOM the legitimacy of such a "reduction" of an unfair term is still being controversially discussed in legal literature, whereas in GERMANY it is acknowledged case law (BGHZ 114, 342; BGHZ 120, 122 and NJW 2000, 1110) and established in legal literature that a reduction is inadmissible for it would stimulate the use of unfair terms and weaken consumer protection. The latter legal attitude also applies to GREECE.

III. Consequences for the contract as a whole

10. Directive 93/13/EEC art. 6(1) envisages that unfair clauses are not binding, whereas the remainder of the contract is usually preserved. Thus the whole contract remains binding on both parties, so long as this is possible without the offending clause according to the purpose and legal nature of the contract. The nullity is thus as a rule limited to the unreasonable term. In Ynos (judgment of 10 January 2006, C-302/04 – Ynos Kft v. János Varga [2006] ECR I-00371) the ECJ was asked whether the hypothetical consideration of whether the business or user would have concluded the contract without the corresponding term, is to be taken into account in Hungarian law, but as the facts occurred prior to Hungary's accession to the European Union, the ECJ stated it lacked jurisdiction, without giving an opinion. However, it seems to be fairly clear from the Directive that the contract stays in force, and the trader has to live with the fact that the particular clause is no longer available.

11. As far as the consequences for the contract as a whole are concerned, virtually all member states followed the prescriptions of the Directive upholding the entire contact if it is capable of a continuing existence without the unfair terms. Minor differences relate to the exact legal techniques applied. Some countries achieve the result via general contract law while others have inserted a specific provision in the relevant act or chapter dealing with unfair contract terms, e.g. CYPRUS Unfair Contract Terms Act art. 6; IRELAND European Communities Regulations 1995 and 2000 reg. 6(1); ITALY ConsC art. 36(1); LATVIA ConsProtA art. 6(8); LITHUANIA CC art. 6.186(6); POLAND CC art. 385/1 § 1 and § 2. In GERMANY the contract as a whole stays in force as long as this effect does not constitute an unacceptable burden on one of the parties (CC § 306(3)). Because of the more flexible approach as described above, SWEDEN has not explicitly regulated the consequences for the contract. In FINLAND, the contract as a whole may either be altered or ordered to lapse if this is in favour of the consumer (ConsProtA chap. 4 § 2). Under ESTONIAN law (LOA § 41 sent. 1) the remaining part of the contract is valid unless the party supplying the term proves that the party would not have entered into the contract without the standard term which is void or deemed not to be part of the contract. The same hypothetical assumption can be found in SLOVENIA.

IV. Other consequences

12. Directive 93/13/EEC does not prescribe any further sanctions for the use of unfair terms such as damages, fines and criminal penalties.

13. Nevertheless, a number of Member States in using the minimum harmonisation (cf. Directive 93/13/EEC art. 8) have provided for compensation for the use of unfair contract terms. In BELGIUM, BULGARIA, the CZECH REPUBLIC, ESTONIA, HUNGARY, GERMANY, ITALY, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, MALTA, PORTUGAL, ROMANIA, SLOVAKIA, SLOVENIA, SPAIN and the UNITED KINGDOM compensation is available under general civil law principles (via breach of a contractual duty, tort or delict or related concepts).

II.–9:409: Exclusive jurisdiction clauses

(1) A term in a contract between a business and a consumer is unfair for the purposes of this Section if it is supplied by the business and if it confers exclusive jurisdiction for all disputes arising under the contract on the court for the place where the business is domiciled.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply if the chosen court is also the court for the place where the consumer is domiciled.

COMMENTS

A. Background and scope

This Article is based on the ECJ's judgment in C-240/98 – Oceano Grupo, according to which a term conferring exclusive jurisdiction for all disputes arising under a contract between a business and a consumer on the court for the place where the business is domiciled, is unfair under Article 3 of the Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC.

The Article does not address the procedural admissibility of jurisdiction terms. It only deals with the question of their contractual validity. It applies to jurisdiction terms which are included in a contract as well as to separate agreements. It does not distinguish between terms addressing international jurisdiction and those addressing local jurisdiction or venue. If the term provides for the jurisdiction at the domicile of the business, it is regarded as unfair.

B. Relation to other jurisdictional terms and Brussels I Regulation

The provision does not exclude other jurisdictional terms, e.g. terms giving jurisdiction to another remote forum, from falling under II.–9:404 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between non-business parties), II.–9:405 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between businesses) and II.–9:410 (lit. (p). The same may apply to arbitration clauses (cf. ECJ C-168/05 – Elisa María Mostaza Claro v. Centro Móvil Milenium SL).

In international cases, Articles 15 to 17 of the Brussels I Regulation may apply. According to Art. 17, a business may enter into a jurisdictional agreement with a consumer (i) if it is concluded after the dispute has arisen; (ii) if it allows the consumer to bring proceedings in courts other than those indicated in Art. 15 or 16 of the Brussels I Regulation; (iii) or if it is entered into by both the consumer and the other party within the contract, both of whom at the time of conclusion of the contract are domiciled or habitually resident in the same Member State on whose courts jurisdiction is conferred, provided that such an agreement is not contrary to the law of that Member State. As the wording of paragraph (1), only leaves room for cases (i) and (ii), paragraph (2) clarifies that a jurisdiction term stipulating case (iii) is also not prohibited by this provision.

Illustration 1
In its standard terms for consumer contracts, business A states: "All disputes arising from or in the context of this contract are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of our domicile". The term is invalid.

Illustration 2
In contracts used for consumers domiciled in the same Member State X as the business, a term states: "All disputes arising from or in the context of this contract are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of X." The term does not give preference to the courts at the domicile of the business; it only assures that the courts of State X still have jurisdiction if the consumer leaves the country after the conclusion of the contract. The term is valid.

NOTES

1. Contract terms, conferring exclusive jurisdiction for all disputes arising under the contract on the court for the place where the business is domiciled fall with within the category of terms which have the object or effect of excluding or hindering the consumer's right to take legal action, a category referred to in Directive 93/13/EEC annex 1(q). Since the annex of the Directive only contains an indicative and non-exhaustive list of the terms which may be regarded as unfair, exclusive jurisdiction clauses were not per se unfair under the Directive. However, in C-240/98 – Oceano Grupo, the ECJ ruled that those terms are in any case unfair under Directive 93/13/EEC art. 3.
2. Member States have transposed the Annex of Directive 93/13/EEC differently (see Notes on II.–9:410 (Terms which are presumed to be unfair in contracts between a business and a consumer)). In AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, the CZECH REPUBLIC, ESTONIA, GREECE, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, LUXEMBOURG, MALTA, SLOVENIA and SPAIN, where the clauses in the annex are always regarded as unfair (black list), exclusive jurisdiction clauses are per se unfair. The same applies to GERMANY, HUNGARY, the NETHERLANDS and PORTUGAL (countries that have opted for a combination of both black and grey lists), where Directive 93/13/EEC annex 1(q) can be found in the black list.
3. In CYPRUS, FRANCE, IRELAND, ITALY, POLAND, SLOVAKIA and the UNITED KINGDOM, where Directive 93/13/EEC annex 1(q) has been implemented as non-binding grey letter rule, those clauses are only presumed to be unfair.

II.–9:410: Terms which are presumed to be unfair in contracts between a business and a consumer

(1) A term in a contract between a business and a consumer is presumed to be unfair for the purposes of this Section if it is supplied by the business and if it:

(a) excludes or limits the liability of a business for death or personal injury caused to a consumer through an act or omission of that business;

(b) inappropriately excludes or limits the remedies, including any right to set-off, available to the consumer against the business or a third party for non-performance by the business of obligations under the contract;

(c) makes binding on a consumer an obligation which is subject to a condition the fulfilment of which depends solely on the intention of the business;

(d) permits a business to keep money paid by a consumer if the latter decides not to conclude the contract, or perform obligations under it, without providing for the consumer to receive compensation of an equivalent amount from the business in the reverse situation;

(e) requires a consumer who fails to perform his or her obligations to pay a disproportionately high amount of damages;

(f) entitles a business to withdraw from or terminate the contractual relationship on a discretionary basis without giving the same right to the consumer, or entitles a business to keep money paid for services not yet supplied in the case where the business withdraws from or terminates the contractual relationship;

(g) enables a business to terminate a contractual relationship of indeterminate duration without reasonable notice, except where there are serious grounds for doing so; this does not affect terms in financial services contracts where there is a valid reason, provided that the supplier is required to inform the other contracting party thereof immediately;

(h) automatically extends a contract of fixed duration unless the consumer indicates otherwise, in cases where such terms provide for an unreasonably early deadline;

(i) enables a business to alter the terms of the contract unilaterally without a valid reason which is specified in the contract; this does not affect terms under which a supplier of financial services reserves the right to change the rate of interest to be paid by, or to, the consumer, or the amount of other charges for financial services without notice where there is a valid reason, provided that the supplier is required to inform the consumer at the earliest opportunity and that the consumer is free to terminate the contractual relationship with immediate effect; neither does it affect terms under which a business reserves the right to alter unilaterally the conditions of a contract of indeterminate duration, provided that the business is required to inform the consumer with reasonable notice, and that the consumer is free to terminate the contractual relationship;

(j) enables a business to alter unilaterally without a valid reason any characteristics of the goods, other assets or services to be provided;

(k) provides that the price of goods or other assets is to be determined at the time of delivery or supply, or allows a business to increase the price without giving the consumer the right to withdraw if the increased price is too high in relation to the price agreed at the conclusion of the contract; this does not affect price-indexation clauses, where lawful, provided that the method by which prices vary is explicitly described;

(l) gives a business the right to determine whether the goods, other assets or services supplied are in conformity with the contract, or gives the business the exclusive right to interpret any term of the contract;

(m) limits the obligation of a business to respect commitments undertaken by its agents, or makes its commitments subject to compliance with a particular formality;

(n) obliges a consumer to fulfil all his or her obligations where the business fails to fulfil its own;

(o) allows a business to transfer its rights and obligations under the contract without the consumer's consent, if this could reduce the guarantees available to the consumer;

(p) excludes or restricts a consumer's right to take legal action or to exercise any other remedy, in particular by referring the consumer to arbitration proceedings which are not covered by legal provisions, by unduly restricting the evidence available to the consumer, or by shifting a burden of proof on to the consumer;

(q) allows a business, where what has been ordered is unavailable, to supply an equivalent without having expressly informed the consumer of this possibility and of the fact that the business must bear the cost of returning what the consumer has received under the contract if the consumer exercises a right to withdraw.

(2) Subparagraphs (g), (i) and (k) do not apply to:

(a) transactions in transferable securities, financial instruments and other products or services where the price is linked to fluctuations in a stock exchange quotation or index or a financial market rate beyond the control of the business;

(b) contracts for the purchase or sale of foreign currency, traveller's cheques or international money orders denominated in foreign currency.

COMMENTS

A. Background and general scope

This Article contains a list of terms which would typically constitute a serious disadvantage for a consumer. Therefore these terms are presumed to be unfair in contracts between a business and a consumer if such a term is supplied by the business. The purpose of the non-exhaustive list is to give examples of terms which are typically unfair under II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer). Apart from some minor linguistic variations, the list is more or less a restatement of the Annex to the Unfair Terms Directive 1993/13/EEC with two notable exceptions. Firstly the reference in paragraph (1) lit. (i) of the Annex to terms with which the consumer had no real opportunity to become acquainted before the conclusion of the contract has been dropped from the list, since this provision is sufficiently reflected in II.–9:407 (Factors to be taken into account in assessing unfairness) paragraph (2). Secondly, some of the exceptions in listed in paragraph 2 of the Annex have been incorporated into the listed terms themselves.

B. "Grey list" instead of "indicative list" or "black list"

The general character of the list has been changed. Whereas the list in the Annex of Directive 1993/13/EEC is only indicative, the list in the present Article DCFR is, following the model of several Member States, a "grey list" of terms which are presumed to be unfair. It is a political question, whether it would even be better for some of the items on this "grey list" to be placed on a "black list" in the sense that such a term cannot be justified by any means and is thus invalid even in very exceptional cases. A candidate to be blacklisted could be a term that excludes or limits the liability of a business for death and personal injury caused to a consumer (cf. paragraph (1)(a)). But this example shows that there must be exceptions (e.g. terms limiting strict liability under the law on non-contractual liability for damage). Therefore these model rules do not blacklist terms except in the single case of II.–9:409 (Exclusive jurisdiction clauses) which goes back to a clear ECJ judgment. But even this very short "black list" with only one item on the "list" in II.–9:409 proves the disadvantages of such a rigid approach, as it became necessary to spell out the exception in paragraph (2). As a result, the "grey list", which is only presumptive, generally seemed the favourable and more flexible approach even for those cases where terms can be justified only in very exceptional cases.

C. List of examples

The list of examples of unfair terms contains inter alia terms that exclude the business's liability in cases of personal injury inflicted by the business or a limitation or inclusion of important contractual remedies in cases of non-performance or terms that give complete control to the business over the "if" and "how" of the performance.

Illustration 1
According to its standard terms, business A limits its liability to cases of intention and gross negligence. The term applies to all kinds of damage so that cases of death or personal injury are included. The term falls under paragraph (1)(a) since X excludes its liability for death and personal injury in cases of simple negligence.

Illustration 2
The standard terms of bus company B state that scheduled journeys are subject to cancellation without prior notice. The terms are meant to apply even if a passenger has a ticket with a reservation for a certain journey. Paragraph (1)(c) applies because the right to cancel is not limited to certain cases such as force majeure, impossibility etc.

Illustration 3
Electrician C provides electrical installations for private homes. In order to be compensated for the effort of initially estimating the costs, C's terms state in a sufficiently transparent manner that a down-payment is required for the costs of an estimate and that it will not be refunded if no contract is concluded. If asked to estimate for a certain project, C informs potential customers about this term but refuses to enter into any negotiations about this issue. Technically, the term falls under paragraph (1)(d) since the electrician can keep money paid by the consumer without giving the consumer the equivalent right in the reverse situation. However, under these circumstances it is clear for a consumer that an estimate is not available for free. Although the term technically constitutes a non-negotiated term, the situation is similar to free consent. The consumer is sufficiently informed about the costs of the estimate and agrees to these terms in a way which is similar to a separate contract. Provided that this is the case, the term may be considered acceptable although it falls under paragraph (1)(d).

Even if a term does not fall under one of the examples contained in paragraph (1) the list of examples may provide some guidance when assessing whether a term is to be considered unfair under II.–9:403 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer") as the examples in the present Article may be considered as statements of more general fairness principles.

Illustration 4
The terms of a package travel company state that tourists may be excluded from the package tour if one of the providers (e.g. hotel or transportation) asks the package travel company to do so. The term does not fall under paragraph (1)(g) since a contract for a package travel tour does not constitute a contract of indeterminate duration; nor is the term covered by any other subparagraph of paragraph (1). However, paragraph

(1)(g) may be seen as a statement of the principle that a termination of a contractual relationship requires a sufficient reason, adequate under the circumstances. The mere wish of one of the providers is not sufficient for this purpose: so that the term should be held unfair under II.–9:404 (Meaning of "unfair" in contracts between a business and a consumer").

C. Interpretation of the examples

Some of the examples listed in the present Article comprise terms which require judicial discretion, e.g., "reasonable", "unreasonable", "valid reason", "disproportionate" or "inappropriate". In such a case, judicial discretion can only exist in a "weaker sense" (for this term see Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously, Cambridge/Mass. (1978), p. 31), which means that judges must not follow their personal subjective standards but develop reliable objective case law in order to give meaning to these provisions.

Illustration 5
The standard terms of seller A state that "a set-off against our claims is excluded, unless it is based on a counterclaim recognised by a final court decision". The question whether this term is covered by paragraph (1)(b) depends on an interpretation of the word "inappropriately" in this provision. The courts have to develop a reliable case law for the interpretation of this term. In this context, courts should consider that there are other cases where the existence of a counterclaim is obvious, e.g. if the seller does not dispute the counterclaim or if the seller's defences against the counterclaim are obviously unfounded. Therefore, such a term should be considered to be contrary to paragraph (1)(b).

NOTES

Grey list or black list?

1. According to Directive 93/13/EEC art. 3(3), the "annex shall contain an indicative and non-exhaustive list of the terms which may be regarded as unfair." Therefore, a contractual term corresponding to the annex is not automatically unfair. In contrast to the preliminary drafts of Directive 93/13/EEC (see COM 90, 322 final and COM 92, 66 final) the annex does not contain a so-called "black list" of terms which are always (per se) ineffective. Rather, the annex – as the ECJ emphasised in C-478/99 (judgment of 7 May 2002, C-478/99 – Commission of the European Communities v. Kingdom of Sweden [2002] ECR I-04147, at para. 22) – "is of indicative and illustrative value". As stated in the opinion of advocate general Geelhoed (at para. 29) – "The list thus offers the courts and other competent bodies, affected groups and individual consumers, sellers and suppliers – including those from another Member State – a criterion for interpreting the expression unfair terms. Thus by giving concrete form to the open provision contained in art. 3(1), that is to say, the first criterion for determining whether a contractual term is unfair, their certainty is reinforced." In this respect the annex to Directive 93/13/EEC is usually referred to as a "grey list".
2. In AUSTRIA (ConsProtA § 6), BELGIUM (ConsProtA art. 32), BULGARIA, the CZECH REPUBLIC (CC art. 56(3)), ESTONIA, GREECE (ConsProtA art. 2(7)), LATVIA, LITHUANIA (CC art. 6.188(2)), LUXEMBOURG (ConsProtA art. 2), MALTA (Consumer Affairs Act s. 44), ROMANIA (Unfair Contract Terms Act annex), and SPAIN the clauses in the annex – in so far as they have been transposed – are always regarded as unfair (black list). In MALTA, the Minister responsible for consumer affairs after consultation with the Consumer Affairs Council is empowered to amend, substitute or revoke any of the terms in the black list. In SLOVENIA the wording of ConsProtA § 24(3) ("contract terms are regarded as unfair") indicates a black list. However, until now there is no case-law or literature confirming this interpretation.

3. A series of Member States have opted for a combination of both black and grey lists. Thus, in ESTONIAN law, a non-exhaustive "black list" of typically unfair standard terms can be found in LOA § 42(3). For business to business contracts the same list is applied as a "grey list" (LOA § 44), i.e. in this case the listed term is only presumed to be unfair. In GERMANY, CC § 308 contains a grey list followed by a black list in CC § 309. Although these lists are according to the wording of the law only applicable in business to consumer situations they have a strong indicative significance in business to business situations, as well (CC § 310(1) sent. 2). ITALIAN law also contains a grey list (ConsC art. 33(2)) as well as a black list (ConsC art. 36(2)) and the black list in certain cases even applies to terms individually negotiated. In the NETHERLANDS, CC art. 6:236 contains a black list and CC art. 6:237 a grey list for business to consumer situations. HUNGARY and PORTUGAL have also adopted both a black and a grey list.

4. In CYPRUS (Unfair Contract Terms Act annex to art. 5(4)), FRANCE, IRELAND, POLAND, SLOVAKIA and the UNITED KINGDOM on the other hand there are only non-binding grey lists. In special cases, however, other legislation (such as in the United Kingdom through the Unfair Contract Terms Act) can result in certain clauses being rendered unfair per se. In France, the annex is by contrast only a "light" grey, as the list is not binding on the judge. The clauses contained in the Annex have an indicative function, as according to ConsC art. L. 132-1(3) sent. 2, a consumer involved in a dispute is not relieved of the burden of proving a term is unfair. Moreover, the judge must decide whether the criteria of unfairness are fulfilled on a case by case basis.

5. FINNISH law does not contain any list, neither grey nor black, regarding unfair terms. However, in transposing Directive 93/13/EEC the grey list contained in its annex was reproduced in the preparatory work for the implementing Act (ConsProtA). According to common legal tradition in the Nordic countries, this preparatory work constitutes an important aid for the interpretation of an Act. The same applies to DENMARK and SWEDEN. This legislative technique was accepted by the ECJ in C-478/99 (judgment of 7 May 2002, C-478/99 – Commission of the European Communities v. Kingdom of Sweden [2002] ECR I-04147). It can thus be said that the Nordic countries have an "indirect" grey list.

6. It has to be noticed that national case law can have wide ramifications on the character of the listed rules. In certain circumstances it can therefore be the case that rules indicated in the table as "grey letter rules" have to all intents and purposes become "black letter rules" through the Member State's case law.

BOOK III

OBLIGATIONS AND CORRESPONDING RIGHTS

CHAPTER 1: GENERAL

III.–1:101: Scope of Book

This Book applies, except as otherwise provided, to all obligations within the scope of these rules, whether they are contractual or not, and to corresponding rights to performance.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Chapter moves from rules relating to contracts and other juridical acts to rules relating to obligations and corresponding rights to performance. The obligations and corresponding rights must be within the intended scope of the model rules but, as is made clear by the next Article, need not arise from a contract.

B. Limited scope

The scope of this Book is limited by the intended field of application of these rules as a whole. This means that it is not intended to apply, for example, to public law rights and obligations, to family law rights and obligations, to employment law rights and obligations or to land law rights and obligations. Many non-contractual obligations – for example, obligations to pay taxes or social security contributions, or obligations to submit reports and returns – are of a public law nature and therefore beyond the intended scope of these rules. The legislation imposing the obligations can be expected to regulate the modalities of performance and the consequences of non-performance. Of course, there is nothing to stop a legislator, when imposing an obligation of any kind, from adopting rules similar to those in this Book or from making provision by reference or analogy on such matters as place of performance and time of performance and the remedies for non-performance. But the intended field of application of this Book is what might be called traditional obligations of a patrimonial law nature in the field of private law, and corresponding rights.

Not all legal systems commonly refer to all such obligations by that name. They may, for example, speak of “liability” to pay damages for loss caused to another rather than “an obligation” to do so. But in practice the modalities of the liability – for example, where the damages must be paid, or whether interest in payable – are then governed by the same rules, or close parallels to them, as apply to contractual obligations. It seems better to use the one word “obligation” in relation to all cases in which, as a matter of private law, a person must render a performance of some kind to another.

C. Obligations, rather than duties

The Book does not contain general rules on duties, as opposed to obligations. So, for example, the normal rules on non-performance of an obligation do not apply to a breach of the moral duty not to harm other people, intentionally or negligently, without justification. It is only when legally relevant damage has occurred that an obligation to make reparation arises. The circumstances in which the obligation does arise are set out in the Book on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another. The way in which the obligation falls to be performed is also regulated where necessary in that Book but some aspects do not need to be regulated there because they are covered by the general rules in this Book.

D. Obligations, rather than contractual obligations

There are good reasons for not applying this Book only to contractual obligations and corresponding contractual rights. It is not only contractual obligations which must be performed and which may not be performed. It is not only contractual rights which prescribe after a certain length of time. It is not only contractual rights which can be assigned. In many situations the legal relations between two or more parties will be composed of a mixture of mutual rights and obligations, not all of them arising from a contract. Rules are necessary in relation to all types of obligations. This was already recognised in the Principles of European Contract Law where, in spite of the name, many of the Articles, particularly in Part III, apply to rights and obligations in general.

The obligations to which this Book applies include, for example, obligations arising out of unilateral promises or undertakings, pre-contractual obligations, obligations arising by operation of law to pay damages for loss caused to another, obligations arising by operation of law out of benevolent intervention in another's affairs, and obligations arising by operation of law to reverse an unjustified enrichment. In the last case the obligations will generally be to return property or pay a monetary equivalent. In all of these cases questions may arise about the modalities of performance. When and where, for example, must an obligation to reverse an enrichment be performed? And in all of them questions may arise about the meaning of, and remedies for, non-performance. Sometimes these matters are dealt with specifically in the relevant places but it is advantageous not to have to repeat default rules of a standard type in every provision for a non-contractual obligation.

There are, however, a few provisions which apply only to contractual obligations – as is indicated by the words "except as otherwise provided". These are clearly identified. Of course, such specific provisions prevail over the general rule. (I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (5).)

III.–1:102: Definitions

(1) An obligation is a duty to perform which one party to a legal relationship, the debtor, owes to another party, the creditor.

(2) Performance of an obligation is the doing by the debtor of what is to be done under the obligation or the not doing by the debtor of what is not to be done.

(3) Non-performance of an obligation is any failure to perform the obligation, whether or not excused, and includes delayed performance and any other performance which is not in accordance with the terms regulating the obligation.

(4) An obligation is reciprocal in relation to another obligation if:

(a) performance of the obligation is due in exchange for performance of the other obligation;

(b) it is an obligation to facilitate or accept performance of the other obligation; or

(c) it is so clearly connected to the other obligation or its subject matter that performance of the one can reasonably be regarded as dependent on performance of the other.

(5) The terms regulating an obligation may be derived from a contract or other juridical act, the law or a legally binding usage or practice, or a court order; and similarly for the terms regulating a right.

COMMENTS

A. "Obligation"

It is necessary to define "obligation" because in national laws and legal literature the word is used in at least two senses. Sometimes it is used, as here, as the correlative of a right to performance – the debtor's side of the legal relationship between the debtor and the creditor. The expression "rights and obligations" is found very frequently. Sometimes the word "obligation" is used to denote the whole legal relationship between the debtor and the creditor. This usage, although traditional and eminently respectable, appears to be less frequent in modern European and international legal instruments. The Principles of European Contract Law, for example, use "obligation" predominantly in the first sense. An obligation is performed or not performed. One does not perform a relationship. The important thing from the drafting point of view is to make a clear choice and stick to it. Paragraph (1) of the Article defines "obligation" in the first of the two senses mentioned.

Under the definition in paragraph (1) an obligation presupposes a legal relationship and is owed to a particular creditor. This is one of the features which distinguishes an obligation from a duty under these rules. A person has a duty if that person is bound to do something, or expected to do something, in accordance with an applicable normative standard of conduct (see Annex 1). A duty does not presuppose a legal relationship and need not be owed to a particular creditor. There can, for example, be a duty to be a good citizen or a duty not to cause harm to others without justification but these would not be obligations in the sense in which the word is used here. Another difference is that there is normally, in principle, a remedy for non-performance of an obligation. Unless otherwise stated, the normal remedies for non-performance are available. There is not necessarily a remedy or sanction for a breach of a duty. It follows that when these rules impose a duty, rather than an obligation, they state the sanction, if any, for breach of the duty. The normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation will not automatically apply.

References to a “debtor” in these rules are to a person who owes an obligation, whether or not the content of the obligation is the payment of money (a monetary obligation). This in turn makes it possible, without risk of misunderstanding, to use the words “debtor” and “creditor” in later provisions rather than “debtor” and “creditor”, which are not common English words and which can be confusing.

It will be a question of wording and of interpretation whether a particular statement gives rise to an obligation or is merely a representation (which might nonetheless give rise to various remedies if it is false). A statement relating to the conformity of x to y might, for example, be a simple representation that x does in fact conform to y, or the undertaking of an obligation to ensure that x does conform to y, or the undertaking of an obligation to pay a certain sum if x does not conform to y.

B. “Performance”

The main purpose of this definition is to remove a possible doubt as to whether “performance” can apply only to an obligation to do something, with some word like “forbearance” being used for an obligation not to do something. The definition makes it clear that “performance” covers both positive and negative obligations.

C. “Non-performance”

Under the system adopted in these rules non-performance of an obligation is any failure to perform the obligation. There is a unitary concept of non-performance. In the case of an obligation to receive or accept the other party's performance the failure to perform may take the form of refusing to accept the performance. Non-performance is not limited to total failure to perform. The non-performance may consist in a defective performance (i.e. a performance which does not conform to the terms regulating the obligation) or in a failure to perform at the time performance is due, be it a performance which is effected too early, too late or never.

Non-performance is used of any non-performance whether or not excused. The consequence of this is that when a remedy is available only for a non-excused non-performance this has to be made clear.

Whether or not there is non-performance will depend on the terms regulating the obligation and on the facts. A distinction is often made between an obligation to achieve a particular result (“obligation de résultat”) and an obligation to make reasonable efforts to do something or use reasonable skill or take reasonable care in doing something (“obligation de moyens”). In the latter case there will be a non-performance only if reasonable efforts are not made, or reasonable skill or care is not taken. Many variations are possible as to the degree of effort, care or skill required.

D. “Reciprocal”

Some rules apply, and some remedies for non-performance are available, only in the case of reciprocal obligations. This is the case for the rules on the order of performance and for the remedy of withholding performance. In the contractual context the notion of reciprocal obligations is also important in the remedy of termination for fundamental non-performance. Generally speaking, however, the relevant distinction here is not between contractual and non-contractual obligations. It would be wrong to suppose that all contractual obligations are reciprocal and all non-contractual obligations are not reciprocal. There can be a contract in which only one party has obligations, the other party being not even obliged to accept performance. And there can be a contract in which there are different packages of obligations, the obligations of one party in one package not being reciprocal to the obligations of the other party in another package. Conversely, there can be reciprocal obligations which arise under separate contracts in an inter-related series of contracts between the same parties. There may even be cases where a non-contractual obligation and a contractual obligation may be reciprocal. For example, an obligation under a unilateral promise may be the counterpart of an obligation under a contract. And there can be cases where two non-contractual obligations are reciprocal. For example both parties may be enriched and disadvantaged by the same void contract. Both may be under an obligation to reverse the relevant enrichment. Each obligation is the counterpart of the other. In short, reciprocal obligations need not both be contractual and, if contractual, need not both arise from the same contract

It should not be assumed that it is only in the case of complicated commercial transactions that there can be a mixture of inter-related contractual and non-contractual obligations. This is often so in the case of ordinary consumer transactions. One common example is the combination of rights and obligations under a unilateral guarantee and rights and obligations under a related contract. Another might be, depending on the actual terms, the common marketing device announced by the slogan "Buy one. Get one free." Whatever the economic reality of such a situation, it may in certain cases have to be analysed legally as a combination of a contract and a unilateral undertaking, with reciprocal obligations under each. And consumers may be affected by reciprocal non-contractual obligations. For example, if a consumer avoids a contract the law on unjustified enrichment may give rise to reciprocal obligations between the consumer and the business.

The definition of "reciprocal" covers not only an obligation performance of which is due in exchange for performance of the first obligation but also an obligation to facilitate or accept performance of the first obligation and an obligation which is so clearly connected to the other obligation or its subject matter that performance of the one can reasonably be regarded as dependent on performance of the other. Examples of this last category might be an obligation to do something only if the other party performs an obligation to supply certain information or pay certain expenses or return certain property. One typical case is where there is an obligation to return property only if certain costs related to keeping it and protecting it from damage are paid.

E. "Terms regulating an obligation"

The only reason for having this definition is that the expressions "terms regulating an obligation" or "terms regulating a right" are not so familiar as "terms of a contract" and may cause some initial uncertainty. The definition makes it clear that the terms regulating an obligation or a corresponding right may be derived from a contract or other juridical act, from a law, from a court order or from a legally binding usage or practice.

NOTES

Non-performance as a unitary concept

1. Non-performance as used here covers failure to perform an obligation in any way, whether by a complete failure to do anything, late performance or defective performance. Furthermore, it covers both excused and non-excused non-performance. This unitary concept of non-performance is found in some but not all of the legal systems.

2. Breach of contract in ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law covers the non-excused non-performance of any contractual obligation, and so does the FRENCH "inexécution": non-performance covers both non-performance, whether total or partial, and defective performance. (See CC art. 1146). In such cases, the creditor may pursue specific performance of the contractual obligations if it is possible, failing which damages are available. This corresponds to the concept of "tekortkoming" in DUTCH law; see CC arts. 6:74 and 6:265 ; to "niet-nakoming" (sometimes "tekortkoming", "wanprestatie") / "inexécution" in BELGIAN law (CC art. 1146); non- performance; in ITALIAN law, see CC arts. 1218 and 1453 ff; and "kontraktsbrott" or "misligholdelse" in NORDIC law, see Ussing, Obligationsretten[4], 20, 50 and Bryde Andersen & Lookofsky 27. In FINNISH law, "kontraktsbrott" or "sopismusrikkomus", see Taxell, Avtal och rättsskydd 171. See also on "breach" in CISG arts. 45-52, 61-65 and 75-80 and on "non-performance" UNIDROIT arts. 7.1.1 ff. The SPANISH CC art. 1101 has a broad concept of non-performance. Each "non-fulfilment" (contravencíon) is regarded as a breach, whatever form it may take - delay, non-delivery, bad performance, hidden defects of the asset (Carrasco, Albaladejo- Comentarios CC y Compilaciones Forales, XV-2º, pp. 392 ff). In AUSTRIA the term non-performance (Nichterfüllung) is used for non-performance and late-performance as well as bad performance, see Rummel in Rummel, ABGB I, 3rd ed., Pref. to §§ 918 no. 1. Similarly, LOA § 100 in ESTONIAN law provides for a unitary concept of non-performance of an obligation.

3. In POLISH law CC art. 471 uses the notion of "non-performance or improper performance of an obligation", which covers all cases of lack of performance or failure to comply with the contents of the obligation. This is also the position in SLOVENIAN law; see Plavšak in Juhart/Plavšak, 537.

4. In GERMAN law non-performance ("Nichterfüllung") was not accepted for terminological reasons. Instead the central category of the new law of obligations since 2002 is breach of a duty ("Pflichtverletzung"), which also covers the breach of contractual duties to protect the other party's integrity ("Schutzpflichten"). The central norm of the concept is CC § 280 which generally provides for a claim for damages in case of a breach of a duty. The breach of a duty is a prerequisite to most other remedies as well, see Schlechtriem and Schmidt-Kessel, Schuldrecht, Allgemeiner Teil[6], 219.

5. In GREEK LAW, the CC has no single concept of non-performance: it regulates impossibility of performance, on the one hand, and default of the debtor, on the other. All other instances fall within a third category, that of improper performance, which is not regulated, but to which the consequences of impossibility of performance and default of the debtor apply by analogy (see Michael P. Stathopoulos, Contract Law in Hellas, Athens, 1995, no. 262).

6. In PORTUGUESE law (CC arts. 790 ff, 799, 804 ff) non-performance covers impossibility, delay in performance and defective performance (lack of conformity, in consumer contracts).

7. In CZECH law, the concept of "non-performance" exists and can be found in written law by reasoning a contrario, because under the general principle in CC § 559, "a debt is discharged by its performance". The word "non-performance" of an obligation ("nesplnění" or "neplnění") - often used by local judges - appears only very occasionally in the Ccom (arts. 323a, 347, 376, 392, 435, 662 and 750) and never in the CC. Instead of a general notion of "non-performance", the written CZECH law prefers to use a more specified concept of delayed performance, i.e. “delay in performance” which is considered as non-performance. This concept is based on the existence of a general concept of due performance ("a debt must be duly and timeously fulfilled" under CC § 559 and the Commercial Law decrees that "an obligation is discharged when performed to the creditor duly and in time" Ccom art. 324). So notions of "faulty performance" or "defective performance" or "delayed performance" of a civil or commercial obligation can be found in many legal dispositions (see CC arts. 169e, 517, 519, 520, 522, 568, 592 for delayed performance considered as a non-performance, CC § 735 for faulty performance and also Ccom arts. 324, 345, 599, 600, which can be seen as three different descriptions or three applications of one general concept of non-performance).

8. In SLOVAK law, CC § 559 states that an obligation is to be performed properly and in a timely fashion. Such a performance extinguishes the obligation. Non- performance in Slovak law is the opposite of performance. It covers all cases of performance which is not done properly and in time - delayed performance, failure to comply with the terms regulating the obligation. Non-performance usually brings about the mutation of obligation, not its extinction – see, for example, CC § 517 (delay in performance of the obligation).

III.–1:103: Good faith and fair dealing

(1) A person has a duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing in performing an obligation, in exercising a right to performance, in pursuing or defending a remedy for non-performance, or in exercising a right to terminate an obligation or contractual relationship.

(2) The duty may not be excluded or limited by contract or other juridical act.

(3) Breach of the duty does not give rise directly to the remedies for non-performance of an obligation but may preclude the person in breach from exercising or relying on a right, remedy or defence which that person would otherwise have.

COMMENTS

A. Good faith and fair dealing

This Article sets forth a basic principle. Good faith and fair dealing are required in the performance of obligations, in the exercise of rights to performance, in pursuing or defending remedies for non-performance or in exercising a right to terminate an obligation or contractual relationship.

As will appear from the Notes, a general duty of good faith is not recognised in the laws of all Member States. However, those that do not recognise it explicitly frequently have specific rules which produce very similar results. This justifies the adoption of a general duty of good faith and fair dealing in these rules. Nonetheless drafters of European legislation should note that in the laws that do not recognise a general duty of good faith, the legislation will not be reinforced by such a duty and the courts may not always readily develop specific rules to achieve the same result. If it is desired that a legislative rule should be supported by a requirement that the parties act in good faith, for example to prevent evasion of the rule, it may be wise to spell this out in the legislation itself, or to include specific provisions to prevent at least those forms of evasion that can be foreseen.

The Article uses the word “duty” rather than “obligation” because of the rather vague, supplementary and all-pervasive nature of what is expected from the parties and because the ordinary remedies for non-performance of an obligation are not directly available – although they may be indirectly available if the principle of good faith and fair dealing gives rise to a tacit or implied term of a contract. See paragraph (3).

B. Nature of the duty

The composite expression "good faith and fair dealing" refers to a standard of conduct characterised by honesty, openness and consideration for the interests of the other party to the transaction or relationship in question. See I.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) and the Comments to that Article.

C. The role of the duty

The role of the duty of good faith and fair dealing under this Article must be distinguished from the wider roles the concept of good faith and fair dealing may play under other Articles. We have already seen that good faith and fair dealing may play an important role in the interpretation and development of these rules as a whole and in the filling of gaps in their provisions. The concept is also relevant to the interpretation of contracts and other juridical acts and to the ascertainment of tacitly agreed terms and the creation of implied terms to fill a gap in a contract's provisions. In these wider contexts the instruction to have regard to good faith and fair dealing is directed to the judge or interpreter. In the present context, as also in the earlier Article imposing a duty to negotiate in accordance with good faith and fair dealing, the instruction is directed to the parties.

The role of the duty under this Article must also be distinguished from the historical role the duty has played already in determining the existence and content of many specific rules of law. Particular applications of the requirements of good faith and fair dealing appear in many specific provisions, such as the duty of a party not to negotiate a contract with no real intention of reaching an agreement with the other party, not to disclose confidential information given by the other party in the course of negotiations, and not to exploit unfairly the other party's dependence, economic distress or other weakness. Good faith and fair dealing could also be said to underpin the debtor's rights to cure a defective performance; the debtor's right to refuse to make specific performance of a contractual obligation if this would involve unreasonable effort and expense; and the requirement that a creditor should limit as far as possible any loss which will be suffered as a result of a non-performance of the obligation by the debtor, thereby reducing the amount of damages.

The role of the duty under the present Article is to serve as a direct and general guide for the parties. Its purpose is to give effect in legal transactions to community standards of decency and fairness. The law expects the parties to act in accordance with the requirements of good faith and fair dealing. The consequences of a breach of the duty are discussed later. They may be serious.

D. Rule is intended to be mandatory

Paragraph (2) provides that the duty may not be excluded or limited by contract or other juridical act. Of course, as noted above, these rules cannot make anything mandatory. This provision serves only as an indication that any legislator adopting the principle might be expected to consider making it mandatory.

What is in accordance with good faith and fair dealing will, however, to some extent depend upon what was agreed upon by the parties in their contract. Thus, parties may agree that even a technical breach by one party will entitle the other party to refuse performance, when, for instance, that party's representatives can ascertain a technical breach but not whether it is a trifle or not.

E. Effect of breach

Paragraph (3) provides that breach of the duty does not give rise directly to the remedies for non-performance of an obligation but may preclude the person in breach from exercising or relying on a right, remedy or defence which that person would otherwise have. The word "precluded" is not intended to mean that the person must be entirely precluded: a partial preclusion or restriction may be sufficient in some cases.

The word "directly" is significant. If good faith and fair dealing have resulted in a tacit or implied term of a contract or other juridical act then, of course, that term will take effect like any other term. If it imposes an obligation then non-performance of that obligation will give rise to all the available remedies in the usual way. There is a policy decision here. It would have been possible to provide for an obligation (rather than a mere duty) to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing and to attach the normal consequences to a non-performance of that obligation, including the possibility of an order for specific performance or an award of damages. Using the filter of an implied term, however, perhaps gives slightly more weight to the autonomy of the parties and leaves slightly less room for a court to hold a party liable in damages where the party has complied with the agreed terms of the contract. It makes it clear that the function of a court is to use the duty of good faith and fair dealing to fill gaps where necessary but not to use the duty to correct or improve the contract by making it more fair than the parties themselves intended. Moreover, the normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation do not always seem appropriate for a breach of the duty to act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. The idea of a court order compelling a party, subject to sanctions which might be severe, to act fairly could be said to confuse the roles of law and morality. Moreover the remedy of withholding performance of a reciprocal obligation does not seem attractive in this area. One party should not be able to say "I am not going to perform my obligation to act fairly until you perform your obligation to act fairly."

Other Articles in these rules provide for damages for loss caused by fraud, unfair exploitation or misuse of confidential information. In most if not all of such cases there will also have been a breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing. There is also an overlap between the duty of good faith and fair dealing and the obligation on parties to co-operate so as to enable an obligation to be performed. Breach of that obligation may also give rise to a liability to pay damages.

One consequence of a breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing is that it may preclude the person in breach from taking advantage of a term in a contract or of a rule in a way which, given the circumstances, would be unacceptable according to the standards of good faith and fair dealing. Contract language which gives a party such a right should not be enforced. Thus, even if a contract provides that a certain type of non-performance of an obligation is to be regarded as fundamental, a creditor would not necessarily be permitted to terminate the contract because of a completely trivial and irrelevant failure to perform in the required way.

The principle of good faith and fair dealing also covers situations where a party without any good reason stands on ceremony.

> Illustration 1
> In an offer to B, A specifies that in order for B's acceptance to be effective B must send it directly to A's business headquarters where it must be received within 8 days. An employee of B overlooks this statement and sends the acceptance to A's local representative who immediately transmits it to A's headquarters where it is received 4 days later. It would be contrary to good faith and fair dealing for A to rely on the technicality to deny a contract.

The principle covers a party's dishonest behaviour.

> Illustration 2
> The contract between A and B provides that A must take legal proceedings against B within two years from the final performance by B if A wants to make B liable for defects in B's performance. Some time before the expiration of this time limit A discovers a serious defect in B's performance and notifies B of an intention to claim damages. B uses dilatory tactics to put A off. On several occasions B assures A that A has no reason for concern. B undertakes to look into the matter, but insists that the investigation will have to be done carefully. When, after the expiration of the time limit, A loses patience and sues B, B invokes the time limit. Not having acted in good faith, B is precluded from relying on the time limit.

In relationships which last over a long period of time, such as many tenancies, agencies, distributorships, partnerships and employment and insurance relationships, the concept of good faith and fair dealing has particular significance as a guideline for the parties' behaviour. It underlies many of the specific rules in, for example, the Part of Book IV dealing with Commercial Agency, Franchise and Distributorship, including the rules on continuation or termination of the contractual relationship (see IV.E.–2:301 (Contract for a definite period) and IV.E.–2:302 (Contract for an indefinite period)) but has an important role to play even in areas not specifically regulated.

NOTES

I. Survey of the laws

1. The principle of good faith and fair dealing is recognised, or at least appears to be acted on as a guideline for behaviour in the performance of obligations and the exercise of corresponding rights, in all Member States. There is, however, a considerable difference between the legal systems as to how extensive and how powerful the penetration of the principle has been. At one end of the spectrum we find GERMAN law where the principle has revolutionized the law of obligations and added a special feature to the style of the legal system. At the other end we find the ENGLISH and IRISH laws which do not recognize a general obligation of the parties to conform to good faith, but which in many cases by specific rules reach the results which other systems have reached by the principle of good faith.
2. The other systems in the European Union range between these two opposites. They recognize a principle of good faith and fair dealing as a general provision, but have not given it the same degree of infiltration into their law of obligations as has German law.

II. Germany

(a) In general

3. In GERMANY CC § 242 has been used to make possible what has been called a "moralization" of obligational relationships. § 242 states in general terms that parties must perform their obligations in the manner required by good faith and fair dealing (Treu und Glauben) taking into consideration the general practice in commerce.
4. The provision has been used to qualify a rigorous individualism of the original contract law of the German CC. It has operated as a "superprovision" which may modify the effect of other statutory provisions. Based on CC § 242, German courts have developed new institutions (see (b) below), and have created a number of obligations to ensure a loyal performance of contractual obligations such as a duty of the parties to co-operate, to protect each others' interests, to give information and to submit accounts.
5. There is, however, one important limit to the operation of the good faith principle. It does not permit the courts to establish a general principle of fairness and equity. A court may not replace the effects of a contract or of a statutory provision by an outcome which it believes to be more fair and equitable (see Staudinger § 242 no. 4).

(b) The institutions

6. Among the institutions created by the courts relying on the good faith principle the following should be mentioned:

- a change of circumstances (Wegfall der Geschäftsgrundlage) which makes the performance of a contractual obligation extremely onerous for the debtor may lead to the modification or termination of the obligation; since 2002 the change of circumstances is dealt with by a special provision, see CC § 313;
- a party's right may be limited or lost if enforcing it would amount to an abuse of right. Abuse of right is found in the following typical cases: (1) A party cannot acquire a right through dishonest behaviour (exceptio doli specialis); this rule bears some resemblance to the concept of "unclean hands" in English equity. (2) A party will lose a right by breach of the party's own duty (Verwirkung). (3) A party cannot claim a performance which will soon have to be given back to the debtor (dolo facit, qui petit, quid statim redditurus est). (4) A party may not pursue an interest which is not worth protecting. (5) A party may not rely on a behaviour which is inconsistent with the party's earlier conduct (venire contra factum proprium);
- ending of contractual obligations which extend over a period of time. These obligations may be ended for compelling reasons (wichtiger Grund) even though this is not supported by a statutory or contractual provision. Since 2002 the right to terminate for serious and extraordinary reason is dealt with by a special provision, see CC § 314. The right to end these obligations may be limited by the contract, but it may not be completely excluded (BGH 4 April 1973, BB 1973, 819).

III. England and Ireland

7. As was mentioned above, note 1, the laws of ENGLAND and IRELAND do not recognise any general obligation to conform to good faith and fair dealing. However, many of the results which in other legal systems are achieved by requiring good faith have been reached in English and Irish law by more specific rules: see the judgment of Bingham L.J. in Interfoto Picture Library Ltd. v. Stilletto Visual Programmes Ltd. [1989] QB 433; but contrast Walford v. Miles [1992] 2 AC 128. For example, the courts have on occasion limited the right of a party who is the victim of a slight breach of contract to terminate the contractual relationship on that ground when the real motive appears to be to escape a bad bargain: see Hoenig v. Isaacs [1952] 2 All ER 176 and Hongkong Fir Shipping Co. Ltd. v. Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd. [1962] 2 QB 26. Conversely, the victim of a wrongful repudiation is not permitted to ignore the repudiation, complete performance and claim the contract price from the repudiating party, unless the victim has a legitimate interest in doing so: see Attica Sea Carriers Corporation v. Ferrostaal Poseidon Bulk Reederei Gmbh [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 250 (C.A.). There are many examples of the courts interpreting the terms of a contract in such a way as to prevent one party using a term in circumstances in which it was probably not intended to apply. The clearest examples of this occur in relation to clauses excluding or limiting liability (Treitel, Contract 6-028–7-032 and Coote [1970] Cambridge LJ 221) but other terms have been construed similarly: see for example Carr v. Berriman (JA) Pty Ltd. (1953) 27 ALJR 273, where it was held that an architect under a construction contract could not exercise a power to order work to be omitted simply in order to give the same work to another contractor who was prepared to do it for less. Thus to some extent the present Article merely articulates trends already present in English law. But the English approach based on construction of the agreement is a weak one as it cannot prevail against clear contrary provisions in the agreement (see Photo Production Ltd. v. Securicor Transport Ltd. [1980] A.C. 827 (H.L.): clauses excluding or limiting liability) or even clear implication from the circumstances (Bunge Corporation v. Tradax SA [1981] 1 WLR 711: right to terminate for breach which might not have any serious consequences). Thus the Article represents an advance on English and Irish law.

IV. The other EU systems

(a) Sources

8. Provisions laying down a principle of good faith in the performance of obligations are found in BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG, see CC arts. 1134(3); ESTONIA, see GPCCA § 138 and LOA §§ 6, 76(2); GREECE, see CC art. 288; ITALY, see CC art. 1375, and see also art. 1175; THE NETHERLANDS, see CC arts. 6:2 and 6:248; POLAND, see CC art. 354; PORTUGAL, see CC art. 762(2); SPAIN, see CC arts. 7 and 1258 and Ccom art. 57; CZECH REPUBLIC, see CC §§ 43, 559(2), 3(1) and 424, Ccom arts. 655(1) and 265; and SLOVAKIA, see CC § 3 and Ccom art. 265.

