Retroactive effect or ex nunc effect. In a couple of legal systems it is explicitly stated that once the period for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession has elapsed, ownership is vested in the owner-possessor with "retroactive effect", i.e. as if the possessor had acquired ownership already at the moment he took possession of the goods. In other legal systems, this question does not seem to be discussed at all, arguably because it appears self-evident that acquisition of ownership takes place at the time of, and therefore produces effects only as from, the expiration of the period (ex nunc effect). It is deliberately intended not to take a final position on this issue in the text or the Comments on these model rules, but to leave this issue to further discussion and development. One reason is that comprehensively regulating the issue would presuppose also dealing with the modes of acquiring other kinds of limited proprietary rights, such as proprietary rights of use, which however fall outside the scope of these model rules. Yet, what can be done is to provide a short discussion on the basic practical effects of such a dogmatic question, and to give a brief description of how the issues could perhaps be tackled, by taking into account certain general principles which are, in some way, inherent in these model rules: One consequence the "retroactive effect" approach intends to achieve is to grant to the possessor all fruits and uses he obtained before the expiration of the period (by deeming him to be "the owner" retrospectively). This issue is touched on by VIII.–4:302 (Extinction of rights under rules on unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability for damage) which, however, opts for the opposite solution (see there). The second main effect relates to third parties to whom the owner-possessor has granted or transferred limited proprietary rights in the goods before the period has elapsed (i.e., as a non-owner). In that respect, the retroactivity approach has the effect that, upon the possessor's acquisition of ownership, such third parties' rights become valid retrospectively, so that they are deemed to have existed ever since they were "created". This certainly meets the practical interests of such third parties, and in a certain sense, the needs of legal certainty in general. But the retroactivity approach is not the only way to protect such interests. Taking into account some general principles inherent in these model rules, also a solution along the following lines could be contemplated (as mentioned already, this is intended to be seen as a contribution to further discussion, not as a proposed solution): Depending on the relevant provisions (which are outside Book VIII and mostly outside the scope of these model rules anyway), a third party deriving a limited proprietary right from the owner-possessor may possibly acquire such a right under one of the relevant provisions on (immediately) acquiring such type of right in good faith, e.g. under IX.–2:106 (Good faith acquisition of security right) for proprietary security rights. Or, acquisition by continuous possession (or exercise) of such a right may be possible under national law, such as in the case of proprietary rights of use in many countries. Under these provisions, the third party may possibly acquire a safe position long before the owner-possessor acquires ownership under the present Chapter, and that right will remain valid as against the original owner even if the owner acts in time and prevents the owner-possessor from acquiring ownership. In other cases, a principle inherent in VIII.–2:102 (Transferor's right or authority) may provide a solution, namely that where the "transferee" (here: the owner-possessor before expiration of the period for acquisition) lacks the right or authority to grant or transfer a right in the goods at the time this right is purported to be established, that right becomes valid when the grantor obtains the necessary right or authority. In other words, the former lack of the owner-possessor's right to dispose may be deemed to be cured as from the owner-possessor's acquisition of ownership. A retroactive effect is not provided for by that rule (for the case that ownership is obtained after having disposed of it). At first sight, the practical effect appears comparable to the one of the retroactivity approach. Priorities between different third-party rights could be determined according to the chronological order of their purported establishment.

B. Effect on limited proprietary rights, paragraph (2)

General. The goods acquired by continuous possession may have been encumbered with the limited proprietary right of a third party (e.g., a security or a usufruct right). Acquisition of ownership by continuous possession does not necessarily mean that such rights are extinguished at the same time. Both issues, the acquisition of ownership of the goods, and the question of whether such third-party rights in the goods are maintained or extinguished, are to be treated separately. With regard to the possible extinguishment of the third-party right, there are again two different grounds: First, the third party's right may be terminated as a consequence of (the possessor's) acquisition of ownership by continuous possession. In this case, ownership is acquired free of that third-party right. This rule impliedly underlies the first part of paragraph (2) and is explicitly addressed at its end (by reference to the expiry of the long thirty- or fifty-year periods). The following Comments will only deal with this first issue. Second, the right may terminate (or cease to be enforceable) by virtue of prescription, i.e. as a consequence of the qualified inactivity of the right-holder, if so provided under the relevant rules of law. This is addressed in the middle part of paragraph (2) ("as long as this right is not itself extinguished by expiry of the respective period").

Caveat. As indicated, the fate of third-party rights in the property after the lapse of a long period of time can be determined by various aspects of law. These model rules touch on the issue only as a side effect of discussing acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, but do not fully deal with the issue, which would include a fully elaborated set of rules for limited proprietary rights and, in particular, rules on the (possible) prescription of such rights. Therefore, a thorough review and perhaps further development of paragraph (2) will most probably prove useful, where this can be based on a broader analysis of the different approaches and underlying interests.

Effect of acquisition in good faith as to ownership and freedom from encumbrances. Depending on the possessor's good or bad faith with respect to the right of ownership and the non-existence of the limited proprietary right of a third person, several different constellations may occur, which are briefly discussed in the following Comments. If the possessor is in good faith with respect to his right of ownership and as to the non-existence of any encumbrances, he will also acquire ownership free of encumbrances. The rule does not make any differentiation as to when the third party's limited proprietary right has been created, it therefore also applies where the third party's right has been created (by the real owner) only after the owner-possessor already took possession. With regard to movable property, this will not happen that frequently. And if so, the third party who accepts to acquire a right in an asset which is not present because possession is exercised by the owner-possessor takes a risk. The solution promotes legal certainty in vesting unencumbered ownership in the owner-possessor.

Effect of acquisition in good faith as to ownership but in bad faith as to freedom of encumbrances. If, on the other hand, the possessor was in good faith as to being the owner, but knows or can reasonably be expected to know that a limited proprietary right of a third party exists, the right of ownership will be acquired after ten years of possession. The third party's right, however, will continue to exist after these ten years, though it may be rendered unenforceable by respective prescription rules (cf. Comment B). Finally, the right may be extinguished by possession for a period of thirty years, as would be the case if the possessor was in bad faith both with regard to ownership and the freedom from encumbrances. This is expressed at the end of paragraph (2). Again, legal certainty is provided in that after the expiry of the long period, unencumbered ownership is vested in the possessor.

Effect of acquisition in bad faith as to ownership but in good faith as to freedom of encumbrances. Where the possessor is in bad faith with regard to his right of ownership but is in good faith as to the non-existence of any encumbrance, he may acquire ownership free of encumbrances after a period of thirty years. With regard to the right of ownership, this clearly follows from the general rules. But the same period should also be applied in respect of the encumbrance: Before the possessor acquires ownership, the third party's right encumbers the property of the rightful owner. It would appear a bit strange if the owner who, suppose, recovers the goods after fifteen years would be freed of the encumbrance just because the owner-possessor meanwhile (for a period of more than ten years) had no reason to know of it. Likewise, there is not much reason for allowing a possessor in bad faith to take advantage of the concept of acquisition by continuous possession before the lapse of a period of thirty years.

Effect of acquisition in bad faith as to ownership and freedom from encumbrances. Where the possessor is in bad faith both with respect to the ownership right as well as with respect to the encumbrance, the thirty-year period will apply in relation to both aspects.

VIII.–4:302: Extinction of rights under rules on unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability for damage

Upon acquisition of ownership, the original owner loses all rights to recover the goods and all rights to payment of the monetary value of the goods or for any future use of the goods under the provisions on unjustified enrichment (Book VII) and non-contractual liability for damage (Book VI).

COMMENTS

A. Function of the rule

Policy. The rule aims at drawing a clear line: once ownership is acquired (so that the asset does not have to be restored), all liabilities as to the value of the substance of the asset and for the use made of it subsequent to that time are extinguished. This may be described as an "ex nunc" effect of acquisition on such rights under the law of obligations. Rights resulting from the former use of the goods, at the time when the owner-possessor was still under an obligation to restore the property are, accordingly, not affected by this Article. They may, however, become unenforceable under the rules on prescription of rights to the performance of an obligation, whereby III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance) limb (a) and III.–7:307 (Maximum length of period) may be of particular importance, according to the circumstances of the case. Thereby, the original owner does not necessarily lose all rights immediately, while the property status of the goods is settled for the sake of legal certainty.

Types of rights excluded under this Article. In the first place, the rule aims at explicitly excluding rights related to the value of the goods under unjustified enrichment law, which are partly said to be effective against the new owner in some European legal systems (although the issue lost much of its practical relevance by the shortening of prescription periods). This approach fits to the unjustified enrichment rules of Book VII, where VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) states that a "rule of law" (like acquisition under the present Chapter) may "justify" the enrichment and therefore preclude its reversal. The principle is, however, explicitly stated in this Article, since VII.–2:101 paragraph (3) leaves it to the policy of the respective rule of law whether the enriched person shall be regarded as entitled to finally retain the enrichment. Second, since Chapter 4 of this Book also allows for acquisition of ownership by continuous possession in bad faith, so that the circumstances under which the owner-possessor holds the goods may constitute non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI, also these claims are excluded explicitly. The reference to Books VI and VII is intended to comprise, as far as relevant, the provisions of Chapter 7 of this Book, which basically refer to Books VI and VII.

B. Details

Exclusion of physical restoration. According to VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment), where the enrichment consists of a transferable asset, the enriched person would have to transfer this asset to the disadvantaged person. In order to avoid possible misunderstandings, the present Article explicitly states that the new owner, after having acquired ownership by continuous possession, is not under any obligation to restore the goods to their original owner. The clarification also relates to VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation), in order to exclude claims for reparation in kind (i.e. restoration of the goods) on the basis of non-contractual liability in case of acquisition by continuous possession in bad faith.

Exclusion of obligation to pay the monetary value for the substance of the goods. Equally, it is also explicitly excluded that the new owner, after acquisition of ownership by continuous possession, may be held liable for compensating the original owner in money for the value of the property that the latter lost to the possessor. This provides legal certainty for the possessor.

Exclusion of obligation to pay for using the goods after acquisition by continuous possession. Third, all monetary claims aimed at compensating the original owner for the possessor's benefits that he obtained from using the goods after having acquired by continuous possession are excluded. Once the new owner has acquired the goods, he shall have all entitlements of an owner, including the enjoyment of use. "Use" is to be understood in a broad sense for the purposes of this Article. It comprises use in a narrow sense (e.g. driving a car) as well as benefits from alienating (a price received when selling) or consuming the goods (e.g. burning fuel).

Benefits before expiration of period. Another question concerns benefits the owner-possessor obtained from using the asset or deriving fruits from it before the expiration of the qualifying period for acquisition of ownership. As the possessor regularly has no right of use before expiration of the period, the benefit will be regarded as an unjustified enrichment under VIII.–7:103 (Fruits from, use of, and other benefits derived from the goods during possession) and the provisions of Book VII. Having prevented the owner from using the property himself may also give rise to a right to reparation under Book VI. As mentioned in Comment A above, this Article does not extinguish such obligations. They may, however, have partly ceased to be enforceable by prescription under Book III Chapter 7.

No explicit exclusion of contractual obligations to return. This Article does not explicitly exclude contractual claims that the (former) owner may have to recover the goods. This issue is of a rather hypothetical nature, but is discussed controversially in some countries. For example, the owner may have lent the goods to another person, who, subsequently, believes that they are his own property. Such a person will regularly not be in good faith, but could acquire by continuous possession after the lapse of a period of thirty years. Here, the question arises whether contractual claims for recovery should also be excluded (like unjustified enrichment claims) or not. There may be arguments in both directions. Legal certainty may speak for clarity after the passing of thirty years, whereas the special relationship established by a contract could speak for the contractual claim for recovery to prevail. Practically, the contractual right to have the goods restored will most often have already become unenforceable under the prescription rules of Book III Chapter 7, since the time limits provided there are much shorter than the thirty-year period necessary for acquisition under Chapter 4. Also, in case the parties to the contract should have established any agreement to the effect that prescription of the contractual obligation to return be deferred, this will usually include an (implicit) acknowledgement of the owner's right in the sense of VIII.–4:205 (Ending of period in case of acknowledgement). Within the framework of these model rules, the issue does not appear to deserve regulation.

CHAPTER 5: PRODUCTION, COMBINATION AND COMMINGLING

Section 1: General provisions

VIII.–5:101: Party autonomy and relation to other provisions

(1) The consequences of production, combination or commingling can be regulated by party agreement. The provisions of Section 2 apply where production, combination or commingling takes place:

(a) without the consent of the owner of the material; or

(b) with the consent of the owner of the material, but without a party agreement as to the proprietary consequences.

(2) An agreement in the sense of paragraph (1) may provide for:

(a) proprietary rights as recognised by this Book; and

(b) a right to payment or other performance.

(3) The effects of production, combination and commingling as to goods subject to a retention of ownership device are regulated by Book IX.

(4) Proprietary security rights created under Section 2 of this Chapter are subject to the provisions on proprietary security rights in Book IX, unless provided otherwise in Section 2. Proprietary security rights created by a party agreement under paragraph (1) are subject to the provisions on proprietary security rights in Book IX except as provided otherwise by VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) paragraph (3).

(5) This Chapter does not affect the applicability of the rules on non-contractual liability for damage (Book VI). The rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (Book V) have priority over the provisions of this Chapter.

COMMENTS

A. General

Situations addressed in Chapter 5. This Chapter deals with the property law results and other consequences where goods, or goods and labour contributions, of at least two different persons are, in one way or the other, joined in a physical sense. More specifically, the Chapter covers situations where either (a) goods belonging to one person are transformed into a new movable asset by work undertaken by another person ("production") or (b) goods belonging to different persons are physically put together. The latter category (b) comprises different sub-constellations: (i) It may be rather easy to separate these items from one another and restore each item to its owner. For this situation, Chapter 5 does not contain any specific rule. The property rights in each item therefore remain unaffected; Chapter 5 impliedly refers to the general rule of VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership), under which each owner can re-obtain possession of his property. When this right is exercised by one (or more) of the owners involved, the combined entity, mass or mixture is (wholly or partly) dissolved. The remaining constellations are characterised in a way that physically separating the individual items would be impossible or at least economically unreasonable. For the purposes of Chapter 5, they are further subdivided into situations where (ii) it is at least possible and economically reasonable to divide the mass or mixture into proportionate quantities ("commingling") and (iii) all other situations where the latter is not the case ("combination"). This Chapter does not deal with the legal fate of movable property being attached to land and is not intended to provide any guidelines for parallel questions arising in that area. As to the terminology employed in this Chapter (production, commingling, combination), cf. also Comment A on each of the subsequent Articles.

Brief overview on issues solved differently in European legal systems and main policy issues. As one can see from the comparative survey in the Notes to this Chapter, the European legal systems partly show considerable differences as to the solutions provided for the issues covered by this Chapter. Apart from differences in terminology, it is evident that the substantive lines of demarcation between the different categories employed by the individual legal systems do not fully converge and are somewhat uncertain in a number of countries. In particular, however, the legal consequences deviate to a significant degree, varying from awarding sole ownership to one party to awarding sole ownership to the other party, or providing co-ownership of the parties involved, partially with special rules on the division of such co-ownership. The aspect whether a certain person acted in good faith or in bad faith carries different weight in the diverse legal systems. And, first and foremost, there exist completely different understandings as to whether the statutory (or other legal) rules applicable to these occurrences are of mandatory character or can be altered by party agreement. It is evident that these questions also constitute main policy issues to be dealt with in Chapter 5. Besides, one must decide about whom to burden with the risk that the act of above all production or combination will be economically successful. Against this background of considerable diversity in the European legal systems, it seems advisable to develop the proposed rules based on a careful analysis of the interests involved in the said situations. Apparently, some of the solutions proposed in this Chapter are new developments and do not coincide with any example provided by an existing European legal system.

Main approach: default rules, provisions on proprietary security rights take priority in case of overlap. The basic policy decision taken in this Chapter is that the proprietary and other consequences of production, combination and commingling may be regulated by an agreement of the parties involved. This is explicitly spelled out in the first sentence of paragraph (1) of this Article, and further specified in paragraph (2). Consequently, the provisions set out in Section 2 of this Chapter are mere default rules. They apply where either the parties have not made any agreement as to the consequences of these occurrences in advance, or where such agreement has been made, but remained incomplete in the sense that the consequences have not been sufficiently determined (e.g., the owner of material consented to another's request to use the material for creating a new object, but the parties did not regulate the proprietary consequences of such act or the calculation of any compensation payable to the owner of the material). For understanding the policies underpinning the subsequent Articles it is very important to see that in many situations of practical importance, such as where employees produce goods for their employer, there will exist an agreement as to these consequences, so that the case will be governed by the party autonomy rule spelled out in the present Article, and VIII.–5:201 (Production) to VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) will not come into play at all. The actual scope of application of Section 2 of this Chapter is, therefore, rather limited. There is, however, one major restriction to this general party autonomy rule, namely that the mandatory provisions of Book IX on proprietary security rights remain unaffected. This may, in particular, be relevant where goods subject to a retention of ownership device become involved into production, combination or commingling. The said principle is generally expressed in VIII.–1:103

(Priority of other provisions) paragraph (1) and further specified in paragraphs (3) and (4) of the present Article.

Function of Chapter 5 within Book VIII and these model rules in general. The situations covered by Chapter 5 do not necessarily occur in a transfer context, which is the primary focus of Book VIII. Some rules, VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination), may even be applicable without any interference of men, i.e. caused by an act of nature or other coincidence. There are, however, a number of instances where the issues covered by Chapter 5 indirectly become relevant for transfer situations, such as where goods owned by different persons are first irreversibly combined, or transformed into new goods in a production process, and then sold, so that one will have to clarify who may validly dispose over these new goods. Also, it may happen that goods are transferred based on a contract for sale and subsequently are used to produce a new movable object by their new owner. Here, VIII.–5:201 (Production) may come into play "retrospectively" if the said contract for sale is avoided, cf. VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation) paragraph (2). Further, the producer may have "acquired" the material from a non-owner and good faith acquisition under VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) may have failed (because the goods have been stolen, are acquired gratuitously or because the purchaser was not in good faith). This shows that there is a certain demand for supplementing the transfer rules with norms like those in Chapter 5. In most European legal systems, the main practical relevance of such rules concerns goods purchased under retention of ownership. If such goods are used, e.g., in production before the purchase price has been paid, the producer uses material owned by another person, the seller. Also under these model rules, the practical importance of the rules contained in Chapter 5 for goods subject to retention of ownership devices will be considerable. Although the effects of production, combination and commingling as to goods subject to a retention of ownership device are deliberately left to Book IX on proprietary security rights (see paragraph (3) of the present Article) in order not to undermine that Book's specific policies and technical means, including registration requirements and the concept of priorities, the relevant provisions of Book IX largely refer back to the rules of the present Chapter. See IX.–2:308 (Use of goods subject to a retention of ownership device for production or combination), and IX.–2:309 (Commingling of assets subject to proprietary security) paragraph (2). In any event, taking into account the model rule character of these proposals, the policies pursued and the solutions adopted in the present Chapter may be of interest as a source of inspiration for the context of retention of ownership devices in general.

Overview on structure of Chapter 5. This Chapter consists of two Sections, the first one comprising only the present Article which spells out the central party autonomy rule (paragraph (1) sentence 1 and paragraph (2)) and defines the scope of application of Section 2, i.e. where no or no complete party agreement as to the proprietary consequences of production, commingling and combination has been established (paragraph (1) sentence 2 with limbs (a) and (b)). The present Article also clarifies the relation between this Chapter and other parts of these model rules: Paragraphs (3) and (4) deal with the relation to Book IX on proprietary security rights. Paragraph (5) sentence 1 clarifies that the rules of Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage can always be resorted to in addition. Paragraph (5) sentence 2 finally clarifies that the specific policies of Book V on benevolent intervention are not interfered with. Section 2 of this Chapter comprises the default rules of VIII.–5:201 (Production) to VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights). The default character of these provisions is made clear by paragraph (1) sentence 1 of the present

Article, which has already been mentioned above. The named default rules distinguish three categories of events, each of them regulated by a separate Article, namely VIII.–5:201, VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination). The last Article, VIII.–5:204 serves as a common supplement for VIII.–5:201 and VIII.–5:203, under which a proprietary security right can arise in favour of an owner of material who loses his ownership of the respective goods. This last Article provides some specific regulation regarding this special security right, e.g. as to its effectiveness (no registration required), extends the security right to proceeds in case the security right in the goods themselves is extinguished by a good faith acquisition made by another person, and deals with priorities.

B. Overview of the relation between production, combination and commingling, and other provisions of these model rules

General; criteria for distinguishing the three categories production, commingling and combination. As already outlined in Comment A above, Chapter 5 differentiates between three categories of facts, each of them corresponding to one of the subsequent Articles: production, commingling and combination. In addition, it may happen that none of these specifically regulated categories applies, but the case is to be solved by applying the owner's general right to recover possession of his goods in the sense of VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership), or by applying unjustified enrichment rules as determined by Book VII. For determining which category to apply, the following criteria are to be taken into consideration: Did one of the contributions consist of the performance of labour (work)? If so, is the result to be considered "new goods"? If so, how important was that labour contribution for achieving the final result? In a number of constellations (namely all cases except those covered by VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1)), it will be important whether the "unified entity" can be physically separated in an economically reasonable way (so that each person recovers the very object he contributed). If not, is it at least possible and economically reasonable to separate the "unified entity" into proportionate quantities (so that not exactly the same items are restored, but a quantity equivalent to each person's contribution)?In this context, one may already anticipate that the scope of VIII.–5:201 converges to a rather high degree with the concepts incorporated in many European legal systems. The demarcation between VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination), on the other hand, is not that familiar taking into account the existing legal systems.

First tests: party agreement, Book IX to be applied. Practically, when dealing with a particular case, the first question to ask will be whether the parties involved have established a (valid) agreement which already regulates the proprietary effects, and, if relevant, any monetary compensation payable between the parties, before the relevant event however it would have to be classified under Chapter 5 occurred. If so, this agreement will govern the case (paragraph (1) sentence 1 of this Article) and there is no practical need in further classifying the situation according to the rules set out in this Chapter. One will, however, have to check whether Book IX on proprietary security rights is to be applied, either because the effect of a party agreement functionally amounts to the creation of a security right, or because goods subject to already existing proprietary security rights (such as goods acquired subject to a reservation of ownership device) are affected by that agreement. If so, the rules of Book IX have to be obeyed, whereby it may be noteworthy that Book IX itself sometimes differentiates according to the categories set out in the present Chapter. Compare, e.g., IX.–2:309 (Commingling of assets subject to proprietary security), under which a security right is automatically extended to co-ownership shares created under VIII.–5:202 (Commingling), in contrast to IX.–2:307 (Use of encumbered goods for production or combination) which provides that, in case of VIII.–5:201 (Production) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination), the preservation of a security right in material in principle requires an agreement of the parties. The following Comments will only deal with situations where no party agreement in the sense of paragraph (1) of this Article has been concluded.

Another primary test: applicability of Book V. It is obvious that where a benevolent intervener in the sense of Book V effects an act amounting to production, combination or commingling in the sense of this Chapter, there will be no advanced party agreement as to the consequences of this act but the proprietary and other consequences established under the present Chapter may counteract the specific purposes and policies underpinning Book V. For this reason, paragraph (5) sentence 2 of this Article provides that the rules of Book V have priority over the provisions of this Chapter. This can lead to full, or only partial, inapplicability of Chapter 5, depending on the circumstances of the case and whether or not the policies of Book V are compatible, or incompatible, with the rules of this Chapter (and their related policies).

> Both neighbours A and B have an apple orchard. They usually produce apple juice from their apples. A gets heavily insured in an accident and cannot take care of the fruits, nor is he able to give instructions. Therefore, B, acting with the intention of benefiting A, reaps A's fruits and produces juice from these fruits for A.
> It is obvious that according to B's intention, and the principles underlying Book V, A and not the "producer" B shall be regarded as the owner of the juice. In so far, Book V must prevail over VIII.–5:201 (Production). Also, the question whether and to what extent B may ask for any indemnification or reimbursement must be decided under Chapter 3 of Book V.

In Illustration 1, Book V takes priority both in relation to the proprietary and the compensation effects of VIII.–5:201 (Production). An example where the property law level will not be affected is provided in Illustration 17 below.

Labour performed, results are "new goods": production. Within the categories defined by Chapter 5, VIII.–5:201 (Production) takes priority over the subsequent Articles VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination). One will, therefore, first test whether the production rule is applicable, which requires (i) that (at least) one contribution consists of "material" (i.e. goods) and another person's contribution consists of the performance of labour (work), and (ii) that the result is to be considered "new goods" in the sense of VIII.–5:201 (Production). If so, the latter provision applies. (It may, eventually, refer further to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) or VIII.–5:203 (Combination), see Comment B below).

> P (the producer) builds a ship by using raw materials owned by another person O. Or, P makes a suit out of cloth owned by O. Or, the artist P forms a sculpture from O's marble. In all these cases, VIII.–5:201 (Production) will apply.

Labour performed, but no "new goods" produced. Where goods owned by one person are subject to work performed by another person but the result of this work is not to be qualified as "new goods" in the sense of VIII.–5:201 (Production), the general production rule of VIII.–5:201(1), which awards sole ownership to the producer, does not apply. According to VIII.–5:201(3), the result will, in the first place, depend on whether there is only one owner of material involved, or more than one owner. In the first case, i.e. where there is just the person performing work in relation to material owned by one other person, the owner of the material will remain to be the sole owner of the goods involved. In other words, there is no change with regard to the right of ownership. This may apply where there is no further material involved at all; or where there are several pieces of material involved, but all of them are owned by the same person. The person performing the labour contribution, on the other hand, may be entitled to a certain compensation (in a non-technical sense) under the principles of unjustified enrichment of Book VII (cf. Illustration 3) or under the rules on benevolent intervention as determined by Book V (cf. Illustration 17 below), as the case may be. Illustration 4 shows that a "compensation" for the work may also be due under a contract, but in such cases the proprietary consequences will normally already be determined, at least implicitly, by an agreement of the parties. However, Chapter 5 may step in if the contract is invalid.

P without having entered into a valid contract with O, nor acting as a benevolent intervener cleans O's car. In that, P performs labour in relation to goods owned by O, but without turning them into "new goods" (the car remains a car). The production rule of VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1) does not apply and O of course remains the owner of his car. P may, however, be entitled to payment of the monetary value of his work under the unjustified enrichment rules of Book VII (cf. VIII.–5:201(3)).

P repairs O's computer under a contract for processing in the sense of IV.C.–4:101 (Scope). Again, work is performed in relation to goods owned by another person. However, in such situations, it will already follow from the terms of the contract, at least impliedly, that O will stay the owner of his asset, cf. paragraphs (1) and (2) of the present Article. But the illustration shows that even if hypothetically no such agreement could be identified, or if the contract is void, the adequate result would be achieved: No change as to the property in the computer will take place because the "new goods" requirement of VIII.–5:201 (Production) would not be satisfied. If the contract is valid as such, P will be entitled to a price under that contract. If the contract is invalid altogether, O will also remain the owner and he will be entitled to a payment according to the unjustified enrichment rules (VIII.–5:201(3)).

The other group of situations involves goods belonging to different owners which, as a consequence of the labour contribution, cannot be separated in an economically reasonable way. One of the owners of the material may be the person performing the work. In all these cases (unless a contractual agreement exists or benevolent intervention is at hand, cf. above), the labour contribution is to be compensated according to VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (3) sentences 2 and 3, i.e. by application of the rules of Book VII on unjustified enrichment. With regard to the material contributions, the property law effects regarding the unified entity as well as the possible question of compensation for the value of such goods will be determined, by way of the reference spelled out in VIII.–5:201(3) sentence 1, by applying VIII.–5:203 (Combination) (Illustration 5) or VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) (Illustration 6).

Erroneously believing to be obliged to do so under a contract, P sprays paint either owned by himself or by a third party X on O's car. Although P performs labour, there are no "new goods" produced, so that VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (3) refers to VIII.–5:203 (Combination) in order to determine any proprietary consequences of that act. The car will constitute the principal part, the paint the subordinate part in the sense of VIII.–5:203 paragraph (2). Accordingly, O will remain the sole owner of the painted car. The owner of the paint will be entitled to payment in accordance with VIII.–5:203(2) sentence 2 (secured by a security right in the car, cf. VIII.–5:203 Comment C). The value of the labour as such will be compensated under unjustified enrichment principles, cf. VIII.–5:201 paragraph (3).

Grain owned by two farmers A and B is inseparably mixed in a silo. It was transported there and put into the silo by a third person P, which involved a certain work effort. Whether there will be any compensation in relation to P's work will be determined according to unjustified enrichment principles (VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (3)). There may be some benefit for the farmers, e.g. if the grain is now stored closer to potential customers, etc., or no benefit at all, in which case P's efforts may be frustrated according to general unjustified enrichment principles or, at least, pursuant to the saving-cap provided for under VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (2). The effects as to the property in the grain will be determined under VIII.–5:202 (Commingling), which is referred to by VIII.–5:201 paragraph (3).

Labour performed and new goods created, but labour is of minor importance. Since VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1) awards sole ownership to the producer where "new goods" are created as a result of the labour contribution, and this has been considered a too far-reaching consequence when the labour contribution was only of minor importance, an exception has been adopted in VIII.–5:201(2)(a). The consequences are regulated by paragraph (3) of that Article: If there was only material of one owner involved, this person acquires the new goods. If there were goods of more than one owner involved (one of them, again, may be the person carrying out the work), the rule as for situations where no "new goods" have been created refers further to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination), respectively. Again, the person contributing the labour may be entitled to a monetary compensation, reflecting the value of his work, under unjustified enrichment principles; cf. VIII.–5:201 paragraph (3). Different results may be achieved in case the parties provided so by agreement in the sense of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article.

Goods of different owners physically put together, but separation into original constituents still possible and economically reasonable. The following Comments deal with those rules which, as such, do not require any labour contribution. These rules may also be applicable by way of reference if a labour contribution is involved, but is either of minor importance or does not create "new goods". The first constellation to be addressed in this context is where goods owned by different persons are physically put together in one way or the other (cf. Illustrations 7 and 8) but it is still possible and economically reasonable to take this "unit" apart and restore each part back to its owner. For such situations, Chapter 5 does not contain any specific rule. Rather, the property rights in each of these single items remain unaffected and each owner may recover his item. In so far, Chapter 5 impliedly refers to the general rule of VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership). With regard to situations where a "possessor" adds parts to goods owned by another, which he would be obliged to return, see also VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession) Comment D ("ius tollendi"). It may well be that single items sustain a certain damage when being disassembled or separated (as long as such losses do not render a dissolution of the entity economically unreasonable). Such losses can be liquidated under Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage, which is always intended to be applicable in addition (cf. paragraph (5) sentence 1 of this Article).

A's tyres are mounted on B's car. They can be removed easily. Accordingly, there is no "combination" in the sense of VIII.–5:203 (Combination) where the owner of the principal part (the car) would acquire the subordinate part (the tyres), but A and B remain the owners of their respective property.

Sheep or cattle owned by different farmers are brought to the same range for the summer period. Each animal is marked with an individual number which allows identifying it when the animals return to their respective owners. There will, therefore, be no "commingling" in the sense of VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) which would lead to co-ownership in the mass of sheep or cattle. Each farmer remains sole owner of his animals.

Separation into each owner's original items impossible or economically unreasonable, but separation into proportionate quantities possible and economically reasonable: commingling. The category of commingling first and foremost becomes relevant with regard to goods of the same kind and quality. It may happen that such goods, belonging to different owners, are mixed in a way that it is impossible to identify which singe item was contributed by which person. Or, such identification may theoretically be possible, but that would be unreasonable from an economic point of view. But it may at least be possible and economically reasonable to divide the whole mass or mixture into proportionate quantities, corresponding to the quantities contributed by each person, and to return that quantity to each contributor. In that case, the special rule of VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) applies. It is, however, not strictly confined to goods of exactly the same kind and quality, but may also apply to slightly different goods, depending on the circumstances. See further the Comments on that Article. Separating the mixture into the respective quantities usually does not affect the quality of the items involved. The commingling may have occurred in a form of physically linking the single parts to each other, such as in case of the commixture of liquids, or the single items may just be stored or placed in the same space or area, and it is immaterial whether or not there is any physical contact between the items (e.g. fish kept in the same basin).

Oil owned by different persons (A, B, C, D) is mixed in a tank. Obviously, it would be impossible to identify which drop of oil was contributed by A, B, C and D, respectively, and to return each drop to its original owner. Even if that were possible, such procedure would be completely unreasonable. Under VIII.–5:202 (Commingling), each contributor will become co-owner of the mixture proportionate to the value of his contribution, and may separate the respective quantity out of the mixture. The rule may also be applicable if the oil of the different contributors was not of exactly the same quality.

Other situations where separation into each owner's original items is impossible or economically unreasonable: combination. The remaining situations where it would be impossible or economically unreasonable to separate a unit formed of goods owned by different persons into its original constituents are covered by VIII.–5:203 (Combination). The difference to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) is that a separation into proportionate quantities is not possible (or economically reasonable) in these situations. The typical case will be that the original items are physically connected in such a way that taking them apart would cause such damage to the single constituents that their value would be reduced considerably as compared to the value of the combined entity. As indicated above, VIII.–5:203 does, itself, not require any contribution of work but may theoretically also apply where the combination is effected by an act of nature. Practically, however, this rule's major field of application will be cases where the combination is effected by the performance of work (being performed by a person also contributing with goods or by a third person), but the labour contribution is either of minor importance in the sense of VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (2)(a) or no "new goods" are produced, so that VIII.–5:203 applies by way of the reference spelled out in VIII.–5:201(3). Compare Illustration 5 above and Illustration 10 below. With regard to the proprietary effects of combination, VIII.–5:203 basically distinguishes two categories of cases: Where one component part is to be regarded as the "principal part", whereas the other part or parts form "subordinate parts", the person who contributed with the principal part will acquire (sole) ownership of the combined entity, while the other owners will be awarded a right to monetary compensation for their goods, secured by a special proprietary security right in the combined entity. See VIII.–5:203(2). Where, on the other hand, no "principal part" can be identified, co-ownership will emerge; see VIII.–5:203(3).

> A integrates spare parts, owned by himself, into a machine owned by B. These parts cannot be removed without partly destroying them; also, the work effort for taking the machine apart again would be considerable. The case falls within VIII.–5:203 (Combination), to which VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (3) refers because despite of the labour contribution involved no "new goods" are created (the machine remains this kind of machine). Within VIII.–5:203, paragraph (2) will be applied as the machine as such constitutes the "principle part" and the spare parts will be "subordinate parts", so that B, the owner of the machine, acquires these new parts as well.

Specific rules for producers and certain persons effecting a combination with a specifically qualified grade of bad faith. Although thereby no further "category" in addition to production, combination and commingling in the sense of this Chapter is established, regard should be had to specific rules provided for in VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (2)(b) in conjunction with paragraph (3), and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (4). These rules have in common that a person who uses goods owned by another person for production or combination while actually knowing that the goods are owned by another and that this other person does not consent to that act, does not acquire sole ownership in the product, or in the combined entity, respectively. These exceptions primarily cover thieves, but go beyond the case of theft. They include, however, a counter-exception where the value of the labour (in case of production), or the value of that person's principal part (in case of combination) is much higher than the value of the (other) material. Where the said exception applies in a production case, VIII.–5:201 paragraph (3) refers further to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) or VIII.–5:203. (If the exception applies in a combination case, a specific rule is contained in VIII.–5:203 paragraph (4). Details are discussed in the Comments on VIII.–5:201 and VIII.–5:203.

Short reference as to relation to Books VI and VII. Chapter 5 of this Book does not interfere with the rules on non contractual liability provided for in Book VI of these model rules. To the contrary, the rules of Book VI are regarded an important supplement to the provisions of this Chapter in order to achieve adequate results in a number of practical cases where the person effecting production, commingling or combination acted with intention or negligence when interfering with another person's property rights. Compare paragraph (5) sentence 1 of this Article. The relation between this Chapter and Book VII on unjustified enrichment has, partly, already been touched in the previous Comments where it was stated that in certain cases, the unjustified enrichment rules are employed for calculating monetary claims compensating for the loss of certain property rights. In contrast to Book VI, Book VII however is not always applicable in addition to the rules of this Chapter. It only applies where explicitly provided so. With regard to other situations, this Chapter employs a separate regime of calculating compensation claims which is intended to supersede the unjustified enrichment principles. Compare Comment H below and the references provided there.

C. Overview of relation to other provisions of Book VIII

Relation to the rules on the transfer of goods forming part of a bulk. VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) and VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk) provide for special rules on the transfer of goods forming part of an identified bulk, "bulk" meaning a mass or mixture of fungible goods which is identified as contained in a defined space or area. Where a buyer of a certain quantity out of that bulk agrees on an immediate transfer of ownership, before the goods are separated from the bulk and appropriated to that buyer's contract, VIII.–2:305 awards him co-ownership in the bulk. These rules do not directly overlap with the provisions of Chapter 5, although both sets of rules may, depending on the circumstances, be applicable to a practical situation one after the other. In particular, VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) may be relevant in this respect, under which rule, also, co-ownership in a mass or mixture of fungible goods may be created. The difference lies in that VIII.–5:202, like the other rules on production and combination, regulates the effects of a certain physical change in relation to the goods involved. This change (like inseparably commixing the goods) may lead to certain proprietary consequences, like the creation of co-ownership in the case of VIII.–5:202. The bulk sale rule of VIII.–2:305, on the other hand, does not imply any physical change but presupposes that there already exists a mass or mixture of fungible goods contained in a defined space or area. It is irrelevant how this bulk has been created and whether one person is the sole owner of all goods in the bulk or whether several persons are co-owners. Such co-ownership may have been established by VIII.–2:305 itself, or in another way by party agreement, decision of a court or a rule of law, one such rule of law actually being the commingling rule of VIII.–5:202. Another difference lies in the functions of the two rules: VIII.–2:305 is a transfer rule, the transferee's undivided share representing the quantity of goods he bought, and the creation of co-ownership being a transitory means of gradually transferring property rights to the buyer. VIII.–5:202, on the other hand, rather serves a preservative function, safeguarding that everyone gets back what he already had before. However, both rules are supplemented with quite similar provisions on dividing co-ownership in VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk) and VIII.–5:202 paragraph (2), both being based on the principle that each co-owner has a right to separate a quantity corresponding to his undivided share from the mass or mixture. Whereas the bulk transfer rules also adopt special good faith acquisition provision in VIII.–2:305(5) and VIII.–2:306(2), there are no property law implications of a party's good faith within VIII.–5:202.

Relation to good faith acquisition under Chapter 3, general. Unlike good faith acquisition under Chapter 3, acquisition under Chapter 5 does not effect an expropriation of the original owner. From an economic perspective, rather, property rights already existing at the moment of production, combination and commingling are preserved partly by special means. Where both the rules of Chapter 3 and Chapter 5 may be relevant in one and the same case, the interrelations between these two Chapters are, mostly, not particularly difficult. Where someone first acquires goods in good faith from a non-owner and these goods will afterwards be involved into production, commingling or combination under this Chapter, the good faith acquirer will simply be regarded as the (new) rightful owner of the respective goods and the relevant rule of Chapter 5 will apply without any peculiarities. Also where first, e.g., production in the sense of Chapter 5 occurs and a good faith acquisition in the sense of Chapter 3 takes place subsequently, no particular difficulties arise. The producer may lose his (new) right of ownership in the same way as any other owner may do. Also the (former) owner of material which was used in production in the sense of VIII.–5:201 (Production) may lose the special proprietary security right granted under that Article by another person's good faith acquisition free of encumbrances in the sense of VIII.–3:102 (Good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights). For this case and the parallel constellation that may take place after combination in the sense of VIII.–5:203 (Combination), however, VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) paragraph (2) provides that the security right automatically extends to the proceeds of the sale. See there.

Relation to exclusion of good faith acquisition of stolen goods in particular. Some further clarification may be useful with regard to the relation between Chapter 5 and VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) paragraph (2), under which good faith acquisition of ownership does not take place in relation to stolen goods (subject to a counter-exception for acquisitions from a transferor acting in the ordinary course of business). First, where stolen goods are involved in production, combination or commingling, their true owner and not the thief will acquire the rights awarded to an owner of the material under Chapter 5. In other words, Chapter 5 does not (in an economic sense) take anything away from an owner whose property was stolen. Then, the question arises what shall happen if the produced, combined or commingled new entity is subsequently purchased by a buyer in good faith: Will the qualification "stolen" be maintained in relation to the respective property right representing the stolen goods after production, combination or commingling, so that the purchaser in good faith may not acquire this right, or free from this right, under the principles of Chapter 3? The good faith acquisition rules of Chapter 3 do not address these situations explicitly, which requires to fall back on the policies pursued by the exception rule of VIII.–3:101(2) and by the rules of Chapter 5. The exception for stolen goods in VIII.–3:101(2) intends to grant the rightful owner additional time to recover his property in a situation where, typically, particular efforts are undertaken to prevent the owner from retrieving his goods. Usually, such additional time will be at least ten years, after which time acquisition of ownership by continuous possession under VIII.–4:101 (Basic rule) paragraph (1)(a) can take place. The rules of Chapter 5, on the other hand, only intend to distribute proprietary rights between those persons who contributed to the result (i.e. the owners of the goods involved, and the processor, as the case may be). But they are rather policy-neutral as to the relation to other persons and, in this context, do not intend to further facilitate good faith acquisitions by subsequent buyers. Consequently, where stolen goods are involved in commingling or combination in a way that co-ownership emerges under VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) or VIII.–5:203 (Combination), the qualification "stolen" will be upheld in relation to the respective undivided co-ownership share representing the stolen goods, and a subsequent good faith acquisition by a third party will be prevented by VIII.–3:101(2). This means that if the good faith acquisition requirements are fulfilled with regard to co-ownership shares which do not represent stolen goods, co-ownership between this good faith acquirer and the original owner of the stolen goods will be arrived at. This corresponds to the wording of VIII.–3:101(2), if one applies this rule to the acquisition of an undivided co-ownership share.

A has stolen fuel from B and commixes it with fuel owned by C and D (but which A erroneously believes to be his own one). B, C and D each "contribute" the same quantity. This leads to co-ownership of B, C and D, each for 1/3, according to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling). Then, A sells not acting in the ordinary course of his business the whole mixture to E who takes delivery in good faith. E can acquire "ownership" in relation to the shares formerly owned by C and D, but he cannot acquire B's share representing the stolen goods. Accordingly, B and E will become co-owners for shares of 1/3 and 2/3, respectively.

The other situation to deal with is that stolen goods are involved in production or in combination in such a way that the producer, or the owner of the principal part, respectively, acquire sole ownership in the new entity, and the other owners of material are granted a proprietary security right in this entity; see VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2). The question will be whether a subsequent buyer in good faith can take the new entity free of these (other) owners' proprietary security rights. Parallel to VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) paragraph (2), the general rule on good faith acquisition free of encumbrances in VIII.–3:102 (Good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights) provides for an exception for stolen goods. The policy approach regarding production should be the same as discussed above. It would be odd if the owner of stolen goods would be protected in case co-ownership is created (see above), but not where he "only" gets a proprietary security right in the new entity, which solution has been adopted on very similar policy considerations as co-ownership, but simplified as to certain practical difficulties co-ownership would bring about (see VIII.–5:201 Comment C). Consequently, a good faith acquirer may not acquire free of the encumbrance (security right) reflecting the stolen objects. A different result will be arrived at where the producer (or person effecting the combination) sold the new or combined goods in the ordinary course of his business.

A buys goods which have formerly been stolen from B (so no good faith acquisition may take place at that stage) and uses them for producing new goods. Under VIII.–5:201 (Production), A will become sole owner of the product but is obliged to payment to B, secured by a proprietary security right. If now A outside the ordinary course of his business sells the product to C, who is in good faith, C acquires ownership of the goods (derivatively), but these goods are still encumbered by B's security right.

Where, finally, the producer himself, or the person effecting the combination and who himself owns the principal part, has stolen the goods used as material, the exceptions provided for by VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraphs (2)(b) and (3), and by VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (4) come into play in addition. The latter case is parallel to co-ownership constellations discussed above with Illustration 11. In case of production, the producer will not acquire ownership of the product so that the owner of the stolen goods either becomes sole owner of the product or becomes co-owner together with other owners of material. The qualification "stolen" will apply to the respective owner's co-ownership share and prevent good faith acquisition parallel to what has been discussed above.

Relation to acquisition by continuous possession under Chapter 4. Comparable to good faith acquisition under Chapter 3, acquisition of ownership by continuous possession under Chapter 4 has the effect of an expropriation without compensation of the rightful owner, which is not the case under the rules of Chapter 5. As pointed out in the previous Comment, possessing the relevant object for the period of time required by Chapter 4 will also make it possible to acquire (or acquire free of) property rights representing "stolen" goods. There is one more issue to be addressed regarding the interrelation of these two Chapters, namely that a person already possessed another's material before production, commingling or combination occurred, and continues possessing the result of that event in a manner capable for acquisition under Chapter 4. Although this situation is not expressly addressed in the black letter rules, the fact that production, commingling or combination occurred in the meantime will not interrupt the running of the period for acquisition under Chapter 4, but the periods elapsed before and after the respective event can be counted together for the purposes of acquisition under Chapter 4. Chapter 5 is neutral in that respect, even though it may practically be more difficult for the original owner to retrieve his property once it has been involved in production etc. But there is a number of hypothetical events which may impede the owner's recovery, and taking into account the rather long periods applicable under Chapter 4 it appears preferable to let that Chapter's general aim of legal certainty prevail.

Relation to rules on protection of ownership and possession under Chapter 6. It has already been pointed out that in all situations where no change of the proprietary positions under Chapter 5 takes place (in particular, where no new goods have been produced and the new entity can be physically separated in an economically reasonable way), each person remains to be the owner of his goods and can take back his property under the general rules, in particular under the general right of revindication under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership). Where, however, a change of the proprietary positions under one of the rules of Chapter 5 has already taken place, the protection rules of Chapter 6 will apply (only) in relation to the new proprietary rights.

Relation to Chapter 7. The scopes of Chapter 5 and Chapter 7 on the rights between an owner of goods and a possessor of these goods who, at the time of the events addressed under Chapter 7, was obliged to return the goods to their owner, may overlap in a great number of situations. In general, it is intended that the rules of Chapter 5, which bring about a change in the proprietary positions regarding the goods concerned, take priority over the provisions of Chapter 7. See VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) paragraph (3) and Comments B and G on that provision. See also VIII.–5:203 (Combination) Comments D and E for certain calculation issues regarding combination. See further VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession) Comment D for situations where no change as to the proprietary positions has taken place and the "possessor" may take away parts he added to the owner's goods (ius tollendi).

D. Party autonomy and scope of this Chapter (paragraphs (1) and (2))

Comparative background. As can be seen in more detail from the Notes to this Article, the majority of European legal systems accepts that the respective rules on production, commingling and combination can be altered by a contractual agreement between the parties involved. Or, in other words, the relevant national provisions have the character of default rules. There is, however, also a considerable number of legal systems where it is held that the respective rules are mandatory. Partly, this is disputed, and in a couple of further countries, the issue is unclear or hardly discussed. Where the mandatory character is favoured, this is often supported by the argument that the rules, due to their function of attributing ownership to one (or several) of the parties involved, yield an erga omnes effect, which would require a mandatory character. But even in these countries, or at least in some of them, a considerable practical demand for certain flexibility is evident especially with regard to the rule on production, in particular because it frequently happens that goods (e.g. raw materials) are purchased under retention of ownership and shall be converted into a product before the purchase price has been paid (i.e., when the seller still "owns" these goods) and the seller has an eminent interest not to lose his security. This is particularly the case in German law. There, it has been accepted that the parties at least are allowed to establish a contractual agreement as to who of them is to be regarded the "producer" in the sense of the mandatory provisions. Also, it is accepted that the parties may stipulate for an anticipated constitutum possessorium, whereby ownership in the product is immediately (re-)transferred to the supplier of the material. By such means, the result of the mandatory rule may in fact be reversed.

Basic policy. These model rules explicitly follow the majority approach by stating that the consequences of production, combination and commingling can be regulated by party agreement; see paragraph (1) sentence of this Article. This decision is based on the evident practical demand indicated above and is coherent with the strong role the principle of party autonomy generally plays in Book VIII, in particular in the central transfer rules of Chapter 2. For the purposes of these model rules, there does not seem to be much sense in arriving at this result by making a detour via party agreements on who shall be regarded the "producer" etc. It has also been stressed already in the context of the transfer rules of Chapter 2 (see VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) Comment C) that the purpose of providing "publicity" only carries very limited importance in relation to a transfer or, in the present context: production, commingling or combination of movable property. Besides, "publicity" could, in the present context, only be provided if the respective rule safeguarded that the person in possession also is to be regarded the owner in a legal sense. This is, however, not the case in all situations where the respective rules grant sole ownership to another person (e.g. because that other person contributed with the principal part) or lead to the creation of sole ownership (or the creation of proprietary security rights, as is partly suggested under the rules of this Chapter). There is, however, a certain limitation to the principle of party autonomy in that the mandatory rules of Book IX on proprietary security rights are granted priority. See Comment E below.

Time of agreement. A party agreement in the sense of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article can be established before or upon production, commingling and combination. If no agreement in this sense has been made by that time (or only an incomplete agreement has been established), the default rules of Chapter 5 will apply and proprietary rights will be allocated accordingly. Also thereafter, the parties can stipulate for the same content in a subsequent agreement. But, to the extent that this deviates from the default rules, this contract may (only) operate as a basis for an ordinary transfer under Chapter 2, for the creation of proprietary security rights, as the case may be, or for rights to payment according to the contract. The subsequent agreement will not take effect retrospectively.

Parties to the agreement. As to the parties who must consent so as to establish a valid agreement in the sense of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article, it is decisive that those parties enter the agreement who would otherwise be affected in their proprietary positions by the subsequent Articles of Chapter 5. E.g., in case of production, this will be the (future) producer and the owners of the material involved. In case of commingling, it will be all owners of the respective goods, etc.

"Agreement" subject to rules on general contract law. As to the conclusion, validity, interpretation etc. of an agreement in the sense of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article, the general contract law rules apply accordingly. With regard to an agreement directly addressing proprietary effects, this is clarified by the general rule of VIII.–1:104 (Application of rules of Books I to III); see there. Regarding the creation of obligations and corresponding rights, this already follows from Books I to III themselves.

(b) Possible content and examples of relevant party agreements

General. As paragraph (2) clarifies explicitly and will be discussed in more detail below, a party agreement in the sense of this Article may relate to the level of property law as well as to the law of obligations. In particular, the parties may regulate (i) that one party becomes sole owner of the new entity or (ii) that co-ownership shall emerge, including the calculation of the undivided co-ownership shares. The parties may also agree (iii) on the creation of proprietary security rights (which will, however, be subject to the provisions of Book IX, cf. paragraph (4) of this Article). On the level of obligations, the parties may, in particular, provide that (iv) one party must pay a certain amount of money to another party, especially where that other party who does not acquire ownership (or only has a right to a smaller share than under the dispositive rules). Theoretically, there are numerous additional possibilities, some of which being mentioned in the Comments below. The party autonomy principle also applies to situations where Chapter 5 itself does not provide any proprietary changes, in particular where a new entity could be separated into its original constituents in an economically reasonable way (so that VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) do not apply. Technically, this will rather constitute an ordinary transfer in the sense of Chapter 2, taking effect when the relevant act addressed in the party agreement is performed, than an effective agreement in the sense of Chapter 5. But that practically makes no difference. The relevant agreement will then constitute an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) and VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass). The priority of Book IX will, of course, also apply in that case.

Agreement as to proprietary consequences, paragraph (2)(a). As mentioned above, agreements as to the proprietary consequences of production, combination or commingling will typically provide for sole ownership of one of the parties or co-ownership of all (or some) contributors, eventually combined with the creation of proprietary security rights similar to the default concept provided in Section 2 of this Chapter. Where co-ownership is established, this means that the co-owners own undivided shares in the whole goods and each co-owner can dispose of his share by acting alone, unless otherwise provided by the parties; see VIII.–1:203 (Co-ownership). The parties may of course also determine a certain ratio of the undivided shares. If they do not and nothing else can be determined by applying the principles of interpretation as provided by Book II Chapter 8, the ratio will be proportionate to the value of the respective contributions, which can seen as a general principle both applied in VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination). The parties may also vary the scopes of application of the categories of production, commingling and combination, providing, for instance, that the consequences of VIII.–5:201 (Production) apply also where the result of the work would not pass the "new goods" test under that Article. But this is just a variation of what has already been said in the previous Comment. Theoretically, the parties may also create a proprietary right to use the new entity, or create a trust subject to the rules of Book X. This Article does not, however, in itself establish freedom to invent new categories of property rights. Paragraph (2)(a) implicitly refers to VIII.–1:202 (Ownership), VIII.–1:203 and VIII.–1:204 (Limited proprietary rights), which again refers further to other Books of these model rules and national law. In other words, agreements in the sense of paragraph (2)(a) must be "within the system" (which may, according to the references to national law in VIII.–1:204, already be a rather wide one). Similarly, the party autonomy rule is not intended to open up for constructions such as attributing ownership of one part, which is inseparably combined with another person's goods, shall belong to one person, while the rest of the entity shall belong to another. Compare the principle expressed in VIII.–1:301 (Transferability) paragraph (2) (the reference to Chapter 5 made there not being intended to paralyse the above made statement). As to an agreement under which a third party shall acquire ownership, see below.

Agreement as to obligations and corresponding rights, paragraph (2)(b). According to limb (b) of paragraph (2), the party agreement may also establish obligations and corresponding rights. Usually, this will be a right to payment, such as some kind of compensation for the value of another person's material, or a counter-performance for work performed, in particular in the context of production. The amount payable and all modalities of payment are subject to the parties' agreement and general rules which may be applicable in that respect. The parties are, however, also free to stipulate for other than monetary obligations, e.g. the owner may be obliged to lease out the product to the other party etc. All this concerns the usual case that the obligations agreed upon only relate to parties to this agreement. If the parties in the sense of Chapter 5 (i.e. those persons contributing to production, commingling or combination) should agree that a third party shall acquire ownership upon production, commingling or combination, such a stipulation in favour of a third party (cf. Book II Chapter 9 Section 3) may operate as an entitlement of the third party to acquire ownership in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d). In addition, an agreement as to the time ownership is to pass (which could be fulfilled by simply assenting to the other parties' agreement), delivery or an equivalent to delivery would be required under paragraph (1)(e) of that Article, so that some sort of consent of the third party would be essential for acquiring ownership.

Typical example of agreement: labour contract. In a lot of practically important situations, parties will regulate the consequences of production (or other events covered by this Chapter) by agreement, whether expressly or impliedly. In particular, where employees produce new goods from material owned and provided by their employer, it usually follows already from the labour contract at least from an interpretation thereof under the principles of Book II Chapter 8 that the employer, not the employees, will be the owner of the products. Also, the labour contract will regulate the price (wage) the employees are entitled to receive for their labour contributions. Consequently, the default rule of VIII.–5:201 (Production), which would lead to the opposite result of acquisition of ownership by the employees in absence of the contrary agreement, will not apply due to the party autonomy rule of the present Article. From the same party agreement's purposes it follows that where the material used by the employees is not owned by their employer, but by a third party who did not consent to production, the employer (and not the employees) are to be regarded as "the producer" in the external relationship with the owner of the material. See also VIII.–5:201 Comment B.

Typical example of agreement: production ordered by the owner of material. Where, on the other hand, the owner of material hands the material over to another person in order to produce new goods out of the material, whereupon the new goods are to be returned to the owner of the material, the agreement between these parties will either determine explicitly, or will have to be interpreted in the sense that the owner of the material shall, upon production, acquire (sole) ownership of the new product. The same will apply where the final products shall not be returned to the owner of the material in a physical sense, but shall be otherwise disposed of according to the order of the material-owner. The person performing labour, on the other hand, will regularly stipulate for a price for production. This will usually constitute a contract of construction in the sense IV.C.–3:101 (Scope) paragraph (2)(a) which extends the relevant provisions to contracts under which a movable thing is constructed following a design provided by the client. The "constructor" (the person producing the new goods in the sense of VIII.–5:201 (Production)) may withhold delivery of the products to the owner in case the latter does not pay, cf. III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation). Such situations will also be covered by the party autonomy rule of paragraph (1).

O is an agricultural company specialised on high quality organic food and other eco-products and markets its products under a well known label. O decides to extend its product range further by offering eco-pullovers made of the wool of their sheep. As O does not own any textile factory itself, O contracts with the factory P that O will deliver wool and P will produce the pullovers in exchange for an agreed price. The contract also states (or if not doing so explicitly, it will be interpreted accordingly) that O will own the pullovers from the moment they are produced. This agreement in the sense of paragraphs (1) and (2)(a) of the present Article supersedes the default rule of VIII.–5:201 (Production).

(c) Remaining scope of VIII.–5:201 to VIII.–5:204

General. It follows from the foregoing that the actual scope of application of the default rules provided for in Section 2, i.e. in VIII.–5:201 (Production) to VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights), is rather limited because party agreements in the abovementioned sense are of major practical importance. Another important restriction follows from this Chapter's subsidiarity in relation to Book IX on proprietary security rights; see Comment E below. One may say that the default rules of Chapter 5 just fill the gaps left open by the party autonomy rule and Book IX, but of course it may also serve as an important model and may provide guidelines on how parties may find an adequate reconciliation of interests when establishing such a party agreement. The following Comments give an overview on the main constellations.

Production etc. without consent of the owner of the material. The main group of situations, which have also been primarily envisaged when developing the default rules of Section 2, are such where production, commingling or combination takes place without the consent the owner, or all other owners of the goods involved; see paragraph (1)(a). This particularly includes, but is not restricted to, situations where the rightful owner of the material does not even know where his goods are located physically and, therefore, can neither avert the production, commingling or combination, nor can make sure that a party agreement as to the consequences of such event be established in advance. Accordingly, the default rules apply where, e.g., the goods have been stolen by the producer; where a person uses another's goods in the mistaken belief of being the rightful owner of the goods himself; but also where the producer (or person effecting commingling or combination) actually knows that he does not own the goods, but erroneously believes that the rightful owner authorised him to use these goods in production, commingling or combination.

Production etc. with consent of contributors, but without agreement as to proprietary consequences. Another situation where the default rules of Section 2 apply is where the owner of the material actually consented to the fact that production, commingling or combination will be undertaken, but the parties did not establish any agreement regulating the proprietary and other consequences of that act; see paragraph (1)(b). These consequences will then be determined by the relevant default rule.

Two salesmen agree to store their merchandise, which is of the same kind and quality (like oil, grain, fruits) in the same container, silo, tank or warehouse. But they do not regulate the further effect as to property etc. These issues will be determined by VIII.–5:202 (Commingling).

Artist O agrees with artist P, who uses the same studio, that P may use O's equipment and material in case he needs it. They are in a common understanding that in such a case, P will replace the material or compensate O accordingly, but nothing precise is agreed upon. And they in fact never thought of issues like property rights. At this stage it is unclear which material P will use, and whether he will use any material of O at all. In case P thereafter uses some of O's material, the consequences will be determined by VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1).

Production etc. with consent of contributors and with agreement as to proprietary consequences, but without agreement as to obligations. There may, theoretically, also be situations where all owners of material consented to production, commingling or combination be undertaken, and all contributors also agree on the proprietary effects thereof in the sense of paragraph (2)(a), e.g. that the producer or another party shall acquire sole ownership, but no agreement as to obligations in the sense of paragraph (2)(b) is established. This case is not mentioned in paragraph (1) sentence 2, which makes sense in so far as the rights to payment provided by some of the default rules of Section 2 will only fit where also the agreed proprietary consequences, in particular the attribution of ownership or co-ownership, correspond to the concepts underlying the relevant default rules. Where this is the case, however, the solutions of Section 2 regarding the creation of obligations and corresponding rights may serve as a guideline for interpreting the parties' agreement, or may be applied by way of analogy. Regard should be had to the fact that the rules on the calculation of the monetary claims provided for by VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2) and (3) contain a certain distribution of economic risks and it should be checked carefully whether this distribution corresponds to the purposes pursued by the parties. Compare VIII.–5:201 Comment D and VIII.–5:203 Comment D.

E. Relation to Book IX on proprietary security rights (VIII.–1:103 (1), VIII.–5:101(3) and (4))

General policy. Book IX provides extensive regulation on proprietary security rights. It follows, in a certain sense, a functional approach by covering not only such types of proprietary rights as generally recognised as designed to serve as security, such as the pledge, but also other proprietary rights which are either intended by the parties to the contract to entitle the secured creditor to preferential satisfaction of his secured right from the encumbered asset or have this effect under the agreement; cf. IX.–1:102 (Security right) paragraph (2). This broad approach is deliberately chosen in order to achieve an equal treatment of functionally similar devices, and in order to pursue certain policies as comprehensively as possible. Such specific policies exist, in particular, with regard to the security rights' effectiveness in the sense of opposability against certain third parties (cf. IX.–3:101 (Effectiveness as against third persons)), where, in relation to goods, in general either possession or registration is required; cf. IX.–3:102 (Methods of achieving effectiveness). Here, striving for completeness of the register is an important policy, which means that exceptions, also in relation to security rights potentially falling within Book VIII, should be kept relatively narrow. Also, Book IX implies specific policies regarding the extension of a security right to other assets, or with regard to the priority regime. In this respect, Chapter 5 of Book VIII aims at interfering with Book IX as little as possible, in order not to undermine that Books general policies. In other respects, such as regarding enforcement provisions applicable to security rights created by operation of law under Section 2 of this Chapter, Books VIII and IX may rather supplement each other. Also, the consequences of production, combination and commingling on (already existing) security rights in the material involved in such an act are not covered by Chapter 5 of this Book. These issues are regulated by IX.–2:307 (Use of encumbered goods for production or combination) and IX.–2:309 (Commingling of assets subject to proprietary security), which are however closely synchronised with the provisions of the present Chapter.

Priority of Book IX under VIII.–1:103(1) (Priority of other provisions). The named policy is, to a certain extent, already realised by the general provision of VIII.–1:103 paragraph (1) which states that in relation to a transfer, or retention, of ownership for purposes of security, the provisions of Book IX apply and have priority over the provisions Book VIII. This implies, for instance, that a transfer of ownership for security purposes will be subject to Book IX on security rights, and so will the further legal destiny of the goods subject to such a transaction, including being involved in production, commingling or combination. The principle inherent in this rule also applies, e.g., where the parties involved in a process of production, commingling or combination establish an agreement the effect of which is providing a proprietary security right to one of them. Such situations are more specifically addressed by paragraph (4) sentence 2.

Goods subject to retention of ownership device, paragraph (3). The rules of Chapter 5 could, based on their broad wording, be applied to production, combination and commingling of goods purchased subject to retention of ownership in the classical sense, provided the price has not been paid when the respective event occurs: The material is still owned by the seller when it is used for production by the buyer, or is combined or commingled with other goods owned by the buyer and, perhaps, also other persons' goods. The general policy throughout the development of these model rules was, however, that it should be up to Book IX and that Book's underlying policies and concepts to decide upon the effects the production, commingling or combination involving such goods shall have. For this reason, paragraph (3) of the present Article makes clear that such constellations shall be exclusively covered by Book IX. This shall ensure that different situations can be treated based upon their own merits and specific policy implications. Note that reference is made to "retention of ownership devices" in the sense of Book IX, which does not only cover retention of ownership in the "classical" sense that the seller retains the right of ownership in the sold goods, but also functionally equivalent devices such as financial leasing (cf. IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership device: scope)). All these cases shall be treated alike also in the context of production, combination and commingling. The main practical effect of this different treatment is that where goods subject to a retention of ownership device are involved in production or combination effected by the other party, or a third party, the security in the original goods does not automatically extend to the new or combined goods, but only if so provided by an antecedent agreement of the parties of the contract for proprietary security; see IX.–2:308 (Use of goods subject to a retention of ownership device for production or combination), in particular paragraph (2). If no such agreement has been established, the buyer, hirer-purchaser, lessee or consignee will acquire the rights granted to the "owner" of the respective goods under VIII.–5:201 (Production) or VIII.–5:203 (Combination), respectively; see the named IX.–2:308 paragraph (1). Another important consequence of the reference to Book IX spelled out in paragraph (3) of the present Article is that any security rights which the holder of the retention of ownership device acquires in the new products or combined assets or in the buyer's, hirer-purchaser's, lessee's or consignee's right to payment against the owner of these assets must fulfil the requirements of Chapter 3 of Book IX in order to be effective as against third persons (cf. IX.–2:308 Comment C). Practically, this means that the contractual extension of the security right must be registered, unless the secured creditor holds possession of the new or combined assets. Where goods are commingled and co-ownership emerges under VIII.–5:202 (Commingling), on the other hand, the former security rights in these goods automatically continue as encumbrances of the undivided shares in the commingled mass or mixture; cf. IX.–2:309 (Commingling of assets subject to proprietary security) paragraph (1) in conjunction with paragraph (2). Priority is not affected by such occurrences, see IX.–4:103 (Continuation of priority) paragraph (1)(b); a separate act of registration is neither necessary for effectiveness (provided the contractual extension has been registered once, which will usually happen when registering the original security right as such) nor for priority so that the superpriority of the holder of the retention of ownership device (IX.–4:102 (Superpriority) paragraph (1)) is maintained.

In all other respects than those already discussed above, the consequences of production and combination of goods subject to a retention of ownership device are identical as those provided by Chapter 5 of this Book. This follows from IX.–2:308 (Use of goods subject to a retention of ownership device for production or combination) paragraph (1) which refers back to the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII in general. The reference also covers VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights). As a consequence, for example, the security right in the new or combined goods (provided the extension to these assets has been agreed upon, see above) automatically extends to the proceeds of the sale where the security right in the goods is extinguished by a third party's good faith acquisition (see VIII.–5:204 paragraph (2)). This improves the secured creditor's position as compared to the general rules of Book IX under which the extension of a security right to proceeds would, in principle, require that the parties have so agreed (cf. IX.–2:306 (Proceeds of the originally encumbered assets) paragraph (3)).

Proprietary security rights created by operation of law under this Charter (paragraph (4) sentence 1). Paragraph (4) of this Article deals with proprietary security rights created upon production, combination or, as the case may be, commingling (which may be relevant for contractually created security rights). The first sentence relates to proprietary security rights created under Section 2, i.e. under VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1) or VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraphs (2) and (3). Again, it is spelled out that such security rights, in principle, are subject to the provisions of Book IX. A general rule correlating to this reference is IX.–1:101 (General rule) paragraph (2)(c), which states that Book IX is applicable, with appropriate adaptations, to "security rights in movable assets implied by patrimonial law, if and in so far as this is compatible with the purpose of the law". The named Articles on production and combination constitute such provisions of patrimonial law which provide for a creation of proprietary security rights by operation of law. Contrary to other examples falling within the named general rule (cf. IX.–1:101 Comment C), any adaptations and limitations are intended to be spelled out by Chapter 5 of this Book directly, so that the reference to Book IX bears the character of a full reference unless explicitly provided by the present Chapter. A full reference will, e.g., apply to issues like enforcement. On the other hand, paragraph (4) sentence 1 of the present Article provides a reservation for deviating regulations provided by Section 2 of this Chapter. This refers to: (i) the rules on the creation of the security rights as mentioned above, which is an automatic, or ex lege, creation as compared to a (primarily) contractual creation under Book IX. Another main difference concerns (ii) the effectiveness of these security rights as against third parties, which does not require possession or registration, see VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) paragraph (1). Nothing, however, speaks against a voluntary registration of the security right, which may help to prevent a good faith acquisition free of the encumbrance due to impeding the third person's good faith. Further, (iii) the security right created under Section 2 automatically extends to the proceeds of a sale of the product or combined goods, if a third party acquires these new or combined goods free of the security right by virtue of a good faith acquisition; see VIII.–5:204(2) in contrast to IX.–2:306 (Proceeds of the originally encumbered assets) paragraph (3) (cf. also Comment E above). Finally, (iv) VIII.–5:204(3) contains a special rule on priority which deviates from the general rule of Book IX, under which the time of the competing security rights becoming effective would be decisive (IX.–4:101 (Priority: general rules)). Under the said VIII.–5:204(3), a proprietary security right created under the Articles on production and combination takes priority over any other security right which has previously been created, by the producer or by the owner of the principal part, in the new or combined goods. See in more detail in the Comments to the named Article.

Proprietary security rights created by party agreement under paragraph (1) (paragraph (4) sentence 2). A security right may also be established by an agreement of the parties under the party autonomy rule of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article. For example, the parties may even agree on exactly the same consequences as provided by the relevant rule of Section 2, but wish to record this explicitly in their written contract document for the purpose of clarity. Such security rights established by party agreement will be subject to the rules of Book IX with just one exception, namely the special priority rule provided for by VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) paragraph (3). The other exceptions applicable to the statutory security rights under Section 2, as listed in the previous Comment, do not apply. In particular, this means that (possession or) registration is required for achieving effectiveness as against third parties in any case where the security right is based on a party agreement. This choice may appear problematic to a certain extent where the party agreement provides exactly the same (or a more limited) security right as the default rule system of Section 2 would have provided in lieu of such agreement (and in which case registration would not be required). One may well argue that an owner of material who did foresee the possibility that production etc. could occur and was careful enough to regulate the property law consequences in advance, but "only" failed to register his security right, should not be put in a worse position than someone who did not even try to reach an agreement. However, the prevailing policy was agreed to be striving for completeness of the register, and reducing exceptions unless inadequate. In this perspective, someone who did foresee the possibility of production (etc.) and even established an agreement as to the proprietary consequences may be regarded less worthy of protection than material-owners in the situations for which the rules of Chapter 5 are designed primarily, i.e. where the owner of material did not even consent to the production or combination . A certain disadvantage for the owner of the material is that registration of a security right requires costs and some efforts. However, registering the security right will be of benefit for the owner of the material as well, as this makes it more difficult, or even impossible, for third parties to acquire the product free of encumbrances in good faith. The same distinction between security rights created under Section 2 of this Chapter and security rights created by party agreement is repeated in IX.–2:307 (Use of encumbered goods for production or combination) paragraph (3).

F. Relation to Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage (paragraph (5) sentence 1)

General: Book VI always applicable in addition. Paragraph (5) sentence 1 makes clear that the owner of material can, in addition to the rights granted by Chapter 5, also resort to the rules on non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI, provided that the requirements set out there are fulfilled. The main requirement is that the person causing a legally relevant damage acted intentionally or negligently. The rule corresponds to a virtually unanimous approach in the European legal systems, which practically serves an important supplementary function in relation to the consequences provided by the rules on production, combination and commingling: A co-ownership share proportionate to the value of the respective material may, depending on the circumstances, not cover all losses the owner of the goods had. Also, a claim for compensation of the market value, whether secured by a security right or not, may be less than the damage this owner actually sustains; see Comment F below for examples. Applicability of Book VI also serves an important function of pursuing justice, as liability is placed where negligence (or even intention) occurred, but where the property law rules provided by Chapter 5 do not, or only partly, react thereto. The working group preparing Book VIII would even have much sympathy for keeping any distinction as to the parties' good faith or bad faith outside the property law level and outweigh these issues by application of Book VI. In that, issues with a potentially high affinity for disputes could be kept out of property law to the benefit of legal certainty and the marketability of products. But see the exceptions for effecting production or combination in a specifically qualified grade of bad faith in VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraphs (2)(b) and (3) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (3) with VIII.–5:201 Comment E and VIII.–5:203 Comment F.

Examples. Paragraph (5) sentence 1 is of main importance where Book VI is applicable in addition to the default rules of Section 2 (it may, however, also be relevant where the parties have regulated the proprietary consequences of production, commingling or combination by party agreement, but something goes wrong in whatever relation). Additional loss which is not recoverable under the rules of Section 2 themselves may be sustained in different respect: Especially where co-ownership emerges proportionate to the value of the respective parts at the moment of commingling or combination, the value represented by these shares may be lower than the market value of each single contribution if the result is less valuable than the added values of the single contributions. Where, in such a situation, one party (or a third person) caused the commingling or combination intentionally or negligently, the difference in value can be claimed from that person based on Book VI.

Each A, B and C own a quantity of 5.000 tons of oil. Without being entitled to do so, D puts these quantities in his tank containing also 5.000 tons of oil owned by himself. A, B, C and D will become co-owners each of one fourth of the whole quantity under VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and each of them can separate 5.000 tons of oil under that rule. But suppose the quality of D's oil was lower than the quality of the other quantities, and therefore the value of the 5.000 tons which A, B and C can separate from D's tank is lower than the value of their original quantities. Or, D's tank is contaminated and the value of the oil placed there decreases for this reason. Then, A, B and C can recover their additional loss from D under the rules on non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI.

In commingling cases like the one in Illustration 16, additional loss recoverable under Book VI may also consist of costs incurred for separating the corresponding quantity from the mass or mixture, and transportation costs for returning the quantity from the place of commingling, if relevant. Eventually, also reparation in kind in the sense that the person who negligently caused the commingling must separate the quantities and restore them to the original owners may be demanded under VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (2). The same principles will apply where a "combined" entity does not fall within the combination rule because its constituents can still be separated in an economically reasonable way in the sense of VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (1). Here, also damage (including a mere diminution in value) sustained as a result of dissembling is recoverable.

An owner of material used for production, or the owner of a subordinate part used for combination, may sustain additional loss for instance in connection with procuring substitute goods. Their price may have increased after the moment of production or combination, or additional transportation costs etc. must be incurred for obtaining substitutes.

G. Relation to Book V on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (paragraph (5) sentence 2)

General. Book V on benevolent intervention in another's affairs may apply to a very wide range of completely different situations, which have in common, though, that the "intervener" acts with the predominant intention of benefiting another. It provides specific duties and specific rights of such interveners, basically built upon a common policy of providing incentives to act and to render assistance where there seems need for help, in contrast to promoting an attitude of "looking the other way". Situations where these policies call for application may also arise within the scope of Section 2 of this Chapter, if a benevolent intervener involves another's goods in production, combination or commingling. It is obvious that the policies of Book V and the specific motivation of the acting person should in some way affect the outcome and that the particularities of such cases may require different results than would be achieved under Section 2 of this Chapter. It is, however, not that simple to draw an exact line of how far such interferences should go. The general approach taken by paragraph (5) sentence 2 is that the rules of Book V "have priority" over the provisions of Chapter 5. This means that Section 2 of Chapter 5 is not necessarily replaced altogether. Its rules may partially remain applicable, depending on whether the two sets of rules and their underlying policies are compatible with regard to the individual case, or not. Where and to the extent they prove incompatible, Book V will supersede. For a closer analysis, it will be useful to distinguish between a level of obligations and corresponding rights on the one hand, and a level of property law on the other.

Obligations and corresponding rights arising from production, commingling or combination. As far as obligations arising from the events covered by Section 2 are concerned, it is quite evident that the principles of Book V should supersede the respective rules of Section 2. This may, in particular, be relevant in combination cases where the benevolent intervener inseparably adds "subordinate parts" to the "principal part" owned by the principal, as VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2) sentence 2 would "only" grant compensation under the unjustified enrichment principles. The unjustified enrichment approach taken in that rule implies attributing a risk on the acting person (see below, VIII.–5:203 Comment D)), whereas the rules of Book V tend to stimulate benevolent acts by limiting the risks following from such an intervention. Whether or to what extent a benevolent intervener has any right to indemnification, reimbursement or even remuneration should, therefore, exclusively decided by the rules of Book V Chapter 3. They do, therefore, take priority over VIII.–5:203(2).

P's boat, which is tied in a remote small harbour, is heavily damaged by a storm. I, who passes by when looking after his own boat, realises that P's boat is about to sink and provisionally repairs it with his own material, intending to prevent the owner of the boat from a major loss. Suppose there was no possibility to contact (perhaps not even to identify) P in advance and the material cannot be separated (in an economically reasonable way) later. The situation potentially falls within VIII.–5:203 (Combination) (VIII.–5:201 (Production) is not relevant since no "new goods" are created). Under paragraph (2) of VIII.–5:203, P will remain the owner of the (repaired) boat including I's material. This proprietary result perfectly fits with I's intention, so no conflict between Chapter 5 of Book VIII and Book V occurs. However, regarding the calculation of monetary claims the intervener I may have against P, Book V shall take priority and exclusively decide these issues. P shall not be entitled to resort to any defences which might be applicable under unjustified enrichment law, such as under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment). This will not only apply in relation to the material I used for repair, but also with regard to the work he performed in the course of his intervention.

Property rights arising from production, commingling or combination. A more difficult issue is whether or to what extent the principles of benevolent intervention may also affect the proprietary consequences Section 2 of Chapter 5 would otherwise establish. There are basically two options. The first option is leaving all property law matters exclusively to Section 2 of this Chapter and letting the principles of benevolent intervention come in only at a second stage. In a case like Illustration 1 (see Comment B) above, where the intervener produces juice for another person from that person's fruits, this would mean that the intervener would acquire ownership in the juice pursuant to VIII.–5:201 (Production) and would subsequently be under an obligation to transfer ownership of the product to the other person under V.–2.103 (Obligations after intervention) paragraph (1). This may be the understanding in a couple of legal systems (however, the reservation must be made that detailed research in this area could not be carried out and the following proposal may not be seen as the result of a comparative synopsis, but rather as a contribution to further discussion). But in certain most probably quite limited situations such approach may appear as a detour which neither meets the interests of the parties, nor the policies of the relevant provisions, and therefore could be avoided. In the case of Illustration 1, for instance, it appears questionable why the intervener should become owner of the produced juice meanwhile: The material (fruits) is owned by the principal, the intervener does not intend to acquire the product and he has no sovereignty interests (see Comment H below and VIII.–5:201 Comment C) in the new goods he intended to produce for the principal. In a system where publicity (in the sense of providing trustworthy information as to a person holding goods in possession being their owner) is not intended to play a significant role (cf. VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) Comment C and VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment C) and more direct solutions instead of correcting proprietary results by means of the law of obligations are sometimes striven for, it may appear more suitable to simplify the solution also for this case. The effect of the benevolent intervention principles may, in this case, be described as rendering VIII.–5:201(1) inapplicable, so that ownership remains with the owner of the material, despite it being transformed into new goods. Note that there is no ownership right forced on someone, but the original ownership right (in the material) exceptionally survives the transformation into new goods in order to avoid a passing and re-transfer of ownership. Situations where principles of benevolent intervention may take priority over the property law rules of Chapter 5 are, however, considered to be exceptional.

H. General policies pursued in Chapter 5 and relation to Book VII on unjustified enrichment

Main interests and basic policy of preserving proprietary equivalent for value of goods. There are typically two main interests involved in a situation of production, commingling or combination. They can be described as "value interests" and "sovereignty interests". The former means that each contributor, may he be the owner of goods involved in the respective process, or perform labour contributions, is interested in not being deprived of the value of his contribution. As two or more contributions are joined together and thus the result ideally forms an addition of the values involved, there is, in principle, no need to expropriate one party to the benefit of another. More specifically, however, the interest will be not only obtaining an equivalent to the value of one's contribution, but being provided protection for receiving such equivalent in the other party's insolvency. The other main interest is not primarily related to the value, but rather to the respective thing as such, its properties and function it may serve, due to these properties, for the person holding it. Such sovereignty interests will, originally, typically exist in relation to the material owned by each respective party. But these goods may cease to exist. After production, e.g., the new goods will primarily be of interest for the one who produced them, for instance where the new goods have been produced for the personal needs of the producer. Based on these interests, it is a basic policy of Section 2 to provide each party with a proprietary equivalent for the value of that part's goods. The aspect of prevailing sovereignty interests may be relevant for deciding on which proprietary consequences to adopt in detail.

Further policies regarding proprietary consequences. Further, it has been an aim to provide practically workable solutions in the sense that less efficient concepts are avoided where possible and the smooth flow of commerce with regard to the new entity is not obstructed. For instance, this has been an argument against co-ownership solutions in a couple of instances, because this requires a typically unwanted common administration of the new asset, time and efforts for dividing co-ownership etc. (cf. VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment C; but see VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) Comments A and C). The aspect of "publicity", on the other hand, has not been an important guideline for developing these rules, although some results achieved in Section 2 may coincide with this idea.

Good faith or bad faith of parties involved. In a number of European legal systems the question of whether the parties, in particular the acting person in a case of production, were in good faith or in bad faith is material for the proprietary consequences of the event. For reasons to be discussed more closely below, the working group preparing Book VIII tried to avoid this and proposed to shift all issues of bad faith from the property law level to reparation under the principles of non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI, which is always applicable in addition to the present Chapter. It did, however, not fully succeed with this approach, and certain exceptions for a person effecting production or combination in a particular grade of bad faith, namely when actually knowing that the goods used are owned by another person and that this other person does not consent, have been imposed by the Study Group's Co-ordinating Committee. As a result, one may say that the model rules of Section 2, as they stand today, also imply a policy that a person in such "qualified" bad faith shall not acquire (sole) ownership of the new or combined goods benefiting from a criminal act. Closer on these issues below, VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment E and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) Comment F.

Policies regarding the calculation of monetary claims replacing a right of ownership. Despite there being a general aim of providing each owner of material with some equivalent for the value of the goods he may lose, there is certain room for calculating these claims replacing the former ownership right. Such margin exists, in particular, where the value of the resulting product is lower than the added value of all contributions. As the default rules of Section 2 mainly apply to situations where the owner of the relevant material did not consent to production, combination or commingling, there is a policy of placing the risk of economically inefficient production and combination on the person who effected the act. The calculation rules of VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2) are built upon this policy. See there for a closer discussion of this approach.

Relation to unjustified enrichment law. The unjustified enrichment principles of Book VII leave it to the property law rules to decide whether an acquisition of ownership under property law provisions "justifies" the acquirer's enrichment in the sense of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraphs (1) and (3), immunising the acquirer against claims under Book VII; compare VII.–2:101 Comment C. The clear decision underlying Section 2 of the present Chapter is that economically, each party should in general keep what it contributed, which means that where, e.g., sole ownership is conferred to one person as a result of production, the value of the other party's contribution must be returned to the latter. As mentioned in the previous Comment, however, Section 2 contains its own regime of monetary compensation which is deliberately chosen for certain policy reasons. In order not to undermine this approach, unjustified enrichment principles shall not be generally applicable in addition to Chapter 5, but only where the unjustified enrichment rules are regarded to fit appropriately to the policies of Chapter 5 and, therefore, this Chapter itself refers to Book VII on unjustified enrichment. See VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (3) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2). Differences between the unjustified enrichment approach and the "equal to value" approach are discussed in VIII.–5:201 Comment D.

Section 2: Default rules and supplementary provisions

VIII.–5:201: Production

(1) Where one person, by contributing labour, produces new goods out of material owned by another person, the producer becomes owner of the new goods and the owner of the material is entitled, against the producer, to payment equal to the value of the material at the moment of production, secured by a proprietary security right in the new goods.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply where:

(a) the labour contribution is of minor importance; or

(b) the producer knows that the material is owned by another person and that the owner of the material does not consent to the production, unless the value of the labour is much higher than the value of the material.

(3) In the cases covered by paragraph (2) and in cases where no new goods are produced, ownership remains with the owner of the material or, where there is more than one such owner, the attribution of ownership is determined by application of VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) or VIII.–5:203 (Combination). The person contributing labour is entitled to the reversal of any enrichment subject to the provisions of Book VII. For the purposes of this paragraph, VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) does not exclude the entitlement of a person contributing labour to a reversal of the enrichment.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. Production in the sense of this Article probably is the most important category of the default rules provided by Section 2. The rule applies where a person, the producer, performs labour on goods owned by (at least) one other person and this results in the creation of "new goods". As an additional requirement for the production rule to apply, the labour contribution must be of more than "minor importance". As to the differentiation between the three categories production, commingling and combination, see VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment B. Note that the provisions on production, commingling and combination regulated in Section 2 are default rules and do not apply where the parties have regulated the consequences of these events by agreement; see VIII.–5:101 paragraphs (1) and (2) and Comment D on that Article. Also note that production involving goods subject to a retention of ownership device is governed by Book IX which, however, refers back to Chapter 5 of this Book to a considerable degree; cf. VIII.–5:101 Comment E.

Terminology: production. The term "production" has been chosen for the simple reason that "processing", which in general may be used synonymously, is already used, in a different meaning, by the principles in Chapter 4 of Book IV.C on services contracts. Processing within the meaning of Book IV.C covers services performed on an existing (inter alia) movable thing, in particular where the service provider undertakes to repair, maintain or clean existing goods (cf. IV.C.–4:101 (Scope)), whereas under the present Article, the creation of new goods is characteristic. "Production" should, however, not be understood to be restricted to industrial or other professional production. It applies to all situations where goods of one person are transformed into new goods by labour performed by another.

Structure of this Article. Paragraph (1) of this Article contains the main rule for production: the requirements for this rule's application (supplemented by the negative requirement that the labour contribution must not be of mere minor importance, paragraph (2)(a)) and the consequences of production on the property law level (acquisition of ownership by the producer, creation of proprietary security rights for the owners of material) and on the level of obligations (material-owner's right to payment). Paragraph (2)(b) provides for an exception from the general production rule for thieves and similar cases, namely where the producer actually knows that the material is owned by another person and that this other person did not consent to production. Paragraph (3), finally, regulates the proprietary and obligatory consequences for all cases excluded from the general rule of paragraph (1). With regard to contributions consisting of material, paragraph (3) partly refers further to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination). Regarding the "producer's" labour contribution, reference is made to unjustified enrichment law. As to the proprietary security rights created under paragraph (1), supplementary provisions are regulated by VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights).

Comparative background and main policy issues. In most European legal systems, application of the rules on production presupposes that "new goods" have been produced from another person's material. In most countries, the producer acquires sole ownership in the product, provided that a certain ratio between the value of his labour performance and the value of the original material is exceeded. This ratio however varies, so that in some jurisdictions, the producer only acquires ownership of the product if his labour contribution was clearly more valuable than the other party's material; or each time the value of the labour contribution exceeds 50 % of the new goods' value; or always unless the value of the material was clearly higher. Where sole ownership of the producer emerges, the owners of the material have, with certain differences in detail, a right to compensation for the value of their goods. In a small minority of countries, on the other hand, the general rule is that the producer and the owner(s) of the goods become co-owners of the product. Considerable differences also exist with regard to the question how to treat a producer who acted in bad faith. In a couple of jurisdictions, this has no effect on the level of property law; sometimes the judge can establish a different solution, sometimes the law is unclear or doubtful. In some countries, a producer in bad faith can, as a rule, not acquire ownership of the product, and in some of them he will not even get compensated for the value of his labour performance. In some countries, a certain party (e.g. the owner of material in case the producer acted in bad faith) can chose whether to acquire ownership of the product or to leave the right of ownership to the other party and demand compensation of the own contribution. Against this background, the main policy issues apparently are how to distribute the property rights in the new product and how to meet the material-owner's value interest adequately when taking into account the producer's sovereignty interests (cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment H). Also, it is important to decide whether or to what extent it shall be relevant if the producer acted in bad faith. As to details, there are choices to be made regarding the calculation of the monetary compensation an owner of material may demand if he loses his right of ownership to the producer.

B. General requirements for application (paragraph (1) and paragraph (2)(a))

Conjunction of labour and another's goods; priority over commingling and combination. As mentioned above, production in this sense occurs where new goods result from a "conjunction" of labour performed by one person and material owned by another.

Where, at the same time, the requirements for VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) or VIII.–5:203 (Combination) are fulfilled, the present Article on production takes priority.

> P, a modern artist, creates a sculpture from Lego bricks owned by A, B and C without their consent. The Lego bricks all look the same so that it is unclear which bricks were taken from A, B and C, respectively. The sculpture could easily be taken apart without damaging the bricks and a quantity equivalent to A, B and C's contributions could easily be restored to them. Nonetheless, VIII.–5:201 (Production) takes priority over VIII.–5:202 (Commingling).

On the other hand, if a case involves labour contributions, this does not automatically mean that the production rule applies. Where work is performed, but either no "new goods" are created or the labour contribution is only of "minor importance", the present Article refers further to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination), or, in case there just has been one other owner of material involved, that person will remain being the owner of his material. See also VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment B.

Material. The term "material" is used synonymously to "goods" and corresponds to a quite traditional terminology in many legal systems. However, the main reason for using another notion than "goods" simply is that the rule also speaks of "new goods" in the sense of the result of production, and referring to "goods" in two different meanings has been avoided for the sake of easier understanding. Anyway, "material" must be movable material at the beginning of the transformation process. Quarrying out stones from a rock is, therefore, not covered by the present Chapter. This corresponds to the scope of the whole Book VIII.

Goods owned by another person – production involving own goods. The wording of paragraph (1) only addresses situations where the producer uses goods owned by another person. In practice, it will often happen that the producer also uses some own material. However, paragraph (1) does not cater to this situation because in that respect, no change of property takes place and no obligation of the producer to compensate for the value of the goods arises as against himself. The rule implies that the producer who also uses own material, or of course also if he uses solely own material, will be the owner of the product as well, but there was seen no need to spell this out explicitly. This principle also applies where the producer has stolen some of the other material (or at least knows that he does not own it and that the owner does not consent), so that the exception under paragraph (2)(b) and paragraph (3) applies: The producer will always be treated as an owner in relation to those goods which are really owned by himself (as to the application of this principle to cases covered by paragraph (3) of this Article, see also Comment F below).

Labour. "Labour" (or "work", which could be used synonymously in this context) is intended to be understood in a wide sense. It comprises actual workforce of a natural person as well as work performed by machines for a certain person. It is also intended to cover preparation activities, as long as they relate to the particular activity of production, like planning a production process or developing and designing the future product. As in some areas these preparation costs can be much higher than the efforts for manufacturing in the physical sense, all such expenditures are to be taken into account when assessing whether or not a labour contribution is of "minor importance" in the sense of paragraph (2)(a), i.e. when deciding whether the production rule of paragraph (1) is applicable. The threshold function of paragraph (2)(a) also shows that it is appropriate to explicitly define the producer's labour contribution as a criterion for production in the sense of this Article. This is not completely obvious from a historical and comparative perspective, as in some legal systems (e.g. English and Irish law and also Roman law, which is quite important as it widely serves as a common foundation in this area), "specification" (production) is defined rather by emphasizing a fundamental change in substance (i.e. a result) than by (also) stressing another person's labour contribution. The present Article, however, is based on the idea that a contribution made by the producer (i.e. the labour) is "transformed" into a proprietary right.

Producer. It is not easy to give an exact definition of who is to be regarded as "the producer" in the sense of this Article. This does not necessarily have to be the person who undertakes the physical acts effecting the transformation from the original material to the "new goods"; rather one may say that the producer will be the person, whether natural or juristic, in whose name and on whose account the relevant acts are undertaken, although this also may be imprecise. In the end, this must be decided according to the common opinion, applying an objective perspective and taking into account the facts of the individual case. For instance, where employees, in the course of their employment, create new goods from material owned by someone else than their employer, the employing enterprise will be regarded as "the producer" in relation to the owner of the material. This also means that if the owner of the material seeks to regulate the consequences of production by party agreement, he must contract with the employer (and of course does not have to enter into contractual relationships with each single employee who may be involved in the production process). Where a buyer subject to a retention of ownership device transforms the goods into something new, he (and not the supplier) will be regarded as the producer in the sense of this Article. IX.–2:308 (Use of goods subject to a retention of ownership device for production or combination), which is primarily applicable due to the reference in VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph (3), refers back to the present Article. If, which may happen theoretically, more than one independent producers act together in the production process, they will usually do so on the basis of a contractual agreement based on which it will be possible to decide who is to be regarded as "the producer" in relation to the owners of the material. Where this is not the case (and all the labour contributions, counted together, are of more than minor importance), the suggested solution is applying VIII.–5:203 (Combination) by way of analogy regarding the internal relation between the producers. Accordingly, if one labour contribution constitutes a "principal contribution", this producer shall acquire sole ownership and the other shall have a right to payment, secured by a proprietary security right. If not, they can become co-owners. An alternative would be to let all producers acquire co-ownership in any case, but it practically seems preferable to achieve a simpler and more efficient solution (in the sense of avoiding practical difficulties which may follow from co-ownership solutions) also in this case.

New goods, general. Paragraph (1), under which the producer acquires sole ownership in the product, requires that the result of different persons' labour and material are "new goods". In principle, this requirement appears unanimously in virtually all European legal systems. To a certain degree there are, however, different views expressed as to which criteria shall be decisive for constituting "new goods". Despite these uncertainties, which perhaps can never be fully avoided and will also appear in relation to the present Article, it is evident that the requirement fulfils an important function and, therefore, is also adopted in this Article: it constitutes a borderline for labour contributions to be transformed into proprietary rights. There are also other borderlines under the present Article, in particular the requirement that the labour contribution must not be of mere minor importance. But the latter has a somewhat different scope, focussing on the producer's contribution as such, while the "new goods" requirement addresses the quality of the product as compared to the quality of the material. For a number of instances, no changes in the proprietary position shall be effected irrespective of the value of the work performed. In particular, the "new goods" requirement has the consequence that maintenance activities or mere reparation of existing goods are excluded from the production rule (e.g. restorations of works of art).

Criteria relevant for constituting new goods. Taking into account the difficulties arising everywhere when trying to define the requirement of "new goods", these model rules do not attempt to provide a definition in the black letter text. Rather, a number of criteria, taken from the comparative survey, is listed in the following for the purpose of illustrating what may be relevant in the present context. The following overview does not intend to be conclusive, nor does it intend to provide any weighting of the named criteria. Fulfilling only one of these criteria may, in a particular case, suffice to constitute new goods, whereas it may also happen that a certain criterion is clearly fulfilled and the constitution of "new goods" must nevertheless be denied. In the end, the common opinion will be decisive. Relevant criteria evidently overlapping each other to a certain extent may be:

(i) Change in form, external appearance or design. Such a change often indicates that new goods are created.

> Grapes are transformed into wine. A wedding gown is made from silk.

These criteria, however, do not necessarily have to be decisive: There are cases where the form does not change, though a new thing is created. This is especially the case for liquids.

> Illustration 3
> Water and oxygen are put together to create hair bleach (hydrogen peroxide), which is a new product, but the form is still the same (liquid).

On the other hand, also opposite cases may occur, namely where the form changes but no new movable is created.

> Illustration 4
> A gold ingot has been melted to a gold nugget. Though the form is different, no new thing has been created. The production rule may also be inapplicable because the "labour contribution" is of minor importance.

(ii) Change of function or usage. Where the result is able to serve an independent function or usage as compared to the original material, this will also indicate that the entity constitutes "new goods" in the sense of this Article.

> Illustration 5
> Timber is transformed into furniture.

(iii) Change in essence or character. A considerably changed "essence" or character of the new asset as compared to the material also indicates "new goods".

Illustration 6
A motor cycle is assembled from individual components in a way that the result is considered a unique model which needs a special authorisation from the Technical Inspection Agency. The novelty of the result may be approved because the economic impact of the produced asset is, compared to the raw materials, totally different.

A picture painted on another person's canvas. A sculpture made from marble.

(iv) Change of name. Also a new name may serve as an indicator for a change in essence. Illustrations 6 and 7 may also serve as examples in this respect.

(v) Increase in value. A mere increase in value, even where the value is greatly increased, should not necessarily make "new goods", but the value criterion may be used as one possible factor among others. As in some legal systems where this criterion is used, the aspect of a considerable increase in value should mainly be applied where solely recurring to other criteria would remain doubts whether the change was "fundamentally enough".

Exclusion of labour contributions of minor importance, paragraph (2)(a). Even where "new goods" are created, the production rule of paragraph (1) of this Article shall not apply if the labour contribution was only of "minor importance". The underlying idea is that, taking into account that applying paragraph (1) leads to the acquisition of sole ownership by the producer, providing a certain minimum level in order to allow the labour contribution triggering consequences in property law has been considered adequate. As briefly mentioned in Comment A above and reflected in more detail in the Notes on this Article, a certain threshold in relation to the labour contribution's value is also provided for in addition to the common "new goods" requirement in many European legal systems. But these national rules often mean a threshold of, or of about, 50 % of the value of the final product, which is definitely not intended by the present Article. The function, in fact, is a different one. Whereas the traditional approach in the (vast majority of) national legal systems is that the producer, provided the relevant threshold is exceeded, shall acquire sole ownership while the owners of the material are left with a mere obligatory right to compensation and therefore will remain unprotected in the producer's insolvency, the model proposed by the present Article takes care of the material-owners' value interests in any case by providing them with a proprietary security right in the product. The threshold rule, therefore, does not have to balance "black or white" alternatives in the sense that one party runs the risk of losing about half of the value of the new goods; it really is intended to provide a minimum level, the starting point in fact having been to exclude "1 % labour contributions" from the scope of the general production rule. A certain flexibility must however be left to the courts when applying a rule like this. Although a fixed percentage is deliberately not provided, it is clear that the importance of the labour contribution must be very low for the exception in paragraph (2)(a) to apply. It should also be clarified that not only value may matter (which is reflected in the neutral word "importance"). Also the grade of change from the original material to the final product may be taken into account when applying this rule, taking into account that the material-owners' sovereignty interests will typically decline the less this party could use the product due to the transformation and change of function it underwent.

Low importance of labour contribution, but producer uses own material in addition. Where the labour contribution's importance is rather low so that it is doubtful whether the "minor importance" test would be passed but the producer also used own material in the course of production, one may think of taking this into account in favour of the producer. Such an approach may be advocated by the argument that the production rule of this Article and the combination rule of VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2) are based on somewhat comparable ideas, so that the importance of labour contributions and material contributions may eventually be added in order to exceed the borderline for acquisition of sole ownership.

Increase in value no separate requirement. In some countries it is disputed whether the application of the production rule requires that the "new goods" are more valuable than the original material. In case of production, an increase in value will regularly take place (cf. also Comment B above as regards the concept of "new goods"), but there seems to be no substantial need for adopting that as an additional requirement. The most important aspect is that cases where "production" exceptionally leads to a decrease in value can be solved adequately. In fact, there exist a number of vehicles to avoid inappropriate results: In some cases, the "new goods" requirement will prevent a change regarding the ownership of the material, namely where the common opinion considers the result of the labour process, to which material X was subject to, as "damaged or destroyed X" and not as a new product Y. This will, in particular, be the case where the intended production fails completely. In some other situations, the exception for labour contributions of "minor importance" may help. In both cases, the person effecting the transformation will not acquire any ownership at all; the consequences are further regulated by paragraph (3) of this Article. Where none of these exceptions applies, paragraph (1) safeguards that the material-owners' claims for payment, each of them secured by a proprietary security right, "eat up" the whole value of the product, so that, economically, nothing is left for the producer, despite he formally acquires ownership (which still may make certain sense in view of his prevailing sovereignty interests, e.g. because he is a market participant in the respective area and may be best able to sell the product). The principles of non-contractual liability for damage will be applicable in addition, cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph (5).

No requirement that restoration to the status quo ante must be impossible or economically unreasonable. Unlike VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination), the production rules in most European legal systems do not require that restoration of the "new goods" to the status quo ante must be impossible or economically unreasonable. The present draft follows this approach. There is of course a common understanding that undoing a production process would typically be economically inefficient. As the value of the labour contribution would necessarily be destroyed completely, the total value after restoration would most often be considerably lower than the value of the product. One may put this argument also in terms of equal treatment of the contributors: In case of restoration, the producer would not receive anything. While the owners of the material would get their material back, the work performed cannot be reversed. The processor would, therefore, not be treated equally to the owners of the material. It is, therefore, evident that from the producer's point of view, any rule preventing restoration to the status quo ante seems preferable. From the material-owners' perspective, of curse the contrary may be true. However, under the present Article's solution, the owners of the material will always be secured, with proprietary effect, equal to the value of their material. Any additional loss may, provided the relevant requirements are fulfilled, be recovered under Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage.

C. Proprietary consequences (paragraph (1))

General. As mentioned above, most European legal systems provide for acquisition of ownership by the producer, the owners of material being compensated by some (obligatory) claim for monetary compensation as against the producer. A small minority of countries provides for co-ownership of the producer and the owners of the material. The following comments will first discuss different options available, taking into account the typical interests involved, namely value interests and sovereignty interests, and the aim of providing workable and efficient solutions (cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment H). This will not only involve models already existing in Europe, but extend to further options which are not implemented in any legal system today. The issue how to deal with producers who act in bad faith will, following the structure of the proposed Article, be discussed in Comment E below.

(a) Options

Sole ownership of the producer, owners of material being awarded an obligatory claim for compensation. This solution is the most wide-spread one in Europe. The main advantage typically pronounced in this context is that this approach takes care of the producer's interests in the best way. As already mentioned, the producer may have an interest in the new goods not only for the capital he invested (the value of his work), but also for sovereignty interests. The latter will typically apply where new goods are produced for the personal needs of the processor. Where, e.g., timber is used for manufacturing furniture specifically shaped and designed for being placed in the producer's house, no one will have better use of it than the producer. Perhaps, no one may even have any use of it except the producer, depending on the individual circumstances. The sovereignty interests' argument is not equally applicable where the producer manufactures on a massive scale with the intention to sell the products. Certainly, the producer has an economic interest regarding the value of his work also in this case, but so have the owners of material. Typically, however, the argument of sovereignty interests will still be applicable in a certain modified sense as a professional producer will have experience and access to the relevant market to distribute the new goods and may, therefore, achieve good prices without incurring ineffective costs (such as, e.g., employing an agent for selling off the new goods). (The latter argument could, of course, also be used in favour of a rule creating co-ownership between the producer and the owners of material, as long as marketing the products is organised by the producer, since the marketing abilities could then also be of benefit for the other co-owners. But that might raise other difficulties.) The owners of the material, on the other hand, are typically said to have no genuine interest in the new goods as such, but only an economic interest in the value of their material, which could be safeguarded by an obligatory claim for compensation. Where this claim for payment (however to be calculated) is a mere obligation, however, this solution has the obvious disadvantage (from the material-owner's perspective) that it does not provide any protection in case the producer (the new owner) goes bankrupt. It should be observed that the rules of Chapter 5, in particular, cover situations where production (etc.) takes place without consent of the owner of the material, so that the owner of the material may have had neither the chance to evaluate the risk of the other person's insolvency, nor to take precautions. In that respect, production might in fact result in an "expropriation".

Another basic advantage of a solution providing sole ownership to the processor can be seen in its simplicity. It is argued to promote legal certainty for the parties involved as well as for subsequent buyers or "commerce" in general, and to be favourable in terms of guaranteeing low information costs for third party acquirers as to the fact of who is the owner. However, such assessment is not necessarily correct, depending on the detailed shape of the applicable rule and on the circumstances of the individual case. It depends on the particular content of the rule in the sense that it may make a major difference whether it is necessary that, e.g., the value of the labour must exceed the value of other persons' material (which, approximately, is the case in many countries, cf. Comments A and B above), or the producer becomes sole owner irrespective of his own contribution's importance. The value ratio and the fact who owned which material are typically hard to identify for a third party interested in obtaining rights in the product. Also, it may generally be observed that possession does not necessarily converge with a proprietary entitlement; but as long as the law provides that the producer acquires (sole) ownership, this problem will typically be of reduced relevance. However, the whole argumentation is considerably put into perspective since under these model rules, the effects of production, commingling and combination may generally be determined by party agreement; see VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph (1).

A definite advantage of sole ownership, as compared to co-ownership solutions, is that no separation of co-ownership must take place, which may save time, negotiation efforts and costs. On the other hand, a clear disadvantage of a mere sole ownership solution, in particular if the value of the work must exceed about 50 % of the product's value, would be that a certain degree of arbitrariness in borderline cases cannot be denied.

Sole ownership (or co-ownership) of material-owner(s), producer has obligatory claim for compensation. Vice versa, it would of course also be possible to neglect the producer's contribution completely and to let the owner of the material become sole owner of the product or, in case goods of more than one owner are involved, provide co-ownership of the material owners. This is, in fact, the solution in many countries where the certain threshold of the labour contribution's importance (usually approximately 50 % of the product's value) is not exceeded. Obviously, the producer's sovereignty interests would not be served by such a solution, and his interests in relation to the value of his labour contribution will if the owner is under a mere obligation to pay an equivalent to that value be taken care of (only) if the owner of the material is not insolvent. The ownership relations would regularly not be identifiable easily for third parties and whether sole ownership, which at least has the advantage of simple administration, emerges would depend on whether the producer uses material of just one or of more than one other persons. This brief summary already shows that this solution perhaps should be avoided if another solution catering for the involved interests adequately can be applied, or where there exist serious reasons for prohibiting an acquisition of ownership by the producer (e.g. because he has stolen the material).

Co-ownership of producer and owner(s) of material. Co-ownership of the producer and the owner, or owners, of the material is provided by a minority of European legal systems. Under this approach, each contribution is transformed into, and represented in, a proprietary right in the new goods. Accordingly, such solution has the advantage of being a "fair" one as between the contributing parties in terms of their respective value interests. Nothing is taken away from the producer; all contributors are treated alike. In particular, each contributor is protected in any other contributor's insolvency. Sovereignty interests in the sense discussed above, on the other hand, are not that efficiently catered for. One person, the producer, may wish to use the product (or to sell it in the course of his business), which is not completely prohibited by the co-ownership concept, but will require an agreement of all co-owners or, at least, a majority of them. In principle, co-ownership requires common administration under the relevant provisions of national law (administration issues not being dealt with in these model rules), which makes this solution somewhat more complicated. Also, determining the co-owners' undivided shares may be difficult in practice, at least if the value of the production activity is hard to determine under the relevant rules. Where this is the case, the co-ownership solution may lead to some uncertainty between the contributing parties as well as for third parties, and, if so, may provoke an additional risk of disputes, or investigation costs for third parties. Disputes as to the proportions of the undivided shares may of course cause a number of consequential difficulties.

Also, it is clear that co-ownership will regularly be an interim stage. The parties will strive for either acquiring sole ownership in the product, or having it sold and receiving an equivalent amount of money. This implies a certain disadvantage of the co-ownership solution as compared to sole ownership, as the process of division may be time-consuming and may cause additional efforts. Under the relevant national rules on co-ownership, division of co-ownership will regularly be possible if the parties so agree, or may be effected in court proceedings. Both may take a long time and require additional costs. Negotiations may be blocked by certain co-owners who try to stipulate for a higher price than there contribution would actually be worth.

Another problem is that co-ownership may complicate selling the asset to a third party and thus constitute a certain impediment to commerce. Each co-owner can only transfer his or her own undivided share, which, from the buyer's perspective, is regularly less attractive than acquiring sole ownership. To acquire full ownership, the third party must negotiate with all co-owners, which may result in additional transaction costs. It also implies the risk that one co-owner refuses to transfer his share. If so, or if one of the co-owners tries to negotiate for an inadequately high price, selling the asset may be postponed until co-ownership gets divided, which may be regarded inefficient. Actually, this may cause the product to be economically "blocked" from the market for a certain while.

Co-ownership and right to buy out. The further alternatives are, in a way, variations of, or compromise solutions between, the main concepts discussed above. One option could be starting with a broad co-ownership approach, but providing the producer a right to "buy out" the other parties' property rights. As soon as the producer pays, the respective material-owner's share accrues to the producer. This would combine the proprietary protection of the material-owners' value interests as achieved by the co-ownership concept with a possibility to meet the producer's sovereignty interests. Also, some of the practical disadvantages of co-ownership (like common administration of the new goods) could be minimised if, and as soon as, the right to buy out is exercised. In principle, the right to buy out would serve the function of providing a simplified and accelerated means of dividing co-ownership. However, these theoretical advantages can be practically limited or even be undone if disputes arise as to the calculation of the compensation to be paid to the material-owners. As long as such disputes are not settled or decided upon, no one can say for sure whether paying a certain amount is sufficient to extinguish the other party's co-ownership right. In that respect, this concept does not differ so much from the ordinary co-ownership model under which it would (also) be necessary to reach an agreement as to the division of co-ownership. Of course no simplification would be achieved if the producer does not even intend to exercise the right to buy out. Also, one would have to provide regulations on how long such a right may be exercised etc.

Rights to choose. Further alternatives consist in providing a certain party, or several parties, with a right to chose whether to acquire ownership in the product or to let this party's property right accrue to the other party for a monetary compensation. In the initial stage, co-ownership of all parties involved will be the appropriate starting point. If the right to choose is placed on the producer, this will equal the "right to buy out" model described above. Other right to choose concepts are provided in some countries where the producer acted in bad faith. Then, the right to choose is placed on the owner of the material. This may work pretty well where just one owner of material is involved, but can cause difficulties where there are more of them. One owner of material may, for example, be interested in acquiring sole ownership in the product because he intends to use it in a certain way. But if thereafter another owner of material also opts for "ownership", the solution must probably be that co-ownership between these two is created; the original motivation of the first material-owner will be frustrated.

Sole ownership of the producer and proprietary security rights for the owners of material. This option, which has finally been favoured, will be discussed below in the subsequent Comments.

(b) The proposed solution: sole ownership of the producer and proprietary security rights for the owners of material

How the concept works. The solution proposed in these model rules does, as such, not exist in any European legal systems today. Nevertheless, it is suggested as a model taking care of the different interests adequately and avoiding certain disadvantages of other options which have been discussed above. The concept works as follows: Upon production, the producer acquires sole ownership of the new goods, which corresponds to the majority approach in Europe. At the same time, the owner(s) of material acquire an obligatory claim for payment to be calculated according to rules discussed below in Comment D as against the producer. This, in essence, is also nothing new. The specific additional aspect is that this right to payment is secured by a proprietary security right in the new goods, which is created by operation of law at the moment of production. In principle, this proprietary security right follows the provisions of Book IX on proprietary security rights, unless provided otherwise by Section 2 of this Chapter (cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph (4) sentence 1). The security right created under this Article constitutes a statutory security right in the sense of IX.–1:101 (General rule) paragraph (2)(c), which states that the provisions of Book IX also apply, with appropriate adaptations, to "security rights in movable assets implied by patrimonial law, if and in so far as this is compatible with the purpose of the law"; see IX.–5:101 Comment E. For further details as to this proprietary security right, see Comment C below and VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights), which supplements the Articles on production and combination.

Reasons for choosing this model. The proposed concept combines a number of advantages of the options discussed above, while avoiding the disadvantages as far as possible. In the first place, it serves the processor's sovereignty interests as discussed supra in Comment C. At the same time, it takes care of the material-owners' value interests by providing not only a right to payment equivalent to the value of each material contribution, but also protection in the producer's insolvency due to the proprietary security right. An expropriation effect (in an economic sense) is thus avoided. This idea is regarded a main policy consideration underlying the proposed concept. Also when focussing on the relation between the owners of the material and the producer's general creditors, each side basically keeps what it had (the value of the goods, or workforce, respectively). The producer's general creditors are restricted to their debtor's contribution, i.e. what is left after economically subtracting the protected values of the former material-owners. They do not benefit disproportionately high from the coincidence (seen from their perspective) of the producer involving other persons' goods in a production process.

It is considered to be positive that safeguarding the parties' monetary interests does not require creating co-ownership as a typically interim stage and that, accordingly, the practical difficulties necessarily connected with a co-ownership concept can be minimized or even avoided. There is, therefore, no need for a joint administration of the product, which would, at least as a tendency, anyway not be promising to work so well (one may assume that the willingness towards a fruitful co-operation is limited where one of the co-owners transformed another's goods into something else without the owner's consent). Also, the time, costs and efforts which may be necessary for dividing co-ownership may be saved (cf. Comment C above).

The proposed concept should also have at least slight advantages where the new goods are to be transferred to a third party. The third party may acquire ownership by negotiating with just one party, i.e. the producer. As compared to the "buy out" model discussed in Comment C, clarity about the producer's ability to transfer sole ownership is provided irrespective of any disputes as to the calculation of monetary compensation. Such disputes may still be a certain issue where it comes to the question whether the material-owner's security right has already been extinguished by effecting a certain payment to the former owner of the material. But it is at least clear who may validly dispose of the whole asset, and the "equal to value" approach for calculating these claims (discussed below in Comment D) should provide a rather clear and workable calculation method.

To a certain extent, "sole ownership plus security right" model even coincides with the traditional publicity aspect, but only in in so far as the new goods are typically placed with the producer and this person is the one who acquires sole ownership. This is, however, not considered to form a main argument for the present solution, as the conclusions one may draw from the "external appearance" of possession are anyway doubtful. And obviously, publicity is not at all promoted by creating "hidden" proprietary security rights for the material-owners. The latter aspect is, however, not regarded as an objection. One should always take into account that a main alternative would have been the creation of "hidden" co-ownership rights, which virtually makes no difference in this relation. Potential third party acquirers may be protected by VIII.–3:102 (Good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights). As to the risk this rule creates for the material-owners and their security rights, see the next Comment and VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) paragraph (2).

Supplementary rules as to proprietary security right. It is very important to stress also in relation to the intended model-rule-function of these provisions that a concept like this requires that certain conditions regarding the regime of proprietary security rights either exist or are provided for in additional rules; and where such supplementary rules must be included, that they do not interfere too heavily with the rest of the security rights system. VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) provides such regulations. First, it is important that a proprietary security right created under paragraph (1) of this Article takes effect, also in relation to third parties, without any act of taking possession, or registration, by the secured creditor (i.e. the former owner of material). Otherwise the concept could not work for material-owners who do not even know that their goods have been used in production. Second, due to this lack of publicity, the secured creditor runs the risk that the security right may be extinguished by a third party's goods faith acquisition. It is no key policy to counteract this risk (a very similar risk would also occur if the material-owners would acquire co-ownership of the product); but the proposed concept provides an extension of the security right to the proceeds of such a sale to a third party. Finally, there may be issues concerning the priority regime between this and other security rights which have been granted, in the producer's future goods, to other secured creditors before the product is actually created. The named VIII.–5:204 contains such provisions in its paragraphs (1) to (3). See there for a closer discussion.

D. Material-owner's right to payment (paragraph (1))

General. Upon production, the owner of the material acquires a right to payment, as against the producer, equal to the value of his goods at the moment of production. The obvious purpose is to compensate the material-owner for the loss of his property, and in order to make this right more effective, the proprietary security right discussed above secures this right to payment. As such, the material-owner's right to payment is nothing unusual. Paragraph (1) simply provides that there is an obligation arising by operation of law at the moment of production. In all other respects, this obligation is subject to the general rules on obligations and corresponding rights as provided under Book III, including prescription (for the latter, see Comment D below). Such a right to monetary compensation is, in one way or the other, provided by all European legal systems where (or in case that) ownership of the product accrues to the producer. In detail, there are, however, certain differences as to the calculation of this monetary claim. A number of legal systems directly spell out that compensation must be made "for the value" of the goods used in production. Other legal systems refer to their (national) principles of unjustified enrichment, under which, again, calculation according to the goods' objective market value often is a guiding principle, but sometimes also the subjective benefit of the enriched party (i.e. the producer) is decisive, which can lead to a lower, or even higher, amount of compensation as compared to the market value. This shows that there is a certain policy choice to be made in the course of developing these model rules. The main issue regarding this choice is on whom the risk that the production process turns out not to be successful in an economic sense shall be placed, i.e. who shall bear the economic "loss" when the added value of the goods used for production and the expenditure for the production process itself exceed the value of the final product. Vice versa, there is also the issue who, the producer alone or (also) the owners of the material, shall take the benefit where production turns out to be very successful in the sense that the value of the new goods is (significantly) higher than the added values of all contributions. In addition, account must be given to some detailed effects of the unjustified enrichment principles provided by Book VII of these model rules, to which reference would be given in case the preferred option was to apply an unjustified enrichment concept (e.g., the defence of disenrichment). These issues will be discussed in the following Comments. As mentioned previously, reparation under the principles of non-contractual liability for damage may always be demanded in addition provided the relevant prerequisites are fulfilled; see VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph (5). However, the right to such additional payment, if any, is not secured by the proprietary security right established under paragraph (1) of the present Article. The security right "only" covers a right to payment as calculated according to the "equal to value" approach provided by paragraph (1) of this Article.

Right to payment equal to the value of the material. As to the calculation of this right to payment, paragraph (1) provides that payment is to be made "equal to the value" of the material, i.e. the goods used for production, at the moment of production. If, for example, the goods owned by material-owner O had a market price of € 1.000 at that time, O's claim against the producer will also be € 1.000. The reasons for choosing this calculation regime are the following: First, this method exactly corresponds to the material-owner's value interests, the safeguarding of which has been a main policy consideration throughout this Chapter. A second important rationale is that the "equal to value" approach places the risk of an economically unsuccessful production on the one who effected the production, i.e. on the producer. The former material-owners will always be entitled to a sum equal to the value of their former material (secured by a proprietary right in the new goods), while the producer, in an economic sense, takes the rest. If this rest is less than the producer himself invested, it will be the producer's loss. In the extreme case that production process did not add any value to the original material, but the resulting product is even less valuable than the original goods, the producer will not get out anything, while being obliged, as against each material-owners, to pay the full value of their former goods. In principle, by the way, such a scenario has no specific impact on the proprietary security rights created under this Article: They arise, as always, by operation of law and cover the whole claims. However, upon enforcement, the former co-owners suffer a reduction proportionate to the values of their respective goods, because the proceeds of a forced sale will not cover the sums due under paragraph (1) to 100 %.

On the other hand, the "equal to value" approach brings about that the chances of achieving an economic benefit from the production are also placed on the producer. Where, e.g. the value of the goods involved is € 1.000 and the costs for production are also € 1.000, but the product can be distributed on the market for € 2.500, the benefit of € 500 goes to the producer. This distribution of risks and corresponding chances appears adequate since both are placed on the acting person, who can decide whether the production shall be carried out at all, on the production methods and marketing strategies, where relevant. To a certain extent, this distribution of the economic risk may operate as an incentive for effecting production efficiently. It is true that this idea is not equally sustainable in all situations that may fall under this rule. It should, e.g., not be stressed too heavily where a producer acts in the erroneous belief that he is the rightful owner of the goods. But where, e.g., raw materials acquired subject to a retention of ownership device are used for production and the supplier has contractually extended his security right to the product (cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment E), pronouncing the incentive idea truly makes sense.

Finally, the "equal to value" approach proves rather simple to apply. All that is needed is finding out about the market value of the relevant goods at the moment of production. This is an objective criterion, no subjective circumstances (like the producer's subjective benefit, as might become relevant if an unjustified enrichment concept was opted for) are to be taken into account. This tends to minimise disputes among the parties involved, and also provides safer grounds for third parties who are interested in acquiring rights in the product, and who must calculate how much they eventually have to pay to former owners of material in order to acquire unrestricted title.

At the moment of production. Calculation of the material's value is to be made as of the time when production was effected (i.e. when the material-owners lost ownership of their respective goods). This appears to be a widespread approach in Europe. Subsequent developments regarding the value of the respective kind of material may, for instance, be considered under the rules on non-contractual liability for damage where the respective requirements are fulfilled. This may be relevant, e.g., where substitute goods must be obtained and the prices for such goods have meanwhile increased.

Why no unjustified enrichment concept. Alternatively to the "equal to value" approach suggested above, the material-owner's claim for "compensation" could be calculated according to the rules of Book VII on unjustified enrichment. Such approach could be favoured in terms of internal coherence within these model rules. The unjustified enrichment rules do, however, produce different results in a couple of instances. But taking into account the policy underpinnings identified for Chapter 5, sticking to a straight-forward "equal to value" approach has been considered preferable. This choice is primarily based on the policies of protecting the material-owners' value interests and of placing economic risks on the producer, in this context not only being the risk of inefficient production but also the risk of the new goods being damaged after production when they are typically in the hands of the producer. The difference between these two concepts roots in their different perspectives: Whereas a policy of safeguarding former owners' value interests takes the material-owners' perspective and seeks to preserve their economic balance, unjustified enrichment law would take the producer's perspective and ask to what extent the producer is enriched.

In terms of Book VII, the producer who acquires ownership of the product is considered to having obtained a "non-transferable enrichment"; compare VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) Comment B with Illustration 1 (bricks built into another's house). The main rule for such non-transferable enrichments actually converges with the approach suggested above: the enriched person (here, the producer) has to pay the monetary value of the non-transferable asset to the disadvantaged person (owner of material); see VII.–5:102(1) and the definition of "monetary value" in VII.–5:103 (Monetary vale of an enrichment; saving). But there are differences. The one main divergence appears where the producer (enriched person) acted in good faith at the time of production. He will then not be liable to pay "more than any saving" according to VII.–5:102(2)(b) (the alternative in limb (a) will be practically irrelevant for production). This saving-cap is a kind of subjective criterion. In the words of the related Comments, its function is to take care of the individual circumstances of the "innocently" enriched person who is, in effect, compelled to purchase what he has enjoyed. The goal is to leave the enriched person no worse off as a result of the reversal of the enrichment; only the actual gain is to be stripped away, compare VII.–5:102 Comment C. One may argue whether these policy considerations are fully compelling where the producer, out of his free will, used another's goods for production, however believing, for justified reasons, to own these goods himself or to be authorised to use them. Practically, the saving-cap approach bears the risk that the owners of the material are not entitled to payment of the full market value where the same effect, from the producer's perspective, could also have been achieved otherwise by cheaper means. As this is not intended pursuant to the guiding policies of Chapter 5, an approach always being geared to the goods' monetary value appears preferable.

A second problem would be created by VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment), under which in short the enriched person (producer) would be released from reversing the enrichment to the extent he has sustained a disadvantage ("disenrichment"), provided that the producer was in good faith at the time of the disenrichment. Such a defence is considered to go too far in the light of the policy consideration of preserving the material-owner a (proprietary) equivalent to the value he lost due to production. Rather, risks are intended to be placed on the one who effected the production and either still has the new goods in his sphere of control at the moment the disenrichment occurs, or at least is closer to the new goods than the former owners of the material. It has to be taken into account that the scope of the defence provided by VII.–6:101 is rather wide: It would apply, e.g., where the new goods are subsequently stolen, or where they are destroyed (without involving any lack of reasonable care as well as where the producer, still being in good faith, destroys the new goods on purpose); compare VII.–6:101 Comment B with Illustration 6. Also, the defence of disenrichment would apply where the product is consumed by its new owner, and eventually even where the latter gives it away as a donation or where he gives one of his other assets away as a donation because, as a result of now having obtained the new goods, he considers not to need that other asset any longer. However, for reasons mentioned above, it seems more adequate to let the former material-owners' value interests prevail in such situations. A general reference to Book VII for the purpose of calculating the material-owners' rights to payment is, therefore, not suggested.

Prescription of the right to payment. As other rights to performance, the right to payment arising under paragraph (1) of this Article is subject to the general prescription period of three years (III.–7:201 (General period)) which, in principle, begins to run at the moment of production, this being the time when the debtor has to effect performance in the sense of III.–7:203 (Commencement) paragraph (1). But the running of the period will be suspended if, and as long as, the creditor (i.e. the former owner of the material) does not know of, and could not reasonably be expected to know of, the fact that production in the sense of the present Article has taken place or of the identity of the producer (cf. III.–7:301 (Suspension in case of ignorance)). For the impact of these prescription issues on the proprietary security right see VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) Comment E.

E. Exception for producer knowingly using another's goods against that person's will (paragraph (2)(b))

Producer's bad faith in general: comparative background. The following Comments discuss how to treat a person who produced new goods in bad faith, meaning that he actually knew, or can reasonably be expected to have known, that he did not own the material he used and that the owner did not consent to production. The question arises whether, and if yes, to what extent the rules for such cases should deviate from the general concept outlined above. Apart from a unanimous correspondence as to that the rules on non-contractual liability for damage are always applicable (cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment F), the range of solutions provided in the European legal systems is enormous. As reflected in more detail in the Notes on this Article, there are countries where a producer in bad faith can, as a rule, not acquire ownership of the product, and in some of them he will not even get compensated for the value of his labour contribution. According to other approaches, the owner of the material has a right to choose whether to cede the property to the producer while being compensated for the value of the goods, or to acquire ownership of the product. Regarding the latter option, some legal systems provide that the producer in bad faith has no right to be compensated for the value of his labour contribution, while others grant such right. There is also a functionally similar solution where first co-ownership emerges and the party in good faith (the material-owner) may choose whether to assume sole ownership against payment to the producer or to cede his share to the producer and being compensated by the latter. In a considerable number of legal systems, on the other hand, the producer's bad faith has no impact on the level of property law (so that, regularly, the producer acquires sole ownership). Bad faith may, however, often affect the calculation of the producer's monetary compensation, in particular where unjustified enrichment principles are applied.

Basic guidelines. Throughout the process of preparing these rules, there has been consent in that any kind of exception for producers in bad faith, if provided at all, must be of a rather narrow scope, i.e. narrowed down to a qualified degree of bad faith. The reasons are manifold. One aspect to take into account is that the negative consequences for the owners of material are already reduced considerably under paragraph (1) of this Article, which provides for a proprietary security right protecting the material-owners' value interests. Second, if each grade of bad faith, starting from slight negligence, would trigger a deviating regime, this would severely undermine the basic rule of paragraph (1), which is explicitly based on the policy of taking into account the producer's value interests and sovereignty interests. One must be aware of that, in a majority of cases of production without the material-owner's consent, it will at least be easy to argue that some kind of "bad faith" existed. In one way or the other, the producer could often have doubts about his entitlement to use the material, even if he uses another's material erroneously and not on purpose. This shows a third risk, besides the undermining effect, namely that uncertainty and a relatively high quantity of litigation about the producer's "good faith" or "bad faith" must be expected. As long as such disputes with effect on the proprietary consequences remain unsettled, the new goods may practically be taken out of commerce for the uncertainty who may rightfully dispose of them. Ultimately, ethical arguments speaking against a producer in bad faith acquiring sole ownership of the new goods are most compelling where the producer has stolen the material or a comparable degree of criminal intent is involved. For these reasons, the options finally taken into closer consideration were (a) a narrow exception designed for thieves and comparable cases (eventually subject to counter-exceptions), and (b) no exception for producers in bad faith at all, meaning that the general rule of paragraph (1) would apply, supplemented by the rules of Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage.

(a) The exception provided by paragraph (2)(b)

General; arguments for adopting an exception. Whether any exception from the main production rule for thieves and comparable persons should be adopted at all has been a disputed issue during the process of developing the rules of Chapter 5. For reasons discussed below in Comment E, the working group in charge of preparing this Book pleaded for abstaining from the adoption of an exception rule, but this approach did not succeed in the Study Group's Co-ordinating Committee where a (slight) majority opted in favour of the concept now implemented in paragraphs (2)(b) and (3). Anyway, the basic policies underlying the exception rule doubtlessly carry weight. They relate to the fundamental ethical and legal principle that no one should benefit from committing a criminal act. In this respect, it has been argued that a thief (or comparable person) is not worthy of legal protection and Chapter 5 should not open up for "private confiscations" but rather create some preventive effect. By contrast, the owners of the material may be considered worthy of particular protection in case their property has been stolen.

Scope of the exception: actual knowledge. According to paragraph (2)(b), the general production rule does not apply where the producer actually "knows that the material is owned by another person and that the owner of the material does not consent to the production" (which, again, is subject to a counter-exception discussed in Comment E below). This means, in the first place, that any case of mere negligent behaviour is not covered and, therefore, falls within paragraph (1). In particular, the general production rule of paragraph (1) will apply to situations where the producer perfectly knows that he is not the owner of the material but erroneously believes, for whatever reason, to be authorised to use the goods for production. It is not decisive whether the producer also knows the identity of the goods' owner. He must just know that the owner is another person. The exception rule, therefore, covers the person who himself has stolen the goods, but goes beyond. It also applies to a person who knows that the goods have been stolen by another, a dishonest finder who uses lost goods for production, and a person who knowingly acquired such goods from a finder, etc. In principle, it also applies to a person who, in contrast to a "thief" in a narrow sense, acted out of an urgent need, with the intention of reimbursing the owner of the material as soon as possible, or of returning goods of the same kind to the latter immediately (cf. the discussion in Comment E below). In all cases, the burden of proof as to the producer's actual knowledge will be on the owner of the material. Apparently, this may be a hard task to fulfil, but that is just another means of keeping the practical importance of this rule low (and, in that respect, is not seen as a disadvantage by the working group).

Counter-exception: much higher value. The counter-exception included at the end of paragraph (2)(b) roots in the awareness that any exception along the lines described above, however drafted in detail, may lead to inappropriate results in some situations. These situations are actually difficult to confine precisely, but it appears evident that a common sense of justice demands for a deviation from the exception rule in one way or the other. For example, it has been discussed whether Picasso, who has been "kissed by the Muse" and "feels like painting", but has no equipment at hand except he takes canvas and paint belonging to one of his colleagues (who is absent), should not become the owner of the masterpiece he creates, because he knew he took another's material and he knew there has been no prior consent? Furthermore, should this be the solution even if the artist intended to reimburse the owner as soon as possible and, accordingly, never intended to put a permanent disadvantage on the owner of the material? Evidently, the creation of pieces of art from another's material appears as a main example for production in textbooks all over Europe and there seems to be a common understanding that the circumstances, including the artist's state of mind in relation to the material, are of rather secondary importance for the result. Naturally, the problem is not restricted to works of art; but the example illustrates the difficulties in developing adequate lines of demarcation.

There may be a number of approaches for tackling this problem. For instance, one could try to solve such cases by letting the producer acquire ownership where he acted with the intention of reimbursing the owner of the material as soon as possible. Alternatively, the rule could be to exempt the producer from acquiring ownership only if he had no good reasons to believe that the owner if the latter knew of the production would have consented to the production; or in other words, the decisive issue could be the producer's expectation that the owner would not object. Both approaches do appear "fair" in the sense that the situations covered may be characterised by a considerably lower degree of bad faith. However, there seems to be a great risk that practically, such criteria would open up for standard excuses which would be raised regularly but would be considerably critical to decide upon (since one's intention is a mere internal fact, and another's hypothetical decision involves a vast number of circumstances and subjective preferences). This may provoke a (relatively) high number of litigation and a lack of predictability of judicial decisions. For these reasons, such approaches were not further pursued.

Instead, a more objective criterion has been opted for, namely a significant difference in value of the contributions involved. Where the value of the labour contribution is "much higher" than the value of the material, the producer will become the owner even where he knowingly used another's material without that other's consent. "The material", which is to be put in relation to the value of the labour contribution, means the stolen material (or material otherwise covered by the exception of paragraph (2)(b)) which is not necessarily all material used for production. For example, where the producer used material of a total value of € 300, of which goods worth € 50 have been stolen, which he knew, and the labour contribution had a value of € 700, only the goods worth € 50 are to be opposed to the labour contribution of € 700. Material not covered by paragraph (2)(b), i.e. the further material worth € 250, remains neutral in this comparison; the reasons for the exception made by this paragraph are not fulfilled in relation to this further material. Yet, the term and concept of a "much higher" value still remains somewhat indefinite. In the example given above, it will certainly be fulfilled. Generally one may think of differences like 90 % to 10 %. The decisive idea may perhaps best be described in that the stolen (etc.) material appears rather unimportant in relation to the labour contribution.

Brief overview of consequences where exception applies. The consequences applying where the producer knowingly used another's material without that other's consent are provided by paragraph (3) of this Article. In brief, the producer's labour contribution does neither lead to him acquiring ownership, nor co-ownership, nor a proprietary security right. Where there has just been one owner of material involved, that person will become sole owner of the product. In case there have been more material-owners, ownership is distributed among them according to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) or in the usual case VIII.–5:203 (Combination). This also applies where the thief (or similar person) also used material owned by himself. In any case, the producer is, however, entitled to payment for his labour contribution on a mere obligatory basis. For this purpose, unjustified enrichment rules are applied which, in the present context, safeguard that the producer bears the risks of the economic success of the production process and take care of the material-owners' interests according to their individual circumstances. Nevertheless, it is deliberately intended that the producer, even if he was a thief, should not be precluded from re-obtaining at least the material-owners' subjective enrichment (so that there will not, vice versa, remain a permanent enrichment on the material-owners' side). For this reason, a clarification regarding VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) has been included. The rules of paragraph (3) of this Article will be discussed in more detail below, Comment F. In any event, the owners of the material can proceed against the producer under the provisions of Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage.

(b) Alternative concept favoured by the working group: deletion of paragraph (2)(b)

General. As has been indicated above (Comment E), the working group preparing Book VIII has a quite critical view towards the model adopted in paragraph (2)(b) and would rather favour deleting that subparagraph; the effect being that the general production rule of paragraph (1) would also apply where the producer knowingly used another's material without that other's consent. This alternative approach shall be discussed briefly in the following Comments, the reasons supporting this view being roughly divisible in two groups of arguments: first, the solution adopted in paragraph (2)(b) as any exception creates difficulties in itself; and second, it appears that the interests of the other parties can anyway be taken care of adequately under the model laid down in paragraph (1) in conjunction with non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI.

Problems inherent in the concept of paragraph (2)(b). Although the legitimacy of the general aim of preventing thieves (and comparable persons) from benefiting from a criminal act is beyond doubt, it is questionable whether an exception rule applying to such persons brings about much more practical protection as compared to the general production rule adopted in paragraph (1) of this Article. The material-owners' value interests which a are doubtlessly worthy of protection against theft and similar acts are already safeguarded by their right to demand payment equal to the value of their material in connection with the proprietary security right. The additional impact of cases where the producer knowingly uses another's goods without that person's consent will, especially in cases of stolen goods, mainly consist of the owner's typical difficulties in tracing the stolen goods and preventing production, since a thief will typically undertake particular efforts in hiding the goods. But the same will apply to the product. There is probably no significant difference between the practical difficulties in determining whether one has a right of ownership, or co-ownership (in case material of more than one other persons has been used) in some product, or a proprietary security right. Also, it is clear that the criterion of the producer's actual knowledge (required not only in relation to the lack of ownership, but also to the lack of the owner's consent) is a hard task to prove for the owner(s) of the material, and one may ask whether it is wise to enter into judicial proceedings about this issue (with all cost risks related) while the "alternative" offered by paragraph (1) on which one will also fall back should the case be lost practically provides about the same protection. Of course, the uncertainties related to the property in the product also affect third parties who would, in principle, be interested in buying the product (although such uncertainties are a little reduced by the burden of proof being placed on the owner of the material).

The complexity and dispute-affinity of this Article also increases due to the counter-exception for labour contributions of "much higher value". This adds a third grade of differentiation according to value relations, in addition to the distinction between labour contributions of "minor importance" and "other" labour contributions (which serves a particular function, cf. Comment B above). The specific element of justice inherent in the "much higher value" criterion is, however, not so easy to grasp. The difficulties in finding a stringent and workable delimitation between the exception rule preventing an acquisition of ownership and a workable counter-exception to that rule have already been pointed out (cf. Comment E).

Since the producer, where the exception of paragraph (2)(b) applies, is restricted to a mere obligatory right as against the material-owner(s) (namely to payment under unjustified enrichment principles), one may also question whether the rule provides an adequate balance between the general creditors of material-owners and the producer and his general creditors, respectively: Strangely, the fact that the producer unlawfully used the material for production will have the effect that the general creditors will be satisfied to a higher degree in the material-owner's insolvency than where paragraph (1) is applicable or no production takes place at all. The product (if only one owner's material was used) or the respective former owner's undivided share in the product, will form part of the bankrupt's estate including the "additional" value originating from the producer's labour contribution, which increases their percentage of satisfaction. The producer will be treated as one of these general creditors and receive a dividend only.

Finally, it may be added that a deterrent effect, in the sense of preventing potential producers from using another's goods for production, will practically be non-existent.

Paragraph (1) may provide adequate results. Contrary to some solutions adopted in the European legal systems today, the general production rule proposed in paragraph (1) already applies a fairly balanced model also for cases covered by paragraph (2)(b). Many aspects to be named here have already been pointed out with a different perspective above: The material-owners' value interests are already taken care of by the proprietary security right provided for by paragraph (1). Whether the owner of material has any further interests in the product as such can hardly be assessed on a general basis, but generally one will say that this will rather not be the case. If so, it is questionable whether paragraph (2)(b) brings about any practical benefit for the material-owner as compared to paragraph (1). The thief (or comparable person covered by paragraph (2)(b)), on the other hand, does not really benefit in an economic sense from using other persons' goods in production, at least not to the disadvantage of the material-owners: To the extent the creation of the product involves something illegitimate, the product is encumbered by the proprietary security right representing the value of the material-owners' goods. The potential additional value of the product does, if one may say so, not result from the unlawful taking of another's material, but from the particular skills and creativity of the producer (which, as such, lack implications of specific illegitimacy).

This, of course, shall not mean that the particularly dishonest behaviour of the producer in cases covered by paragraph (2)(b) shall be regarded acceptable. The working group just proposes to sanction this behaviour with other means, namely by resorting to the rules on non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI and criminal law sanctions, as the case may be. When deleting the exception rule of paragraph (2)(b), the present Article could, therefore, still provide adequate solutions the concept however being less complicated and easier to handle not only for the material-owners (cf. the risk of litigation discussed above) but also for third parties. Compare also the general aspects like the relation to the producer's general creditors and the simplification effect of sole ownership as compared to co-ownership (where there are more than one owners of material) discussed in Comment C above.

F. Consequences in situations exempted from general rules (paragraph (3))

General. Paragraph (3) regulates the consequences, for the level of property law as well as in relation to resulting obligations, of situations not governed by the general production rule in paragraph (1). It may partly be considered to serve a rather clarifying function, in particular in relation to situations where the labour contribution is of minor importance or where no new goods are produced. Taking into account the variety of solutions offered in the European legal systems, determining the consequences in the black letter text proves to be important in particular where the exception provided in paragraph (2)(b) applies. Since the rules for these three cases however after having been analysed on their individual merits each are the same, they are jointly regulated in one paragraph. As the scope of paragraph (3) is wide and also covers situations where no "new goods" are produced, the neutral term "person contributing labour" is used instead of "producer".

Proprietary consequences where there is only one owner of material. Where the person performing labour only used material owned by one other person (and did not use any material owned by himself), paragraph (3) sentence 1 provides that ownership "remains" with that owner of material. This is obvious where no "new goods" have been produced (cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment B with Illustrations 3 and 4). Where production is on hand, the owner of the former material becomes the owner of the product.

Proprietary consequences in case of more than one owners of material. Where, on the other hand, the person performing labour used material owned by more than one person which may either mean that he used goods owned by several other persons, or also used material owned by himself paragraph (3) sentence 1 refers to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination). According to these rules, the owners of material involved may either become co-owners of the result, or one of them acquires sole ownership and the others have a right to payment, secured by a proprietary security right. Examples are provided by Illustrations 5 (combination) and 6 (commingling) in VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment B.

It may be noteworthy that under this rule, also a thief may become co-owner of the resulting entity, if and to the extent to he used also material owned by himself. He may not, however, become sole owner, even if he (besides his labour contribution) owned most of the material himself and these goods would constitute the "principal part" in the sense of VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2). This follows from VIII.–5:203(4).

Compensation in respect of material owned by person contributing labour. As indicated above, where the person contributing labour also contributed with material (and this does not create co-ownership in the resulting entity), compensation for the value of these goods will be due under VIII.–5:203 (Combination), to which paragraph (3) of this Article refers (VIII.–5:202 (Commingling), to which paragraph (3) also refers, is not relevant in this context because it always leads to the creation of co-ownership).

P steals material from O and produces new goods. In the production process, he also uses some own material, but only worth 2 % of the whole material involved in production. Due to the exception provided in paragraph (2)(b) of this Article, O will not acquire ownership of the product. Paragraph (3) refers to VIII.–5:203 (Combination) which provides, in its paragraph (2), that the owner of the "principal part" shall become sole owner of the combined goods. This will apply to O. With respect to his own material, however, P will be entitled to payment against O. Since the thief effected the production himself, that amount is to be calculated according to VIII (Commingling) paragraph (2), first alternative of sentence 2, which states that payment must only be made equivalent to O's enrichment. A corresponding rule applies in relation to the compensation of the thief's labour contribution (see the following Comments).

Reversal of enrichment resulting from labour contribution: general. Where the value of the product or, where no "new goods" have been produced: of the amended original goods exceeds the value of the material, paragraph (3) sentence 2 provides that the person performing the labour contribution is entitled to the reversal of any enrichment resulting from this labour contribution subject to unjustified enrichment provisions of Book VII. This right is directed against the owner of the (new or original) goods, or their co-owners, respectively. Book VII is referred to as a whole, with one exception addressed in Comment F below. In particular, Book VII will govern the calculation of the enrichment claim: Within the framework of the provisions of Book VII, a material-owner will regularly in particular in case of theft or other situations covered by the exception of paragraph (2)(b) be treated as an "enriched person in good faith" who "did not consent to the enrichment" (production). The general rule being that reversal of the enrichment means to pay its monetary value, the named qualification will trigger a somewhat subjective test for calculating the amount to be paid: The owner of the goods will not have to pay "more than any saving"; see VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (2) and Comment D above for a general description of this concept (however with the opposite view of the producer being the enriched person). The "saving"-criterion takes into account the personal needs and the individual circumstances of the enriched person (here: the material-owner). This approach is considered to be an adequate one in the present context, compare Illustrations 9 and 10. It will apply irrespective of there being just one or several owners of material.

O runs a recycling enterprise, employing advanced technologies for transforming scrap into reusable metal. P steals scrap stored at O's premises and recycles it in his own factory. O will remain the owner of the metal under paragraphs (2)(b) and (3) sentence 1 of this Article (assume that the metal has not been inseparably combined with metal owned by P himself). P's labour efforts will be compensated subject to unjustified enrichment principles (paragraph (3) sentence 2). Suppose the metal's quality is the same as if O himself had recycled it, but P's production methods are much more costly, the "saving" criterion will safeguard that O does not have to compensate the producer for more than he himself would have had to invest for achieving the same result.

P has stolen material of great value from O. The increase in value caused by the production subsequently performed by P is considerable, but does not exceed the "much more valuable" threshold imposed by paragraph (2)(b). Under paragraph (3), O will be the owner of the product but would, in principle, have to pay the additional value to P. Suppose fulfilling such an obligation to return the enrichment would force O to take out a loan: The "saving"-limitation of VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (2) will entitle the material-owner to deduce credit costs from the "enrichment" he is obliged to reverse. Similar results may be achieved by applying the rules of Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage, losses of such kind being consequences of property infringements in the sense of VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession).

Also, in case the new goods are destroyed and the owner of the material has no benefit of it, he can resort to the defence of "disenrichment" as provided for by VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment).

Special rule concerning VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b). Sentence 3 of paragraph (3) is only relevant for cases falling within the exception of paragraph (2)(b), i.e. where the producer actually knew that he used another's property and the owner did not consent. It has already been pointed out that the producer, in such a situation, should at least be entitled to some equivalent representing the value of his labour contribution, whereby the unjustified enrichment principles, including the "saving"-cap discussed above, ensure that the interests of the material-owners (who become owners of the product) are not affected inadequately. However, the unjustified enrichment principles contain one provision which, if applied in the light of the Comments on that provision, could exclude all rights of the producer to be compensated for his labour contribution from the beginning: Under VII.–2:101 paragraph (1)(b), an enrichment is not "unjustified", which means that no liability under unjustified enrichment law may arise at all, if "the disadvantaged person consented freely and without error to the disadvantage". Under the intended understanding of this rule (cf. VII.–2:101 Comment D), a producer who actually knows that the material is owned by another person (and that the owner did not consent) could well fall within the "consented freely and without error" criterion when creating new goods out of it (compare the parallel case of knowingly improving another's property). This interpretation is, perhaps, not beyond doubts, and arguably different results should be achieved e.g. where the producer acts under a mistake of law in the sense that he assumed to become the owner of the product despite having stolen the material. But the risk would remain that there are situations where the owner(s) of the new goods would take the improvement completely for free. Evidently, however, it would not appear reasonable to make that radical distinctions between, e.g., cases where the producer acted under a mistake of law and other situations. And in particular, the counter-exception for "much more valuable" labour contributions would become a turning point which virtually could not be justified at all: Below this benchmark, the producer would get literally nothing (not even a monetary compensation for the value he added), but when he exceeds it, he would become sole owner of the product (however being obliged to compensate the material-owners). Therefore, sentence 3 of paragraph (3) clarifies that the named VII.–2:101(1)(b) does not exclude the producer's entitlement to a reversal of the enrichment. A parallel problem arises with regard to VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2) and VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession) paragraph (1) where, however, a compromise solution is adopted. See the Comments on these provisions.

VIII.–5:202: Commingling

(1) Where goods owned by different persons are commingled in the sense that it is impossible or economically unreasonable to separate the resulting mass or mixture into its original constituents, but it is possible and economically reasonable to separate the mass or mixture into proportionate quantities, these persons become co-owners of the resulting mass or mixture, each for a share proportionate to the value of the respective part at the moment of commingling.

(2) Each co-owner can separate a quantity equivalent to that co-owner's undivided share out of the mass or mixture.

COMMENTS

A. General

Basic idea. The default rule provided in this Article applies where goods owned by different persons are "commingled" in a certain sense. The rule can best be explained by starting with a look on its effects: It provides the creation of co-ownership, proportionate to the values of the respective contributions (paragraph (1)), and a simplified mode of dividing co-ownership, namely by physically separating a quantity corresponding to the respective undivided share from the mass or mixture (paragraph (2)). The requirements defining the rule's scope of application are, one could say, built around these legal effects, shaped to address those situations where the named legal effects appear suitable. The central case, which has also been the starting point when developing this rule and where it will certainly have its strongest persuasive power, is the commingling of fungible goods in the sense of goods of the same kind and quality: Upholding a right of ownership in the strict sense will be technically impossible because the single items will become unidentifiable by the process of commingling. However, a practically similar effect can be provided by paragraphs (1) and (2) of this Article; the creation of co-ownership taking care of the value interests of all the owners of goods contributing to the mass or mixture and, at the same time, each co-owner's sovereignty interests being catered for by allowing the co-owner to take out a quantity corresponding to his original quantity whenever he so wishes (as to these interests in general, see VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment H; see also VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment C). Further, the practical difficulties typically inherent in co-ownership solutions (cf. VIII.–5:201 Comment C) are considerably reduced or even non-existent where fungible goods are concerned: Joint administration, if impractical, is not necessary where each contributor can separate a respective quantity any time and thereby becomes sole owner of that quantity. Since quantities are a relatively simple criterion for determining undivided shares, there will regularly be little dispute or negotiation about separation, and trading the goods involved in commingling will not be impeded considerably, since any co-owner can dispose of his share and the buyer may simply take out the goods instead of the original co-owner. These advantages partly decrease where the Article's scope extends to goods of not exactly the same, but similar kind or quality; and even more where goods of clearly different kind are commingled. There are, however, also other arguments involved in these areas (cf. Comment B below). The criteria delimitating the Article's scope of application, finally, cover all these situations by confining themselves to stressing the decisive difference to VIII.–5:203 (Combination): The rule applies where it is, just like under VIII.–5:203, impossible or economically unreasonable to separate the resulting mass or mixture into its original constituents; but in contrast to VIII.–5:203, it is at least possible and economically reasonable to separate the mass or mixture into proportionate quantities, which is necessary for applying the simplified separation regime of paragraph (2).

Terminology: commingling. "Commingling" has been agreed upon as a neutral term for situations where goods of all states of aggregation, solids, liquids or gases, are put together or connected with each other in a way provided by paragraph (1). It replaces, or rather forms an umbrella term for, traditional terms like "commixture" relating to solids and "confusion" relating to mixed liquids and gases.

Comparative background. There is no common European ground in a stricter sense for the present Article, but in some countries, comparable results are achieved at least for goods of the same kind and quality. In most legal systems, the same rules apply as for combination in the sense of VIII.–5:203 (Combination). In some countries it is argued that the "principal part" rule does not apply where goods of the same kind are commingled, but there are also disputes reported as to whether the larger part should be regarded as the "principal part" whereby the owner of that quantity would acquire sole ownership of the mass or mixture. Sporadically, also a rule granting sole ownership to the possessor of the mass or mixture occurs. This is the case in Austria (where the main rule, however, provides for co-ownership) and where the possession vaut titre rule applies (French case law however heading in the opposite direction by accepting a right to vindication where unidentified generic goods are commingled). Apart from goods of the same kind, a general rule providing co-ownership as the primary solution appears to exist only in one country (Austria).

Relation to other provisions. The present Article is subsidiary in relation to VIII.–5:201 (Production), meaning that where "new goods" are created by mixing different goods (unless the labour contribution is of minor importance) or by putting goods of the same kind together in a way that would theoretically be easy to undo, VIII.–5:201 will apply (see there, Comment B with Illustration 1). At the same time, it is a special rule in relation to VIII.–5:203 (Combination) and is therefore placed in between these two. The differentiation between the three categories production, commingling and combination is further discussed in VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment B. As to the relation of this Article to VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) and VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk) see VIII.–5:101 Comment C. Where the parties have regulated the effects of commingling by prior agreement, this agreement is relevant. See VIII.–5:101 Comment D.

B. Scope of application

General. This Article may apply to solids, liquids and gases, irrespective of how the commingling takes place. The commingling may be effected by one of the owners of the goods involved, or by an independent third person (cf. Illustration 1 below); theoretically, the commingling may also be effected by the goods themselves (cf. Illustration 2) or by another fortuitous event (e.g., such as in Illustration 3). This implies that the present Article does not presuppose the performance of any labour contribution. It may, however, be applicable also where labour is involved, cf. VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (3) and the overview provided at VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment B; see also Comment B below. As the following illustrations show, commingling regularly involves that the single items become non-identifiable. The possibility of identifying the original constituents, or at least of identifying each group of constituents originally belonging to one and the same owner, is, however, not adopted as a requirement for the application of this Article. The decisive criterion is the impossibility to separate the original constituents from the mass or mixture. Physical separation would be a second step after having identified the single items. Where identification is impossible (or economically unreasonable), carrying out a physical separation will be as well.

Wheat owned by the farmers A, B and C is put into a silo. As it will be impossible (or at least economically unreasonable) to identify which piece stems from which farmer and to restore it to that person, the present Article applies. It is irrelevant whether the mixing was effected by one of the parties, by all of them (each placing his own wheat in the silo) or by another person D.

Illustration 2
Both A and B run a fish farm, breeding fish of the same kind in vicinal basins. After torrential rain, the basins overflow and fish partly swim from one basin to the other. Provided it would be impossible or economically unreasonable to identify and restore each fish to either A or B, the present Article will apply.

A and B own metal stored close to each other. During a fire, the metal amalgamates. Provided the block can be separated without economically unreasonable efforts, the present Article applies.

A practically important supplement to the commingling rule of the present Article is VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph 5 which provides that the rules of Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage may always be resorted to in addition. Any loss an owner of commingled goods may suffer from that event, e.g. additional costs for effecting separation or transportation, or resulting from a decrease in quality etc., may be liquidated under these rules. The property law level is, however, not affected by any person's negligent or even intentional act (see also Comment C below).

Goods owned by different persons; relevance of labour. As with all other categories regulated in Chapter 5, this Article requires that contributions of at least two persons are involved. Only the contribution of goods is relevant for this Article. The performance of labour does not count within this Article, but may result in a right to payment under unjustified enrichment principles, against the co-owners of the commingled goods. Compare VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (3) (no new goods created) and Comment F on that Article; see also VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment B with Illustration 6.

Separation into original constituents impossible or economically unreasonable; general. The first requirement for this Article to apply is that "it is impossible or economically unreasonable to separate the resulting mass or mixture into its original constituents". This exactly matches with the prerequisite set out in VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (1), although the latter's formulation is slightly abridged. The function of this criterion is to draw the dividing line between situations where a change in the property relations takes place and other situations where, despite goods owned by different persons may have been placed, e.g., in the same room or container, each person remains the owner of his individual goods. In the latter case, no specific regulation as to proprietary consequences is necessary and each owner is entitled to separate these goods under general principles, such as by resorting to the remedy of revindication under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership).

Bananas owned by the agricultural companies A, B and C, packed in boxes of the same size and external appearance, are shipped in one and the same container. If it is possible to identify which box is owned by A (or one of the other companies), e.g. because the box itself is marked with the company's label, or the bananas placed inside are marked, or it is possible and economically reasonable to identify the bananas by other means, for instance because each company produced a different sort, the requirements set out by this Article are not fulfilled and no change in the proprietary relations takes place. Each company can separate its boxes under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1). If, on the other hand, the boxes cannot be identified (e.g. no labels are placed there and it cannot be clarified which boxes have been placed at which parts of the container), the present Article applies. It may also happen that identification is possible (and economically reasonable) only with regard to parts of the boxes. Then, the present Article does not apply to these items, but to the rest.

Another example where separation into the mass's original constituents is possible and economically reasonable is given in Illustration 8 to VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions), see there in Comment B.

Separation into original constituents impossible. "Separation" in the sense of this Article may be effected by whatever means. The range covers any form of physically taking and removing single items and, as the case may be, any kind of mechanical (e.g. sieving), physical (e.g. heating) or chemical process. "Impossibility" to separate the mass or mixture into its original constituents is intended to be understood in a literal, i.e. rather strict, sense. Where such separation is theoretically possible, but no one would realistically think of undertaking such an act because it would be unreasonably costly, one will apply the criterion of "economical unreasonableness"; see next Comment.

Fuel of identical quality owned by A and B is mixed in a tank. Separation into the mixture's original constituents will be "impossible" in the sense of this Article because it is virtually excluded to return each drop of fuel to its (former) owner.

It is by the way not necessary that the single items physically touch each other. "Impossibility" in the sense of this requirement may also occur where identical goods owned by different persons are placed in the same room or stockyard and, since no one remembers where exactly which goods have been placed, or because the goods move (e.g., animals), identification becomes impossible after a while.

Separation into original constituents economically unreasonable. Since "Impossibility" is a rather narrow concept, the criterion of most practical importance is that a separation into the original constituents would be "economically unreasonable". This criterion is to be understood in an objective way. High costs of separation are not intended to be regarded as "reasonable" just because the other party (or a third person) effected the commingling negligently and, therefore, would have to cover the costs of separation under the principles of non-contractual liability for damage. The basic idea of this test is to weigh the economic efforts or other disadvantages of effecting separation which will, under the present Article, basically be the costs of separation only, since the goods will usually not be damaged by separating them into proportionate quantities as against the parties' interests in maintaining the original property status (i.e. each person maintaining his ownership right in that person's individual goods) by effecting such separation. The latter, i.e. the interests in maintaining the proprietary status quo, of course depend on the alternative which would otherwise apply. In the context of this Article, therefore, the hypothetical separation costs must be held against the interests in not becoming co-owner of the mass or mixture under this Article, including the facilitated possibility of dividing co-ownership by physical separation of a respective quantity under paragraph (2). From this follows that, especially in case of commingling of fungible goods, where both the value interests as well as the sovereignty interests of the owners typically are almost non-affected, relatively low separation costs can already be "unreasonable". This may change to a certain extent the more the single items or quantities differ from each other in quality or even in kind, since the single contributor's sovereignty interests may be affected to a higher degree. This also shows that, despite the concept in principle equals the one applied in VIII.–5:203 (Combination), a certain percentage of costs already being considered as "unreasonable" under the present Article may still be "reasonable" under VIII.–5:203. A fixed borderline, e.g. in the sense of a certain amount or percentage, cannot be provided seriously. One will always have to take into account the individual circumstances or the case.

Separation into proportionate quantities possible and economically reasonable. The second requirement for this Article to apply is that "it is possible and economically reasonable to separate the mass or mixture into proportionate quantities". This criterion draws the line of demarcation to VIII.–5:203 (Combination). Evidently, the criterion is associated with the effects of the present Article, namely the creation of co-ownership supplemented by a facilitated procedure of dividing co-ownership (i.e. by physical separation of a respective quantity by each co-owner, see paragraph (2)). "Proportionate quantities" are quantities of the mass or mixture which correspond to the respective co-owners' undivided shares. As to the concepts of "possible" and "economically" reasonable", the principles correspond to what has been described above in Comment B. The costs for separating the mass or mixture into proportionate quantities are to be held up against the parties' interests in the result of such separation, namely the creation of co-ownership and the possibility to divide co-ownership under paragraph (2), since this will be the regular result when applying the present Article. In many situations, the critical question will rather be whether separation into proportionate quantities is possible at all; if so, it will often not create unreasonable costs. The opposite may apply, for instance, where pieces of metal of rather low value have melt into one another. Where the test provided by the present Article is not passed, VIII.–5:203 will apply. Typical constellations where a separation into proportionate quantities in the sense of this provision is possible and reasonable are briefly discussed in the subsequent Comments.

In particular: fungible goods. As already pointed out in Comment A above, this Article in the first place applies to the commingling of fungible goods, i.e. goods of the same kind and quality. One can say that each party's interests in the quantity will basically be the same as this party's interests in the original items. For a closer discussion, see the named Comment.

> Oil of the same quality is mixed in a tank. Grain of the same kind and quality is mixed in a silo. Coal is commingled during transport. It may, e.g., be theoretically possible to determine the origin of each piece of coal by some chemical method, but that would be economically unreasonable.

Commingling of "similar" goods. In the course of developing these rules, the solution found adequate for goods of the same kind and quality has first been extended to the commingling of similar goods, i.e. goods of the same kind but of different quality (e.g. crude oil of slightly different quality, coffee beans of different quality etc.) and – which can hardly be distinguished clearly – goods of different, but similar kinds. The underlying idea has been that the interests of the parties may be served much better when applying the solution provided by the present Article than when applying VIII.–5:203 (Combination) where, in particular, one party would acquire sole ownership if that party's contribution is to be considered the "principal part" (or where co-ownership may also be created, but would have to be divided under the applicable national rules, which may require judicial separation in case no agreement can be reached between the parties).

Hundreds of thousands of barrels of crude oil, owned by different companies and partly being of different quality, are inseparably mixed in tank. Even if company A owned only three percent of the whole oil, the value may still be considerable. The interests of company A may be served better by becoming co-owner of the mixture under the present Article (which maintains its possibilities to trade "its" quantity of oil) than getting a mere claim for payment, however secured by a proprietary security right in the whole mixture, if another company owned 97 % and that would be considered the "principal part" under VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2), if that rule was applicable instead of the present Article.

A second reason for opening up for "similar goods" relates to practical difficulties which could easily arise if the rule was strictly confined to goods of the "same kind and quality". Compare the banana-example in Illustration 4 above. What is "the same" could hardly be defined precisely. One would most probably apply something like the common understanding of reasonable market participants which would already imply a certain extension to value judgements.

Commingling of different goods. The final step of extending the rule, which as such does not correspond to examples presently existing in the European legal systems, concerns cases where goods of different kind are commingled. One main aim and achievement of this approach certainly is that all kinds of uncertainties which would otherwise remain in relation to drawing the necessary distinction between the rules of VIII.–5:203 (Combination) and the present Article are eliminated.

Illustration 8
Wheat owned by A and barley owned by B are mixed inseparably. It would, however, be easily possible to divide the mass into proportionate quantities. If the present Article would only apply to fungible and similar goods, there would be uncertainty whether wheat and barley are "similar" (both being grain, but of different kind) or whether the case should be solved under the rules of VIII.–5:203 (Combination) (if they also covered "commingling" of different goods). The wide scope of the present Article makes it superfluous to determine whether, e.g., the result is to be regarded "polluted wheat" (in which case the "principal part" rule of VIII.–5:203(2) would otherwise apply in favour of the wheat owner A), "barley of reduced quality" or "muesli ingredients" (in which case perhaps applying the commingling rule would appear feasible). Such insecurity does not arise under the present shape of this Article. In addition to this practical advantage of considerably simplifying the finding of the applicable rule, the solution also appears acceptable. A and B become co-owners of the mixture and each can take out a respective quantity whenever he so wishes.

There are however also cases where applying a "principal part" rule as provided by VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2) may be considered appropriate as an alternative concept. These situations were, however, also considered to be solved adequately by the concept of the present Article, a main factor in the final decision certainly being that this categorisation achieves getting rid of all uncertainties in delimitation. Where co-ownership emerges and one of the co-owners has no practical interests of taking parts of the result, it may be quite likely that the parties negotiate on some other result (e.g. one party taking over the other party's quantity in exchange for a price). Also the rules of non-contractual liability for damage may help to achieve an adequate final result.

Illustration 9
Wine owned by A is inseparably mixed with sulphite owned by B. The mixture can, however, easily be separated into proportionate quantities so that the present Article is applied. If alternatively VIII.–5:203 (Combination) would apply to such cases, the wine would be regarded the "principle part" and A would acquire sole ownership of the mixture. Under the present Article, however, A and B will become co-owners. If B is not interested in trading wine (or drinking the quantity himself), he may arrange with A to take over his quantity. Different to other situations where co-ownership is to be divided, paragraph (2) of the present Article caters for that none of the parties can impede the division by trying to negotiate for an unreasonably high price. The other party can go away with his quantity any time so that the risk of inappropriate pressure being exercised in negotiations is minimised.

C. Consequences of commingling (paragraphs (1) and (2))

Creation of co-ownership; calculation of shares. Provided the prerequisites discussed above are fulfilled, the owners of the goods involved in the commingling become co-owners of the resulting mass or mixture. Co-ownership is to be understood in the sense of VIII.–1:203 (Co-ownership), meaning that each co-owner acquires an undivided share in the whole mass or mixture and each co-owner can dispose of that share by acting alone. The policy of this concept has already been highlighted in Comment A above, to which can be referred: The undivided share in the mass or mixture represents each owner's value interests in the original goods, and forms an interim stage for the owners' sovereignty interests which, in principle, can be freely exercised as soon as separation under paragraph (2) has been effected. The shares are calculated "proportionate to the value of the respective part at the moment of commingling". Where the commingled goods are fungible, this means that the proportions correspond with the quantities involved. Where, on the other hand, quantities contributed by one co-owner are more valuable than others (e.g. oil of better quality), the undivided share of that co-owner will be bigger than what would correspond to his quantity. In such a situation, i.e. where goods of a better quality are mixed with other goods of lower quality, it is also clear that the value of the share will usually be lower than the value of the original goods, thus the respective owner's value interests not being met fully. Any loss resulting from this decrease in value may be liquidated under the rules of Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage.

Subsequent shrinkage, increase. Where the whole quantity contained in the mass or mixture subsequently shrinks (e.g. parts of the goods are destroyed or stolen), the undivided shares remain the same. The risk will be borne collectively in proportion to the shares. Unlike under VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) paragraph (4), the risk is not primarily placed on one party only. The reason is that the named provision is a transfer rule, which implies certain grounds for placing the risk on the seller, whereas the present Article does not involve any transfer; cf. also VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment C. If, on the other hand, the quantity of the goods increases by an act of nature (e.g. like worms breed for fishing multiplying), the co-owners take the additional quantity proportional to their undivided shares.

Relevance of the parties' good or bad faith. Unlike in VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (2)(b) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (4), the question of whether the parties act in good faith or in bad faith, or whether any kind of particular degree of bad faith is involved, bears no importance on the level of property law. The result will always be co-ownership. One reason is that co-ownership may easily be re-transformed into sole-ownership under paragraph (2), which usually corresponds to the status quo ante. The party acting in (particular) bad faith would not take any considerable advantage from his unlawful act. As to consequences under Book VI, see Comment C below.

Co-ownership favourable as against sole-ownership of the possessor. These model rules deliberately do not follow an approach occasionally occurring in European legal systems, namely awarding sole ownership of the whole mass or mixture of unidentifiably commingled goods to the person exercising physical control over that mass or mixture, i.e. its possessor. On a policy level, co-ownership is clearly favourable because it serves the value interests of all parties. Apart from where the said concept is built upon a possession vaut titre principle, which is as such not followed by these model rules, it seems that the "ownership for the possessor" approach can only be explained or justified against the background of lacking evidence for the ownership in quantities involved. But this is another level and should not assume the character of a rule of substantive law. This choice also corresponds to a certain trend in Europe, cf. developments in French (and Belgium) case law and doctrine, respectively, and the change made by the Dutch legislator when enacting the new civil code (formerly the person effecting the commingling becoming sole owner) as reflected in the joint Notes on VIII.–5:202 and VIII.–5:203. Also in Germany, the Supreme Court has ruled against the opinion that sole ownership of the possessor should emerge where it is impossible to determine the ratio of the respective values.

Simplified mode of division: physical separation of quantity equivalent to share. As pointed out above, the peculiarity of this Article is that co-ownership can be separated in a simplified way (cf. Comment A and passim). Each co-owner is allowed to take out (separate) a certain quantity from the resulting mass or mixture, by which that person acquires sole ownership in the goods contained in this separated quantity. Accordingly, that person's undivided share will be extinguished fully or partly, depending on whether that co-owner separates the whole quantity due to him or only a part of it. The quantity which may be separated under paragraph (2) is "equivalent to that person's share" in the sense of Comment C. Where the goods are fully fungible, the quantity will correspond to the quantity formerly contributed. Where a shrinkage of the mass or mixture has occurred, the quantity referred to by paragraph (2) is the reduced quantity corresponding to the respective share after shrinkage. Since paragraph (2) explicitly states that each co-owner "can" separate the respective quantity, any act of separation is allowed by law and does not constitute an interference with the other co-owners' property rights or lawful possession. Of course, separation must be exercised with due care so that remaining quantities sustain no damage.

Separated quantity exceeds equivalent to share. Where the mass or mixture has diminished but a co-owner separates a quantity he originally contributed i.e., more than what would correspond to his undivided share after shrinkage that (former) co-owner is to be treated as a non-owner in relation to the excess. Technically, the goods he takes out would still be subject to co-ownership, his own share corresponding to the quantity he would rightfully be entitled to under the principles discussed in the previous Comment, and the rest of the shares corresponding to the proportion of all other co-owners holding shares in the original mass or mixture. Good faith acquisition does not apply because there is no "entitlement to a transfer of ownership" in the sense of VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(d) in conjunction with VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) paragraph (1)(a). Paragraph (2) of the present Article does not serve any transfer function but as the other rules of Section 2 of this Chapter intends to maintain what already existed. See also VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment C.

Costs of separation, loss resulting from shrinkage or decrease in value. In principle, each party bears its costs of separation itself. However, where another person effected the combination under circumstances which give rise to liability under Book VI, these costs may be recovered under the principles of non-contractual liability for damage. The same principles apply where the quantity of the whole mass or mixture has been reduced by shrinkage: Generally, each co-owner bears the loss proportionally, but that result may change by resorting to Book VI where applicable. Also, where goods of higher quality are commingled with goods of lower quality, the owner of the more valuable contribution may sustain a loss: Often value of the resulting mass or mixture will be lower than the amount resulting from adding the single values. Also such loss primarily falls upon the respective co-owner, but may be shifted to another person under Book VI.

Further consequences: damages under Book VI. In addition to the rights conferred under the present Article, a party sustaining any further loss may resort to the remedies provided by Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage. Such loss may be the costs of separation or other instances discussed in the previous Comment (see also VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment F with Illustration 16), but may also encompass costs for detecting the goods unlawfully removed from the owner's premises, transportation costs and other damage.

VIII.–5:203: Combination

(1) This Article applies where goods owned by different persons are combined in the sense that separation would be impossible or economically unreasonable.

(2) Where one of the component parts is to be regarded as the principal part, the owner of that part acquires sole ownership of the whole, and the owner or the owners of the subordinate parts are entitled, against the sole owner, to payment subject to sentence 2, secured by a proprietary security right in the combined goods. The amount due under sentence 1 is calculated according to the rules on unjustified enrichment (Book VII); or, where the owner of the principal part effects the combination, is equal to the value of the respective subordinate part at the moment of combination.

(3) Where none of the component parts is to be regarded as the principal part, the owners of the component parts become co-owners of the whole, each for a share proportionate to the value of the respective part at the moment of combination. If, in the case of more than two component parts, one component part is of minimal importance in relation to other parts, the owner of this part is entitled, against the co-owners, only to payment proportionate to the value of the respective part at the moment of combination, secured by a proprietary security right in the combined goods.

(4) Paragraph (2) does not apply where the person who owns the principal part effects the combination, knowing that a subordinate part is owned by another person and that the owner of the subordinate part does not consent to combination, unless the value of the principal part is much higher than the value of the subordinate part. The owners of the component parts become co-owners, the shares of the owners of subordinate parts being equal to the value of their respective parts at the moment of combination.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview of scope and relation to other provisions. This Article, as the previous provisions of Section 2 of this Chapter, is a default rule and only applies where the parties have not regulated the consequences of combination by prior agreement (cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph (1) and Comment D on the named Article). It regulates, roughly speaking, the inseparable conjunction of at least two goods owned by different persons. The Article is subsidiary in relation to VIII.–5:201 (Production), meaning that where "new goods" are created by joining different goods and involving a labour contribution of more than minor importance, the named Article on production will apply. Also, the present Article is subsidiary in relation to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) which applies where the mass or mixture of goods cannot be separated into its original constituents, but at least into proportionate quantities. As to the differentiation between the three categories production, commingling and combination, see further VIII.–5:101 Comment B. Although the present Article does not require any contribution of work, the main practical application will be cases where, apart from linking corporeal movable items towards each other, labour is performed by one person, but the result does not constitute "new goods" so that VIII.–5:201 paragraph (3) refers to the present Article.

Main content and structure. The Article applies where goods owned by different persons are "combined" in the sense that separation into their original constituents would be impossible or economically unreasonable (paragraph (1)). It contains two main rules: The primary rule (paragraph (2)) is that where one of the component parts (i.e. the contribution of one of the owners of goods involved) is to be considered the "principal part", the owner of this part will become sole owner of the whole combined entity. The owners of other goods involved ("subordinate parts") are, however, not expropriated in an economic sense: the new owner is obliged to pay a certain compensation for the value of their goods, to be determined under a special regime regulated in the second sentence of paragraph (2), and this right to payment is secured by a proprietary security right in the combined goods. The other main rule (paragraph (3)) applies where no "principal part" can be identified. Basically, this triggers the creation of co-ownership between the owners of the various parts. Labour contributions, where involved, do not have any effect on the property law level. They may result in a right to be compensated under unjustified enrichment principles; cf. VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment F. For situations where the person effecting the combination acts with a particular grade of bad faith, namely in case he knows that another part is not his own property and the owner of that part does not consent to the combination, paragraph (3) contains a special rule which has the purpose of preventing that person from becoming the sole owner of the combined entity. As that could only be the case where the person effecting the combination owns the "principal part", the rule is restricted to this situation. Where this exception applies, co-ownership will emerge. The concept is parallel to the exception in VIII.–5:201 paragraphs (2)(b) and (3) and, corresponding to the production rule, also includes a counter-exception for situations where the principal part is of "much higher value". The working group responsible for preparing Book VIII is, however, quite critical towards the whole exception rule of paragraph (3); compare Comment F below. Supplementary rules on the statutory proprietary security rights created under this Article are contained in VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights).

Terminology: combination. The category regulated by this Article is called "combination". This term comprises all situations covered by the present Article, irrespective of the goods' state of aggregation and irrespective of whether the single parts still can be identified in the new entity, or lost their individuality, etc.. For describing the effect of paragraph (2), also the term "accession" could be used.

Comparative background and main policy issues. Despite there being differences in detail, the relevant rules in the European legal systems roughly converge to the extent that they apply where separating the new entity would be impossible or at least unreasonable in an economic sense. Often, the same rules also apply to what is covered by VIII.–5:202 (Commingling); in particular, the commingling of goods of different kind is generally covered by "combination" rules in the national legal systems. In a few countries, a subordinate part may still be separated from a principal part if the former was much more valuable. As to substance, many countries provide that the owner of the "principal part" becomes sole owner of the combined entity (often named accession), partly also providing that where no principal part can be identified, co-ownership shall emerge (in some other countries, the goods are to be sold in that case). In many other countries, the relation of rule and exception between the "principal part" approach and the "co-ownership approach" is reversed so that basically co-ownership will be created. This is, e.g., a trend observable in German court practice where judges try to avoid a loss of ownership as much as possible. In a few countries, the issue of whether the combination was effected in good faith or in bad faith may also be an issue. Sometimes, the person combining goods in bad faith must accept that the other part may be separated even if that causes damage to the component parts. Another approach adopted is that the other party may choose between assuming ownership of the combined entity and ceding the ownership to the party in bad faith in exchange of a compensation. The question of whether a party was in good faith or in bad faith may also affect the amount of compensation payable if one party acquires sole ownership by accession. Often, the relevant rules on unjustified enrichment are applicable. Taking into account this comparative background, there is a certain indication for adopting a "principal part" approach on the one hand and a "co-ownership approach" on the other hand. It must be clarified, however, which rule shall be the general one; this will depend, in particular, on how the parties' value interests can be served adequately. Another issue to consider is how the subordinate part owner's right to compensation shall be calculated. In addition, there is a general question of how a person effecting combination in bad faith shall be treated. Another question, which has however already been dealt with in VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) Comment B above, is how to delimitate the scopes of VIII.–5:202 and the present VIII.–5:203. As to a general overview of the typical interests involved in the situations covered by this Chapter, and general policies pursued in this relation, see VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment H.

B. Scope of application (paragraph (1))

General. Parallel to what has been said in VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) Comment B, combination in the sense of this Article may be effected by one of the parties, a third person or occur by coincidence. In principle, this Article may apply to solids, liquids and gases. Practically, however, it will mainly apply to solids, since in case of liquids and gases, a separation into proportionate quantities in the sense of VIII.–5:202 will regularly be possible and economically reasonable. But there may be exceptional cases, e.g. where separation into quantities would be dangerous and could not be done without taking costly precautions. As mentioned above in Comment A, it is irrelevant whether or not the single parts still can be identified in the new entity.

Goods owned by different persons. Corresponding to the principles discussed in VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) Comment B, the present Article requires that goods of at least two different owners are combined. Labour contributions, where at hand, are irrelevant for the proprietary result, but may trigger compensation under unjustified enrichment principles; cf. Comment A above and VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment F.

Separation into original constituents impossible or economically unreasonable. For a discussion of this Article's central requirement that "separation would be impossible or economically unreasonable" we can largely refer to the parallel provision in VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and Comment B on that Article. Although the formulation in paragraph (1) of the present Article is a bit shorter than under the preceding Article ("into its original constituents" not being mentioned explicitly), the concept, in principle, is exactly the same. The decisive distinction between the present Article and VIII.–5:202 thus is that under the present VIII.–5:203, a separation "into proportionate quantities" is impossible or economically unreasonable; on the latter criteria, see VIII.–5:202 Comment B. As stressed above, the function of the requirement that separation into the original constituents must be impossible or economically unreasonable is to draw the line of demarcation between situations where joining goods of different owners results in some proprietary change and situations where there is no such change. In the latter case, each party remains the owner of his goods and can separate them from the unified something under general rules (cf. VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership)).

Although the concepts of "impossible" and "economically unreasonable" are identical in principle, applying the latter involves certain peculiarities as compared to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling): The main difference is that what must be weighed against the parties' interests in maintaining the proprietary status quo are not only the costs of separation but also other economic disadvantages, namely the potential decrease in value resulting from the single parts being damaged in the course of separation. This potential loss, which is to be added to the costs of effecting separation as such, is the difference between the value of the combined (non-separated) goods and the added values of each component part after hypothetically having effected the separation. This sum, as said above, must be held against the parties' interests in remaining sole owners of each specific part, or in other words, their interests in the case not being governed by paragraphs (2) to (4) of the present Article. In that respect, it must be taken into account that under the present Article, in contrast to some rules applicable under existing national law in Europe, the value interests of all parties involved are served by either providing co-ownership of all parties involved or, where one party acquires sole ownership, by granting proprietary security rights in the combined entity in favour of the other parties. This means that the interests in getting one's part separated generally must be other than value interests, which as a tendency reduces the probability that separation is allowed. This also applies where single parts are very valuable. In this way, the present Article promotes the preservation of newly created economic entities and serves efficiency at a macro-economic level while, at the same time, serving the value interests involved. Under VIII.–5:202 on the other hand, which of course also serves the parties' value interests, the total value of the goods is normally not affected by separating the mass or mixture into proportionate quantities.

A motor owned by A is assembled in a used car owned by B (without any agreement existing on the consequences), the work being performed by C. This is a standard case discussed in relation to the national combination rules. Under these model rules, one will first have to state that the labour performed by C does not lead to the creation of "new goods" in the sense of VIII.–5:201 (Production), for which reason the latter provision does not apply but refers (in its paragraph (3)) to the present Article. The decisive question for applying VIII.–5:203 (Combination) is whether separating the motor from the car would be "economically unreasonable". It should be stressed that this question cannot be answered in a general way but has to be assessed according to the facts of each individual case, so that sometimes separation may be regarded economically unreasonable whereas in other cases it may not. Generally speaking, the main costs to be considered in a case like this will be the costs for effecting separation as such, i.e. the work efforts of a mechanic. Presumably, neither the motor itself nor the car would suffer any considerable damage (if so, however, such loss would also have to be taken into account).

Illustration 2
Tyres owned by A are mounted on B's car. This case is also discussed frequently in the context of combination. Under the present Article, combination in the sense of paragraph (1) would not occur because the tyres can be demounted easily and with very low costs, without causing any damage to the tyres nor to the car.

C. Proprietary consequences where "principal part" rule applies (paragraph (2))

(a) Options in general

Options for proprietary consequences. Potential options for the proprietary consequences of situations covered by Section 2 of this Chapter have already been discussed in more detail in VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment C for the purposes of production in the sense of that Article. The options are basically the same in the present context as well, so that a general reference to the named Comments may be made. This Comment may confine itself to repeating that co-ownership of course takes care of all parties' value interests but may complicate matters in certain other relations, such as administration of the common asset, dividing co-ownership and selling the combined goods to a third party. Providing sole ownership to one person and leaving the others with mere obligatory claims, on the other hand, does not provide any protection in the new owner's insolvency. The others' value interests can, however, be taken care of if the sole ownership approach is combined with proprietary security rights granted to the (former) owners of subordinate parts. A sole ownership approach also may appear preferable with respect to the idea of serving sovereignty interests, i.e. interests related to the goods as such, other than interests in their value. Of course, each contributor may have such sovereignty interests in his original goods. In a certain sense and to a certain degree, such sovereignty interests might even best be served by allowing physical separation. But accepting that new entities shall not be separated where economically unreasonable, one may say that where sole ownership is given to the owner of the "principal part" (where existent), that part's sovereignty interests in his original goods will often basically continue in relation to the combined goods dominated by that party's principal asset. Regarding the publicity aspect, which is anyway not intended to be given much importance, one may add that the person acquiring sole ownership under a "principal part" rule will not necessarily be the person exercising physical control, whereas in case of production, the goods will at least typically be in the hands of the producer after that event.

(b) The rule adopted in paragraph (2)

General. The rule adopted in paragraph (2) is that where one contribution to the resulting combination can be regarded as the "principal part" and the other contribution(s), as a consequence, are to be considered as "subordinate part(s)", the owner of the principal part will acquire sole ownership. This can be described as a more or less general approach in the European legal systems. Contrary to the existing European legal systems, though, it is suggested that the (former) owners of subordinate parts shall acquire proprietary security rights in the combined asset, parallel to the solution opted for in VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1). As in the named production rule, this concept intends to combine a number of advantages offered by the different proprietary options while avoiding disadvantages as far as possible. It tries to take into account at least the principal part-owner's sovereignty interests (whereas the sovereignty interests of the subordinate part-owners could typically only be served when allowing physical separation) while respecting the value interests of the involved owners in relation to all combined parts. Also, the general creditors of the principal part-owner are economically restricted to their debtor's contribution as the rest of the value is reserved for the former owners of subordinate parts as long as the debts have not been paid off. Co-ownership, which would basically be equivalent to the proposed solution with regard to the parties' value interests, is avoided for its practical disadvantages, such as possible difficulties in jointly administering the combined goods, time and costs required for dividing co-ownership (which would regularly only be an interim stage, safeguarding the parties' value interests, but to be dissolved when the value-issue is settled). Also, difficulties resulting from potential disputes in the process of division of co-ownership, creating an impediment to commerce, are minimised. For a more detailed discussion, reference is made to VIII.–5:201 Comment C on the parallel issue in the context of production. Also, in some cases discussed below (e.g. Illustration 8), a co-ownership solution would simply be regarded un-natural. One can therefore summarise that, within the present Article, a "sole ownership & security right" approach is generally striven for where it seems possible to implement it (namely where a principal part can reasonably, i.e. without arbitrariness, be identified). Otherwise, co-ownership will be applied. As to the general relation of the principal part rule to the co-ownership rule, see also Comment C below. Another exception has been adopted for rather ethical reasons where a particular grade of bad faith is at hand; see paragraph (4) and Comment F below.

Principal part – subordinate part; general. Although the distinction between the "principal part" ("main part", "dominant part" etc.; terminology differs) on the one hand and "subordinate parts" ("minor parts" etc.) is a rather common concept in the European legal systems, certain nuances and disputes can be observed regarding the interpretation of these criteria in court practice and doctrine. The terms are usually not defined in the statutory texts. Also in respect of the present Article, it appears preferable not to include any definition but to leave certain flexibility and discretion in applying the rule, whereby inspiration may well be drawn from the discussions on existing national law, however in the light of the aims and basic concepts of these model rules. One general guideline following from the general choices underlying this Article is, for instance, that there is no need to broaden the scope of the co-ownership rule of paragraph (3) as opposed to the scope of paragraph (2)'s sole ownership approach out of a motivation of protecting the subordinate part owners' value interests; these are already catered for by the security right concept (cf. Illustration 6 below). As a tendency, the notion of "principal part" may therefore be interpreted rather broad; see also Comment C below.

Criteria for determining a "principal part". The following criteria may be taken into account when assessing whether the contribution of a certain person is to be regarded as the principal part in the sense if this Article. The list of criteria, which a are all borrowed from national discussions, is explicitly intended to be of indicative character only. Obviously, overlaps may occur. None of the named criteria is intended to be decisive on its own and often, the "common opinion" however hard to grasp will be regarded ultimately decisive.

If one of the parts can be regarded as constituting the essence of the resulting combination, this will be an argument for treating this part as a principal part. One can ask whether the other parts of the combined entity could be lacking without affecting the essence of the thing.

> A new motor owned by A is assembled into B's car. Provided dissembling the motor would be economically unreasonable (cf. Comment B with Illustration 1 above), the "essence" criterion may speak in favour of regarding the car as the principal part, notwithstanding the motor's value.

It may be an aspect that other parts have only a supplementary function in relation to the part in question.

Illustration 6
A technical machine owned by A is incorporated into a casing or frame owned by B in a way that separation would be unreasonable. This case had to be decided by the German Supreme Court who argued that if the machine can perform its primary purpose without the frame, it should be regarded as a principal thing (e.g., the frame serves only as decoration, to give the machine a better look). If, to the contrary, the frame has other functions as well, e.g. protection of the machine and the persons operating the machine, the German Supreme Court held that the frame cannot be regarded as an accessory (subordinate pat). The same was argued where the operating of the machine would only be possible after incorporating it into the frame.

This reasoning shows the Supreme Court's concern of interpreting the principal part-rule narrowly in order to leave a broad scope of application to the co-ownership solution for the sake of protecting the value interests of the owner of the frame. The latter will not apply as a guiding motivation under the present Article (see above) and it is very likely that this may affect the result notwithstanding the fact that taking into account the supplementary function as a criterion for determining the principal part appears reasonable also for the purposes of this Article.

The value of the parts may also be a certain indicator, but corresponding to a broad understanding in the European legal systems it should not be regarded decisive. One must take into account that mere value interests are already taken care of by the creation of security rights under the present system.

A stone of certain value owned by A is placed on a golden ring owned by B. The work is carried out by goldsmith C who contracted for a price with B (which implies an agreement in the sense of VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) that C will certainly not become the owner). Suppose separating the items would be unreasonable. Normally, the ring will be considered as the principal part under the common opinion. There may, however, also be cases where, e.g., the stone owned by A is a unique diamond, much more valuable than the ring as such. Here, if the task under a contract between A and C will, from an objective perspective, will rather be to "make something out of the diamond", the stone's value could operate as an indicator that rather the stone should be regarded as the principal part. There may perhaps also be cases where no principal part can be identified so that co-ownership emerges under paragraph (3).

Relation between principal part rule (paragraph (2)) and co-ownership rule (paragraph (3)). A question partly linked to the interpretation of the "principal part" concept is how the scopes of paragraph (2) and paragraph (3) shall relate. Theoretically, there are three alternatives: (i) The first would be applying the "sole ownership & security rights" approach to all cases; or in other words: deleting paragraph (3) where co-ownership is provided. If this option was chosen, the judge would always be forced to identify one part as the "principal" or dominant one, no matter whether or not there still is any plausible reasoning available for this decision. The owner of this part would then acquire sole ownership of the whole entity; the other(s) get a claim for compensation and a proprietary security right. Such a "black or white" concept (either the one or the other person will acquire sole ownership) may be regarded simpler in so far as no division of co-ownership must take place. On the other hand, in cases where it is difficult to determine which contribution should be regarded the principal one, the parties (and third parties) will be left in uncertainty and even if they go to court, there is still an evident risk of arbitrariness where both parts are more or less equally important. (ii) A second option would be to apply the "sole ownership & security rights" approach only in a rather limited number of cases where, taken to extremes, the identification of a principal part is so self-evident that one simply cannot ignore it (e.g. where paint is sprayed on a car) in other words: to leave relatively broad room for co-ownership. (iii) The third option is to leave just a rather narrow field "in the middle" where both parties become co-owners (for instance, if the value of one part is 45 and the value of the other is 55 and there is no other criterion applicable besides the value). If, on the other hand, a principal part can be more or less clearly and reasonably identified, the "sole ownership & security rights" approach applies. It has already been indicated that the present Article intends to follow the third model. The value interests of the owners of subordinate parts are, as mentioned repeatedly, already taken care of by the security right; so the argument of value-protection does not speak in favour of a broad co-ownership concept. The purpose and advantage of having a rather narrow co-ownership rule in the middle is that harsh and hardly justifiable decisions in borderline cases can be avoided more easily.

How the "sole ownership & security right" concept works technically. The concept is the same as provided under VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1). See Comment C of that Article for a more detailed explanation.

Note regarding very small contributions. The concept proposed under paragraph (2) may appear a bit queer, at least at first sight, when it comes to very small contributions which, under any existing property law regime in Europe, would not result in any proprietary consequence whatsoever.

> Illustration 8
> A's paint is sprayed on B's car in order to repair damage to the paintwork. Assume the paint is worth 1/1000 of the car's value.

The question arises whether providing the owner of the by far less valuable contribution with a proprietary security right is adequate or, if not, whether some kind of limitation should be incorporated. Before trying to find a suitable borderline, which would evidently be problematic anyway, it suggests itself to analyse whether granting a proprietary security right in cases like Illustration 8 causes any considerable practical problems: (i) A mini-security right would definitely become relevant when the owner of the principal part becomes insolvent and the debt has not been paid (or where the combined goods are attached and liquidated in a forced sale by one of the creditors outside bankruptcy). This, however, does not create considerable problems, as the difference between getting the whole claim discharged (by means of the security right created under paragraph (2)) and proportionate satisfaction which could otherwise be achieved in bankruptcy will not be considerable in absolute terms. (ii) A second aspect that may seem a bit strange is that the person entitled to the mini-security can of course also enforce the security right under general rules (see Chapter 7 of Book IX), i.e. he may have the combined asset sold. But this is not that striking either. Also if no proprietary security right was provided, A could, in the case of Illustration 8, enforce his right to payment in the whole patrimony of B, including the car. (iii) One may add that as long as the combined asset is not subject to enforcement (be it in its owner's insolvency or where the former subordinate part owner enforces the security right himself), the existence of the proprietary security right as such does not affect the principal part-owner. The debt will once be paid, or it prescribes, and nothing remains from the security right.

There is, however, one last potential problem, namely the situation where the combined goods are going to be alienated, so that the question arises whether or to what extent the potential existence of small proprietary security rights may create an impediment to commerce. It is obvious that, for instance, a used car may have undergone numerous small reparations, the price of which may partly have remained unpaid, and it is also obvious that the policy should not be that each buyer of a used car should find himself confronted with a whole list of proprietary security rights in his new car, the existence and extension of which he can never be really sure of. But, one will have to consider that such repairs will usually be made under a contract concluded between the (former) owner of the item and a service provider and that the contract may either contain an (express or implied) agreement in the sense of VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) that the service provider will not acquire any proprietary interests in the combined asset, or, if that agreement should provide the creation of a proprietary security right (e.g., equivalent to the present default rule), this security right will be subject to the provisions of Book IX (cf. VIII.–5:101(4) second sentence). In the latter case, Book IX Chapter 3 provides that the security right will be effective as against third persons only if, or as long as, the secured creditor (the service provider) is in possession of the combined entity or if the security right is registered; cf. IX.–3:101 (Effectiveness as against third persons) and IX.–3:102 (Methods of achieving effectiveness). Such registration will hardly ever be made in respect of very low debts so that a security right created by the service provider will usually not be effective as against a potential acquirer. This will also apply where the service provider agreed on a retention of ownership device in relation to the goods to be combined with the client's principal part and the client is a consumer: IX.–3:107 (Registration of acquisition finance devices) paragraph (3) does provide that "where a credit for assets supplied to a consumer is secured by an acquisition finance device, this proprietary security is effective without registration." But "this exception does not apply to security rights in proceeds and other assets different from the supplied asset" so that an extension to the combined entity would require registration which will regularly not be made.

There are, consequently, basically only two remaining situations where the combined asset to be acquired by a third person may be encumbered by an effective security right of the service provider: First, where the service provider used goods owned by someone else without that person's consent, in which case the present Article applies. This situation is, however, of low practical importance. Second, a security right created under Book IX itself may still exist and be effective where the supplier of the service provider delivered the material subject to a retention of ownership device, these two persons have entered into an agreement for extending the security to products or combined assets in the sense of IX.–2:308 (Use of goods subject to a retention of ownership device for production or combination) and the security right has been registered (cf. Comment C on the named Article). Even then, however, the potential third party acquirer (and this is to say, commerce in general) will largely be protected by good faith acquisition rules. In particular, IX.–6:102 (Loss of proprietary security due to good faith acquisition of ownership) paragraph (2) has the effect that a third party acquirer is not expected to search the register if he buys in the transferor's ordinary course of business. Also, he is not expected to know of entries not filed against the transferor but, e.g., against the person from whom the transferor acquired the asset (which will apply, e.g., in relation to material "acquired" subject to a retention of ownership device by the service provider that has been contractually extended to products and combined assets; see above). Such rights are filed against the service provider, not against the potential transferor of the combined asset (the client).

After all, it appears that there does not seem to be a practical need for treating very small contributions different from subordinate parts of a certain higher value.

General. Where a principal part exists and the owner of that part, therefore, acquires sole ownership of the combined asset, the owners of subordinate parts acquire a right to payment as against the principal part owner. The right to payment arises when the ownership in the original item is lost, i.e. at the moment of combination, and in principle serves the purpose of compensating the owners of subordinate parts for the value of their property. It is subject to the general rules on obligations and corresponding rights as provided under Book III (as to prescription, cf. VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment D on the parallel issues arising there). The proprietary security right conferred by the first sentence of paragraph (2) relates to this right to payment. Similar as in case of production, there is, however, certain leeway for calculating this right to payment. Also here, the main policy issue has been on whom to place the risk of economically unsuccessful combinations, i.e. where the value of the combined asset is lower than the added single values of the former parts as such (cf. VIII.–5:201 Comment D). As in case of production, the choice has been placing this risk on the person who effected the combination. This policy is reflected in the two different calculation methods provided by the second sentence of paragraph (2). At the same time, this approach helps synchronising the present Article with the policies pursued in Chapter 7 of this Book, namely regarding situations where a possessor of goods which he must restore to their owner, adds subordinate parts to the owner's principal part. See below in Comment D.

Owner of principal part effects combination: payment equal to value of subordinate parts. The situation that combination is effected by the owner of the principal part, i.e. by the person who hereby acquires sole ownership in the combined asset, is regulated in the second alternative of paragraph (2) sentence 2. This rule provides that the subordinate part owners must be compensated "equal to the value of the respective subordinate part at the moment of combination". It corresponds to the approach taken in the parallel case of production: Also there, the parties who lose their right of ownership have a right to be paid "equal to value" as against the person who effected the relevant act and thereby acquired sole ownership of the new entity. The effect achieved by this approach is to place the risk of economically unsuccessful combinations on the principal part owner, who is responsible for effecting combination. At the same time, the value interests of the subordinate part owners are fully taken care of, also with regard to subsequent loss of the combined asset after combination. For a closer discussion of the concept, compare VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment D. That a person "effects" combination in the sense of this rule covers, of course, not only carrying out the respective act oneself, but also situations where the principal part owner contracts with a third person to bring about the combination.

Combination effected by subordinate part owner or by third party: payment under unjustified enrichment principles. All situations where someone other than the owner of the principal part effected the combination are regulated by the first alternative of paragraph (2) sentence 2, which basically refers to the principles of unjustified enrichment. This rule covers situations where the combination is effected by the owner of a subordinate part, where a third person was responsible for effecting combination and where combination occurred by coincidence or an act of nature. Most often, the practical effect of this approach will be identical to what would be achieved by the "equal to value" concept employed by the second alternative of paragraph (2) sentence 2. But there are three differences, one occurring where the disadvantaged party (i.e. the subordinate part owner effecting the combination) falls within the "consented freely and without error to the disadvantage" formula of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) which will be discussed more closely below; the other two differences being relevant when the enriched person, i.e. the owner of the principal part to whom sole ownership of the combined asset accrues, is in good faith. These two further differences will be discussed in the following: first, the owner of the principal part will not be obliged to pay "more than any saving" which means that, in case that person has a smaller benefit of the combined asset than what would correspond to the added market values of all parts at the moment of combination, the owners of subordinate parts may receive less than the objective value of their goods at that time. Second, the principal part owner (enriched person) can raise the defence of disenrichment in the sense of VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment) to the extent he has sustained a disadvantage after combination (e.g., the combined asset was destroyed), provided he was still in good faith at the moment of this disenrichment. These concepts are further discussed in the context of production, so that reference can be made to VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment D for a closer description. Contrary to the context of production and cases where the owner of the principal part himself effected the combination, however, the unjustified enrichment concept is deliberately chosen for the scope of the first alternative of paragraph (2) sentence 2. This is on the one hand motivated by protecting the principal part-owner's interests, who obtained an enrichment without his consent. While unjustified enrichment law safeguards that this person does not retain an undue benefit, obtaining the enrichment should also not result in further disadvantages. Where the person effecting the combination was the owner of the subordinate part in question, the unjustified enrichment approach also pursues the policy that the risk of inefficient combinations should be placed on the person who had it in his hands whether or not to bring about the factual result. The same goes for subsequent deterioration and other instances amounting to a "disenrichment". Since, in these situations, the said principles of distributing risks converge with the general principles of unjustified enrichment law, there is evidently no reason for deviating from the latter.

These policy considerations do, however, only partly apply where the combination is effected by a third person (who does not own any material involved in the combination), as well as in relation to subordinate part-owners where another subordinate part-owner effected the combination: The principal part-owner's worthiness of protection is the same as discussed above; but the respective subordinate part owner did not contribute with any act which, out of itself, would justify putting him into a less favourable position as compared to the "equal to value" approach. Nevertheless, the proposed approach corresponds to general principles of these model rules, as established by Book VII. Also, the respective subordinate part-owner may proceed against the responsible person under the rules on non-contractual liability for damage. It will be quite easy for such other owners of subordinate parts to demonstrate that they sustained a loss and to quantify that loss (i.e. the difference between the market value and the principal part-owner's subjective benefit). But the respective subordinate part-owner must establish the acting person's negligence. However, solving the problem via Book VI seems to be a good approach in so far as the problem is solved exactly in the relationship where it occurs, i.e. between the person effecting the combination and the respective subordinate part-owner who sustains a loss therefrom. There is no detour over the relationship with the principal part owner (i.e. the calculation of monetary claims against that person).

Synchronisation with Chapter 7. Opting for the unjustified enrichment approach inter alia for situations where the owner of a subordinate part effects the combination also fits to the policy choices made in relation to Chapter 7 of this Book. See VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession) Comments B for a closer discussion of the question how to compensate a possessor of goods, which he would be obliged to return to their owner, for parts added to, or other expenses made on, these goods. The named provision overlaps with the present Article where the "possessor" contributes with a subordinate part to the "owner's" principal part. Sentence 2 of the present Article does not only refer to Book VII but also to VIII.–7:104, where applicable, i.e. where the owner of the respective subordinate part (possessor) himself effected the combination. The purpose of this reference is to cover VIII.–7:104(1) sentence 2, which safeguards that VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) does not exclude a possessor's entitlement to a reversal of the enrichment where the possessor knows that the goods are owned by another and incurs expenditure on, or adds parts to, the goods for the purpose of the possessor's own benefit. The reasons for this choice are discussed in VIII.–7:104 Comment B. A parallel approach is followed in VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (3) sentence 3; cf. Comment F on that Article.

E. No principal part identifiable: co-ownership (paragraph (3))

General. Paragraph (3) is intended to be understood as an exception where no "principal part" can be identified (cf. Comment C above). If so, the owners of the goods involved (neutrally named "component parts") become co-owners of the combined entity, subject to an exception for very small contributions provided under paragraph (3) sentence 2. In both cases, the value interests of the parties involved are provided proprietary protection. Co-ownership is acquired by operation of law at the time of combination. The rule impliedly refers to VIII.–1:203 (Co-ownership) which provides that each co-owner acquires an undivided share in the combined asset and each co-owner can dispose of that share by acting alone. Further rules on co-ownership created under this Article are not contained in these model rules. In particular, division of co-ownership has not been regulated any closer, inter alia because auf the central role judicial proceedings play in this respect unless the parties reach an agreement on the division of co-ownership in many countries. There is, however, a short overview on this subject matter provided in the Notes to this Article. A simplified mode of dividing co-ownership as provided by VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) paragraph (2) evidently is out of question in the present context.

Calculation of shares. The undivided shares of the co-owners are calculated "proportionate to the value of the respective part at the moment of combination". This appears to be a wide spread approach in European legal system where co-ownership emerges in the case of combination and has the advantage of taking care of the value interests of all co-owners equally. It also corresponds with the mode of calculation adopted in VIII.–5:202 (Commingling). However, this approach constitutes a certain incoherence within the system of Chapter 5, since all contributors are treated alike irrespective of who effected the combination. In other rules except VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) where the separation into proportionate quantities in most cases secures that everyone gets back what he had the risks of the production or combination being economically inefficient or the new entity being subsequently destroyed are usually placed on the person who effected the relevant act. This approach could, theoretically, also be implemented in paragraph (3) of this Article by employing the calculation scheme adopted in paragraph (4) sentence 2, i.e. providing that the shares of all owners of component parts who did not effect the combination are calculated "equal to their value" at the moment of combination. Still, paragraph (3) sticks to the traditional "proportionate to value" approach. One aspect in this relation certainly is that with regard to the situations covered by VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraphs (1) and (3) and VIII.–

5:203 (Combination) paragraphs (2) and (4), the scope of solutions offered in the European legal systems is broader than in the present context, so that a policy choice had to be taken anyhow. Another aspect is that especially in the case of VIII.–5:203(2), a synchronisation with Chapter 7 of this Book had to be found (cf. Comment D above), which facilitated the choice towards an unjustified enrichment concept placing the risk on the person effecting the combination. But that was not necessary with regard to paragraph (3) of this Article (cf. Comment E below).

Further loss sustained by owners of component parts; subsequent damage. Where one of the owners of component parts sustains additional loss, e.g. because the method of calculating the undivided shares described above does not cover the full market price of his goods, or because additional costs must be expended for obtaining substitute goods, these losses may be liquidated from the person who effected the combination under the rules of Book VI. Where the combined asset deteriorates or gets damaged, the co-owners, in principle, bear the loss proportionally in relation of their undivided shares. If, however, one of them, or a third person, is accountable for such damage, recovery may be made again by resorting to reparation under Book VI.

Special rule for component parts of minimal importance, paragraph (3) sentence 2. Sentence 2 of paragraph (3) contains a special rule for situations where two or more parts of more or less equal, or at least considerable, importance and, in addition, further goods which are only of minimal importance are involved in the combination.

> Goods owned by A, B, C and D are combined in a way that co-ownership emerges under paragraph (3) of this Article. A's and B's goods are each worth 40 %, C's goods are worth 19 % and D's goods are worth 1 % of the total value of the combined asset.

D's contribution is "minimal" in the sense of paragraph (3) sentence 2. The purpose of this rule is to practically facilitate division of co-ownership by party agreement while, at the same time, fully respecting and protecting the value interests of the owner of such a minimal part. The latter aspect is achieved by replacing the co-ownership share which would be acquired under sentence 1 by a right to monetary compensation of exactly the same value, secured by a proprietary security right in the combined goods. This model has practical advantages in so far as division of co-ownership by party agreement is typically easier the less parties are involved. In particular, the owners of the more important parts (in Illustration 9: A, B and C) will typically be interested in separating co-ownership quickly; long negotiations and disputes would keep the combined goods "out of commerce". If, in such a situation, a further person with a small co-ownership share was involved in the negotiations as well, this person could be tempted to give his assent only if he receives an excessive price. Such risks are avoided by the additional rule in the second sentence of paragraph (3).

Relation to Chapter 7. In principle, this Article may overlap with Chapter 7 also where co-ownership emerges under paragraph (3), the decisive aspect under VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) being that the possessor adding his own goods to other goods had to return these other goods to their owner at the moment he effected this combination. Unlike situations where the possessor combines his own "subordinate part" to the owner's "principal part", where a synchronisation between paragraph (2) of the present Article and VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession) had to be striven for (cf. Comment D above), the situations covered by paragraph (3) of this Article are characterised in that a return of the combined asset to "its owner" will not take place anyway due to the creation of co-ownership. It is therefore no problem to let paragraph (3) supersede the unjustified enrichment-orientated provision of VIII.–7:104. This effect is spelled out by VIII.–7:101(3).

F. Exception from acquisition of sole ownership where person effecting combination knowingly uses another's goods without that other's consent (paragraph (4))

General. Paragraph (4) of this Article has been introduced as a parallel provision to VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (2)(b). The discussion of the present rule can therefore be kept relatively short by referring to details discussed in VIII.–5:201 Comment E. Also in the present context, it was clear that, if any exception for parties acting in bad faith was to be adopted at all, such exception shall be a narrow one because, in particular, the "sole ownership & security right" concept of paragraph (2) of this Article provides quite sufficient protection for the owners of subordinate parts and uncertainty resulting from disputes about bad faith should be kept limited, if not avoided completely (cf. VIII.–5:201 Comment E). Like in the case of VIII.–5:201(2)(b), the policy underlying the exception in paragraph (4) is that no one should benefit from committing a criminal (or close to criminal) act. Also, it may be emphasized that the working group preparing Book VIII was not at all in favour of adopting paragraph (4) but did so according to a majority decision in the Study Group's Co-ordinating Committee (cf. also VIII.–5:201 Comment E).

Scope of exception. Pursuant to the policy outlined above and parallel to the rule in VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (2)(b), paragraph (4) of this Article aims at preventing a person acting in particular bad faith (see below) from assuming an ownership right at the expense of the owners of other parts involved in the combination. The effect to be avoided, therefore, is that such a person acquires sole ownership under paragraph (2) of this Article. From this follows that the scope of paragraph (4) is restricted to situations where the combination is effected by the person who owns the "principal part". For other situations there is no need for such exception: If a subordinate part-owner effects combination with such unlawful intent, ownership will be acquired by another person anyway (paragraph (2)) and where co-ownership under paragraph (3) is created, the person effecting combination in particular bad faith will not take a bigger proportion of ownership than he had before. The second aspect to be discussed in relation to the rule's scope is that the person effecting the combination must actually know that a (i.e. at least one) subordinate part is owned by another person and that this other person does not consent to the combination. The provision primarily addresses the thief who uses the stolen goods for combining them with his own goods, but has a broader scope. For details as to the requirement of actual knowledge and the situations covered by this criterion, reference may be given to VIII.–5:201 Comment E. The burden of proof as to the existence of actual knowledge lies on whom who asserts this fact. This will regularly be the owner of the respective component part. As to the counter-exception for situations where the principal part is of "much higher value" see Comment F below.

Creation of co-ownership, calculation of shares (sentence 2). The consequence provided by the exception of paragraph (4) is that all owners of component parts become co-owners of the combined asset. This also includes the thief (or other person covered by the criterion of actual knowledge). It is noteworthy that the policy underlying this rule parallel to VIII.–5:201 (Production), in case the producer in particular bad faith also uses material of his own is to prevent the person in bad faith from acquiring a bigger portion of ownership by the specifically unlawful act, but not to take away any ownership right this person lawfully had. Regarding the calculation of the co-owners' undivided shares, however, the bad faith of the person effecting the combination does bear significance. Sentence 2 of paragraph (4) places the risk of economically inefficient combinations on the person who effected the combination in particular bad faith. The owners of subordinate parts acquire a share "equal to the value" of their respective component part at the moment of combination. This guarantees that these owners' value interests are met fully, even where the overall value of the combined asset is less than the added single values of all component parts. The share of the principal part owner corresponds to what is economically left after "deduction" of the subordinate part-owners' shares. Nevertheless, the result will usually be that the person who effected the combination in a qualified degree of bad faith is the majority shareholder due to the dominating position of his principal part. This (or a comparable) scheme of calculating the shares is also needed in order to avoid the result that the person effecting combination in a qualified degree of bad faith would be put in a better position under paragraph (4) than he would have been under paragraph (2) had he acted in good faith. A specific rule along the lines of paragraph (3) sentence 2, providing the owner of a "minimal" part "only" a right to payment secured by a proprietary security right, is not adopted in paragraph (4). Where such a "minimal" part has been stolen (etc.), however, the counter-exception of "much higher value" may result in the principal part-owner acquiring sole ownership (see Illustration 10 below).

Counter-exception: much higher value. Paragraph (4) contains the same counter-exception as provided in VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (2)(b): Paragraph (2) of the present Article applies and the owner of the principal part, who effects the combination in the particular bad faith, acquires sole ownership of the combined asset if "the value of the principal part is much higher than the value of the subordinate part". "The subordinate part" just means the part(s) in relation to which the requirements set out for the exception under paragraph (4) sentence 1 of this Article are fulfilled, i.e. the part which has been stolen or is otherwise knowingly used without its owner's consent (cf. VIII.–5:201 Comment E for the parallel question arising in production cases). The concept of "much higher value" is copied from VIII.–5:201(2)(b). It must be considerably more than what suffices to constitute a "principal part". Despite all vagueness remaining, the counter-exception doubtlessly serves an important task in avoiding unreasonable results in some constellations.

> A, the owner of a car, steals an aerosol can owned by B and sprays the paint on the car body. If the exception rule of paragraph (4) contained no counter-exception, B would become co-owner of the car.

Critique and alternative proposal: deletion of paragraph (4). As mentioned above (Comment F), the working group preparing this Book rather favours deleting the whole paragraph (4) and covering all "principal part" cases by paragraph (2), irrespective of that part's owner's good faith or bad faith. To a large extent, the arguments are parallel to those brought forward in the context of the working group's preference of deleting VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (2)(b) as well (for a closer discussion, see Comment E on that Article): The exception rule of paragraph (4) of the present Article hardly brings about more practical protection to the owner(s) whose goods have been stolen (etc.). Being entitled to demand payment of the full market value, secured by a proprietary security right, would perfectly meet the subordinate part-owners' value interests, which are basically to be regarded their main interests. In relation to all additional loss they may sustain, resorting to the rules of non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI is the appropriate means; co-ownership is of no help in such regard. Looked upon from the opposite perspective, the principal part-owner who knowingly used another's subordinate part would not really benefit in an economic sense in case the general rule of paragraph (2) was applicable. Apart from these value-based deliberations, the owner of a subordinate part who invokes the exception of paragraph (4) runs considerable procedural risks, in particular because the other party's actual knowledge regularly is particularly difficult to establish. All kinds of uncertainties may also have negative effects on third parties. Evidently, the counter-exception of a "much higher value", apart from adding a third level of differentiation (subordinate part, principal part, principle part of much higher level), contributes to increasing this Article's complexity and dispute-affinity. Last but not least, the result achieved under the exception rule does not only lack an addition in terms of practical protection for the other co-owners, it actually leads to rather impractical consequences: Due to the importance of his principal part, the thief (or similar person) will most often be the majority shareholder in the combined asset. This means that depending on the relevant rules of national law he may administer the combined asset according to his will (e.g., if the relevant administration rules let a simple majority suffice in administrative issues). Reaching an agreement about dividing co-ownership which is what the subordinate part owners will try to achieve in order to realise their value interests may also be rather complicated, taking into account the majority owner's favourable position regarding administration and the particular honesty this person has already proven. One can expect that the other co-owners will often have to enter judicial proceedings for dividing the co-ownership. For all these reasons, also taking into account that the comparative survey does not provide a strong indication for deviating from the general rule of paragraph (2), deleting paragraph (4) appears to be a favourable solution.

VIII.–5:204: Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights

(1) A proprietary security right created under the preceding Articles on production and combination is effective against third persons without requiring possession by, or registration of, the former owner of the material or of the component part.

(2) If the proprietary security right in the new or combined goods is extinguished by a third party's good faith acquisition (Chapter 3), the security right extends to the proceeds of the sale. Paragraph (1) applies accordingly.

(3) A proprietary security right created under the preceding Articles on production and combination takes priority over any other security right which has previously been created, by the producer or by the owner of the principal part, in the new or combined goods. The same applies to equivalent security rights created by agreement between the former owner of the material and the producer, or between the former owner of the subordinate part and the owner of the principal part.

COMMENTS

A. General

Scope and purpose of this Article. This Article provides supplementary provisions which appear necessary for the approach of protecting certain parties' interests by granting proprietary security rights to work efficiently. To the extent provided by the present Article, the security rights created under this Section deviate from the general rules on proprietary security rights as provided by Book IX; cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph (4) sentence 1. The rules of the present Article apply to all cases where, under the preceding provisions of this Section, a former owner of goods acquires such a proprietary security right, i.e. in case of VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraphs (2) and (3) sentence 2.

B. Effectiveness without possession or registration (paragraph (1))

The general rule provided by Book IX. Book IX on proprietary security rights distinguishes between "creation" and "effectiveness" of a proprietary security right. "Creation" of security rights in the sense of Section 2 of this Chapter is effected by operation of law at the moment of production, or combination, respectively (cf. VIII.–5:201 (Production) Comment C and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) Comment C). For providing protection as against third parties, in particular as against other (later) secured creditors and against the producer's or the principal part-owner's general creditors in that person's insolvency, a proprietary security right also needs to be "effective" in the sense of Chapter 3 of Book IX; see IX.–3:101 (Effectiveness as against third persons) paragraph (1). The usual methods of achieving such effectiveness as far as relevant in the present context are holding possession of the encumbered asset (i.e. the new or combined goods) or registration of the security right pursuant to Chapter 3 Section 3 of Book IX; see IX.–3:102 (Methods of achieving effectiveness). Details and exceptions (such as for goods supplied to a consumer under an acquisition finance device, cf. IX.–3:107 (Registration of acquisition finance devices) paragraph (3)) may be neglected in the present context. The method which would be practically relevant for security rights created under Section 2 of the present Chapter if not excluded by the present Article would be registration. Possession would not be an appropriate alternative at least in cases of production, as it is usually the producer (and not the secured party, which is the former owner of the material) who has physical control over the new goods. The same would apply where the owner of the principal part effects combination.

Necessity for adaptation for purposes of Section 2. If proprietary security rights created under Section 2 were subject to a registration requirement as described above, there would be an eminent risk that the target of protecting the owners' value interests against the producer's (principal part-owner's) creditors would be missed. One has to consider that Section 2 of Chapter 5 in particular also covers situations where the owner of the material (i.e. the secured party) does not even know that production or combination has taken place, or who the producer (or the owner of the principal part in case of combination) is, and would, therefore, be practically excluded from filing a registration notice. There are basically two options how to solve this problem: Either registration must be made at least within a certain period of time, e.g. three months, from the moment when the owner of material obtained actual knowledge of the fact that production (or combination) occurred and of the identity of the producer (or owner of the principal part). This, as a tendency, could help to make the register more complete (although completeness could not be achieved). However, the time limit for such subsequent registration should not be too short, because the owner of the material, when suddenly being informed of what happened to his goods, may need to obtain legal advice in order to know what to do, etc. The other option, which was preferred for the present Article, is to do without a requirement of registration (and possession) for achieving effectiveness as against third parties altogether. One must take into account that filing notices in the register would create certain costs and efforts for the secured party (the former owner of the goods). In particular, the owner of the goods involved in production or combination might be required to undertake an initial enrolment in the register (cf. IX.–3:304 (Authentication as requirement for declarations to the register)), the costs of which he would basically have to bear himself (cf. IX.–3:332 (Distribution of costs)). After all, one may well assume that such constellations where registration after some months could still be made would be so rare that the aim of making the register as complete as can be would not seriously be impeded by not requiring possession or registration from the beginning. Of course, nothing is to be said against "voluntary" registration of security rights created under Section 2 of this Chapter, which offers the former owner of goods used in production or combination a possibility of reducing the risk of losing his right due to a third person's good faith acquisition.

C. Extension to proceeds (paragraph (2))

Extension of security right to proceeds (paragraph (2) sentence 1). A proprietary security right in the new or combined goods may vanish as a consequence of good faith acquisition, when the producer (or the principal part-owner) sells these goods to a third party who does not know nor has reason to suspect that such security right exists. Such good faith acquisition free of encumbrances is provided for in VIII.–3:102 (Good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights) and is further specified in IX.–6:102 (Loss of proprietary security due to good faith acquisition of ownership) paragraph (2). In order to maintain the security as much as possible in such a situation, paragraph (2) of the present Article provides that the security right shall extend to the proceeds of such a sale. The term "sale" is intended to encompass also other dispositions for value than contracts for the sale of goods in a narrow sense, provided this disposition leads to a good faith acquisition extinguishing the security right in the goods (otherwise, the security right in the goods remains enforceable against the acquirer and there would be no need to "double" the encumbered assets). According to the drafting history of this provision, the term "proceeds" is intended to cover (i) the producer's (principal part-owner's) claim for payment of the price against his buyer (as long as the latter has not paid) and (ii) the price received from the buyer once the latter paid. This right will, of course, only be enforceable as long as the paid sum is identifiable within the producer's (principal part-owner's) patrimony. As to a possible extension to further kinds of proceeds, see Comment E below. Although this was not subject to discussion when preparing this Chapter, one could contemplate adopting a parallel rule for co-ownership shares created under VIII.–5:203 (Combination).

No possession or registration needed for extension of security right in proceeds (paragraph (2) sentence 2). Finally, the same deliberations as discussed for the security right in the new or combined goods as such apply to the extension of the security rights to the proceeds of a sale (cf. Comment B above). Neither possession nor registration is required for achieving effectiveness in relation to the extension of the proprietary security right to the proceeds of a sale.

D. Priority over security rights earlier created in new or combined goods (paragraph (3))

The problem. This paragraph deals with situations where a producer (or the owner of the principal part in case of combination) has already concluded prior to production or combination an agreement to create a security right in the new or combined goods in favour of a third party. Under the rules of Book IX, such an agreement between the producer or principal part owner (as security giver) and a third party as the secured creditor (e.g., a bank) may be validly concluded before the encumbered asset comes into existence. Such agreements on the creation of security rights in future goods may be registered and priority is generally determined by the time of that registration; see IX.–4:101 (Priority: general rules) paragraphs (1) and (2)(a). This means that, under the general regime of Book IX, such a preceding security right of a third party, whereas formally being created only at the time the relevant asset comes into existence (cf. IX.–2:102 (Requirements for creation of security rights in general) limb (a) and Comment B on that Article) would have priority over a security right created under Chapter 5.

Priority of security right created under Section 2. As the main policy of Chapter 5 is to preserve some form of property law protection (cf. VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) Comment H), the statutory proprietary security right provided for by the rules on production and combination must have priority over the contractual security rights previously granted to a third party. This is spelled out explicitly in paragraph (3) sentence 1. The rule is not only justified by the said policy of maintaining some kind of proprietary protection equivalent to the former ownership right in the goods involved in production or combination. There also is a strong parallel to acquisition finance devices (especially retention of ownership devices), which are also granted "superpriority" by IX.–4:102 (Superpriority) paragraph (1). In both situations, the security provider (producer or principal part-owner; buyer under retention of ownership) increases his assets by "taking in" another's goods (material used in production or combination; or goods acquired subject to a retention of ownership device), but has not yet paid the full equivalent for these new assets to the person from which he received them. Metaphorically, he has not "earned" these assets to the extent the former owner's security right still exists. This also shows that the "superpriority" proposed by paragraph (3) of the present Article does not frustrate any legitimate expectations of the producer's (principal part owner's) other creditors: Before having paid the monetary equivalent to the former owner of the goods involved in production or combination, the producer (principal part owner) is not entitled to the full value of the new or combined goods. Economically, the producer is only entitled to the value of his work, as reflected in the new goods, and the principal part-owner is entitled to the value of his own component part. In so far, the material-owner's (principal part owner's) proprietary security right created under Section 2 of this Chapter does not interfere with another creditor's global security right. The producer's (principal part owner's) other creditors cannot legitimately expect that the producer (principal part owner) could increase his assets (and, thereby: their collateral) by the value of unpaid material used for production or combination without the prior owner's consent. Finally, this solution corresponds with the solution that would be achieved if VIII.–5:201 (Production) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2) provided for co-ownership between the producer and the owners of material, and between the owner of the principal part and the owners of subordinate parts, respectively: The producer (owner of the principal part) could create a security right only in "his" undivided share, whereas undivided shares of other co-owners, i.e. shares of the former owners of the material, or of subordinate parts, respectively, would remain unaffected. Where the effect provided for under this paragraph shall be avoided, the producer (or principal part owner, respectively) may try to reach a party agreement in the sense of VIII.–5:101 paragraphs (1) and (2) with the owners of the other goods involved.

Priority of equivalent contractual security right. The same priority regime shall apply where a security right equivalent to the one created under the default rules of Section 2 of this Chapter is created by an agreement between the owner of the respective material or subordinate part on the one side, and the producer or principal part-owner on the other side. It would not be adequate to "punish" a material-owner (or an owner of a subordinate part) for regulating the effects of production or combination in an agreement by putting him in a worse position regarding priority. Also here, the parallel to retention of ownership devices, which are also granted superpriority by the named IX.–4:102 (Superpriority) paragraph (1), is evident (see also Comment G on the named Article). This rule is explicitly spelled out in the second sentence of paragraph (3). Party agreements in the sense of this paragraph are agreements in the sense of VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraphs (1) and (2), i.e. agreements concluded before or upon production or combination. "Equivalent" security rights are such that grant the secured creditor (i.e. the former owner of material or of a subordinate part) the same, or less, protection as that person would be provided with if Section 2 of this Chapter applied. This particularly includes the amount of the secured claim. To the extent the secured claim exceeds the amount calculated under the respective rules of Section 2 of this Chapter, no superpriority in the sense of this paragraph is provided, but the general rules on priority apply (see Chapter 4 of Book IX).

E. Further issues relating to proprietary security rights created under Section 2

Relation to already existing proprietary security rights in the material. A further issue, which however does not require specific regulation in Chapter 5 of this Book, is the question how the ex lege security rights created under Section 2 of Chapter 5 relate to proprietary security rights which, at the moment of production or combination, already existed in the material or single component parts. This issue is regulated by Book IX itself. The first rule to observe is IX.–2:307 (Use of encumbered goods for production or combination) paragraphs (1) and (2). Under these rules, security rights in the encumbered material may be extended (a) to the product or the combined asset (which is relevant where the security provider effects production himself, or where he owns the principal part himself, respectively), or (b) to the right to payment to which the security provider is entitled as former owner of the goods under the rules of Section 2 of this Chapter (which is relevant where a third party effects production or owns the principal part in case of combination) only if the parties, i.e. the owner of the respective material as the security provider and the respective secured creditor, so agree. This agreement must be registered in order to achieve effectiveness as against third parties (cf.

IX.–2:307 Comment D). Provided such agreement has been made, the security right originally created in the respective goods automatically extends to the product (combined asset) or the material owner's right to payment without requiring any further act, and provided the security right was effective in relation to the original goods, effectiveness is preserved without any additional registration. Also, the priority of the security right in the original goods is preserved by virtue of IX.–4:103 (Continuation of priority) paragraph (1)(b).

Where the security right, under the principles summarised above, extends to the material-owner's right to payment as against the producer or principal part-owner, the security right also extends to that former owner's proprietary security right in the new or combined goods (as created under Section 2 of this Chapter). This effect is explicitly spelled out by IX.–2:307 (Use of encumbered goods for production or combination) paragraphs (4). As a result, the secured creditor (third party holding a security right in the former material or subordinate part) is entitled to enforce the proprietary security right created under this Section (i.e., in favour of the former owner of the material or subordinate part). As a general principle, this is also laid down in IX.–2:301 (Encumbrance of right to payment of money) limb (c).

As a practical effect, payments made by the producer (principal part-owner) to one former owner of material, or by one former owner of material to one of his pre-existing secured creditors, do not affect the position of another former owner of material and his pre-existing secured creditors, respectively. Metaphorically, each former owner of material used in production or combination constitutes a "branch" which is entitled to a certain amount of payment by the producer (principal part-owner). Payments made within such a branch never affect other branches (another former owner of material and his preceding secured creditors).

Extension of security right to certain proceeds of originally encumbered asset. In addition to the case explicitly regulated by paragraph (2) of this Article, the proprietary security right created in the new or combined goods also extends to certain other proceeds of the originally encumbered asset as far as provided for by general rules of Book IX. Pursuant to IX.–2:306 (Proceeds of the originally encumbered assets) paragraph (1), the security right extends to rights to payment due to a defect, damage or loss of the originally encumbered asset, including insurance proceeds.

Enforcement of security right created under Section 2. As to enforcement of security rights created under this Section, the general enforcement rules of Chapter 7 of Book IX will apply. Generally, enforcement may be exercised after an event of default (cf. IX.–7:101 (Secured creditor's rights after default) paragraph (1), which basically means any non-performance of the debtor of the obligation covered by the security right (i.e., the producer or principal part-owner); cf. IX.–1:201 (Definitions) paragraph (5). This basically means that the secured obligation must be due (which will be the case immediately upon production or combination) and has remained unpaid. Enforcement may be made judicially or extra-judicially, in the latter case subject to restrictions applying where the security provider (producer, principal part-owner) is a consumer; cf. IX.–7:103 (Extra-judicial and judicial enforcement) paragraph (2): the consumer must have agreed to extra-judicial enforcement after default. In case the security provider is a consumer, any enforcement proceedings must be initiated by delivering an enforcement notice in textual form at least ten days before the beginning of enforcement; cf. IX.–7:107 (Enforcement notice to consumer).

Time limits. The former owner's right to payment under VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (1) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraphs (2) and (3) sentence 2 are subject to the general three years period of prescription provided by III.–7:201 (General period). As top details, especially as to commencement and suspension of this period on the ground of ignorance, see VIII.–5:201 Comment D. Accordingly, the proprietary security right practically created under the named provisions becomes ineffective (unenforceable) after three years from production or combination (or later, where suspension applies). This seems to be adequate, as the situation where the asset is encumbered is not prolonged eternally and, on the other hand, the former owner of the goods involved in production or combination will have a practically realistic period of time to enforce his right.

CHAPTER 6: PROTECTION OF OWNERSHIP AND PROTECTION OF POSSESSION

Section 1: Protection of ownership

VIII.–6:101: Protection of ownership

(1) The owner is entitled to obtain or recover possession of the goods from any person exercising physical control over these goods, unless this person has a right to possess the goods in the sense of VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor) in relation to the owner.

(2) Where another person interferes with the owner's rights as owner or where such interference is imminent, the owner is entitled to a declaration of ownership and to a protection order.

(3) A protection order is an order which, as the circumstances may require:

(a) prohibits imminent future interference;
(b) orders the cessation of existing interference;
(c) orders the removal of traces of past interference.

COMMENTS

A. General approach in Chapter 6

Legal remedies of owners and possessors. Chapter 6 of Book VIII determines which remedies are available to full owners of a movable and to parties who directly or indirectly exercise physical control over a movable (possessors, see VIII.–1:205 to VIII.–1:208) when another person interferes with their legally protected positions with respect to the movable.

Basic differences between remedies protecting ownership and remedies protecting possession. The protection of the legal position of an owner as a holder of the full right in rem with respect to the movable considerably differs from the protection of the legal position of a mere possessor: the first type of protection aims at a final solution of a legal dispute over a right in rem, it protects and enforces a permanent order with respect to the proprietary right of ownership; whereas the protection of possession is only of temporary nature, its main aim is to protect the former possessor and the owner against the negative consequences of unlawful infringements of the actual possession of a movable. It gives the possessor certain rights against the unlawful intruder: self-help, claim for recovery, protection order. Thereby, a person who wants to realize his or her claim to possess the movable is forced not to act unlawfully, on his or her own initiative, by simply taking away the movable from the actual possessor, but, instead, to enforce his/her claim in court. The rules on protection of possession thus promote the peaceful resolution of disputes over the right to possess a movable by use of court proceedings, and give the peaceful possessor, who has not acted unlawfully when obtaining his possession, the advantageous position of a respondent in a court litigation over the right to possess. For the relationship between the protection of ownership and the possession remedies see the Comment F.

B. Sources and scope of application

Sources and relation to other fields of law. The sources for the present Chapter consist mainly in the property law provisions of the European legal systems as they have been developed by literature and court decisions over the years. Occasionally, other fields of law must also be taken into consideration, especially the rules on civil procedure and non-contractual liability for damage of the EU Member States, as well as Book VI of the DCFR on Non-Contractual Liability Arising out of Damage Caused to Another.

C. Basic principles and guidelines of remedies

Obligatory rights to possess protected. The European legal systems vary as to the means of protection of ownership and possession. Whereas the common law systems treat the position of a possessor as a right with effect against third parties (in rem), the majority of the other systems recognize a restricted catalogue of rights in rem (like ownership, security rights, usufruct etc) which does not include mere possession. Nevertheless most of these systems afford to persons with an obligatory right (in personam) to exercise physical control over a movable ("limited-right-possessors" in the terminology of this Book) a special protection against third persons infringing that right which is similar to the protection afforded to the holder of a right in rem (e.g. the owner): namely remedies in tort, an entitlement to recovery and to protection orders against the third person. Thus, in these systems, the position of limited-right-possessors is protected as a "quasi-right in rem". The rules of Chapter 6 follow the majority trend in the Member States' legal systems in granting limited-right-possessors possessory remedies (VIII.–6:203, VIII.–6:204), as well as the partly rights-based remedies of VIII.–6:301 and VIII.–6:302 (better right to possess or better possession).

Types of remedies. With respect to the kinds of remedies available to a possessor we decided to follow the majority approach among the EU Member States and to depart from the minority Common Law approach (Great Britain, Ireland): In the Common Law systems no special remedies for the protection of ownership and possession are available, all infringements of the owner's/possessor's legal position are treated as torts. The only remedies available there are, therefore, tort remedies (in most cases damages in money, only in exceptional cases also recovery and the like). To the contrary, the continental legal systems provide remedies in tort when certain types of qualified possession are violated (especially in cases of proprietary rights to possess [e.g. ownership], of limited-right-possessors, who have a [limited proprietary or obligatory] right to possess the movable, and occasionally also in cases of persons acquiring by continuous possession) AND in addition particular ownership and possession remedies. (For the relationship between the protection of ownership and the possession remedies see Comment F.)

These latter remedies normally differ from tort law remedies in two ways: on the level of the prerequisites for the claim, they do not require any evidence of fault or negligence on the side of the violator, and on the level of the nature of remedies. The main remedies in this area are the recovery of the movable and a protection order against interferences with possession other than total dispossession. Money damages are only available under the torts provisions, but not in this field of law.

D. Terminology

Definition of possession. This Chapter is based on the definitions set out in Chapter 1 VIII.–1:205 – 1: Direct as well as indirect possession are recognized (VIII.–1:205). The owner-possessor (VIII.–1:206) is abbreviated by the letters "OP", the limited-right-possessor (VIII.–1:207) by "LRP", the possession-agent (VIII.–1:208) by "PA".

E. Possession as a "right", a "proprietary right" or a mere "factum"?

Legal nature of possession. The fact that certain legal remedies are made available to "possessors" to protect their position against intruders raises the question of the nature and character of the legally protected position, namely the "possession" or, in other words, the question of whether the positions of an owner-possessor, a limited-right-possessor and a possession-agent (see VIII.–2:205-2:208) can be qualified as an entitlement or right in rem (proprietary right) or, rather, as a mere factual position and not as a right, or as a mere obligatory right.

With regard to the intensity of protection of the positions of owners, owner-possessors, limited-right-possessors and possession-agents with respect to a movable one can distinguish between the following four types:

> (1) possession-agents: the only protection remedy available to them is immediate self-help (VIII.–6:202): The PA can act as a 'third person' in the sense of that article, thus helping the possessor to recover his movable immediately. All other remedies have to be exercised by the respective owner-possessor or limited-right-possessor.
> (2) owner-possessors in bad faith who are not owners and cannot acquire by acquisitive prescription (in good faith) as e.g. the thief: the protection remedies available to them are self-help (VIII.–6:202) and the possessory remedies of VIII.–6:203 and VIII.–6:204.
> (3) limited-right-possessors, potential acquirers by continuous possession in good faith and owners who do not or cannot provide evidence of their ownership right: the protection remedies available to them are self-help (VIII.–6:202), the possessory remedies of VIII.–6:203 and VIII.–6:204 and the partly rights-based remedies of VIII.–6:301 and VIII.–6:302 (better right to possession or better possession).
> (4) owners who can provide evidence of their ownership right: they are protected by all remedies of Chapter 6 (VIII.–6:101, 6:102, VIII.–6:202-6:204, VIII.–6:301-6:302) including the remedy of VIII.–6:101 of protection of ownership.

The last position 4 of owners is certainly a right in rem. Position 1 of a possession-agent is the weakest position of all; the protection of this position against third persons is minimal (self-help). It seems, therefore, not recommendable to qualify this position as a right in rem. Under our proposed terminology in VIII.–1:205-208 the possession-agent is not even a 'possessor'. Position 2 of the thief-possessor or owner-possessor in bad faith is protected only by the entitlement to self-help and the possessory remedies of VIII.–6:203 and VIII.–6:204 (with the restriction of VIII.–6:203 paragraph [3]). Position 2 will be defeated by every right to possess (positions 4 and 3: VIII.–6:101, VIII.–6:301, VIII.–6:302) and every better possession that was not acquired by theft or otherwise in bad faith (position 3: VIII.–6:301, VIII.–6:302). For the purposes of the Books of the CFR, it does not seem necessary to consider position 2 as a right in rem.

With respect to position 3 it can be stated that the protection is partly rights-based in the following sense:

> The limited-right-possessor may have a proprietary right to possess the movable (e.g. a security right), but he always has an obligatory right to hold the movable which he can assert against the possessor (owner) as well as against third persons who do not have a better right to possess (VIII.–6:301, VIII.–6:302).
> The potential acquirer by continuous possession in good faith has not yet acquired ownership, but he will acquire it after the lapse of the time period prescribed in Chapter 4. He, therefore, has a right in rem which is in the state of growth or in the pre-birth state (in statu nascendi) and which can be defended against third persons whose possession is of an inferior quality (VIII.–6:301, VIII.–6:302).

It has to be noted, however, that within position 3 the intensity of protection is stronger for the position of a limited-right-possessor than for that of a potential acquirer by continuous possession in good faith. The limited-right-possessor can assert his right to possess the movable even against the owner and any other person having no right to hold the movable, whereas the position of the potential acquirer by prescription will be defeated by the position of the owner or any right to hold (possess) the movable derived from the owner.

The respective "right" connected to position 3 is not as complete or comprehensive as the right of ownership, but, in some cases, it nevertheless seems to bear the characteristics of a right in rem. In a minority of legal systems the position of a possessor (LRP) having a right to possess (e.g. lessee, pledgee, storage) is right-out qualified as a right in rem. But the majority of legal systems provides legal protection for certain types of LRPs, especially those with a right not only to possess, but also to use the movable in their own interest, (sometimes also for the acquirer by continuous possession in good faith) that is very close to the protection of a proprietary right (in tort and property law).

The right of a lessee as an obligatory or proprietary right. Throughout all legal systems, irrespective of their dogmatic approach which either qualifies the right of a lessee as obligatory or proprietary, the resulting legal consequences for a lessee are almost the same. It would, therefore, be unproblematic to qualify the right of a lessee to possess and use the movable as a proprietary right (right in rem). This qualification would make sense for future private law codifications. It seems, however, not necessary for the purposes of the DCFR to determine the precise dogmatic category in which the right of a lessee does or should fall.

The proprietary concept (favoured by our working group) would mean that the right of the lessee to hold and use the movable would be treated like other limited rights in rem in a movable (as for instance security rights and usufruct rights). The proprietary right of the lessee would come into being when he obtains possession of the movable. This would mean that the lessee's right to possess and use the movable would have to be respected by subsequent buyers of the movable (good faith acquisition free of encumbrances requires the lessor to be in direct possession of the movable when he sells it). The lessee who leases from a non-owner would be able to acquire the proprietary right of lease under the general conditions for good faith acquisition in VIII.–3:101. The lessee's proprietary right would have priority over subsequent security rights of creditors and over the claims of general creditors of the lessor (buyer). According to IV.B.–7:101 (Change in ownership and substitution of lessor) paragraph (1) the contractual position of a lessee in possession of the goods remains essentially unchanged by the passing of ownership to a new owner.

F. General idea of VIII.–6:101

Protection of ownership in general. The law protects ownership and enforces ownership rights. This is a constitutional imposition in many countries, and is also established by the first additional protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights. The law grants a vast array of remedies aimed at enforcing ownership rights: specific property law remedies, tort remedies and can even give rise to administrative or criminal sanctions.

Resort to the protection of ownership may be necessary when there is an interference or trespass to the owner's legitimate enjoyment of the thing, and the owner needs to assert his right of exclusive enjoyment of the movable (ius excludendi omnes alios). Normally, the owner needs to resort to a court of law or other authority to enforce his right, though, in limited circumstances, he can resort to self-help or direct action in order to defend his right of ownership.

Protection of ownership and protection of possession. In most legal systems, an action for the protection of possession (VIII.–6:203, 6:204) is the easiest, quickest and most common path to protect one's ownership against dispossession or interferences. But the owner is always also free to bring an action for the recovery of possession or the protection against interferences based on his ownership right. The attractiveness for the owner of the claim based on his ownership right depends on the difficulties he may or may not have to bring sufficient evidence of his ownership right and also on the time he is able to invest in the litigation. In some legal systems, the requirements for the proof of ownership in the respective rules of civil procedure are quite strict (probatio diabolica), in others they are not (e.g. France). These rules intend to interfere with the procedural law of the Member States as little as possible and, therefore, leave the issues of proof of ownership to the legal systems of the Member States. In some legal systems, the protection of ownership concentrates on the protection of proprietary rights (ownership remedies); in others, the second track of protection of mere possession is more frequently used. These rules, therefore, provide for both tracks: ordinary litigation based on the proprietary right of ownership and simplified litigation based on possession.

This article contains the specific ownership remedies on the basis of the proprietary right of ownership. It provides for three different types of remedies: recovery, declaration of ownership, and protection order against interferences.

G. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Interests involved. A rule on the protection of ownership must strike a balance between the interests of the owner and those of the possessor exercising physical control over the movable. The interests of the owner are of foremost social and economical importance in a capitalistic society. Thus, the owner tends to enjoy a particularly strong position as regards the movable. His interests lie in a swift and certain recovery of the goods and public reassurance of his rights in the goods, according to a framework of certainty and stability regarding his property status. The major obstacle to the owner is the discharging of the burden of proof of ownership and identification of the movable.

The interests of the possessor are prima facie not as strong; however, they can be valued more highly than the interests of the owner in so far as the possessor has a right to hold the movable (that can be asserted successfully against the owner) based on a legal ground of a real (usufruct, security) or obligatory nature (lease, processing, loan, storage etc.). In addition, as the possessor is not always acting in bad faith, he may deserve some degree of protection, e.g. with regard to the ownership in the fruits of the movable and/or compensation for the costs incurred for reasonable improvements to the movable (see Chapter 7 of Book VIII).

H. Comparative analysis

(a) Remedies of the Owner

The dominant trend. The legal systems of PORTUGAL, SPAIN, ITALY, AUSTRIA, GERMANY and THE NETHERLANDS provide similar solutions and remedies regarding the protection of ownership. These systems contain two classes of remedies: (1) rei vindicatio, in which the claimant requests the prompt return of the goods and recovers possession, and (2) declaratory actions, whereby the claimant has his ownership recognised by a court of law and/or obtains the declaration of the inexistence of a right of ownership in the goods by the respondent and, in some cases, an injunction to refrain from further interference.

These systems differ slightly in several aspects:

- stringency of the burden of proof to be discharged by the claimant/owner;
- compensation regime of the possessor as regards fruits and improvements;
- compensation of losses incurred by the owner because of deprivation of possession (tort/unjustified enrichment);
- injunction mechanisms and interlocutory measures;
- limitation of actions.

The 'possession vaut titre' approach. In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBURG, the system of protection of ownership is quite different, due to the principle "en fait de meubles, la possession vaut titre", which creates a very strong presumption that the possessor is indeed the owner, and protects the possessor in good faith (but for lost or stolen movables) from actions for the protection of ownership. A rei vindicatio action ("revendication") is only possible against a possessor in bad faith or against a good faith possessor if the movable was lost or stolen. However, against the limited-right-possessor (LRP), the most likely path is an action based on the non-performance of the underlying contract.

Casuistic approach. In SWEDEN and other Nordic countries the regime of protection of ownership is also different. In the Swedish legal system there are no strict categories of actions, and the courts follow a case by case approach as to the protection of ownership, whose effects may include injunctions, interlocutory measures and summary proceedings.

Only tort remedies. In ENGLAND/WALES the common law does not provide any remedies other than those of tort law, consisting of the recovery of the market value of the thing and the losses relating to the interference. Only in exceptional cases, the courts will order the restitution of the movable to the owner.

(b) Limitation of actions

No limitation but for acquisition by continuous possession. In PORTUGAL, ITALY and AUSTRIA there is no limitation period for actions for the protection of ownership, unless someone else has obtained ownership of that movable through acquisition by continuous possession. This is in principle the case also in GERMANY, but only for the rei vindicatio action.

Other limitation periods.

SPAIN	6 years or less in case of adverse prescriptive acquisition
FRANCE, BELGIUM	30 years/3 years if the possessor is in good faith
NETHERLANDS	20 years
GERMANY	3 years (actio negatoria only)

(c) Preferred opinion

Reasons for the choices made by the working group. The working group opted for the dominant trend as regards the protection of ownership, consisting of three possible claims: recovery of the movable (actio rei vindicatio), declaration of ownership, and protection order against interferences by a third person. The latter remedy allows for several possible orders: prohibition of future interference, the cessation of an existing interference and removal of traces of past interferences. Several of these demands can be combined in one single protection order.

This system is the dominant approach in most countries and is the most likely to receive acceptance on a European scale.

As to the reasons for this choice, there follows an analysis of the "odd ones out", and an explanation of why the working team did not favour them.

In the possession vaut titre systems approach, though the person in possession of the movable enjoys a very strong position, the protection of ownership works in practice in a similar way to the "dominant" trend. In addition, the working team did not adopt the possession vaut titre principle for the possession system, and as such it would make no sense to adopt it here.

The approach of the common law, allowing tort remedies only, is also not followed, as it only provides indirect protection of the owner's rights. Specific property law remedies give the owner a faster, simpler, hurdle-free and more far-reaching protection than tort law, a fact that is justified by the interests connected to the particularly strong legal position of the owner regarding the movable, by the stability of rights in rem, as well as by the need of legal certainty as to who holds rights in the movable. In particular, tort remedies are insufficient for the prevention of future interference with the movable.

A casuistic approach such as in the Nordic systems would not be likely to conform to the interests of legal certainty and stability of property rights. Likewise, the approach of the common law restricting stringently the recovery of the movable would also hardly be acceptable on a European scale.

Finally, concerning the limitation of actions for the protection of ownership, they are limited under the terms of VIII.–4:201, concerning acquisition by continuous possession, as the former owner loses and the possessor acquires ownership.

I. VIII.–6:101(1): receipt and recovery of physical control

Illustration 1
A parked his bicycle in front of a store without locking it. B walks away with that bicycle. One year afterwards, A recognises his bicycle parked and locked in a watched parking lot. A is entitled to an action against B for the recovery of the physical control of the bicycle.

C sold his motorcycle to D; however, the bicycle is being repaired by E. C hands over the keys to D. E, however, refuses to deliver the motorcycle to D. D has an action against E in order to obtain possession of the bicycle.

Obtain and recover. VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1) is a specific property law remedy that entitles the owner, who is not in possession of the movable, to "recover" it. This is the classical actio rei vindicatio. This rule applies to cases where the owner was deprived of his possession. Situations, where the owner was never in (direct) possession of the movable, such as when ownership passed, but the movable is in possession of a third person (VIII.–2:105 paragraph [2]), or the movable stayed in the possession of the seller (VIII.–2:103), could be interpreted as situations, where the owner was in indirect possession of the movable already when the act of dispossession occurred. In these cases, a violating third party could be seen as dispossessing not only the direct possessor (seller or other), but also the owner as the indirect possessor of the movable. If, however, no dispossession by a third person occurred, but the third holder of the movable (VIII.–2:105 paragraph [2]) or the seller (VIII.–2:103) simply refuses to deliver the movable to the owner, even though his right to possess (keep) the movable has ended, the words "dispossession" and "recovery of possession" do not seem completely appropriate. To make it absolutely clear that also receipt of direct physical control of the owner for the first time is covered by VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1), the word 'obtain' was used in addition. VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1) in addition applies to cases where no dispossession of the owner ever occurred: E.g. the owner lost the movable, or he entrusted the movable to someone who refuses to give it back or who gave the movable to a third person.

Physical control. Instead of the words 'physical control' also the word 'possession' could be used. This follows from the definitions in VIII.–1:205-1:208. The words are synonymous in this context. The claim may be directed against a 'person exercising physical control' over the goods. This means that it may be directed against direct and indirect possessors of the movable (OPs and LRPs in the sense of VIII.–1:206 and 1:207) and against possession-agents (PAs, VIII.–1:208) who exercise this control on behalf of the possessor.

Claimant and respondent. The person entitled to the remedy of 6:101(1) (claimant) is the owner. He may have been in direct or indirect possession of the movable before and then been deprived of his possession by the other person (respondent). But 'dispossession' by the respondent is not a prerequisite for the claim. An owner who has lost his movable or whose movable has been stolen is entitled to claim back the movable from every current possessor who does not want to return it (finder, thief or other person without a right to possess the movable that can be asserted successfully against the owner). In these cases the owner was not "dispossessed" by the respondent. Respondent can be any person who exercises physical control over the movable, whether directly or indirectly, (OP or LRP) or a person who exercises physical control on behalf of a possessor as possession-agent (PA). No legal capacity or fault (negligence or other) on the side of the respondent are required.

Ownership: The owner bears the burden of correctly identifying the goods and of proving his ownership right in the goods. This may be, in the case of goods, a difficult burden to discharge, as most usually, transactions of movables are not documented in a written form, movables circulate quickly, are often mass-produced, and, as such, their identification can be difficult. If the time period prescribed in Chapter 4 for acquisition by continuous possession has elapsed, the proof of ownership can be discharged on that basis. The particular requirements for the proof of ownership are left to the provisions of the Member States.

> A must prove that he has bought the bicycle, and produces the receipt of its acquisition at a store as proof of ownership. Fortunately the receipt includes an accurate description of the bicycle, originally intended for guarantee purposes. In addition, A had had his name engraved in the frame. A should succeed in proving ownership of the bicycle in his claim against B.

Right to possess the movable. However, the owner is not entitled to recover or obtain possession against another person who has a valid right to possess the goods, such as a lease contract, a possessory pledge, an other possessory security right in the goods, or a right of retention, etc. The right to possess the movable must be binding on the owner, as e.g. when the owner concluded a contract of lease with the other person from which results a right to possess and use the movable. A right to possess the movable which is derived from a third person, as e.g. the thief of the movable, will generally not be binding on the owner, but only upon the thief. It can, therefore, not be used as a defence by the possessor of the movable against an action for recovery of the owner according to VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1).

The right to possess the movable is formulated as a defence. The burden of proof with respect to the existence of such right is, thus, placed on the holder of such right. The owner does not have to prove that no such right exists.

> F rents out a bicycle to G for 1 year. After 3 months F claims the restitution of the bicycle. The claim does not prevail, as G has a valid contractual right (lease) to possess the thing. Similarly, if H stored his bicycle at a storehouse and does not pay the deposit, the storehouse has a right to withhold delivery until payment is received.

Remedy of 'recovery' and damages. The legal consequences of the remedy of VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1) are the acknowledgement of the owner's property right in the movable and the recovery (or obtaining) of possession of the movable, i.e. the inescapable duty of the third person to restitute the movable, and, in some circumstances, also give adequate reparation under the provision of VIII.–6:401 and VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession).

A prevailed in his claim against B for recovery of the bicycle. He is acknowledged as the legitimate owner of the bicycle. B must therefore transfer the physical control of the bicycle to A. B might also be liable for damages.

J. VIII.–6:101(2): other interferences

Interference. VIII.–6:101(2) deals with other interferences with the owner's rights than the complete dispossession of the movable by the other person without a right to possess. It covers present, past and future inferences. Future interferences are only covered, if the interference is "imminent": this means that it is a clear that the interference will occur in the immediate future.

The provision also includes "imminent" dispossessions, because they can be considered as "interference with the owner's rights" as well (see also VIII.–6:202(1)).

Declaration and protection order. VIII.–6:101(2) entitles the owner to a declaration that he is the owner of the movable, and to a protection order. This protection order may prohibit ongoing or imminent acts of interference with the movable, including the removal of physical traces of the interference. This is similar to the classical notion of actio negatoria.

Illustration 6
A catches his neighbour B, on several occasions, red-handed trying to pick the lock of his valuable mountain bicycle and prevents him from succeeding in it. Though A remains in physical control over the bicycle, in order to assert his ownership and clear any doubts, he resorts to the action for declaration of ownership and prohibition of further interference.

Illustration 7
B shears several of A's sheep without A's permission.

B sometimes drives A's car without his permission.

Rare situation for movables. Mere interferences with the right of ownership are much less frequent and of much less practical importance in the field of movables than in the field of immovables. As demonstrated in the illustrations 6-8 above, they might nevertheless occur, and were, therefore, subjected to a regulation which is parallel to the regulation found in many Member States, at least in the field of immovable property.

Nature of 'interference'. 'Interferences' in the sense of this article are only physical interferences. Immaterial nuisances in the sense of VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by dangerous substances or emissions), such as noises, smells, radiation and other such emissions, are much more likely to affect immovables. Only in very rare circumstances such interferences could also cause detriment to movables.

K owns a top ranking racing horse. L regularly flies a helicopter near the stables where the horse is lodged. The noise produced by the helicopter can cause anxiety and stress to the horse, reducing his racing performance.

However, immaterial nuisances are generally not simple and exclusive interferences with movable property. In such cases, the rules on tort liability, as set out in Book VI, seem to provide adequate and appropriate remedies for the owner of the movable. A rule ordering L, in the above illustration, to stop the interference, namely to stop flying his helicopter over K's racing horse, would have to be qualified in many ways, because L's activity does not only relate to the movable, but also to K's land over which he flies, and to the reasons for which L flies his helicopter. A simple protection order, taking only into account that L interferes with the movable, would be too strict and simplistic, and, thus, seems inappropriate to deal with cases of immaterial interferences which can normally not be strictly reduced to the fact that they also cause interferences with the ownership in movables.

K. VIII.–6:101(3): Protection order

Types of protection orders. The protection order may include three types of demands:

(a) the prohibition of imminent future interference;

(b) the cessation of existing interference and

(c) removal of traces of past interference.

Several of these demands can be combined in one single protection order.

Future interference. Future interferences must be "imminent" in order to justify an order prohibiting future interferences: this means that it is clear that the interference will occur in the immediate future. See also the use of the word "impending" in VI.–1:102 (prevention: "Where legally relevant damage is impending, this Book confers on a person who would suffer the damage a right to prevent it. […]) and III.–3:504 (Termination for anticipated non-performance: […] "it is otherwise clear that there will be such a non-performance of the obligation"). In all these cases, there is a very high probability that the damage, non-performance or interference will occur. The provision also includes "imminent" dispossessions, because they can be considered as "interference with the owner's rights" as well (see also VIII.–6:202 paragraph [1]).

Existing interference. The protection order may also include the demand that presently still ongoing interferences have to be terminated (order of cessation of existing interference).

Past interference. Where an interference is in itself terminated, but "easily removable traces" of the interference are still left on the movable of the owner, the protection order will also extend to these removable traces and order that they must be removed by the interferer. It must be noted here, that the terms 'removal of traces' was used here in the sense of 'easily' removable traces in order to distinguish it from 'damage' that was inflicted on the movable. The reparation of damages in money or otherwise is regulated in Book VI and cannot become part of a protection order. As opposed to "damage", which results in a destruction or change of parts of the substance of the movable, 'removable traces' are physical objects that are left on the movable as a result of the interference without causing damage to the substance of the movable, like e.g. dust, dirt or mud. They can be easily removed because they do not effect the substance of the movable. The 'removable' traces are considered to be part of the interference itself, their removal is not difficult and is a much less severe remedy than the reparation of damage to the substance of the movable. It was, therefore, considered to be adequate to grant this remedy together with the other demands of the protection order, also in view of the fact that the requirements for the protection order are less strict than the requirements for the reparation of damage, especially with respect to the fault or negligence requirement, which does not form part of VIII.–6:101. In many legal systems, the removal of physical objects that are left on the property as a result of the interference (in German "Beseitigungsanspruch"), is a well known remedy in the field of protection of ownership and possession of land (immovables) and is partly also extended to movables. It is, however, clear that this remedy is of much less practical importance in the field of movables than in the field of immovables.

N sometimes uses his neighbour M's car without his authorisation. M requires the declaration of his ownership right in the car, as well as the termination of an ongoing interference (N has taken the car for already one day and has not returned it yet), the prohibition of future interference (M fears that otherwise N will "borrow" his car repeatedly) and that N cleans the car, as it is usually soiled, muddy and dirty after N's excursions with the car.

Interferer has removed fruits or other objects from the movable. In addition, it can happen that the interferer takes away something from the movable. Such situations are covered by VIII.–Chapter 7.

Illustration 11
N has taken away five of M's sheep without authorisation. N shears the five sheep he has taken away from M and some other of M's sheep which stay on M's premises. N is obliged to restore M's five sheep according to VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1), to terminate ongoing interferences and to abstain from future interferences (if they are imminent) in accordance with VIII.–6:101 paragraph (2). And N will have to restore the wool or its value in accordance with the provisions of Chapter 7 of Book VIII.

L. Relationship to other parts of the DCFR

Relationship to other rules. VIII.–6:101 and 6:102 deal only with specific property law remedies. The remedies under Book VI on Non-Contractual Liability Arising out of Damage Caused to Another and in particular under VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) are granted in addition to these remedies (see VIII.–6:401).

Some rights to possess or retain can be found in other parts of the DCFR:

- III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation)

- IV.B.–3:101 (Availability of goods) (providing that the lessor of goods has the duty to enable the lessee to obtain physical control of the goods);

- IV.C.–5:106 (Payment of the price) paragraph (2) (providing that a storer of goods may withhold the goods until the client pays the price);

- IV.C.–5:110 (Liability of the hotel-keeper) paragraph (6) (providing that a hotel-keeper may withhold the luggage of the client until the client pays for the service).

M. Character of the rules

Nature of rules. VIII.–6:101 and 6:102 are mandatory rules.

VIII.–6:102: Recovery of goods after transfer based on invalid or avoided contract or other juridical act

(1) Where goods are or have been transferred based on a contract or other juridical act which is invalid or avoided, the transferor may exercise the right of recovery under paragraph (1) of the preceding Article in order to recover physical control of the goods.

(2) Where the obligation of the transferee to restore the goods to the transferor, after a transfer based on an invalid or avoided contract or other juridical act, is one of two reciprocal obligations which have to be performed simultaneously, the transferee may, in accordance with III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligation), withhold performance of the obligation to restore the goods until the transferor has tendered performance of, or has performed, the transferor's reciprocal obligation.

(3) The preceding paragraphs also apply where the transfer was based on a contract or other juridical act subject to a resolutive condition in the sense of VIII.–2:203 (Transfer subject to condition or time limit) paragraph (1) and this condition is fulfilled.

COMMENTS

A. Restitution of movable if obligation is invalid, ineffective or avoided

Obligatory and proprietary claim for recovery. VIII.–6:102 paragraph (1) clarifies that, in the case of an unsuccessful transfer of the goods based on a contract or other juridical act which is invalid or avoided, the owner will be able to choose between his obligatory claim to recover the movable from the transferee (following from contract law or the law of unjustified enrichment) and his proprietary claim of recovery based on his right of ownership in the sense of VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1).

Contract or other juridical act invalid or avoided. This provision refers to VIII.–2:202, which distinguishes between two different consequences of the invalidity or cancellation of a contract or underlying other juridical act of the transfer of a movable: (a) If the underlying contract (juridical act) is invalid from the beginning, or it was 'avoided' (e.g. for mistake) later on, this has the effect that the ownership is deemed to have never passed to the transferee. In all these cases, the claim for recovery of the movable based on the owner's proprietary right of ownership according to VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1) is available to the owner (as an alternative to his right to claim recovery on an obligatory basis). (b) If the underlying contract or other juridical act is 'terminated' in the sense of Book III, or terminated as a consequence of a 'withdrawal' in the sense of Book II, or revoked in the sense of Book IV (donation), there is no retro-active proprietary effect nor is ownership retransferred immediately. Thus, the transferee remains the owner of the transferred movable. The right of recovery under VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1) is not available to the transferor in these cases, because he is no longer the owner of the movable.

B. Right to withhold the goods

Right to withhold performance of the obligation to restore. VIII.–6:102 paragraph (2) deals with cases in which VIII.–6:102 paragraph (1) is applicable and the obligation of the transferee to restore the movable to the transferor/owner (based on an obligatory or a proprietary right of the owner) is linked to a reciprocal obligation of the transferor/owner owed to the transferee which has to be performed simultaneously. VIII.–6:102 paragraph (2) provides that the bond of simultaneous performance between the two reciprocal obligations extends also to the claim of the owner based on his ownership according to VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1). This rule applies when simultaneous performance of two reciprocal obligations is owed in accordance with III.–2:104. The bond of simultaneous performance leads to the consequences of III.–3:401: namely the right of the transferee to withhold his performance (here restoration of the movable to the transferor/owner based on VIII.–6:101 paragraph [1]) until the transferor/owner has performed his obligation or has tendered performance. In accordance with III.–3:401 paragraph (2) this right to withhold can be also exercised by the transferee as long as it is clear that there will be a non-performance by the transferor/owner of his reciprocal obligation when his performance becomes due.

C. Resolutive condition

Application to resolutive condition in the sense of VIII.–2:203 paragraph (1). VIII.–2:203 paragraph (1) determines the effect of a so-called 'resolutive condition' that is included by the parties in their contract of sale or in another contract or juridical act that underlies the transfer of ownership. If the parties do not provide otherwise, such a resolutive condition has the effect that ownership is re-transferred automatically at the point in time when the condition is fulfilled. This means that, unlike in cases of an invalid or avoided contract, ownership is not re-transferred with a retro-active effect, but only with an effect ex nunc (from now on). Nevertheless, this effect conveys immediate ownership on the transferor. Thus he will be able to use this ownership as a basis for his claim of recovery of the movable in the sense of VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1). Therefore, VIII.–6:102 paragraph (3) provides that the case of a resolutive condition must be treated just like cases of invalid or avoided contracts or other juridical acts.

Section 2: Protection of mere possession

VIII.–6:201: Definition of unlawful dispossession and interference

A person depriving the possessor of possession or interfering with that possession acts "unlawfully" under this Section, if the person acts without the consent of the possessor and the dispossession or interference is not permitted by law.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Central idea of 'unlawfulness'. The main aim of the provisions of Section 2 is to protect a possessor against 'unlawful' dispossession and against other 'unlawful' interferences with his possession, which do not amount to complete dispossession. Thus, the three legal remedies granted to possessors in VIII.–6:202 – 6:204 (self-help, recovery, and protection order) share one common requirement: the 'unlawfulness' of the dispossession or interference undertaken by the other person, against whom the remedies are directed. Therefore, the term 'unlawful' is defined in the first article of Section 2.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Possession remedies. The regime of special possession protection remedies of Section 2 aims at protecting possessors by providing simple and quick means to regain their possession or to stop unlawful interferences. These remedies, as all other remedies of private law, have to be enforced in a legal proceeding before a competent court or other public authority, as is the case in VIII.–6:203 and 6:204, in order to provide a reasonable protection also to the interests of the other person, against whom the remedies are directed. VIII.–6:202 (self-help) allows only one narrow exception to that general principle of rights enforcement. In this case, the protection of the interests of the other person is taken into account by requiring an immediate and proportionate action in relation to the unlawful infringement of the claimant's possession.

C. Comparative overview

Comparative overview. In certain legal systems (e.g. Austria, Germany, Switzerland, Greece) the assertion of possession remedies of whichever nature explicitly requires an initiative of the interferer/dispossessor which is unlawful and against the will of the possessor (in German "verbotene Eigenmacht"). In France and Belgium, although the possessory remedies are suitable only for the protection of real estate, the facts giving rise to such remedies usually consist in the so-called "trouble possessoire", which is every action affecting or menacing one's exercise of possession rights. In general terms, the enactment of possession remedies is usually triggered by actions which are objectively regarded as affecting, in a negative way, one's possession over a movable and there is no cause justifying them, like e.g. the possessor's consent or imposition by law.

D. Acting without the possessor's consent unless permitted by law

Consent. Any dispossession or interference with possession is considered "unlawful" if it is undertaken against the will, or in other words, "without the consent" of the possessor and if it is not permitted by law. Normally, the consent of the direct possessor will suffice to make the intervention of the other person legal. In some situations the consent of the indirect possessor may also be sufficient, especially if the indirect possessor, with respect to his relationship to his direct possessor, has the right to allow the intervention of the other person: e.g. the lessee (who is an LRP according to VIII.–1:207) gives his consent to the interference with his direct possession by a third person. If thereby the position of the owner (lessor) is not infringed (interfered with), no consent of the owner is needed.

Can a mere interior change of mind amount to an 'unlawful' dispossession? Usually the dispossession (or interference) is an exterior physical act, meaning that the other person actively takes away or interferes with the movable. But the provision also includes the 'unlawful' mere interior change of mind of a person who is already in possession of the movable, if (exterior) evidence for this change of mind can be produced: Such a change of mind is unlawful, for instance, in case of an LRP (VIII.–1:207) who decides to possess the movable like an owner (VIII.–1:206) and to refuse the return of the movable to the lessor after the term of the lease has expired. The same applies to the employee of the owner or the finder (PA of the owner: VIII.–1:208) of a movable who decides to keep the movable as an OP (VIII.–1:206) and not to give it back to the owner.

The reason for this is that such an LRP or finder (PA) acts without the consent of the possessor when he deprives this possessor of his possession: When the LRP or PA decides to act further on as an OP himself, he denies the former OP's indirect (or direct) possession and, thus, no longer possesses for the latter, but for himself. This change of mind of the LRP or PA leads to a dispossession of the former OP by depriving him of his indirect (or direct) possession without his consent. A finder who never had the intention to hold the movable for the owner (or other former holder) – in comparison to a finder who initially was in good faith (PA) and later on changed his mind – cannot be literally said to dispossess the owner by a change of mind, because in such a case the owner lost possession and never regained it by means of an honest finder (PA). However, this case should not be treated any differently with respect to the means of possessory protection that are available to the (former) possessor against an unlawful dispossessor or interferer. Thus also such a finder is considered to act unlawfully in the sense of VIII.–6:201, as well.

No right of self-help without exterior physical act. It must be noted here, that the possessory remedies which require an unlawful dispossession or interference by the other person are, in principle, the following: self-help (VIII.–6:202), recovery (VIII.–6:203) and protection order (VIII.–6:204). The right of self-help is, however, restricted to exterior physical acts of dispossession and interference, and does not include a dispossession by the mere change of mind of the current possessor, as described in the paragraph above. The reason for that is that the physical reaction of self-help can only be defined and justified as a reaction to a real physical attack to the possession of the movable. An exterior physical reaction of self-help to a mere interior change of mind cannot be considered proportionate from the outset. Example: A lessee refuses to return the movable after the period of the lease has expired. The lessor cannot simply go to the lessee and take the movable away from him against his will. He will have to seek enforcement of his right to recovery of the movable in court: either on the basis of VIII.–6:203, VIII.–6:101 or on the basis of his contractual remedies.

Permission by law. A dispossession or interference without the consent of the possessor will be considered 'unlawful' only if it is not permitted by some other provision(s) of law. Such right or permission to dispossess or interfere without the possessor's consent will usually be based on public law: e.g. judicial execution proceedings, expropriation by public law. With respect to rights arising out of a private law relationship (e.g. contractual rights) the person acting against the will of the current possessor will not act 'unlawfully', as long as his course of action complies with the prerequisites of self-help (VIII.–6:202), which also constitutes a permission by the law. Outside the narrow limits of self-help, a person who claims possession based on a provision of private law such as, for instance, a contractual right or an ownership right to possess the movable, is not allowed to dispossess the current possessor of a movable on his own initiative, but is required to enforce his entitlement in a court proceeding. Consequently, any 'private' dispossession or interference against the will of the current possessor will be considered 'unlawful' despite the obligatory or proprietary right of the dispossessor or interferer to possess the movable.

E. Character of the rule

Mandatory rule. The rule is mandatory; any default rule in this field would inevitably render the cases of dispossession/interference with one's possession unbearably ambiguous and would therefore confine the scope of application of possessory protection and diminish its efficiency.

VIII.–6:202: Self-help of possessor

(1) A possessor or a third person may resort to self-help against another person who unlawfully deprives the possessor of possession of the goods, or who otherwise unlawfully interferes with that possession, or whose act of unlawful dispossession or interference is imminent.

(2) The means of self-help are limited to such immediate and proportionate action as is necessary to regain the goods or to stop or prevent the dispossession or interference.

(3) Under the restrictions of paragraphs (1) and (2) self-help may be also directed against an indirect owner-possessor who unlawfully deprives the limited-right-possessor of possession or interferes with that possession in violation of the specific legal relationship between owner-possessor and limited-right-possessor. This rule applies equally to an indirect limited-right-possessor who unlawfully deprives the other limited-right-possessor of possession or interferes with that possession.

(4) Where a person in the exercise of a right of self-help conferred by this Article causes legally relevant damage to the person depriving the possessor of possession or interfering with that possession, VI.–5:202 (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity) applies.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Situations addressed in this Article. The self-help regulation in possessory protection aims at providing a quick remedy that will be able to avert recourse to judicial measures, provided that the persons entitled to it are in a position to react promptly and proportionately and wish to do so. Self-help follows from the very character of possession as a temporary order for regulating relationships concerning movables in contrast to proper rights in rem.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Aim and restrictions of self-help. The main aim of the provision of VIII.–6:202 is to protect the interests of a possessor who is unlawfully deprived of his possession or whose possession is otherwise unlawfully disturbed. The possessor may resort to immediate action to protect his possession. The interests of the other person who unlawfully interferes with the possessor's possession are safeguarded by the strict limits to which the possessor's right of self-help is subjected, namely the requirements of immediate and proportionate action necessary under the circumstances to prevent or stop the interference.

The view that, under certain circumstances, the victim of an unlawful infringement of possession cannot be reasonably expected to wait for public authorities or the courts to protect his interest in the movable, but may have to resort to self-help measures is expressed by the defences granted to possessors and owners by the European legal systems in the fields of criminal law and torts. These defences are available if the possessor, in the course of the (proportionate) protection of his interests in the movable, causes some damage or harm to the aggressor or the aggressor's property. The possessory self-help remedy is a consequent continuation of this view in the field of property law. The possessor, who catches the thief red-handed and dispossesses the thief, may not even inflict any harm upon the thief in doing so. Under these circumstances, the (former) possessor's act of dispossession cannot be considered 'unlawful' in the sense of VIII.–6:201, but should be permitted by the law. This permission is provided in VIII.–6:202. If the (former) possessor inflicts any additional harm upon the thief, his act of dispossession will only be permitted under the restrictions of VIII.–6:202 paragraph (2). These restrictions are again in line with the criminal law and tort law defences of self-help: If the reaction of the former possessor in the protection of his interests in the movable is not proportionate, it will not constitute a defence against his criminal or tort law liability vis-à-vis the thief.

C. Comparative overview

Different approaches in European legal systems. Self-help in the context of protection of possession is not specifically regulated in all European legal systems. Specific possessory regulation of self-help can be found e.g. in Germany, Austria, Greece, Portugal, Hungary, Latvia, and the Czech Republic. But generally the recourse to the general self-help rights as provided by civil law or criminal law is not precluded. Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, French and Belgian law make no reference to emergency rights with respect to possession protection, whereas English law is particularly cautious with affirming such a possibility. In those legal systems, where possessory self-help is separately regulated, it is controversial whether it should be treated as a specific emanation of the general regulation of self-help or as a specific regulation (with whichever implications this may have for the scope of application of each). Usually, the specific possessory self-help remedies are considered as autonomous regulations, and not all prerequisites set by the general rules must be observed, though some may apply. Some common traits can be noted: Where self-help is permitted, the self-help reaction of the possessor must abide by a certain standard of necessity and be reasonable and proportionate to the damage inflicted. Self-help is permitted only within explicitly strict time limits.

D. Persons entitled to self-help

Possessors and third persons may exercise self-help. Self-help may be exercised by all categories of 'possessors' of a movable in the sense of VIII.–1:205-208: owner-possessors and limited-right-possessors, whether direct or indirect possessors, as well as by third parties wishing to help someone defend his property or possession. Possession-agents (VIII.–1:208) are not 'possessors' themselves, but they can react in self-help as 'third persons' in the sense of VIII.–6:202 paragraph (1). This wide personal scope was chosen due to the characteristic of self-help as an immediate reaction to dispossession/interference or to an attempt to dispossess/interfere. It certainly would not be practical, if the LRPs or PAs in cases of dispossession and the like had to contact their OP and ask him to take the necessary measures for self-help. In most cases the OP would arrive much too late for immediate and necessary reactions. The wide personal scope serves the best interest of all three categories of persons: the OP, the LRP and the PA. The OP maintains his (direct or indirect) control over the object, the LRP remains able to hold the object and either use it as agreed or return it to the OP according to their agreement, the PA continues exercising his duties with respect to his employer or other OP/LRP. Furthermore, allowing a third person to act in protection of one's possession (of whichever kind) renders the protection accorded by those provisions more effective. This extension to third persons is in accordance with the provision on self-defence in VI.–5:202, which also allows a third person to act in protection of the legitimate interests of a person other than himself.

E. Persons against whom self-help is directed

Past, present or imminent dispossession or interference. The person against whom the self-help may be directed is a person who unlawfully (in the sense of VIII.–6:201) dispossesses the possessor or otherwise interferes with his possession or whose act of unlawful dispossession or interference is imminent. In accordance with VIII.–6:101 paragraph (2) an act is imminent, when it is clear that the dispossession or interference will occur in the immediate future. See also the use of the word 'impending' in VI.–1:102 (prevention: "Where legally relevant damage is impending, the Book confers on a person who would suffer the damage a right to prevent it. […]) and III.–3:504 (anticipated non-performance: […] "it is clear that there will be a fundamental non-performance"). In all these cases, there is a very high probability that the damage, non-performance or interference will occur.

The reason to include imminent dispossessions and interferences was the following: In this stage the dispossession or interference can often be averted by means which involve only a minor degree of force, whereas it might be much harder for the (former) possessor to reverse a dispossession (or stop an interference) that already occurred. In the light of this observation, it seems unreasonable to force the possessor whose dispossession is imminent to refrain from any defence reaction until the dispossession actually occurs. If the possessor can prevent the dispossession or interference, before it occurs, with proportionate means (see point F. below), he should be allowed to do that, instead of having to wait for the actual occurrence of the unlawful act, which probably can be stopped only by a considerably stronger reaction than the proportionate defence reaction to an imminent intrusion.

Unlawful act. The act of the person must be 'unlawful' in the sense of VIII.–6:201 (see Comment D to VIII.–6:201). However, the defence reaction of self-defence requires by its nature (real action and re-action) an exterior physical act by the intruder, a visible act directed against the defending possessor's possession. A mere change of mind of an LRP or PA who is already in possession of the movable without an additional physical act of dispossession or interference will not suffice as a basis for self-defence. The reason for that is that the physical reaction of self-help can only be defined and justified as a reaction to a real physical attack to the possession of the movable. An exterior physical reaction of self-help to a mere interior change of mind cannot be considered proportionate from the outset.

> Illustration
> A lessee refuses to return the movable after the period of the lease has expired. The lessor cannot simply go to the lessee and take the movable away from him against his will. He will have to seek enforcement of his right to recovery of the movable in court: either on the basis of VIII.–6:203, 6:101 or on the basis of his contractual remedies.

Fault and legal capacity. The unlawful dispossession or interference does not require any fault (negligence or other) on the part of the acting person. No legal capacity of the person is required, because the dispossession or interference is not a legal act, but a factual act.

F. Restrictions on self-help in VIII.–6:202 paragraph (2)

Restrictions in general. The act of self-help must be an immediate and proportionate reaction in view of the particular circumstances of the case. If the act is not immediate and proportionate in the sense of VIII.–6:202 paragraph (2), the act of the defence of the (former) possessor is itself an unlawful dispossession or interference with the possession of the other person, and will trigger all the consequences of an unlawful dispossession or interference as laid down in Book VIII Chapter 6 and other Books.

Immediate action. The act of self-help must be "immediate": This means that the (former) possessor's defence must be a quick reaction to the unlawful dispossession or interference that occurred. The classical case is that the (former) possessor catches the dispossessor or interferer red-handed and immediately intervenes to regain his full possession. When the act of dispossession is already completed in the sense that the dispossessor has already brought the movable to a safe place after the unlawful dispossession and he is no longer fleeing with his loot, any later self-help action is precluded because it is no longer an immediate reaction. After an interference has been terminated, no self-help right exists. For future dispossessions and interferences the unlawful act must still be imminent. Without that no self-help right exists.

The time frame of immediate reaction depends on two factors: (a) the time when the defending possessor acquires knowledge of the dispossession or interference, and (b) the objective limitation of the time frame irrespective of the defender's knowledge of the unlawful intrusion. (a) When the defending possessor becomes aware of the interference/dispossession, he must react immediately. When he reacts to an ongoing interference or completed dispossession, of which he has been informed from the very start, only several days after he has become aware of it, his reaction will no longer be immediate. (b) If the defending possessor does not become aware of the unlawful intrusion before the dispossession is completed or the interference terminated, he has no prolonged right of self-help, but his late reaction will be unlawful because of lack of immediacy. He has no other right than to claim recovery of the movable or a protection order against the interference in a court proceeding.

Proportionate action. The proportionality requirement set out by VIII.–6:202 paragraph (2) provides for a double restriction of the self-help reaction:

> the defending possessor's action must be proportionate and
> he may use no action of a higher degree of force than is necessary to regain his full possession (or avert the imminent intrusion).

The determination has to be made with regard to the particular circumstances of the case.

The proportionality of a defence reaction depends, in large parts, on the value of the movable, and on the seriousness of the infringement (as for instance the degree of force that is used by the other person and whether the other person's interference is rather harmless and restricted or results in a full dispossession). If the value of movable is low, or if the infringement is harmless, there will exist no extra-judicial self-help reaction that can be considered proportionate, altogether. In such a case, the question of necessity of the means does not arise at all.

The requirement of necessity to stop or avert the intrusion must not be misunderstood in the sense that the means necessary to stop a particular intrusion is also always a lawful and proportionate means. Only if more than one proportionate means to stop or avert the intrusion exist in the particular case, the right to self-help is limited to those or to the means that are or is necessary to stop or avert the intrusion. This means that the self-defender must choose the means which least interferes with the interests of the other person. The self-defender may not resort to a higher degree of force than is necessary to stop or avert the intrusion.

This means that the defending possessor's reaction may be unlawful mainly for two reasons:

The circumstances are such that all extra-judicial means necessary to regain full possession (or to avert the imminent intrusion) would be disproportionate. Then the defending possessor does not have the right to react in self-defence (e.g. he could only stop the thief by inflicting serious physical harm to the latter). The question of whether a means is necessary to stop or avert the intrusion does not arise.

The circumstances may be such that several extra-judicial means to stop the interference or to regain full possession are available to the defending possessor. In this case, the defending possessor may only resort to the particular means that is the least harmful to the intruder and still helps to stop the intrusion. If he chooses any other means, his reaction will be considered unlawful.

When determining the proportionality of the defence action in the above described sense, the possibility of the defending possessor to turn to the competent public authority (e.g. police) or the courts for help has to be taken into account. If the circumstances are such that it can be reasonably expected from the defending possessor to turn to these authorities for help instead of taking action himself, because this would constitute a reasonable means to regain full possession (or avert the intrusion), any self-defence would be disproportionate.

G. Self-help by the direct possessor against the indirect possessor (VIII.–6:202(3))

Relationship between OP and LRP. VIII.–6:202(3) makes clear that an LRP may not only exercise his right of self-help against 'third persons', but also against the indirect OP or LRP (as e.g. the lessor) who violates the (direct) LRP's contractual or proprietary right to possess the movable. When the indirect OP (or LRP) dispossesses the direct LRP or interferes with the latter's possession he commits a breach of his legal relationship with the direct LRP which gives the LRP the right to possess the movable. The direct LRP can make use of the remedies for breach of contract, but he may also resort to the possession remedies of VIII.–6:202-6:204. The latter remedies will enable the direct LRP to defend his possession and enforce his right to possess in a quicker and more efficient way than by the recourse to the remedies for breach of contract.

The fact that the indirect OP or LRP has a contractual (or other legal) duty to respect the right of possession of the direct LRP does not exclude the idea that this duty cannot only be enforced by contractual (or other obligation-related) remedies in a court proceeding, but also by the quicker and more efficient possessory remedies of VIII.–6:202-6:204. On the contrary, a contractual relationship creates a regime of particular duties between the parties which have to be respected and complied with in good faith, whereas such elevated regime of duties, respect and trust does not exist between persons outside a contractual relationship. It, therefore, seems adequate and just to grant the efficient possessory regime of sanctioning infringements of possession not only as a means of protection against third intruders (extra-contractual), but also against intrusions by a person who has the contractual duty to respect the possessor's right to possess the movable.

Different approaches in European legal systems. The European legal systems are divided on the point of whether the particular possession protection remedies should also be made available to the direct LRP to defend his right to possess the movable against the person (indirect OP, LRP) from whom he derives this right: Some exclude these rights and thus restrict the direct LRP to the remedies for breach of contract, whereas the majority of legal systems seems to allow such exercise of the possession remedies. The rule follows this majority trend for the above-mentioned reasons.

Possession-agents. VIII.–6:202(3) excludes the PA who does not have a right of his own to possess the movable in his own interest. The PA has a right of self-help against intruders as a 'third person', but not against a dispossession or interference by his OP or LRP. The PA's right to react against third persons in self-help is an efficient means to protect the legitimate interests of the person for whom he holds the movable (OP or LRP) against any third intruders. The PA is in possession of the movable, whereas his OP or LRP is not. It will, therefore, be the PA who is the first to discover the (imminent) dispossession or interference and the first (and probably only one) who is able to take immediate and proportionate action against the intrusion.

H. Relation to other parts of the DCFR

VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damages caused by dangerous substances or emissions): 'Immaterial' interferences such as those mentioned in VI.–3:206 – radiation, smells, heat, light etc.– are very rare in the area of movables; they mainly affect the enjoyment and possession of immovable property. The remedy of a liability for damages as set out in VI.–3:206, therefore, seems to offer sufficient protection for the owner or LRP of a movable.

VI.–5:202 (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity): VIII.–6:201 paragraph (4) is of merely declaratory nature: it stresses that, if in the process of self-help the defending possessor causes legally relevant damage in the sense of tort law (VI.–2:201) to the other person, VI.–5:202 which provides a specific defence against liability in tort, will apply. According to VI.–5:202, an action of self-defence constitutes a defence against liability in tort, if the defender acts 'in reasonable protection of a right or of an interest worthy of legal protection of' himself or a third if the person suffering the damage is accountable for endangering the right or interest protected. Ownership and possession of a movable can be considered 'interests worthy of legal protection'. A person unlawfully dispossessing the defender or interfering with his possession 'endangers' this right/interest. The requirement of 'reasonable protection' is similar to or congruent with the proportionality test of the self-help action set out in VIII.–6:202 paragraph (2). Therefore, a possessor or third person acting within the limits of VIII.–6:202 in defending his possession when he causes legally relevant damage to the intruder will be exempted from liability on the basis of VI.–5:202.

I. Character of the rule

Mandatory rule. The rule is of a mandatory nature. Of course, the (former) possessor can always waive or not use his right of self-help.

VIII.–6:203: Entitlement to recover as protection of mere possession

(1) Where another person unlawfully deprives an owner-possessor or a limited-right-possessor of possession, the possessor is, within the period of one year, entitled to recover the goods, irrespective of who has the right or better position in terms of VIII.–6:301 (Entitlement to recover in case of better possession) to possess the goods. The period of one year starts to run at the time of dispossession.

(2) The right to recover may also be directed against an indirect owner-possessor who unlawfully deprives the limited-right-possessor of possession in violation of the specific legal relationship between them. This rule applies equally to an indirect limited-right-possessor who unlawfully deprives the other limited-right-possessor of possession.

(3) The right to recover is excluded if the person seeking to exercise it unlawfully deprived the other person of possession within the last year.

(4) Where the other person in the sense of paragraph (1) invokes an alleged right or better position in terms of VIII.–6:301 (Entitlement to recover in case of better possession) to possess the goods as a defence or counter-claim, the obligation to return the goods according to paragraph (1) may be replaced by an obligation to hand the goods over to the court or other competent public authority, or to a third person pursuant to an order of the competent authority.

VIII.–6:204: Entitlement to protection order to protect mere possession

(1) Where another person unlawfully interferes with the possession of goods or such interference or an unlawful dispossession is imminent, the owner-possessor or the limited-right-possessor is, within the period of one year, entitled to a protection order under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (3), irrespective of who has the right or better position in terms of VIII.–6:301 (Entitlement to recover in case of better possession) to possess, use or otherwise deal with the goods. The period of one year starts to run from the time when the interference began or, in cases of repeated interferences, from the time when the last interference began.

(2) The protection order may also be directed against an indirect owner-possessor who unlawfully interferes with the possession of a limited-right-possessor in violation of the specific legal relationship between them. This rule applies equally to an indirect limited-right-possessor who unlawfully interferes with the possession of a subsidiary limited-right-possessor in violation of the specific legal relationship between them.

(3) Where the other person in the sense of paragraph 1 invokes an alleged right or better position to possess, use or otherwise deal with the goods as a defence or counter-claim, the court order may be suspended until, or replaced by, a decision on the existence of such alleged right or better position.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Claim for recovery and protection order. The remedies provided in cases of unlawful dispossession or other unlawful interference with one's possession can be divided into two types depending on which form of possession infringement is at hand: entitlement to recovery, if possession was entirely removed, and protection order against interference for all other forms of interference with possession that do not reach as far as complete dispossession. The distinction between those two types of remedies is found in the majority of legal systems in the Member States (though the said remedies do not always apply to movables).

Protection of ownership and protection of possession. Chapter 6 distinguishes between two main categories of remedies: possessory protection remedies (VIII.–6:202 - 6:204) and protection remedies based on the right of ownership (VIII.–6:101). The protection of the legal position of an owner as a holder of the full right in rem with respect to the movable considerably differs from the protection of the legal position of a mere possessor (possessory remedies): the first type of protection aims at a final solution of a legal dispute over a right in rem, it protects and enforces a permanent order with respect to the proprietary right of ownership.

Aims and functions of particular possession remedies. The protection of possession is only of temporary nature, its main aim being to protect the former possessor and the owner against the negative consequences of unlawful infringements of the actual possession of a movable. The rules on protection of possession give the possessor certain rights against the unlawful intruder: self-help, claim for recovery, protection order. Thereby, a person who wants to realize his claim to possess the movable is forced not to act unlawfully, on his own initiative, by simply taking away the movable from the actual possessor but, instead, to enforce his claim in court. The rules on protection of possession thus promote the peaceful resolution of disputes over the right to possess a movable by use of court proceedings, they restrict private force, and give the peaceful possessor, who has not acted unlawfully (VIII.–6:201) when obtaining his possession, the advantageous position of a respondent in court litigation over the right to possess. For the relationship between the protection of ownership and the possession remedies see also Comment F to VIII.–6:101.

Right to possess is not a requirement. The phrase 'irrespective of his or the other person's right or better position [...] to possess the movable' was inserted to clarify that the possessory entitlement does not touch the merits or final outcome of a case with respect to the underlying rights to possess. The right to possess the movable or a 'better possession' in the sense of VIII.–6:301 is not taken into account here. The main subject of the possessory remedies is the unlawful act that infringes the possession of the possessor (private force), irrespective of the underlying rights of the parties to possess the movable. The former possessor only has to prove his possession and the unlawful violation of his possession by the other person. If the other person raises a defence or counter-claim based on his better right or position to possess the movable, VIII.–6:203 paragraph (4) applies. Then the court will deal with the question of the right to possess, but the respondent cannot keep the movable and has to prove his right.

The remedies of Section 3 of Chapter 6 are based on a better right or position to possess the movable. They rank between the fully right-based remedies of ownership protection (Section 1) and the merely possession-based remedies of Section 2.

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

Quick results. The policy goal of the provision is to secure a speedy outcome of the litigation, as a result of the distinction between possessory protection and ownership protection, as well as to restrict private force and to secure a peaceful enforcement of rights. Speedy outcome: possession is a temporary order; consequently there is no reason why the parties should indulge in a long and perhaps costly litigation procedure, so as to prove the right that entitled them to exercise physical control over the object. Usually the procedural laws of the Member States provide a simplified and accelerated procedure for the enforcement of such type of possessory remedies, at least as far as the requirements of proof are concerned.

Restriction of private force and promotion of peaceful enforcement of rights. Even a person having a better right to possess the movable may not dispossess the current possessor unlawfully, but has to obtain the current possessor's consent or enforce his right in a court proceeding on the merits. An unlawful dispossession that cannot be reversed by means of a legal remedy would put the unlawful dispossessor in a very favourable position with respect to the ensuing court proceeding over a claim of the former possessor to restore the movable. The unlawful dispossessor would – due to his unlawful act – be in the position of a respondent, and the former possessor, as a claimant, would have to prove his ownership or better right or position to possess the movable. Thus, every peaceful person who does not exercise private force would have to prove his better right or position to possess the movable as claimant in a court proceeding against the current possessor (respondent).

The rules of possessory protection ensure that the unlawful dispossessor cannot benefit from his unlawful act in the way described above. He is forced to stay in the position of a claimant who has to prove his better entitlement to possess the movable. This gives to the possession that was not – within a year (see below) – obtained in the unlawful way defined by VIII.–6:201, a certain protection, which crystallizes in the fact that the more favourable position of a respondent in litigation over the right to possess is secured for the person in current (peaceful) possession. This protection is in line with the presumption "la possession vaut titre" of the Romanist legal systems.

C. Comparative overview

Protection remedies in the Member States. With respect to the protection of possession, two main tendencies can be discerned in the examined legal orders: (a) Either specific legal remedies for the protection of possession exist, usually a remedy against interferences and a remedy against dispossession (such is the case in Germany, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Greece, Malta, Austria) or, (b) in the countries where the principle "en fait des meubles, la possession vaut titre" applies (France, Belgium), the possessor is treated in the same way as the title holder, namely the owner, and has the same remedies as the owner. The Netherlands have a mixed system: Although the protection of possession system alludes to the principle "la possession vaut titre", it also has elements from the so-called actio publiciana, in that the "better" possession is favoured; besides, tort law remedies are alternatively at the disposition of the possessor, who was a victim of interference, thus bridging the gap between property and tort law. In English law, possession is protected by means of the action on trespass and the action on conversion in tort law (the latter has certain similarities with an action on dispossession). In Sweden possession protection is regulated in a fragmentary way through provisions of the Penal Code which demonstrate a rather tortuous character. In Hungary, an administrative procedure precedes the recourse to judicial remedies; the administrative procedure constitutes the actual possessory protection, while judicial protection is always on the merits.

D. VIII.–6:203(1) and VIII.–6:204(1): Requirements and persons entitled to remedy

Unlawful dispossession or interference. VIII.–6:203(1) requires an unlawful dispossession by the other person, VIII.–6:204(1) requires an unlawful interference of possession or an imminent interference by the other person. For the term 'interference' see Comment J to VIII.–6:101. The term 'imminent interference' also comprises an 'imminent dispossession' (see Comment J to VIII.–6:101), whereas a dispossession that already occurred is covered by VIII.–6:203. For the definition of the term 'imminent' see Comment K to VIII.–6:101. For the definition of the term 'unlawful' see VIII.–6:201. Unlawful dispossessions include physical acts of dispossession as well as an interior change of mind of a former LRP or PA and the finder in bad faith (they all have the animus of an OP; see Comment D to VIII.–6:201).

Persons entitled to the remedies. The persons entitled to exercise the possessory remedies of VIII.–6:203 und VIII.–6:204 are owner-possessors (OPs) and limited-right-possessors (LRPs). Possession-agents (PAs) are not 'possessors' in the sense of VIII.–1:205 to 1:208 and should be entitled to exercise self-help alone (VIII.–6:202), because in such cases a quick reaction is of essence and the circumstances usually do not allow the PA to inform the OP or LRP of the intrusion in time. These conditions are not present, however, with respect to the possessory judicial remedies. In the event that possessory remedies are necessary, they must be initiated within the period of one year; the abundance of time provides sufficient grounds for granting those remedies only to OPs and LRPs, who have an interest of their own in the exercise of control over the movable. It seems reasonable to expect from mere PAs to inform their OPs or LRPs for whom they hold the movable of the infringement in order to enable them to take the required judicial steps against the third person, instead of expecting from PAs to take the judicial steps themselves.

In case of a relationship of limited-right-possession (e.g. contract of lease or storage) both the OP (e.g. the lessor) and the LRP (e.g. the lessee) have an interest in the recovery of the movable by the LRP or the termination of the interference. It seems to be in the interest of both parties that both of them have the possibility to resort to the respective possessory remedies against the third person.

Person against whom the remedy is directed: The claim may be directed against the person who unlawfully dispossessed the former possessor provided that this person is still in direct or indirect possession (physical control) of the movable.

B steals the movable from A and keeps it. The claim may be directed against B as the direct possessor of the movable.

Illustration 2
B steals the movable from A and afterwards hands it over to C for safekeeping. The claim may be directed against B as the indirect possessor of the movable. It can, however, not be directed against C, because C did not unlawfully dispossess the former possessor.

B steals the movable from A and afterwards sells it to C. B is no longer in direct or indirect possession of the movable. The claim cannot be directed against B. The claim cannot be directed against C, because C did not unlawfully dispossess the former possessor. A can claim recovery from C under VIII.–6:101.

No fault or legal capacity required. Just as in cases of self-help the unlawful dispossession or interference does not require fault or legal capacity on the side of the intruder. Therefore, the claims for recovery or a protection order may be also directed against persons who initially were not aware of the unlawfulness of their action of dispossession or interference. However, their intrusion will become intentional once the possessor claims back his goods from the intruder (or claims cessation of the interference) and the formerly unaware intruder does not fulfil this claim. At this point, the (former) possessor can make use of the remedies mentioned in VIII.–6:203 and 6:204.

B takes A's umbrella, erroneously thinking that it is his own. When A approaches B and explains to him that the umbrella was his and that he wanted it back, B refuses to give back the umbrella. A is entitled to recovery against B under VIII.–6:203.

Illustration 5
While attempting to escape, thief T puts A's movable in B's bag. B does not notice that and walks away with the movable. If T has lost physical control over the movable, the claim for recovery can no longer be directed against T. This is not the case where T knows where B is and can cause him to give the movable back to T. Initially A cannot claim recovery from B because B did not dispossess A. When B, however, refuses to give the movable back to A, A is entitled to recovery against B under VIII.–6:203. By keeping the movable, B assists in the unlawful action of T.

No identity between initial unlawful dispossessor and later possessor required, if later unlawful possession forms part of initial unlawful dispossession. This means that one has to distinguish between the following situations:

> (a) A, the owner, was unlawfully dispossessed by B. B is still in direct or indirect possession of the goods. A is entitled to recovery against B under VIII.–6:203, no fault, not even negligence on the side of B is required. It is sufficient that he refuses to give the goods back.
> (b) A, the owner, was unlawfully dispossessed by B. B asks C to store the goods for him so that the police will not find the stolen goods in his (B's) house. A is entitled to recovery against B and C under VIII.–6:203 (provided they refuse to give back the goods to A on a voluntary basis). C's refusal to surrender the goods to A forms part of B's initial act of dispossession. By storing the goods and refusing to give them back to the owner, C assists in the unlawful action of B. The same applies to illustration 5 above.
> (c) A, the owner, was unlawfully dispossessed by B. B sells the goods to C. C is in good faith and takes in no way part in the initial unlawful dispossession. A is not entitled to recovery against B or C under VIII.–6:203, because B is no longer in possession, whereas C's possession is not unlawful in the sense of VIII.–6:203, because it does not form part of the initial unlawful dispossession by B. A can claim recovery from C under VIII.–6:101.

E. VIII.–6:203 paragraph (1) and VIII.–6:204 paragraph (1): Objective limitation period of one year

Why a relatively short limitation period is needed. As a general policy, which is derived from practical drafting reasons and is in full accordance with the traditions of the legal systems of the Member States, prescription periods and similar time limits should not be prescribed in the substantive provisions themselves. When the rights resulting from the various provisions of private law or a contract are terminated by prescription, this is to be regulated in a separate chapter. In the case of the possessory remedies of VIII.–6:203 and 6:204, however, the relatively short prescription period is an integral part of the particular provisional character of the remedy which aims at a simplified and accelerated enforcement in cases of violation of possession. This particular character distinguishes the possessory remedies from other rights and rights-based remedies, which are subject to the ordinary prescription periods, or – as may be the case with the ownership right – to no prescription period at all (extinction only by acquisition of ownership by continuous possession). Besides, the fact that the prescription periods found in most European legal systems are more or less the same, namely one year, makes it feasible to establish a prescription period of that length already in the substantive provisions without giving rise to controversy.

Subjective and objective time limits. In the legal systems of the Member States possessory remedies are usually formulated for movables and real estate with uniform requirements for both categories. With respect to the time limit, two different regulation techniques can be discerned:

(1) A shorter subjective time period (e.g. one month) which starts to run when the person entitled to the possessory remedy gains knowledge of the dispossession or interference and of the identity of the third person.

(2) A longer objective time period (usually of one year for both movables and immovables) which starts to run at the moment the dispossession or interference takes place.

Ad (1): The main policy objective underlying the subjective time period is to ensure that the OP or LRP is able to enforce the remedies provided in his favour, even if he becomes aware of the infringement (dispossession or interference) and of the identity of the infringer only a considerable time after the dispossession or interference occurred/began. As long as he is unaware of the infringement, he does not have the possibility to resort to remedies against the infringer. And it is equally evident from the nature of the remedy that the claimant must also know the identity of the infringer in order to be able to take judicial steps against him.

Ad (2): In the European legal systems, the most frequently used time limit is the objective limitation period of one year starting to run with the occurrence of the dispossession or interference. An OP or LRP who knows of the dispossession/interference and who knows the third person, will have one year to go to court and institute a proceeding against the dispossessor/interferer. Considering the temporary character of the possessory protection remedies and the purpose of their speedy enforcement in an accelerated procedure, the period of one year seems to be an adequate objective time limit.

Why only an objective limitation period was provided. An objective period of one year, which does not take into account the respective knowledge of the possessor of the infringement, balances the need for a restricted ability of the possessor to enforce the possessory remedies, on one hand, and the consideration of cases in which the possessor may not be able to gain knowledge of the infringement promptly, on the other hand. Besides, the solution proposed is in accordance with the majority of European legal systems providing specific judicial possessory remedies.

Considering the temporary character of the possessory protection remedies and the purpose of their speedy enforcement in an accelerated procedure, as well as the need for a prompt resolution of disputes arising in the field of relations in rem, it seems to be inappropriate to render the aforementioned objective period provided by VIII.–6:203 paragraph (1) and 6:204 paragraph (1) "relative" by giving an OP or LRP who obtains the required knowledge only after a year or even later (e.g. even after several years) whichever additional period to react. Therefore, the absolute character of the one year limitation period is not subject to specific exceptional regulations allowing relativity as to its exact extent depending on the subjective knowledge of the possessor.

Limitation period for interferences. With respect to interferences, one has to bear in mind that, contrary to dispossession, it is rather hard to determine the exact point in time when they take place. It can be that an interference is ongoing through a series of acts which constitute, however, a uniform interfering course of action or is repeated by several acts, which form different instances of interference; e.g. A is, on a daily basis, throwing away garbage in B' truck; C has been repeatedly, at irregular intervals, destroying the tyres of D's car for reasons of personal revenge, whereas E does the same with the car of F only once as an act of vandalism.

Generally, a protection order makes sense and will be granted only if the interference is still present (ongoing) or is still imminent. An interference that is already terminated cannot be averted any longer by a court order. However, with respect to the removable traces an interference left on the movable (see Comment K to VIII.–6:101), a protection order still makes sense when the act of interference itself is terminated. It seems inappropriate to let the limitation period of one year start at the moment of termination of an interference for two reasons: (a) Once an interference is terminated (and no removable traces are left), no protection order will be granted. (b) An interference may last for some years, whereas the possessor is in the position to resort to judicial remedies against it from the very beginning of the interference. Therefore, the general rule must be that the period of prescription starts to run at the moment in which the interference began.

However, in cases of repeated interferences, it seems unfair to let the prescription period start with the beginning of the first interference for the following reason: If several acts of interference occur in the course of time, the possessor often cannot know for sure if the interferer plans to continue disturbing his possession or not. Therefore, VIII.–6:204 paragraph (1) in fine provides that, in cases of repeated interferences, a new period starts each time a new interference begins.

Protection of the possessor after the lapse of the limitation period of one year. It is important to note, however, that the OP or LRP is not without legal protection against the infringer, even after the period of one year has elapsed. He then has the possibility to claim recovery or a protection order against the interferences on the basis of his better right or better possession (VIII.–6:301, 6:302), on the basis of his ownership (VIII.–6:101), or on the basis of a contractual right. What is limited here, is only the particular remedy of recovery or protection order against interferences based on the mere fact that a possession was violated by an unlawful act (private force) but not all other remedies based on rights to possess the movable. See the formulation "irrespective […]" explained in paragraph 4 of Comment A above.

F. VIII.–6:203(1) and VIII.–6:204(1): The remedies – recovery and protection order

'Recovery' (VIII.–6:203) means that the third person has to hand over the movable to the claimant. The remedy is similar to the remedy provided for in VIII.–6:101(1) ("entitled to obtain or recover physical control"). The requirements for the two remedies, however, differ decisively (VIII.–6:101: right of ownership; VIII.–6:203: unlawful dispossession; rights are irrelevant). The different formulation with respect to the remedies of recovery and receipt or recovery of physical control results from the fact that in VIII.–6:101 the other person is not required to have committed an act of dispossession himself, no act of dispossession is required to have taken place at all (see Comment I to VIII.–6:101), whereas in VIII.–6:203 the requirement of an unlawful dispossession by the other person is crucial.

The 'protection order' (VIII.–6:204) is the same remedy as the protection order in VIII.–6:101 paragraph (3). Comment K to VIII.–6:101 also applies here.

G. VIII.–6:203(2) and VIII.–6:204(2): The relationship between direct and indirect possessor

Protection of direct LRP against unlawful OP/LRP. As explained in Comment G to VIII.–6:202, the (direct) LRP should be protected against his indirect possessor, who is an OP or LRP, when the latter violates the direct possessor's right (conferred by contract or by law) to possess the movable. The direct LRP can defend his possession by self-help (VIII.–6:202) and the possessory remedy of VIII.–6:203, where the indirect possessor unlawfully dispossesses the LRP. These remedies offer the LRP a quicker and probably less costly relief than the judicial procedure based on his contractual right to possess the movable. With the exception of a few countries (for instance France), this is also the dominant solution in the EU Member States. The OP also cannot assert his right of ownership successfully against his LRP (VIII.–6:101) because his claim for recovery is blocked by the LRP's contractual (or other) right to possess the movable.

Right to possess must be valid. From the definition of the LRP in VIII.–1:207 follows that the LRP must have a valid right to possess the movable, otherwise he would not qualify as an LRP, but would be treated in analogy to VIII.–1:206 as an OP (see Comment F to VIII.–1:205-208). Therefore, the provisions of VIII.–6:203 paragraph (2) and 6:204 paragraph (2) also only apply to possessors with a valid right to possess the movable in relation to the indirect possessor.

H. VIII.–6:203(3): exclusion of remedy in case of unlawful dispossession by claimant within the past year

Initial unlawful dispossessor excluded from remedy. VIII.–6:203(3) addresses the case of a thief or other person A who unlawfully dispossessed possessor B within the last year. Afterwards the former possessor B in his turn unlawfully deprived person A (an OP) of his possession. This will be, for example, the case when the initial possessor B is not entitled to exercise self-help according to VIII.–6:202, because his dispossession of the thief A does not comply with the immediacy or proportionality requirement laid down in VIII.–6:202(2). As the initial possessor is not or no longer entitled to self-help, he acts 'unlawfully' when he deprives the thief A of his possession (and may be liable for damage to the thief which was caused as a consequence of his unlawful act).

The lawful way to effect restoration of the movable to the initial possessor would have been to exercise the possessory remedy of VIII.–6:203 within one year or to make use of any other claim based on a right to possess. However, it does not seem just to permit A, the thief or other initial unlawful dispossessor, to rely on the unlawful act of the initial possessor B for the following reason: A himself was the one who initiated the unlawful course of action. A acted unlawfully in the first place. The unlawful act committed by the initial possessor B was only a reaction to the thief's initial infringement of possession. This reaction occurred in a relatively short period of time (one year) after the initial dispossession by the thief A. For this reason, the thief's entitlement to recovery of the movable is excluded under these circumstances. This rule is derived from the 'unlawful possession objection' ("fehlerhafter Besitz") of the German law family. It is also partly consistent – in a sense, as the other side of the coin – with the "ano e dia" ("a year and a day") rule found in the Portuguese and the Spanish legal systems, according to which a possessor must have exercised his possession rights for at least a year, before he can rely on the possession remedies.

I. VIII.–6:203(4) and VIII.–6:204(3): Enforcement of right or better position to possess

Relation of possessory remedy to right-based remedy. In cases of dispossession, where it is foreseeable that the other person will invoke or actually invokes a right to possess the movable by raising a defence or counter-claim (see remedies of VIII.–6:101, 6:301), it might seem unreasonable for the judge to order that the movable is first to be returned to the initial possessor (OP or LRP) according to VIII.–6:203(1) and will subsequently have to be given back to the other person, when the latter wins the litigation based on his right to possess the movable. This evaluation applies even more strongly to cases where, from the very start, the facts point with considerable certainty towards the conclusion that the other person has such a right to possess, whereas the initial possessor (claimant) does not have such a right.

No return of the goods to claimant in cases of defence or counter-claim based on right to possess. Therefore, in such cases (cases of defence or counter-claim based on right to possess), the judge is able, according to VIII.–6:203(4), to order that the movable has to be handed over to a third person, or to the court or a competent authority, who will hold the movable for the person that will finally win the procedure on the underlying better right to possess the movable until this decision on the merits is reached. VIII.–6:203 paragraph (4) allows the judge to link a proceeding pursuant to VIII.–6:203 (merely possessory) with a proceeding pursuant to VIII.–6:301 (better possession), VIII.–6:101 (ownership) or a proceeding over an obligatory right to receive delivery of the movable. If the other person, as respondent, invokes such other entitlement to possess the movable, the movable will, on a provisional basis, be kept by the court, public authority or third person, and will be handed over to the claimant (initial possessor), if he wins the proceeding, or to the respondent (other person), if he prevails with his counter-claim.

Protection order ceased or replaced in cases of interference. When it is possible to link a claim based on the protection of mere possession with a counter-claim based on a right to possess in cases of dispossession, this should be also possible in cases of interference (see VIII.–6:204(3)). In these cases no final protection order will be rendered by the court. The order will be ceased and, if necessary, finally replaced by a decision on the existence of a right or better position to interfere.

J. Character of the rule

Mandatory rule. The rule is mandatory. The person entitled to the possessory remedies can waive or not use the remedies.

Section 3: Protection of better possession

VIII.–6:301: Entitlement to recover in case of better possession

(1) A former owner-possessor or former limited-right possessor is entitled to recover possession of the goods from another person exercising physical control over them, if the former possession was "better" than the current possession of the other person in the sense of paragraph (2).

(2) The former possession is "better" than the current possession if the former possessor is in good faith and has a right to possess, while the other person has no right to possess, the goods. Where both persons are in good faith and have a right to possess the goods, the right derived from the owner prevails over a right derived from an owner-possessor who is not the owner; if this does not apply, the older rightful possession prevails. Where both persons are in good faith, but neither has a right to possess the goods, the current possession prevails.

VIII.–6:302: Entitlement to protection order in case of better possession

Where another person interferes with the possession, or such interference or a dispossession is imminent, the owner-possessor or the limited-right-possessor, who is in good faith, is entitled to a protection order under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (3), unless the other person would, in case of dispossession, have a better possession in the sense of Article VIII.–6:301 (Entitlement to recover in case of better possession) paragraph (2), or the third person has a better right to use or otherwise deal with the goods than the owner-possessor or limited-right-possessor.

COMMENTS

A. General idea

Protection of 'better' possessors who have problems to prove their right to possess: The remedies stipulated in Section 3, VIII.–6:301 and 6:302, constitute an effort to bridge the gap between 'pure' possessory protection (VIII.–6:202-6:204), based upon the factum of a person exercising actual physical control over a movable, and the protection based upon one's ownership right in a movable (VIII.–6:101). These legal remedies are not meant to prolong the possessory protection remedies, which are, as stated above, restricted to one year. They are intended to respond to particular practical needs, namely the lack of protection of a former possessor, when he can no longer assert the possession remedies and no proof of an ownership right in the sense of VIII.–6:101 can be provided. Under these circumstances, a former possessor (OP or LRP) should not be left without any protection against a current possessor, if the former possessor clearly has a better entitlement to possess the movable than the current possessor. Such better entitlement or position to possess the movable seems to be present when the former possessor has a right to possess the movable, whereas the current possessor does not have such a right, or where the former possessor is an acquirer by continuous possession in good faith (VIII.–4:101(1)(a)), whereas the current possessor is an OP in bad faith (e.g. the thief).

B. Interests at stake and policy considerations

'Actio publiciana' and similarity to protection of ownership. The remedies of VIII.–6:301 and 6:302 share a similarity with the "a*ctio publiciana*" of Roman law and its further developments in the various legal systems of the Member States. The aim of these provisions is to offer for certain categories of 'qualified' or 'better' owner-possessors and limited-right-possessors, who do not qualify for the protection of ownership under VIII.–6:101, because they are not (yet) owners, or because they are owners but cannot prove their ownership, a special protection remedy against 'less qualified' other persons who are in current possession of the movable. This special protection exceeds the limits of the mere possessory remedies of VIII.–6:203 and 6:204 and bears a certain similarity to the protection of ownership (VIII.–6:101) – albeit not requiring the proof of ownership.

Persons protected. The better-possession-remedies of VIII.–6:301 and 6:302 are designed to protect especially the following categories of persons:

(1) limited-right-possessors with an obligatory right or/and a limited right in rem to possess the movable against a current possessor without a right to possess, or against a current possessor with a right to possess which is derived from an OP who is not the owner;

(2) potential acquirers by continuous possession in good faith (before the completion of the period of ten years of VIII.–4:101 paragraph [1][a]) against a current possessor in bad faith without a right to possess;

(3) owners, who cannot or do not want to provide evidence of their ownership (as required by VIII.–6:101). They can prevail under VIII.–6:301 and 6:302, if they prove to be in good faith and the other person was in bad faith, or the other person was in good faith, but has no right to possess.

C. Comparative overview

Forms of qualified possession in the Member States. The 'actio publiciana' appears in a variety of 'modern' forms in the contemporary legal systems of the Member States. Several tendencies can be noted: for instance, there are those legal systems concentrating mainly on a possessor having a title (e.g. a contract of sale), or even a putative title, and being in good faith as to his title and the way he obtained possession; the protection also extends to acquirers by continuous possession in good faith (Austria; Greece: only for immovables). Austrian law also shows an interesting aspect in that the actio publiciana has come to answer to new needs and actually even transcends its traditional scope by offering a quasi in rem position to obligatory rights, such as the lease (right to possess, LRP).

As to those legal systems, on the other hand, which substantially departed from the classical actio publiciana, namely Germany, Portugal and Spain, further distinctions must be made: Good faith still plays a role in GERMAN CC § 1007, but no right to possess is necessary for this remedy. In Portuguese and Spanish law, the good or bad faith of the possessor are not mentioned, but three elements are decisive: the actual possession, the seniority of it and the existence of a title (like e.g. a contract of sale).

Position of 'actio publiciana' in relation to possessory protection and ownership protection. With respect to the relationship of the actio publiciana to claims based upon other legal bases, it is interesting to note the differences and the various reasons for which the claimant will choose the one or the other remedy. With respect to ownership claims the substantial advantage of the actio publiciana lies within the much more convenient evidence requirements; it is in any case far easier to prove one's possession or its acquisition in good faith than the whole trail of owners up to original ownership acquisition. With respect to the relationship to possessory remedies, on the other hand, a series of factors must be taken into account: in possessory claims one has to prove solely that he possesses (in case of interference) or he possessed (in case of dispossession), whereas in the actio publiciana the claimant also has to prove that he was in good faith and that the other requirements for his better position to possess are present; possessory claims are usually limited by one year, whereas the actio publiciana will normally be subject to the longer general prescription periods; finally, while a judgement on ownership remedies (VIII.–6:101) constitutes res judicata with respect to the right of ownership, it is disputed what will be covered as res judicata by the judgement in case of an actio publiciana: In Greece, it simply covers the existence of the prerequisites of good faith acquisition by continuous possession, in Austria it is controversial whether it contains a presumption of ownership or not, in Spain the ruling consists in a mere interim measure without prejudice to the parties' right to bring forward new claims at a further stage of the procedure.

D. VIII.–6:301(1) and VIII.–6:302: requirements in general

Comparison to VIII.–6:203, 6:204, 6:101. The better-possession-remedies of VIII.–6:301 and 6:302 have to be distinguished from the possessory remedies of VIII.–6:203 and 6:204: Unlike the possessory remedies, they have to be enforced in an ordinary proceeding and are not subjected to a particularly short limitation period; moreover, their scope of application is wider, in that they do not require an unlawful dispossession by the current possessor (respondent). The most important and useful aspect from a practical point of view lies in the fact that, unlike the ownership remedies of VIII.–6:101, the claimant does not have to prove his ownership.

Proof of former possession/of interference with possession, of good faith and of better right or position to possess. In the cases of VIII.–6:301 and 6:302 the claimant has to prove his (former or current) owner-possession or limited-right-possession, the current possession by the other person (VIII.–6:301), or, in cases of interferences (VIII.–6:302), the interference or imminent interference, and his good faith. And the claimant will finally prevail only if he can prove a better right or position to possess (or [VIII.–6:302] otherwise deal with) the movable than the right or position proved by the other person (respondent). In comparing the relative quality of the possession of the first owner-possessor/limited-right-possessor (claimant) and of the other person (respondent), not only the good faith of both persons, but also their right to possess plays a considerable role.

No unlawful dispossession by respondent required. Unlike the possessory remedy of VIII.–6:203 paragraph (1) and in line with VIII.–6:101 (protection of ownership), VIII.–6:301 paragraph (1) does not require an unlawful dispossession by the other person (respondent). The case may well be that the current possessor (the other person) obtained his possession in an entirely peaceful way, e.g. because the movable was lost and he found it.

Comparison of quality of possession of claimant and respondent. The entitlement to the better possession remedy of VIII.–6:301 is finally decided on the basis of a comparison between the respective qualification of the owner-possession/limited-right-possession of the claimant and the person currently in physical control of the movable (other person). If the possession of the other person is less qualified than that of the claimant, the other person will have to surrender the movable to the former possessor, irrespective of the manner in which the other person obtained physical control over the movable.

A is the owner or LRP of a movable. A loses the movable on a journey. B, who does not know A, picks up the movable and wants to keep it for himself or wants to deliver it to the competent institution. B never deprived A of his owner-possession or limited-right-possession, because A himself lost the movable and was not in physical control of the movable when B picked it up. A has a right to possess the movable, whereas B has not. Therefore, A will prevail over B under VIII.–6:301.

A is the LRP of a movable. He has a contract of lease with the owner. B steals the movable. C, who is in good faith, purchases the movable from B, but does not acquire it by good faith acquisition. C himself did not unlawfully deprive A of his limited-right-possession. With respect to the movable, C qualifies as a potential acquirer by continuous possession in good faith. C's right to possess the movable is derived from the contract with the thief B. A's right to possess the movable is based on the relationship of limited-right-possession with the owner. Therefore, A has the better right to possess the movable, since it can be traced to the owner, and will prevail over C's right. B's right to possess the movable (under his contract with the owner) must of course be still valid and not terminated when B sues C.

VIII.–6:301, however, also covers cases, in which the other person unlawfully deprived the OP or LRP of his possession. If, in illustration 2, the thief B keeps the movable, A can enforce his entitlement under VIII.–6:301 against B.

E. VIII.–6:301(1) and VIII.–6:302: persons entitled to 'better possession' remedies – OP or LRP in good faith Protection requires former 'possession' in the sense of an OP or LRP. The persons entitled to the better possession remedies of VIII.–6:301 and 6:302 are owner-possessors (OPs) and limited-right-possessors (LRPs) in the sense of VIII.–1:206 and 1:207, but not possession-agents (PAs, VIII.–1:208). For the reasons explained in Comment D to VIII.–6:203 and 6:204, the protection granted to PAs should be limited to the remedy of self-help. The persons protected by section 3 are OPs (direct and indirect) and LRPs (direct and indirect) whose owner-possession or limited-right-possession is "more qualified" than that of the other person.

Good faith of OP and LRP and valid right of LRP. One indispensable element of this 'qualification' is the 'good faith' of the claimant. The OP or LRP must reasonably believe that he has a right to possess the movable. The right the OP must reasonably believe to have is the right of ownership. An OP who is not the owner is in good faith if he neither knew nor could be reasonably expected to know that he is not the owner (see VIII.–3:101 [1][d]). An LRP will qualify as an LRP in the sense of VIII.–1:207 only, if his right to possess the movable (of an obligatory or proprietary nature) really exists (see Comment F to VIII.–1:205 – 1:208). The LRP must be in good faith with respect to the entitlement of his OP/LRP to grant such a right. He must for instance believe that his pledgor or lessor is the owner of the movable and, therefore, entitled to grant him a pledge or a lease.

The burden of proof with respect to his good faith lies on the claimant.

Remedy. The remedy granted by VIII.–6:301 is the 'recovery of physical control': This means that the other person has to hand over the movable to the claimant (former possessor). The remedy is similar to the remedy provided for in VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1) ("entitled to obtain or recover physical control") or the remedy of recovery on VIII.–6:203. The remedy in cases of interference according to VIII.–6:302 is the protection order defined in VIII.–6:101 paragraph (3).

F. VIII.–6:301(1) and VIII.–6:302: persons against whom the remedies are granted

Person who exercises physical control. The protection is granted against another person in physical control (possession) of the movable or another person interfering with the movable.

Like in VIII.–6:101, no act of unlawful dispossession on the side of the other person is required. The other person may be in direct or indirect possession of the movable (OP, LRP), or exercise physical control on behalf of a possessor like the PA.

Relationship between OP and his LRP. The protection is not granted against the owner and/or other indirect owner-possessor of the movable, who unlawfully deprives his LRP of his limited-right-possession in violation of the specific relationship between him and the limited-right-possessor. In this point, VIII.–6:301 differs from VIII.–6:203 paragraph (2) (recovery) and VIII.–6:202 paragraph (3) (self-help). The reason for this differentiation is the special character of the remedies of self-help and possessory recovery: They offer a much quicker termination of the unlawful dispossession than the ordinary legal remedies and should, therefore, be granted to LRPs against their indirect possessors in addition to their contractual remedies. The remedy of VIII.–6:301 does not offer the LRP any additional advantage in comparison to a remedy based on the breach of contract. Therefore, the LRP seems to be sufficiently protected against the unfaithful indirect owner-possessor by his contractual remedies and does not need the additional protection of VIII.–6:301.

G. VIII.–6:301(1) and VIII.–6:302: proof of 'better possession' or 'better right to use or otherwise deal with the movable'

Proof of better possession. The burden of proving the (better) quality of his own owner-possession or limited-right-possession is on the claimant. The burden of proving the (better) quality of his owner-possession or limited-right-possession is on the respondent.

> A somehow loses physical control over a movable, which he formerly held in good faith. C gets the movable as a gift from B. A demands recovery of the movable from C on the basis of VIII.–6:301. C proves that he meets all the requirements of acquisition by continuous possession in good faith according to chapter 4, but the period of ten years of owner-possession by C has not yet elapsed. A can rebut this evidence by proving that he has a contractual right (derived from the owner) to possess the movable. In this case, A will prevail over C because he has the better possession according to VIII.–6:301(2).

Thus, the central feature of the better-possession-remedies of VIII.–6:301 and 6:302 is a comparison between the respective quality of the owner-possession or limited-right-possession of the claimant and the owner-possession or limited-right-possession of the respondent. Claimant and respondent have to bring evidence as to the respective quality of their possession. If the respondent is not able to bring any evidence as to his good faith, his right to possess, or otherwise better possession, it will be sufficient for the claimant to establish that he formerly possessed the movable in good faith. If the respondent brings evidence of his good faith and of his right to possess or otherwise qualified possession, the claimant can rebut this evidence by proving that his right to possess can be traced back to the actual owner, whereas this is not the case for the respondent.

Proof in cases of interference. In the case of interferences in VIII.–6:302, it seems difficult to define what the respondent, who is not in owner-possession or limited-right-possession of the movable, but merely interferes with the owner-possession/limited-right-possession of the claimant, will have to prove in order to prevail over the claimant. As an argumentum a maiori ad minus, it seems evident that a respondent who has a right to possess the movable, whereas the claimant does not have such a right, should not only be allowed to keep the movable (VIII.–6.301), but that he should also be allowed to otherwise interfere with the claimant's possession. Therefore, VIII.–6:302 refers to the determination of the better owner-possession or limited-right-possession in the (hypothetical) case of dispossession in VIII.–6:301. In addition, the other person (respondent) should also prevail, if he cannot prove a better (hypothetical) owner-possession or limited-right-possession in the sense of VIII.–6:301, but he can prove a right to cause exactly that sort of interference, which the claimant wants to avert or prohibit by his claim under VIII.–6:302.

A is the LRP of C's truck. C concluded a contract with B, allowing (and obliging) B to paint and repair his truck. If A wants to prohibit B from interfering with the truck on the basis of VIII.–6:302, B can defend himself by invoking his contractual right to (use or otherwise) deal with the movable.

Illustration 5
A, as the owner or limited-right-possessor of a sheep, grants to B a right of usufruct, which entitles B to acquire ownership of the milk and the wool of the sheep. If A changes his mind and wants to prohibit B from taking possession of the milk or the wool, in breach of his relationship with B, B will prevail over A by invoking his contractual as well as his right in rem to take the milk and the wool of the sheep.

H. VIII.–6:301(2): determination of 'better possession'

The two 'persons' mentioned in VIII.–6:301 paragraph (2), the quality of whose possession is to be compared, are the former owner-possessor or limited-right-possessor (claimant) and the other person (respondent) in the sense of VIII.–6:301 paragraph (1).

(a) other person in bad faith

Respondent in bad faith. In order to prevail against the other person, a person must be in good faith with respect to his right to possess (see Comments E and G supra). A former OP or LRP who is in good faith will always prevail over another person who is not in good faith. The good faith of the OP relates to his ownership, the good faith of the LRP relates to the ownership of the person from whom he directly or indirectly derives his right to possess (see Comment E supra).

(b) former possessor with right (to possess) and third person without a such a right

VIII.–6:301(2) sentence 1: "The former possession is "better" than the current possession if the former possessor is in good faith and has a right to possess, while the other person has no right to possess the goods."

Only claimant has a right to possess. If both, claimant and respondent, are in good faith, the claimant who has a (valid, not putative) right to possess the movable will prevail over another person who does not have such a right. The respective right may be an obligatory right (e.g. a contract of lease, storage etc between the OP and the LRP) or a right in rem (e.g. usufruct, security right).

Illustration 6
A is the lessee of the movable, on the basis of a contract of lease with owner O. The movable is stolen by an unknown thief. Respondent B purchases the movable from X. B is in good faith, he reasonably believes X to be the owner, and thinks his contract of sale with X is valid (B is a potential acquirer by continuous possession in good faith in the sense of VIII.–4:101(1)(a)). B's contract with X is invalid. Thus, B does not have a right to possess the movable, whereas A has a right to possess the movable. A will prevail over B, because his limited-right-possession is "better" than B's owner-possession in the sense of VIII.–6:301(2).

(c) former possessor AND third person have a right to possess

VIII.–6:301(2) sentence 2: "Where both persons are in good faith and have a right to possess the goods, the right derived from the owner prevails over a right derived from an owner-possessor who is not the owner; if this does not apply, the older rightful possession prevails."

Claimant must have been in possession. In all cases where two rights to possess the movable are compared, it must be kept in mind that no right to possess the movable is ever protected under VIII.–6:301, if the claimant (or respondent) has not yet obtained possession of the respective movable. This follows from the basic structure of the better-possession-remedy of VIII.–6:301: The claimant was (formerly) in owner-possession or limited-right-possession, and the respondent ('other person') is currently in physical control of the movable, when the claimant resorts to the remedy of VIII.–6:301. A claimant who rented the movable from the owner, but the movable was never delivered to him, is not entitled to recovery, according to VIII.–6:301, against another person currently in physical control of the movable (who probably also rented the movable from the owner); the claimant must, even for a short period, have been in possession of the movable.

Right to possess. Persons who have a 'right to possess' in the sense of this paragraph are LRPs (VIII.–1:207) and OPs (VIII.–1:206) who have a valid title (contract of sale) for the acquisition of ownership giving them a relative right to possess the movable with respect to the seller, but who did not acquire ownership for some other reason: e.g. because the movable they attempted to acquire from the non-owner was stolen. Thus the right to possess the movable in the sense of this section can be a contractual right, a right created by operation of law, a right in rem, or a mere obligatory right.

If both, the claimant and the respondent, are in good faith and have an obligatory or in rem right to possess the movable, further distinctions must be made.

(i) Right derived from the owner versus right derived from someone else

Right derived from owner or someone else. The formulation 'derived from' means that the OP or LRP directly or indirectly derives his right to possess the movable from that person (from the owner or an OP who is not the owner). The sub-LRP of the LRP of the owner has a right to possess the movable finally going back to the owner (= derived from the owner), even though he has a contract only with the first LRP. If the movable is stolen and sold by the thief to a person X (who may be in good or in bad faith), and B acquires the movable by sale from X in good faith, B has a right to possess the movable based on the sales contract with X. However, B's right is derived from the thief, who is an owner-possessor in bad faith.

Illustration 7
A is the lessee of the movable, on the basis of a contract of lease with the owner O. The movable is stolen by an unknown thief. Respondent B is a potential acquirer by continuous possession in good faith who purchased the movable from X. The sales contract between B and X is valid. B does not have a right to possess the movable which is better than the right of A, because A's right is derived from the owner, whereas B's right is derived from the thief. A will prevail over B, because A's limited-right-possession is 'better' than B's owner-possession in the sense of VIII.–6:301 paragraph (2).

(ii) Older possession if rights to possess are derived from the same person

Rights to possess derived from the same person. The distinction with respect to the origin of the right to possess (see (a) supra) does not apply, if both persons, claimant and respondent, have a right to possess that is derived from the same person.

The owner O concludes a contract of lease, first with A, then with B. He delivers the movable to A B afterwards deprives A of his limited-right-possession. Solution: A will prevail.

Illustration 9

Illustration 10

Illustration 11
The owner O concludes a contract of lease with A, but does not deliver the movable to A. A few days later O sells the movable to B and delivers the movable to B. A afterwards deprives B of his owner-possession. Solution: B will prevail.

Illustration 12
The owner O concludes a contract of lease, first with A, then with B. A few days later A sub-leases the movable to C. O delivers the movable to C. B deprives C of his limited-right-possession. Solution: C will prevail.

Illustration 13
The thief T (or the finder F who keeps the movable for himself) concludes a contract of sale, first with A, then with B. He delivers the movable to A. B afterwards deprives A of his owner-possession. Solution: A will prevail.

The option seems to be to let the 'older right' prevail over the 'younger right', or, alternatively, to let the 'older possession' prevail. It has to be noted that a right that is 'older', but was never substantiated by delivery of possession cannot be defended under VIII.–6:301, because the person entitled to recovery under VIII.–6:301 must be the 'former possessor'. In illustrations 8, 9 and 13, A has the older right and the older possession; it is, therefore, clear that A's right should prevail. In Illustrations 10, 11 and 12, B and C have the younger right, but the older possession, because the owner O delivered the movable to them, and not to A.

Relationship to VIII.–2:301. The solution provided here is in line with the basic rule of VIII.–2:301 on Multiple Transfers. The transferee who first fulfils all general requirements of transfer, i.e. a valid entitlement (contract or other) and delivery (transfer of possession to him), prevails. He will become owner and – provided he is in good faith with respect to existence of the earlier entitlement of the other transferee – will not be subjected to any claim for recovery by the former owner or the other transferee. Thus, in general, not the prior contract (right) will be decisive, but, rather, the prior receipt of possession.

Older rightful possession prevails. For these reasons, VIII.–6:301 paragraph (2) provides that the limited-right-possessor or owner-possessor with a right to possess and the 'older rightful possession' prevails. The word 'rightful' was inserted to make clear that this provision deals with the possession of two parties who both have a right to possess; thus, if they possess, they possess in accordance with that right. The solution of illustrations 10, 11 and 12 is therefore: B (10, 11) or C (12) will prevail over A, because O delivered the movable to B (or C) first and A only obtained possession after B (C). A's possession is, therefore, younger than the possession of B and C. The rule 'the older rightful possession prevails' applies only where both persons (claimant and respondent) are in good faith and their respective rights to possess the goods are not in one case derived from the owner and in the other case from the non-owner (see VIII.–6:301 paragraph (2) 'if this does not apply'). Thus, their rights to possess can both be derived from the same person, owner or non-owner, or from two different co-owners or two different non-owners.

(d) neither former possessor nor the other person have a right to possess the movable

VIII.–6:301(2) sentence 3: "Where both persons are in good faith, but neither has a right to possess the goods, the current possession prevails."

Current possession prevails. If both, claimant and respondent, are in good faith, but neither of them has a right to possess the movable (because e.g. their contracts are invalid), no remedy will be granted to the former possessor on the basis of VIII.–6:301. The current possessor will prevail. This rule is congruent with the principle of "beati possidentes" found in several legal systems. In view of the fact that the other person (current possessor) will – because of the good faith requirement – never be a person that unlawfully deprived the former possessor (OP) of his possession, while both persons lack a right to possess, no reason can be found for a remedy that orders the recovery of the movable by the former possessor.

I. VIII.–6:302: Remedies against interference or imminent Interference

References to other provisions. For the question of 'better possession' in cases of interference with possession and the respective burden of proof see Comments G and H supra. For the term 'interference' see Comment J to VIII.–6:101. The term 'imminent interference' also comprises an 'imminent dispossession' (see Comment J to VIII.–6:101), whereas a dispossession that already occurred is covered by VIII.–6:301. For the definition of the term 'imminent' see Comment K to VIII.–6:101.

Comparison to other remedies; no declaration of right possible. The remedy granted by VIII.–6:302 "protection order" is the same remedy as the protection order in VIII.–6:101(3). Comment K to VIII.–6:101 also applies here. See also VIII.–6:204(1). VIII.–6:204(1) (possessory remedy) and VIII.–6:302 (better possession remedy) differ from VIII.–6:101 paragraph (2) (ownership remedy) in so far as no declaration of a right (of ownership) – as in VIII.–6:101(2) – can be demanded under VIII.–6:204(1) (possessory remedy) and VIII.–6:302 (better possession remedy). The remedy of declaration is clearly inappropriate with respect to a possessory remedy, because no 'right' is under dispute there. The opinions in the European legal systems, which know an actio publiciana type of remedy, are divided over the question of whether a judgement on such a remedy can constitute res iudicata with respect to the existence of such a 'right' in the movable. In our view, a declaration would only make sense if the basis for the protection granted by VIII.–6:301 and 6:302 was clearly the existence of a right in or with respect to the movable (which is the case in VIII.–6:101). However, VIII.–6:301 and 6:302 cover also situations in which the (former) possessor (claimant), who is entitled to the better possession remedies, has no right in rem in the movable or not even an obligatory right to possess the movable. Moreover, a declaration of a right seems to be only necessary in cases of basic rights in rem, like the right of ownership (VIII.–6:101), because they demand to be respected by everybody. A right to such a declaration of a right with respect to the movable was, therefore, not provided.

J. Character of the rule

Mandatory rule. The rule is mandatory. The person entitled to the better possession remedies can waive his right to enforce the remedies or simply not make use of it.

Section 4: Other remedies

VIII.–6:401: Non-contractual liability

The owner and the limited-right-possessor are entitled to reparation for an infringement of their right of ownership, or their right to possess the goods under the terms of VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession).

CHAPTER 7: CONSEQUENTIAL QUESTIONS ON RESTITUTION OF GOODS

VIII.–7:101: Scope of application

(1) This Chapter applies where the situations covered by the subsequent Articles occur while the goods are possessed by a person against whom, at that time, the owner is entitled to obtain or recover possession of the goods.

(2) Where the requirements for the application of Book V are fulfilled, the provisions of that Book apply and have priority over the provisions of this Chapter.

(3) The provisions of Chapter 5 have priority over the provisions of this Chapter.

COMMENTS

A. General

Introduction as to situations covered. The issues dealt with in this Chapter have in common that they arise in a situation where physical control over the goods is exercised by a person other than the owner and the owner is entitled, as against this person, to obtain or recover possession of the goods by "revindication" in the sense of VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1). There may be various reasons why the person exercising physical control over the goods has no right to possess them; we may think of a thief as well as of someone who purchased the goods from a non-owner but did not acquire in good faith, or of a person who purchased the goods from the owner under a contract which turns out to be void, or is avoided with retroactive effect. These different instances will be explored more closely below, Comment B. In the following discussion, the two parties will generally be referred to as the "owner" on the one side and as the "possessor" on the other side. For the purposes of this Chapter, there are basically three questions that may arise in such situations. (a) If the goods are damaged while they are under the physical control of the possessor, or if they are even destroyed or get lost: will the possessor be liable for the damage? This question may also appear where revindication in the sense of VIII.–6:101) does not make sense because the goods are completely destroyed or lost. (b) In case the possessor obtains any fruits from, or makes use of, the owner's goods while the possessor has them in possession: is the possessor under an obligation to return these benefits to the owner and, if so, to what extent? (c) Where the possessor incurs expenditure on the goods, or improves them: will the possessor be entitled to reimbursement of the expenditure from the owner when the latter reclaims the goods? Or will there be other means of protection available for the possessor, for instance a right to remove corporeal parts that the possessor added to the owner's goods, before they are returned? These issues (a) to (c) are dealt with in the subsequent Articles VIII.–1:102 to VIII.–1:104. The numbering (a) to (c) will be used throughout the Comments on this Article in order to facilitate understanding. The following discussion will focus on the scope of application as described by paragraph (1). The relation to Book V on benevolent intervention in another's affairs as addressed in paragraph (2), which is of limited importance as compared to other issues, will be taken up in Comment E, below.

Why Book VIII contains regulations on these issues. Chapter 7 serves an important supplementary function in relation to other parts of Book VIII, in particular to the transfer rules of Chapter 2, the provisions on good faith acquisition in Chapter 3 and those on protection of ownership in Chapter 6. Since questions like the ones listed in Comment A can easily appear in any situation where goods must be returned to their owner, these model rules should provide clear answers on how to deal with such cases in practice. As will be pointed out in more detail below in Comment C and in the Notes on Chapter 7, a great number of European legal systems contain a specific set of rules regulating these issues in a property law context, the main general tendency of which can be summarised as the granting of certain privileges to a "possessor in good faith", as compared to the general rules that would govern the case if no such special set of rules existed, the latter primarily being general rules on non-contractual liability for damage and unjustified enrichment. Against this background it is evident, firstly, that there are certain policy issues to be decided within the scope of these model rules in order to find the most adequate balance between the owner's and the possessor's interests. Secondly, if Book VIII was completely silent about these issues, the question could come up whether they are intended to be left to the general rules of other parts of these model rules, i.e. mainly to Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage and Book VII on unjustified enrichment, or whether these issues should be left to the different (property law or other) regimes applicable under the national laws. It is noteworthy that Book VII presupposes that there may be additional rules to be taken into account when dealing with issues covered in the present Chapter, and explicitly provides that such other rules will take precedence over the unjustified enrichment rules; see VII.–7:101 (Other private law rights to recover) paragraph (3) and Comment C to that provision. Accordingly, including a set of rules like Chapter 7 of this Book seems to be the appropriate way of dealing with the issue within the framework of these model rules.

B. Scope of application, paragraph (1)

General criterion of owner's right to obtain or recover possession at the time the relevant event occurs. The general requirement for Chapter 7 to apply is that the owner is entitled, as against the possessor, to obtain possession of the goods by virtue of "revindication" in the sense of VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1). This prerequisite must be fulfilled at the moment when the relevant event occurs, i.e. when (a) the act or omission causing damage to the goods takes place, (b) the respective benefit is obtained by the possessor, or (c) when the possessor incurs expenditure on the goods. This is important for distinguishing the scope of Chapter 7 from other rules of law governing similar questions in other situations.

P takes advantage of the fact that the owner (O) of a sailing boat stays abroad for four weeks, and uses O's boat, without permission of the latter, for a nice sailing tour in the Stockholm archipelago. After that, P returns the boat in an undamaged condition. He, however, saves the cost of leasing a sailing boat for that time. Chapter 7 will apply since the owner would have had a right to demand the return of the boat all the time P had it in possession, and since the benefit from using the boat was obtained at that time. O's rights in relation to these benefits will be governed by VIII.–7:103 (Fruits from, use of, and other benefits derived from the goods during possession).

O, a car rental firm, owns a number of cars and provides its customer P with a temporary right to use one of these cars under a contract for the lease of goods in the sense of Book IV Part B. If the car is damaged during the lease period, the question of whether the lessee P is liable for that damage will be assessed according to the rules governing the lease of goods, i.e. one has to assess whether the lessee handled the car with such care as can reasonably be expected in the circumstances, as provided for by IV.B.–5:104 (Handling the goods in accordance with the contract), and award damages in accordance with Book III, Chapter 3 (Remedies for non-performance). Also, where the lessee has incurred expenditure on the goods for the purpose of preserving them, the lessee's right to reimbursement will be assessed according to IV.B.–5:105 (Intervention to avoid danger or damage to the goods). Chapter 7 of Book VIII will not apply, although a possessor (P) has physical control over the owner's (O's) goods at the time the car is damaged. But P, at this time, has a right to possess the car in the sense of VIII.–1:207 (Possession by limited-right-possessor) in relation to the owner O, which excludes the owner's right to recover possession at the relevant time; compare VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1).

However, it should be immaterial whether the owner formally invokes the remedy provided for by VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1). Only the "abstract" entitlement to such remedy is decisive. The owner may, e.g., also resort to VIII.–6:301 (Entitlement to recover in case of better possession), or the goods may be returned voluntarily without the owner even knowing that they have meanwhile been in the hands of another person (cf. Illustration 1). The wording "obtain or recover possession of the goods", parallel to VIII.–6:101 paragraph (1), also covers the hypothetical situation of the owner never having been in possession of the goods so far.

Point in time when entitlement to recover must exist. As already stated, the prerequisite for the owner's entitlement to obtain or recover possession of the goods in the sense of VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1) must exist at the time the relevant event occurs. With regard to (a) the issues covered by VIII.–7:102 (Loss of, or damage to, the goods during possession), this relates to the time when the possessor's act or omission causing damage to the goods, or other event for which the possessor is liable under paragraph (2) of the named provision, takes place. It does not matter if, as a result of this event, a right to recover possession as against this person no longer exists because the goods are completely destroyed, got lost or have been alienated to a third party. Similarly, regarding (b) the issues covered by VIII.–7:103 (Fruits from, use of, and other benefits derived from the goods during possession), one will also take into account the time of the event from which the benefit arises. For example, where the possessor uses the owner's coal for heating and so receives a benefit , it is irrelevant that there may be no coal left to return to the owner. Where fruits or other benefits disappear at a later time, this may possibly have an impact on the extent of the enrichment to be reversed, see VIII.–7:103 Comment B, but will not affect the applicability of Chapter 7 as such. Finally, regarding (c) the issues covered by VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession), one will look at the time when the relevant act involving the incurring of expenses, or improvement effort, is undertaken by the possessor. Again, where the effect of this act is reduced or extinguished or, conversely, an additional effect appears at a later time (e.g. where the owner later sells the property and obtains an additional enrichment due to the improvements made by the possessor), this may have an impact on the extent of the owner's obligations as against the possessor see VIII.–7:104 Comment B, but will not affect the applicability of Chapter 7 as such. Another instance where the "at that time" formula becomes relevant is this Chapter's application to transfers based on avoided contracts; see Comment B, below.

Purpose; application by analogy. Illustration 2, above, illustrates the purpose of the requirement of an "entitlement to revindication" in the sense of the present provision. It ensures that where a specific legal relationship exists which already addresses the issues covered by this Chapter, those rules will apply and Book VIII, Chapter 7 does not interfere. This should, however, not exclude applying certain rules of Book VIII, Chapter 7 by analogy where a legal relationship providing the possessor with a right to possess does exist, but some of the issues regulated in the present Chapter are not regulated by the rules governing that legal relationship and do not follow from an interpretation of the contract. But whether such an analogy is appropriate must be decided primarily by having regard to the nature and purposes of that legal relationship. The question may, for instance, come up where a storer (possessor) uses the stored goods owned by the client without the latter having authorised such use in the sense of IV.C.–5:103 (Protection and use of the stored thing).

Non-exhaustive list of examples. The following Comments will provide a non-exhaustive overview of situations which, under these model rules, may fall within the "entitled to obtain or recover possession of the goods" test of Chapter 7. This shows that the potential field of application of Chapter 7 is rather broad and the subject matters are quite diverse. It should be underlined, and will also follow from the Notes on Chapter 7, that not all of these situations are necessarily subject to a separate set of rules governing the "owner's" relation to a "possessor" under those national legal systems which contain such a specific set of rules (see Comment C, below). It may also be worth noting, since this will play a certain role in some of the policy considerations concerning the subsequent Articles, that some of the e situations listed in this Comment involve only two parties, i.e. the owner and the possessor, whereas others are three-party constellations.

Transfer based on void or avoided contract. The prerequisites set forth in this Article will be fulfilled where the owner transfers the goods based on a contract which is void from the beginning, e.g. because of legal incapacity of one of the parties where the consequence of invalidity is provided for by the relevant national law, and a relevant event as listed under (a) to (c) in Comment A above takes place while the transferee possesses the goods. The same will apply where the contract between transferor and transferee is avoided with retroactive proprietary effect. Technically, this follows from VIII.–2:202 (Effect of initial invalidity, subsequent avoidance, withdrawal, termination and revocation) paragraph (2), which provides that where the underlying contract or other juridical act is avoided under Book II Chapter 7, ownership is deemed to have never passed to the transferee. For the purposes of this Article, this means that the owner, retrospectively, is deemed to have been entitled to recover possession all the time since delivery to the transferee (possessor) was made. As will be expanded on in more detail below when discussing the policies of the individual Articles of this Chapter, this is not intended to be the mere result of an interaction with certain other rules, but rather is based on deliberate choices made when establishing the substantive proposals for Chapter 7; compare VIII.–7:103 (Fruits from, use of, and other benefits derived from the goods during possession) Comment B.

Invalid or avoided right of use. The owner will also be entitled to recover possession of the goods in the sense of this Article, where the goods have been handed over to the possessor based on an initially invalid, or subsequently avoided, right of use. One may think of an invalid contract for the lease of goods in the sense of Book IV Part B, or of a right of usufruct as provided for by national law.

Right to use goods has ended. Chapter 7 may also apply where a right of use was, originally, validly established, but has already ended when the relevant event occurs. This may be the case, for example, where goods are used by the former lessee (possessor) after the end of the agreed lease period and the requirements for a prolongation of the lease contract under IV.B.–2:103 (Tacit prolongation) are not met.

Theft, unauthorised use, confusion of goods. Chapter 7 will also apply in the case of theft in the sense of an (intended) permanent dispossession, which is one of the paradigmatic examples of an owner being entitled to have the goods returned from the possessor (thief). Moreover, the requirements of this Article will be fulfilled where the possessor does not intend to dispossess the owner permanently, but just uses the owner's goods temporarily and the relevant event occurs during that time (cf. illustration 1, above). Chapter 7 will furthermore apply where a person erroneously confuses that person's own goods with those of another person, e.g. where someone, by mistake, takes another's coat or umbrella from the cloakroom in a restaurant.

Finding not intended to be covered. Formally, the prerequisite that the owner is entitled to recover the goods from the possessor will also be met in the case of finding, i.e. where someone deliberately assumes physical control of another's property which has been lost by that other person. However, this area of law is governed by a special regime in most European countries, which pursues specific policies. In particular, the finder is mostly provided with certain incentives such as a finder's reward, reimbursement of expenses and, perhaps, a possibility to acquire ownership of the lost item in order to comply with duties such as informing the owner or a competent public authority and handing over the found goods to the latter, which, as a whole, will increase the owner's chances to recover the property. Taking into account these special policies and the various differences in the related national rules, acquisition of ownership by finding has been excluded from the scope of Book VIII from the beginning; see VIII.–1:101 (Scope of application) paragraph (2) limb (h). This exclusion should be understood in a broad sense. Besides the issue of acquiring ownership, it also applies to related issues such as reimbursement of the finder's expenses. Finding, therefore, is intended to be exempted from Chapter 7 altogether by virtue of the named rule. This, however, does not exclude applying the rules of Chapter 7 by analogy to the extent that national law is silent about an issue regulated in this Chapter, provided that this is compatible with the purposes of the respective national legal framework governing this area.

Goods obtained from a non-owner for the purpose of acquisition provided that the possessor did not acquire ownership. The owner (A) will furthermore be entitled to recover the goods from a possessor (C) who "acquired" them from a non-owner (B), provided that neither good faith acquisition under Chapter 3 nor acquisition by continuous possession under Chapter 4 has taken place. Taking into account the basic rules of VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership), Chapter 7 may apply, in particular, where the contract between non-owner B and good faith acquirer C is void or avoided; where the possessor did not acquire for value (contract of donation in the relation B–C); where C was not in good faith; where C "acquires" stolen goods unless purchased from a transferee acting in that person's ordinary course of business; or in case stolen cultural objects are "acquired". In relation to Chapter 4, the main prerequisite for Chapter 7 to apply is that the relevant period for acquisition by continuous possession has not yet elapsed. It may be notable that such situations of a failed acquisition from a non-owner have, since the times of ancient Roman law, played an important role in the historical development of specific legal rules favouring a possessor in good faith, which exist in many European legal systems today (see Comment C, below, and the Notes on this Chapter).

Right of use granted by a non-owner. Since the model rules do not provide for any good faith acquisition with regard to rights of use, Chapter 7 may generally apply where, e.g., a non-owner (B) leases the owner's (A's) property to a third person (the possessor C). The owner will be entitled to recover the goods from the possessor irrespective of whether the latter uses the goods in exchange for a price and whether the possessor is in good faith or not. This will be different where national law provides for good faith acquisition of a proprietary right of use, compare VIII.–1:204 (Limited proprietary rights) limb (b).

Service provided to third party: garage cases etc. One may finally consider situations where an "unauthorised" person, such as a thief of goods, enters into a contract with another person and hands the goods over to that person who, in performance of the obligations under that contract, improves the goods. For example, a garage-owner repairs a stolen car under a contract concluded with the thief who, however, does not pay the price. Such a situation may also fall within the scope of Chapter 7 since the garage-owner – like the thief – will have no right to possess as against the owner at the time the car is repaired.

C. Different approaches in the European legal systems

Application of general rules of the law of obligations. As will follow in more detail from the Notes on the subsequent Articles, some European legal systems tend to solve the issues covered by Chapter 7 with general rules; that is to say, basically with the relevant provisions on non-contractual liability for damage and unjustified enrichment. This applies, for instance, to the common law countries, to the Nordic countries and, to some extent, to French law.

Specific rules in a property law context. In many other European legal systems, being influenced by the Roman law tradition, the issues (a) to (c) are addressed by a specific set of rules, dealing with these issues as a kind of annex to the owner's right to revindication or in a section on possession. The Roman law heritage results in certain main differentiations which still appear as basic structural elements today. The main dividing line in most legal systems is a differentiation between possessors in good faith and possessors in bad faith (whereby "good faith" does not necessarily mean the same in all countries). Often, a differentiation between events taking place before or after the initiation of legal proceedings against the possessor (derived from the Roman litis contestatio) is added. With regard to expenses (issue (c)), the differentiation between "necessary", "useful" and other ("sumptuary") expenses has become a common feature. On a very general level, the common core of these national rules can be summarised as a tendency to privilege a possessor in good faith, as compared to the results that would be achieved if such special rules did not exist. For the purposes of discussing the policy issues of Chapter 7 in the subsequent Comments, this approach will be called the "owner-possessor relationship" approach, a term which is borrowed from German legal terminology. It should be added, as will also follow from the Notes, that in hardly any legal system is this set of rules applied to all the situations listed above in Comment B. The situation of unwinding synallagmatic contracts, for instance, is deliberately left to unjustified enrichment law in most countries. In several countries, difficulties arise in so far as the relation of these specific owner-possessor relationship rules to the general law on non-contractual liability for damage non-contractual liability and unjustified enrichment law is unclear or disputed.

D. General approach taken in Chapter 7

Reference to general rules of Books VI and VII. Providing a mere restatement of commonly accepted European principles seems to be unrealistic in this area, due to the stated differences between the national legal systems. The general approach taken in Chapter 7 is to resolve issues (a) to (c) by basically referring to the general rules on non-contractual liability for damage (Book VI), unjustified enrichment (Book VII) and, although it is only occasionally relevant, benevolent intervention in another's affairs (Book V). A specific set of rules along the traditional lines of the owner-possessor relationship approach (cf. Comment C) is not adopted. Rather, the general non-contractual liability non-contractual liability and unjustified enrichment principles are supplemented or slightly modified where a different result appeared preferable, taking into account the comparative background. However, the latter is the case in quite a limited number of instances.

General reasons for this approach. The proposed approach has mainly been developed by way of an evaluative comparison of the results achieved under the European legal systems and the results that would be arrived at if the issues were left to the general principles already existing within these model rules (Books VI and VII). This analysis will be reflected in the Comments on the subsequent Articles of Chapter 7. Besides, more general aspects have been taken into account, such as the question of coherence, which arises almost inevitably in the present context. Adopting a specific regime of, for example, rules following the patterns of the owner-possessor relationship tradition, would presuppose that there exist good reasons for treating a possessor of a corporeal movable asset differently from someone who, e.g., uses an intellectual property right in good faith, but without being entitled to do so, so that liability under Book VII will arise. Furthermore, striving for simplicity was regarded as attractive where a deeper analysis shows that ultimately no further layer of law is needed. This may be the case because either comparable results can be achieved also by applying general rules, or the policies underlying the owner-possessor relationship rules appear questionable and the results achieved under general rules are considered to be preferable.

Still a separate Chapter. One may question whether a separate Chapter in Book VIII is really needed where the general approach is to subject the issues dealt with here to general rules provided elsewhere. There is evidently a point in that. The main explanation for Chapter 7 existing in its present form will have to be seen in its character of a model law. As already pointed out in Comment A above, there is, on the level of substance, a certain value in having a defined place for testing the general rules of Books VI and VII within the specific context of the situation where an owner is entitled to recover goods from another person. Also, on a more technical level, there is some value in clarifying that these issues are not intended to be left to the different concepts which may be applicable under current national laws. Finally, the relevant parts of these model rules are expressly pointed out to the reader of the black letter text.

E. Relation to Book V on benevolent intervention, paragraph (2)

Situations covered by Book V. Situations where a person other than the owner exercises physical control over goods may also fall within the scope of Book V on benevolent intervention in another's affairs. According to V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another), Book V basically presupposes that this person exercising physical control acts "with the predominant intention of benefiting another" (in the context relevant here: with the predominant intention of benefiting the owner of the goods concerned). That means that the person exercising control actually knows that he or she is not the owner. E.g., someone detects that goods owned by another are exposed to a risk of sustaining damage, and takes them with the intention of preserving them in the interest of the owner, who is absent. One may discuss whether such a person will, at the time of the benevolent intervention, be subject to the owner's entitlement to recover possession in the sense of paragraph (1) of this Article. If the owner shows up and demands the goods back, the answer will clearly be in the affirmative; but according to the current situation, the owner does not. Rather, the intervener is not allowed to discontinue the intervention without good reason, V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (2). The intervener may, therefore, be under a duty to keep the goods under his or her control. It should, however, be irrelevant how such situations are to be treated under paragraph (1) since there are clear policy reasons, as reflected below, to subject these cases to Book V, which is therefore spelled out explicitly in paragraph (2).

Policy and main effects of the reference to Book V. Book V pursues specific policies by specific means. People should not be discouraged from helping others where necessary; rather, incentives to act in such a way are to be established. For this reason, there is a clear preference that, in any situation of possible overlap, Book V should apply and not be displaced by any specific property law-related rules or general non-contractual damage non-contractual liability or unjustified enrichment law rules. There do not seem to be any good reasons why an intervener who, while "possessing" corporeal movable property for the benefit of the owner, causes damage to these goods, or incurs expenses on the asset for the benefit of its owner, should be governed by a regime other than the one governing other benevolent interveners. Rather, a "possessing" intervener who causes damage to the goods, should be liable as against the owner (principal) under the specific rules of Book V, in particular under V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty) which provides for a special possibility to reduce or exclude the intervener's liability in its paragraph (2). VIII.–7:102 (Loss of, or damage to, the goods during possession) which refers to the general rules of Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage is superseded. Equally, the rules of Book V Chapter 3 (Rights and authority of intervener) should apply where an intervener in the sense of Book V incurs expenditure on the goods. One effect is that the success of the venture is not essential, provided that and in so far as the expenditure was reasonably incurred for the purposes of the intervention, cf. V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification and reimbursement), which differs from the results achieved under this Chapter (see VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession)).

F. Character of the rules

Non-mandatory character. The rights and obligations arising under Chapter 7 (in conjunction with the referred rules of Books V, VI and VII) are subject to the principle of party autonomy in the sense of II.–1:102 (Party autonomy) and can, therefore, be varied by party agreement, subject to the general limitations to this principle under the relevant provisions of these model rules. This applies to subsequent settlements as well as to agreements made in advance. The latter are unlikely to appear in a couple of situations covered by Chapter 7, but one may think of an agreement between the parties to a contract for the lease of goods establishing a certain liability regime for the case where the goods are not returned in due time after expiration of the lease contract.

G. Relation to Chapter 5, paragraph (3)

General. The scope of Chapter 7 and the scope of Chapter 5 on production, combination and commingling may overlap in a number of cases because the events covered there will often consist of an act undertaken by someone who, at that time, possesses the goods without being entitled to them as against the owner. In general, it is intended that the rules of Chapter 5, which can be regarded as the more specific ones and may bring about a change in proprietary positions, take precedence over the rules of Chapter 7 in so far as the results would not be compatible.

Particular instances. This means that where "new goods" are produced out of the owner's material, VIII.–5:201 (Production) will apply and take precedence over VIII.–7:104

(Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession), which could otherwise be applied if one regards the transformation into "new goods" as an expenditure on the existing goods. Where the labour contribution is of minor importance or no new goods are produced, the results provided for by VIII.–5:201 (Production) paragraph (3) which refers to VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) – and VIII.–7:104(1) actually converge (cf. VIII.–5:203 Comment D). Where a possessor commingles the owner's goods with the possessor's own ones or with the goods of other owners, VIII.–5:202 will regulate the proprietary consequences of this event. However, if this causes a loss to the owner, the owner's rights resulting therefrom will be subject to VIII.–7:102 (Loss of, or damage to, the goods during possession) which, in turn, basically refers to the rules on non-contractual liability for damage of Book VI. Finally, VIII.–5:203 will take precedence over VIII.–7:104 (Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession) with regard to the proprietary effects if the possessor physically adds any items to the owner's goods. Where the possessor's part – which will be the practically most important case – constitutes a "subordinate part" in relation to the owner's "principal part", the calculation of the possessor's claim for payment which may arise from such an occurrence is identical to the one provided by VIII.–7:104 paragraph (1). See VIII.–5:203 paragraph (2) sentence 2 and Comment D on that Article. Where, on the other hand, combination results in the creation of co-ownership, VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (3) prevails; cf. Comment E on that Article. With regard to maintenance costs incurred by the possessor, no overlap between Chapters 5 and 7 occurs. See also VIII.–7:104 Comment D regarding the possessor's right to remove added parts and VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions). Comments C and H on the relation between Chapter 5 and Chapter 7 (and unjustified enrichment law) in general.

NOTES

1. The DUTCH CC art. 3:120 regulates the legal consequences of possession in good faith, while CC art. 3:121 provides for the legal consequences of possession in bad faith. Some of those rules refer to the law on unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability for damage on-contractual liability. Pursuant to CC art. 6:275, the rules of CC arts. 3:120 and 3:121 regarding the restitution of fruits and the reimbursement of costs and compensation for damage apply mutatis mutandis to the case of the setting aside of a synallagmatic contract and the obligation to reverse performance which have already been received under the contract. This provision was necessary because the creditor of that obligation is not the owner of the object. As the setting aside of a contract does not have proprietary effect, the acquirer is obliged to transfer the ownership of the object back to the original transferor (Faber/Lurger [-Salomons], National Reports VI: The Netherlands, 138).
2. A similar structure can be found in the SWISS CC. CC arts. 938-939 regulate the position of the possessor in good faith in the case of restitution, while art. 940 provides for the rules on possession in bad faith. These articles do not refer to the provisions of the law on unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability , although the possessor in bad faith is de facto treated according to the principles of unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability law. The general rules dealing with the restitution of the goods to their rightful owner (CC arts. 938-940) also apply to situations where the contract is void or avoided with retroactive effect (ex tunc; Faber/Lurger [-Foëx/Marchand], National Reports VI: Switzerland, 67).
3. The ITALIAN legislator considers the possession of another person's goods as being something unlawful. In principle, the provisions of non-contractual liability and unjustified enrichment law are applicable. However, the possessor in good faith receives a better treatment with regard to the restitution of the fruits or the reimbursement of the expenses incurred on the goods, since the legislator, nonetheless, considers it unjust to subject a person, who used the goods in the firm belief of being the owner, to further "punishment" in addition to having to return the goods (Tomassetti, Il possesso, in Giurisprudenza critica 2005, 462).

4. In AUSTRIA, the position of the possessor in good faith and the possessor in bad faith is regulated in CC §§ 329 ff. The main aim of these rules is to mitigate the responsibility of, and to provide certain privileges for, a possessor in good faith. The rules provided in CC §§ 329 ff are regarded as problematic to a great extent. Partly, the black letter text is simply misleading. The norms do not form a consistent set of rules which is fully compatible with other parts of the Civil Code. As a consequence, interpretation has always been highly controversial. The main problem is the relationship of these rules to the rules on unjustified enrichment. According to the prevailing opinion, the unjustified enrichment rules prevail in the end, but applying them is all but simple. A second difficulty is the exact relationship to the rules on non-contractual liability for damage. On the other hand, the relationship to the rules of negotiorum gestio (benevolent intervention in another's affaires, Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag, CC §§ 1035 ff) is rather clear. As these rules only apply if the possessor wants to act in the owner's interest, there is almost no overlap. The main point of discussion in legal writing and case law is how to bring CC §§ 329 ff in line with other parts of the Civil Code (Faber/Lurger [-Faber], National Reports I: Austria, 193).

5. There is no common concept for all situations under ESTONIAN law. The rules which have to be applied depend on the conflict situation: they will either be the provisions of unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability law, or the separate set of rules provided in PropLA §§ 84-88. The latter provisions apply when the relationship between the owner and the possessor is neither based on a preceding contractual relationship nor on a relationship of unjustified enrichment or negotorium gestio. Those rules set forth certain modifications to the general law on non-contractual liability for damage and unjustified enrichment. With regard to void and avoided contracts, the rules of unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability law are applicable (Faber/Lurger [-Kullerkupp], National Reports I: Estonia, 103).

6. The same distinction is made under LITHUANIAN law. In situations where the owner has no right of an obligatory nature against the possessor of the thing, the property law rules provided for by CC arts. 4.95 and 4.97 apply. If there is an obligation between the owner and the unlawful possessor, the rules on restitution regulated in Book 6 "Law on Obligations" are applied (Faber/Lurger [-Mikelenas], National Reports III: Lithuania, 70).

7. Also in the CZECH REPUBLIC, situations of transfer based on a void or avoided contract are regulated by the rules on unjustified enrichment. However, at the same time another claim based on CC § 126 is admitted. The owner is entitled to claim the restitution of the thing, irrespective of the previous obligatory relationship based on the (invalid, avoided) contract or the unjustified enrichment relationship (Faber/Lurger [-Tichý], National Reports VI: Czech Republic, 70).

8. A similar approach is followed in SLOVENIA. In the case of void and avoided contracts, every party has to return to the other party everything it has received under the contract (Code of Obligations, art. 187/II). In the remaining situations, a separate set of rules provided in Code of Property Law arts. 95-96 applies (Faber/Lurger [-Rudolf/Rijavek/Keresteš], National Reports I: Slovenia, 105).

9. This is likewise the case in HUNGARY. If the transfer is based on a void or avoided contract, the situation is regulated according to the principle of in integrum restitutio (CC § 237(1)): objective restoration of a situation in which no agreement has been entered into. With regard to the other situations, a separate set of rules (rules on possession without legal grounds; CC arts. 193-195) is applicable (Faber/Lurger [-Szilagyi], National Reports III: Hungary, 94).

10. Also BELGIAN law makes a distinction between situations where restitution is due after a retroactive termination of a translative agreement (restitutio status quo ante) and situations where the owner and the possessor had no contractual relationship (Faber/Lurger [-Cauffman/Sagaert], National Reports IV: Belgium, 98-104).

11. The SPANISH CC provides for a special set of rules in articles 451 ff. These rules are applicable as long as no special rules have to be applied on the basis of a specific relationship between the parties (Faber/Lurger [-González Pacanowska/Díez Soto], National Reports V: Spain, 91). In cases of annulled contracts, it has been acknowledged that the provisions set forth in CC art. 1.303 do not exclude the application of CC art. 451 (STS 10 February 1970, RJ. 792; STS 14 June 1976, RJ. 2752).

12. The GREEK CC, too, contains special regulations with regard to the restitution of goods (CC arts. 1096-1100). In some situations, however, the provisions on wrongful acts (non-contractual liability law) and unjustified enrichment apply in parallel with this special set of rules. For instance, if the underlying sales contract is avoided but the real transaction is valid, the possessor has to restitute the movable as well as the fruits derived from the movable according to the rules on unjustified enrichment, CC arts. 904 and 908 (Faber/Lurger [-Klaoudatou], National Reports III: Greece, 145). The possessor in bad faith is also liable on the basis of the provisions on non-contractual liability and unjustified enrichment. These provisions are applicable in parallel with the regulations on the possessor's liability provided for in CC art. 1096 ff (Georgiadis, Property Law I, 594).

13. The GERMAN CC provides for a separate set of rules regarding the restitution of goods to the owner (Eigentümer-Besitzer Verhältnis; CC §§ 987-1003). The aim of this special set of rules is to protect the undisputed possessor in good faith from the rules on unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability for damage. If the general provisions of unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability law were applicable, the possessor in good faith would be held liable, even in a case of slight negligence and would be obliged to restitute all the benefits derived from the goods, regardless of fault (Bamberger/Roth [-Fritzsche], BGB II, § 987, no. 3). The German regulation regarding the owner-possessor relationship is heavily criticised in legal writing. The CC §§ 987-1003 are regarded as unclear and complex. Moreover, due to numerous amendments of the law, the rules are not coherent and are sometimes contradictory. It gives rise to problems of interpretation (Bamberger/Roth [-Fritzsche], BGB II, § 987, no. 2; Staudinger [-Gursky], BGB[2006], vor § 987, no. 1; other opinion: Münchener Kommentar [-Medicus], BGB[4], vor §§ 987-1003, no. 22). Whether such a separate set of rules was necessary for the regulation of those conflicts or whether they could have been regulated under the ordinary rules of the law of obligations, is a matter of dispute in German legal writing (see for references in Staudinger [-Gursky], BGB[2006], vor § 987, no. 1).

14. PORTUGUESE law regulates the effects of possession in a separate set of rules: CC arts. 1268–1275.

15. Unlike most civil law jurisdictions, the laws in ENGLAND and WALES, as well as in IRELAND, basically do not contain any property law remedies of revindication. The practical legal means of protecting ownership against interference by third parties is the tort of conversion. Prior to its recognition, restitution was seen as being a part of the law of contract. Essential pre-conditions of the obligation to make restitution are settled. There must be an enrichment of the possessor at the expense of the owner in circumstances in which the law will require restitution (i.e. whether the enrichment was "unjust" is relevant here) and there should be no reason why restitution should not be granted (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 87).

16. No specific rules are to be found in SWEDISH and FINNISH law regulating cases where damage or loss occurs during possession. Restitutionary claims can nevertheless be based on the general law on non-contractual liability (see for SWEDEN: Skadeståndslagen; and for FINLAND: Vahingonkorvauslaki/Skadeståndslagen). If someone is liable for damages, this will be solved based on the culpa-principle.

VIII.–7:102: Loss of, or damage to, the goods during possession

(1) Where the goods are lost, are destroyed or deteriorate during possession in the sense of VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application), the rights of the owner resulting from such loss or damage are determined by Book VI.

(2) For the purposes of this Article, intention or negligence as to possessing the goods despite the owner's entitlement to obtain or recover possession suffice to establish accountability in the sense of Book VI, Chapter 3.

COMMENTS

A. General

What is covered. This Article covers all situations where the owner of the goods, as a result of the other person's possession of them, sustains any loss. The loss may consist, for example, of the value of the goods where they get lost or destroyed during possession and, for that reason, cannot be returned to their owner. The same applies where returning the goods is impossible because they have been consumed, e.g. food eaten up or fuel oil used for heating, or where the goods have been alienated to another person. The loss may consist of a diminution of the goods' value where they are damaged or deteriorate during possession. In any case, the owner may also sustain a loss through being unable to use the asset while it was in the possession of the other person, or being prevented from using it in the future because it cannot be returned. As to situations which fall within the scope of Book V on benevolent intervention in another's affairs, see VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) paragraph (2) and Comment E on that Article.

Relevant time. As to the relevant point in time ("during possession"), see VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment B.

Main approaches in European legal systems and basic policy issues. Common law provides for strict liability and where, as a result of the exclusively tort law based protection of property, the goods are not returned to the owner but a claim for damages is granted, the issue of the subsequent deterioration of the goods does not play any important role. In the Nordic countries, where the goods are returned to the person having a better right in them, the issues covered by this Article will generally be solved under the respective rules on non-contractual liability for damage. Applying a culpa principle, these rules will generally lead to the result that a person possessing in good faith, who, without negligence, believes himself or herself to be entitled to possess, will not be liable for damage occurring to the goods. This also applies in several "continental" European countries which, for issues (b) and (c) as listed in VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment A, have established rules along the lines of an owner-possessor relationship tradition (cf. VIII.–7:101 Comment C). Others extend separate owner-possessor relationship rules also to issue (a) and establish, in the first place, a differentiation between possessors in good faith and possessors in bad faith (in part, adding further sub-differentiations as may be seen from the Notes). Such legal systems regularly contain a rule explicitly spelling out that a possessor in good faith is not liable under the relevant rules on non-contractual liability for damage. In some countries, the liability of a possessor in bad faith – sometimes under the condition of additional qualifications – is extended to fortuitous events, unless the damage would also have occurred had the property still been in the possession of the owner. From this overview, the main policy questions will be, in the first place, whether strict liability or another regime, establishing requirements such as intention and negligence as provided for by Book VI, should apply. A strict liability approach would imply that even a possessor in good faith could be held liable, at least in principle. In case such an approach is not favoured, one may consider whether there are any substantive differences between the "good faith" criterion and an approach as taken by Book VI, which may have a certain impact on the wording employed in this Article. This group of questions will be dealt with in Comment B below. Second, even if no general strict liability approach is adopted, one will have to decide how to deal with someone who is in "bad faith" with regard to entitlement to possess but does not act with intention or negligence in relation to the event finally causing damage to the goods (e.g. a thief storing the stolen goods in an apartment where they are destroyed by fire, the thief however being in no way responsible for the fire). This issue will be discussed in Comment C.

B. The main rule (paragraph (1))

Reference to Book VI on non-contractual liability for damage. Paragraph (1) states that the rights of the owner as against the possessor are determined by the rules on non-contractual liability for damage (Book VI). Basically, this means that the possessor may be liable if he or she causes legally relevant damage intentionally or negligently; see VI.–1:101 (Basic rule). This, in the first place, is a choice against a general strict liability approach. In that, Book VIII follows the basic decision taken for Book VI. There is no obvious reason why damage caused to goods by another person in possession should be subject to a stricter liability regime than, e.g., loss in the form of personal injury. Technically, this approach is also a choice against phrasing the rule in terms of a differentiation between a possessor in good faith and a possessor in bad faith. The following Comments show that this does not imply any important differences as to substance. Finally, the proposed approach brings about some additional advantages, which will also be addressed below.

How the rule works with a person who, in good faith, believes himself or herself to be the owner of the goods. An owner-possessor in the sense of VIII.–1:206 (Possession by owner-possessor) who is in good faith, believes himself or herself to be the rightful owner and is reasonably justified in doing so. This implies that such a possessor may believe himself or herself to be entitled to damage, destroy or abandon the goods, cf. VIII.–1:202 (Ownership). The decisive aspect for the question whether or not such acts trigger liability under Book VI will be the point of reference of the requirements of intention and negligence. From the concept of accountability in Book VI it follows that this reference point is not the possessor's act or omission as such (e.g. throwing a bottle of champagne against the hull of a ship; driving a car too fast so that it crashes) but the causation of legally relevant damage. Applied to our constellations, "legally relevant damage" is not the actual physical deterioration or destruction of the asset, but the loss to the owner. However, since the possessor in good faith assumes himself or herself to be the owner which includes, as pointed out above, the assumption of being "entitled" to do damage to his or her own asset, the possessor's act will not qualify as intentional in the sense of VI.–3:101 (Intention) nor as negligent in the sense of VI.–3:102 (Negligence), even if the possessor destroyed the goods on purpose or the damage occurred because the possessor did not take reasonable care. See VI.–3:101 Comment B with illustration 2.

No specific rule excluding liability of owner-possessor in good faith needed. The result achieved in the previous Comment coincides with what is stated explicitly by a specific rule in some countries dealing with the issue in an owner-possessor relationship context. A possessor in good faith is not liable as against the owner for loss sustained by the latter. To this extent, a specific rule, in addition to the rules of Book VI, is not needed. Also other arguments which are put forward in favour of a specific rule in some legal systems do not have much persuasive power within the context of these model rules. In German law, for instance, where the acquirer acts in "good faith" in the sense of the good faith acquisition rules and where the acquirer is slightly negligent as to the predecessor's lack of entitlement, and the same meaning of the term "good faith" also applies to the owner-possessor relationship rules, a kind of symmetry argument envisaging the protection of commerce is traditionally put forward. It is argued that it would be an inadequate differentiation if a person who purchases goods from a non-owner in slight negligence regularly acquired ownership in "good faith", but would be exposed to full non-contractual liability for damage where the goods have been stolen or lost (so that good faith acquisition is excluded under the relevant national good faith acquisition provisions). Against this background, the explicit exclusion of non-contractual liability under the German owner-possessor relationship is said to be justified in order to provide at least some protection in the case of a slightly negligent "acquisition" of stolen goods. Such an argument cannot, however, be brought forward in relation to these model rules, since good faith acquisition is excluded in relation to any form of negligence, see VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership).

How the rule works with a person who, in good faith, believes himself or herself to be entitled to use the goods. Where the possessor, in good faith, believes himself or herself to be entitled to the mere use of the goods (in contrast to good faith related to a right of ownership in the goods), the possessor must, anyway, respect another person's property right and expect to be liable, should he or she cause damage to the goods. There is, in other words, no reasonably justified belief to be entitled to damage the goods. Applying the general liability regime of Book VI will, therefore, be an appropriate solution. As for examples, see the situations described in VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment B.

How the rule works with a possessor in bad faith. Where, on the other hand, a possessor is in bad faith, the possessor knows or has reason to assume that the goods must be returned. This applies to a person who possesses as, or as if, an owner in the sense of VIII.–1:206 (Possession by owner-possessor) as well as to someone who purports to be entitled to merely use the goods. Where such a person destroys the goods on purpose or as a consequence of acting carelessly, there is no question that the requirements of intention or negligence, respectively, in the sense of Book VI will be fulfilled and liability under that Book arises. There is no need to correct this result. It converges with the results arrived at under the European legal systems. As to the question how the current Article works in relation to a person who is in bad faith as to the entitlement to possess, but has no reasonable possibility of preventing the event actually causing the damage, see Comment C below.

Further implications of the general reference to Book VI. The reference to Book VI should be understood as being a general one. It comprises general principles such as causation as well as more specific provisions of Book VI. For instance, a possessor under the age of eighteen may be held liable only to the extent permitted by VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen) and the possessor's liability to compensate can be reduced, where this is fair and reasonable, under the provisions of VI.–6:202 (Reduction of liability); as to the latter rule, see also Comment C below. Also VI.–5:102 (Contributory fault and accountability) applies, which allows flexible solutions where the owner also contributed to the occurrence or extent of the damage.

C. The function of paragraph (2)

Situations addressed. Paragraph (2) addresses situations where the possessor is in bad faith, so that there may be liability under this Article in principle, but where the damage itself results from a fortuitous event, i.e. independent of any act or omission attributable to the possessor.

> Illustration
> A thief, P, steals three valuable paintings from a museum and stores them in a house. Before P is able to sell them, an arsonist sets the house on fire, which destroys the paintings. P is not present when the fire takes place and has no way of preventing the paintings from being destroyed.

Policy underlying the proposed rule. As can be seen from the Notes, the national legal systems in Europe differ as to the question whether a possessor in bad faith is liable for fortuitous events. Taking into account the regime of Book VI, it may be arguable that a possessor who actually knows that the goods must be returned will be under an extended duty of care in order to preserve the property. As long as such reasoning is possible and the damage occurs as a consequence of not meeting the relevant standard of care, paragraph (2) of the present Article has no substantive effect. It seems, however, preferable to extend liability also to situations where such argumentation does not help. This, in the first place, applies where the possessor knows about the lack of entitlement: With regard to the loss equivalent to the value of the goods (cf. Comment A above), the issue is in some way comparable to the issue of the passing of risk, arising in contract law. Taking into account that the possessor should have returned the goods from the beginning and positively knows this, it seems preferable to place the risk on the possessor rather than on the owner. Phrasing the rule in terms of a rule on non-contractual liability instead of in terms of a risk rule, however, makes it possible to cover also additional losses which may occur, e.g., in relation to being deprived of use after the goods were destroyed (any loss from being deprived of use before the goods were damaged will be covered by the general rules of Book VI anyway). Second, it seems preferable not to limit the provision to cases of actual knowledge because, on the one hand, the deliberations about the passing of risk may be considered all the more appropriate the more careless the possessor was with regard to the lack of entitlement, and, on the other hand, Book VI happens to provide a provision which makes it possible to mitigate the possessor's burden flexibly where necessary (see Comment C below). Again, referring to Book VI provides appropriate solutions where there is contributory negligence on the part of the owner (cf. Comment B above).

How the rule works. In order to achieve the functions described in Comment C above, paragraph (2) provides that the requirement of accountability in the sense of VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) and Book VI Chapter 3 is satisfied if the intention or negligence test is fulfilled with regard to the non-entitled possession itself. This means that possessing the goods in bad faith may be sufficient to trigger liability, even if there is no intention or negligence in relation to the event actually producing the damage. This coincides with a couple of legal systems, but may possibly appear a bit harsh at first sight when it comes to possessors whose degree of negligence with regard to the entitlement to possess is rather low, whereas the loss caused is rather high. But this problem can be solved internally by the rules of Book VI (see below, Comment C), which actually facilitates the choice for a full reference to the rules of Book VI in general. Also, due to this general reference to Book VI, accountability is not the only prerequisite for liability. Where there is not even a causal nexus between possession and the occurrence of the damage, i.e. where the goods would also have sustained the same damage if they had remained in the possession of their owner, no liability will arise; cf. VI.–1:101 and VI.–4:101 (General rule). This restriction corresponds to the solution provided for in many national legal systems which have adopted such a liability for fortuitous events.

Reduction of liability under VI.–6:202 possible. As mentioned above, any degree of fault (intention, gross or even slight negligence) in relation to the possessor's lacking entitlement to possess suffices to fulfil the general requirements for liability under paragraph (2). However, where, in particular in the case of a possessor who is only slightly negligent as to the non-existence of the right to possess, liability would appear disproportionate, VI.–6:202 (Reduction of liability) provides for a flexible instrument to reduce the possessor's liability. The requirements set forth in this provision fit very well with the purposes of paragraph (2) of the present Article: The general guidelines being fairness and reasonableness, liability may be reduced wholly or in part provided that full liability would be disproportionate when having regard to a number of aspects. The first requirement is that the damage must not have been caused intentionally. Whereas intention in relation to the event ultimately causing the damage will not exist in the situations covered by paragraph (2) (see Comment C above), this basic value judgement can be taken into account when applying the rule to a person who possesses goods while actually knowing that the owner is entitled to recover them. Further aspects to be taken into account when applying the "disproportionate" test are, first, the "accountability of the person causing the damage". In the situations covered by paragraph (2) of the present Article, the degree of accountability is "weakened" not only by the fortuitous nature of the event finally causing the damage, but may be lowered in particular where the possessor was only slightly negligent with regard to the right to possess. Second, regard must be had to the extent of the damage, and third, to the means of preventing it, again facilitating a reduction of compensation due to the absence of means to prevent the damage caused by the fortuitous event. This instrument appears flexible enough to cope with the wide range of hypothetical variations that may underlie paragraph (2). The defence established by VI.–5:302 (Event beyond control), on the other hand, will play no important role in the present context. As can be seen from the Comments on that provision, it is designed for operating in the realm of strict liability.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. Under SLOVENIAN and SWISS law, the possessor in good faith cannot be held liable.
2. In BELGIUM, GERMANY, ESTONIA, GREECE and HUNGARY, the possessor in good faith is only liable for damages which occurred after the initiation of the rei vindicatio. In principle, the same applies in AUSTRIA; however, in some situations, as in case of the consumption of the goods, the rightful owner could claim for damages under the provisions on unjustified enrichment. Under DUTCH law, the possessor in good faith is liable as from the time when informed by the rightful owner that the latter is enforcing the ownership right. In SPAIN, in order to be able to claim for damages it has to be proved that the possessor in good faith acted with fraudulent intent. Also in PORTUGAL, the possessor in good faith is liable, if he or she acted culpably.
3. In LITHUANIA and ITALY, the possessor in good faith is regarded as liable for every deterioration or loss of the goods.

4. In BELGIUM, the NETHERLANDS, ESTONIA, SLOVENIA and HUNGARY, the possessor in bad faith is liable for all losses, except for those which would also have occurred if the goods had remained in the possession of the rightful owner. The same holds true under SWISS law; however a special regulation applies to the possessor in bad faith who does not know to whom the goods have to be returned: the possessor in this case is liable only for damage caused by fault.

5. In SPAIN, the possessor is liable for every deterioration or loss of the goods, even if caused by force majeure, provided that the possessor fraudulently delayed the delivery of the goods to their rightful owner. Under GERMAN and GREEK law, the possessor is only liable for damages caused by fault; however, if possession has been obtained through an illegal act (in GERMANY: criminal act or unlawful dispossession (verbotene Eigenmacht)), the possessor is liable for any kind of damage, including fortuitous events and accidental losses.

6. In AUSTRIA, the possessor in bad faith is liable for all losses caused by the possession. It is matter of dispute to what extent the possessor is also to be liable for accidental loss or deterioration.

7. Under ITALIAN, PORTUGUESE, CZECH and LITHUANIAN law, the possessor in bad faith is regarded as liable for every deterioration or loss of the goods.

8. The issue of damage or loss during possession in SWEDEN and FINLAND is solved without the use of specific property law concepts. The area is, therefore, not specifically regulated. Property law is not codified in a single law or code, and most of its parts are not regulated at all. The solutions are found in general laws or principles, as well as in Supreme Court decisions: The question of damages is solved through the national Tort Law Act (SWEDEN: Skadeståndslagen; FINLAND: Vahingonkorvauslaki/Skadeståndslagen), based on the culpa-principle, its rules not only being applicable to property law issues. There, the important question is not the possessor's state of mind, but whether the possessor has caused the damage or loss by negligence or wilful intention (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 75 f). If damage has been caused by negligence, the possessor will be liable under non-contractual liability law.

9. According to the NORWEGIAN legislation, the person with the physical control will normally not be liable if the movable subject to restitution is lost or damaged by an accident. If restitution results from the voidness of a contract, the possessor must not, however, be responsible for the contract's invalidity and must not have caused the damage negligently. If the contractual relationship is terminated, the possessor is not liable as long as not to blame for the loss. In other situations, the question of liability will be, just as in SWEDEN and FINLAND, answered according to whether the possessor has been negligent or not. If he or she has been negligent, he or she will be liable according to the rules of non-contractual liability law (Hov, Avtaleslutning og ugyldighet[3], 188 and Faber/Lurger [-Færstad], National Reports V: Denmark/Norway, 80 f).

10. Damages are also an adequate form of compensation under common law in ENGLAND and WALES. The owner of a movable has no right to the specific restitution of it and must, instead, be content with an award of damages representing the value of the thing lost. If the possessor nevertheless retains the owner's movable, the court has, as an extraordinary remedy, discretion to order specific relief (TIGA 1977 s.3(2)(a) and Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England, 9 f and 106). In equity, the position is different. The owner can establish an equitable title to the movable and on that basis seek a declaration from the court that the party in possession holds the chattel on trust for the owner. The owner can thereafter ask the court to order the retransfer of the movable to him or her (Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England, 106). Damages are awarded to the owner, reflecting the value of the movable at the time of conversion. The subsequent deterioration of the movable will normally not matter. If, however, the court grants specific relief, then subsequent losses might be compensated by means of damages for consequential loss (s.3(2)(a) TIGA 1977).

11. The relevant area of law does not seem to be fully regulated in CYPRUS, as there is no comprehensive single property law code, and there are no specific rules regarding an owner's rights when the possessor has damaged or lost the movable. CYPRUS has a "mixed" legal system. Practically, English law is applied in all areas of law, which are not expressly regulated by legislation. One can, therefore, find legal solutions using English legal sources (Faber/Lurger [-Laulhé Shaelou/Stylianou/Anastasiou], National Reports II: Cyprus, 4 ff). See further the notes for ENGLAND and WALES.

12. In SCOTLAND, the former possessor can, at the most, be held liable to restitute the value of the thing (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 175). In this area of law, it appears that legal scholars seldom share the same standpoint and every problem produces a multitude of different opinions and solutions. Some of the deviant opinions will be presented below.

13. In IRELAND, the consequences arising from damage sustained in relation to goods which have to be restored to their owner are complex and at common law, there is a wide variety of claims that can be brought in the case of the misuse of goods, such as tort claims, claims for breach of contract and claims for restitution. The claims often overlap and the area of law is often unclear and lacks consistency. The law has been reformed in ENGLAND by the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, but no legislative reforms have taken place in IRELAND (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 84). There are a number of defences to a restitutionary claim, such as the defence of change of position. It involves a denial that the defendant has been enriched on the basis that the enrichment is no longer in his or her hands. In IRELAND, this defence has been recognised in two cases (Murphy v A.G. (1982) IR 241 and McDonnell v Ireland, unreported Supreme Court of July 23 1997; see also Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 96).

II. Possession in good faith

14. According to the SWISS CC art. 938, the possessor in good faith is entitled to use the goods according to his or her presumed right. Hence, such a possessor is not liable for any damage to the rightful owner's movable. A possessor who believes himself or herself to be the owner, is allowed to damage or destroy the goods, or to alienate them to a third person. The rightful owner can claim neither the purchase price nor the difference between the purchase price and the price that has been paid by the possessor in good faith to obtain the goods (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 507). The possessor is in good faith if the possessor has good reasons to believe that the possession is lawful (Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], vor art. 938-940, no. 8). Good faith is required throughout the whole period, not only at the moment of acquisition. Hence, a possessor in good faith may become a bad faith possessor; for instance, on finding out that the transfer of possession was not based on a valid title (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 501).

15. Also in SLOVENIA, the good faith possessor is not liable for any deterioration or destruction of the movable, and does not have to pay for using it (Code of Property Law art. 95/II). In the case of an avoided or void contract, every party has to return to the other everything it has received (Code of Obligations, art. 187/II).

16. According to BELGIAN law, the good faith possessor is only liable for losses caused by an occurrence which took place after the initiation of the rei vindicatio. This rule is justified by the idea that the possessor was, until that time, entitled to believe that the goods belonged to him or her. Even if the loss was caused intentionally, the possessor does not have to compensate the owner, provided that it occurred before the initiation of the action. Once the revindication action has been initiated, the possessor is, to a certain extent, obliged to safeguard the goods which may have to be returned. Hence, as from this moment, the possessor is liable for losses caused negligently or intentionally, but not for losses due to force majeure (Hansenne, Les biens, no. 673). CC art. 550 provides that the possessor is in good faith if he or she possesses as an owner on the basis of an entitlement to transfer property, of the defects of which he or she is not aware. The good faith ends as soon as the possessor gets to know of the defects. The judge evaluates whether the possessor possesses in good or in bad faith (Van Neste, Beginselen van Belgisch Privaatrecht V2, no. 251). With regard to restitution after retroactive termination of a translative agreement, most scholars do not make a distinction between the debtor in good faith and the debtor in bad faith. The debtor of the restitutionary obligation is bound by an obligation of result (of effecting restitution). If the goods have perished or the value of the goods has diminished beyond the reduction in value that would have been caused by normal "usure", the possessor will have to repair the goods at his or her own expense (Starosselets, T.B.B.R. 2003, 67, no. 26). However, the debtor of the restitutionary obligation is discharged if the object has perished due to vis maior (Starosselets, T.B.B.R. 2003, 67, no. 36). It must be taken into account that the obligation to make restitution is only one side of the mutual obligation. If the debtor of the restitutionary obligation is discharged, the other party (seller) is entitled to refuse repayment of the price (Limpens, La vente, no. 1782; Starosselets, T.B.B.R. 2003, 67, no. 36).

17. In GERMANY, the possessor in good faith is not liable for damage or loss of the goods. This follows from CC § 993 (1), second sentence. The possessor is in good faith if he or she neither knows that he or she is not entitled to possess the goods, nor was grossly negligent at the moment of acquisition. However, the possessor in good faith is liable for damage, consumption, deterioration or loss that occurred after the initiation of the legal proceedings (CC § 989), caused by his or her own fault (intentionally or even with slight negligence); cf. also note 39. Compensation is owed according to CC §§ 249 ff (Wieling, Sachenrecht I^{2}, § 12 III 2). If there is a decrease in value because the thing has been used, the rightful owner is entitled to claim either compensation for damage or the restitution of the benefits (see note 45 to VIII.–7:103; Soergel [-Stadler], BGB^{13}, § 989, no. 14; Bamberger/Roth [-Fritzsche], BGB II, § 989, no. 6). There is no deterioration if the goods have to be used in order to maintain them; e.g. exercising a horse (Soergel [-Stadler], BGB^{13}, § 989, no. 5). When a thing is encumbered with a limited right in rem, it is considered that the thing is changed in a disadvantageous way, resulting in compensation having to be paid (Soergel [-Stadler], BGB^{13}, § 989, no. 6). With regard to the possessor in good faith who obtained possession through a criminal act or unlawful dispossession (verbotene Eigenmacht), see note 39.

18. The GREEK CC distinguishes between the period before and the period after the initiation of the legal proceedings. As long as legal proceedings have not been initiated, the good faith possessor is not liable for the loss of, or deterioration to, the goods (CC art. 1100), since the possessor believes himself or herself to be the lawful owner of the movable asset. However, this does not cover the case where the possessor in good faith alienates the goods, resulting in an enrichment. The owner then has a claim based on the provisions of unjustified enrichment. Regarding the period following the initiation of the legal action, the good faith possessor is liable to compensate the owner if the movable, due to the possessor's fault, was destroyed or damaged or, due to some other reason, cannot be restituted (CC art. 1097). The regulation regarding the impossibility of restitution due to the fact that the possessor has alienated the goods to a third person, depends on whether the acquirer obtained ownership or not. If the acquirer obtained ownership, the possessor is liable according to CC art. 1097 f and, possibly, also according to the provisions of unjustified enrichment and non-contractual liability law and negotiorum gestio. If the acquirer did not obtain ownership, the original owner may claim the goods from the acquirer. This, however, does not mean that the owner is to be burdened with the expenses and hurdles of claiming the goods from the third party. The owner could claim compensation from the possessor according to CC art. 1097 f. If the possessor alienated the goods after the legal action was brought, the decision of the court can be enforced against the third party. If the owner does not enforce the claim against the third party, the owner can claim compensation from the possessor according to CC art. 1097 f.

19. In HUNGARY, the possessor in good faith is not liable for damage which occurred during the period before the claim for restitution was initiated. From the moment when possession is reclaimed, the possessor is only liable if the damage is imputable to him or her (Faber/Lurger [-Szilagyi], National Reports III: Hungary, 96). Nevertheless, if it is obvious that the possessor became a bad faith possessor when the legal proceedings were initiated, the possessor will be liable as a possessor in bad faith (see note 36).

20. Under ESTONIAN law, the possessor in good faith is not liable for the destruction or the decrease in value of the goods, provided that it occurred before the possessor became aware of the filing of the action for restitution. The possessor is only liable for such damage caused by his or her fault after becoming aware of the owner's claim for restitution (PropLA § 84(3)). The possessor is in good faith if the possessor did not know nor was supposed to know about circumstances constituting a basis for reclamation pursuant to the provisions on unjustified enrichment (LObligA § 1035(4)).

21. The general idea of the AUSTRIAN CC § 329 is to treat the good faith possessor like an owner with respect to all kinds of liability (Schwimann [-Klicka], ABGB II^{3}, § 329, no. 1). Hence, a possessor in good faith who uses, consumes or even destroys the movable, is not liable under non-contractual liability law any more than an owner would be The meaning of 'good faith' is defined in the general rule of CC § 326. According to the prevailing opinion, a possessor lacks good faith when the possessor positively knows that he or she is not the owner, and in any case of negligent ignorance of the lack of ownership, including slight negligence. However, the Supreme Court decided that, as to situations where the goods have to be restored due to a void or avoided contract, the possessor is to be treated like a good faith possessor even if both parties knew that the contract would be void and, nevertheless, exchanged performances. The argument was that both parties could assume an understanding that they would not interfere with the other party's rights (OGH 18 September 1991, JBl 1992, 594; OGH 29 May 2001, JBl 2002, 789 (Holzner), both regarding immovable property). According to CC § 338, the possessor who was originally in good faith is considered to be in bad faith as from the moment of official receipt, via the court, of the service of process (Klagszustellung), provided that the possessor loses the lawsuit. However, the possessor in good faith could be under an obligation to compensate the owner for damage if, and to the extent that, the possessor obtained a benefit from the goods (e.g. by consumption). According to the prevailing opinion in case law and legal writing, the rules on unjustified enrichment prevail over CC § 329 in two-party constellations. As to three-party constellations, the prevailing opinion differentiates between whether the possessor 'acquired' or 'used' gratuitously or for value. An acquirer who did not pay for acquiring or using the property must reverse the enrichment to the owner under the unjustified enrichment rules, e.g. must pay for using or consuming the asset if this resulted in damage, or surrender the purchase price received when selling the object to another person; while such obligation does not exist if the possessor paid for acquiring or using the movable because then CC § 329 applies (Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 329, no. 3; Rummel [-Spielbüchler], ABGB I[3], § 329, nos. 1 f). For more details: see note 47 to VIII.–7:103.

22. In SPAIN, this issue is regulated in CC art. 457. According to this provision, the possessor in good faith is not liable for the deterioration or loss of the goods, except in cases where it is proved that the possessor acted with fraudulent intent. This article raises some questions about the possessor's good faith: how can a possessor be in good faith when acting fraudulently? In legal writing, different explanations have been given for this apparent inconsistency. For some legal scholars, the formula refers to the intentional destruction of the thing (but it has to be remembered that the possessor considers himself or herself to be the legitimate possessor); for others, it refers to the damage caused by an abusive exercise of right (CC art. 7(2)), or to the damage intentionally caused when, still being in good faith, the possessor had reason to suspect that he or she would have to restore the thing (e.g. after receiving a judicial summons) (Faber/Lurger [-González Pacanowska/Díez Soto], National Reports V: Spain, 95).

23. According to the PORTUGUESE CC art. 1269, the possessor in good faith is only liable for loss and damage, if he or she acted culpably. The possessor is in good faith if ignorant of the fact that another person's right is being infringed (CC art. 1260).

24. According to the prevailing opinion in CZECH law, the possessor in good faith is not liable for damage to, or loss of, the goods. Only a minority opinion admits claims for damages against the possessor in good faith. The amount of compensation should equal the market value (Faber/Lurger [-Tichý], National Reports VI: Czech Republic, 72). Situations of transfer based on a void or avoided contract are regulated by the rules on unjustified enrichment. Anyone who has been unjustifiably enriched must return what was acquired (Faber/Lurger [-Tichý], National Reports VI: Czech Republic, 70).

25. Under DUTCH law, the legal basis for liability of the possessor towards the owner is non-contractual liability law. This is explicitly stated in CC art. 121(1) with regard to the possessor who is not in good faith (see note 32). See, for more details: Faber/Lurger [-Salomons], National Reports VI: The Netherlands, 139 ff.

26. Under LITHUANIAN law, the owner has the right to claim damages on the basis of non-contractual liability law (Faber/Lurger [-Mikelenas], National Reports III: Lithuania, 71). In case the goods are restored to the owner after the avoidance or termination of a contract between the parties, the CC arts. 6.147-6.148 apply. In case of damage, loss or alienation of the goods, the possessor is bound to compensate for the value of the goods at the time when the thing was received, lost or alienated, or the value at the time of its restitution, whichever is lower (CC art. 6.147). If the goods are destroyed by force majeure, the debtor (possessor) is bound to assign to the creditor (owner) a claim for indemnity for the lost thing or to deliver to the owner the indemnification received for it (CC art. 6.148). If the thing has suffered partial loss or any other decrease in value, the debtor is bound to pay to the creditor the monetary equivalent of such loss or decrease in value, unless it has resulted from normal wear and tear of the thing (Faber/Lurger [-Mikelenas], National Reports III: Lithuania, 72).

27. In ITALY, the possessor who is obliged to return the goods and their fruits can be held liable for the deterioration of the goods or for the impossibility to return them (Faber/Lurger [-Greco], National Reports I: Italy, 45). If the possessor is not in the position to return the goods, either because they have been sold to another person or because they were lost, a distinction is made between the period before and the period after the initiation of the legal proceedings. The possessor, who sold the goods after the initiation of the vindicatio, has to pay compensation of a sum equal to the economic value of the goods, as well as having to compensate for the potential damage inflicted on the owner. In case the goods are destroyed after the initiation of the proceedings, the owner will receive compensation of an amount equal to the economic value of the goods. Finally, if the object was either sold or destroyed before the beginning of the proceedings, the owner cannot recover the goods, but can only bring an action based on the contractual agreement that was perhaps concluded with the possessor, an action for damages, or an action for unjustified enrichment, in order to obtain compensation in the amount of their economic value (Faber/Lurger [-Greco], National Reports I: Italy, 44).

28. In SCOTLAND, if ownership is lost by no fault of the possessor, irrespective of his or her state of mind the possessor will be liable only to the extent of any enrichment (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[4], § 537; nevertheless, see also Ferguson v Forrest (1639) Mor 4145, where the possessor was held liable even though the movable was destroyed without any fault of the possessor). If a possessor in good faith consumes, sells or destroys the goods, he or she is also liable only to the extent of the enrichment (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 175 f). This standpoint has not been left unquestioned in Scotland. Some authorities state that the good faith possessor should be liable for the value of the goods, "probably" calculated at the time of the act of deprivation, while a bad faith possessor "may" also be liable for profits resulting from the wrongful act (Carey Miller/Irvine, Corporeal Moveables[2], 243). These authorities are said to be unsupported by case law (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 176; Faulds v Townsend (1861) 23 D 437 at 439 and North West Securities v Barrhead Coachworks 1976 SC 68). When the property is sold, the owner can sue a good faith possessor only for the profit generated by the resale (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 177). Another opinion brought forward is that it is difficult to impose an obligation on someone who believes the property to be his or hers (Gordon, Scottish Land Law, § 14.59).

29. There are no specific rules governing the liability of possessors who damage another's property in SWEDEN, FINLAND and NORWAY. Under the general rule, the existence of a right to claim damages can, however, be justified by the rules of non-contractual liability law (for SWEDEN: Skadeståndslagen (1972:207); for NORWAY: Skadeserstatningsloven, lov nr. 69/1969; for FINLAND: Vahingonkorvauslaki/Skadeståndslagen 31.5.1974/412), which are based on the culpa principle. The question of liability is solved irrespective of property law principles. Good or bad faith has no significance. It is the negligence that constitutes liability (Hellner/Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt). The conclusion is that a possessor in good faith can hardly be seen as being negligent and, therefore, will normally not be liable for damages.

30. In ENGLAND and WALES, where the tort law liability is basically a strict one, the only defences a possessor might be able to raise, in an attempt to reduce exposure to liability, concern issues of causation and remoteness (Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 107). This would mean that the issue of good or bad faith probably is of little importance in ENGLAND and WALES.

31. Also in IRELAND, the primary determinant in calculating damages in tort is the consideration that the owner should be placed in the same position as if the loss had never occurred. This general rule also seems to apply in restitution cases and where the possessor was in good faith as to the possession (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 84 and 91).

III. Possession in bad faith

32. Under DUTCH law, a possessor who is not in good faith (the DUTCH Civil Code avoids using the words bad faith; Asser, Goederenrecht[14] I, no. 129) is liable for damages caused to the goods pursuant to the rules on non-contractual liability for damage (CC art. 3:121(1)). It refers to damage suffered by the rightful owner due to the possessor's unlawful possession. This covers fruits, which have not been collected by the possessor, as well as damage which would not have occurred if the owner had remained in possession of the goods (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Rank-Berenschot], B.W.[3], art. 3:121, no. 2; Pitlo, Goederenrecht[12], no. 398). Hence, if the possessor proves that damage would also have occurred, had the goods remained in the possession of the rightful owner, there is no liability. For the notion of good faith see note 31 to VIII.–7:103.

33. Under BELGIAN law, the bad faith possessor is liable for all losses, regardless of whether they were caused fraudulently or negligently, or whether they are the result of force majeure, and regardless of whether those losses occurred before or after the initiation of the rei vindicatio. However, the possessor is not liable for accidental losses if it is proved that these would also have occurred if the goods has remained in the possession of the real owner (arg. CC art. 130(2)). A possessor is regarded as being in bad faith if he or she knew that the possession of the goods was unlawful (Hansenne, Les biens, no. 673). With regard to restitution after the retroactive termination of a translative agreement, see note 16.

34. According to the ESTONIAN PropLA § 84(1), the bad faith possessor has to compensate the owner for damage resulting from the destruction or decrease in value of the thing according to the rules of non-contractual liability law (LOA §§ 1043 ff). A person who obtained possession of a movable arbitrarily is liable for destruction and deterioration of the movable, except where such destruction or deterioration would also have occurred had the movable remained in the owner's possession (PropLA § 84(2)). In cases where the goods have to be restored because the contract is void or avoided, the transferee has to compensate the transferor for damage resulting from the loss or deterioration of the goods, where such loss or deterioration was caused by the fault of the transferee, and provided that the transferee knew or should have known about the circumstances constituting the basis for a reclamation pursuant to the provisions on unjustified enrichment (Faber/Lurger [-Kullerkupp], National Reports I: Estonia, 107).

35. In SLOVENIA, the bad faith possessor has to compensate for any loss in the form of deterioration or destruction of a movable, unless this would also have occurred had the movable remained in the possession of the rightful owner (Code of Property Law art. 96/III). In the case of an avoided or void contract, every party has to return to the other everything it has received (LOA art. 187/II).

36. Under HUNGARIAN law, the possessor in bad faith is liable for all damage that would not have occurred if the goods had remained in the possession of the entitled person (Faber/Lurger [-Szilagyi], National Reports III: Hungary, 96).

37. Under SWISS law, the possessor is not entitled to dispose of the goods and is therefore liable for all damage resulting from the unlawful possession (CC art. 940 (1)) even damage which occurred coincidentally (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 519; Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], art. 940 no. 6). There should be a causal connection between the unlawful possession and the damage. Therefore, it is considered that the possessor is free from liability when the goods would also have been damaged or destroyed, had they remained in the possession of their rightful owner (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 521; Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], art. 940, nos. 6 and 8). The lessee who does not return the leased object to its owner is considered to be a possessor in bad faith in terms of CC art. 940 (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 519a; Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], Pref. to art. 938-940 no. 9). A particular regulation applies when the possessor in bad faith does not know to whom the goods have to be returned (CC art. 940(3)) and cannot find this out easily even when making reasonable investigations (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 518). In this case the possessor is liable only for damage caused by his or her fault or by a person under his or her responsibility. Hence, there is no liability for any accidental loss (Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], art. 940 no. 13).

38. In SPAIN, the possessor in bad faith is liable for every deterioration or loss of the goods; even when caused by force majeure, but only in cases where the possessor fraudulently delayed the restitution of the goods to their rightful owner (CC art. 457). The possessor's bad faith has to be proved by the owner (Faber/Lurger [-González Pacanowska/Díez Soto], National Reports V: Spain, 93).

39. Under GERMAN law, the possessor in bad faith is liable for all damage, deterioration or loss of the goods caused by his or her fault (CC §§ 989 f; Schwab and Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 538). The same rules apply to a possessor in good faith after the initiation of the legal proceedings (CC § 990; see supra note 17). The possessor is in bad faith if he or she, at the moment of acquisition, knew or, due to gross negligence, did not know that he or she was not entitled to possession, or if he or she finds this out during the possession (Soergel [-Stadler], BGB[13], § 990, nos. 3-6 and no. 25; MünchKomm [-Medicus], BGB[4], § 990 no. 1 and no. 9). When the possessor in bad faith defaults on restoring the goods, he or she is liable for all damage, including damage caused accidentally (without fault), unless it would also have occurred if the goods had been returned to the owner in time (Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 III 3 b; Soergel [-Stadler], BGB[13], § 990 no. 27). The possessor who obtained possession through a criminal act (theft, robbery, concealment, deceit, etc) or unlawful dispossession is liable according to the provisions of non-contractual liability law (CC § 992). As a consequence, such a possessor is also liable for damage and loss caused accidentally. This rule may also cover situations where the possessor actually was in good faith in the sense of CC §§ 987 ff; e.g. where a person erroneously takes another's hat in a restaurant (as to this problem, Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 III 5). The limitation period of the rei vindicatio is 30 years, whereas the period of prescription under non-contractual liability law is only 3 years, which is a disadvantage for the rightful owner (Schwab and Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 541).

40. Under GREEK law, the liability of the bad faith possessor is the same as the liability of the good faith possessor after the proceedings for restitution have been initiated (CC art. 1098, see above note 18). A precondition for liability is, besides the bad faith of the possessor, also the possessor's fault regarding the deterioration, destruction or non-restitution of the goods. Fault is defined in accordance with CC art. 330 ff (liability arising from fault; Filios, Property Law, 250). If the possessor is in bad faith and is also in default, the liability is extended and the possessor, therefore, is obliged, besides performing, also to pay compensation for the damage suffered by the owner by reason of the delay (CC art. 343(1), Georgiadis, Property Law I, 599). If possession has been obtained through an illegal act, the possessor is liable for any kind of damage, including fortuitous events in the meaning of CC art. 344 (Faber/Lurger [-Klaoudatou], National Reports III: Greece, 149).

41. In AUSTRIA, with regard to non-contractual liability law consequences, the possessor in bad faith is liable for all losses caused by the possession (CC § 335), including lost profits, the effect of which is a wider liability than under the general rule of CC § 1324 (which requires gross negligence in order to recover lost profits). Liability covers not only damage to the property itself, but also consequential damages caused by the fact that the owner lacked physical control over the goods (Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 335; no. 4). There is some dispute as to the extent to which the possessor in bad faith is also liable for accidental loss or deterioration. The legal scholar Spielbüchler argues that such aggravated liability should presuppose that the possessor had actual knowledge of the lack of entitlement. From his point of view, negligent causation of loss leads to liability under the general rules of non-contractual liability law (Rummel [-Spielbüchler], ABGB I[3], § 335, no. 1). As to the unjustified enrichment consequences of using or consuming the other party's property, the same principles apply as described in note 68 to VIII.–7:103.

42. Under LITHUANIAN law, the owner can claim damages on the basis of non-contractual liability law. According to the general principle of full compensation for damage, the owner is entitled to be compensated for all kinds of damage, such as direct damage e.g. the value of the thing, and lost profits (CC arts. 6.249 and 6.263; Faber/Lurger [-Mikelenas], National Reports III: Lithuania, 71-72). If the goods are restored to their owner due to the avoidance or termination of a contract between the parties, CC arts. 6.147-6.148 apply. If the person liable to make restitution has been in bad faith, or the need for restitution is due to that person's fault, he or she is bound to return the highest possible value of the thing in case the goods are lost or alienated (CC art. 6.147). If the goods are destroyed by force majeure, the debtor in bad faith, or the debtor whose fault is the reason for the restitution, is obliged to return the equivalent of the value of the property, calculated in accordance with the rules provided in CC art. 6.147, except in cases where the debtor proves that the thing would have been destroyed even if it had remained in possession of the owner (CC art. 6.148). If the thing has suffered partial loss or any other decrease in value, the debtor is bound to pay the creditor the monetary equivalent of such loss or decrease in value, unless it results from normal wear and tear (Faber/Lurger [-Mikelenas], National Reports III: Lithuania, 72).

43. In SCOTLAND, one opinion brought forward is that a possessor in bad faith generally will be liable for the value of the thing. As stated above, the possessor will be liable to the extent of the enrichment only where the property is lost during possession by no fault of the possessor (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[4], § 537; however, see also Ferguson v. Forrest (1639) Mor 4145). If the movable has been damaged or deteriorated by the fault of the possessor, the possessor in bad faith "might" be liable in compensation. In the case of damage, he or she will be liable for the reduction in value, while in the case of deterioration, the possessor should be liable only in quantum lucratus (Reid, Unjustified enrichment and Property Law, at 178, who seems to be in accordance with Rankine's opinion, see Rankine, The Law of Land-ownership in Scotland[4], 93). The only thing which can safely be said is that the law is very uncertain and unsatisfactory.

44. Under CZECH law, the possessor in bad faith is liable for the loss or deterioration of the movable (Faber/Lurger [-Tichý], National Reports VI: Czech Republic, 72).

45. In ENGLAND and WALES, it seems that bad faith has only a small significance. As stated above, a good faith possessor might limit liability by raising issues of causation and remoteness, and might be successful in doing so issues that a bad faith possessor will not be able to raise (Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 107).

46. In IRELAND, the restitutionary remedies are used with reference to the possessor's gain and the effect, in many cases, is the restoration to the owner of what he or she has lost. But, if the possessor has committed a wrong against the owner, the possessor may be required to surrender the benefits to the owner rather than to restore what the owner has lost: If the assessment of damages is confined to considerations of loss, the injured party would leave the profits generated by the movable to the wrongdoer; therefore, damages should be assessed so as to deprive him or her of that profit. This reflects the fundamental principle of restitution that no possessor should profit from his or her wrongdoing (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 91).

47. In ITALY, the possessor who is obliged to return the goods and their fruits may be held liable for the deterioration of the goods or for the impossibility to return them (see note 27).

48. The issue of bad faith as such has no significance in SWEDEN, FINLAND and NORWAY. The liability is assessed according to whether someone has been negligent according to the culpa principle. One can, of course, claim that someone who is in bad faith must be seen as being negligent, and therefore should have to pay damages to the owner. There are numerous court decisions specifying the few rules contained in the Swedish Tort Law Act. In SWEDEN, if the goods have been alienated by an unauthorised sale by the possessor, the damages may well be assessed with reference to what the possessor gained from the sale (Hellner/Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 423; Hellner, Om obehörig vinst, 241 ff and Karlgren, Obehörig vinst och värdeersättning, 48 ff). However, the primary determinant in calculating damages for the total loss of a movable is the cost of buying the same type of movable anew, subject to deductions for age and use. The estimated utility value or selling price is used only exceptionally. In cases of partial detriment suffered by a movable, the damage is either assessed with reference to the cost of repair, or to the difference in the value of the movable before and after the detriment (Hellner/Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 420 ff).

49. The PORTUGUESE CC is silent about the legal consequences for the possessor in bad faith in cases of loss or deterioration. A contrario sensu, it can be argued that the possessor is liable for any loss or deterioration of the movable even if it did not result from his or her act or omission. Some legal scholars allow the defence that the loss or deterioration would have occurred anyway, irrespective of who might have possessed the thing. This interpretation is based on (1) the provision of the old civil code article 496, allowing this defence and the lack of reasons given in the travaux préparatoires of the CC of 1966 as to remaining silent on this issue and (2) the coherence of the risk regime with the mora creditoris of CC art. 807, where such a defence is allowed (Mesquita, Direitos Reais, 119; de Lima/Varela, Código Civil anotado[2] III, 36).

VIII.–7:103: Fruits from, use of, and other benefits derived from the goods during possession

Where the possessor obtains fruits from, makes use of, or derives other benefits from the goods during possession in the sense of VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application), the rights of the owner resulting from such benefits are determined by Book VII.

COMMENTS

A. General

What is covered: fruits, use and other benefits. This Article covers all situations where the possessor derived any kind of benefit from the owner's goods during, or as a result of, the possession. That may, for example, be benefits from using the goods (e.g., the thief starts a taxi business with the stolen car). Or, benefits may be derived in the form of "fruits" the possessor collected from the asset. The fruits may be "natural" (e.g., wool sheared from another's sheep) or "legal" (e.g., rent received from leasing the owner's goods to a third person). "Other benefits" may be derived from the consumption or disposal of the goods (e.g., the possessor uses the owner's coal for heating or sells it to a third party and receives a purchase price in return). All of these terms are not intended to be understood in any specific technical sense; they rather serve descriptive purposes. For the purposes of the reference spelled out in this Article, it is immaterial which rule will cover the case under the unjustified enrichment principles of Book VII, i.e. whether VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment), VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) or VII.–5:104 (Fruits and use of an enrichment) will be applicable. What matters is that any kind of benefit derived from the owner's goods is covered.

Relevant time. As to the relevant point in time ("during possession"), see VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment B.

Main approaches in the European legal systems and basic policy issues. As reflected in more detail in the Notes on this Article, the range of solutions offered in the European legal systems extends from generally obliging the possessor to reverse any enrichment (which is, for instance, discussed within the scope of restitution and tort principles in the common law jurisdictions) to "immunising" a possessor in good faith against claims brought on the basis of unjustified enrichment principles. The latter is a general approach in the countries following an owner-possessor relationship tradition (cf. VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment C), although certain differences exist in particular with regard to different categories of fruits. Also, in these countries, a possessor in bad faith will, in turn, be obliged to reverse any benefit received from the owner's goods. In addition, some legal systems require the possessor in bad faith to compensate the owner for fruits the possessor failed to collect. In some countries, a further differentiation practically relevant for possessors in good faith – is made in so far as a person who obtained possession gratuitously (in particular, by way of gift from a non-owner) must reverse the benefits obtained from the property to its owner, so that the "immunisation" rule only applies to possessors who obtained possession for value. The basic policy question, therefore, is whether a possessor in good faith should be privileged by the establishment of an "immunisation" against claims brought on the basis of unjustified enrichment principles, which would otherwise arise under Book VII.

B. The proposed approach: Reference to Book VII on unjustified enrichment

Overview. This Article spells out that the owner's rights in relation to any benefits derived from the goods during possession are determined by the general rules on unjustified enrichment as provided for in Book VII. Briefly summarised, these rules will operate as described below, where the focus is laid on Chapters 5 and 6 of Book VII (reversal of enrichment, defences), since the general requirements in VII.–1:101 (Basic rule) seem to be rather unproblematic in the present context. Basically, there are two main levels of differentiation. The first differentiation relates to the category of benefit: it may consist of a transferable enrichment, a non-transferable enrichment or fruits and use of an enrichment. The second differentiation is whether the enriched person, i.e. the possessor, is in good faith or in bad faith. These two criteria are explored in more detail below. The main policy considerations leading to the solution adopted will be summarised in Comment C. The issue of whether a possessor in bad faith should be liable for fruits the possessor failed to collect is dealt with later in this Comment.

Categories of benefit. Where the enrichment – at the moment it is received – consists of a transferable asset, e.g. coal received as a gift from a non-owner, the basic rule spelled out in VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) paragraph (1) is that the enriched person (the possessor) is obliged to transfer this asset to the disadvantaged person (the owner of the coal). The present Article will come into play where, e.g., the possessor has obtained a benefit from the coal by burning it for heating purposes (consumption of the asset). Then, the enriched person is no longer able to transfer the asset (the coal) and must reverse the enrichment by paying its monetary value to the disadvantaged person, see VII.–5:101 paragraph (3). If, e.g., the possessor alienated the coal to another person and receives a purchase price in return, this price may be reversed as a substitute according to VII.–5:101 paragraph (4). Second, where the enrichment does not consist of a transferable asset (e.g. the purported lessee's use of a car under an invalid contract for lease), the basic rule is that the enriched person (the possessor) must pay the enrichment's monetary value to the disadvantaged person, see VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (1). This liability may be reduced to the enriched person's "saving" (see below). Third, the benefit may consist of "fruits or use" which the possessor obtains in addition to the asset which is primarily regarded as "the enrichment" in the sense of Book VII (e.g., wool sheared from another's sheep). Then, VII.–5:104 (Fruits and use of an enrichment) applies, providing that such benefits have to be handed over to the disadvantaged person; but again, a "saving" cap applies where the possessor was in good faith (see below).

Good faith or bad faith of the enriched person (possessor). As mentioned above, the second important criterion under the unjustified enrichment rules of Book VII is whether the enriched person, i.e. the possessor, is in good faith or in bad faith. The main consequences of this distinction relate, first, to the calculation of the monetary claim where the enrichment is non-transferable: An enriched person who was in good faith is not liable to pay "more than any saving", VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (2). The saving cap takes care of the individual circumstances of the innocently enriched person who is, in effect, compelled to purchase what has been enjoyed. The goal is to leave the enriched person no worse off as a result of the reversal of the enrichment; only the actual gain is to be stripped away, cf. VII.–5:102 Comment C. The same principle applies where the benefit consists of fruits or use in the sense of VII.–5:104 (Fruits and use of an enrichment). A second effect of the good faith criterion is that an enriched person in good faith is entitled to a defence of disenrichment under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment). This rule provides that the possessor in good faith is not liable to reverse the enrichment to the extent that he or she has sustained a disadvantage which removes or diminishes the enrichment, e.g. where the sheared wool is destroyed by a fire before it can be transferred to the owner of the sheep.

No extra rule for fruits a possessor in bad faith failed to collect. Including an extra rule imposing a general obligation on a possessor in bad faith to compensate the owner for fruits the possessor failed to collect, as presently exists in some European legal systems, would go beyond the general principles of Books VI and VII without any particular need to do so. There does not seem to be any special justification why an owner of goods should be in a better position than a holder of some other right who was deprived of using the right by another person. Chapter 7, therefore, contains no such additional rule. Where, however, the owner can sufficiently show that he or she would have collected such fruits if he or she had had possession of the property, so that a loss has actually been sustained in this respect, liability under Book VI may arise.

C. Main policy reasons for not "immunising" a possessor in good faith

General. As pointed out above, the main policy issue with regard to this Article is whether or not to exempt a possessor in good faith from obligations under unjustified enrichment law. The proposed approach is not to provide for such an "immunisation" of a good faith possessor. The following Comments summarise the reasons for this decision. One of the starting points certainly was that these model rules, in Book VII, already contain a fully developed set of unjustified enrichment principles which are, in principle, fit for governing the issues covered by this Article. Deviating from these general principles when it comes to benefits derived from the possession of goods owned by another would, therefore, presuppose the existence of good reasons for doing so. Such potential reasons have been analysed while preparing the present Article, but have finally been considered not to be compelling. A discussion of the two most important arguments in that respect is provided in the following comments.

With regard to possessors in bad faith, there is even less difficulty. A comparative overview shows no major discrepancies throughout the European legal systems. It has, therefore, been considered unproblematic to subject such cases to the unjustified enrichment principles established by Book VII.

No "immunisation" of possessor in good faith as compensation for possessor's efforts. A rather prominent rationale, already put forward in Roman law, is that the possessor in good faith may keep the fruits as a schematic compensation for the efforts to produce such fruits (pro cultura et cura). Put differently, the purpose of the rule immunising the possessor in good faith is that the additional value created by the possessor's efforts (i.e. the fruits) is not transferred to the owner under unjustified enrichment principles, since this would result in the owner becoming unjustly enriched in turn. Such an approach may be advocated in terms of simplicity and practicability. It does, however, not harmonise with certain basic concepts of the unjustified enrichment principles of Book VII. First, there may be a problem with the requirement of attribution as provided for by VII.–1:101 (Basic rule) and VII.–4:101 (Instances of attribution). In many usual cases, fruits (or other benefits) actually are a kind of "combination" of (the possibility to use) the owner's property and the possessor's efforts. To the extent that the fruits or other benefits have their origin in particular efforts undertaken by the possessor (so that they actually originate from something else than the owner's property), one may argue that the requirement of attribution will not be satisfied, which should exclude any obligation to reverse in that respect. Second, as indicated above, if the fruits are already in the hands of the owner, the value of the possessor's efforts would constitute an unjustified enrichment of the owner which, in principle, would have to be handed over to the possessor. The effect would be comparable. Third, with regard to a possessor in good faith, the saving cap regulated in VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (2), VII.–5:103 (Monetary value of an enrichment; saving) and VII.–5:104 (Fruits and use of an enrichment) will operate in the same direction. The saving corresponds to the value of the possessor's ability to use the owner's property because these goods did not have to be purchased or otherwise made available in order to generate the fruits or other benefits. Consequently, the possessor will be under an obligation to reverse only in so far as the value of the fruits or other benefit exceeds the efforts invested. It is of course not the task of these Comments to explore in detail how these different levels of argumentation interrelate under the framework of Book VII. The main point is that they all lead to the adequate result that the economic benefit derived from goods belonging to one person and efforts undertaken by another is divided up between these two. This provides a more flexible solution than the ones envisaged by many historical legislators who basically contemplated two alternatives, namely awarding all fruits (or all fruits of a certain kind, respectively) either to the possessor (if in good faith) or to the owner.

No "immunisation" of possessor in good faith as compensation for purchase price paid to third party. Another important argument for "immunising" the possessor in good faith against unjustified enrichment claims is that the possessor should in some way be compensated for a purchase price which was paid to a third party and which will not be recovered from the owner upon vindication. But this argument is not persuasive either. First, it obviously fails where the possessor obtained possession gratuitously. Applying unjustified enrichment law, on the other hand, will lead to adequate results. The possessor in good faith, who paid nothing at all for possessing the goods, has to reverse the benefits derived, but not more than any saving in the sense of VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (2) and VII.–5:104 (Fruits and use of an enrichment). If the enrichment does not exist anymore, there will be the defence of disenrichment under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment). Accordingly, applying the unjustified enrichment principles never takes away more than the possessor in good faith actually gained from the movable. This result can also be observed in those legal systems which apply a special rule for the gratuitous acquisition of possession. Secondly, the argument does not fit two-party relations in general (as to the various situations referred to in the following, cf. VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment B): Even where the possessor paid a price for obtaining possession (e.g., in the case of an invalid purchase from the owner or an invalid contract for lease with the owner), the owner as the other contracting party is of course also obliged to return what the owner received (i.e., the price) under unjustified enrichment principles. This result does not need any correction.

In the remaining three-party constellations (purchase from a non-owner, right of use granted by a non-owner), the argument is valid provided that the possessor (i) has actually paid a price to the third party and (ii) neither recovers it from this third party nor from anyone else. Conversely, where or in so far as the possessor is able to recover the price paid, either from the seller or from another third party such as an insurance company, as the case may be, the argument may not justify any deviations from the general unjustified enrichment rules. But even in the remaining case where the possessor in good faith paid a price to the third party and does not recover it, there are arguments for applying general unjustified enrichment law rules, i.e. for placing the risk on the possessor rather than on the owner, by obliging the possessor to return not only the goods themselves but also the benefits derived from them. We must be aware of the fact that under these model rules, the whole issue is mainly about (i) stolen goods which have not been purchased in the ordinary course of the seller's business, or (ii) situations where the possessor "acquired" from the seller under a void or avoided contract. In the first case, one can say that the risk should rather be placed on the person who voluntarily contracted with the dishonest third party. That is the possessor who purchased from the thief (or from someone who obtained possession from the thief, etc.); the owner typically did not enter into any voluntary contact with the thief. In the second case, the risk may be placed on the person who obtained possession under an invalid contract. In both cases, the possessor does not necessarily lose the value of the goods and the benefits. The possessor can claim damages from the seller who was unable to confer good title. The issue is that the possessor bears the risk of the seller's insolvency. There is also a third situation (iii), namely where the possessor derives a right of use from a non-owner. Where this non-owner is a thief, the same arguments will apply as where the goods are purchased from a thief. But the owner could also have entrusted the goods to the third party and, therefore, be in a situation somewhat comparable to the possessor's, since both contracted with the dishonest third party. In these situations, however, the unjustified enrichment rules themselves already provide protection for the possessor in good faith. Under VII.–6:102 (Juridical acts in good faith with third parties), the enriched person (the possessor) is not liable to reverse the enrichment (a monetary equivalent to the use made of the goods) if the enriched person, in exchange for that enrichment, conferred another enrichment on a third party (the price paid to the non-owner) and was in good faith at that time. Compare VII.–6:102 (Juridical acts in good faith with third parties) Comment with Illustration 1. As the purpose of that rule is to provide supplementary protection outside the scope of the good faith acquisition rules (cf. VII.–6:102 Comment), it will not be applicable in the two situations dealt with above, namely (i) where the good faith possessor was prevented from acquiring ownership in good faith because the goods were stolen or (ii) the contract by which the possessor bought the goods was invalid.

Further aspects. It appears, therefore, that additional "owner-possessor relationship" rules which put the possessor in good faith in a more favourable position than under the unjustified enrichment rules of Book VII are not needed. This, obviously, is also preferable in terms of coherence between the different parts of these model rules. Also, applying unjustified enrichment rules to the unwinding of void or avoided contacts (cf. VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment B), independently of the involved parties' good or bad faith, appears favourable because these rules can provide a well-balanced regime for both obligations to return (not only for the one relating to the goods) by taking into account possible interrelations between these two and specific situations that may arise. One of such specific questions is what should happen if one of the performances cannot be reversed physically due to an event which cannot be attributed to either of the parties (e.g., the car transferred under a void contract for sale is destroyed before restitution). Such questions are a particular matter of dispute in unjustified enrichment law in some countries. Applying unjustified enrichment law to both obligations to return makes it possible for these model rules to take a stand on this issue. Generally, Book VII follows an "itemised" approach, looking at the individual enrichment of each party, and rejects a "net" approach in calculating the enrichment; see VII.–3:102 (Disadvantage) Comment E.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. In BELGIUM, the NETHERLANDS, SPAIN, ITALY, GREECE, SLOVENIA, LITHUANIA and HUNGARY, the possessor in good faith is entitled to keep the fruits collected before the initiation of the rei vindicatio. In SWITZERLAND and PORTUGAL, the possessor is entitled to keep the fruits as long as they were collected while the possessor was still in good faith. Under GERMAN law, the possessor in good faith is entitled to keep the benefits, but there are two exceptions: (1) in case of an excess of fruits and (2) when the possessor obtained possession gratuitously.

2. A similar approach is followed in AUSTRIA, but according to the prevailing opinion, in the majority of cases this has to be adapted under the rules of unjustified enrichment. In ESTONIA, too, the possessor in good faith is obliged to return all benefits. However, the possessor is relieved of the duty to return what he or she received or to compensate the value thereof in case of subsequent disenrichment.

3. Under CZECH law, it depends on whether the owner claims restitution based on an unjustified enrichment claim (possessor is entitled to keep the proceeds) or on the basis of the rei vindicatio (possessor has to reverse the proceeds).

4. Under DUTCH, HUNGARIAN and LITHUANIAN law, the possessor in bad faith has to return all the collected fruits as well as compensate for those which have not been collected. Also in GREECE, the possessor in bad faith is obliged to restitute all collected benefits as well as compensate for those which, culpably, have not been collected. The possessor who obtained possession through an illegal act is also liable under non-contractual liability law: even in the case of slight negligence.

5. In BELGIUM, the possessor in bad faith is obliged to return all fruits collected as well as compensate for those which he or she neglected to collect, unless it can be proved that the owner would not have been able to collect them either. In SPAIN, the possessor in bad faith is obliged to return the fruits received as well as compensate for those which the rightful owner could have received.

6. The possessor in bad faith has to return all the fruits (advantages, benefits) and also has the duty to pay the value of the fruits which could have been collected, if the possessor had acted with ordinary care (ITALY); as a diligent possessor (PORTUGAL); if the goods had been used in an appropriate way (SWITZERLAND); according to the rules of proper management (GERMANY); in the context of a regular economic activity (ESTONIA). In GERMANY, the possessor who obtained possession through a criminal act or unlawful dispossession is liable according to the provisions of non-contractual liability law. The possessor has to reverse all benefits, even though the rightful owner would not have collected them.

7. Under SCOTTISH law, a right to restitution covers not only the recovery of the movable itself but also of its fruits and accessories (Scottish Law Commission, Recovery of Benefits Conferred under Error of Law (Scot Law Com Discussion Paper 95 (1993) vol. 2, para. 2.156 vi)). This means that, for example, if a cow is the subject of restitution, her calf must also be returned. The rule will apply when the transfer is based on a void contract, where a void right of use has been granted, and where the property has been stolen. If a right has been avoided, a possessor is entitled to the fruits collected prior to such avoidance. Conversely, in cases where a right has terminated, the possessor will have a right to the fruits up until this point in time (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 173). Since the maxim accessorium sequitur principale (i.e. where two things are connected, the accessory follows the principal) is recognised in respect of natural fruits, an action for restitution in relation to the natural fruits generated by a thing owned by the claimant is no more than an action for revindication (Carey Miller/Irvine, Corporeal Moveables in Scots Law[2], 49 f; Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[4], § 1298; Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 173). Another opinion is that industrial fruits and artificial profits do not fall under the scope of the rules on restitution, meaning that products manufactured by the thing are probably not subject to restitution (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 173 f). This distinction has not been left unquestioned. The Scottish Law Commission doubts whether there is a distinction between natural and civil fruits: What matters in determining the extent of the right of recovery is the enrichment of the possessor and whether he or she was in good or bad faith during possession (Scottish Law Commission, Recovery of Benefits Conferred under Error of Law, vol. 2, para. 2.141). For the distinction between natural and civil fruits, see section II of these Notes.

8. Under AUSTRIAN law, the possessor in bad faith must reverse all benefits, even those which the rightful owner would not have obtained and must compensate for the fruits which could have been collected but were not. An exception is provided for the possessor who made significant efforts to obtain the benefits.

9. Under CZECH law, the possessor in bad faith is obliged to return any enrichment that has been acquired unjustifiably and to the detriment of the rightful owner. In SLOVENIA, the possessor in bad faith has to return all the fruits which have been separated during the possession.

10. The NORWEGIAN Property Law Act contains a general rule providing for an entitlement to benefits in all situations where someone other than the rightful owner has had physical control over the movable (Lov om hendelege eigedomshove 1969/17 § 15; for considerations on a good faith possessor's right to the fruits, prior to the enactment of this law, see Braekhus/Haerem, Norsk tingsrett, 560 ff). According to this rule the possessor is entitled to obtain the benefits ("avling, avdrått og anna som tingen kastar av seg") stemming from the movable as long as he or she was in non-negligent good faith regarding his or her right to the movable. Where a contract has been terminated, the Sale of Goods Act provides that the buyer is not entitled to obtain the benefits and, therefore, has to return them to the seller (Lov om Kjop, 13.05.1988, § 65 nr 27). Apart from these two rules, Norwegian law does not regulate issues of fruits and use during possession.

11. The situation of a possessor obtaining fruits or making use of goods during possession is not regulated in SWEDEN and FINLAND. However, it has been discussed in SWEDISH legal literature whether the concept of unjustified enrichment could be applied to such cases. It has been said to be a concept not really needed in SWEDEN, since it is rather a problem partly created by the ownership concept. With the SWEDISH functional approach, the concept of unjustified enrichment is not needed to the same extent as in other jurisdictions based on a civilian law tradition (Faber/Lurger [-Martinson], National Reports V: Sweden, 23 f and 46 f). Among legal scholars there is another, less predominant view, stating that the concept of unjustified enrichment is, however, very useful and that it could be used in a number of situations (Faber/Lurger [-Martinson], National Reports V: Sweden, 46 f and Karlgren, Obehörig vinst och värdeersättning). The Supreme Court has been considering unjustified enrichment in other areas (see for example, JustR Munch in NJA 1988 s. 144, with further references to Hessler in SvJT 1955 s 38 ff, Hult, Lärobok I värdepappersrätt 6 ed., 97 ff and Agell, Växel, check och materiell fordran, 17 ff. See also the Appeal Court decision RH 1998:56, where a car had been repaired without a binding contract. The court held that redress for unjustified enrichment is only available in a very limited number of regulations and cases: Consumer Service Act § 8 (Konsumenttjänstlagen) only covers reasonable and economically sensible additional work and the repair carried out in the above case was found to be made outside of that Act's scope of application). One can, perhaps, state that the concept exists, but nevertheless, is seldom, or hardly ever, used.

Besides the concept of unjustified enrichment, a possessor in SWEDEN and FINLAND has, under certain conditions, an obligation to return benefits obtained to a bankruptcy estate (for SWEDEN, see Konkurslagen chap. 4 § 15*;* see also Faber/Lurger [-Martinson], National Reports V: Sweden, 73 ff). In FINLAND, there are few situations where the possessor has an obligation to return obtained benefits, as in the mentioned example where an asset is recovered by a bankruptcy estate. One can, nevertheless, find legal scholars considering the distinction of natural benefits and civil fruits, as well as a Supreme Court decision clarifying the possessor's right to keep obtained benefits and fruits (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 73 ff).

12. There are a few rules in DANISH law covering fruits obtained and use during possession, in a law from 1683 (Lov nr 11000 af 15/04/1683). The rules have partly been applied analogously, or further developed by legal doctrine.

13. In ENGLAND and WALES, there is not much authority on the issue of fruits and benefits. In a recent case, there was an indication that a claim in conversion can lead to the recovery of benefits enjoyed by the possessor at the owner's expense. The damage would then be based not only on the value of the movable at the time of the conversion but also on any benefit the possessor has gained by using the movable (Kuwait Airways Corpn v Iraqi Airways Co. (2002) 2 AC 883, at 1094). Such a claim would appear to be based on general principles of restitution and particularly the fact of the possessor's unjust enrichment (Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 108).

14. CYPRUS has adopted a part of the English doctrine of restitution, which includes the right of the owner to claim for benefits derived in the form of fruits and use: one part states that unjustified enrichment is not in itself a cause of action, but can be applied in cases of restitution (see Minerva Finance and Investment Ltd v Georgio Georgiadi, Civil Appeal no. 9493. vol. 1D (1998) 2173 SC). The requirements for the rules on compensation to be applied to unjustified enrichment are that a person does something lawfully for another person, not intending to do so gratuitously and that the person for whom the act is done must enjoy the benefit of it. If these requirements are fulfilled, the person enjoying these benefits has to "…make compensation to the…(owner)… in respect of, or to restore, the thing so done or delivered" (Faber/Lurger [-Laulhé Shaelou/Stylianou/Anastasiou], National Reports II: Cyprus, 22 f and Ismini Kyriakou Hi Loizi and Others v Irini Iona, Civil Appeal No. 4366. Vol. 2 (1983) 11 CLR).

15. Also in IRELAND, there is not much authority on the issue. It, however, seems that there are relevant considerations in the assessment of damages, such as the need to deprive a wrongdoer from the possibility of profiting from his or her act (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 91).

II. Fruits and uses

16. The DUTCH CC art. 3:9 provides for a definition of natural and civil fruits. Natural fruits are things which are regarded as being fruits of other things according to common opinion (verkeersopvatting) (e.g. fruits of a fruit tree, eggs of a hen, the calf of a cow etc.; Pitlo, Goederenrecht[12], no. 393). Civil fruits are rights, which are regarded as being fruits of goods according to common opinion (e.g. interest, rent payments and proceeds of pledges) (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Huijgen], B.W.[3], art. 3:9, no. 2). The old civil code also mentioned industrial fruits, but this distinction had no relevance and, therefore, it has not been taken over into the new code. For this reason, natural fruits include industrial fruits (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Huijgen], B.W.[3], art. 3:9, no. 4; for more details see Asser, Goederenrecht[14] I, nos. 74-77).

17. BELGIAN law distinguishes between fruits and products. Fruits are the regular and periodical gains produced by goods, which do not reduce the latter's value or size (Van Neste, Beginselen van Belgisch Privaatrecht V[2], no. 250; Hansenne, Les biens I, nos. 265 and 280). A distinction is usually made between natural fruits and civil fruits. The civil code also mentions industrial fruits. Natural fruits are the fruits produced by the soil itself, the offspring of animals (CC art. 583). Civil fruits are, for instance, interest and rent payments (CC art. 584). Industrial fruits of land are those obtained as a result of cultivation (CC art. 583). Products, on the other hand, are non-periodical gains produced by goods, which result in a decrease in the size and value of the goods themselves, e.g. minerals or stones extracted from a quarry (Hansenne, Les biens I, no. 280).

18. FINNISH law distinguishes between natural benefits and civil fruits. Natural benefits are those products which are generated by the asset in question, for instance, plants, corn and harvest, and which do not form a fixture or fittings of the asset. Civil fruits are economic profits and interest, such as rent and interest income. Different from benefits and fruits are those withdrawals from property, which diminish the value of the property itself, decreasing its size or value (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 73 f).

19. In SCOTLAND, there is a distinction between natural and civil fruits: i.e. between fruits resulting directly from the thing which is the object of restitution and those fruits resulting from exploitation of the thing (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 173).

20. The SPANISH civil code classifies fruits (frutos) in three categories: natural, industrial and civil fruits. According to the CC art. 355, natural fruits are the spontaneous products of the soil, as well as the offspring and other products of animals; industrial fruits are those produced by land as a result of cultivation or labour; civil fruits are the rent income generated by buildings, the lease payments generated by land and other property, and sums of perpetual or life annuities or other similar income. Since, nowadays, the distinction between natural and industrial fruits has lost its practical relevance, legal writing simplifies this classification, differentiating only between two kinds of fruits: natural and civil fruits. According to CC art. 357, only those fruits which are manifested or born are deemed to be natural or industrial fruits (STS 6 March 1965, RJ. 1436); as to animals, it is sufficient that they are in their mother's womb, even though they have not been born yet. Sometimes the word productos ("products") is used in relation to those things which are not periodically produced and the obtaining of which results in a diminution in the substance of the thing (e.g. the minerals extracted from a mine: STS 30 June 1950, RJ. 1235 which denied that the products of a mine could be considered as industrial fruits). Under SPANISH law, these products may also be included in the concept of fruits (STS 6 March 1965, RJ. 1436; STS 23 January 1947, RJ. 21), although, in some respects, they are subject to specific rules.

21. In the ITALIAN civil code, one can distinguish between two kinds of fruits: natural fruits (frutti naturali) and civil fruits (frutti civili). The CC art. 820(1) defines natural fruits as being those derived directly from the thing, with or without human intervention. As examples, the article provides agricultural products, wood, newly-born animals as well as products of mines, quarries and turf pits. As to civil fruits, the CC art. 820(3) defines these as being derived from a thing, serving as consideration for the benefit another person derives from it. Interest on capital, rent under an emphyteusis or lease agreement, life annuities as well as any other investment income, are examples of civil fruits.

22. PORTUGUESE law distinguishes between natural and civil fruits. Natural fruits (frutos naturais) are those that originate directly from the movable, while civil fruits (frutos civis) consist of the revenue or value generated by the movable as the consequence of a legal relationship or transaction (CC art. 212(2)).

23. SLOVENIAN law recognises both natural and civil fruits (Code of Property Law art. 20/II).

24. Under SWISS law, benefits are all material and immaterial advantages enjoyed by the possessor, natural and civil fruits, use etc. The question whether, in the case of the alienation of the goods, the purchase price should be regarded as a benefit, is still a matter of dispute under SWISS law. From an economic point of view, the purchase price replaces the thing in question. However, it is considered that alienation, destruction and deterioration should not be treated differently (Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar^{2}, art. 938, nos. 4-5).

25. Under AUSTRIAN law, three categories can be distinguished. Natural fruits (natürliche Früchte), which result directly from the movable; they can be separated physically. A classical example is the calf born to a cow. Civil fruits (Zivilfrüchte) are profits or interests that the movable produces as a consequence of a legal relationship between the possessor and a third party, e.g. the rent received under a leasing contract. Other benefits are also considered to be covered by the relevant rules, such as the possibility of the use of a car by the possessor (Gebrauchsnutzen) (Klang [- F. Bydlinski], ABGB IV/2^{2}, 517; Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 330, no. 1).

26. The GERMAN Civil Code uses the word "Nutzungen" (benefits). It covers fruits as well as the advantages resulting from the use of something (CC § 100; Wieling, Sachenrecht I^{2}, § 12 IV): direct fruits, such as milk, newly-born animals, fruit as well as coal, gravel or mineral water; or indirect fruits, like rent. Advantages resulting from the use of the goods are benefits in natura, obtained through the possession of those goods; e.g. the use of a car or a machine, the wearing of clothes, the use of an animal as a means of transport or for sporting purposes (Soergel [-Stadler], BGB^{13}, § 987, no. 11).

27. Benefits in the sense of the property law regulations of the GREEK civil law (CC art. 961 and 962) are understood to be: (1) natural fruits of a thing, being the products thereof, e.g. organic products from animals (milk, meat etc.) or from the ground (trees, fruits, seeds, plants etc.); (2) everything that is extracted from the thing in conformity with its purpose. Those are the inorganic products of the ground (e.g. sand, marble, gravel etc.); (3) fruits of a right, being the revenues that the right generates, according to its use, for the person entitled to the right (e.g. usufruct, tenancy etc.); (4) civil fruits, which are the proceeds that a thing or a right generates, by virtue of a legal relationship, for the person granting this right (e.g. lease agreement, loan etc); (5) any advantage achieved by the use of the thing or the right (Faber/Lurger [-Klaoudatou], National Reports III: Greece, 144).

28. According to the ESTONIAN GPCCA § 62, the benefits of goods include the fruits of the thing as well as the advantages resulting from its use. The provision distinguishes between natural and civil fruits. Natural fruits are the products of a thing generated by the force of nature or with human intervention (GPCCA § 62 (2)). Civil fruits are the income receivable from a thing or right pursuant to the purpose thereof or as a consequence of a legal relationship (GPCCA § 62 (3)).

29. The LITHUANIAN CC art. 4.18 speaks of "income". "Income" includes fruits, profit, interest, etc. (Faber/Lurger [-Mikelenas], National Reports III: Lithuania, 70).

30. CZECH law does not distinguish between different categories of benefits. The more general term "accrual" is used, instead of "fruits" (see CC section 135a; Faber/Lurger [-Tichý], National Reports VI: Czech Republic, 72).

III. Possession in good faith

31. According to the DUTCH CC art. 3:120(1), the good faith possessor is entitled to all separated natural and civil fruits, which have become exigible during possession. It is considered to be unfair that the possessor in good faith, who can keep the collected fruits, should be obliged to pay compensation to the rightful owner for using the goods on the basis of unjustified enrichment (CC art. 6:212). Therefore, it is considered, based on CC article 3:121(1) and (3) per analogiam, that the good faith possessor has a right to use the asset until the rightful owner has claimed the restitution of the property (Snijders, Goederenrecht[4], no. 142). Pursuant to CC art. 6:275, the rules of CC arts. 3:120 and 3:121 regarding the restitution of fruits and the compensation payable for costs and damage apply mutatis mutandis in the case of the setting aside of a synallagmatic contract.

32. As a general rule, under BELGIAN law the fruits of movables are subject to the CC art. 2279 (possession vaut titre). However, the civil code also contains special rules concerning the fruits of movables as well as immovables in CC art. 549 ff. These rules will usually give the possessor less protection and the possessor will therefore prefer to claim on the basis of the protection granted by CC art. 2279. However, there are cases in which CC articles 549 ff offer better protection to the possessor than CC art. 2279. This will, for example, be the case if the rightful owner revindicates a stolen or lost movable within the period of three years according to CC art. 2279(2) (Hansenne, Les biens I, no. 282). The CC art. 549 provides that a mere possessor is entitled to keep the fruits, provided that the possession is in good faith (for the notion of good faith, see note 16 to VIII.–7:102). This applies only to fruits collected during the good faith possession, and neither to the fruits collected before that time, nor to those collected after the initiation of the rei vindicatio, unless they follow from an additional value which the possessor added to the goods. The fruits are then considered as a kind of compensation for the expenses incurred on the goods (Cass. 17 June 1852, Pasicrisie 1853, I, 435; Van Neste, Beginselen van Belgisch Privaatrecht V[2], no. 252). Moreover, the possessor in good faith is only entitled to the fruits, not to the products (Hansenne, Les biens I, no. 280). The question whether the debtor of a restitutionary claim will be able to invoke CC art. 549 if in good faith is uncertain. The application of this provision is difficult to bring into accordance with the obligation to restore the situation as if no contract had ever been entered into, if the termination of the agreement has retroactive effects. Most of the BELGIAN legal writers argue that this argument prevails in such a way that the debtor of the restitutionary claim is not entitled to keep the fruits. He or she could not be considered as a possessor in good faith (De Page, II, no. 872; Laurent, Principes, XIX, no. 64; Limpens, La vente, no. 1785). Complete restitution would, according to this view, also include restitution of the fruits. However, this comes into conflict with FRENCH case law and legal writing, where CC art. 549 is applied to obligations to make restitution (Cass. fr. 20 June 1967, D. 1968, 32, J.C.P. 1968, II, no. 15262, note J.A. and Rev. trim. dr. civ. 1968, 337, note Bredin; Baudry-Lacantinerie, Traité, XIV, no. 1969).

33. According to the SPANISH CC art. 451, the possessor in good faith is entitled to the fruits which were received before the possession was legally interrupted. Natural and industrial fruits are considered as having been received as from the time they were collected or severed (art. 451(2) and 472). Civil fruits are deemed to accrue every day (art. 451(3) and 474) and, therefore, belong to the good faith possessor in proportion to the period of possession. It is a matter of dispute whether possession is regarded as being legally interrupted as from the filing of the claim, as from the moment of the possessor's reply to the claim or as from the moment the possessor is summoned before the court. This last opinion is followed by the majority of case law (López Frías, Jurisprudencia civil comentada. Código Civil, 1087 with reference to case law). The possessor is not entitled to the fruits once possession is in bad faith. However, the legal interruption of possession provided for by CC art. 451 does not necessarily make the possessor mala fide. Hence, the good faith possessor, who is ordered to return the goods will be authorised to keep the fruits collected up until the point in time of the legal interruption, but will be obliged to hand over the fruits received during the proceedings. The possessor in good faith is not obliged to return the fruits which could have been collected by their rightful owner (Faber/Lurger [-González Pacanowska/Díez Soto], National Reports V: Spain, 93). Some legal authors have pointed out that the "use" of a thing is a "value" that may be claimed as damage or on the basis of unjustified enrichment (Carrasco, Restitución de provechos, ADC 1988, 62 et seq). The CC art. 452 has a regulation regarding fruits which have still not been collected at the time when the possessor's good faith ceases to exist. The possessor has a right to claim reimbursement of the expenses of cultivation, in proportion to the time of the possession in good faith. The owner of the thing may give the possessor in good faith the right to finish cultivation and to collect the existing fruits, as compensation for expenses incurred. A possessor in good faith who refuses to accept this compromise loses the right to be compensated in any other way.

34. In DENMARK, a possessor in good faith has the right to keep all fruits of the property obtained up to the time of the rei vindicatio (DL 5-5-4, Lov nr 11000 of 15/04/1683: The rule is applicable to immovables but is applied to movable property analogously). The decisive criterion is whether the fruits are obtained before the initiation of the rei vindicatio. However, the possessor is not allowed to keep fruits obtained before the initiation of the rei vindicatio, but only where the due day would have been subsequent to such initiation (Vinding Kruse, Ejendomsretten 1^3, 742 f).

35. According to the rules of the SWEDISH Bankruptcy Act (Konkurslagen), a possessor who has to return the movable to the bankruptcy estate also has to return its fruits obtained as from the time revindication proceedings were initiated (Konkurslagen chap. 4 § 15). E contrario, this means that a possessor in good faith can keep fruits obtained before such action was filed. The possessor "should" (bör) also pay for his or her beneficial use of the movable (Karnov [-Lennander] 2006/07, 3446 no. 162). Irrespective of these rules, an obligation to reverse fruits and benefits may arise from unjustified enrichment law, which is, however, an uncertain basis in Swedish law (see section I of these Notes).

36. NORWEGIAN law provides that a possessor who obtained benefits from another's property while being in good faith, i.e. while believing, without negligence, to be entitled to these benefits, may keep them without being obliged to reverse the benefits to the owner of the property; see Lov om hendelege eigedomshove 1969/17 § 15 and Falkanger/Falkanger, Tingsrett[6], 404 ff (the discussion centres on immovables, but is also applicable to movable property).

37. Under FINNISH law, a good faith possessor who has acquired property through a valid acquisition may, as a general rule, "in some certain cases", have a better right to the benefits and fruits generated by the movable up until the time good faith ceases to exist (see Supreme Court ruling KKO 1984 II 125 and Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 74 f). However, according to some special regulations (see, for example, Act on Recovery § 17.1 and TakSL § 5), a good faith possessor might, in some cases, have the obligation to return all benefits and fruits as from the time of commencing possession (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 74 f).

38. Under ITALIAN law, the possessor in good faith is entitled to keep the natural and civil fruits collected before the initiation of the claim. The fruits obtained after the initiation of legal proceedings should be reversed to the rightful owner in case of the restitution of the goods (CC art. 1148).

39. In GREECE, the possessor who took possession of the movable in good faith and continued to exercise possession in good faith, is entitled to keep the benefits deriving from the goods before the initiation of the legal proceedings for restitution (CC art. 1100). In case the underlying sales contract is avoided but the real transaction is valid, the possessor has to return the movable and the fruits deriving from the movable according to the CC art. 904, 908 (unjustified enrichment). Regarding the benefits collected after the initiation of the proceedings, the owner can claim the restitution of those benefits from the possessor in good faith. The possessor is also liable for the benefits which he or she culpably failed to collect after the initiation of the proceedings but which could have been collected according to the rules of proper management (CC art. 1096).

40. In SLOVENIA, fruits are regarded as components of a movable and share the same fate as the object until they are separated. The right of separation normally belongs to the owner. A good faith possessor can obtain ownership of the fruits by virtue of their separation and is only obliged to return fruits which have not yet been separated (Code of Property Law art. 95/I). Good faith can be lost by the initiation of an action (Faber/Lurger [-Rudolf/Rijavek/Keresteš], National Reports I: Slovenia, 106). In the case of void and avoided contracts, every party has to return to the other everything received (Code of Obligations art. 187/II).

41. In LITHUANIA, the possessor in good faith is entitled to keep the benefits which were received up until the time when he or she found out or should have found out that the possession was unlawful, or obtained knowledge about the initiation of judicial proceedings regarding the revindication of the movable. The owner who recovers the property is entitled to claim from the good faith possessor all the income which was received or should have been received as from the time indicated above (CC art. 4.97). Good faith is presumed. The possessor is in good faith if convinced that nobody has more rights to the thing (CC art. 4.26). If the goods have to be restored due to the avoidance or termination of a contract between the parties, all fruits and income belong to the person bound to make restitution. This person bears all expenses incurred in the production of those fruits and revenues (CC art. 6.151).

42. In HUNGARY, the possessor in good faith is not liable for the benefits obtained during the period before the legal proceedings for recovery were initiated. Furthermore, a possessor who has acquired possession for value is not even obliged to surrender the existing benefits. However, the position changes as from the time when the legal proceedings are initiated. As from this time, the rules on “responsible custody” (CC §§ 196-197) will apply. According to these rules, the possessor is obliged to return all benefits which collected, or to pay the value of the benefits which could have been collected. The possessor can deduct these benefits from expenses incurred (Faber/Lurger [-Szilagyi], National Reports III: Hungary, 95). Nevertheless, if it is obvious that the possessor is in bad faith as from the initiation of legal proceedings, he or she will be liable as a possessor in bad faith (see note 54). If the transfer is based on a void or avoided contract, the situation is regulated according to the principle in integrum restitutio (CC § 237 (1)).

43. In SWITZERLAND, the possessor in good faith is entitled to keep the natural and civil fruits, provided that they were collected while the possessor was still in good faith. The person who believes himself or herself to be the rightful owner has the right to use the object without having to pay any compensation (CC art. 938; Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 504). For the notion of good faith, see note 14 to VIII.–7:102.

44. In PORTUGAL, the possessor in good faith is entitled to keep the natural and civil fruits collected during the possession in good faith (CC art. 1270). The main reason is that: "The good faith possessor acted in the conviction of being the holder of a right in the movable, and as such it would be unfair to oblige him to return the harvested fruits, as he was expecting them and organised his activity based on that expectation" (de Lima/Varela, Código Civil anotado[2] III, 37). For the meaning of good faith, see note 23 to VIII.–7:102.

45. According to the GERMAN CC § 993(1), the possessor in good faith is entitled to keep the benefits, even those which he or she still has in possession. This provision, however, provides for an exception in the case of an excess of fruits (Übermaßfrüchte). Furthermore, the possessor in good faith is obliged to return all benefits to the rightful owner, if possession was obtained gratuitously (CC § 988). Restitution has to be effected according to the rules on unjustified enrichment. If the possessor incurred some expenses on the goods, the defence of disenrichment may be available (Schwab/Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 533; Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 IV 4; Bamberger/Roth [-Fritzsche], BGB II, § 988, no. 11). As to the definition of good faith, see note 17 to VIII.–7:102. Also the benefits collected by the possessor in good faith after the initiation of legal proceedings have to be handed over to the rightful owner (CC § 987 (1)). The proceedings are considered to be initiated with the notification of the summons (Soergel [-Stadler], BGB[13], § 987, no. 4). If the fruits still exist, the possessor has to restitute these in natura. Otherwise, the possessor is obliged to pay the value of those benefits. The possessor is also liable for the benefits which he or she culpably failed to collect after the initiation of the proceedings but which could have been collected according to the rules of proper management (CC § 987(2)). It is irrelevant whether the rightful owner would have collected these fruits if still in possession of the goods (Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 IV 2 a; Bamberger/Roth [-Fritzsche], BGB II, § 987, no. 65). If the possessor incurred any expenses in order to obtain the benefits these costs may be deducted from the amount of compensation (Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 IV 2 a bb).

46. In SCOTLAND, according to one legal scholar, a claim against a good faith possessor lies not in the enrichment received at the owner's expense but in the enrichment surviving. Thus, if a possessor in good faith has increased his or her spending, the possessor is not liable for this increase (Stair, Institutions of the Laws of Scotland[2], I.7.10). Other opinions brought forward, and as a separate defence for a good faith possessor, are that a good faith possessor becomes the owner of the fruits upon separation or, slightly narrower, that the possessor is liable only for the fruits remaining unconsumed by the time of the claim to recover the principal thing (Stair, Institutions of the Laws of Scotland[2], I.7.10 and Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 174). A good faith possessor need not prove consumption, a presumption of consumption can be drawn from the collection of the fruits (Ferguson v Lord Advocate (1904) 14 SLT 52). Depending on the kinds of fruits, this presumption is not always applicable.

47. The AUSTRIAN CC § 330 provides that the possessor in good faith acquires ownership of natural fruits by separating them from the property. The rule can be understood as a lex specialis to the general provision of CC § 405, which provides that, by separation, ownership of fruits is acquired by the owner of the property (Klang [-Klang], ABGB II^2, 405). Civil fruits are primarily attributed to the possessor in good faith under the double prerequisite that they have already been 'collected' and that they have become due during 'quiet possession', i.e. as long as the possessor has not been sued (cf. CC § 338; Klang [-Schey/Klang], ABGB II^2, 96 f). As to the notion of good faith, see note 21 to VIII.–7:102. It is, however, a matter of dispute whether or to what extent this result is to be adapted under the rules on unjustified enrichment. According to the prevailing opinion, such a modification must be made in the majority of cases (Klang [-Wilburg], ABGB VI^2, 474 f; Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 330, no. 3; OGH 22 April 1997, SZ 70/69, concerning immovable property. Arguing for a stricter observation of the principles provided for by CC § 330: Rummel [-Spielbüchler], ABGB I^3, § 330, no. 1). The prevailing view is based on the ratio legis the legislator had in mind when introducing CC § 330: The possessor in good faith should be entitled to keep the fruits, first, as compensation for the purchase price paid to a third party and which is not recovered from the owner (CC § 333). Second, keeping the fruits was seen as a schematic way of compensating the possessor for the efforts expended to obtain such fruits (Zeiller, Commentar II/1 69 f). Therefore, the range of situations where CC § 330 can be applied literally (i.e. the possessor may keep the fruits) is reduced to those to which the referred argumentation fits (for more details, see Faber/Lurger [-Faber], National Reports I: Austria, 188 f). The obligation to reverse under unjustified enrichment law applies both to natural and civil fruits. As indicated above, it also applies to other benefits the possessor may have obtained from the movable, particularly by using it (see note 25). In the latter case, the possessor is obliged to pay a sum equivalent to the price of using the property (Benützungsentgelt), which is, according to the prevailing opinion, to be calculated based on the individual benefit the good faith possessor had from utilisation (Schwimann [-Klicka], ABGB II^3, § 330, no. 2; Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 330, no. 3). Fructification costs are to be deducted from the benefit which has to be reversed under unjustified enrichment law (Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 330; no. 4). As to unjustified enrichment claims under AUSTRIAN law, it should also be mentioned that, in general, the obligation to reverse the enrichment is not extinguished if the enrichment ceases to exist subsequently (no defence of 'disenrichment'). There is no delictual liability of a possessor in good faith for fruits consumed; nor for fruits he or she could have collected but did not (Iro, Sachenrecht^3, no. 7/5).

48. The ESTONIAN regulation distinguishes between two-party and three-party constellations. Regarding the former, the possessor will be obliged to compensate the owner for the usual value of the benefits received as a result of use, if the possessor keeps using the movable even though the contractual relationship has terminated. In cases where the goods have to be restored because the contract is void or has been avoided, anything received plus any profits gained therefrom have to be restored (LObligA § 1028). If the transferred movable has been destroyed, consumed, damaged or seized, the owner may claim the transfer of what the possessor acquired in return for it (LObligA § 1032). In general, the possessor is relieved of the duty to return what was received or to compensate for the value thereof in the case of subsequent disenrichment (LObligA § 1033(1)). However, this defence is not applicable in cases of synallagmatic contracts (LObligA § 1034(1)). Further, the defence of disenrichment is not applicable where the destruction, consumption or damaging of the goods has occurred after the transferee became aware or should have become aware of circumstances constituting a basis for reclamation pursuant to provisions on unjustified enrichment (LObligA § 1035(1) and (2)). In case of the involuntary loss of possession of the movable by the owner (e.g. theft), the rules on condictio against intervention (LObligA §§ 1037–1040) usually apply. The person who violated the owner's rights by disposition, use, consumption, combination, commingling, production or otherwise is liable to compensate the owner for the usual value of what that person received as a result of the violation. The violator is relieved of such duty if he or she was not aware nor was supposed to be aware of the lack of entitlement with regard to the movable, in so far as no longer enriched by the value gained as a result of the violation by the time of learning about the filing of the compensation claim (LObligA § 1038). In three-party constellations, the provisions of the PropLA, regarding the delivery of and the compensation for fruits (§ 85(1)), make an explicit reference to LObligA §§ 1037–1040, i.e. the provisions on condictio against intervention (see above). Thus, the same rules apply to relations between an owner and the violator of the owner's rights as apply to the relationship between the owner and a possessor who is bound by neither a contractual nor a non-contractual relationship. If a non-entitled person has disposed of the movable without the actual owner's consent and the requirements for good faith acquisition have not been met, the owner may, instead of directing a claim against the third-party possessor, demand from the non-entitled person compensation for the usual value of that which the latter received. However, in the case of a gratuitous transfer by a non-entitled person, the third-party acquirer is required to deliver to the rightful owner what was received, even if the conditions for good faith acquisition were met (LObligA § 1040). The acquirer in good faith may rely on the defence of disenrichment (Faber/Lurger [-Kullerkupp], National Reports I: Estonia, 104-106).

49. According to the CZECH CC § 458 (2) (restitution on the basis of an unjustified enrichment claim), the possessor in good faith is entitled to all proceeds; this includes also fruits (Faber/Lurger [-Tichý], National Reports VI: Czech Republic, 72). However, if the owner claims the restitution of the goods on the basis of the rei vindicatio, all fruits (proceeds) must be reversed, regardless of whether the possessor is in good or bad faith (Faber/Lurger [-Tichý], National Reports VI: Czech Republic, 70).

50. Under CYPRUS law, the possessor's good or bad faith is not a criterion. See further section I of these Notes.

51. For ENGLAND, WALES and IRELAND, see section I of these Notes.

IV. Possession in bad faith

52. In the NETHERLANDS, the possessor who is not in good faith is not entitled to the fruits (CC art. 3:121 (1)) but is obliged to deliver all the collected fruits to their rightful owner. If not able to deliver these fruits, the possessor is liable according to the rules on non-contractual liability for damage (Asser, Goederenrecht[14] II, no. 123). The possessor who is not in good faith is liable for damage suffered by the rightful owner due to the unlawful possession by the possessor. This covers also the fruits which have not been collected by the possessor (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Rank-Berenschot], B.W.[3], art. 3:121, no. 2).

53. In SCOTLAND, a possessor is likely to be liable for all fruits consumed or other benefits obtained during the period of possession (Carey Miller/Irvine, Corporeal Moveables in Scots Law[2], 243). There appears to be no authority in SCOTLAND on the liability of a possessor who has not acquired the fruits that the movable could have generated. But, since a good faith possessor is entitled to the fruits generated, the imposition of such liability will be restricted to a bad faith possessor anyway (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 175 and Carey Miller/Irvine, Corporeal Moveables in Scots Law[2], 106 f).

54. In HUNGARY, the bad faith possessor is obliged to return the existing benefits and pay the value of any benefits which he or she consumed or failed to collect (Faber/Lurger [-Szilagyi], National Reports III: Hungary, 96).

55. In LITHUANIA, the possessor in bad faith is obliged to restitute or reimburse all income that he or she received or should have received throughout the whole period of possession (CC art. 4.97). Hence, the possessor in bad faith is not entitled to any benefit (Faber/Lurger [-Mikelenas], National Reports III: Lithuania, 70). As good faith is presumed, the owner has to prove that the possessor was in bad faith, i.e. that the possessor knew or should have known that there was no right to obtain possession of the goods or that another person had more rights in the goods in question (CC art. 4.26). In the case of the restitution of a thing according to the rules of the law of obligations (e.g. avoidance or termination of a contract between the parties), CC art. 6.151 provides a special rule. If the person bound to make restitution is in bad faith or if the restitution is due to that person's fault, there is an obligation not only to return the fruits and income but also to indemnify the creditor for any benefit has derived from the thing. Nevertheless, the creditor must compensate the debtor for the necessary expenses incurred in producing the fruits and income (see note 50 to VIII.–7:104).

56. Under GREEK law, the possessor who was in bad faith at the moment of obtaining possession of the movable, or who has become aware later that there was no entitlement to possess, is obliged to hand over the collected fruits which still exist, a sum equivalent to the value of the fruits alienated or consumed and the equivalent of the benefits which were culpably not collected (CC art. 1098). It is not the time of the initiation of the legal action which is decisive for the possessor's liability, but a moment prior to such initiation, namely the moment when the possessor became a possessor in bad faith (Georgiadis, Property Law I, 592). The bad faith possessor who is also in default is liable for all damage that occurred while in default and, therefore, also for the benefits which, without fault, were not collected (CC art. 1098 s. 2 and art. 343(1)). He or she is also liable for the accidental impossibility of performance. On the other hand, if it is proved that the damage would also have occurred if the movable had been returned in time, the possessor is not liable. Besides these duties, such a possessor is, in addition, obliged to pay an equivalent of the value of the fruits he or she could not collect, as well as the equivalent of the value of the fruits which were destroyed while he or she was in default. There is also liability for the accidental perishing of a movable (Faber/Lurger [-Klaoudatou], National Reports III: Greece, 146). A possessor who obtained possession based on an illegal act is also liable to compensate the owner according to the provisions on unlawful acts (CC art. 1099). He or she has to compensate for all fruits irrespective of the moment of the initiation of legal proceedings for restitution or his or her bad faith. Hence, the possessor is also liable in case of slight negligence (Faber/Lurger [-Klaoudatou], National Reports III: Greece, 146). The liability of the possessor, on the basis of the provisions on unlawful acts, is concurrent with the regulations on the possessor's liability according to CC art. 1096 ff (Georgiadis, Property Law I, 594).

57. According to the BELGIAN CC art. 549, the possessor in bad faith is obliged to return the fruits together with the movable to the rightful owner, who is revindicating the property. The possessor in bad faith has to return all fruits collected, regardless of whether he or she still has them or has already consumed them; in the latter case, he or she has to pay an equivalent of the value of the consumed goods. Case law and legal writing unanimously accept that the possessor in bad faith even has to pay an equivalent to the fruits he or she has neglected to collect. Moreover, he or she must pay compensation to the owner for fruits obtained by a third person in good faith to whom the goods have been transferred, even if the third party's good faith subsequently ceased to exist (Hansenne, Les biens I, no. 269). However, the possessor in bad faith does not have to restitute the fruits he or she failed to collect, if it can be proved that the owner would not have been able to collect them either (Hansenne, Les biens I, no. 272). In cases where restitution has to be performed in the form of compensation, it is acknowledged in legal writing that the value of the fruits should be calculated with reference to the moment of restitution (Hansenne, Les biens I, no. 270). The FRENCH legislator has explicitly taken up this view in CC art. 549. It is generally accepted that the possessor in bad faith may be held liable to pay the interest generated by the fruits to the rightful owner as compensation for damage. The interest accrues as from the moment when the possessor in bad faith collected the fruits (Hansenne, Les biens I, no. 271; De Page/Dekkers, VI, no. 155). Nevertheless, the possessor in bad faith is entitled to request compensation for the production costs (Van Neste, Beginselen van Belgisch Privaatrecht V[2], no. 251; referring to CC art. 548: the fruits belong to the owner of the goods, who is under an obligation to compensate the possessor for the costs of, for example, ploughing, cultivation and sowing). This rule is based on the theory of necessary costs (see notes 28 and 55 to VIII.–7:104) and, more generally, on the principle of unjustified enrichment (Hansenne, Les biens I, no. 273).

58. Under SPANISH law, the possessor in bad faith is obliged to compensate the rightful owner for the fruits received, as well as for those which the rightful owner could have received (CC art. 455). The possessor has the right to claim the reimbursement of the necessary expenses of production, because otherwise the rightful owner would be unjustifiably enriched (see notes 48 to VIII.–7:104). Besides, the CC art. 356 provides for a general rule according to which "he who receives the fruits has the obligation to pay the expenses incurred by a third person on their production, collection and preservation".

59. In ITALY, the possessor in bad faith is not regarded as being socially justified to keep fruits belonging to another person. In this case, if possession results from a delict, the possessor is liable under the law of delict and the restitution of the goods and their fruits has a compensatory nature. However, if possession has been obtained by means of a wrongful transfer, the possessor can bring actions for the protection of possession, the result of which will depend on the good or bad faith of the possessor. The possessor in bad faith will always have to return the fruits (CC art. 2033) and also has to pay the value of the fruits which he or she would have collected if acting with ordinary care (Faber/Lurger [-Greco], National Reports I: Italy, 44).

60. Under SWISS law, the bad faith possessor has to compensate the rightful owner for all advantages (not only fruits) enjoyed from using the movable (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 516). He or she has to pay an equivalent monetary compensation sum for using the goods. If the fruits still exist, the possessor has to hand them over in natura but otherwise is obliged to pay the value of those advantages, even if the fruits have been lost accidentally (Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], art. 940, no. 11). Furthermore, the possessor is also liable for the fruits he or she neglected to collect (CC art. 940(1)). Compensation is, however, only owed for fruits, which would have been collected if the possessor had used the thing in an appropriate way (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 517). Moreover, it is sometimes argued that the rightful owner cannot claim for compensation if the fruits would not have been collected anyway even if the owner had remained in possession of the goods, since in such case the owner has not suffered any damage (Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], art. 940, no. 10; other opinion: Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 517). It should be added, however, that the CC art. 940(3) states that as long as the possessor does not know to whom the goods have to be returned, he or she is only liable for damage caused by fault (see note 37 to VIII.–7:102).

61. Under PORTUGUESE law, the possessor in bad faith must return all fruits produced by the movable during the possession (CC art. 1271) and is also obliged to compensate the owner for the value of the fruits that the movable could have potentially generated had the possessor acted with the care of a "diligent owner" (CC art. 1271; STJ 21 January 1972, BMJ 213, 231; de Lima/Varela, Código Civil anotado[2] III, 39). The rationale is that the bad faith possessor is responsible vis-à-vis the owner for all avoidable damage and detriment caused by the bad faith possession (Rodrigues, A Posse, 314).

62. As described above, NORWEGIAN law provides that a possessor must have been in non-negligent good faith in order to obtain the benefits. As from the time the owner has brought a claim for the revindication of the movable and the possessor's good faith, therefore, has ceased to exist, the possessor has to compensate the owner for the yield and use he or she benefited from, though being able to deduct costs. As for the time prior to the bringing of the revindication action, the possessor only has to compensate the owner for the profit that does not constitute a yield or use (Lov om hendelege eigedomshove 1969/17 § 15).

63. In DENMARK, a possessor has no right to the obtained fruits as from the time he or she qualifies as a possessor in bad faith (Vinding Kruse, Ejendomsretten[3], 743 f; DL 5-2-89 11 sept. 1839 § 2 and lov nr 397, 12 july 1946 § 22). A possessor in bad faith is also liable for all fruits he or she failed to obtain (Vinding Kruse, Ejendomsretten[3], 744 and DL 6-15-12).

64. In FINLAND, a possessor in bad faith has no right to keep the benefits or fruits generated by the movable (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 74 f and Supreme Court ruling KKO 1984 II 125).

65. In GERMANY, the possessor in bad faith is liable for the benefits pursuant to CC § 987 - i.e. as a possessor in good faith after the introduction of legal proceedings (CC § 990 (1)) – and is obliged to return all benefits. As to the definition of bad faith, see note 39 to VIII.–7:102. If the fruits still exist, the possessor must hand them over in natura but otherwise must pay a sum equivalent to the value of those benefits. Moreover, the possessor in bad faith is also liable for the benefits which, due to fault, he or she failed to collect but could have collected according to the rules of proper management (Schwab/Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 532). The possessor who obtained possession through a criminal act or unlawful dispossession is liable according to the provisions of non-contractual liability law (CC § 992) and, according to the prevailing opinion, has to return all benefits collected and those which wee culpably not collected, even though the rightful owner would not have collected them (Schwab/Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 535; Baur/Stürner, § 11, no. 14. For another opinion, see Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 IV 6 who argues that compensation is limited to fruits which would have been collected by the rightful owner; otherwise, there is no unjustified enrichment).

66. In SWEDEN, Konkurslagen chap. 4 §§ 5 and 15 provide that where a movable has to be returned to a bankruptcy estate, a bad faith possessor must reverse not only the fruits obtained after the initiation of the revindication proceedings, but also the fruits obtained as from the time he or she obtained possession of the movable. Irrespective of insolvency, a claim for restoring fruits and compensation for use may be based on unjustified enrichment which is, however, a disputed concept in SWEDISH law (see section I of these Notes).

67. In ESTONIA, the same distinction concerning the possessor in bad faith and the possessor in good faith is made (see note 28). In the case of two-party constellations, the possessor will be obliged to pay to the owner the usual value of the benefits received in the form of use, if the possessor keeps using the movable even though the contractual relationship is terminated. However, according to LObligA § 1039, the owner may further claim from a possessor in bad faith, the transfer of any revenues received as a result of the violation, in addition to the usual value of that which was received. In cases where the goods have to be restored because the contract is void or avoided, anything received plus any profits gained therefrom have to be restored (LObligA § 1028). If the transferred movable has been destroyed, consumed, damaged or seized, the owner may claim the transfer of what the possessor acquired in return for it (LObligA § 1032). Disenrichment will not relieve the transferee, if, at the time the disenrichment occurred, the transferee knew or should have known about circumstances constituting a basis for reclamation pursuant to the provisions on unjustified enrichment. If the transferee was aware or should have been aware of such circumstances either at the time of disenrichment or before the disenrichment took place, the transferee is liable to deliver to the transferor the gains derived from the goods, to pay interest in case money was received and to compensate for any uncollected profits that the transferee could have obtained in the course of regular economic activity (management) (LObligA § 1035 (3)). Also PropLA § 85(2) provides that the possessor who obtained possession by way of arbitrary action is additionally required to compensate for gains that the owner would have received if still in possession of the thing (Faber/Lurger [-Kullerkupp], National Reports I: Estonia, 104-106). For three-party constellations, see Note 48 above.

68. Under AUSTRIAN property law, the possessor in bad faith does not acquire ownership of any fruits (CC § 335). According to the general rules of CC §§ 404 ff, ownership is acquired by the owner of the principal asset. As a consequence, the owner is entitled to recover the fruits based on the right of ownership. Unjustified enrichment law provides that the possessor in bad faith must hand over all benefits gained from the movable to its owner (CC §§ 335, 1437). This may also apply to benefits which the owner would not have obtained (Schwimann [-Klicka], ABGB II^3, § 335, no. 1; Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 335, no. 1; OGH 30 January 1996, JBl 1996, 653). This principle, however, may be subject to an exception: The possessor in bad faith may be entitled to parts of the fruits in case they could only be generated due to the significant efforts of the bad faith possessor (OGH 4 December 1968, JBl 1969, 272; for further examples, see Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 335, no. 1). The possessor who has consumed or sold the goods is obliged to pay at least the market price. Also, a consideration for using the object (Benützungsentgelt) is to be calculated irrespective of the possessor's subjective benefit (Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 335, no. 3). Regarding the costs of producing the fruits, however, the same outcome as for the possessor in good faith should result. Such costs have to be deducted from the benefit to be reversed under unjustified enrichment law (Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 330, no. 4). According to the CC § 335, the possessor in bad faith is also liable for fruits not collected, and under non-contractual liability law, the possessor in bad faith is liable if he or she caused damage to fruits.

69. Under SLOVENIAN law, the bad faith possessor is not entitled to the fruits, but has to return all the fruits to the owner (Code of Property Law art. 96/I). The possessor in bad faith has to compensate the owner for all the fruits he or she has separated or that were separated by somebody else during the possession (Code of Property Law art. 96/II).

70. Under CZECH law, the possessor in bad faith is obliged to return any enrichment that has been acquired unjustifiably to the detriment of the rightful owner. If this is not possible, the possessor must provide compensation in money (CC section 458(1)). As a consequence, the possessor has no defence. This is a strict liability regime. Regardless of the reason why the goods have to be restituted, the possessor is obliged to perform (Jehlička/Švestka/Škárová [-Pokorný/Salač], Občanský zákoník – komentář[9], 666).

71. In IRELAND, a wrongdoing possessor may be obliged to pay damages covering not only what the owner has lost but also the profits and benefits obtained by the wrongdoing possessor. This prevents him or her from profiting from the wrongful act (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 91).

72. For ENGLAND and WALES, see section I of these Notes.

VIII.–7:104: Expenditure on, or parts added to, the goods during possession

(1) Where the possessor incurs expenditure on, or adds parts to, the goods during possession in the sense of VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application), the rights of the possessor to reimbursement of such expenditure or for such addition are determined by Book VII.

(2) The possessor is entitled to retain the goods in order to secure the rights referred to in paragraph (1). Sentence 1 does not apply where the possessor knows of the owner's entitlement to obtain or recover possession at the time when expenditure is incurred on, or parts are added to, the goods.

COMMENTS

A. General

Situations covered by paragraph (1). Paragraph (1) of this Article covers all situations where the possessor incurs expenditure on the owner's goods during possession or physically adds parts to them. One may think, e.g., of expenses made for the purpose of the preservation of the goods, such as repainting a boat where this is absolutely necessary in order to prevent its deterioration, as well as of repainting a car where this is absolutely unnecessary, but the possessor simply likes the new colour better than the old one. Also, one may think of ordinary maintenance costs, such as the costs of feeding animals, or costs incurred for improving the other's property, such as the costs of training a horse for show jumping competitions. The term "expenditure" is to be understood in a broad sense. It covers monetary expenses as well as work or any other performance. The Article further covers situations where the improvement (or potential improvement) consists of a part physically added to the owner's property, such as a new radio or GPS system installed in the owner's car. In relation to the broad meaning of "expenditure", as outlined above, adding corporeal parts to the goods appears just as a subcategory of incurring expenditure; it is, however, mentioned explicitly for the purpose of clarity. It is immaterial whether the possessor carried out these acts personally or whether another person, such as a service provider, performed them on the possessor's account. Also, the Article intends to address situations where such expenses have been incurred but the efforts turn out to have failed, either because the intended effect was not achieved from the beginning or because the effect was achieved originally, but had disappeared before the goods were returned to their owner. In all these situations the question arises whether and to what extent such expenditures (in the broad sense) are to be reimbursed by the owner upon retaking possession of the goods.

Relevant time. As to the relevant point in time when the act of incurring expenses or adding parts must be undertaken in order to apply this Article ("during possession"), see VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment B.

Main approaches as to reimbursement in European legal systems and basic policy issues. By way of a rough summary of important divergences to be found in the European legal systems, one may point out that in some countries, the issues covered by this Article are dealt with under an unjustified enrichment approach, basically making the possessor's right to reimbursement depend on the owner's subjective benefit. This basically is the case in French law and in English law, as far as restitution principles are applied. Where tort law is applied, English law provides for the possibility of reducing the quantum of damages according to the value of the improvements (only) if the improver acted in the mistaken but honest belief that there was a good title to the goods. In those countries which deal with these issues according to the patterns derived from an owner-possessor relationship tradition (cf. VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment C), usually two basic distinctions are made. The first distinction relates to certain types of expenses: "necessary" expenses, i.e. expenditures which are indispensable to maintain the property, are distinguished from other expenses, which are often divided into "useful" and "sumptuary" expenses. Secondly, in many, but not all, countries it is important whether the possessor, upon incurring the expenses, was in good faith or in bad faith. Details vary, but a main characteristic of this approach is that where the possessor made necessary expenses in good faith, the owner must reimburse these expenses irrespective of whether or not the owner subjectively benefits from them. In other situations, reimbursement is often restricted in one way or another, taking into account the objective increase in value or the owner's subjective benefit. In most countries even a possessor in bad faith who made other than "necessary" expenses may be reimbursed in one way or the other. The main policy issues, therefore, will be whether a possessor in good faith should be reimbursed for certain expenses (like "necessary" expenses) regardless of whether the owner derives any benefit from them; in other words: whether a possessor in good faith should be privileged as compared to the legal position under the general unjustified enrichment principles that are provided for by Book VII. Second, it will have to be decided whether (or to what extent) possessors in bad faith, or in certain types of qualified bad faith, should be excluded from a right to reimbursement.

Right to retain, paragraph (2). Paragraph (2) provides that the possessor who has a claim for reimbursement under paragraph (1) is entitled to retain the goods as a security for such a claim. A comparable right exists in many European jurisdictions, sometimes with certain exceptions. Paragraph (2) will be dealt with more closely in Comment C below.

Possessor's right to remove added parts (ius tollendi). Also, many legal systems contain a rule that the possessor is entitled to remove improvements made to the asset (such as a new radio installed in the owner's car), provided that the asset can be returned to the owner in its previous condition. This idea goes back to Roman law (so called ius tollendi). Chapter 7 does not provide for such a right explicitly but presupposes that it exists under the precondition that the possessor is still to be regarded as the owner of that part (or otherwise has a better right to it than the owner of the "main" goods). The issue is discussed in some more detail in Comment D, below, and is also reflected in the Notes to this Article.

Relation to Chapter 5. As to the relation between this Article and Chapter 5, in particular to VIII.–5:203 (Combination), see VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) paragraph (3) and Comment G on that Article. See also Comments D below and VIII.–5:203 (Combination) Comment D.

B. Reimbursement of expenditure and for added parts

Overview. The following Comments will deal with the issues covered by paragraph (1), the main idea being that the possessor's rights to reimbursement of expenditure on, or for parts added to the goods, are determined by Book VII. The Comments will first describe how the reference to unjustified enrichment law works (subsection (a)) and subsequently justify the policy of not privileging possessors (in particular: those in good faith) who incur "necessary expenses", as compared to their legal position under the general unjustified enrichment principles. This requires dealing more closely with some main arguments put forward in favour of the alternative owner-possessor relationship approach (subsection (b)). After that, the Comments focus on the specific policy question of how to deal with a possessor who acts in bad faith, in particular with a possessor who actually knows that the goods are owned by another person (subsection (c)). As to situations which fall within the scope of Book V on benevolent intervention in another's affairs, see VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) paragraph (2) and Comments E on that Article.

(a) Effect of the reference to Book VII in paragraph (1)

How the main criteria relevant under Book VII work in general. Under Book VII, as relevant for the purposes of this Article, the two most relevant criteria regarding the reversal of an enrichment are: whether the enrichment is transferable or not, and whether the enriched person is in good faith or not. Compare VIII.–7:103 (Fruits from, use of, and other benefits derived from the goods during possession) Comment B, the category of "fruits and use" of the enrichment however not being relevant in the present context. When applying unjustified enrichment principles to the issues covered by this Article, i.e. expenditure made on goods, the enriched person is the owner of these goods. This has the consequence that the enriched person will almost automatically be regarded as being enriched in good faith in the sense of VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) paragraph (5): In most cases, the owner, who is not in possession of the goods, will simply not know that an improvement is made to, or other expenses are incurred on, the property at the time these events take place. This will have some relevance when applying several rules, as will emerge from the following. Where the enrichment is transferable (e.g., the possessor put a new radio into the owner's car, which can still be removed), the enriched person (owner) is basically obliged to transfer the asset to the possessor. But the owner may choose to pay the monetary value of the enrichment if a transfer would cause an unreasonable effort or expense for the owner; see VII.–5:101 paragraphs (1) and (2). These rules apply regardless of the enriched person's good faith or bad faith. Where the enrichment is non-transferable (as, e.g., in the case of maintenance costs incurred), the owner must, in principle, pay the objective monetary value of the enrichment, VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (1). But in the majority of constellations, the owner will not have to pay "more than any saving", as the owner will be considered as being in good faith or not having consented to the enrichment (VII.–5:102 paragraph (2)). The function of this feature will be discussed more closely in subsection (b), below. In addition, the owner in good faith may generally raise the defence of disenrichment (VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment)) if, for instance, the improvement made by the possessor does not exist any more when the owner recovers possession.

Differences to criteria relevant under the owner-possessor relationship tradition. As follows from the foregoing, the criteria relevant within the adopted approach differ from those traditionally used in the countries which follow an owner-possessor relationship tradition (cf. Comment A above): The distinction between "necessary" and "other" ("useful" and "sumptuary") expenses is not used as a structural element and has no relevance as such. Also, the distinction between a possessor in good faith and a possessor in bad faith is – basically – immaterial. Book VII differentiates between enriched persons in good faith and in bad faith; the state of mind of the disadvantaged person is of no importance, except for certain persons actually knowing that they are not entitled to the property and who, therefore, are considered to "consent freely and without error to the disadvantage" in the sense of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances in which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b).

How Book VII works in case of performance of an obligation to a third person ("garage cases" etc.) in particular. In particular instances the general regime described above is subject to an important reservation. Due to VII.–2:102 (Performance of obligation to third person) sub-paragraph (a), an enrichment is "justified" – meaning that no reversal of the enrichment may take place from the beginning – "where the enriched person obtains the enrichment as a result of the disadvantaged person performing an obligation or a supposed obligation owed by the disadvantaged person to a third person" if "the disadvantaged person performed feely". Within the potential scope of Chapter 7 (cf. VIII.–7:101 (Scope of application) Comment B), such a situation may occur, e.g., where a garage owner (possessor) enters into a contract with a non-owner for repairing a car (apparently owned by the latter) and, by way of performing the obligation arising from that contract, enriches the owner of the car. Another relevant situation may occur where goods are leased from a non-owner and the lessee must, under IV.B.–5:105 (Intervention to avoid danger or damage to the goods) paragraph (1), take necessary measures for the maintenance or repair of the goods because it is impossible or impracticable for the lessor, but not for the lessee, to ensure that these measures are taken. In both situations, the disadvantaged person who is in possession of the goods (garage owner; lessee) performs an obligation towards a third person (the client, the non-owner of the car; or the lessor, respectively), thereby enriching the owner of the goods. Whether the disadvantaged possessor is entitled to a reversal of the enrichment as against the owner will depend on whether the possessor "performed freely" in the sense of VII.–2:102 sub-paragraph (a). As follows from VII.–2:103 (Consenting or performing freely) paragraph (2), no "free" performance will take place (only) if the obligation which is performed is ineffective because of incapacity, fraud, coercion, threats or unfair exploitation. Practically speaking, where the disadvantaged possessor can be regarded as "defrauded" in the sense of these provisions (so that the circumstances establish a ground for avoidance under II.–7:205 (Fraud)), he or she may proceed against the owner under the unjustified enrichment principles, as described above. Where he or she is in mere error, this is not possible. The rationale of this general policy established by Book VII is that "the parties to the contract have sought themselves out and, as regards any restitutionary claims arising from the failure of their purported contractual agreement, ought to look only to their counterpart for recompense since in the usual case it was from that other party (and not any other person who may be directly or incidentally benefited) that the disadvantaged party expected its counter-performance". Compare VII.–2:102 (Performance of obligation to third person) Comment B. Book VIII respects this basic policy decision by its general reference to Book VII.

(b) Policy considerations as to not privileging possessors who incur "necessary" expenses in relation to unjustified enrichment principles

Overview of main issues. When comparing the results under the unjustified enrichment approach presented above with those resulting from the traditional distinctions employed by many owner-possessor relationship regimes, two main differences appear to exist. Both relate, above all, to "necessary expenses", in particular where the possessor acted in good faith. The first problem arises where the owner's benefit, due to the individual circumstances of that person, is smaller than the value of the possessor's expenditure. The second problem arises where the improvement achieved (or intended to be achieved) by the possessor's expenditure does not exist (any longer) when the goods are returned to their owner. These two issues will be discussed below. Since this analysis does not reveal any compelling reasons for deviating from the unjustified enrichment principles of Book VII, its outcome has become an important argument, along with considerations of coherence, for adopting the approach presented above in subsection (a).

Owner's subjective benefit smaller than value of expenditure. The first issue relates to the extent of liability where the benefit to the owner (enriched person), due to the individual circumstances of that person, is less than the expenses incurred by the possessor. Where expenditures are "necessary" from an ex ante perspective, legal systems following an owner-possessor relationship tradition provide a right to full reimbursement. Under Book VII, on the other hand, the owner who did not consent to the enrichment is only obliged to pay his or her "saving", i.e., subjective circumstances of the owner are taken into account, provided that the enrichment is non-transferable (which often is the case with regard to "necessary" expenses); cf. VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (2). The latter concept is less favourable to the possessor (i) where the owner would not have incurred such expenses by reason of personal needs and preferences (see Illustration 1 below). Potentially, there can also be some differences (ii) where the owner would have decided to undertake the same kind of preservation measure as well, but could have achieved the same result with less effort because of individual special knowledge or skills, so that the "saving" is smaller than the value of the possessor's expenses.

> P, being in good faith, buys a riding horse from a thief and incurs all necessary expenses of feeding and keeping it for two years. Then the horse's owner O finds it. O would have been unable to ride the horse during the past two years because a traffic accident has forced him into a wheel chair. He therefore intended to sell the horse before it was stolen (alternatively, O would have sold the horse because he lost his job and could not afford keeping a horse any longer). A settlement between O and P fails and O reclaims his horse. P insists on being reimbursed for the necessary expenses she incurred on the horse.

The owner-possessor relationship rule providing that necessary expenses (incurred by a possessor in good faith) must always be reimbursed may force the owner to pay for investments he or she would never have made. This contradicts the principle that the owner is free to do whatever he or she likes with the asset, cf. VIII.–1:202 (Ownership). The rule is based on the assumption that the owner always benefits from "necessary" expenses. As Illustration 1 shows, this is, however, a simplified way of looking at the substantial question. The unjustified enrichment rules of Book VII take a more differentiated approach, in particular by introducing the "saving" cap in VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment). This is a major policy decision of the unjustified enrichment law of Book VII, explicitly based on the policy of party autonomy, i.e. on the principle that the enriched person (provided that he or she did not consent or is in good faith) should not be forced into exchanges without consent; cf. VII.–5:102 Comment C. Having regard to this, it appears preferable to apply the unjustified enrichment principles instead of providing a strict "necessary expenses are to be reimbursed" rule. It should however be stated that in many situations, where necessary expenses actually correlate with the owner's benefit, the practical results will basically be the same.

Effect where improvement or benefit disappeared or the purpose of expenditure incurred failed from the beginning. The second issue concerns situations where no improvement or benefit exists when the goods are returned to their owner. Under most legal systems following an owner-possessor relationship concept, expenses must be reimbursed if they were "necessary" at the time they were incurred, which is usually assessed by applying an objective standard from an ex ante perspective. As a consequence, expenses must also be reimbursed by the owner (i) where the expenditure originally resulted in an improvement but the benefit is extinguished subsequently (such as in Illustration 2 below) and (ii) where the possessor could reasonably expect that the expenditure would lead to the intended (necessary) effect, but in fact the efforts failed and no improvement was achieved. Under the unjustified enrichment principles, the owner (enriched person) will certainly not be regarded as being enriched from the beginning in constellation (ii). In constellation (i), the owner can, provided that he or she is regarded as being enriched "in good faith" (which is the usual case, see Comment B above), raise the defence of disenrichment under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment) because the positive effect on the property has now disappeared.

P, in good faith, buys a sailing boat from a thief. After a while, the upper part of the wooden cabin starts leaking and P undertakes the necessary repair measures in order to prevent further damage occurring to the boat. Before the boat's owner O finds it, the cabin is destroyed by fire.

The owner-possessor relationship approach described above would impose on the owner the risk of investments made by another person being unsuccessful. This, again, may be considered to come into conflict with the owner's right to decide what should happen with the assets. The unjustified enrichment approach, on the other hand, puts the possessor into the position he or she would be in if he or she was the true owner (as was actually believed to be the case, if the possession was in good faith): the owner would have to bear the risk of unsuccessful investments. Based on this, one can argue that a possessor in bad faith should certainly not be in a better position. Also, the unjustified enrichment approach will put the risk of accidental loss (in relation to improvements and expenditure) on the party who has physical control over the item, i.e. the possessor. This party, typically, has better possibilities of preventing the occurrence of damage – an argument which, also in other contexts, is quite frequently used in relation to the distribution of risks. The argument, finally, that necessary expenses should always be reimbursed in order to provide an incentive for the possessor to take reasonable preventive measures for the benefit of the owner, will not work where the possessor assumes himself or herself to be the owner (regardless of whether such assumption is made in good faith or in bad faith). Hence, such a rule does not seem to receive sufficient support. Rather, it appears appropriate to apply general unjustified enrichment principles, containing the policy that a subsequent disenrichment is to be taken into account in favour of an enriched person in good faith, also in the context of this Article, where the enrichment consists of expenditures made on corporeal assets.

(c) Possessor actually knowing that goods are owned by another

Different possible solutions. A further policy issue relates to the question of how to deal with a possessor in bad faith, and in particular with possessors who definitely know that they do not own the asset but nevertheless incur expenditure on it, usually for the purpose of improving their own use. The solutions offered to this problem in a comparative perspective are quite different: Under English law, for instance, no reimbursement or equivalent allowance with respect to the owner's tort claim will be granted. In most civil law countries, on the other hand, "necessary" expenses and also "useful" expenses will be reimbursed, partly subject to certain limitations (such as those deriving from references made to the relevant provisions on unjustified enrichment or benevolent intervention). Subjecting the issue to the unjustified enrichment principles of Book VII, as provided for by the main rule in paragraph (1) sentence 1 of this Article, would mean that VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) comes into play. Under this provision, an enrichment is not "unjustified", which means that no liability under unjustified enrichment law may arise at all, if "the disadvantaged person consented freely and without error to the disadvantage". Under the intended understanding of this rule (cf. VII.–2:101 Comment D), a possessor in bad faith who actually knows that the property does not belong to him or her will fall within the "consented freely and without error" criterion when incurring expenses on that property. Therefore, such a possessor will never be entitled to any reversal under unjustified enrichment principles and the owner, upon the return of the asset, will be entitled to retain this enrichment without paying any compensation. Alternatively, one could contemplate following the approach of most civil law countries. Based on what has been discussed in subsection (b) above, this could be done by making VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) inapplicable – unless the possessor really intended to enrich the owner gratuitously – so that all the other unjustified enrichment provisions may apply also where the possessor actually knows that the goods are not his or her property. In principle, this would be compatible with Book VII insofar as VII.–7:101 (Other private law rules to recover) paragraph (3) allows deviations from the rules of Book VII if regarded as suitable by the other Books of these model rules.

Discussion of the two policy choices. The alternative option of excluding VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) for the purposes of this Article could be supported on the ground that it follows a widespread approach in Europeand by the argument that such a possessor's acts should rather be sanctioned by criminal law, where relevant or trigger liability under the principles of non-contractual liability for damage, where and in so far the owner has sustained a loss. It may be argued that unjustified enrichment law, at least for the present purposes, need not develop any punitive effect. The policy pursued by VII–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b), namely that a disadvantaged person who is in such qualified bad faith incurs expenditures at his or her own risk (cf. Comment D to that provision), will in principle also be pursued by the "saving" cap established by VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (2). Under this approach, the policy would be to protect the owner economically from being forced into an unwanted transaction. But, where and to the extent that the owner actually derives a benefit, this approach would not exempt the owner from an obligation of reversal just because the disadvantaged party acted with a particular degree of bad faith. In other words, the owner would be prevented from earning a windfall, whereas subjective elements on the possessor's (disadvantaged person's) side would be sanctioned by other means. This kind of approach was originally favoured by the working group preparing Book VIII. Given the comparative law background, this would already have been a compromise between those legal systems which grant a possessor who actually knows that he or she is not the owner full compensation for necessary expenses and those legal systems where such a possessor does not receive any compensation at all.

However, since this approach would mean a deviation from general unjustified enrichment law principles provided by Book VII, it was finally decided not to follow that approach but to solve the issue in full coherence with Book VII, including the special rule of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b). One main argument, besides the coherence argument, was that this is an issue of public policy, namely of preventing opportunistic claims by people who have spent money for their own purposes with their eyes wide open (the paradigmatic example used in this relation being a thief who incurs expenditure on the stolen property to make the use of it more comfortable). Also, accepting this choice has been made easier by taking into account that the owner must, in certain circumstances (namely when proceeding against the possessor for a monetary equivalent for the latter's use of the goods), give an allowance for certain expenditure even under the unjustified enrichment principles and under the principles of non-contractual liability for damage, which may be employed alternatively. See the next Comment.

How paragraph (1) works technically when applied to a possessor who actually knew of the lack of entitlement when incurring expenditure. The basic effect of the full reference to Book VII including VII–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) is that a person falling within paragraph (1)(b) has no independent claim for reimbursement of any expenditure incurred while being in possession of the owner's goods. If a thief, or other person actually knowing that the goods are owned by another, incurs expenditure for the primary purpose of serving his or her own benefit, e.g. for the purpose of maintaining the asset in a condition enabling it to be used from then on, or simply to make its possession more comfortable, he or she cannot proceed against the owner under Book VII. The owner, on the other hand, is entitled to vindicate the goods under VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership) paragraph (1) or to recover possession of the goods under Book VII. However, if the owner, besides recovering the goods, additionally seeks to recover a payment for the possessor's use of the goods for the period of the unlawful possession, Book VII provides that the owner will not be able to recover such payment – a notional hire fee under VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment) paragraph (1) – without giving an allowance for the saving obtained from the possessor's expenditure. Technically, this allowance is provided for by the defence of disenrichment in VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment) paragraph (2)(b)(i) because the enriched person (owner) would also have been disenriched even if the enrichment had been reversed (e.g., where the stolen car would also have been serviced or repaired by its owner, or food for a stolen horse would have been bought). If the owner claims under Book VI (instead of proceeding under Book VII), then essentially the same result follows. Under VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (1), the owner would be put into the position he or she would have been in if the possessor had not deprived the owner of the use of the property. For instance, if the stolen goods needed repair this would mean that the owner would have to be compensated for the lack of use of goods which are not running very well, so that compensation could be calculated as a notional cost of hiring such goods which needed to be repaired or serviced at the lessee's (owner's) expense. In short, the thief will have no independent claim but can deduct the expenditure incurred, to the extent it brings a saving to the owner, from the payments due to the latter.

Practically, however, it may still happen that the approach now chosen in paragraph (1) of this Article assimilates to the one originally favoured by the working group (cf. the previous Comment). Given that according to VII–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) Comment D, an error in the sense of the "consented freely and without error" formula of paragraph (1)(b) of that Article also may be a mistake of law, it may be possible for the possessor to argue that the expenditure was incurred in the mistaken belief that at least necessary expenses must be compensated in any event – which is the rule of law today in many European legal systems.

General. Many European legal systems provide the possessor with some right to retain physical control over the goods until the right to be reimbursed for expenditure made on the property is satisfied or such performance is tendered. In most of these countries, this right is limited in its scope by either excluding possessors in bad faith in general or by providing exceptions (only) for certain qualified situations, such as where possession was obtained by intentionally committing an unlawful act. In a number of countries, the "legal nature" and, often related to this question, the effects of this right to retain physical control are unclear or disputed. For the purposes of Chapter 7, adopting such a right appears to be perfectly adequate in principle. Given the uncertainties existing in many legal systems, the aim is to offer a proposal with efficient as well as clear-cut effects.

Scope of right to retain, sentence 2. There is a rather clear tendency in civil law jurisdictions to exclude at least possessors in "qualified" bad faith from a right to retain. This Article follows this tendency by limiting the scope of paragraph (2) to possessors who do not know of the owner's entitlement to obtain or recover possession (sentence 2). While also excluding possessors acting with merely negligent ignorance may be considered to constrain this – generally reasonable – instrument of balancing the parties' interests too much and may give rise to numerous disputes about the applicability of such right, excluding a possessor who is perfectly aware of his or her lack of entitlement appears adequate. Given that the reference to Book VII spelled out in paragraph (1) of this Article also covers VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) by which an independent claim of a person who "consented freely and without error to the disadvantage" is excluded from the outset (and, therefore, cannot be secured by a right of retention under paragraph (2) of the present Article), sentence 2 of this paragraph takes care of cases which are not already absorbed by the named provision. The scope of the two rules does not necessarily converge fully; e.g., sentence 2 of the present Article will also apply where a thief can argue that he or she acted under a mistake of law with regard to the reimbursement of expenses (cf. Comment B, last paragraph, above). Also, the discussion below may be helpful to give a full illustration of the approach originally favoured by the working group with regard to paragraph (1) of this Article. As to substance, excluding a possessor who knows of the owner's entitlement to recover possession from a right to retain the goods may already be supported by reference to the general principle of good faith and fair dealing. The proposed solution does not itself deprive the "knowing" possessor of any right to reimbursement (but see the effect of VII.–2:101 (Circumstances under which an enrichment is unjustified) paragraph (1)(b) as described above). However, it appears more adequate to place on such a possessor the risk of the owner's insolvency (which is, essentially, the substantive subject matter underlying the right to retain) than to expose the owner to the factual risks such retention may imply, especially when being exercised by a person who explicitly showed a readiness to act unlawfully. There may be a risk that such a possessor misuses the right in order to claim unreasonably high reimbursement, or merely pretends to have incurred certain expenditure in order to make use of the asset further on in the dispute, or seeks to alienate the asset to a third party. One should also consider that the effects of a right to retain in the sense of this Article are rather far-reaching. Finally, there is a certain coherency argument relating to the right of set-off (this instrument serves a somewhat comparable function in not only securing, but even discharging mutual obligations), where III.–6:108 (Exclusion of right to set-off) sub-paragraph (c) excludes the right of set-off in relation to a "right arising from an intentional wrongful act". The latter formulation will roughly go in the same direction as the formulation used in this Article. One could put forward a counter-argument against all kinds of restrictions of a right to retain possession, namely that the availability of such right would provide an incentive to incur such expenditures as are absolutely necessary to prevent the goods from sustaining damage – which would finally also be in the interest of the owner. However, this argument is not considered to be strong enough to outweigh the others. A certain pressure not to let the goods deteriorate will already follow from the possessor's liability under the rules on non-contractual liability for damage; cf. VIII.–7:102 (Loss of, or damage to, the goods during possession).

General principle of good faith and fair dealing applies. The availability as well as the modalities of the exercise of the right to retain will furthermore be determined by III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) which is intended to apply also to the right of retention under paragraph (2). This may, for instance, have the effect that no right to retain may be exercised where the possessor's claim is sufficiently secured by other means and withholding the goods would be inappropriate under the circumstances. Also exercising the possessor's right of enforcement will be subject to the general duty of acting in accordance with good faith and fair dealing.

Effect of right of retention. In order to provide an effective means of protecting the possessor's interests, hence also putting pressure on the owner to solve any dispute seriously and efficiently, it is proposed that the right conferred on the possessor be a "right of retention" in the sense of IX.–2:114 (Right of retention of possession). The latter rule provides that "where according to agreement or under other law a person is entitled as against the owner of an asset to retain possession of this asset as security for a right to performance, this right of retention of possession gives rise to a possessory security right." Paragraph (2) sentence 1 of the present Article operates to the effect of providing a statutory basis for a right of retention as required by the cited rule. The main consequences of establishing a proprietary security right are, first, that the right is effective also against third persons which may be important to safeguard efficiency. Since the security right is "possessory", registration is not required in order for it to be effective against third parties; cf. IX.–3:102 (Methods of achieving effectiveness) paragraph (2)(a). Second, the possessor ultimately has a right of enforcement, i.e. should the owner constantly refuse to pay due reimbursement, the possessor may sell the goods and have the claim satisfied by the proceeds of the sale. This is regarded as preferable in order to avoid long-lasting stalemate situations. As already mentioned, when it comes to enforcement, particular regard must be given to acting in accordance with good faith and fair dealing, taking account of the statutory nature of this right of retention and all the circumstances of the case.

General. Many European legal systems explicitly provide for a right of the possessor to remove corporeal parts which the possessor had attached to the property before (or even after) returning the asset to the owner, provided that thereby no damage is done to the item so that it can be returned to its owner in its previous condition. The rule is founded on a Roman law tradition (the so called ius tollendi). In some countries, this right is restricted to certain categories of expenditure ("sumptuary" or "useful" expenses), is unavailable to possessors in bad faith, or is unavailable in so far as the owner can avert the exercise of the possessor's right to remove by compensating the latter for the expenditure. From a policy point of view, there is hardly anything to be said against such a right, provided that the goods sustain no damage. This being the substantive interest of the owner, it should also be immaterial whether the possessor has added these parts in good faith or in bad faith. It is noteworthy that these model rules already provide a similar effect by two general rules. On the one hand, the possessor, as long as ownership of the respective part does not pass to the owner of the "main" item or co-ownership emerges under VIII.–5:203 (Combination), will be entitled to have the added part separated and returned under the general rule of VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership); see also Comment D below. On the other hand, unjustified enrichment rules – which are applicable under this Article, cf. Comment B above – provide that the enriched person (the owner) reverses the enrichment by transferring the asset to the disadvantaged person (the possessor) where the enrichment consists of a transferable asset; see VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) paragraph (1). This provision will often apply where corporeal parts are added to the owner's goods. Compare also paragraph (2) of that Article, under which the enriched person may choose whether to transfer the asset or to pay its monetary value if a transfer would cause the enriched person unreasonable effort or expense.

Extent of such right: limitation to situations where possessor remains owner of the part or applicability beyond. Should the possessor's right to remove parts be confined to what already follows from the named general rules – basically meaning that the possessor can remove what the possessor still owns – or should it go beyond that. In the former case, spelling out a ius tollendi explicitly in the black letter text would mean nothing more than repeating general principles; in the latter case, this would mean establishing a special right to (re-)acquire ownership by separation (or occupation after separation). The whole issue appears to be only little or even not discussed at all in many legal systems. However in Germany, for instance, the latter concept applies. When discussing this issue under the framework of these model rules, one must be aware of the fact that the scope of an "additional" right of removal in the sense of the re-acquisition of ownership would be rather limited in practice. It could vest an additional option in the possessor only where physical separation of the part would be possible, but "economically unreasonable" in the sense of VIII.–5:203 (Combination) – since the possessor would otherwise be protected anyway by being the owner of the parts – and the owner's goods could still be returned to the latter in their previous condition. Therefore, exercising such a right, where possible at all, would rarely be efficient for the possessor. One should also take into account the policy of VII.–5:203 (Combination) which intends to preserve new entities where dividing them would be economically inefficient. In that respect, offering a "broad" ius tollendi would create a problem of coherence, because one would have to explain why such a right to separate the entity should be allowed within the scope of Chapter 7, i.e. where the person is "in possession" of the combined entity, having added a part thereto, but not as a general rule applicable to all situations covered by VIII.–5:203. Such a specific justification can hardly be found. Taking into account the interests of the parties, one may first say that demounting parts under circumstances where this is already qualified as "economically unreasonable" could be quite likely to run against the interests of the owner of the "principal" goods since there may well be a certain risk of these goods sustaining damage. On the other hand, where the owner is also interested in having these additions removed, the owner will be able to reach this result by the operation of VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment), in which case the interests of both parties converge. Second, when taking the perspective of the possessor, VIII.–5:203, in providing a monetary claim secured by a proprietary security right, offers quite efficient protection in many situations. The problem that this claim for compensation would be considerably lower than the possessor's expenditure due to the "saving" cap introduced by the unjustified enrichment principles (see Comment B above) should not arise. This kind of limitation is only provided for "non-transferable" enrichments in the sense of VII.–5:102 (Non-transferable enrichment). Where a ius tollendi is discussed, however, the enrichment will always be a "transferable" one, and VII.–5:101 (Transferable enrichment) does not provide a saving cap. Rather, the monetary value of the enrichment must be transferred (VII.–5:101 paragraph (2)). This obligation, as mentioned above, will be secured by a security right under VIII.–5:203 (Combination) paragraph (2). It is therefore proposed that no right of removal in excess of what is provided by the other general rules of Books VII and VIII is needed. Against this background, there is also a clear decision against providing the owner with a right to avert the possessor's exercise of the (remaining) right to remove his or her property by refunding the value of the expenditure (cf. the overview in Comment D above), because this would force the possessor into an exchange without consent.

Right implicitly accepted, but no need for explicit regulation. Based on the foregoing analysis, it is proposed that there is no need to spell out a ius tollendi explicitly in the black letter text. Where the possessor remains the owner of the added part, it already follows from VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership). It may also follow from another rule of law, such as VIII.–6:301 (Entitlement to recover in case of better possession), provided that the possessor has a better right to the respective part than the owner of the goods that are to be returned. Although the black letter text remains silent about the issue, it is intended that the act of removing the part – which, in many cases, practically presupposes laying one's hands on the owner's property – does not in itself constitute an unlawful infringement of the owner's property right.

P, who possessed a car without entitlement and must return it to its owner O, has fitted new tyres on to the car. Since removing the tyres is not "economically unreasonable" in the sense of VIII.–5:203 (Combination), P remains the owner of the tyres and is allowed, under the principle expressed by VIII.–6:101 (Protection of ownership), to remove the tyres before returning the car to O. Of course, P would have to return the car with the old tyres (or tyres of an equivalent standard and condition) on the wheels.

NOTES

I. Overview

1. With regard to the reimbursement of expenses, many countries distinguish according to, first, the possessor's good or bad faith, and second, whether the expense can be classified as "necessary", "useful" or "sumptuary" (see Notes 2-7). In other countries, no such differentiation is made as a matter of principle (see Notes 8-10).

2. Under BELGIAN law, necessary expenses as well as useful expenses have to be reimbursed to the possessor in good faith. Regarding useful expenses, only the enrichment has to be reimbursed. Maintenance costs are usually covered by the revenues the goods produce and do not have to be reimbursed. Also in GERMANY, the possessor in good faith is entitled to claim reimbursement of all necessary expenses, with the exception of ordinary costs of maintenance incurred during the period in which the benefits were enjoyed. The possessor in good faith can also claim compensation for useful expenses, provided that the increase in value still exists at the moment of restitution. In AUSTRIA, both useful and necessary expenses have to be reimbursed in so far as the possessor in good faith does not obtain the benefits anyway; with regard to useful expenses, the objective increase in value has to be compensated. The same holds true for SPAIN. As far as useful expenses are concerned, the owner has the option to either reimburse the amount of the costs or to pay a sum equivalent to the increase in value. In GREECE, the possessor in good faith has the right to claim reimbursement of necessary and useful expenses as well as expenses made for the discharge of burdens encumbering the goods. The possessor cannot claim an amount higher than the enrichment, or an amount higher than the sum of the incurred expenses. Under HUNGARIAN, SLOVENIAN and SWISS law, the rightful owner has to reimburse all the necessary and useful expenses to the possessor in good faith. However, the fruits and other benefits enjoyed by the possessor during possession have to be deducted from the amount of compensation. In SLOVENIA, luxury expenses only have to be reimbursed if they have contributed to the total value of the goods. Also in LITHUANIA, all expenses incurred in relation to the thing, which have not been covered by the income received from it, have to be reimbursed. In the NETHERLANDS, the possessor in good faith is entitled to claim reimbursement of all expenses; however, the judge may reduce the amount of compensation when full compensation would result in an unreasonable benefit for the possessor. The expenses have to be reimbursed in so far as they have not already been covered by the benefits enjoyed during possession.

3. Under ITALIAN, PORTUGUESE and CZECH law, the necessary expenses have to be reimbursed to the possessor in good faith according to the rules on unjustified enrichment. In ITALY, the possessor in good faith is also entitled to the reimbursement of extraordinary expenses and for improvements; the amount of compensation is equal to the increase in value of the goods. In PORTUGAL, useful expenses have to be reimbursed, if the removal of the relevant parts is impossible. In ESTONIA, the possessor in good faith is entitled to claim reimbursement of necessary expenses, unless possession was obtained by way of an arbitrary act. Other expenses (useful and luxury) may be reimbursed if the requirements of unjustified enrichment are met.

4. Under SPANISH, LITHUANIAN and CZECH law, the possessor in bad faith is only entitled to claim reimbursement of necessary expenses. The same rule applies in SWITZERLAND, provided that the rightful owner would have incurred these expenses too.

5. In SLOVENIA, the possessor in bad faith has a right to claim reimbursement of necessary expenses as well as the useful costs, provided that these costs also benefit the owner. Under BELGIAN law, the necessary expenses as well as the useful expenses have to be reimbursed to the possessor in bad faith. Regarding useful expenses, only the enrichment has to be reimbursed. In ESTONIA, necessary expenses are reimbursed to the possessor in bad faith, unless the possessor obtained possession as a result of an arbitrary act; whereas the reimbursement of useful and luxury costs is subject to the provisions on unjustified enrichment.

6. Under DUTCH and HUNGARIAN law, the possessor in bad faith may, as a general rule, claim reimbursement of expenses incurred on the goods according to the rules on unjustified enrichment. Also in ITALY, necessary and extraordinary expenses have to be reimbursed to the possessor in bad faith according to the rules on unjustified enrichment. With regard to improvements, the possessor in bad faith has a right to reimbursement equalling either the increase in value of the goods or the expenses incurred, whichever sum is lower. In PORTUGAL, the necessary expenses have to be reimbursed to the possessor in bad faith according to the rules on unjustified enrichment; useful expenses have to be reimbursed, if their withdrawal is impossible.

7. In GERMANY, AUSTRIA and GREECE, the possessor in bad faith is entitled to reimbursement of expenses under the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs.

8. The rules on expenses in FINLAND are scattered across fragmentary acts of legislation and most of the rules are suggestions made in legal literature. This means that there is no specific regulation of the issue of expenses incurred on goods during possession (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 76).

9. There are no rules on this matter in NORWAY and SWEDEN, and it is therefore unclear whether a possessor may be reimbursed for expenses incurred on the goods during possession. A claim might, however, be successful on the basis of the rules on unjustified enrichment (for NORWAY, see Rt 1956, 1242 and Hagstrom/Aarbakke, Obligasjonsrett, 436; for SWEDEN, compare section I of the Notes on VIII.–7:103).

10. In ENGLAND and WALES, as well as in IRELAND, the issue of improvements of and expenses incurred on the goods by the possessor is primarily dealt with in a tort law context. See sections III and IV of these Notes.

II. Expenses

11. The 'costs' to which the DUTCH CC arts. 3:120-121 refer are costs that have really been incurred at the expense of the possessor (HR 7 oktober 1994, NJ 1995, 62). Under the regimen of the old civil code, a distinction was made between impensae necessariae, utiles et voluptuosae, i.e. costs necessary for the preservation of the goods, useful costs and embellishment costs: this distinction was not been repeated in the new civil code of 1992. In principle, the reimbursement of all costs can be claimed, even if they did not enrich the owner, but in the case of costs which did not lead to a direct increase in the value of the thing the court may reduce the reimbursement (Schoordijk, Vermogensrecht in het algemeen naar Boek 3 van het nieuwe B.W., 390; Parl.Gesch. Boek 3, 450).

12. Under BELGIAN law, necessary expenses are those that are necessary for the preservation of the goods (e.g. insurance premiums, repair costs, taxes); useful expenses are those, which have resulted in an increase in the value of the goods. Luxury expenses are those that are made from mere personal choice and only have a subjective utility (De Page/Dekkers, Traité VI, no. 149). Legal scholars usually add another category of costs: maintenance costs (Hansenne, Les biens, no. 675; De Page/Dekkers, Traité VI, no. 152).

13. NORWAY distinguishes between necessary maintenance costs and other expenses. Necessary maintenance costs are those expenses, the incurring of which is necessary in order for the possessor to be able to use the movable as intended (Faber/Lurger [-Færstad], National Reports V: Denmark/Norway, 82).

14. FINLAND recognises three types of expenses; necessary, useful and luxury expenses incurred on the movable. Necessary are those expenses, which are needed to maintain the property – expenses that a responsibly acting person would not have neglected to incur – whereas useful expenses are those which increase the value of the property. To be considered a useful expense, the improvement has to be "significant". Luxury expenses are costs incurred from mere personal choice , only benefiting the individual incurring them (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 76 ff).

15. SWISS law differentiates between three kinds of expenses: (1) necessary expenses are those which have to be incurred for the purposes of the preservation of the object's value and utility, as well as for its proper exploitation (CC art. 647*c*; e.g. repair of a car's brakes, provision of food for an animal); (2) useful expenses are those which, without being necessary, increase the value of the object or improve its performance and utility (CC art. 647*d*; e.g. restoration of a painting); (3) luxury expenses are merely aimed at embellishing the object or at making its use more comfortable (CC art. 647*e*; e.g. coating a couch with new fabric, while the old one is still in a good condition). Generally, expenses are costs incurred on goods in order to maintain, repair, modify or embellish them, costs incurred in paying charges relating to them (payment of taxes, mortgage interest), or costs incurred to protect them (payment of insurance fees). However, the expenses could also be made in natura or take the form of work done on the goods (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], nos. 509-510).

16. PORTUGUESE law recognises three different categories of expenses: necessary, useful and sumptuary (CC art. 216). The first category includes expenses that are necessary to prevent the loss, destruction or deterioration of the thing, the second category is made up of expenses that do not qualify as necessary but increase the value of the thing, and sumptuary expenses are those not qualifying as necessary or useful, having been incurred by the possessor from mere personal choice.

17. AUSTRIAN CC §§ 331, 332 differentiate between three types of expenses: Necessary expenses (notwendige Aufwendungen) are indispensable for the preservation of the property. Useful expenses (nützliche Aufwendungen) are not necessary, but result in a durable improvement of the profitability. Luxury expenses (Luxusaufwendungen, Verschönerungsaufwand) do not result in any objective increase in value.

18. ESTONIAN GPCCA § 63 also defines three types of expenses. The expenses are (a) necessary, if the object is thereby preserved or protected from complete or partial destruction; (b) useful, if the object is thereby significantly improved; (c) sumptuary, if the main objective thereof is to improve the the comfort, amenity or beauty of the object.

19. Under SLOVENIAN law, one can distinguish between necessary costs for the maintenance of goods, beneficial costs increasing the value of the movable and costs incurred for the pleasure of the possessor or for the purpose of decorating the goods (Code of Property Law arts. 95-96).

20. The GREEK CC distinguishes between the following categories of expenses: (1) necessary expenses, which are expenses incurred in order to maintain the goods in a condition adequate for their proper use (CC art. 1101; e.g. the provision of food for animals, repairs done to a house, painting a boat); (2) expenses incurred for the settlement of charges encumbering the thing (CC art. 1101); (3) useful expenses, which are expenses, as a result of which the value of the thing was increased (CC art. 1103); (4) sumptuary expenses, which are expenses made for special aesthetical reasons (Spyridakis, Property Law 3, 177).

21. GERMAN law distinguishes between necessary expenses (notwendige Verwendungen) and other expenses increasing the value of the goods (sonstige wertsteigernde (nützliche) Verwendungen). Necessary expenses are measures needed to maintain the object or repair it, or measures required for an adequate utilisation of the goods (e.g. necessary repairs, periodically incurred maintenance costs such as expenditure for animal food, car service). It is a matter of dispute whether work performed by the possessor personally should be considered as an expense. Case law considers valuable manpower as a cost, which may be reimbursed by the owner (BGH 24 November 1995, NJW 1996, 921; BGH 24 June 2002, NJW 2002, 2875), whereas a more restrictive approach is followed in legal writing by accepting manpower as an expense only in a limited number of situations subject to the fulfilment of some additional requirements (Soergel [-Stadler], BGB[13], § 994, no. 2: provided that the possessor would have incurred the expense also in any other way; see Schwab/Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 551 for more references). Useful expenses are those, which result in an objective increase in value (Schwab/Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 554). It is a matter of dispute whether measures changing the original state of the object exclusively have to be considered as expenses in the sense of CC §§ 994 and 996. The Supreme Court had to deal with this question in a case where a building was constructed on an undeveloped piece of land. The court decided that such costs are not covered by the notion of "expenses" and rejected the claim based on unjustified enrichment (BGH 26 February 1964, NJW 1964, 1125; confirmed by BGH 29 September 1995, NJW 1996, 52). It has been argued in legal writing that this decision implies a far-reaching protection of the owner's interests to the disadvantage of the possessor in good faith. The notion "expenses" is interpreted in a broad way and includes all expenditures which benefit the goods and increase their value (Schwab/Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 555; Bamberger/Roth [-Fritzsche], BGB[2] II, § 994, no. 21).

22. ITALIAN law distinguishes between expenses incurred for the production and yielding of fruits (CC art. 1149), the costs of ordinary acts of maintenance (CC art. 1150(4)) as well as extraordinary expenses (CC art. 1150(1)), and improvement costs (CC art. 1150(2)).

23. SPANISH law knows the concept of 'expenses' as opposed to 'improvements'. Expenses are the costs incurred on a thing; improvements refer to the actual increase in the value or utility of a thing. There may be expenses which do not result in improvements; similarly, there may be improvements which are not the consequence of the incurring of any expenses (e.g. improvements having arisen naturally). The legal regulation governing both of them is, however, the same in many respects. Necessary expenses are those which are indispensable for the preservation of the thing, so that neglecting to incur them would result in the destruction or deterioration of the thing. They also include expenses needed to maintain the productivity of the goods (STS 28 February 1968, RJ. 1391; STS 4 April 1968, RJ. 2034; STS 4 March 1960, RJ. 947), as well as the payment of taxes and public contributions (STS 27 January 1975, RJ. 263; STS 10 April 1956, RJ. 1927). Useful expenses or improvements are those which, not being necessary, contribute to an increase in the profits or the value of the thing. Luxury expenses or improvements are those which serve to adorn or embellish the thing, or to provide more comfort or a better use (Faber/Lurger [-González Pacanowska/Díez Soto], National Reports V: Spain, 94).

24. Under SCOTTISH law, expenses are only subject to reimbursement if they are not, so to say, of a "fanciful sort", or are only "suited … to the particular taste and humour of the late possessor" (Hume, as cited in Reid, The Law of Property Law in Scotland, 141). There must be a value added to the movable and the expenses recoverable are those classified as necessary and profitable. Necessary are those expenses that typically enrich the owner in the form of a saving and are described by Rankine as "outlay necessary for the upkeep of the subject" (Rankine, The Law of Land-ownership in Scotland[4], 88, n 64). "Useful" or "profitable" are those expenses that are not necessary, like those incurred when upgrading or repairing a thing which is in a state of neglect (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 183), provided there is a value added to the movable.

25. Under CZECH law, there is no legal basis for compensation claims beyond necessary expenses. Only necessary expenses have to be reimbursed based on the rules of unjustified enrichment (CC section 458(3)). Necessary expenses are useful costs of maintenance incurred when possessing the thing. Regarding reimbursement for improvements, there is only one court decision: the court ruled that the amount of compensation payable is equal to the difference between the value of the thing before and after the improvement was made (Faber/Lurger [-Tichý], National Reports VI: Czech Republic, 72).

26. Under SWEDISH law, there are no generally applicable categories of expenses. In some statutes, however, such categories are used. The term "reasonable" (försvarliga) costs appears in Sale of Goods Act (Köplagen) and the term "necessary" in chap. 11 § 3 and chap. 12 § 8 Handelsbalken. The Bankruptcy Act uses the terms "necessary or useful" (nödvändig eller nyttig) (Konkurslagen chap. 4, § 15).

27. CYPRUS law does not appear to provide any categories of expenses.

III. Reimbursement in the case of possession in good faith

28. In BELGIUM, only the necessary and useful expenses must be reimbursed, regardless of whether the possessor is in good or bad faith, while luxury expenses do not have to be reimbursed. Regarding necessary expenses, it is argued that the owner would also have incurred these costs if the owner had remained in possession of the goods. Even if the benefit of these expenses had disappeared due to force majeur, the costs have to be reimbursed. With regard to useful expenses, the owner would perhaps not have incurred these expenses, but gets back a movable which is now more valuable. Hence, according to the principles of unjustified enrichment, the owner has to reverse the enrichment (the additional value). The additional value is not assessed at the moment when the costs have been incurred, but at the date when the owner reclaims the goods (De Page/Dekkers, Traité VI, no. 150). Maintenance costs are usually covered by the revenues that the goods produce, and since the possessor in good faith is entitled to keep the fruits yielded up to the moment of the introduction of the action of revindication (see note 32 to VIII.–7:103), it is considered logical to burden such a possessor with the maintenance costs (Hansenne, Les biens, no. 675; De Page/Dekkers, Traité VI, no. 152). With regard to restitution after the retroactive termination of a translative agreement, the restitution debtor may not claim any reimbursement for an increase in value of the object that has resulted solely from economic developments (Starosselets T.B.B.R. 2003, 67, no. 24). The debtor can, however, claim reimbursement for the improvements that were effected by the debtor's activity, regardless of good or bad faith. (De Page, II, no. 828; Starosselets, T.B.B.R. 2003, 67, no. 24; contra: Hansenne, no. 721).

29. If the property is held in good faith in FINLAND, the possessor has the right to be reimbursed for improvements that are considered necessary or useful. The owner does not have the obligation to reimburse luxury expenses incurred on the movable. The rules on how to calculate the reimbursement sum payable are somewhat unclear and are particularly open for discussion when useful expenses are concerned. The possessor can nevertheless only claim the difference between the expenses incurred and the benefits acquired during possession (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 76 ff).

30. In GERMANY, the possessor in good faith is entitled to claim reimbursement of all necessary expenses, with the exception of ordinary costs of maintenance incurred during the period in which the benefits were enjoyed (CC § 994(1)). It is not required that the expense also actually benefits the rightful owner; e.g. if the possessor brought an injured racehorse to a veterinary surgeon to be cured, this was a necessary cost, although the horse is still paralysed. Also, if the result of the incurring of the necessary expenses disappears after a while, reimbursement is nevertheless due; e.g. if the roof of a house has been repaired and the house burns down subsequently, the repair costs have nevertheless to be reimbursed (Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 V 4 a). If the possessor is entitled to keep the benefits, reimbursement of the ordinary costs of maintenance cannot be claimed. It is not possible for the possessor to prove that the sum of the expenses incurred is higher than the benefits enjoyed, or that the benefits were not enjoyed at all; for instance, the possessor who never drove the car possessed cannot claim reimbursement of the road tax that he or she paid (Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 V 4 a aa). The possessor in good faith may also claim reimbursement of expenses, which have increased the value of the goods (useful expenses), provided that the increase in value still exists at the moment when the property is restored to its owner (CC § 996). Expenses incurred on whim, which do not increase the value of the object, do not have to be reimbursed (Schwab/Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 554). Regarding expenses incurred after the initiation of the legal proceedings, CC § 994(2) provides that the possessor in good faith only has a claim for reimbursement according to the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag; CC §§ 683-684). Hence, the real or presumed intention of the rightful owner is decisive. However, the intention of incurring expenses is often accepted regarding necessary expenses, as it is seen as generally being in the interest of the owner (Schwab/Prütting, Sachenrecht[30], no. 553). If the requirements set forth in CC § 683 are not fulfilled, the possessor can, according to CC § 684, claim compensation on the basis of the provisions on unjustified enrichment (Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 V 5; Soergel [-Stadler], BGB[13], § 994, no. 9). Gursky, on the other hand, takes the view that the rules on unjustified enrichment do not apply in this case. CC § 994(2) only refers to benevolent intervention in another's affairs, not to unjustified enrichment (Staudinger [-Gursky], § 994, no. 26). With regard to useful expenses, the possessor who already received the service of process is not entitled to claim compensation. The owner's enrichment is considered to be justified. The legislator explicitly stated that the application of the unjustified enrichment rules is to be excluded (Wieling, Sachenrecht I[2], § 12 V 6).

31. Under AUSTRIAN law, a possessor in good faith is entitled to reimbursement of necessary and useful expenses (CC § 331; see note 21 to VIII.–7:102 for a definition of the good faith possessor). There are two limitations: First, the possessor is not entitled to more than was expended. Second, the possessor may only claim reimbursement in so far as the improvement still exists. The underlying principle is that the risk of subsequent loss of the improvement is placed on the possessor who, in good faith, believes he or she is the owner and therefore faces the same risks as an owner (Iro, Sachenrecht[3], no. 7/8; OGH 9 July 1997, SZ 70/136 (immovable property)). As far as useful expenses are concerned, the prevailing opinion states that the objective increase in value is decisive, not the owner's subjective preferences (OGH 9 July 1997, SZ 70/136; Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 331, nos. 1 f; Rummel [-Spielbüchler], ABGB I[3], § 331, no. 1; contrary Koziol/Welser, Grundriss I[13], 347). It is also assumed that the possessor is entitled to reimbursement of the expenses only in so far as these have not already been covered by the fruits the property produced and other benefits derived from it (Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 331, no. 1; Rummel [-Spielbüchler], ABGB I[3], § 331, no. 1). Consequently, expenses which do not lead to an objective increase in value (luxury expenses) are not to be reimbursed.

32. Under SPANISH law, the possessor in good faith can claim reimbursement of the necessary expenses (CC art. 453(1)). The rightful owner cannot choose to pay the increase in value instead of the amount of expenses incurred (STS 14 April 1998, RJ. 2145). Useful expenses also have to be reimbursed to the possessor in good faith. In relation to these expenses, the rightful owner has an option to either reimburse the costs or to pay the possessor a sum equivalent to the increase in value of the goods (CC art. 453(2)). Reimbursement does not have to be made for improvements which did not result from expenses incurred by the possessor (CC art. 456), or for improvements which have ceased to exist at the time the rightful owner takes the goods back (CC art. 458). Mere luxury expenses need not be refunded (Faber/Lurger [-González Pacanowska/Díez Soto], National Reports V: Spain, 95).

33. Under GREEK law, the possessor in good faith has the right to claim reimbursement of expenses incurred before the bringing of the legal action (CC art. 1101). This applies to necessary expenses, expenses made for the settlement of charges encumbering the asset and useful expenses. Sumptuary expenses are not reimbursed (Faber/Lurger [-Klaoudatou], National Reports III: Greece, 151). According to the prevailing opinion, the amount of reimbursement is calculated according to the following criteria: the possessor cannot claim a higher amount than the enrichment, or a higher amount than the sum of the expenses incurred (Filios, Property Law, 259; contra: Georgiadis, Property Law I, 609). From Georgiadis' point of view, there are two ways to proceed with the calculation: an abstract calculation and a calculation in connection to the function and position of the goods in the owner's estate. Regarding expenses incurred after the initiation of the legal proceedings, the CC art. 1102 provides that a possessor in good faith only has a claim for reimbursement according to the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (Georgiadis, Property Law I, 612-613; Spyridakis, Property Law 3, 177γα ff). The reimbursement is limited to the necessary expenses and the expenses incurred for the settlement of charges encumbering the thing (CC art. 1102).

34. Under HUNGARIAN law, the possessor in good faith may claim the reimbursement of necessary expenses, as well as useful expenses that have not been covered by the benefits the possessor received. Reimbursement has to be paid, even if the costs incurred do not appear to have enriched the rightful owner (Faber/Lurger [-Szilagyi], National Reports III: Hungary, 95).

35. Under SLOVENIAN law, the good faith possessor is entitled to a reimbursement of all costs that have been necessary for the maintenance of the movable (Code of Property Law art. 95/III) and can also claim the reimbursement of all useful costs that have contributed to an increase in the value of the movable (Code of Property Law art. 95/IV). These claims for reimbursement are set off against the benefits that the possessor has obtained from the movable (Code of Property Law art. 95/V). Costs incurred by the good faith possessor on whim or for the purposes of the embellishment of the movable are only reimbursed if they have increased the overall value of the goods (Code of Property Law art. 95/VI).

36. According to the SWISS CC art. 939(1), the possessor in good faith is entitled to claim reimbursement of all necessary and useful expenses. However, fruits and other benefits derived by the possessor during possession have to be deducted from the reimbursement sum (CC art. 939(3); Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], nos. 511-511a; Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], art. 939, no. 6). The actual expenses incurred on the goods have to be reimbursed, not the increase in value of the goods at the moment of restitution. The reimbursement should also cover the interest payable on the sum of the expenditure as from the moment it was incurred (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], nos. 511b; Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], art. 939, nos. 4-5).

37. In LITHUANIA, where the thing is revindicated according to the rules of property law, the possessor in good faith has the right to claim compensation for all expenses incurred in relation to the thing which have not been covered by the income received from the thing. If the parts added as improvements cannot be separated, or when the thing was improved in a different way, the possessor in good faith has the right to claim reimbursement of expenses resulting from such an improvement, though this cannot exceed the increase in value of the thing (CC art. 4.97). Equally, in the event of the restitution of the goods according to the rules of the law of obligations, the expenses for the care and custody of the goods incurred by the person who is bound to return the property are to be reimbursed in accordance with the provision of the CC art. 4.97 regarding the revindication of a thing (CC art. 6.150).

38. The DUTCH CC art. 3:120(2), first sentence, provides as a general principle that the good faith possessor should be compensated for all expenses incurred on the goods (see note 31 to VIII.–7:103 as to the definition of a good faith possessor). The goods may have been repaired, improved or maintained. It is also possible that the possessor had to pay compensation for damage caused to a third person or incurred costs in bringing an action to recover the goods. It is not important whether or not the rightful owner is enriched or benefits from such costs (Pitlo, Goederenrecht[12], no. 395). However, the judge may reduce the amount of reimbursement when full reimbursement would result in an unreasonable benefit to the possessor; for instance, where the costs of repairing the damage suffered by the possessor could be covered by insurance (Pitlo, Goederenrecht[12], no. 395). The unreasonable benefit has to be proved by the rightful owner and must be evaluated in the context of the relationship between possessor and owner. (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Rank-Berenschot], B.W.[3], art. 3:120, no. 3). Furthermore, CC art. 3:120 (2) states that costs and other damage have to be reimbursed in so far as the possessor has not been reimbursed yet by the fruits and other benefits that derived from the possession. The owner can be freed from the obligation to reimburse by transferring the property to the possessor, who is obliged to cooperate (recht van abandon; CC art. 3:122).

39. In SWEDEN, a possessor who has to return a movable to a bankruptcy estate has a right of reimbursement provided that there are no particular reasons against granting the possessor such a right (chap. 4 § 15 Konkurslagen). In principle, this rule applies equally to possessors in good faith and possessors in bad faith. As to the latter, see further section IV of these Notes. Outside the scope of application of the Bankruptcy Act, there are some rules giving the possessor a right to retain as long as the possessor has a right of reimbursement. There is no requirement of good faith in the Sale of Goods Act: If the possessor has owed a duty to take care of the movable and has had to incur expenses by virtue of this duty, he or she also has a right to retain the movable until the expenses have been reimbursed (Köplagen § 75; see Karnov [-Herre] 2006/07, 568 note 307-308). But, if there are costs of storage, necessary expenses incurred on the movable during storage or useful expenses incurred with the consent of the person handing over the movable for storage, the possessor has to believe in good faith that the person handing over the movable has a right to do so (Handelsbalken chap. 12 § 8; Karnov [-Herre] 2006/07, 499 note 20). If a movable has been handed over to be repaired, the possessor has a right of retention, if the repairer believed in good faith that the person handing over the movable was the owner of it (Håstad, Sakrätt avseende lös egendom[6], 72; NJA 1936 s. 650 and NJA 1948 s 10). However, in relation to necessary costs there is no good faith requirement (Håstad, Sakrätt avseende lös egendom[6], 72 f and NJA 1987 s. 312).

40. In SCOTLAND, a right to reimbursement of expenses presupposes that the possessor has expected to benefit from the improvements, either permanently or at least for a substantial period of time and has been disappointed in that expectation. This excludes possession with so short a term to run that donation to the owner must necessarily have been presumed (Reid, The Law of Property in Scotland, 141). Reimbursement will be awarded to the extent of the owner's enrichment by the time the owner resumes possession, or when good faith ceases, whichever occurs earlier, but is limited to the loss suffered by the possessor (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[10], § 538). The enrichment is assessed objectively. The recoverable expenses are those classified as necessary and useful, or profitable (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 183 f).

41. In ITALY, expenses incurred in the production and yielding of fruits (CC art. 1149) and costs of ordinary maintenance (CC art. 1150(4)) have to be reimbursed to the possessor, who is obliged to restitute the fruits (i.e. the possessor in good faith from the date of the vindicatio; see note 38 to VIII.–7:102) not exceeding the value of the fruits which are owed to the owner. The reimbursement is based on the principles of unjustified enrichment. The possessor is also entitled to the reimbursement of extraordinary expenses (CC art. 1150(1)), because the incurring of these expenses benefits the owner. Regarding improvements, the possessor in good faith has a right to a reimbursement equal to the increase in value of the goods (CC art. 1150(2)).

42. In ENGLAND and WALES, when the possessor acted in the mistaken but honest belief that he or she had good title to the movable then an allowance should be attributable to the possessor when damages are being assessed (TIGA 1977 Act s.6(1)). This allowance is available also to the good faith possessor who did not improve the movable him- or herself. The rationale for the granting of such an allowance is that the possessor paid a price that reflects the value of the improvements made to the movable by the former possessor (TIGA 1977 Act s.6(2) and Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 10).

43. In IRELAND, if the possessor has acted in the mistaken but honest belief that he or she had a right to the goods, an allowance will be made for the amount of the expenditure incurred for the purpose of making the improvement. The assessment will be made at the time of the conversion rather than at the time of the judgment (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 84 f and Greenwood v Bennet (1973) QB 195). Even the buyer of a stolen movable who improves it or spends money on its preservation may have some remedies (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 101). If the movable is somewhat unique and not an ordinary article of commerce replaceable in the market, the court will order specific redelivery and consequential damages. In these cases, it is suggested that the court will order the reimbursement of the improver to the extent of the costs incurred on the improvement (Greenwood v Bennett (1973) 1 QB 195). Another case suggests that where the court orders the return of a movable, the possessor is entitled to a fair and just allowance for the improvement of the movable while it was possessed (Webb v Ireland (1988) IR 353). Such allowance should not be ordered, according to two legal scholars, if the result were that the owner had to sell the movable in order to pay the allowance (Palmer and Hudson, Improving stolen chattels in Palmer & McKendrick, Interests in Goods, chap. 36). Where the movable is not unique, the court will order damages and may then order a credit for the improvements the buyer made (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 101 f).

44. In PORTUGAL, the possessor in good faith as well as the possessor in bad faith has the right to receive reimbursement of necessary expenses. Regarding useful expenses, both the good and the bad faith possessor have the right to remove their improvements, provided that they can be removed without causing damage to the movable thing (CC art. 1273). If removal is impossible, the useful expenses have to be reimbursed to the possessor (Faber/Lurger [-Caramelo-Gomes], National Reports IV: Portugal, 97). The amount of reimbursement is calculated according to the rules on unjustified enrichment provided by CC art. 479. Sumptuary expenses are not subject to compensation. Only the possessor in good faith is entitled to undo the effects of incurred expenses, in so far as this is possible without causing damage to the movable (CC art. 1275).

45. In the CZECH REPUBLIC, the possessor has a right to claim compensation for necessary expenses, based on the rules on unjustified enrichment (CC § 458(3)). Good faith is not a requirement (Faber/Lurger [-Tichý], National Reports VI: Czech Republic, 73).

46. In ESTONIA, the right of the possessor, who has to restore the thing to its rightful owner on the basis of PropLA § 80 (claim of the owner against anyone possessing a thing belonging to him without a legal ground), to receive reimbursement of expenses incurred is regulated in PropLA § 88. According to the first paragraph, the possessor is entitled to claim reimbursement of the necessary expenses incurred on the thing, unless possession was obtained by way of an arbitrary act. Other expenses (useful and sumptuary) may be reimbursed if the requirements set forth by LObligA § 1042

(unjustified enrichment) are met. According to this provision, the possessor may demand reimbursement of the costs to the extent to which the owner has been enriched, taking into consideration, inter alia, the question of whether such costs are useful for the owner and in accordance with the owner's intentions with regard to the thing in question. In cases where the goods have to be restored because the contract is void or avoided, the transferee (possessor) is entitled to claim reimbursement of incurred costs, unless he or she knew or should have known, at the time of transfer, about the circumstances constituting a basis for restitution pursuant to the provisions on unjustified enrichment, or where the costs were incurred after he or she became aware, or should have become aware, of such circumstances (Faber/Lurger [-Kullerkupp], National Reports I: Estonia, 109).

47. In CYPRUS, there appears to be no general rule on the matter but the question is dealt with within the scope of the issue of void contracts. Where a contract is declared void, the person who has improved the property during possession has a right to compensation for the improvements made. In one case, where the agreement was void due to the transfer of immovable property by an infant, it was held that it would be contrary to "natural justice" not to order the payment of reimbursement for the improvements (see Anthoulla Papadopoulou v Xenophon Polykarpou, Civil Appeal No. 4686. vol 1 (1973) 352 CLR and Faber/Lurger [-Laulhé Shaelou/Stylianou/Anastasiou], National Reports II: Cyprus, 36). It seems that restitution remedies, such as reimbursement for improvements, are only available where the original contract is terminated or contracts become ineffective due to mistake, impossibility, lack of writing or lack of capacity (see Kier (Cyprus) Ltd v. Trenco Constructions Ltd, Civil Appeal No. 5770. vol. 1 (1981) 30 CLR and Faber/Lurger [-Laulhé Shaelou/Stylianou/Anastasiou], National Reports II: Cyprus, 37). Good or bad faith does not seem to play any important role in deciding the outcome.

IV. Reimbursement in case of possession in bad faith

48. In SPAIN, the bad faith possessor is entitled to the reimbursement of the necessary expenses incurred on the goods for the purpose of their preservation, but cannot claim reimbursement of useful and luxury expenses (CC art. 455).

49. The FINNISH compensation rules distinguish between constellations where property is held in good or bad faith. A bad faith possessor only has a right to be reimbursed expenses that are considered necessary, but not useful or luxury expenses (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 76 f).

50. In LITHUANIA, the possessor in bad faith is only entitled to the reimbursement of the necessary expenses related to the thing (CC art. 4.97). Where restitution of the movable is based on the rules of the law of obligations, the expenses for care and custody of the goods incurred by the person who is bound to return the property are also reimbursed in accordance with the abovementioned provisions of CC art. 4.97 (CC art. 6.150).

51. According to the leading case in SCOTLAND, there is a distinction between a direct claim and a counter-claim (Barbour v Halliday (1840) 2 D 1279). The court rejected the bad faith improver's claim, but left open the possibility for a counterclaim for the reimbursement of the cost of the materials and other expenses in an action brought by the owner to recover possession. Such a counterclaim was allowed in another case (Paterson v Greig (1862) 24 D 1370). Moreover, a direct claim for the reimbursement of necessary expenses will probably succeed (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 183 f).

52. According to the CZECH CC § 458 (3), the possessor in bad faith is also entitled to claim reimbursement of the necessary expenses incurred on the goods, since good faith is not a requirement.

53. In SWITZERLAND, the possessor in bad faith can only claim the reimbursement of the necessary expenses, provided that the rightful owner would have made these expenses too (CC art. 940 (2)).

54. In ENGLAND and WALES, an improver who has not acted in good faith may still benefit from an allowance by the application of common law (Clerk and Lindsell, Torts[19], § 17-97 and Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 10). See further section III above.

55. As BELGIAN law does not distinguish between possessors in good and bad faith as regards the reimbursement of expenses incurred on the goods by their possessor, the same regulations apply to possessors in bad faith and possessors in good faith (see note 28, above).

56. Under SLOVENIAN law, the bad faith possessor has a right to claim reimbursement of necessary expenses that would also have burdened the rightful owner if the owner had had possession (Code of Property Law art. 96/IV). The possessor is also entitled to compensation for useful costs, provided that these costs also benefit the owner (Code of Property Law art. 96/V). A bad faith possessor is not entitled to claim reimbursement of expenses that have been incurred on whim or for the purpose of embellishing the movable. However, the possessor is allowed to remove such items, if this does not damage the movable in question (Code of Property Law art. 96/VI).

57. In ESTONIA, with regard to the bad faith possessor's entitlement to reimbursement of such expenses, the same regulation applies as for the possessor in good faith. Necessary expenses are reimbursed, unless the possessor obtained possession as a result of an arbitrary act (PropLA § 88(1)); whereas the reimbursement of useful and luxury costs is subject to the provisions on unjustified enrichment (see note 46, above). For cases of void or avoided contracts, see also note 46.

58. Under DUTCH law, a possessor who is not in good faith may claim reimbursement of expenses incurred on the movable itself or on the collection of its fruits according to the rules on unjustified enrichment (CC art. 3:121(2)). Hence, the bad faith possessor's entitlement to reimbursement of expenses is more restricted. The reimbursement sum is determined by three factors: (a) the owner's enrichment, (b) the possessor's disenrichment and (c) reasonableness. The owner's enrichment allows the taking into account of a possible decrease in value. With the standard of reasonableness it is possible to assess the level of bad faith, the utility of the expenses to the owner, the inconvenience for the owner due to lacking the goods in question, etc. Furthermore, the possessor who is not in good faith is not entitled to claim reimbursement of damages he or she had to pay to a third person under non-contractual liability law (Pitlo, Goederenrecht[12], no. 398). Also in these situations, the owner has the option, according to CC art. 3:122, to transfer the goods to the possessor instead of making a reimbursement (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Rank-Berenschot], B.W.[3], art. 3:121, no. 3).

59. Under HUNGARIAN law, the possessor in bad faith may claim reimbursement of expenses according to the rules on unjustified enrichment (Faber/Lurger [-Szilagyi], National Reports III: Hungary, 96).

60. In PORTUGAL, the same rules apply to possessors in good faith as to possessors in bad faith (see supra note 44). A possessor in bad faith, however, is not entitled to withdraw sumptuary expenses.

61. In ITALY, as mentioned above (see note 41), the owner has to reimburse expenses incurred in the production and yielding of the fruits (CC art. 1149), as well as ordinary maintenance costs (CC art. 1150(4)), to the possessor who is obliged to restitute the fruits, though not exceeding the value of the fruits which are owed to the owner. The possessor is also entitled to the reimbursement of extraordinary expenses (CC art. 1150(1)), regardless of good or bad faith, since the incurring of these costs benefits the owner and the reimbursement is based on the principles of unjustified enrichement. With regard to improvements, the possessor in bad faith has a right to a reimbursement equal to either the increase in value of the goods or the expenses incurred, whichever sum is lower (CC art. 1150(2)).

62. Under SWEDISH law, when the movable has to be returned to a bankruptcy estate and the possessor has incurred necessary or useful expenses on the movable, the possessor has a right to reimbursement if there are no particular reasons against giving him or her that right (Konkurslagen chap. 4 § 15). Reasons against giving the possessor this right may be that a bad faith possessor has incurred expenses that are too burdensome for the estate. These expenses will not be reimbursed (Karnov [-Lennander] 2006/07, 3446 no. 160. See also NJA 1932 s. 534).

63. The AUSTRIAN CC § 336 states that a possessor in bad faith is entitled to reimbursement of expenses under the rules of negotiorum gestio (benevolent intervention in another's affairs, Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag, CC §§ 1035 ff). The prevailing opinion modifies this rule in so far as expenses, which remain fruitless are not to be reimbursed (Koziol/Welser, Grundriss I[13], 347 f; Iro, Sachenrecht[3], no. 7/9; see also Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 336, nos. 1 f*; contra*: Klang [-Schey/Klang], ABGB II[2], 100 f). Whether expenses are useful (and, therefore, are to be reimbursed) is assessed according to the individual preferences of the owner (common opinion, cf. CC § 1037; see references in Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 336 no. 3). To this extent, a different rule applies as compared to the one applying to possessors in good faith. Luxury expenses are not to be reimbursed (cf. CC § 1038).

64. In GERMANY, the same rule applies to possessors in bad faith as applies to possessors in good faith after the initiation of the legal proceedings (CC § 994 (2)). According to this provision, the possessor in bad faith may claim the reimbursement of necessary expenses based on the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs (see note 30, above; Münchener Kommentar [-Medicus], BGB[4], § 994, no. 19).

65. Under GREEK law, the reimbursment of expenses incurred by a possessor in bad faith is subject to the regulations on benevolent intervention in another's affairs. The reimbursement is limited to the necessary expenses and the expenses incurred for the settlement of charges encumbering the thing (CC art. 1102).

V. Right to retain

66. In AUSTRIA, someone who is under a duty to surrender a thing is entitled to retain it as security for due claims for reimbursement of expenses made on the asset, or for a claim for compensation arising from damage caused by the asset. The party can retain the property until the other party tenders performance (so-called Zug-um-Zug Prinzip). This is provided by a general rule in CC § 471 ABGB, which is referred to by CC § 334. It is irrelevant whether the possessor is in good or bad faith (Klang [-Schey/Klang], ABGB II[2], 99; Rummel [-Hofmann], ABGB I[3], § 471, no. 4 with further references). However, a right to retain is excluded with regard to property which has been removed without permission or fraudulently, which has been borrowed, let on lease or deposited (CC § 1440 sentence 2). For more details see Faber/Lurger [-Faber], National Reports I: Austria, 199.

67. Under ESTONIAN law, the possessor's right to retain the movable is explicitly regulated with regard to synallagmatic contracts. In case a synallagmatic contract is void or avoided, the parties have the duty to return what they received under the contract or compensate each other for the value simultaneously. Each party is entitled to withhold performance until the other party has performed, offered to perform, or secured or confirmed the performance (LObligA § 1034 (3) in conjunction with LObligA § 111(1)). Where there is no such relationship between the parties, the possessor's right to retain the movable until the owner reimburses the expenses incurred may be derived from LObligA § 110. The prerequisite of such a right of retention is the existence of a sufficient link between the claim (for reimbursement or similar) and the obligation to deliver the movable (Supreme Court 20 December 2005, no. 3-2-1-136-05 as cited in Faber/Lurger [-Kullerkupp], National Reports I: Estonia, 110).

68. Under GREEK law, the possessor has the right to retain the movable until satisfied in respect of the reimbursement of the expenses incurred during possession (CC art. 1106). The expenses must be reimbursed according to CC articles 1101-1103 or on the basis of other provisions (Georgiadis-Stathopoulos [-Georgiadis], Civil Code V, 613). The court decides, within the scope of the rei vindicatio, that the possessor has to deliver the goods under the condition that the owner concurrently reimburses the expenses incurred on the asset (Faber/Lurger [-Klaoudatou], National Reports III: Greece, 152). This right of retention is not granted to a possessor who acquired the asset through an illegal act (CC art. 1106). The right of retention is an obligatory right and cannot be exercised against third parties (Georgiadis-Stathopoulos [-Georgiadis], Civil Code V, 613).

69. According to the GERMAN CC § 1000, the possessor has a right to retain the goods until reimbursement of the expenses. This right is not granted to the possessor who obtained possession through an intentionally committed unlawful act. Besides, the right of retention is excluded when its exercise would violate the principle of "equity and good faith" (Treu und Glauben). For instance, when the cost that has to be reimbursed is very low compared to the value of the goods in question (Wieling, Sachenrecht I^2, § 12 V 8 a).

70. According to the HUNGARIAN CC § 193 (2), the possessor is entitled to retain the goods until the claims for reimbursement are satisfied. However, the possessor who acquired the goods by committing a criminal act or in another violent or fraudulent way is not allowed to retain the goods.

71. Under NORWEGIAN law, the possessor may retain the movable if there is a natural connection between the claim he or she wants to secure and the reason why he or she has physical control over the movable. The possessor also needs to fulfil the requirements for a good faith acquisition in order to retain the movable (Faber/Lurger [-Færstad], National Reports V: Denmark/Norway, 83).

72. Under SWISS law, the possessor in good faith has a right to retain the goods until the expenses have been reimbursed (CC art. 939(1)). This provision does not grant a real right of retention in terms of CC art. 895 ff, but a right to refuse to make delivery (Steinauer, Les droits réels I^4, no. 512). Whether the possessor in bad faith also benefits from a right of retention is disputed among legal scholars. It is not mentioned in CC art. 940, but some legal scholars argue that CC art. 939 (1) should apply by way of analogy (pro: Steinauer, Les droits réels I^4, no. 522; contra: Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar^2, art. 940, no. 12).

73. The DUTCH CC art. 3:120(3) grants the possessor in good faith a right to retain the goods (retentierecht), as long as the amount due has not been received. The bad faith possessor, on the other hand, does not enjoy such a right (Pitlo, Goederenrecht[12], no. 398; Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Rank-Berenschot], B.W.[3], art. 3:121, no. 3).

74. In SLOVENIA, the good faith possessor has a right to retain the movable until all necessary and useful costs have been reimbursed (Code of Property Law art. 95/VII). A possessor in bad faith does not have such right (Juhart et al. [-Vrenčur], Commentary on the SPZ, art. 96, 492).

75. Under SPANISH law, only the possessor in good faith has a right to retain the goods until been reimbursed for the necessary and useful expenses (CC art. 453).

76. ITALIAN CC art. 1152(1) grants the possessor in good faith a right of retention, as long as the expenses incurred for improvements and repairs have not been reimbursed, since such expenses are considered as an act benefiting the goods. However, the good faith possessor does not have any right to retain the goods with regard to the expenses incurred for the production and yielding of the fruits, since the possibility to keep the fruits is an alternative way to recover compensation (Faber/Lurger [-Greco], National Reports I: Italy, 47).

77. In PORTUGAL, the possessor in good faith has a right to retain the movable until payment of the expenses (CC arts. 754 and 756). The right of retention requires that the possessor of the movable obtained possession in a lawful way or, at least, at the time of acquiring possession was unaware of the unlawfulness of the acquisition and was in good faith (CC art. 756).

78. In FINLAND, the concept of retaining the movable is known as a security for reimbursement or other equivalent payment that may relate to the object. But there are no legal rules on this matter. Nevertheless, if the possessor has physical control over the object and has claims against the owner, he or she may well retain the movable (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 78).

79. A right to retain under DANISH law presupposes that there is a connection between the possessor's possession of the movable and the demand for payment (Mortensen, Indledning til tingsretten[2], 63 and Vinding Kruse, Ejendomsretten 3[3], 1684). In contractual situations there are, for example, rights to retain contained in the Sale of Goods Act (Købeloven §§ 36 and 57). As to non-contractual situations, the law is less clear. It is said that a person who is in, or obtains possession of, a movable and suffers damage from another's property has a right to retain the property. This general rule might be applicable also in non-contractual situations, depending on the circumstances of each situation ("må afgøres efter sagens natur"; Vinding Kruse, Ejendomsretten 3[3], 1686 f). In a situation where the owner is incapable of protecting his or her property and someone else incurs expenses in order to prevent serious damage to the property, the possessor has a right of retention until the expenses have been reimbursed (Vinding Kruse, Ejendomsretten 3[3], 1683).

80. There are several legal sources giving a possessor the right to retain a movable in SWEDEN (such as, for example: Handelsbalken (HB) chap. 11, § 3 and chap. 12 § 8, Sale of Goods Act (Köplagen) § 75). However, the terminology used is confusing. The Swedish legislator does not clearly distinguish between retention and a statutory right of pledge. A right to retain may very well include the right to sell the movable (as in, for example, Lagen (1970:980) om retentionsrätt för fordran hos hotellgäst; see also, Millqvist, Sakrättens grunder, 158 ff; Rodhe, Handbok i sakrätt, 443 ff and Håstad, Sakrätt avseende lös egendom[6], 350). The common opinion seems to be that there is no general right outside the scope of application of these rules (Håstad, Sakrätt avseende lös egendom[6], 350 and Millqvist, Sakrättens grunder, 159). Some possibilities to use these analogously exist, especially the two rules in HB, but there is no unwritten general rule providing a right to retain another person's property (Millqvist, Sakrättens grunder, 159; Undén, Svensk sakrätt i lös egendom, 235 and NJA 1985 s. 205). It is, however, uncertain to what extent an analogous application is possible and whether the rules can be applied to non-contractual situations. As for the abovementioned examples, chap. 11 § 3 HB gives a borrower a right to retain, if he or she incurred necessary expenses with the owner's consent. One legal scholar extends this rule's scope of application also to "useful" ("nyttiga") costs not consented to by the owner (Undén, Svensk sakrätt[10], 236). Under HB chap. 12 § 8, a possessor storing the movable has the right to retain the object pending payment of necessary expenses on the movable or storage costs. The right exists even where the movable was stored without the owner's consent if the person storing the movable was in good faith as to the possessor's right to the movable (Karnov [-Herre] 2006/07, 499 no. 20). Undén suggests that the possessor's fee and costs other than those qualifying as necessary should give the owner the same right to retain (Undén, Svensk sakrätt[10], 236). Sale of Goods Act § 75 gives a possessor – who can also be the seller or the buyer, where the party is in charge of taking care of the goods for the other party's account – the right to retain up until his or her justifiably incurred ("försvarliga") costs of care have been reimbursed or acceptable security has been provided to the possessor. Other less commonly used rules are Kommissionslagen (1914:45) §§ 6, 31-37 and 39; Handelsagentlagen (1991:351) §§ 15 and 16; Lagen (1985:982) om näringsidkares rätt att sälja saker som inte har avhämtats; Bostadsrättslagen (1991:614) chap. 7 § 16a; Sjölagen (1994:1009) chap. 3 §§ 36, 39 and 43, chap. 13 § 20, chap. 15 § 11; Vägtransportlagen (1974:610) §§ 20 and 25; Ägofredslagen (1933:269) §§ 22-28 and Lagen (1919:426) om flottning i allmän flottled §§ 33 and 68.

81. The BELGIAN CC does not provide for a general right of retention. It only recognises certain applications of it (e.g. CC articles 570, 867, 1612, 1673, 1749, 1948, 2028, 2087). According to a part of legal writing, followed by case law, the possessor in good faith has a right of retention with regard to the reimbursement sums due from the owner who claims the property back (De Page/Dekkers, Traité VI, nos. 153 and 186).

82. Under LITHUANIAN law, neither the possessor in good faith nor the bad faith possessor has a right to retain the movable until the reimbursement of the expenses has been made (Faber/Lurger [-Mikelenas], National Reports III: Lithuania, 73).

83. It is unclear whether there is a right to retain the movable in SCOTLAND. There is no case law on the issue of movable property (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 185 f). In some older cases regarding land, a possessor who had carried out improvements was allowed to retain it until the expenses had been reimbursed (Binning v Brotherstones (1676) Mor 13401 and York Buildings Co v Mackenzie (1797) 3 Pat 618). A legal scholar confers the right to retain in cases of land (Bankton, Institute of the Law of Scotland, I.8.15; I.9.42 and II.9.68). However, there is also some case law where the courts have rejected the existence of a right to retain (Duke of Gordon v Innes (1824) 3 S 10; Agnew v Earl of Stair (1824) 3 S 229 and Sinclair v Sinclair (1829) 7 S 242). Reid states, with certainty and with references to Bankton, that there is a right of retention of or lien in the objects improved. This right is not confined to cases of unlawful possession (Reid, The law of Property in Scotland, 141 f).

84. There seems to be no authority on the issue of the retention of property in ENGLAND and WALES. This might be due to the fact that an owner under common law has, in principle, no right to specific restitution of the movable and must usually be content with an award of damages representing the value of the lost thing (Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 106).

VI. Right to remove improvements

85. In ENGLAND and WALES, as well as in IRELAND, if the improvement has become part of the movable, it will belong to the owner of the movable (Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 108). The improvements have become a part when a separation is either impossible or impracticable, or when something smaller has been joined into a larger movable, so that the identity of the smaller succumbs to the larger (the principal) (Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 81; Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 56; Bell, Modern law of Personal property in England and Ireland, 72 f and Bridge, Personal Property Law[3], 106 ff). It has been said that the principal "probably" is the one with the greatest value (Faber/Lurger [-Gardiner], National Reports II: Ireland, 55). Size and purpose can also be important (Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 80). If the improvement has not become a part of the movable, the improver is entitled to remove the improvement (Faber/Lurger [-Frisby/Jones], National Reports II: England and Wales, 108).

86. There is no authority on the issue in CYPRUS. Though, one can assume that the courts in CYPRUS will follow the ENGLISH law of combination. See further the Notes for ENGLAND.

87. In SCOTLAND, the right to remove improvements depends on whether combination ("accession") has occurred or not. If the improvements have acceded to the principal – if there is an "indissoluble union" between the principal thing and the accessory attached by the possessor – the owner of the principal becomes the owner of the accessory too (Reid, The Law of Property Law in Scotland, 473 f). If combination has not occurred, ownership of the attachment remains with its owner: Separation is not only permitted but obligatory (Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland[4], § 537). The owner of the principal has therefore an obligation to restore the attachment to the possessor (Faber/Lurger [-Carey Miller/Combe/Steven/Wortley], National Reports II: Scotland, 179 ff and Carey Miller/Irvine, Corporeal Moveables in Scots Law[2], 80).

88. A possessor should probably have a right to remove improvements in NORWAY and SWEDEN as long as no combination has occurred. SWEDEN does not have specific rules for combination, but it has been said that if the movables simply can be separated from each other, without significant costs or loss of value, each owner "should" remain the owner of his or her contribution (Håstad, Sakrätt avseende lös egendom[6], 47). A right to remove an improvement will therefore probably be possible only for as long as it can be separated from the other movable. In NORWAY, the rules on combination apply when two or more movables are combined in such a way that they no longer are viewed as different movables; for example, if it is impossible or too expensive to separate them. The reasonableness of separation costs will have to be assessed by taking into account the type of movable in each particular case (Rådsegn 7 frå Sivillovbokutvalet (Oslo 1963) 19 f). Other circumstances to take into account are whether it is possible for the owner to acquire another movable and the owner's need for the movable (Faber/Lurger [-Færstad], National Reports V: Denmark/Norway, 46 and Braekhus/Haerem, Norsk tingsrett, 549 ff). For further information, see Notes on VIII.–5:104.

89. In DENMARK, the owner of a movable has a right to demand to have it separated from any other movable, if the movables can be separated without causing a substantial loss of value. Where the possessor was in bad faith as to the right to work on the movable, separation can be demanded even if this will cause a substantial loss of value, if the produced movable is, so to say, a normal piece of merchandise ("en almindelig handelsvare") and not a piece of art (Vinding Kruse, Ejendomsretten[3], 443). Another scholar shares this approach, but seems to suggest a slightly stricter rule as to separation, where the manufacturer is in bad faith (Illum, Dansk tingsret[3], 383 f), meaning that according to the latter approach there are fewer situations where separation would be possible.

90. A possessor in FINLAND has, "in most cases", a right to detach objects from the main object if this is possible without causing damage or other harm to it (Faber/Lurger [-Kuusinen], National Reports V: Finland, 77 f). This will, of course, mostly be important regarding luxury expenses incurred on the property, or regarding useful expenses incurred by a bad faith possessor – expenses that are not reimbursed to the possessor.

91. Under BELGIAN law, it is accepted that the possessor is allowed to remove everything that can be removed, i.e. without damaging the substance of the goods (De Page/Dekkers, VI, no. 150).

92. Under DUTCH law, the right to remove improvements (ius tollendi) is regulated in CC art. 3:123. All changes or additions made to the goods can be removed by the possessor, regardless of whether or not the possessor is in good faith, under the precondition that the thing can be returned to its previous state. As a consequence, the possessor loses the right to claim reimbursement of the costs incurred in making these changes or additions (Nieuwenhuis/Stolker/Valk [-Rank-Berenschot], B.W.[3], art. 3:123, no. 1; Asser, Goederenrecht[14] II, no. 122a). If the changes or additions cannot be removed without deterioration of the goods, the possessor is not allowed to exercise this right (Pitlo, Goederenrecht[12], no. 399).

93. According to the GREEK CC art. 1104, the possessor has the right to remove assets, which have been joined to the movable, subject to restitution (ius tollendi), regardless of whether the possessor was acting in good or bad faith and whether or not the improvement is a necessary, useful or sumptuary one. It is also of no relevance whether the possessor was the owner of the attached movable or not (Spyridakis, Property Law 3, 177 ε). The ius tollendi is excluded in the following cases (CC art. 1104): (1) where the attachment constitutes a usual disbursement for the purpose of maintenance, for which the possessor is not entitled to claim reimbursement since he or she enjoyed the benefits resulting therefrom; (2) where the possessor draws no advantage from removal; (3) where the possessor receives a sum equivalent to the value that would have been attributable to the other thing after separation.

94. Under GERMAN law, the possessor is, in any case, entitled to remove his or her property, which has been combined with the object that has to be returned to its rightful owner, as long as it has not become an essential component part (wesentlicher Bestandteil) of the object. In such situations, the possessor is still regarded as the owner of this part (Prütting, Sachenrecht[33], no. 561). In addition, the CC § 997(1) grants such a right of removal in relation to essential component parts, provided that the previous state is restored (CC § 997(1) in conjunction with CC § 258). This means that the possessor is entitled to separate his or her part and to acquire ownership by way of occupation (Prütting, Sachenrecht[33], no. 561; Soergel [-Stadler], BGB[13], § 997 nos. 1-3). According to the CC § 997(2), the right cannot be exercised if the possessor is not entitled, according to the CC § 994(1) second sentence, to claim reimbursement of the expenses incurred, if such separation is useless for him or her (e.g. wallpaper), or if he or she receives compensation at least equal to the value that the component part would have for him or her after separation. Both the possessor in good faith and the possessor in bad faith are entitled to exercise this right (Prütting, Sachenrecht[33], no. 561; Bamberger/Roth [-Fritzsche], BGB II, § 997, nos. 8 and 17-19).

95. The ESTONIAN PropLA § 88(2) grants the possessor a right to remove the improvements made to the thing, provided that the thing can be returned to its previous state. Such a right is unavailable if it is impossible to remove the improvements without damaging them or if the possessor is reimbursed for the expenses incurred in the course of these improvements. It seems that this right can be exercised by a possessor in good faith as well as one in bad faith.

96. Under SLOVENIAN law, a possessor who cannot claim for the reimbursement of costs incurred on a whim or for the purpose of embellishing the movable is allowed to remove such improvements, provided that this does not cause any damage to the goods (Code of Property Law art. 96/VI).

97. In HUNGARY, the possessor is entitled to remove improvements, provided that the original state of the goods can be restored (Faber/Lurger [-Szilagyi], National Reports III: Hungary, 95).

98. The AUSTRIAN CC § 332 provides that a possessor in good faith can remove luxury 'improvements' before restoring the goods to their owner. This rule also applies to a possessor in bad faith (Schwimann [-Klicka], ABGB II[3], § 336, no. 3; Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 336, no. 4). The good faith possessor may also remove useful improvements (Klang [-Schey/Klang], ABGB II[2], 98; Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 331, no. 3). This right (ius tollendi) can be exercised under the prerequisite that the substance of the property is not damaged, or, at least, the status quo ante is restored. (Kletečka/Schauer [-Lurger], ABGB, § 332, no. 2).

99. Useful and sumptuary expenses are qualified as improvements (as they increase the value of the movable thing) under PORTUGUESE law. The good faith as well as the bad faith possessor is entitled to remove the improvements resulting from useful expenses, provided that this is possible without causing damage to the movable (CC art. 1273). With regard to improvements resulting from sumptuary expenses, only the possessor in good faith has the right to remove them (CC art. 1275).

100. In SPAIN, both the possessor in good faith and the one in bad faith have the right to remove the luxury improvements (ius tolliendi), provided that the goods do not suffer any injury thereby. The rightful owner who recovers the property can prevent the exercise of the ius tolliendi by refunding the amount paid for the improvements, if the possessor is in good faith, or by paying a sum equal to the value of the goods at the time possession is recovered (CC arts. 454-455).

101. According to the SWISS CC art. 939(2), the possessor in good faith is entitled to remove improvements (which are regarded as being luxury expenses and, therefore, not reimbursable under CC art. 939(1)) under three conditions: (1) the right has to be exercised before the restitution of the object; (2) separation is possible without causing damage to the object; (3) the rightful owner does not propose to reimburse the luxury expenses (Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 513). With regard to the possessor in bad faith, such a right has not explicitly been provided by law. However, some legal scholars take the view that the CC art. 939(2) should apply by way of analogy to possessors in bad faith for useful and luxury expenses (pro: Steinauer, Les droits réels I[4], no. 522a; contra: Honsell [-Stark], Basler Kommentar[2], art. 940, no. 12).

102. In LITHUANIA, the possessor in good faith has the right to keep the parts that have been added to improve the thing, provided that they cannot be separated without causing damage to the thing (CC art. 4.97).

BOOK IX

PROPRIETARY SECURITY IN MOVABLE ASSETS

CHAPTER 1: GENERAL RULES

Section 1: Scope of application

IX.–1:101: General rule

(1) This Book applies to the following rights in movable property based upon contracts for proprietary security:

(a) security rights; and

(b) ownership retained under retention of ownership devices.

(2) The rules of this Book on security rights apply with appropriate adaptations to:

(a) rights under a trust for security purposes;

(b) security rights in movable assets created by unilateral juridical acts; and

(c) security rights in movable assets implied by patrimonial law, if and in so far as this is compatible with the purpose of the law.

COMMENTS

A. Security rights and retention of ownership devices

Paragraph (1) introduces a basic distinction upon which these rules are based: security may be provided by security rights or by retention of ownership devices. These two basic techniques are defined and specified by the three following articles.

B. Contractual security (paragraph (1))

Generally, the security devices covered by these rules (i.e. security rights and retention of ownership devices) are based upon a contract for proprietary security, commonly called a security agreement. In practice, this security agreement is usually part of a broader instrument, especially of a loan contract concluded between the creditor who is to be secured and the debtor as provider of the security. If the security is to be provided by a third person, this also will usually be agreed upon in a clause of the loan contract; but there may also be an additional contract for proprietary security between the creditor to be secured and this third party security provider in which both the terms of the credit to be secured and the terms of the pertinent security right are regulated.

The parties to the security agreement are usually the creditor of the obligation to be secured and the debtor of this obligation. However, since a security right need not be provided by the debtor, the security provider may also be a third person. In such a case, there may even be two or three security agreements: one between the secured creditor and the debtor, another between the secured creditor and the security provider, and a further one between the debtor and the security provider.

Since the security agreement is a contract and as such has no proprietary effect, it is open to party autonomy. The parties are free to fix the details of the proprietary security device to be created, such as the asset or assets to be encumbered, whether the encumbered asset is to remain in the security provider's possession or is to be delivered to the secured creditor, insurance of the encumbered assets, and so on.

However, the rules of this Book do not apply only to security devices based upon agreement. They also apply to proprietary security rights based upon one of several non-contractual sources, see paragraph (2).

C. Non-contractual security rights (paragraph (2))

General. The present rules are primarily intended to apply to contractual security devices, i.e. retention of ownership devices and security rights that are based upon a contract for proprietary security. However, there are also a few non-contractual sources of security rights in movable assets to which the rules on contractual security rights ought to be applied in order to fill a gap which otherwise would arise.

Trust for security purpose (paragraph (2)(a)). Occasionally, a trust is used for the purpose of creating a security, e.g. by the debtor or other security provider transferring the assets to be encumbered to the secured creditor or a third person as trustee for security purposes. Another example may be the trust receipt which aims to achieve a similar purpose. The rules of Book X on trusts explicitly provide that in their application to a trust serving security purposes those rules are subject to the provisions of this Book on proprietary security (X.–1:202, so that any conflict is avoided.

Creation by unilateral juridical act (paragraph (2)(b)). It is conceivable that a security provider might create a security right by unilateral juridical act. Even although this is unlikely to happen very often in practice, the situation should be regulated.

Security right implied by patrimonial law (paragraph (2)(c)). In many countries legislation provides for statutory security rights, especially if commercial services are involved, without regulating details. Such details are then supplied by applying relevant rules of the general regime of security rights – in so far as this is compatible with the purpose of the relevant statutory regime. Paragraph (2)(c) confirms that this supplementation of various national statutory regimes is to be continued. See also the examples in IV.C.–5:106 (Payment of the price) paragraph (2) and IV.E.–2:401 (Right of retention).

However, the application of the present rules must be compatible with the other law; and the application is permitted only so far as this compatibility goes.

Right of retention of possession. Reference must also be made to IX.–2:114 (Right of retention of possession). This provision covers all cases in which a person under a contract or rule of law is entitled to retain an asset as security for a right to performance, especially the payment of money for work done on an asset of the debtor, such as inspection, repair and other services performed at the service provider’s place of business. In all these cases there arises a possessory security right governed by the relevant rules of this Book.

IX.–1:102: Security right in movable asset

(1) A security right in a movable asset is any limited proprietary right in the asset which entitles the secured creditor to preferential satisfaction of the secured right from the encumbered asset.

(2) The term security right includes:

(a) limited proprietary rights of a type which is generally recognised as designed to serve as proprietary security, especially the pledge;

(b) limited proprietary rights, however named, that are based upon a contract for proprietary security and that are either intended by the parties to entitle the secured creditor to preferential satisfaction of the secured right from the encumbered asset or have this effect under the contract; and

(c) other rights which are regarded as security rights under the rules of this Book, such as the right referred to in IX.–2:114 (Right of retention of possession) and the rights covered by paragraph (3).

(3) A transfer or purported transfer of ownership of a movable asset which is made, on the basis of a contract for proprietary security, with the intention or the effect of securing satisfaction of a secured right can create only a security right in the asset for the transferee.

(4) Paragraph (3) applies in particular to:

(a) a security transfer of ownership of corporeal assets;

(b) a security assignment;

(c) a sale and lease-back; and

(d) a sale and resale.

COMMENTS

A. General remark

It is not easy to delimit the scope of application of Book IX because a uniform term for all security rights in movable assets is lacking – not only on the European level, but also in most member states. The reason is historical. In the 19th century, proprietary security in movables was restricted, in most member states, to possessory security, i.e. the pledge (pignus) which due to its Roman origin was recognised throughout Europe. However, with the industrial revolution the need for non-possessory security became urgent because industry and increased trade could not develop unless encumbered assets, such as raw material, semi-finished products or trade inventory, were left with the debtor or the security provider. Each European country since the late 19th and in the course of the 20th century developed various types of non-possessory proprietary security, usually for special situations only, with or without requiring registration. This colourful picture essentially still is valid today, although one can observe a slow trend to generalise the multitude of special laws on the national level. However, a generally accepted terminology has rarely been achieved and can therefore not be employed in the present context.

The situation is complicated by the fact that even outside any national specific legislation, practice for purposes of security has often taken recourse to contractual or proprietary institutions that had not been designed to be used for purposes of security. Examples are consignment, sale and lease-back, leasing, or – on the proprietary level – security transfer of ownership and security assignment of rights to performance – to mention only a few.

B. Security right and retention of ownership devices

These rules on proprietary security appear to be based upon a fundamental distinction between security rights, on the one hand, and retention of ownership devices, on the other hand. That impression may be nourished by the exposition of these two basic instruments in this and the following Article. Nevertheless, this impression is misleading. It is true that these rules distinguish between security rights proper and retention of ownership devices. However, this distinction is activated for merely two fields: creation (Chapter 2), on the one hand, and enforcement (Chapter 7) on the other hand. For all other aspects – third party effectiveness, priority, pre-default rules and termination – it has turned out that no differentiations are necessary. In these four fields, uniform rules apply to both security rights proper and to retention of ownership devices.

C. Definition of security right (paragraph (1))

The (proprietary) security right is the central institution of Book IX, as its title indicates. Paragraph (1) contains the definition of this core institution. The two essential elements are: first, a security right is a limited proprietary right and second, this right entitles the secured creditor to preferential satisfaction from the encumbered asset.

Limited proprietary right. Paragraph (1) of the Article describes the legal nature of a security right in a movable asset as being a "limited proprietary right" in the asset. This description indicates that a security right as a limited proprietary right is merely an encumbrance of the full right in a movable, i.e. of its ownership. Ownership is normally held by the security provider. It is possible, though, although rather rare, that a third party who is not the owner, may have power or authority to create the encumbrance in the third party's own name (and not merely as a representative in the owner's name).

The security provider is in most cases also the debtor of the obligation covered by the security right. However, such identity is not necessary. A third person may wish, or may be asked, whether or not for a fee, to encumber one of its assets.

Entitlement to preferential satisfaction. The second part of the definition in paragraph (1) circumscribes the substantive contents of the limited proprietary right mentioned in the initial part of the sentence. This limited right must entitle the secured creditor to "preferential satisfaction" of the secured right from the encumbered asset. Of the three elements of this definition, practically the most important one is the first, i.e. preferential satisfaction.

The preference that is claimed here for a security right is the essence of any proprietary security right: A security right only performs its function of providing security to its holder, the secured creditor, if the latter is allowed to satisfy the secured right before any (or at least most) other creditor(s). This is the essence of the secured creditor's "preferential" right of satisfaction. Such preference must be respected in all possible factual situations: whether upon an agreed sale of the encumbered asset, in an execution brought by another creditor of the owner of the encumbered asset or in an insolvency proceeding over all the debtor's assets.

Of course, preference does not necessarily mean "absolute" preference. Primarily, it means preference over unsecured creditors of the debtor. By contrast, as regards the relationship to other secured creditors holding a security right in the same asset, priority is determined by the rules on priority (cf. Chapter 4). There may also be statutory preferences; however, these are rare for movable assets.

D. Paragraphs (2) and (3)

Against the background of the development of proprietary security in movables briefly sketched in Comment A, paragraphs (2) and (3) of this Article must determine the substantive scope of application of Book IX. This is difficult because – apart from the possessory pledge, which is generally recognised – the national laws widely diverge. Each country has – to a lesser or broader degree – developed rules of its own for coping with the contemporary practical demands for non-possessory security, i.e. security where possession is held by the security provider (the latter may or may not be the debtor of the obligation to be covered by the security).

Apart from the many cases where limited proprietary rights are "generally recognised as designed to serve as proprietary security" (paragraph (2)(a)), for many other rights the classification as security right may be doubtful. Paragraphs (2) and (3) are designed to establish criteria which can be used for solving the doubts as to their correct classification.

The two paragraphs use two criteria, each of which justifies the assumption that there is a proprietary security right. There is either an intention of the parties to create a security right or their arrangements have this effect (paragraph (2)(b) and paragraph (3) main text).

E. Paragraph (2)

Sub-paragraph (b) expressly says that names of (national) institutions are irrelevant for determining their qualification as proprietary security. It is a general principle in this paragraph that only substance counts. Two criteria are established.

Sub-paragraph (a) confirms an obvious criterion: a proprietary right that is of a "type which is generally recognised as designed to serve as proprietary security". The example expressly indicated, that of the pledge, is obvious. In fact, the pledge appears to be recognised throughout Europe as a security right – at least the possessory pledge. This may probably be extended to the non-possessory pledge, because use of the term pledge generally indicates the intention of creating a proprietary security.

The same must be true for other comparable institutions developed on a national level. If such institutions in a country are "generally recognised … to serve as proprietary security", this suffices to bring them under the scope of application of these rules. By contrast, it is irrelevant whether such institutions are governed by legislation or any other official regulation or whether they have been developed by business practice, provided they are recognised by the courts.

Sub-paragraph (b) deals with cases which cannot rely on general recognition as a security right. Instead, two formal and two functional criteria are to be employed. The two formal criteria are that a "limited proprietary right" must be created, based upon "a contract for proprietary security". It goes without saying that in the present context these two criteria must not be understood too strictly. A broad understanding of the two legal criteria is confirmed for the first of these criteria. It is expressly said that the name – given by the parties – to the limited proprietary right created by them is irrelevant. That must carry over to the corresponding contract for proprietary security.

By contrast, the emphasis obviously is on the two alternative substantive functional criteria: either the subjective intention of the parties to create a security right; or the objective effect of that agreement of the parties.

> Illustration
> A, a good friend of B, has proudly been told by the latter that he has recently inherited from his uncle a considerable number of shares in a thriving enterprise. Knowing that A plans to build a family home and is negotiating a loan from a private lender, B offers to make available to him for the purpose of security, if need be, one third of the inherited securities. A and B set this down in writing, and this document is sent to the lender. Can the lender, if A fails to repay the loan, enforce its claim against B's securities? An affirmative answer can be based both upon the parties' intention and the effect of the agreement.

Sub-paragraph (c) uses still another criterion for delimiting the scope of application of Book IX: express recognition as a security right by Book IX. The rights covered by paragraph (3) are expressly mentioned and will be commented upon below (see under Comment F).

The "right of retention of possession" is mentioned separately. These rules regard it as a security right (cf. IX.–2:114 (Right of retention of possession)); this is an innovation for many countries. For details, cf. the Comments on that Article.

F. Paragraph (3)

Paragraph (3) deals with the issue under which criteria a transfer of ownership agreed upon by the parties must be converted to a proprietary security right.

As under paragraph (2)(b), either the parties' intentions or the effects of their transaction are decisive for the classification of the transfer of ownership as giving rise to a security right. The parties must intend to use the transfer of ownership in order to secure performance of a secured right or this must be the effect of their transaction.

Paragraph (3) enumerates four transactions where the intended or implied transfer of ownership typically pursues a security purpose, so that they may be re-characterised as a creation of a security right (as a limited proprietary right) only.

Sub-paragraph (a) refers to a security transfer of ownership of corporeal assets. The initial term "security" indicates already the intention of the parties. The transfer of ownership of specific corporeal assets to the secured creditor is to serve a security purpose. This intention is in practice usually confirmed by two further clauses. First, possession of the transferred corporeal assets is usually left with the "seller". Second, the parties usually agree upon a corresponding clause of reversion. After payment of the obligation covered by the security transfer, the secured creditor is usually obliged, by contract or law, to re-transfer the corporeal assets to the security provider. In effect, then, the security transfer of ownership amounts to a non-possessory security right.

Sub-paragraph (b) refers to a security assignment. An assignment of an intangible, especially of a right to payment, has the same structure and the same function as a security transfer of ownership.

Sub-paragraph (c) refers to a sale and lease-back. This usually achieves the same purpose as a security transfer of ownership. The sale as such involves a transfer of ownership to the "buyer". The "lease-back" to the seller means that the latter retains possession of the sold goods. The leasing rates paid by the seller correspond to the rateable repayment of a credit granted by the buyer–lessor to the seller–lessee. After complete repayment of the credit in the form of the leasing rates, the lease terminates and the buyer is usually obliged to retransfer the "bought" assets to the original "seller-lessee", i.e. the debtor.

Sub-paragraph (d) refers to a sale and resale. This is the simpler basic pattern of the sale and lease-back . Reference can therefore be made to the preceding comment.

IX.–1:103: Retention of ownership devices: scope

(1) There is a retention of ownership device when ownership is retained by the owner of supplied assets in order to secure a right to performance of an obligation.

(2) The term retention of ownership device includes:

(a) retention of ownership by a seller under a contract of sale;
(b) ownership of the supplier under a contract of hire-purchase;
(c) ownership of the leased assets under a contract of leasing, provided that according to the terms of the contract the lessee at the expiration of the lease period has an option to acquire ownership of, or a right to continue to use, the leased asset without payment or for merely nominal payment (financial leasing); and
(d) ownership of the supplier under a contract of consignment with the intention or the effect of fulfilling a security purpose.

COMMENTS

A. Introductory remarks

The retention of ownership devices dealt with in this Article represent the most typical security device which is being used in Europe in order to secure the financing of acquisitions (acquisition financing).

There is broad international agreement that acquisition financing deserves special, favourable treatment because of its general benefit for economic development. The more people and enterprises can buy, the more general welfare and economic, especially industrial, development are promoted. A rough survey of international developments in this field shows that on the legal level two methods for realising the generally accepted desire of granting special protection to security for acquisition financing are available and have been chosen in legislation and court practice.

One solution is based upon using the ordinary security right. If used for securing acquisition finance, it is granted a special priority. Apart from this aspect, however, the ordinary rules on security rights apply. These rules are predicated on the debtor/security provider granting or the secured creditor retaining a security right in encumbered assets. If applied to securing acquisition finance by encumbering goods bought by the buyer, the latter must therefore be owner of these goods. This means that the seller has to transfer ownership of the sold goods to the buyer in order to enable the latter to grant a security right for the unpaid purchase price to the seller (or a third person).

An alternative solution is based upon the technique of the seller retaining ownership of the sold assets, while possession of the latter is transferred to the buyer. This technique of retention of ownership is widely accepted and practised in Europe, as distinct from the practice in other continents. It should be added that the basic technique of retention of ownership extends – beyond retention of ownership in sales contracts – to three related transactions, namely to:

- ownership of the supplier under a contract of hire-purchase;
- to a contract of financial leasing;

- ownership of a supplier under a contract of consignment, if the parties intend, or their contract has the effect of, creating a security for the consignor.

The two techniques – either using a security right or a retention of ownership – in a wider sense can co-exist. Both can be used, as the parties prefer. However, it must be noted that the broader effects – beyond the technical field of proprietary security – differ. Especially in executions brought by other creditors of the buyer; in the buyer's insolvency proceedings as well as upon the buyer's default, a retention of ownership grants considerably stronger protection to the seller than a "mere" security right.

B. Retention of ownership devices and security rights

As noted above, there is broad agreement on the economic justification for the special protection of proprietary security that is used as securing for financing acquisitions. The traditional way pursued in most European countries is to have recourse to full title. In the basic situation, the seller, in spite of delivery of the sold goods to the buyer, may retain (or reserve) ownership in the sold goods until payment of the full purchase price. In the buyer's bankruptcy or where other creditors bring executions against the buyer, the seller may invoke this right of ownership, which provides full protection. The seller may repossess the sold assets from the bankruptcy estate, subject to due accounting for any payments made by the buyer and counter-claims by the seller for use and wear of the sold goods. A corresponding rule applies in executions brought against the sold assets.

Sweden and perhaps one or two other member states of the EU have chosen another, more direct, route to achieve the same result. Instead of relying on the special status of ownership, the seller may retain a security right which enjoys a special priority, a super-priority, that achieves the same effect in the buyer's bankruptcy.

At first sight, the results reached by this special way appear to be the same as those achieved by the traditional recourse to ownership. It is true that the technique used is more straight-forward and therefore more elegant and less complicated than recourse to ownership. However, this modern approach has not yet been adopted by most of the member states. And there are decisive disadvantages of the "mere" security right as compared to the ownership approach. In the buyer's bankruptcy, the secured creditor no longer enjoys the special privileges of an owner; the creditor cannot repossess the goods from the bankruptcy estate. The same applies to executions brought by other creditors of the buyer – unless the relevant bankruptcy or execution rules have been adapted to confer special protection to creditors of purchase money. So far, such special protection is lacking in most member states.

Faced with these two approaches, the Study Group has decided to draft its basic text by both following the traditional approach of the retention of ownership and allowing the use of the more modern concept of the security right for acquisition finance. Adoption only of the modern approach in these rules on substantive law would create a clear risk. As long as the bankruptcy laws, the rules on execution and those on enforcement of the member states do not adopt the new approach of granting a super-priority to a security right securing acquisition finance, use of the new rules would decisively diminish the protection of acquisition finance in the most critical situations, i.e. in the security provider's bankruptcy, in execution proceedings brought against the sold assets and in enforcing the security right. It is more important to achieve these relevant substantive purposes and also more in line with present

European law and practice than to present an elegant one-track solution predicated on the security right – but without the assurance of achieving similar practical results.

Another reason militating for this twofold approach is the treatment of financial leasing. The economic function of the latter is the same as that of retention of ownership. It is a modern form of securing acquisition finance, although with a somewhat different legal structure. On the initiative and mandate of a customer, the latter as the future lessee instructs a future lessor to acquire goods from a manufacturer. These goods are leased to the customer who, as lessee, pays the agreed leasing rates to the lessor. If the value of the purchase price has been paid, the lessee has an option, either to continue paying leasing rates – although only of a nominal amount – or to acquire the leased goods for no or a merely nominal amount. It is obvious that in spite of certain minor deviations financial leasing has the same legal structure as retention of ownership. The preservation of this legal similarity which reflects the economic correspondence between the two institutions, also speaks for retaining retention of ownership in its original conception.

On the other hand, the regime of retention of ownership does not differ in every respect from that of security rights. On the contrary, there are extensive similarities and for the benefit of ease of application the present rules attempt as far as possible to offer unified rules. Most of the rules on security rights also apply to retention of ownership devices. The general rule is the unity of the two systems; exceptions for retention of ownership devices must be explicitly set up.

C. Details

Paragraph (1) sets out the basic legal structure of all four retention of ownership devices which are specified in paragraph (2). The owner of assets who is engaged in transferring assets to one of the categories of persons mentioned in paragraph (2) and who finances the acquisition of these assets by their holders (and future owners) can retain ownership as security for payment of the price for those assets.

The term retention of ownership implies that the assets for which ownership is retained are delivered to the person acquiring them (or, if this person so instructs the owner, to a third person). These persons obtain possession and may use the acquired assets. The owner may prescribe any conditions or limits for such use.

Depending upon the circumstances, the owner may even allow the assets to be disposed of. In particular, the resale of the transferred assets may be permitted, especially if merchandise is involved, because resale may often be the only realistic way for a merchant to raise the money for payment of the price credited by the original seller/owner. Such a power of disposition will usually be limited to dispositions “in the ordinary course of business”; for a merchant, the ordinary course of business would usually be strictly limited to sales for cash or equivalent forms of immediate satisfaction (against a credit card, bank transfer or a cheque).

Paragraph (2) enumerates four types of contracts for which retention of ownership actually is being used. However, while these four types of contracts are presently typical contractual bases for retention of ownership, the enumeration in paragraph (2) is not exclusive, as the word “includes” indicates. Indeed, new types of contracts may be developed in future which would fit under the broad scheme laid out in this Article.

Sub-paragraph (a) refers to contracts of sale, for which the pattern of retention of ownership devices was originally developed. The seller, while transferring possession of the sold goods to the buyer, retained ownership in the sold goods as security until the buyer later at an agreed time paid the purchase price.

In many countries, in practice the seller's "retention" of ownership must be slightly qualified. In order to economise handling and save on proceedings and bureaucracy, the seller often transfers immediately upon delivery a form of ownership to the buyer – however, under the suspensive condition of full payment of the purchase price. This means that the buyer obtains not only possession, but also ownership – though merely conditional ownership. This technique is indicated by the term "conditional sale" which, although imprecise, is known and used in some jurisdictions. This technique implies that the buyer nominally obtains ownership already upon delivery of the sold goods; however, that ownership is merely conditional – it turns into full ownership only upon payment of the full purchase price for the bought assets.

Sub-paragraph (b) covers a related form of security for acquisition finance, i.e. hire-purchase. This appears to be used today primarily in the European Anglophone countries. As the double name indicates, this contract consists of two phases, first a hiring which is followed, after the hirer has paid all the instalments of rent (which in sum amount to the purchase price), by an option of the hirer to acquire the hired asset for no or a merely nominal amount. Functionally, this is a full equivalent of a retention of ownership.

Sub-paragraph (c) deals with financial leasing, a commercial contract that has been developed in the past decades and has become very popular all over Europe and beyond. It is described in Comment B above. Although the business background differs to some degree, it is structurally closely related to hire-purchase and therefore is also a retention of ownership device.

Sub-paragraph (d) covers certain consignments. The structure of this type of contract differs from all the preceding types of retention of ownership devices. This difference is not accidental, but can be explained by the historical background of this institution which, generally speaking, is a special method of commercial distribution. However, in the Scandinavian countries it is also being used for security purposes because in those countries a retention of ownership allowing the buyer to sell the goods to third persons is regarded as void. In order to overcome this legal obstacle, sellers have had recourse to consignment contracts. If this type of contract has been drafted with the intention of achieving a security for the consignor; or if the effect of the parties' agreement is to achieve a security purpose, then that intention or this effect prevails. This formula corresponds to that used in a more general way in IX.–1:102 (Security right in movable asset) paragraph (3) and is therefore in keeping with a basic guideline of Book IX.

IX.–1:104: Retention of ownership devices: applicable rules

(1) Retention of ownership devices are subject to the following rules on security rights, unless specifically provided otherwise:

(a) IX.–2:104 (Specific issues of transferability, existence and specification) paragraphs (2) to (4);
(b) Chapter 2, Sections 3 and 4;
(c) Chapters 3 to 6; and
(d) Chapter 7, Section 1.

(2) When applying rules on security rights to retention of ownership devices, the following adaptations apply:

(a) references to the encumbered assets refer to the assets supplied under a contract of sale, hire-purchase, leasing or consignment, respectively;
(b) in retention of ownership under contracts of sale , references to the secured creditor are to be understood as referring to the seller, and references to the security provider as referring to the buyer;
(c) in retention of ownership devices under contracts of hire-purchase , references to the secured creditor are to be understood as referring to the supplier, and references to the security provider as referring to the hire-purchaser;
(d) in retention of ownership devices under contracts of financial leasing , references to the secured creditor are to be understood as referring to the lessor, and references to the security provider as referring to the lessee; and
(e) in retention of ownership devices under contracts of consignment , references to the secured creditor are to be understood as referring to the supplier, and references to the security provider as referring to the consignee.

COMMENTS

A. Retention of ownership devices and rules on security rights

Paragraph (1) enunciates the general principle that the regime of retention of ownership devices, while partly autonomous, is in most respects identical with that for security rights. In the Sections and Chapters mentioned in paragraph (1), those rules that deviate from the corresponding rules for security rights, are set out explicitly. Retention of ownership devices are subject to the rules on security rights, unless otherwise provided. The main reason why in the area of secured credit for acquisition finance and similar transactions both possible approaches are recognised has already been pointed out in the Comment B to the preceding Article: the traditional concept of retention of ownership devices was upheld in order to accommodate concerns that most national insolvency, execution and enforcement regimes do not recognise for mere security rights securing acquisition finance a status equivalent to ownership.

Apart from these practically highly important issues, the legal construction of retention of ownership devices does not deviate in the result from the rules on ordinary secured transactions based on the proprietary security right, which commend themselves as a model regime for secured transactions. While the concept of mere security rights for acquisition finance, e.g., allows the use of the idea of priority itself as key for the solution of the competition between several proprietary security rights, the application of the traditional concept of a retention of ownership is more complicated: Primarily, the relationship vis-à-vis third parties asserting proprietary rights in the sold or leased assets is based upon the principle of nemo dat quod non habet, since the buyer or lessee is regarded as non-owner and cannot normally pass title to the encumbered assets to a third party.

In practice, the distinction between retention of ownership and a simple security right seems to be slightly weakened in the field of sales by the practice of many sellers to transfer ownership to the buyer at once, however under the suspensive condition of full payment of the purchase price. However, in effect that does not change the result. Since the suspensive condition is not met until full payment of the purchase price, the buyer does not obtain ownership until that payment has been effected. Even without the conditional transfer of ownership, the buyer has the same status since the buyer may dispose of the future right of ownership under the condition of full payment of the purchase price.

Instead of attempting to formulate on the level of common European principles specific rules on the legal construction of retention of ownership devices and on their relationship to competing proprietary rights, it was therefore preferred to formulate the solutions for these issues primarily with a view to mere security rights. Nevertheless, in line with the general functional approach of these rules retention of ownership devices are covered by most of the relevant rules as well; for details see the enumeration in paragraph (1). However, the focus of rules such as IX.–3:107 (Registration of acquisition finance devices) and IX–4:102 (Superpriority) paragraph (1) is more on the effects of these legal instruments than on their specific legal construction. It is ensured that retention of ownership devices achieve for all practical purposes in relation to priority and competing proprietary rights the same outcome as mere security rights for acquisition finance.

B. Specific remarks

It is not necessary to comment specifically on the enumeration in paragraph (1) of the generally applicable rules that apply also to retention of ownership devices. It merely deserves mention that even those Chapters and Sections which apply generally to retention of ownership devices may contain some special rules for these devices.

Paragraph (2) does not require comment; it contains merely a catalogue for adaptation of the key terms for those parts and individual rules on security rights that apply to retention of ownership devices. The adaptations mentioned in paragraph (2) are merely terminological.

IX.–1:105: Exclusions

(1) This Book does not apply to security rights for micro-credits, if and in so far as national legislation of the place where the security provider's business or residence is located contains specific protective rules for the security provider.

(2) The rules of an international Convention dealing with a subject-matter regulated in this Book and binding upon a member state are presumed to have for that member state precedence over the rules of this Book.

COMMENTS

Paragraph (1) deals with a novel economic and social phenomenon, namely a slowly developing new sector of socially inspired financing of non-professional, poor people willing to establish a small business or professional activity. A historical root is the traditional pawnshop which offers small loans, usually to a consumer, securing the loans by accepting small items as possessory pledges. Pawnbrokers are usually strictly regulated, both as to the terms of their loans and as to their dealings with the pledged goods.

Paragraph (1) gives preference to any specific mandatory provisions of a member state that claim application. In the case of cross border transactions, the law at the security provider's place of business or residence should prevail since it is this person who requires greatest protection. This implies that each member state is free to define the notion "micro-credit".

Paragraph (2) is intended to clarify that rules on a special topic of proprietary security which have been agreed upon in an international Convention should have for a member state that has ratified this Convention priority over the present rules. This rule aims at a specific international instrument, i.e. the UNIDROIT Convention on security rights in mobile equipment (Cape Town 2001) and its three protocols, dealing with aircrafts, railways and space objects, respectively. Especially, the protocol on security rights in aircrafts has already been ratified by several countries and may soon enter into force for these countries. It provides, inter alia, for an international register, which has already been instituted in Dublin. In order to avoid duplication and confusion, it appears preferable to give preference to the international regime over a competing European regime – at any rate for those states that have ratified the Convention.

Since some doubt has been expressed about a general priority of international Conventions over national law, this priority has been expressed in a rather cautious manner. A general rule along these lines may not be appropriate, since in the field of contract law relevant international Conventions usually allow the parties to contract out of the international regime (cf. CISG Article 6).

In specific cases, the general rule of paragraph (2) of this Article may perhaps be derogated from in favour of a specific policy or rule.

Section 2: Definitions

IX.–1:201: Definitions

(1) For the purposes of this Book the following definitions apply.

(2) An "accessory" is a corporeal asset that is or becomes closely connected with or part of a movable or an immovable, provided it is possible and economically reasonable to separate the accessory without damage from the movable or immovable.

(3) "Acquisition finance devices" cover:

(a) retention of ownership devices;

(b) where ownership of the sold assets has been transferred to the buyer, those security rights in the sold asset which secure the right:

(i) of the seller to payment of the purchase price for the encumbered asset under a contract of sale;

(ii) of a lender to repayment of a loan granted to the buyer for payment of the purchase price for the encumbered asset, if and in so far as this payment is actually made to the seller; and

(c) rights of third persons to whom any of the rights under sub-paragraph (a) or (b) has been transferred as security for a credit covered by sub-paragraph (a) or (b).

(4) A "contract for proprietary security" is a contract under which:

(a) a security provider undertakes to grant a security right to the secured creditor;

(b) a secured creditor is entitled to retain a security right when transferring ownership to the transferee who is regarded as security provider; or

(c) a seller, lessor or other supplier of assets is entitled to retain ownership of the supplied assets in order to secure its rights to performance.

(5) "Default" means:

(a) any non-performance by the debtor of the obligation covered by the security; and

(b) any other event or set of circumstances agreed by the secured creditor and the security provider as entitling the secured creditor to have recourse to the security.

(6) "Financial assets" are financial instruments and rights to the payment of money.

(7) "Financial instruments" are:

(a) share certificates and equivalent securities as well as bonds and equivalent debt instruments, if these are negotiable;

(b) any other securities which are dealt in and which give the right to acquire any such financial instruments or which give rise to cash settlements, except instruments of payment;

(c) share rights in collective investment undertakings;

(d) money market instruments; and

(e) rights in or relating to the instruments covered by sub-paragraph (a) to (d).

(8) "Intangibles" means incorporeal assets and includes uncertificated and indirectly held securities and the undivided share of a co-owner in corporeal assets or in a bulk or a fund.

(9) "Ownership" for the purposes of these rules covers ownership in movable corporeal assets and of intangible assets.

(10) A "possessory security right" is a security right that requires possession of the encumbered corporeal asset by the secured creditor or another person (except the debtor) holding for the secured creditor.

(11) "Proceeds" is every value derived from an encumbered asset, such as:

(a) value realised by sale or other disposition or by collection;
(b) damages or insurance payments in respect of defects, damage or loss;
(c) civil and natural fruits, including distributions; and
(d) proceeds of proceeds.

(12) The "secured creditor" may be the creditor of the secured right or a third person who may hold the security right in that person's own name for the creditor, especially as a trustee.

(13) The "security provider" may be the debtor of the obligation to be covered by the security right or a third person.

COMMENTS

Paragraph (2): accessory. The term "accessory" is not generally used in English legal terminology; an equivalent, frequently used, term is trade fixture. Standard examples are the engines of a motor-car, an aeroplane or a ship or the heating equipment of a house – provided they can relatively easily be removed (as may be necessary for repair or inspection) without damage to the vehicles or the building. Both the accessory and the vehicle or the building must not suffer damage which it would be uneconomical to avoid or to repair. The definition of accessory draws the line between two corporeal assets, especially where one thing is attached to another thing. As long as a thing is merely an accessory to a main thing, the accessory is legally separate from the main thing to which it is attached: the rights existing in or burdening the main thing do not extend to the accessory, and vice versa.

Paragraph (3): acquisition finance devices. As was explained in Comment A on IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership devices: scope), for general economic reasons, security for acquisition finance deserves special legal protection. This privileged position is not limited to retention of ownership devices. Rather, all legal forms of such security must be treated alike since all of them perform the same economic function; the specific legal method or construction used is irrelevant.

Paragraph (3) deals in essence with five different cases of security for acquisition finance. The first case covers retention of ownership devices. The second case is where, on transferring ownership in the sold goods to the buyer, the seller retains a (mere) security right (paragraph (3)(b)(i), first alternative). The third and fourth cases are where after ownership in the sold goods has been transferred to the buyer, the latter grants a security right in the sold goods either to the seller (paragraph (3)(b)(i), second alternative) or to a third party financer (paragraph (3)(b)(ii)), provided the borrowed money is used by the buyer for payment of the purchase price. The fifth case is where a third party financer in the first to the third cases grants a loan to the seller in the first and the second case for refinancing the seller's or the buyer's credit, respectively. The third party is subrogated to:

in the first case, the seller's retained ownership;
in the second case (first alternative), the seller's retained security right; in the third case, to the security right granted by the buyer, if and in so far as the credit is used to pay the purchase price to the seller.

If the third party financer refinances itself from a fourth party, the latter is subrogated to the rights acquired by the third party, provided the credit is actually used for payment of the credited purchase price. It is irrelevant for this subrogation, whether the third party's acquired right is the ownership in the sold goods or a mere security right.

Paragraph (4): "contract for proprietary security". In general, security rights covered by these rules are based upon a contract. This security contract usually is part of a broader instrument, especially of a credit contract in which both the terms of the credit to be secured and the terms of the pertinent security right are regulated. Even if the security contract is a separate contract, it has as such no proprietary effect and is open to party autonomy: the parties are free to fix all the details of the proprietary security right to be created.

At this point, the distinction between the two basic kinds of security becomes relevant and is reflected in the different sub-paragraphs of paragraph (4).

Sub-paragraph (a) describes a security provider's obligation to grant a proprietary security right. This is mentioned first since it describes the case most frequently occurring in practice.

By contrast, sub-paragraph (b) deals with a relatively rare situation which factually, but not legally, is close to that also regulated in sub-paragraph (c). The owner of assets who sells these on credit, may secure the credit, i.e. the purchase price, by retaining either a security right (sub-paragraph (b)) or ownership (sub-paragraph (c)) by a retention of ownership device. The retention of a mere security right is rare, but is possible, especially if an economically strong buyer insists on this in order to have a stronger legal position.

Finally, sub-paragraph (c) describes the standard situation of all retention of ownership devices: the seller, hire-purchaser, financial lessor or consignor retains full ownership of assets, possession of which is transferred to the buyer, hirer, lessee or consignee.

The parties to a contract for the creation of a security right are usually the creditor of the right to be secured and the debtor of the corresponding obligation. However, since a security right need not be provided by the debtor, the security provider may also be a third person. In the case of retention of ownership devices, the parties are the owner of the asset to be sold, leased etc. and the buyer or lessee. In both cases, a third party financer may take part from the beginning or may intervene later (see under "security provider", below).

Paragraph (5): "default". Paragraph (5)(a) declares in essence that "default" is a case of non-performance of the obligation covered by the security right. Some of the reasons for distinguishing between non-performance and default are the following. Most importantly, "default" is the current term used by all professionals in the credit market. In addition, there is a peculiar feature frequently used in practice: by a so-called cross-default clause in the credit agreement, the parties frequently agree that a default occurring under another credit contract also constitutes default under the present credit agreement. While in essence there is no difference between default and non-performance, the term "default" is so deeply ingrained in English and therefore in international practice, that any departure from this terminology would create bewilderment or even confusion.

Paragraph (6): "financial assets". This definition of "financial assets" corresponds in substance to Article 2 paragraph (1)(e) of the EU-Directive on financial collateral arrangements of 2002 (FCD). The first part of the definition, i.e. "financial instruments", is further defined in paragraph (7); the second part on the right to the payment of money does not require comment, except that security rights in cash are expressly excluded (FCD Article 2 paragraph (1)(e) and explicitly Consideration 18 in fine).

Paragraph (7): "financial instruments". This corresponds to the definition in Article 2 paragraph (1)(e) of the FCD.

Paragraph (8): "intangibles". "Intangibles" (or incorporeals) are all assets that are not "corporeals". A right to the payment of money as such is an intangible. The same is true for uncertificated securities, i.e. securities that are not incorporated into negotiable instruments . Indirectly held securities are instruments held by a bank or another intermediary and represented by book entries.

Paragraph (9): "ownership". This takes a practical approach in order to facilitate the use of one term for designating the most comprehensive right a person can have over both corporeal and incorporeal assets. This corresponds to the approach taken elsewhere in the DCFR, cf. the combined definitions of "Ownership" and "Property" in the Annex of definitions. However, immovable property is in principle excluded from the present rules; it may be affected only marginally, e.g. by rules on accessories.

Paragraph (10): "possessory security right". This defines the traditional possessory security right, the pledge, which for economic reasons plays in contemporary practice only a secondary role; however, it is still an important element of security practice. Note that the secured creditor (or a third person holding for the secured creditor) is not merely entitled to hold the encumbered assets, but is required to do so. The secured creditor's security right is only effective vis-à-vis third persons if and as long as the secured creditor preserves (direct or indirect) possession of the encumbered asset (IX.–3:102 (Methods of achieving effectiveness) paragraph (2) lit. (a)).

Paragraph (11): "proceeds". For purposes of illustration, the following examples may be given.

Sub-paragraph (a). The right to payment of the sales price is a primary example of the first item; the right to rental income from leasing out a corporeal asset is an example of the second item; and money received in cash or credited to a bank account exemplifies the third item;.

Sub-paragraph (b). If an encumbered corporeal asset is damaged, defective or is lost due to acts or omissions for which a person other than the owner is responsible, the latter's claims are (involuntary) "proceeds"; since such kinds of damage diminish the secured creditor's economic position, it is justified to extend the security right to these proceeds. The same is true for insurance proceeds that may arise on the basis of such events. It may be added that such proceeds, since their object is a liquid monetary asset rather than rights for damage as under the preceding heads, are economically more valuable.

Sub-paragraph (c). While natural fruits are a clear category, civil fruits are a somewhat artificial transposition of the "natural" idea to a modern economic category. Interest on rights to payment such as a loan or a bank account are obvious examples. Distributions arise if assets are sold, e.g. company assets upon the (partial or complete) dissolution of a company.

Sub-paragraph (d). It is consistent to extend the term "proceeds" to "proceeds from proceeds" since the latter share the qualification of the former.

Paragraph (12): "secured creditor". The "secured creditor" as the holder of the security right does not require any explanation. The typical example of a third person holding a security right in its own name for the secured creditors is the trustee of bondholders. Very frequently the number of bondholders is very great, and, if the bonds have been issued to the public, may also be subject to frequent change. Since it is not practical to act in the names of all those who hold bonds at a specific point of time, the issuers of publicly traded bonds generally appoint a trustee who can act for all those who are bondholders at any point in time.

Paragraph (13): "security provider". Normally it is the debtor who, by encumbering one or more of its assets, provides proprietary security to the creditor. However, this need not be so. Not infrequently, the debtor is unable to furnish the security demanded by the creditor. If this occurs, a third person may be asked by the debtor to assist by providing the security demanded by the creditor. The third person security provider may be a relative, friend or colleague of the debtor. However, the third person may also be a business, especially a bank or other financial institution, or even the debtor's employer. The identity of the third person will usually require the creditor's consent. Whether the service of supplying a security for the debtor to the creditor is rendered gratuitously (as frequently occurs among relatives or friends) or for a fee (especially by a bank or an insurer), is a matter of the internal relationship between debtor and security provider and is irrelevant to the proprietary aspects.

CHAPTER 2: CREATION AND COVERAGE

Section 1: Creation of security rights

Subsection 1: General provisions

IX.–2:101: Methods of creation of security rights

A security right in a movable asset may be created:

(a) by the security provider granting the security right to the secured creditor;
(b) by the secured creditor retaining the security right when transferring ownership of the asset to the security provider ; or
(c) by the secured creditor relying on a right of retention of possession .

COMMENTS

A. Creation and third party effectiveness

The rules on proprietary security in movables are based upon the fundamental distinction between the creation of a security right or a retention of ownership device and its effectiveness as against third parties in general (i.e. the third parties enumerated in IX.–3:101 (Effectiveness as against third persons) paragraph (1)).

The rules on creation contained in Chapter 2 cover only the requirements that have to be met as between the two immediately involved parties, i.e. the security provider and the secured creditor (for the parties to a contract for proprietary security providing for a retention of ownership device, see IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership devices: scope) paragraph (2)). No additional conditions have to be fulfilled in order to give the secured creditor a legal position which in the event of default allows the satisfaction of the secured right from the encumbered assets, as long as no third persons enumerated in IX.–3:101 (Effectiveness as against third persons) paragraph (1) are involved.

Against these third persons, the security right or retention of ownership device is effective only if the additional criteria set out in Chapter 3 are fulfilled. Technically, the requirements under Chapter 3 (in general: possession, control or registration) are distinct from those for the creation of the security right or retention of ownership device under Chapter 2. They are more directed at the outside world than at the relationship between secured creditor and security provider. In fact, however, very often creation and third party effectiveness are achieved contemporaneously.

B. Proper role and effects of creation

Traditionally, proprietary rights – as distinct from contractual rights or rights corresponding to non-contractual obligations (such as non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another (Book VI) or the obligation to reverse an unjustified enrichment (Book VII)) – are thought to be limited to rights that are effective against third persons in general (more poetically, against all the world). If one proceeds from this assumption, it may not be entirely certain, whether the creation of a security device according to the rules of this Chapter should be regarded as giving rise to a proprietary right in this traditional sense, if the conditions for effectiveness against third persons in general as set out in Chapter 3 are not fulfilled. A consequence of this logic could be that rules on creation, strictly speaking, should not be covered in this Book, but should form part of the rules on contractual relationships.

That, however, would be too narrow a view. The general approach of this Book is that even if only the requirements of this Chapter are fulfilled, but not the requirements of Chapter 3, there is already a valid proprietary right which is not only a contractual relationship between secured creditor and security provider. As opposed to the traditional approach, the concept of a proprietary right is no longer restricted to rights that are effective against every third person; for proprietary security, there is instead a distinction between proprietary rights that are effective against secured creditor and security provider and some third persons and proprietary rights that are effective against third persons in general.

This general approach is reflected by the fact that even a security right or retention of ownership device which only fulfils the requirements of Chapter 2 but not those of Chapter 3 has effects under these rules which go beyond the scope of a merely contractual position. One example is that some types of proprietary security are exempted from any specific requirements under Chapter 3 (see, e.g., the security rights mentioned in IX.–3:101 (Effectiveness as against third persons) paragraph (2) or acquisition finance devices in assets supplied to a consumer, IX.–3:107 (Registration of acquisition finance devices)). Also that a person who acquires ownership of the encumbered assets assumes the position of a security provider vis-à-vis the secured creditor (provided there is not exceptionally a good faith acquisition free from the earlier security right or retention of ownership device) shows that the fulfilment of the requirements of Chapter 2 already gives rise to a proprietary right. A third example is the relationship between several holders of security rights or retention of ownership devices none of which is effective according to Chapter 3. Their proprietary rights are regarded as effective against each other, the one created earlier enjoys priority, i.e. ranks better (IX.–4:101 (Priority: general rules) paragraph (4)). A last example, which is not specifically dealt with in these rules, is the relationship to third persons such as persons accountable under Book VI. The holder of a retention of ownership device can claim damages from a third person for damage done to the supplied assets; this right to payment of damages should not depend upon registration or other requirements, if necessary, for the retention of ownership device under Chapter 3.

C. Survey of contents of Chapter 2

Apart from the last provision of this Chapter, all the others deal with creation. While Section 1 covers the creation of security rights, Section 2 deals with the other major type of security devices under this Book, i.e. retention of ownership devices. Section 3 contains rules on specific assets that can be encumbered (or that may be subject to a retention of ownership device) and covers also the issue whether and how security rights are created in new goods arising from the production, combination and commingling of encumbered assets; the final Section 4 consisting of a single Article determines the obligations that are covered by a security right.

D. General and specific provisions on creation of security rights

Section 1 of Chapter 2 is sub-divided into four Subsections. While this first Subsection contains general provisions that apply to the creation of security rights in general, Subsections 2 to 4 cover specific requirements and issues that are peculiar to the different methods of creation of security rights.

In addition to the issues dealt with in this Section, Section 3 deals with the creation of security rights in specific assets, for which some adaptations of the normal rules on the creation of security rights in Section 1 are necessary.

E. Methods of creation of security rights

This Article enumerates the three methods for the creation of security rights within the context of this Book

Creation of security right by granting (sub-paragraph (a)): This method of creation of a security right, which is dealt with in more detail in Subsection 2, can be regarded as the classical method by which a security right is created. The secured creditor, who did not have any rights in the collateral before, obtains a proprietary security in the encumbered asset from the security provider.

Creation of security right by retention (sub-paragraph (b)): Where a security right is created by retention, the secured creditor already owns the assets to be encumbered. These assets are both transferred to the other party to the transaction (who is to be regarded as a security provider not because of a granting of a security right, but because of the acceptance of encumbered ownership only) and serve as security for the secured creditor. Instead of transferring ownership to the security provider and then being granted a security right from the latter in two separate transactions, the secured creditor can under these rules simply transfer ownership to the security provider and at the same time retain a security right in the transferred assets, so that the security provider acquires only encumbered rights in the assets (see Subsection 3). While under a retention of ownership device it is the retained ownership itself which serves as a security device, here it is the newly created security right as a limited proprietary right only which the secured creditor retains under the method of sub-paragraph (b); the security provider becomes owner of the encumbered assets, while under a retention of ownership device the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee would not obtain more than conditional ownership, if any.

Right of retention of possession as basis for security right (sub-paragraph (c)): The third method of creation of a security right applies where the secured creditor is entitled to retain possession of an asset; this right of retention of possession is regarded as a security right under this Book (see Subsection 4, IX.–2:114 (Right of retention of possession)).

F. Transfers of ownership for security purposes

Even though this type of transaction is not expressly mentioned in this Chapter, transfers of ownership for security purposes also give rise to a security right in favour of the transferee (see IX.–1:102 (Security right in movable asset) paragraph (3)). Since the transferee, i.e. the secured creditor, did not hold any proprietary rights in the assets to be encumbered before the purported transfer of ownership, these transactions constitute a case of creation of a security right by granting; therefore, a security right is created on the basis of such an agreement to transfer ownership only if the other requirements for this method of creation of a security right under Subsection 1 and Subsection 2 are fulfilled; for specific assets, also the rules in Section 3 have to be applied.

G. Retention of ownership devices

The creation of retention of ownership devices, on the other hand, is dealt with separately in Section 2. The only provision of Section 1 that is (partly) applicable to retention of ownership devices is IX.–2:104 (Specific issues of transferability, existence and specification) (see IX.–1:104 (Retention of ownership devices: applicable rules) paragraph (1)(a)).

IX.–2:102: Requirements for creation of security rights in general

The creation of a security right in a movable asset requires that:

(a) the asset exists;
(b) the asset is transferable;
(c) the secured right exists; and
(d) the additional requirements for the creation of a security right by granting, by retention or on the basis of a right of retention of possession are fulfilled.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article covers general requirements which have to be fulfilled whenever a security right is to be created according to the rules of this Chapter, regardless of the method of creation. Additional requirements are contained in the three Subsections covering the individual methods of creation; Section 3 deals with some further issues arising in relation to the creation of security rights in specific types of assets.

B. Existence of asset

Sub-paragraph (a) provides that a security right can only be created in an asset which exists. This is obviously a general principle of property law whose application is self-understood. Since there is – as yet – no general Book on property law within the Principles of European Law, it needs to be stated here; similar provisions can also be found in other Books on specific matters of property law, cf. VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(a).

The rule in sub-paragraph (a) is not to be misunderstood as preventing an agreement to create a security right in an asset which does not yet exist from being effective at all. As is clarified by IX.–2:103 (Possessory and non-possessory security rights) paragraph (3), the agreement may not have any proprietary effects as long as the asset concerned does not exist; however, a security right is created as soon as the asset to be encumbered comes into existence.

It should be emphasised that this delayed creation of the security right does not necessarily affect its priority. If the security right is made effective by registration, it is the time of registration which determines the priority of this security right (see IX.–4:101 (Priority: general rules) paragraph (2)(a)); this time of registration may well precede the actual creation of the security right.

C. Transferability of asset

According to sub-paragraph (b) a security right can only be created in an asset which is transferable, i.e. ownership of which can be transferred. The reason is obvious. Without such transferability, there would be in general hardly any possibility for enforcement of a security right in this asset (apart from the possibility of collecting income). Some specifications of the requirement of transferability of the asset are contained in IX.–2:104 (Specific issues of transferability, existence and specification) paragraphs (1) to (3), see the Comments on that provision.

D. Existence of secured right

Since security rights in movables under this Book are dependent security rights only, the existence of a secured right is another general requirement for the creation of security rights enumerated in this Article (see sub-paragraph (c)).

As with the creation of security rights in future assets, the parties may agree on the creation of security rights as security for rights which are not yet in existence (or which are only conditional); IX.–2:104 (Specific issues of transferability, existence and specification) paragraph (5) provides that such security rights are created at the time the rights to be secured come into existence or become unconditional.

E. Additional requirements of the different methods of creation

Sub-paragraph (d) provides that a security right can only be created if the additional requirements for the creation of a security right by granting (Subsection 2), by retention (Subsection 3) or on the basis of a right of retention of possession (Subsection 4) are fulfilled. The content of these requirements depends upon the different methods of creation. While under Subsections 2 and 3 there are different requirements concerning the agreements between the parties, the creation of a security right on the basis of a right of retention of possession only depends upon the additional requirement of the secured creditor being entitled to the retention of possession of an asset as security (IX.–2:114 (Right of retention of possession)).

IX.–2:103: Possessory and non-possessory security rights

Unless otherwise agreed by the parties, the creation of a security right by contract does not require possession of the encumbered asset by the secured creditor.

COMMENTS

This Article serves clarification purposes. While historically national regimes of proprietary security in movables tended to recognise security rights as valid proprietary rights only if the secured creditor was in possession of the encumbered assets (possessory pledge), these rules adopt the contrary approach: Non-possessory security allows the security provider to continue to use the collateral even after creation of a security right (see also IX.–5:202 (Rights in general) and the Comments on that provision under A). In commercial practice, it is therefore only non-possessory security which allows the encumbrance of machines required for production by the security provider or of merchandise (inventory) to be sold by shop-owners or other merchants. In the context of the rules on effectiveness as against third parties in Chapter 3, this position is confirmed by the existence of three alternative methods of achieving effectiveness, especially of the possibility of registration of security rights.

Even though the creation of security rights which are based upon a contract for proprietary security does not in general depend upon possession of the encumbered asset by the secured creditor, the parties are of course free to agree otherwise. Where the parties have so agreed, no proprietary right is created as long as the secured creditor does not hold possession of the collateral.

The scope of application of this Article is limited to security rights created by contract. For ex lege security rights within the scope of this Book (such as the right of retention of possession if this right arises by law) it would not appear to be appropriate to dispense with any requirement of possession by the secured creditor. These ex lege security rights are still typically regarded as being dependent upon possession by the secured creditor (notable exceptions are the proprietary security rights according to VIII.–5:101 (Party autonomy and relation to other provisions) paragraph (4)); this position should not generally be reversed by these rules on contractual proprietary security rights.

IX.–2:104: Specific issues of transferability, existence and specification

(1) A security right can be created in a right to performance other than a right to the payment of money, even if this right is not transferable, provided that it can be transformed into a right to the payment of money.

(2) A security right can be created in an asset, even if its owner had agreed not to transfer or to encumber the asset. This rule applies also to a right to performance, whether contractual or not, unless it is non-assignable by virtue of III.–5:109 (Assignability: rights personal to the creditor) paragraph (1)).

(3) If the parties purport to create a security right in a future, generic or untransferable asset, the security right arises only if and when the asset comes into existence, is specified or becomes transferable. Paragraph (2) remains unaffected.

(4) Paragraph (3) sentence 1 applies with appropriate adaptations to the creation of security rights in a conditional right, including the rights covered by that paragraph. A security right may be created in a present conditional right, especially in the right of a transferee under a conditional transfer of ownership.

(5) Paragraph (3) sentence 1 applies with appropriate adaptations to the creation of security rights for secured rights which are future or only conditional.

COMMENTS

A. Transferability of asset to be encumbered

Paragraphs (1) to (3) deal with specific issues of the transferability of the asset in which a security right is to be created and qualify the general requirement that security rights may only be created in assets that are transferable.

Paragraph (1) allows the creation of security rights even in such rights to performance other than for payment of money which are not transferable, provided that these rights can be transformed into a right to payment of money. An example of the transformation of a non-monetary obligation into a monetary one would be an obligation arising from a promise of non-competition, if a non-performance of this obligation is sanctioned by a stipulated payment for non-performance (provided the agreement is valid). Even in the absence of an agreed monetary sanction, a right to payment of damages for non-performance would qualify.

According to paragraph (2) a right is transferable even if the owner or holder of the right had agreed with a third person not to transfer or to encumber the asset. An example is a negative pledge clause which the owner or holder of the right may have established with a creditor in order to assure the latter that no other secured creditor can intervene by obtaining a security right in the asset concerned. Even though the owner may become liable towards the creditor for non-performance of the obligation, such a negative pledge clause does not prevent the creation of a security right, i.e. a secured creditor may obtain a proprietary right even if the security provider had promised to another creditor not to create such an encumbrance. By contrast, if the non-transferability does not follow from an agreement, but is provided by law, a security right cannot be created in the asset concerned; for such cases there is no exception from the general rule laid down in IX.–2:102 (Requirements for creation of security rights in general) sub-paragraph (b). These rules also apply to rights to performance. An agreement that these rights cannot be transferred does not prevent the creditor from creating a security right in such a right, unless the right is of a highly personal character (see the exception at the end of sentence 2 of paragraph (2)).

Finally, paragraph (3) provides that where the parties agree on the creation of a security right in an asset which at the time of the contract for proprietary security is not yet transferable, a security right arises in this asset once the asset becomes transferable. This rule does not affect the ineffectiveness of agreed prohibitions of transfers of the assets under paragraph (2) (see paragraph (3) sentence 2).

B. Existence of asset to be encumbered

Issues of the existence of the asset to be encumbered (see the general requirement in IX.–2:102 (Requirements for creation of security rights in general) sub-paragraph (a)) are dealt with in paragraphs (3) and (4) of the present Article. While paragraph (3) provides that a contract for proprietary security in which the parties purport to create a security right in an asset which is not yet in existence at the time of the agreement, gives rise to a valid security right as soon as the asset concerned comes into existence, paragraph (4) deals with the creation of a security right where the rights of the security provider are only conditional.

Paragraph (4) sentence 1 makes paragraph (3) applicable also to the creation of a security right in a conditional right. If, e.g., the security provider holds as against a third party debtor a right to performance which is conditional only, an encumbrance granted to a secured creditor arises in this right only if it becomes unconditional, i.e. if the event occurs or any other condition is fulfilled upon which the existence of this right to performance depends. These principles also apply to the creation of a security right in a conditional right which is future, generic or non-transferable (see the second half-sentence of paragraph (4) sentence 1). The security right arises if the right becomes unconditional and is also no longer future, generic or non-transferable.

Paragraph (4) sentence 2, however, qualifies the rule in sentence 1. While in general a security right can only arise if the rights to be encumbered are unconditional, a security right may be created in a present conditional right. In some situations, a transfer which is subject to a suspensive condition creates a conditional right of ownership which is existent even before fulfilment of this condition. If, e.g., ownership is transferred subject to the payment of the purchase price, the transferee does not immediately acquire ownership, but obtains a present conditional right (or contingent right, see VIII.–2:307 (Use of encumbered goods for production or combination). This present conditional right may even be encumbered. However, if the condition is not fulfilled and especially if the seller terminates the contractual relationship with the buyer because the purchase price is not paid, the conditional right of the transferee is extinguished and so are any encumbrances created by the transferee.

C. Specification of asset to be encumbered

The rule in paragraph (3) sentence 1 applies also to the specification of the asset to be encumbered. This general requirement for the creation of a proprietary right on the basis of a party agreement is established in IX.–2:105 (Requirements for granting of security right) sub-paragraph (a) (see the Comment B on that Article); in the case of a retention of a security right it follows indirectly from IX.–2:113 (Requirements for retention of security right) sub-paragraph (b): The transfer of ownership of the asset in which a security right is to be retained requires specification of this asset, see VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (3) sentence 1. If the parties purport to create a security right in an asset of the security provider without identifying this asset in the contract for proprietary security, a security right arises only if the asset is subsequently specified. For the creation of a security right in an asset which forms part of a bulk at the moment the security right is to be created, IX.–2:112 (General matters of property law) refers to VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) and VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk).

D. Existence of secured right

While IX.–2:102 (Requirements for creation of security rights in general) sub-paragraph (c) provides that no security right can be created if there is no secured right, the present Article paragraph (5) read with paragraph (3) sentence 1 qualifies this rule by stating that an agreement purporting to create a security right for a secured right which at the time of the agreement is only future or conditional gives rise to a security right as soon as the secured right becomes present or unconditional.

Such a delayed creation does not necessarily affect the order of priority. If the security right is registered, it is the time of registration which is decisive, not the time of creation (IX.–4:101 (Priority: general rules) paragraph (2)(a)).

Subsection 2: Granting of security right

IX.–2:105: Requirements for granting of security right

In addition to the requirements under Subsection 1, the creation of a security right in a movable asset by granting requires that:

(a) the asset to be encumbered is specified by the parties;
(b) the security provider has the right or authority to grant a security right in the asset;
(c) the secured creditor is entitled as against the security provider to the granting of a security right on the basis of the contract for proprietary security; and
(d) the secured creditor and the security provider agree on the granting of a security right to the secured creditor.

COMMENTS

A. General

The general concept of the granting of a security right as the classical method of creation of such an encumbrance has already been described. On the basis of an agreement with the security provider (the contract for proprietary security), the secured creditor obtains a security right as limited proprietary right in the asset ownership of which does not pass to the secured creditor.

In addition to the requirements for the creation of such a security right under this Article, the general requirements that apply for the creation of a security right regardless of the method of creation according to IX.–2:102 (Requirements for creation of security rights in general) must be fulfilled; for the creation of security rights in special types of assets, there are also further specific provisions in Section 3 of this Chapter 2.

B. Specification of asset to be encumbered – sub-paragraph (a)

The requirement that the asset to be encumbered must be specified by the parties (sub-paragraph (a)) expresses a general principle of property law. Unlike rights that are of an obligatory nature only, proprietary rights must refer to specific assets. Parties cannot create proprietary rights or dispose of such rights if it is not specified which rights in which assets are meant. This specification does not necessarily have to follow from the content of the contract for proprietary security alone, the assets to be encumbered may also be specified at a later stage. A similar principle is laid down in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (3) sentence 1.If generic assets in which security rights are to be created are specified only after the conclusion of the contract for proprietary security, the security right arises as soon as the assets are specified (see IX.–2:104 (Specific issues of transferability, existence and specification) paragraph (3) sentence 1).

A special situation concerning the specification of collateral is dealt with by IX.–2:112 (General matters of property law) which refers to VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) and VIII.–2:306 (Delivery out of the bulk). Where security rights are to be created in a specified quantity of assets of a bulk without specific assets out of the bulk being identified, the transaction is not wholly ineffective. Even though the security rights cannot be created in specific assets out of the bulk since there is no specification, a security right arises in an undivided share of the bulk (for the calculation of this share see VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) paragraph (3)).

C. Security provider's right or authority to grant security right – sub-paragraph (b)

Sub-paragraph (b) of the Article expresses a general principle of law and applies it to security rights. Generally, no person can dispose of a right, i.e. especially transfer, release or encumber this right, unless that person has the right or authority to do so (nemo dat quod non habet, see the equivalent requirements in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(c) and, for assignment, III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (1)(d)).

Such a right or authority may derive, in the first place, from law. In particular the owner of an asset that is to be encumbered may generally freely dispose of this asset. Exceptionally, however, even the owner's authority to dispose of assets may be restricted, most notably where the owner is insolvent.

On the other hand, a person other than the owner may be entitled to encumber an asset, provided authority to do so has been conferred on this person. Such an authority may arise by law (e.g., in the case of the insolvency administrator) or may be granted by the actual owner.

Where the security provider acts without authority, a security right may nevertheless be created on the basis of IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) and IX.–2:111 (Security right in cash, negotiable instruments and documents) i.e. the provisions on good faith acquisition of a security right.

Assets subject to a security device. Some specific issues arise concerning the right or authority to create a security right in an asset which is already subject to a security device. These issues are dealt with in the following paragraphs.

Security provider not prevented from creating additional encumbrances. The fact that an asset is already encumbered by a security right does not affect the security provider's authority to create an additional encumbrance that is subject to the earlier right. Generally, several competing security rights may exist in the same asset; the relationship between them is determined according to the rules on priority contained in Chapter 4. The security provider is normally not, however, entitled to grant another security right in disregard of the earlier encumbrance. Whether the second secured creditor may nevertheless acquire a security right free from an earlier security right is decided by IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset).

Secured creditor in general not entitled to create additional encumbrances. The secured creditor, on the other hand, is generally not entitled to create additional encumbrances in the collateral. A secured creditor to whom a security right (i.e. a limited proprietary right as defined in IX.–1:102 (Security right in movable asset) paragraph (1)) in a certain asset has been granted may not by virtue of this proprietary right create an additional encumbrance in the same asset, even if of a lower rank. Otherwise the security provider, who has granted a security right in assets as security for a certain secured right, would incur the risk that those assets might additionally be held liable also for the performance of another obligation. Instead of creating an additional security right in the encumbered asset, the secured creditor may, however, indirectly use the proprietary rights as collateral by encumbering the secured right in favour of creditors. On the basis of IX.–2:301 (Encumbrance of right to payment of money) sub-paragraph (c), a security right in a right to payment entitles the secured creditor to exercise also any security rights securing performance of this right to payment.

Creation of security right in asset subject to retention of ownership devices. With respect to the creation of security rights in assets which are subject to retention of ownership devices, several different constellations have to be distinguished.

(i) Generally, the buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee does not acquire ownership and is therefore not entitled by law to dispose of the asset concerned. That the holder of the retention of ownership device had authorised the buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee to encumber the former's retained ownership, will be a rather unusual case.

However, there may be situations, especially for a buyer under a retention of ownership agreement, where a present conditional right in the asset is acquired. While the buyer is not authorised to encumber the retained ownership of the holder of the retention of ownership device, the buyer may as holder of this present conditional right encumber this right in favour of a creditor. This is expressly permitted by IX.–2:104 (Specific issues of transferability, existence and specification) paragraph (4) sentence 2. If the buyer pays the purchase price, the buyer's secured creditors then automatically acquire a security right in the buyer's (no longer only conditional) ownership of the supplied assets. If, however, the holder of the retention of ownership device exercises the rights under Chapter 7, any rights created by the buyer in favour of third parties are lost (IX.–7:301 (Consequences of default under retention of ownership devices) paragraph (2)).

Even if there is no present conditional right for the buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee under the transaction concerned, a security right in the assets which are still owned by the holder of the retention of ownership device may be validly created by the buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee if these persons subsequently acquire ownership of the supplied assets. This is a case where the requirement of IX.–2:105 (Requirements for granting of security right) sub-paragraph (b) is fulfilled only after the conclusion of the contract for proprietary security; the security right is created as soon as the buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee obtains ownership in the supplied asset and is therefore authorised to grant a security right (see IX.–2:106 (Time when security right is created by granting)).

(ii) The holder of a retention of ownership device, i.e. the seller, supplier or lessor, is still the owner of the supplied assets. Even though this may be a non-performance of obligations under the underlying contract of sale, hire-purchase, consignment or lease, the holder of a retention of ownership device therefore has the authority to grant a security right in the supplied assets.

D. Secured creditor's entitlement to security right – sub-paragraph (c)

In sub-paragraph (c) it is provided that a security right can only be created if the secured creditor is entitled as against the security provider to the granting of a security right on the basis of the contract for proprietary security. This provision corresponds to the general position of the DCFR concerning the transfer or creation of proprietary rights which is most prominently expressed in VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) (for the transfer of ownership in goods) and III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (1)(d) (for the assignment of rights). The DCFR follows a causal approach; as opposed to legal systems governed by the principle of abstraction, the existence of the obligatory right to obtain the proprietary right concerned, i.e. the causa, is indispensable for the proprietary right to be transferred or created.

Even though the creation of a security right follows a causal approach (see under D above), there is still a need to distinguish between the contract for proprietary security and the act of granting a security itself. The same differentiation is expressed in III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (1)(d) and (e) in relation to the assignment of rights. The causal approach does not necessarily negate any distinction between, on the one hand, the contract which entitles the transferee to obtain the proprietary right and, on the other hand, the agreement by virtue of which the transferee actually obtains this proprietary position, even though this agreement may be effective only if there is a valid causa.

Obviously, however, this theoretical distinction need not be reflected in the separation of the contract for proprietary security and the agreement on granting a security right in practice. While it is possible that the parties in the contract for proprietary security only agree on the secured creditor's entitlement to a security right, which is created only at a later stage, both agreements may be contained in a single transaction. A similar principle is expressly spelled out in the context of the assignment of rights in III.–5:104 (Basic requirements) paragraph (3).

Sub-paragraph (d) differs to some extent from VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1)(e) which contains the element of delivery as an alternative to an agreement which determines when ownership is to pass. Delivery could be an appropriate criterion only in the context of creating possessory security rights, whereas these rules are intended to promote the use of non-possessory security rights where there is no delivery or equivalent to delivery according to VIII.–2:104 (Delivery) and VIII.–2:105 (Equivalents to delivery). Nevertheless, an actual delivery of the assets to be encumbered may serve as prima facie evidence of the fact that the parties have not only agreed on the conclusion of a contract for proprietary security, but also have actually agreed on the granting of the security right itself.

IX.–2:106: Time when security right is created by granting

Subject to IX.–2:110 (Delayed creation), the security right is created by granting at the time when the requirements set out in the preceding Article are fulfilled, unless the parties have agreed on another time of creation.

COMMENTS

The general idea underlying this Article is that a security right can only be created if all the requirements set out in the preceding Article are fulfilled (including the requirements under Subsection 1, especially IX.–2:102 (Requirements for creation of security rights in general), to which the preceding Article refers). It is not necessary, however, that this must be the case already at the time the contract for proprietary security is concluded. If one or several requirements are fulfilled only at a later point of time, the transaction is not wholly ineffective; instead, the security right is created at the time when the missing requirements are fulfilled. For the requirements set out in Subsection 1, a similar rule is laid down in IX.–2:104 (Specific issues of transferability, existence and specification) paragraph (3).

The reference to IX.–2:110 (Delayed creation) covers the granting of security rights which are subject to the additional requirements set out in IX.–2:107 (Granting of security right by consumer) or to the alternative requirements set out in IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) (where the security provider does not have the right or authority to grant a security right, so that the requirements of IX.–2:105 (Requirements for granting of security right) sub-paragraph (b) are not even subsequently fulfilled). In these cases, a security right can only be created if and when also these additional (IX.–2:107) or alternative (IX.–2:108) requirements are fulfilled.

The last part of the present Article expressly provides for the possibility of a party agreement on the time of creation. This allows the parties in particular to agree that the security right is to be created only when additional conditions are fulfilled or that the security right is not to be created immediately when the contract for proprietary security is concluded, but at a later time. Similar rules can be found in the context of the transfer of ownership of goods in VIII.–2:103 (Agreement as to the time ownership is to pass) and VIII.–2:101 (Requirements for the transfer of ownership in general) paragraph (1) (e). Since it is, however, not in the interests of the secured creditor to delay the creation of a security right, this possibility will serve the interests of the parties only in exceptional cases, such as where a third party security provider offers security only conditionally upon the provision of counter-security.

IX.–2:107: Granting of security right by consumer

(1) The creation of a security right by a consumer security provider by granting is only valid within the following limits:

(a) the assets to be encumbered must be identified individually; and

(b) an asset not yet owned by the consumer upon conclusion of the contract for proprietary security (apart from the rights to payment covered by paragraph (2)) can only be encumbered as security for a credit to be used for the acquisition of the asset by the consumer.

(2) Rights to payment of future salary, pensions or equivalent income cannot be encumbered in so far as they serve the satisfaction of the living expenses of the consumer security provider and his or her family.

COMMENTS

A. General remarks

A whole Chapter has been devoted to the protection of a consumer who provides personal security (Book IV.G., Chapter 4); this indicates the great risk which any provider of personal security incurs, since the obligation to the creditor, although only conditional, may threaten the economic existence of the grantor of the personal security. As compared to this high risk, the obligation of the provider of proprietary security is, in effect, limited to the value of the property which the security provider has encumbered with the proprietary security right. The different degree of risk is also reflected by the fact that very few, if any, complaints have been heard by consumer providers of proprietary security in movables.

In addition to the lower level of risk which is connected with a proprietary security in comparison to personal security, it also has to be taken into consideration that personal security is assumed by a security provider as security for an obligation which by definition is owed by a debtor different from the security provider. In the area of proprietary security in movables, however, the security provider is more often than not identical with the debtor. A consumer security provider will therefore already, in the capacity of the debtor, be entitled to consumer protection without a general need for additional protection based upon the qualification as security provider.

These observations are confirmed by the developments on the European level. Neither the first nor the second version of the EU Directive on consumer credits of 1987 and 2008, respectively include protective rules on proprietary security.

B. Reasons for action

Nevertheless, it was thought necessary to take into account the evident temptations to which a vulnerable individual may be exposed by applying for a general credit or in purchasing on credit a major piece of household equipment, a new car or other item of some value.

C. Three aspects requiring protective action

The first aspect is the sufficient identification of the consumer's assets that are to be encumbered. In order to prevent global descriptions (such as "all household items", "all securities" etc.), paragraph (1)(a) requires an individualised enumeration of each item that is to be encumbered. While this requirement in certain cases may be time-consuming and therefore may even increase the expenses of contracting, still it is a useful way of avoiding surprise and raising awareness of the risks which the consumer security provider may incur in case of non-performance of the obligation to the secured creditor.

Another risk to which consumers are often exposed is to offer future assets which the consumer hopes to acquire or may even have contracted for, as collateral. This risk should be limited to those future assets, which are to serve as security for the purchase money (sub-paragraph (b)).

Finally, paragraph (2) deals with another aspect of borrowing against a future asset, i.e. future regular payments, such as salary, pensions, social security payments etc. Paragraph (2) intends to ensure that a minimum amount of such regular payments cannot be disposed of, but is to remain reserved for the living expenses of the consumer security provider and his or her family. Admittedly, it will frequently be difficult and rather time-consuming to determine that reserved amount. But while this may increase the expenses of contracting, it is in the consumer's interest to become aware of the risks which will be incurred by offering this sensitive kind of security to the creditor.

D. Other rules on consumer protection

Other rules for consumers are few, since an urgent general need has not yet become apparent. A few protective rules are contained in Chapter 7 on enforcement (e.g., IX.–7:103 (Extra-judicial and judicial enforcement) paragraph (3), IX.–7:105 (Predefault agreement on appropriation of encumbered assets) paragraph (3), IX.–7:107 (Enforcement notice to consumer)). Security for micro-credits, which will frequently be assumed by consumers, may be subject to special national legislation (IX.–1:105 (Exclusions) paragraph (1)). Finally, IX.–3:107 (Registration of acquisition finance devices) paragraph (3) exempts acquisition finance devices by consumer security providers from the requirement of registration which otherwise would apply.

IX.–2:108: Good faith acquisition of security right

(1) Even where the security provider has no right or authority to dispose of a corporeal asset, the secured creditor nevertheless acquires a security right in it, provided that:

(a) the asset or a negotiable document to bearer on the asset is in the security provider's possession or, if so required, the asset is registered in an international or national register of ownership as owned by the security provider at the time the security right is to be created; and

(b) the secured creditor does not know and cannot reasonably be expected to know that the security provider has no right or authority to grant a security right in the asset at the time the security right is to be created.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(b), a secured creditor acquiring a security right in an asset that is subject to a retention of ownership device which is registered under Chapter 3 Section 3 against the security provider is regarded as knowing that the latter has no right or authority to grant a security right in the asset.

(3) Good faith acquisition of a security right is excluded for an asset that was stolen from the owner or the person holding for the owner.

COMMENTS

A. General

The principle of good faith acquisition allows the acquisition of a right even if the transferor does not have a right or authority to dispose of the right. While normally a person who is not the holder of a right cannot pass a good title to a transferee unless the transferor is specifically authorised to do so, the principle of good faith acquisition protects the transferee's confidence in the transaction with the transferor. This protection is granted in the interests both of the transferee individually and of commerce in general; the efficiency of any market is enhanced if participants may rely on certain assumptions concerning their counterparties' rights to dispose of the assets concerned.

It has to be emphasised that there is also another side to the effects of the operation of the principle of good faith acquisition. While the transferee acquires the right which the transferor was not entitled to dispose of, there will also be a true owner (or, where the transferor is actually the owner, but is nevertheless barred from disposing of the assets concerned, a person in whose interests the transferor's power to dispose of the asset is restricted) who suffers – either by losing rights or by an encumbrance being created in the assets concerned.

Obviously, such protection for the transferee, the mirror-image of which is the detriment to the true owner, cannot be based merely on the fact that a transferee actually trusts in the transferor's right or authority; there can be a legal protection of these expectations only under additional clearly-defined objective conditions which let the transferee's confidence appear reasonable in the eyes of the law.

The basis for such protection which is traditionally accepted is the transferor's possession of the asset concerned. If the transferor is in possession, third parties are reasonably entitled to believe that the transferor may also dispose of the asset concerned. This reasoning, which effectively implies that the application of the principle of good faith acquisition is restricted to corporeal assets, also constitutes a basis for the rules on good faith acquisition in Chapter 3 of Book VIII. Within the Principles of European Law, these provisions on the acquisition of ownership in movable assets define the core of the principles of good faith acquisition and constitute the point of reference also for the more specific applications of these principles including those in the present Book.

Due to a number of differences, however, the rules of Chapter 3 of Book VIII cannot be applied directly and without qualifications in the context of proprietary security. First, the present rules are concerned not with the acquisition of outright ownership, but of proprietary security rights. The acquisition of a limited proprietary right by the transferee does not deprive the owner of the asset concerned of all rights in the latter. Second, the acquisition of a security right in an asset is not regularly connected with the acquisition of possession by the secured creditor. This suggests that the good faith acquisition of a security right should not depend upon delivery or an equivalent to it. Third, the system of publicity for security rights by registration gives rise to some specific issues of the protection of the transferee's confidence in the transferor's authority.

B. Survey of provisions on good faith acquisition in proprietary security law

Since there are in this Book on proprietary security in movables a number of provisions each covering different aspects of the principle of good faith acquisition, a short survey will be useful setting out the core content of each of these Articles.

IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right). This provision deals with the acquisition of a security right in cases where the security provider did not have the right or authority to dispose of the asset concerned, i.e. typically cases where the security provider is not the owner of the asset to be encumbered. This includes cases where the security provider attempts to create a security right in an asset that is subject to a retention of ownership device. This Article bears close resemblance to the basic rule in VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership), the major distinction being that the latter provision covers the acquisition of ownership, not merely of a limited proprietary right such as a security right.

IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset). Paragraph (1) of this Article covers the good faith acquisition of a security right in a situation where the security provider is the owner of the asset concerned which is, however, already subject to an encumbrance in favour of a third party. The transferee can under IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) paragraph (1) acquire a security right in the asset concerned in disregard of the earlier encumbrance.

IX.–2:111 (Security right in cash, negotiable instruments and documents. This provision extends for certain assets the protection of the efficiency of the market beyond situations where the secured creditor actually believed that the security provider was entitled to dispose of the assets concerned. For cash, negotiable instruments and documents, direct possession of which is transferred to the secured creditor, the latter need not be concerned about the security provider's entitlement to dispose.

IX.–3:101 (Effectiveness as against third persons) paragraph (3). This provision merely spells out a consequence of the other rules on good faith acquisition in so far as they allow the acquisition of a security right in an asset which is already subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. The security right which is acquired in disregard of the earlier proprietary security is effective against the latter without any requirements under Chapter 3 being fulfilled.

IX.–3:321 et seq.: Some additional rules on good faith acquisition are also to be found in the Section on registration. IX.–3:321 paragraph (2) contains a restriction of this principle by further limiting the possibility for a transferee to acquire a proprietary right in an asset free from an earlier encumbrance if the transferee had been informed of its existence by the holder of this encumbrance. IX.–3:322 paragraph (1) and IX.–3:323, on the other hand, extend the principle of good faith acquisition by allowing a transferee – even in respect of intangible assets – to rely on the registered secured creditor's information that the asset concerned is not encumbered and to acquire a security right free of the registered secured creditor's rights.

IX.–4:101 paragraph (5): Like IX.–3:101 (Effectiveness as against third persons) paragraph (3), this provision covers another consequence of the other rules on good faith acquisition of a security right in an asset which is already subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. The security right acquired on the basis of a good faith acquisition enjoys priority over the earlier rights in the same assets in disregard of which the security right has been acquired.

IX.–6:102: This provision qualifies to some degree the rules in Chapter 3 of Book VIII concerning the good faith acquisition of ownership free of earlier rights when these earlier rights are security rights or retention of ownership devices. In the context of the present Book, such situations are of specific relevance since they lead to the termination of the proprietary security devices in the assets concerned.

C. Good faith acquisition of a security right according to IX.–2:108

Other requirements under IX.–2:105. The principle of good faith acquisition replaces only the requirement that the security provider must have a right or authority to dispose of the asset concerned; the other requirements for the acquisition of a security right under this Subsection remain unaffected, e.g. the existence of a contract for proprietary security specifying the asset to be encumbered and of an entitlement of the secured creditor to the granting of the security right (see IX.–2:105 sub-paragraph (a) and (c)).

Corporeal asset. A good faith acquisition is possible under IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (1) only with regard to corporeal assets. This restriction follows the scope of application of the corresponding provision of VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership) and is based upon the ground that only for corporeal assets there can be possession by the transferor which constitutes the basis for the legal protection of the acquirer's expectations.

Security provider has no right or authority to dispose of asset. There is no need for rules on good faith acquisition if the security provider is entitled to dispose of the asset concerned.

It has to be emphasised that the mere fact that the asset concerned is already encumbered with a security right (in the sense of a limited proprietary right as defined in IX.–1:102) does not deprive the security provider of the right to dispose of the asset (see Comment C on IX.–2:105).

The situation is different if the asset concerned is subject to a retention of ownership device. In this case, the buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee is not the owner of the supplied assets and – as is confirmed by paragraph (2) – also does not have authority to grant a security right in these assets. The attempt to create a proprietary security right in the bought or leased assets in favour of another secured creditor would therefore be a case in which IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) could be applicable. Therefore, the good faith acquisition of a security right in an asset which is already encumbered by a limited proprietary right is covered by another provision (IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset)) than the one on good faith acquisition of a security right in an asset which is subject to a retention of ownership device. There is, however, no conflict with IX.–1:104 paragraph (1) since the provisions of this Subsection 2 of Chapter 1, Section 1 are not mentioned in that Article as rules on security rights which are also applicable to retention of ownership devices. Moreover, it has to be emphasised that IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) and IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) are largely identical so that the treatment of the good faith acquisition of a security right in an asset that is subject to a retention of ownership device under the former or the latter provision would not lead to different results. The treatment of retention of ownership devices and (normal) security rights by two different provisions, which follows the traditional understanding of the legal construction of retention of ownership devices, is therefore justified on the basis of the reasoning in the preceding sentences, even though these security devices are to a large extent functionally equivalent.

Two exceptional situations in which the buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee acts with authority in relation to the creation of a security right in an asset which is subject to a retention of ownership device have already been mentioned in Comment C on IX.–2:105. If there is at least a conditional transfer of ownership, a buyer may encumber the present, but conditional right in the supplied assets; moreover, even if there is not a present conditional right at the time when the contract for proprietary security is concluded, the creation of a security right might be validated if the buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee subsequently acquires ownership (the security right is created as soon as the requirements of IX.–2:105 sub-paragraph (b) are fulfilled, see IX.–2:106).

Acquisition of a security right by granting. IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) is placed in Subsection 2 of Section 1 of Chapter 2; therefore this provision is only intended to apply to the acquisition of security rights in the sense of a limited proprietary right as defined in IX.–1:102 by granting; this provision allows neither the acquisition of a security right by retention nor the acquisition of a retention of ownership device under which the holder of the latter would be regarded as owner of the assets concerned. The reason for this restriction is obvious. Only a person who according to the agreement of the parties obtains a right from the other party may be worthy of being granted protection for having confidence in the assumption that these rights are actually obtained. There is no justification for protecting a person who according to the content of the agreement merely retains rights assumed to be already held.

Possession or registration of the security provider as owner. The good faith of the secured creditor enjoys legal protection only in two situations, in which on the basis of objective criteria such confidence can be regarded as reasonable and justified.

In the first situation, the security provider is in possession of the asset concerned or of a negotiable document to bearer on the asset. Concerning the meaning of possession for the purposes of provisions on good faith acquisition, reference must be made to the rules in Book VIII (see the definition of possession VIII.–1:205). In fact, the rules on good faith acquisition in Book VIII go beyond a mere requirement of possession by demanding delivery of the assets concerned (VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1)(b); for the definition of the term delivery see VIII.–2:104, equivalents to delivery are covered by VIII.–2:105). For the good faith acquisition of a security right, however, such a requirement would not be appropriate. For a person attempting to acquire ownership in an asset, taking possession can of course be regarded as a precondition for the protection of this person's good faith in the transaction. The present rules, however, are intended to support the use of non-possessory security rights (see IX.–2:103); putting such security transactions at a disadvantage in comparison with possessory security rights would clearly contravene these intentions. Since taking possession of the encumbered asset is no longer the normal way of taking security, the protection of the secured creditor's confidence in the security provider's entitlement to dispose of the assets concerned should not be limited to cases where the secured creditor actually takes possession.

The absence of a requirement of delivery to the secured creditor, however, opens the way to the possibility that several security rights are created in the same asset. For the way in which this problem is dealt with under these rules see Comment B on IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset).

The second situation in which the confidence of the secured creditor in the security provider's entitlement to dispose of the assets concerned is protected is the case of a registration of the security provider as owner of these assets in an international or national register of ownership. In VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1), registration of the transferor is not specifically mentioned as a situation in which a good faith acquisition could be possible. However, Book VIII contains a general reference to national systems of registration of ownership, providing in VIII.–1:102 paragraph (2) that the effects of the relevant national rules on registration have priority over the rules in Book VIII which would include the operation of a registration as the basis for the transferee's good faith in the registered owner's entitlement to dispose. In IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (1)(a), the protection of good faith acquisition on the basis of a registration of the transferee is recognised without qualification, i.e. a good faith acquisition may in the absence of the security provider's possession be based upon the security provider being registered as the owner of the assets concerned, regardless of whether the law governing this registration so provides. Making a good faith acquisition even of a proprietary security right dependent upon the position of the national law would make it necessary for the parties to find out whether or not such protection is actually recognised under national law. In view of the fact that registration as owner should in general be a fact which any transferee should be entitled to rely on, these rules have therefore decided in favour of autonomously recognising this registration as a basis for a good faith acquisition of a proprietary security right. Such a deviation from the treatment of registration of ownership under the rules of Book VIII appears to be permitted on the basis of VIII.–1:103 paragraph (1), which spells out a general preference of the rules of Book IX over Book VIII in relation to the transfer or retention of ownership for purposes of security. It should be emphasised, however, that it can only be a registration as owner which can be relevant under IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (1)(a) no. (ii). By contrast, the registration as holder of a security right (under Chapter 3, Section 3 of these rules) is not covered by paragraph (1)(a) no. (ii); the registration of a third party as holder of a retention of ownership device may be relevant in so far as this registration may prevent the secured creditor from being able to claim to be in good faith according to paragraph (1)(b) (see paragraph (2)).

Good faith according to paragraph (1) in general. The central requirement for a good faith acquisition under this provision is contained in paragraph (1)(b). There can be a good faith acquisition only if the secured creditor does not know and cannot reasonably be expected to know that the security provider has no right or authority to grant a security right in the asset concerned. In so far as the security provider's lack of right or authority is not due to the fact that the assets concerned are subject to a retention of ownership device, but follows, e.g., from the fact that (outright) ownership is still held by a third party who has supplied the assets to the security provider under an ineffective contract of sale, this requirement is identical with the criterion of good faith according to VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1)(d); reference can be made to the Comments on that provision.

Good faith according to paragraphs (1)(b) and (2) in case of assets subject to a retention of ownership device. As has already been explained, a buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee is not authorised to create an encumbrance in the ownership retained by the holder of the retention of ownership device (exceptions apply where the buyer merely encumbers a conditional ownership, see Comment C on IX.–2:105; the situation is different if the asset is merely encumbered with a security right as a limited proprietary right, see Comment C. on IX.–2:105). A secured creditor therefore acquires a security right only if the creditor does not know nor can be reasonably expected to know that the asset to be encumbered is subject to a retention of ownership device.

This situation differs from the good faith requirement as it is generally applied since retention of ownership devices – contrary to ownership as such – are, generally speaking, subject to a requirement of registration under these rules (see IX.–3:107). This registration provides publicity for the rights of the holder of a retention of ownership device and even if a creditor who intends to acquire a security right in the asset concerned does not have actual knowledge of this retention of ownership device, the secured creditor at least can be expected to know that the security provider has no right or authority to grant a security right in the asset concerned; paragraph (2) even provides for a fiction that the secured creditor can be regarded as having (constructive) knowledge of the security provider's lack of right or authority.

These issues with respect to the relevance of the registration of earlier security devices in the encumbered assets are dealt with in more detail in the Comments on IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset). As has been explained above, the only reason for the separate treatment of the good faith acquisition of security rights in assets that are subject to retention of ownership devices is the traditional legal construction of the latter type of security devices; no difference concerning substance or results is intended. See also the Comments on IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) for the issue of a registration of the earlier security device against a person different from the security provider.

No requirement of acquisition for value. Differing from VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1)(c), the acquisition of the asset concerned for value is not required for the good faith acquisition of a security right under this provision. The criterion of an acquisition for value has not been expressly adapted for the acquisition of security rights. Security rights are always created to secure a payment or a credit furnished by the secured creditor to the security provider; that purpose is at least an equivalent of value.

Exclusion of stolen goods according to paragraph (3). According to paragraph (3), there can be no good faith acquisition of a security right with regard to stolen goods. This exception corresponds to the similar rule in VIII.–3:101 paragraph (3); in the present context there is no need, however, for the special provision in VIII.–3:101 paragraph (3) sentence 1 last half-sentence for dispositions of stolen goods in the ordinary course of the transferor's business. This sub-rule is intended to protect especially sales transactions in everyday commercial practice; the acquisition of a proprietary security right, by contrast, cannot be regarded as an event in the ordinary course of the security provider's business. For the creation of security rights in cash, negotiable instruments and negotiable documents to bearer, however, there is a special rule in IX.–2:111 (Security right in cash, negotiable instruments and documents), according to which a security right may be acquired by the secured creditor even if the requirements of IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) are not fulfilled, i.e. even if these assets were stolen from their owner.

Irrelevance of registration of security right to be acquired. A registration under Section 3 of Chapter 3 of the security right which is to be acquired on the basis of good faith acquisition is irrelevant in the present context. The mere fact that a secured creditor has filed an entry in the register of security rights does not entitle this secured creditor to have confidence in the security provider's entitlement to dispose of the assets concerned.

The existence of an entry in the register of security rights is also irrelevant when there is actually no security right and the registered secured creditor nevertheless attempts to transfer not only the (purportedly secured) right but also the actually non-existing security right. The existence of an entry in the register of security rights is no sufficient basis for the protection of a third person's confidence in the actual existence of the security right mentioned in this entry. As a consequence, IX.–5:301 does not contain any references to a good faith acquisition of the security right by the transferee.

Finally, it should be noted that – as opposed to the registration of a retention of ownership device – not even the existence of a registered security right in the assets concerned constitutes an obstacle to the good faith acquisition under this Article. It is the secured creditor's confidence in the security provider's entitlement to dispose of the asset concerned that is decisive, not the question of good faith concerning the existence of prior encumbrances. See also IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) paragraph (3).

D. Position of the owner after good faith acquisition by secured creditor

Owner and secured creditor. On the basis of a good faith acquisition the secured creditor obtains a security right in the owner's assets. If the assets concerned had been subject to a retention of ownership device, the rights which the secured creditor acquires under IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) can no longer be extinguished by the holder of the retention of ownership device who exercises the rights under Chapter 7 (see IX.–7:301 paragraph (2)(b)). The priority between the original retention of ownership device and the subsequent security right acquired in good faith is governed by IX.–4:101 paragraph (5), i.e. the latter security right enjoys priority.

However, the true owner is not regarded as the security provider for the purposes of the provisions on effectiveness and priority. Hence, the secured creditor will only be able to rely on the security right vis-à-vis the owner who is regarded as a third party within the meaning of IX.–3:101 paragraph (1)(a), if the requirements for effectiveness under Chapter 3 are fulfilled. The position is different only in relation to an owner who is holder of a retention of ownership device.

In relation to this owner a security right acquired in good faith is effective according to IX.–3:101 paragraph (3), i.e. without fulfilment of any requirements under Chapter 3.

If the security right is to be registered, it will have to be registered against the security provider and it is the security provider's, not the owner's consent that is necessary for the registration. The reason for this is that the secured creditor would not obtain the true owner's consent. This, however, leads to the result that the security right might be registered against a person other than the actual owner of the encumbered asset. If the latter then creates another security right in the same asset, the true owner's secured creditors will not be able to find out about the prior encumbrance from the register. This problem, which also arises in cases of a transfer of the encumbered asset prior to the creation of additional security rights by the transferee, is dealt with in IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) paragraph (2).

Owner and security provider. That the secured creditor enjoys protection under this provision does not prevent the security provider from being liable towards the owner for any losses resulting from the creation of the encumbrance.

IX.–2:109: Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset

(1) Where a corporeal asset is encumbered with a security right or another limited proprietary right and the security provider has no right or authority to dispose of the asset free from the third person's limited proprietary right, a secured creditor nevertheless acquires a security right free from that other right, provided that:

(a) the requirements of paragraph (1)(a) of the preceding Article are met; and

(b) the secured creditor does not know nor can reasonably be expected to know that the security provider has no right or authority to grant a security right in disregard of the third person's limited proprietary right at the time the security right is to be created.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(b), a secured creditor acquiring a security right in the encumbered asset is regarded as knowing that the security provider has no right or authority to grant a security right in the asset in disregard of the existing security right if this right is registered under Chapter 3, Section 3 against the security provider.

(3) Where the requirements of paragraph (1) are not met but the requirements of the preceding Article are met, the secured creditor obtains a security right in the encumbered assets. The priority between this security right and the prior encumbrance is determined according to the general provisions.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article deals with the good faith acquisition of a security right in an asset that is already encumbered with a limited proprietary right, whether a security right as defined in IX.–1:102 or another limited proprietary right (the good faith acquisition of a security right in an asset which is subject to a retention of ownership device is covered by IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right)). If the secured creditor is in good faith concerning the existence of the earlier encumbrance, the secured creditor acquires a security right in the assets free of the earlier encumbrance. The holder of the earlier security right must then give precedence to the new secured creditor, i.e. the rights of the new secured creditor, which need not fulfil any requirements under Chapter 3 in order to be effective as against the earlier secured creditor (see IX.–3:101 paragraph (3)), enjoy priority over the earlier security rights (see IX.–4:101 paragraph (5)).

As will be shown below, however, in the end the scope of application for a good faith acquisition of a security right in disregard of an earlier encumbrance is rather limited. Only rarely will it be possible on the basis of this provision to create a new security right in the same asset in disregard of earlier security rights that fulfil the requirements for effectiveness under Chapter 3. The publicity achieved by the registration of the earlier security right protects its holder against good faith acquisition by another secured creditor. One important situation in which exceptionally such good faith acquisition is possible is where the earlier security right is registered against another person than the security provider who attempts to grant the new security right (see Comment B). Even if there is no good faith acquisition, the creation of a new (additional) security right in the same asset will still be possible; the earlier and the subsequent security right will then be regarded as competing security rights, the relationship between them being determined by the rules on priority (see Chapter 4).

Like IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right), the present Article only allows the acquisition of a security right by granting, not of a security right created by any other method and not of a retention of ownership device. This follows already from the fact that this Subsection 2 of Chapter 1 Section 1 applies to the creation of security rights by granting only; see also the reasoning in Comment C on IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right).

B. Good faith acquisition of a security right according to IX.–2:109 paragraph (1)

Other requirements under IX.–2:105. As in the case of IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right), the principle of good faith acquisition under the present Article applies only where – apart from the right or authority to create a security right free of the earlier encumbrances – all the other requirements of IX.–2:105 are fulfilled.

Corporeal asset. As under IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right), a good faith acquisition under paragraph (1) of the present Article is possible only with regard to corporeal assets. See Comment C on IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right).

Security provider's lack of right or authority to dispose of the asset free of the earlier encumbrance. The existence of a security right in the assets owned by the security provider does not deprive the latter of authority as owner to dispose of the asset concerned or to create additional security rights in this asset if this is done subject to the earlier encumbrance. In the case of transfer of ownership, the transferee assumes the position of the security provider as new owner of the encumbered asset (IX.–5:303 paragraph (1)); where an additional security right is created subject to the earlier encumbrance in the same asset, the relationship between both encumbrances is governed by the rules on priority (see Chapter 4).

However, if an asset is encumbered with a security right the security provider usually no longer has the right or authority to dispose of the asset free of the earlier encumbrance (including the creation of a security right in disregard of the earlier encumbrance). If no authority to dispose of the encumbered asset free of the earlier encumbrance has been conferred on the security provider on the basis of an agreement or by law (see, e.g., IX.–5:204 paragraph (1)), another creditor may therefore acquire a security right in disregard of the earlier encumbrance in the same asset only if by relying on the principle of good faith acquisition.

Possession or registration of the security provider. The reference in paragraph (1) (a) to IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (1)(a) introduces the alternative requirement of possession or registration of the security provider into the present Article.

As within the original scope of application of IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (1)(a), it is only a registration of the security provider's ownership that may be relevant for the secured creditor's ability to rely on the principles of good faith acquisition. A registration in the register of security rights according to Section 3 of Chapter 3 of this Book is irrelevant for this provision.

Also for the alternative requirement of possession reference can be made to the identical requirement under IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (1)(a), see Comment C on that Article. Again, possession by the security provider is sufficient; it is not necessary that there is a delivery of the encumbered asset to the secured creditor in order for the latter to enjoy protection under this provision.

That there is no requirement of delivery to the new secured creditor neither creates too much risk for the original secured creditor nor gives rise to problems that the security provider could be enabled to create several security rights in favour of different secured creditors. As long as the secured creditors concerned ensure that their security rights are made effective by fulfilling the requirements of Chapter 3, the possibilities for a good faith acquisition of a security right by a third party under paragraph (1) of the present Article are limited. This is obvious for security rights made effective by the exercise of possession; in such cases there is no possession of the asset concerned by the security provider and hence – in the absence of the rather rare case of registration of the security provider's ownership – no good faith acquisition under paragraph (1) of the present Article. If the security right is registered, the requirements of paragraph (1)(a) read with IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (1)(a) might be fulfilled; however, the publicity of the original security right which is achieved by registration of this encumbrance in the European register of security rights will normally prevent any new security provider from being able to claim to be in good faith concerning the earlier encumbrance.

Good faith according to paragraph (1)(b). A secured creditor can only acquire a security right free of an earlier encumbrance on the basis of this provision if the secured creditor is in good faith, i.e. if the secured creditor does not know and cannot reasonably be expected to know that the security provider has no right or authority to grant a security right in disregard of the third person's limited proprietary right (paragraph (1)(b)). As has been explained in Comment C on IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right), the following Comments are also relevant for the situation of a good faith acquisition of a security right in an asset that is subject to a retention of ownership device.

The main practical problem in this context is to decide whether a secured creditor can reasonably be expected to know that the security provider does not have the right or authority to dispose of the asset free of the earlier security right or retention of ownership device. In general, much will depend upon the circumstances of each individual case. If it is a practice of general application in certain sectors of the economy that items of inventory are bought under a retention of ownership agreement, then third parties could for example reasonably be expected to know that the security provider is not entitled to create another security right in these assets in disregard of the suppliers' retained ownership. A secured creditor will also more likely be expected to know that the assets concerned are already encumbered if the secured creditor knows that the security provider is in financial dire straits and has struggled to obtain credit in the past.

Generally, it is the burden of the secured creditor who wants to rely on good faith acquisition according to the present Article, i.e. the secured creditor who attempted to acquire a security right in disregard of the earlier right, to prove that it did not know and could not reasonably be expected to know that the security provider did not have the right or authority to dispose of the asset free from the earlier right (see the wording of paragraph (1)(b): "provided that… the secured creditor does not know nor can reasonably be expected to know that…"). An identical rule concerning the burden of proof applies in the context of the acquisition of unencumbered ownership of goods (see VIII.–3:102 paragraph (1) (d) sentence 2).

Good faith and registration - paragraph (2). A highly important factor for answering the question whether the secured creditor can reasonably be expected to know that the security provider does not have the right or authority to grant a security right in the assets concerned in disregard of an earlier security right or retention of ownership device is the registration of this earlier proprietary right under the provisions of Section 3 of Chapter 3.

Paragraph (2) provides that the secured creditor is regarded as knowing of the security provider's lack of right or authority to grant a security right in the assets concerned in disregard of an earlier security device, i.e. every secured creditor will be regarded as having constructive notice of every security right or retention of ownership device that is registered against the security provider. No actual knowledge is required and nothing more needs to be shown in order to prevent the secured creditor from relying on the present Article than that the asset concerned is subject to a security device registered against the security provider.

In effect, this principle, which is in line with virtually all systems of registration for security rights, requires a creditor who is about to acquire a proprietary security right in an asset to investigate whether any security rights or retention of ownership devices are registered in that asset against the security provider. If the asset concerned is actually already subject to a registered security right or retention of ownership device, the intending secured creditor could not acquire a security right in disregard of the earlier right and would not be protected by the rule on good faith acquisition in paragraph (1) of the present Article, even if this earlier right was actually unknown to the intending secured creditor. Since, however, the register under this Book is electronically accessible in an online format and open to everyone (IX.–3:302, IX.–3:317), the consultation of the register does not constitute too much of a burden for the intending secured creditor and for the creation of security rights in general.

No general restriction of this principle would be justified on the basis of the facts that under the system of registration according to Chapter 3, Section 3 of this Book entries in the register may be filed by the parties themselves and that these entries need not individualise specific assets. Even though the information that can be obtained directly from the register might be less reliable and less detailed in comparison to the information that is available under more traditional systems of registration involving a public registrar, these rules provide for specific possibilities to obtain more precise information from the registered secured creditor (IX.–3:319 ss.). Intending secured creditors can be expected to use these possibilities even if the existing entry against the security provider is drafted in the widest and least precise terms possible; after all, as secured creditors they stand to profit from the publicity effects of the system of registration under these rules as well. It is only in very exceptional circumstances, where the content of the registration or other declarations of the registered secured creditor actually allow the acquirer of another security right in the same asset to assume that this asset was not already subject to a security device, that a restriction of the rule in paragraph (2) on general grounds (as opposed to the limitation discussed in the following paragraph) could be justified. One specific exception is expressly laid down in IX.–3:322 paragraph (1). Good faith acquisition is not excluded even though the earlier security right is registered where the registered secured creditor had informed the acquirer that the asset concerned is not encumbered. This specific provision applies only in the context of requests for information according to Subsection 5 of Chapter 3, Section 3; similar results, however, can be achieved for comparable situations – e.g. where the registered secured creditor had publicly declared that the secured right had ceased to exist – on the basis of the application of the general principle of good faith which underlies the whole Principles (see, e.g., III.–1:103). It would be contrary to this principle if the registered secured creditor was not bound by its declarations and the reasonable assumptions which other persons made on the basis of these declarations even if they were in conflict with the content of the register.

Good faith and registration against person different from the security provider. The rule in paragraph (2) that a secured creditor is regarded as knowing that a security provider has no right or authority to grant a security right in an asset that is already encumbered in disregard of this encumbrance is restricted to security rights that are registered against the security provider (a corresponding limitation applies according to IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (2) for registered retention of ownership devices). Where this registration is not filed against the security provider who is to create a security in favour of the intending secured creditor, the latter is not regarded as knowing that the transferor has no right or authority to grant a security right in the asset in disregard of the existing security right merely by reason of the fact that this right is registered. This means that in such situations, unless the intending secured creditor has actual knowledge of the earlier security right or if there are other circumstances on the basis of which the secured creditor can be expected to know that the assets concerned might have been acquired by the security provider subject to an existing encumbrance, a good faith acquisition of a security right in disregard of the earlier encumbrance according to paragraph (1) of the present Article is possible.

The main example of a situation where the security right is not registered against the actual owner of the encumbered asset who may then as security provider create another security right in the same asset is the following case. Prior to the creation of the second security right, ownership in the already encumbered asset has been transferred subject to the existing encumbrance and without an additional declaration of transfer being filed (see IX.–3:330 and IX.–3:331). This issue is more fully explained in the Comments on the provisions on the registration system, cf. Comment B on IX.–3:330 . For present purposes, it suffices to say that since the European register of security rights is not intended to operate as a real folio system, the possibilities to search for specific assets rather than for individual security providers are rather limited. In the interest of avoiding unreasonable burdens in connection with the creation of security rights, intending secured creditors should not be obliged to search the register for entries filed against the persons from whom the security provider has acquired the assets concerned.

The same reasoning also applies to cases where a security right has been created by a non-owner under IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) and then the true owner intends to create another security right in the same asset (see Comment D on IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right)). In such cases, paragraph (2) of the present Article is not applicable, i.e. the intending secured creditor may acquire the rights in disregard of the earlier security right in the same asset since this security right is not registered against the true owner who is now the intending security provider.

No special rules for transactions in the ordinary course of business. IX.–6:102 paragraph (2)(a) provides that, if the transferor acts in the ordinary course of its business, a third person intending to acquire ownership in the encumbered assets is not regarded as knowing that the transferor has no right or authority to dispose of the assets concerned in disregard of the earlier encumbrance merely by reason of the fact that this encumbrance is registered. There is no corresponding rule for transactions in the ordinary course of the security provider's business in the present Article. The reason is that this provision deals with the acquisition of a security right only; there is no need here for a specific rule directed at the protection especially of sales transactions in the interests of commerce in general; the creation of a security right cannot and should not be understood as forming part of anyone's ordinary course of business.

C. Good faith acquisition of a security right according to IX.–2:109 paragraph (3)

Paragraph (3) deals with special situations in which a security provider attempts to create a security right in an asset which the security provider is not entitled to dispose of and which is already encumbered. If the intending secured creditor is in bad faith concerning the prior encumbrance, but not in bad faith concerning the security provider's lack of entitlement to dispose of this asset, then, provided that the other requirements of IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) are fulfilled as well, the secured creditor acquires a security right in the asset concerned without the other encumbrance being lost. Both security rights exist as competing security rights in the same asset; the priority between them is determined according to the general rules, cf. Chapter 4.

D. Effects of good faith acquisition of a security right in disregard of earlier security right

The main effects of the good faith acquisition of a security right in disregard of an earlier encumbrance of the same asset have already been alluded to in Comment A. The new secured creditor is treated as if the earlier encumbrance was not in existence, i.e. the new security right need not fulfil any requirements under Chapter 3 in order to be effective as against the earlier secured creditor (see IX.–3:101 paragraph (3)); it enjoys priority over the earlier security right on the basis of IX.–4:101 paragraph (5).

As against other secured creditors or other third persons, however, the position of the secured creditor who has acquired a security right on the basis of the present Article in disregard of an earlier encumbrance, does not differ from the normal position. Against such other third persons, the security right acquired on the basis of the present Article must fulfil the normal requirements of Chapter 3 and its priority status is determined according to the normal rules of Chapter 4.

The security right in disregard of which a new security right has been acquired is neither entirely terminated nor does it lose its effectiveness against the security provider or other secured creditors in general. It is only the secured creditor who has acquired the rights in disregard of the earlier encumbrance on the basis of the present Article against whom the earlier security right is to be treated as non-existent; this security right can still be enforced against the security provider and remains valid against other secured creditors.

IX.–2:110: Delayed creation

In assets for which at the time when the security right would have been created according to IX.–2:106 (Time when security right is created by granting) the requirements of IX.–2:107 (Granting of security right by consumer) and IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) have not yet been met, a security right automatically arises as soon as the events indicated in the preceding provisions have occurred.

COMMENTS

This Article supplements the general rule laid down in IX.–2:106 according to which a security right is to be created by granting, if and when the requirements set out in IX.–2:105 are fulfilled. IX.–2:105 covers only the general requirements for the creation of a security right by granting, but not the additional requirements set out in IX.–2:107 for consumer security providers or the alternative requirements set out in IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) for a good faith acquisition of a security right where the security provider does not have the right or authority to grant a security right. Therefore, this additional rule is necessary. It provides that, if and in so far as the fulfilment of the requirements of IX.–2:107 or IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) is necessary for the creation of a security right by granting, this security right does not arise at the time indicated by IX.–2:106, but at the time when also these additional or alternative requirements are fulfilled.

IX.–2:111: Security right in cash, negotiable instruments and documents

A security right in cash, negotiable instruments and documents to bearer may be created free from any earlier rights, even if the requirements of IX.–2:105 (Requirements for granting of security right) sub-paragraph (b), IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) and IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in an encumbered corporeal asset) are not met, provided that direct possession of these assets is transferred to the secured creditor.

COMMENTS

This Article contains a special rule for the creation of security rights in three items of negotiable assets: first, cash(whether domestic or foreign); negotiable instruments to bearer (such as a bill of exchange or a cheque to bearer); and negotiable documents to bearer (such as a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt, if issued to bearer). The documentary form is essential, since the provision requires that direct possession of the encumbered asset be transferred to the secured creditor.

The creation of a security right in these assets is exempted from some of the general requirements of this Subsection concerning the security provider's right or authority to grant a security right in these assets. Even if the security provider does not have a right or authority to grant such a right in the assets concerned (i.e. where the requirement of IX.-2:105(b) is not met), a security right may be created in these assets even if the secured creditor cannot rely on the principle of good faith acquisition as laid down in IX.-2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right). This means that the creation of a security right is possible even where the secured creditor knows that the security provider does not have a right or authority to grant a security right in the cash, negotiable instrument or documents or where these assets have been stolen from their owner.

The policy of this rule relies on the negotiability of the instruments mentioned. The negotiability of these instruments is extended to the creation of security rights in these instruments: secured creditors are relieved from any need to inquire into the security provider's right or authority to grant a security right in these assets; even if they have doubts in this respect, they can obtain a valid proprietary security right. Moreover, in the case of cash, it is close to impossible to identify the origin of specific pieces of cash or any former owner and to inquire into the course which cash has taken.

The only requirement for this exception to apply is that direct possession must be transferred to the secured creditor. Generally, these rules do not require a transfer of possession for the creation of a security right, not even where the creation is to be based upon the principle of good faith acquisition (see Comment C on IX.-2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right)). However, under the present Article, such a restriction is necessary because the application of this rule needs to be limited; direct possession of the collateral is necessary to justify the protection of a secured creditor since this Article also applies where the latter is not in good faith or where the assets were stolen from their owner. This requirement, of course, effectively limits the scope of application of the Article. It cannot apply to the creation of security rights in modern forms of monetary bank accounts and – generally speaking – electronic "instruments" or "documents".

If a security right is acquired according to this Article in disregard of an earlier security right in the asset concerned, the new (possessory) security right enjoys priority over the earlier right by virtue of IX.-4:101 paragraph (5). Theoretically this rule would also apply to an earlier created retention of ownership device; however, this form of security is unlikely to be created in the assets covered by the present Article. For security rights in financial assets, a similar priority consequence results also from IX.-4:102 paragraph (2); this rule, on the basis of which a secured creditor in possession or control of financial assets enjoys priority over competing earlier security rights (especially registered security rights), applies also to intangible financial assets to which the present Article cannot apply, since the secured creditor cannot “possess” them.

IX.–2:112: General matters of property law

Rules on general matters of property law in Book VIII, Chapter 2 apply for the purposes of this Book with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

Even though there is not – as yet – a separate Book on general issues of property law in the DCFR, a number of legal issues that might arise in the context of the creation of a proprietary security right by granting are essentially to be regarded as general matters of property law which are common to various situations relating to the creation or transfer of proprietary rights. At least in so far as these issues are related to, but do not touch directly upon, the core characteristics of the creation of security rights by granting, it is not necessary to repeat more or less identical rules for such general matters of property law in this Chapter; instead a reference to a detailed codification of these principles in another context is possible.

Following this general approach, the present Article refers for general issues of property law to the rules in Chapter 2 of Book VIII on the transfer of ownership of goods; these provisions can with appropriate adaptations be applied also in relation to the creation of security rights by granting.

This reference especially covers VIII.–2:305 and VIII.–2:306 which deal with the transfer of goods forming part of a bulk. The principles laid down in those Articles (which can be regarded as a special issue concerning the requirement of specification, see IX.–2:105 sub-paragraph (a) and Comment B on that provision) are applicable with appropriate adaptations also where a security right is to be created in a specified quantity of an identified bulk. For the case of assets being commingled in a bulk after a security right had been created in these assets, see IX.–2:309.

Subsection 3: Retention of security right

IX.–2:113: Requirements for retention of security right

(1) In addition to the requirements under Subsection 1, the creation of a security right in a movable asset by retention requires that:

(a) the secured creditor is entitled as against the transferee to the retention of a security right by virtue of the contract for proprietary security; and

(b) the secured creditor transfers its ownership in the asset to be encumbered by the retained security right to the transferee.

(2) The security right is created by retention at the time when all the requirements set out in the preceding paragraph are fulfilled.

(3) The transferee is regarded as the security provider for the purposes of the application of the rules of this Book.

COMMENTS

A. General

These rules allow as an alternative method to the creation of a security right by granting also the creation of such a limited proprietary right by retention. In the case of creation of a security right by granting, the security provider grants a limited proprietary right to the secured creditor, while there is in general no transfer of ownership. Where a security right is created by retention, the secured creditor transfers ownership of the collateral, but retains a security right. The transferee obtains only encumbered ownership even though the secured creditor had held unencumbered ownership before the transfer.

In practice, such a method of creation of a security right can be of relevance for instance where an asset is to be sold and the seller intends to use this asset as collateral for payment of the purchase price. As an alternative to a retention of ownership, under which the buyer does not become the (unconditional) owner of the sold asset, seller and buyer may also agree on a transfer of ownership to the latter and a retention of a mere security right by the seller. While both under a retention of ownership and a retention of a security right, the seller has a secured position which also enjoys preferred treatment for purposes of priority vis-à-vis other secured creditors, the seller's rights in the event of default are more limited. In the case of a retention of ownership device, the seller is entitled to reclaim the supplied assets after termination of the contractual relationship under the sales contract (IX.–6:101 paragraph (4) sentence 2, and IX.–7:301); as holder of a mere security right, the seller may only enforce this right in order to seek satisfaction of the secured right; any surplus must go to the buyer (or to other secured creditors), see IX.–7:215.

Even without the possibility to create a security right by retention, similar results could be achieved through a two-step procedure. The secured creditor could transfer unencumbered ownership to the security provider and then the latter could subsequently grant a security right to the secured creditor. The advantage of allowing the creation of a security right by retention is that this solution requires only a single transaction; moreover, the secured creditor is better protected against the risk, e.g., that the transferee becomes insolvent before re-transferring a security right or that the security right to be re-transferred by the transferee to the secured creditor would be second-ranking only due to the prior creation of a security right in the same asset by the transferee in favour of another secured creditor.

B. Requirements for creation of security right by retention

This Article deals only with the requirements that are specific to the method of creation of a security right by retention. In addition to the requirements under this Article, the general conditions under Subsection 1 must also fulfilled in order to create a security right by retention; for the creation of security rights in specific types of assets, special rules are contained in Section 3 of this Chapter.

Entitlement of secured creditor to retention of security right. According to paragraph (1)(a) of the Article, the secured creditor must be entitled to retain the security right. This requirement corresponds to the rule that a security right may be created by granting only if the secured creditor is entitled to obtain the security right (IX.–2:105 sub-paragraph (c)); a security right can only be created if this has been agreed upon in the contract for proprietary security.

It has to be pointed out that these rules do not allow the unilateral creation of a contractual security right by the secured creditor by retention. Differing from the case of a retention of ownership device, the secured creditor does not retain ownership; instead, a security right is created and retained at the same time at which there is a transfer of ownership. This transfer requires an agreement by the parties and is valid – following the causal approach – only if the transferee is entitled to acquire ownership. The same requirements apply mutatis mutandis for the retention of a security right in favour of the secured creditor in the course of this transfer of ownership to the transferee.

Transfer of ownership by secured creditor to transferee. Paragraph (1)(b) contains the core difference between a retention of ownership device and the creation of a security right by retention. While under a retention of ownership device the seller, supplier or lessor retains ownership (either by not transferring ownership at all or by transferring ownership only under the suspensive condition of performance of the obligation corresponding to the secured right, i.e. payment of the purchase price), the secured creditor in the present situation transfers ownership and retains a security right only, i.e. a limited proprietary right in the collateral.

Since a security right may be created by retention both in corporeal and in intangible assets, the transfer of ownership according to paragraph (1)(b) includes both a transfer of ownership of corporeal assets and the assignment of other rights; this is in line with the general approach of the DCFR (see the definition of ownership and property in the Annex) and with the definitions used throughout this Book (see IX.–1:201 paragraph (9)).

The requirement of a transfer of ownership by the secured creditor indirectly imports the relevant additional conditions laid down in Book VIII (in case of a transfer of ownership of corporeal assets) or Book III, Chapter 5 (in case of an assignment of a right to performance). Even though these conditions are not expressly mentioned in IX.–2:112 (as opposed to IX.–2:105), the creation of a security right by retention is possible only if the asset to be encumbered is specified by the parties (see VIII.–2:101 paragraph (3)) and if the parties agree on the transfer (see III.–5:104 paragraph (3)), even if subject to the creation of an encumbrance.

It is expressly provided in paragraph (1)(b) that a security right may only be created by retention if the secured creditor transfers its ownership. If the creditor is not the owner, it cannot retain a proprietary right in the asset when transferring ownership to the transferee.

A holds a right to payment against B. A and B agree on a transfer of ownership of an asset which is owned by C to B and A purports to retain a security right under this transaction. Whatever the outcome concerning the acquisition of ownership by B, A cannot retain a security right since A was not the owner of the asset concerned.

Even though the transferee may acquire ownership although the creditor is not the owner (if the creditor has been authorised by the true owner or if the other party can rely on the principles of good faith acquisition), no security right can be retained by the creditor under such circumstances. The creditor also cannot claim to acquire a security right by retention on the basis of the principles of good faith acquisition (see Comment C on IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right)). If the creditor acts with authorisation by the owner, however, this agreement between the creditor and the owner could be regarded as creation of a security right by granting to which the rules of Subsection 2 apply.

The facts are the same as in illustration 1; however, A acts with authority of owner C. Since A has authority to transfer C's asset, B acquires ownership. A still cannot retain a security right, but the agreement between A and C can be interpreted as an agreement to create a security right by granting. At the same time at which A transfers C's ownership to B, C as third party security provider grants a security right to A.

C. Time when security right is created by retention

Paragraph (2) contains the same principle that is expressed by IX.–2:106. When a security right is created by retention, the security right arises only if and when all the relevant requirements are fulfilled; this may occur, however, after the contract for proprietary security had been concluded.

D. Transferee regarded as security provider

According to paragraph (3), the transferee is regarded as security provider for the purposes of the application of the rules of this Book. In the context of the creation of a security right by retention, it is hardly possible to regard the person obtaining encumbered ownership from the secured creditor as a security provider; therefore this person is called transferee in the present Article. However, for the purposes of the other rules of this Book, i.e. especially rules on effectiveness, pre-default rules and rules on consequences of default, the transferee is regarded as a normal security provider.

E. Priority of retained security right

Even though the category of security rights created by retention does not as such enjoy a preferred position in the context of the rules on priority, a secured creditor holding a security right created by retention will nevertheless typically enjoy priority over competing secured creditors. This is due to the fact that security rights created by retention will typically be acquisition finance devices. If a seller retains a security right as security for the purchase price when transferring ownership to the buyer, this security right falls under IX.–1:201 paragraph (3)(b) no. (i). As an acquisition finance device, this security right enjoys superpriority according to IX.–4:102 paragraph (1). This superpriority is generally not affected by a transfer of the security right, i.e. if the retained security right is transferred to another secured creditor the latter also enjoys superpriority (see IX.–5:301 paragraph (4)).

If, however, the acquisition finance device exceptionally does not enjoy superpriority (especially if the agreement is that the retained security right is to serve as security for a secured right other than a right to payment of the purchase price or if registration took place outside the 35 days period of IX.–3:107), no equivalent protection of the secured creditor can be deduced from IX.–5:303 paragraph (3). This provision applies to the transfer of ownership of assets that were already encumbered before the transfer; in the case of a creation of a security right by retention the retained security right arises at the same time at which ownership is transferred.

Subsection 4: Right of retention of possession

IX.–2:114: Right of retention of possession

Where under a contract or rule of law a person is entitled as against the owner of an asset to retain possession of the asset as security for a right to performance, this right of retention of possession gives rise to a possessory security right.

COMMENTS

A. General

Apart from the creation by granting (Subsection 2) or retention (Subsection 3), a security right, i.e. a limited proprietary right entitling the secured creditor to preferential satisfaction from the encumbered asset, can also be created on the basis of a right to retention of possession.

If there is a right to retention of possession, the secured creditor is regarded as holding a security right even if this had not been specifically agreed by the parties. In fact, a security right may come into being on the basis of a right to retention of possession even in the absence of any agreement between the parties. The present Article is expressly declared to apply regardless of whether the right of retention of possession arises under a contract or rule of law.

B. Policy

A right of retention exists where a person who is obliged to restore an asset to another (usually the owner) is entitled to retain that asset until certain conditions are fulfilled, e.g. performance of a reciprocal obligation. Rights of retention can be agreed by the parties; more often, however, they are implied by law. One example would be a repairer who might be entitled to retain possession of an asset until payment of the price for the repair (an alternative solution under national law would be to provide for a security right arising ex lege). Such a right of retention of possession should not be confused with a right to withhold performance of an obligation (see III.–3:401). If, e.g., a seller transfers neither ownership nor possession of the sold assets and instead withholds performance until payment of the purchase price, the seller is still the owner – assuming the seller sells its own assets – and the right to withhold performance is not regarded as a security right under this Book. It follows that the exercise of the right to withhold performance is not affected by the rules of this Book.

By elevating a mere right of retention of possession to a security right, i.e. a limited proprietary right in the asset possession of which may be retained, this Article strengthens rights of retention which have arisen pursuant to a contract or rule of law. The Article does not deal with the conditions under which such rights of possession arise, but regulates their effects only. An important consequence flowing from this provision is that the secured creditor may in the event of default have recourse to the remedies under Chapter 7. In this way the deadlock is solved that otherwise often arises. While the creditor is always entitled to retain the asset, many national laws do not permit enforcement of the “secured” right against the retained asset. Those creditors retaining possession are in a deadlock if the debtor refuses to make payment. By elevating the right of retention of possession to a possessory security right, this problem can be resolved in a quick and efficient manner.

Moreover, the principle laid down in the Article is intended to achieve uniformity throughout the member states even outside the area of security rights based upon a contract. While there is typically some protection available for repairers, warehouse-keepers, inn-keepers and similar persons which allows them to use the assets of their counterparty as security for their own rights to payment, this protection is partly achieved by the use of ex lege security rights, partly by rights of retention of possession. By elevating the latter rights to security rights, this distinction becomes irrelevant and secured creditors can avail themselves of identical remedies regardless of the position under national law.

C. Requirements for creation of security right on the basis of right of retention of possession

The only requirement mentioned in the Article for the creation of a security right on the basis of a right of retention of possession is that the secured creditor must be entitled as against the owner to retain possession of an asset as security for a right to performance.

While it is not a matter to be decided by this provision whether and under which conditions a right of retention of possession arises, the requirement that there must be such a right of retention of possession indirectly confirms that in case of a creation of a security right by this method, the general requirements set out in Subsection 1 must be fulfilled, especially the existence of the collateral, its transferability and the existence of the secured right.

The Article does not directly answer the question whether a security right may arise on the basis of a right of retention of possession if the asset to be encumbered is not owned by the security provider; it is required by this provision, however, that the person relying on the right of retention of possession, i.e. the secured creditor, must be entitled to retain possession as against the owner of the assets concerned. In relation to a right of retention of possession that is based upon an agreement, this effectively means that only a right of retention of possession agreed with the owner or with a representative of the owner can give rise to a security right. Other agreements would not bind the owner. Concerning a right of retention of possession that arises by operation of law it is a question to be decided by the national law providing for this right of retention of possession whether, e.g., a repairer is entitled as against the owner of the repaired asset to retain possession if the repair had been ordered by a person different from the owner. In any event, it is not possible to invoke the protection under the rules of this Book on good faith acquisition of a security right, especially IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right), in the context of the creation of a security right on the basis of a right of retention of possession.

D. Effectiveness and priority of right of retention of possession

Security rights based upon a right of retention of possession are possessory security rights and as such they are made effective for the purposes of Chapter 3 by the exercise of possession by the secured creditor.

They enjoy superpriority under IX.–4:102 paragraph (3), i.e. a secured creditor holding a security right on the basis of a right of retention of possession prevails over any other secured creditor claiming a security right in the asset concerned.

Section 2: Creation of retention of ownership devices

IX.–2:201: Retention of ownership devices

(1) A retention of ownership device arises in the cases set out in IX.–1:103 (Retention of ownership devices: scope) paragraph (2) if:

(a) the seller, supplier or lessor is the owner of the supplied asset or acts with authority in relation to this asset;

(b) the asset is specified in the contract for proprietary security;

(c) the secured right exists; and

(d) the seller, supplier or lessor retains ownership.

(2) Ownership is also retained for the purposes of paragraph (1)(d) where there is a transfer subject to the suspensive condition that the obligation covered is performed.

COMMENTS

A. General

The general distinction underlying these rules on proprietary security, i.e. the difference between security rights and retention of ownership devices, has already been described in Comments A and B to IX.–1:103.

While IX.–1:103 primarily defines a retention of ownership device, the conditions under which this type of proprietary security arises are set out in the present Article. The rules in the preceding Sections of Chapter 2, which cover the creation of a security right, i.e. a limited proprietary right as defined in IX.–1:102 paragraph (1), are not applicable to retention of ownership devices (with the exception of IX.–2:104 paragraphs (2) to (4)). Some of the main differences between security rights and retention of ownership devices are due to the very different methods of creation. Therefore the general principle of applying rules on security rights also to retention of ownership devices (see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)) cannot apply in the present context.

For retention of ownership devices in specific types of assets, additional rules are to be found in Section 3 of this Chapter (for the applicability of these rules to retention of ownership devices see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(b)).

B. Requirements for retention of ownership devices

A retention of ownership device arises according to this provision if the requirements mentioned in the following paragraphs are fulfilled.

Supply of assets under contract for sale, hire-purchase, financial lease or consignment. The Article is applicable only to cases where assets are supplied under contracts for sale, hire-purchase, financial lease or consignment. This requirement already follows from the first half-sentence of paragraph (1) which contains a reference to the cases set out in IX.–1:103 paragraph (2); references to contracts for sale, hire-purchase, financial lease or consignment are also contained in paragraph (1)(a) and (d).

The great majority of cases in which retention of ownership devices are used will fall under these four classes of contracts; throughout these rules, only these contracts are expressly mentioned as examples of cases where retention of ownership devices might be used. Nevertheless, the definition of retention of ownership devices in IX.–1:103 paragraph (1) is not limited to security in the context of these contracts and would allow the use of retention of ownership devices also in other transactions. This possibility is, however, at least not directly covered by the present Article. Instead, the question whether a retention of ownership device arises under any other transaction will have to be answered primarily on the basis of the criteria set out in IX.–1:103 paragraph (1) alone; as a clarification of these criteria, however, the more detailed provisions in paragraph (1)(a) to (d) of the present Article may still be useful.

Ownership of supplied assets or authorisation by owner. Paragraph (1)(a) requires that the assets that are supplied under contracts for sale, hire-purchase, financial lease or consignment must be owned by the seller, supplier or lessor or that the latter must act with authority of the owner.

If the seller, supplier or lessor supplies assets which it neither owns nor is authorised by the owner to supply, there can be no creation of a retention of ownership device at all. The (true) owner's rights are not affected and are not turned into a retention of ownership device; nor does the seller, supplier or lessor acquire such a type of proprietary security:

> A agrees on a contract for financial leasing of a car with B. The car supplied by A to B, however, is actually owned by C who is unaware of the transaction between A and B. No proprietary security arises in favour of A and C remains the outright owner (subject, however, to the possibility of a good faith acquisition by B if and when the latter exercises an option to acquire ownership). Therefore, C's rights in the supplied car remain effective against third parties even without registration.

The situation is different if the seller, supplier or lessor is not the owner, but acts with authority of the owner in relation to the supplied asset. Since the owner (who does not intend to become a party to the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment: this is not a case of representation according to Chapter 6 of Book II) has authorised the seller, supplier or lessor, the agreement on a retention of ownership reduces the owner's ownership to a retention of ownership device, i.e. a security device under this Book. Its effectiveness against third parties depends upon registration. It should be noted, however, that even though it is the (true) owner who retains a proprietary right in the sold asset, it is the seller, supplier or lessor, i.e. the person concluding the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment as supplier in its own name, who is to be regarded as secured creditor for the purposes of this Book (see IX.–1:104 paragraph (2)). Where the true owner authorises the seller, supplier or lessor to reduce its ownership into a retention of ownership device securing a right to payment owed under the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment to the seller, supplier or lessor, this authorisation also allows the seller, supplier or lessor to exercise vis-à-vis the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee the rights deriving from the true owner's retained ownership under this Book.

A, a car dealer, agrees on a contract for financial leasing of a car with B. The car supplied by A to B, however, is actually owned by A's customer C who has authorised A to supply the car under a retention of ownership device to B. A concludes the contract of financial leasing with B in its own name; C is not a party to this transaction between A and B. However, on the basis of this transaction and especially on the basis of the authorisation granted by C to A, C's former outright ownership is reduced to a mere retention of ownership device which is effective against third parties only if registered. A, however, is the lessor, therefore A is regarded as secured creditor for the purposes of this Book and is authorised to rely on the retention of ownership device, e.g. by asserting the rights of a secured creditor under IX.–5:201 (pre-default) or IX.–7:301 (after default).

Specification of supplied asset in contract for proprietary security. Paragraph (1)(b) requires that the asset which is to be subject to a retention of ownership device is specified in the contract for proprietary security, i.e. the contract for sale, hire-purchase, financial lease or consignment (see IX.–1:103 paragraph (2)). In general, every contract for sale, hire-purchase, financial lease or consignment under which assets are to be supplied will already contain a clause specifying or allowing the specification of the assets to be supplied, so that paragraph (1)(b) could be thought not to contain an additional requirement. If, however, only some of several supplied assets are to be subject to a retention of ownership device, while ownership of the others is to pass, an additional specification of these supplied assets which are to be subject to a retention of ownership device is necessary.

Existence of secured right. Paragraph (1)(c) provides that there can be a retention of ownership device only if there is a secured right, i.e. a right to performance which is to be secured by the retained ownership. If there is initially such a secured right, e.g. the right to payment of the purchase price, which subsequently ceases to exist because payment is made by the debtor, the retention of ownership device terminates (see IX.–6:101 paragraph (1)(f)). Whether or not the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee acquires unencumbered ownership after termination of the retention of ownership device due to satisfaction of the secured right, depends upon the terms of the agreements of the parties (see IX.–6:104 paragraph (5)). In case of a retained ownership under a contract of sale, the buyer will become the owner once the purchase price is paid. If, however, the parties to a contract of financial leasing merely have agreed that the lessee shall be entitled to continue to use the leased assets without any further payment or for merely nominal payment (see the last alternative of IX.–1:103 paragraph (2)(c)), the lessor remains the owner even after full payment of the secured right, i.e. the right to payment of rent.

Ownership is retained. Finally, a retention of ownership device arises only if the seller, supplier or lessor actually retains ownership in the context of the relevant transaction (see paragraph (1)(d). This requirement is obviously the core characteristic of a retention of ownership device and as such it forms a central part of the definition of this type of proprietary security in IX.–1:103 paragraph (1). Paragraph (2) clarifies this requirement by providing that a retention of ownership device is also created if there is a transfer of ownership which is only conditional upon performance of the obligation corresponding to the secured right. For example, a buyer under a retention of title agreement can agree with the seller on a transfer of ownership which is to take effect only upon payment of the purchase price. The fact that this transfer is conditional upon performance of the secured right means that the (unconditional) ownership does not pass before the secured right is satisfied and until that time the retained ownership can serve as security for the right to payment of the purchase price.

C. Retention of ownership devices as acquisition finance devices

While security rights as limited proprietary rights are regarded as acquisition finance devices only if additional criteria are fulfilled, retention of ownership devices are always covered by the definition of acquisition finance devices (see IX.–1:201 paragraph (3)). This does not have any bearing on the creation of retention of ownership devices, but it is the basis under these rules for the preferred treatment for retention of ownership devices for purposes of priority (see IX.–4:102 paragraph (1)). Moreover, it should be added, retention of ownership devices are as acquisition finance devices subject to the requirement of registration according to IX.–3:107. Contrary to the legal practice in a number of member states, a retention of ownership is therefore effective as against third parties only if in addition to the requirements of creation under IX.–2:201 there is also a registration of the retention of ownership device under Section 3 of Chapter 3.

Section 3: Creation of security rights in specific types of assets

IX.–2:301: Encumbrance of right to payment of money

(1) The encumbrance of a right to payment of money is also subject to the following special rules.

(2) The provisions of Book III, Chapter 5 apply with appropriate adaptations, except III.–5:108 (Assignability: effect of contractual prohibitions) paragraphs (2) and (3) and III.–5:121 (Competition between successive assignees).

(3) A right to payment held by the security provider against the secured creditor may be encumbered by the security provider also in favour of the secured creditor.

(4) A security right encumbering a right to payment extends to any personal or proprietary security right securing this right to payment.

COMMENTS

A. General

While Sections 1 and 2 of this Chapter 2 cover the creation of security rights and retention of ownership devices in general, the rules in this Section 3 contain special provisions covering the creation of security devices in specific assets; these rules supplement the provisions in the preceding Sections.

B. Scope of application

The present Article is applicable in every case in which a right to payment is used as collateral. The most common type of security in a right to payment will be a security right, i.e. a limited proprietary right encumbering the right to payment, created by granting; this covers also cases in which the parties purport to assign a right to payment for security purposes. Such a transaction is regarded under these rules as creating a security right only (see IX.–1:102 paragraph (3)). There will hardly ever be a practical need to agree that a right to payment should be subject to a retention of ownership device. The separation of ownership and possession – which characterises this type of security and constitutes its raison d'être – cannot apply to rights to payment. Moreover, a retention of ownership in a right to payment contradicts the economic rationale behind the recognition of that technique of security since the trading of rights to payment does not deserve the same encouragement as the acquisition of corporeal assets.

C. Application of provisions on assignment

The rules on assignment of a right to payment in Book III Chapter 5 are expressly declared to be applicable “with appropriate adaptations” (paragraph (2)). The reason for a merely “with adaptations” application is that in the case of a security right in a right to payment this right is merely encumbered and not transferred as in the case of an assignment. On the other hand, applying the rules of Book III, Chapter 5 is in line with the general rule that the encumbering of a right is a partial transfer of a limited right (of security) to the secured creditor.

Certain provisions of Book III Chapter 5 have been excepted from application. This exception applies in particular to III.–5:108 (Assignability: effect of contractual prohibitions) paragraphs (2) and (3). These paragraphs run counter to the policy of this Book to disregard any restriction on transferability, in so far as it prevents or limits the possibility to create security rights – cf. IX.–2:201. However paragraph (4) of III.–5:108 on the assignor's liability to the debtor for any breach of a prohibition or restriction of assignment does apply in the present context and is a sufficient sanction.

III.–5:121 (Competition between successive assignees) is excepted since this provision runs counter to the rules on priority and also is not reconcilable with the rules on registration in Book IX.

D. Encumbrance of security provider's right against secured creditor

Paragraph (3) clarifies a point on which doubts had arisen in some countries. It is clarified that a security provider's right to payment against the secured creditor can be encumbered in favour of the latter. The analogy to assignment helps to confirm this hypothesis. Certainly the security provider can assign a right to payment which it holds against the secured creditor to the latter. While an assignment may appear to be somewhat artificial, a mere encumbrance which may even be provisional, makes good sense.

E. Extension of encumbrance to security rights

Paragraph (4) expresses a general rule. Dependent personal and proprietary security rights fall by virtue of their dependency under the scope of a proprietary encumbrance of the right to payment, i.e. the secured creditor may in the event of default not only enforce its security right in the right to payment but may also exercise the security rights securing this right to payment in order to obtain satisfaction of the secured right. At least partly, this result follows already from the application of the rules on assignment. III.–5:115 paragraph (1) expressly extends the effects of an assignment to all "accessory rights and transferable supporting security rights". Paragraph (4) of the present Article is confirmed by IX.–7:214 paragraph (4).

IX.–2:302: Security rights in shares of a company

(1) Possession of negotiable certificates of shares of a company which are directly held is regarded as possession of the shares.

(2) Shares of companies which do not meet the requirements of paragraph (1), whether or not they are registered, cannot be subject to a possessory security right.

(3) Security rights in shares of companies extend to dividends, bonus shares and other assets which the shareholder derives from the shares but are limited to the financial value of the shares and such assets.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of application of possessory security rights

One issue that traditionally causes some problems in the context of the creation of possessory security rights is to determine the types of assets that may be subject to possessory security rights. Doubts may arise, in particular, with respect to assets which essentially are intangible rights, but which are evidenced by, or embodied in, a document.

These rules do not intend to classify these assets as corporeal (and therefore possibly subject to the exercise of possession) or intangible (which would rule out the possibility of possession of the asset concerned) in general. Instead, it appears to be preferable merely to state that certain consequences which traditionally are connected with this classification are applicable to these assets, i.e. whether possession of the relevant documents can be regarded as sufficient for the creation of a possessory security right and for achieving effectiveness of a security right in these assets as against third parties. The last-mentioned issue is to be dealt with in IX.–3:202 and IX.–3:203. By contrast, IX.–2:302 to IX.–2:304 deal with the preliminary issue of whether possession of a relevant document can be sufficient for the creation of a possessory security right in shares of a company (IX.–2:302 paragraphs (1) and (2)), bonds (IX.–2:303) and negotiable documents of title and negotiable instruments (IX.–2:304 paragraph (3))

B. Possessory security rights in shares of a company

Concerning the question whether possession of a share certificate can be regarded as sufficient for the creation of a possessory security right in the share itself, paragraphs (1) and (2) distinguish between two different types of holding shares. This reflects relatively recent developments that have occurred in the "certification" of participations in companies. While until recently shares in companies traded in the capital markets typically were embodied in negotiable share certificates, the trend for dematerialisation has radically changed the picture. IX.–2:302 must fit both the old system of negotiable share certificates as well as the modern and radically expanding systems of indirectly held certificates, global certificates and uncertificated book-entries.

Only if shares are certificated in the traditional form and where these certificates are held directly by the shareholder, does the latter have possession so that a possessory security right can be created in the share certificates and therefore in the shares themselves. The number of these situations is very limited. Primarily, there is a direct holding only if the shareholder keeps the share certificates personally. Alternatively, the certificates may be kept by a third party, especially a bank or other financial institution, in a separate safe for the customer to which only the shareholder – with or without the assistance of the holding institution – has access.

Shares of companies that do not meet the requirements of paragraph (1), whether or not they are registered, cannot be subject to a possessory security right (paragraph (2)). This applies, e.g., to shares the certificates for which are held by a bank in a fund and where the individual shareholder's rights are merely represented by a book entry in that customer's favour. The same result is achieved if the company has issued merely one global share which is deposited with a bank and where, again, the individual shareholders' rights are merely represented by book entries in their name. And finally, the preceding rules equally apply, where a company has not issued even a single global share, but all entitlements of shareholders are merely certified by book entries.

C. Scope of security rights in shares of a company

Paragraph (3) deals with a different issue. Irrespective of whether a security right in shares of a company is to be regarded as possessory or non-possessory, a question arises as to the scope of such a security right. A share of a company entitles the shareholder typically not only to a share in the capital (i.e., the value to be received as distributions in the event of a dissolution of the company) and fruits (i.e., dividends), but also to a participation in decisions on major issues of the company's affairs.

Paragraph (3) provides as a default rule that security rights in shares of companies are limited to the financial value of the shares. This means that the secured creditor is not entitled to exercise, e.g., the shareholder's voting rights. The financial value of the shares, so long as they are cum dividend, will of course include any accrued right to dividends.

IX.–2:303: Security rights in bonds

Paragraphs (1) and (2) of the preceding Article apply also to bonds.

COMMENTS

For bonds, the same issues arise and the same solutions apply concerning the creation of possessory security rights as for shares (see Comments A and B on the preceding Article. Here also, the possession of directly held bond certificates is sufficient for the creation of a possessory security right in the bonds. Where there are no directly held bond certificates, however, the bonds cannot be subject to a possessory security right.

IX.–2:304: Negotiable documents of title and negotiable instruments

(1) If and as long as a negotiable document of title covers goods, a security right in the document covers also the goods.

(2) For negotiable instruments, a security right in the instrument covers also the right embodied in the instrument.

(3) Possession of a negotiable document of title or a negotiable instrument is regarded as possession of the goods covered by the document of title or the right embodied in the instrument.

COMMENTS

A. Negotiable documents and negotiable instruments

This Article deals with the creation of a security right in negotiable documents of title as well as negotiable instruments. The common denominator of both kinds of negotiable "papers" is obviously their negotiability, i.e. their transferability. Both kinds of "papers" represent values. Negotiable documents represent corporeal assets (especially merchandise); negotiable instruments intangibles, more particularly rights to payment embodied in bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes (cf. I.–1:101 paragraph (2)(d)).

Negotiable documents of title are, in particular, bills of lading and warehouse receipts. For the rules in IX.–2:304 to apply it is assumed that a paper document has in fact been issued; it cannot apply to electronic bills of lading which have started to be used, but so far are not yet generally recognised.

B. Scope of security rights in negotiable documents of title

Paragraph (1) draws the conclusion from the negotiability of "genuine" documents of title that a security right created in the document of title also creates a security right in the corporeal assets represented by the document, as long as the negotiable document in fact covers the assets.

C. Scope of security rights in negotiable instruments

Paragraph (2) corresponds to the rule in paragraph (1) and confirms a general principle of the law of negotiable instruments. The creation of a security right in the paper creates a security right in the embodied right; i.e. the right to payment of a sum of money.

D. Possessory security rights in negotiable documents and instruments

The question may also arise whether there can be a possessory security right in negotiable documents of title and negotiable instruments (see generally Comment A on IX.–2:302). Paragraph (3) answers this question in the affirmative and provides that possession of the document or instrument, i.e. the paper, suffices for the creation of a possessory security right in the goods covered by the document of title or in the right embodied in the instrument.

IX.–2:305: Security right in an accessory

(1) A security right may be created in an asset that, at the time of creation, is an accessory to a movable or an immovable. If the rules applicable to immovable property so provide, the security right may also be created according to the rules governing immovable property.

(2) A security right in goods continues even if the encumbered asset subsequently becomes an accessory to a movable or an immovable.

COMMENTS

A. "Accessory"

The legal meaning of the term "accessory" (see the definition in IX.–1:201 paragraph (2)) does not seem to be generally known and understood.

The best way of clarifying the term is by contrasting it to the related notion of "part and parcel" (partie integrante), such as the bricks and other material used for the construction of a building. After integration, any security (or other) right existing in the bricks or similar building material is extinguished by virtue of the practically irreversible integration into the building.

By contrast, accessories do not lose their identity, if they can be separated without any or any appreciable damage to either the accessory itself or the unit with which they are connected. Practical examples are the engines of most vehicles, especially cars, aeroplanes or ships; the windows of a building or the boiler of a heating system and similar machinery – provided it is economically feasible and sensible to separate these accessories from the main asset.

B. Legal consequences

If the technical criteria of an accessory are fulfilled, the accessory preserves its legal identity. Two consequences are set out by the present Article. First, an asset that is an accessory, whether of a movable or an immovable, can be encumbered separately from that movable or immovable by a security right that is governed by the rules of Book IX. This implies that after separation from the movable or immovable the security right continues to exist as before.

Secondly, a security right created in a corporeal asset that afterwards becomes an accessory to a movable or an immovable, continues to exist thereafter. Sometimes it is even possible to achieve public notice by a corresponding notation in the land register of the immovable (cf. IX.–3:105).

IX.–2:306: Proceeds of the originally encumbered assets

(1) A security right extends to rights to payment due to a defect in, damage to, or loss of the originally encumbered asset, including insurance proceeds.

(2) A possessory security right extends to civil and natural fruits of the originally encumbered assets unless the parties agree otherwise.

(3) Other proceeds of the originally encumbered assets are covered only if the parties so agree.

COMMENTS

A. Basic idea

The three paragraphs of the provision deal with three separate approaches to the extension of a security right to the proceeds of the originally encumbered asset. The basic idea underlying this provision is that in general a security right does not extend beyond the originally encumbered asset into its proceeds, such as in particular a right to payment of the sales price of that asset. The reason for this limitation is that other providers of credit should have a fair chance of securing their rights to payment by encumbering the proceeds in the course of financing the general dealings of the buyer.

The term "proceeds" is defined in IX.–1:201 paragraph (11). It does not cover new assets resulting from the use of the original goods for production, combination or commingling; whether these new products or combined or commingled assets are covered by the original security rights is regulated separately in IX.–2:307 to IX.–2:309.

The present Article applies not only where the original assets were subject to a security right, but covers also the extension of the seller's, supplier's or lessor's rights into the proceeds of the supplied assets where these assets were subject to a retention of ownership device. It should be emphasised, however, that even where there is such an extension, the seller, supplier or lessor can only have a security right in the proceeds, not retained ownership. As opposed to the supplied assets, these proceeds had not originally been owned by the seller, supplier or lessor.

B. Exceptions

The three paragraphs of the Article establish three exceptions from the general principle underlying this provision, i.e. the rule that in general a security right does not extend beyond the originally encumbered asset into its proceeds. Each of these exceptions has a rationale and scope of its own.

Paragraph (1) contains an exception which applies automatically without specific agreement. The provision enumerates events most of which occur without the agreement and even against the will of the owner of an encumbered asset. However, this exception also covers cases in which the events mentioned may be due to acts of the security provider or its agents or employees. The reason justifying the automatic extension of the security right to the proceeds is the diminution of the value or total loss of the encumbered asset. In order to protect the secured creditor, its security right is extended to the rights to payment arising upon the occurrence of the events mentioned and events similar to these.

Paragraph (2) establishes a default rule that, in the case of a possessory security right, the security right extends to civil and natural fruits of the encumbered assets. This rule will apply unless the parties agree otherwise. The default rule is based upon the fact that in the case of a possessory security right the secured creditor has possession of the encumbered assets. Therefore, the secured creditor will first notice whether and which fruits the object possessed by it will produce. Further, the secured creditor will of necessity be the person who, as possessor of the encumbered asset, will best be able to collect any fruits.

The meaning of the term "natural fruits" (see IX.–1:201 paragraph (11)(c)) need not be explained. A typical example is the offspring of animals. Transplanted to assets other than animals, the less obvious term "civil" fruits is used. Typical examples are interest on money or dividends on company shares.

In the case of civil and natural fruits an additional issue arises, i.e. who becomes the owner of the fruits? This issue is not explicitly solved by the text; but the answer is implied. It is only the security right that is extended to the fruits. This implies that the fruits are owned by the owner of the encumbered assets, and that ownership is encumbered by the security right which encumbers the fruit-bearing main asset.

Paragraph (3) provides that proceeds other than those covered by paragraphs (1) and (2) are encumbered in favour of the secured creditor holding a security right in the asset from which these proceeds are derived only if there is an agreement of the parties, i.e. of secured creditor and security provider. The initiative to conclude such an agreement will usually be taken by the secured creditor, since the latter will be interested in preserving its security right in order to remain secured as long as possible. However, the creditor's interest will often coincide with that of the debtor, who will wish to offer security in order to prolong the covered credit as long as possible at a favourable interest rate. On the other hand, where the debtor/security provider has access to a cheaper supplier of credit, a switch to that other creditor will often only be feasible if the debtor can dispose of the proceeds as security for the new creditor.

C. Effectiveness and priority

Security rights in the proceeds covered by paragraph (1), i.e. security rights in rights to payment due to a defect in, damage to, or loss of the encumbered assets, are effective without fulfilment of any requirement under Chapter 3 (see IX.–3:101 paragraph (2)). Security rights in this type of proceeds continue to enjoy the priority of the security rights in the original encumbered assets (IX.–4:104 paragraph (1)(b)). Also any superpriority enjoyed by the security right in the originally encumbered assets is preserved (see IX.–4:105 paragraph (2)(a)). Therefore, even if a retention of ownership device in the original assets is replaced by a mere security right in proceeds of this type, the latter enjoy the same priority as the security in the original asset.

Security rights in civil or natural fruits into which the rights of the secured creditor are extended according to paragraph (2) are also covered by IX.–3:101 paragraph (2). Security rights in other proceeds, however, into which the rights of the secured creditor are extended only if there is a party agreement to this effect according to paragraph (3), are not exempted from the requirements of Chapter 3, i.e. these security rights are effective only if they are registered or if the encumbered assets are in the possession or control of the secured creditor.

Under the conditions set out in IX.–4:104 and IX.–4:105, however, also these security rights can continue to enjoy the priority of the original security rights; for details reference is made to the Comments on those provisions.

IX.–2:307: Use of encumbered goods for production or combination

(1) Where encumbered materials owned by the security provider are used for the production of new goods, the secured creditor's security right may be extended by party agreement:

(a) to the products; and

(b) to the right to payment to which the security provider as former owner of the material is entitled by virtue of the production against the producer according to VIII.–5:201 (Production).

(2) The preceding paragraph applies accordingly if goods are combined in such a way that separation would be impossible or economically unreasonable for the purposes of VIII.–5:203 (Combination).

(3) The issue whether a former owner of material other than the holder of a retention of ownership device acquires a security right by operation of law as the result of production or combination involving the material, and the effectiveness and priority of this security right are governed by Book VIII, Chapter 5. If these security rights are created by party agreement, they are subject to the provisions of Book IX, but enjoy superpriority according to VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) paragraph (3).

(4) In the case of paragraph (1)(b), the right of the secured creditor, as the former holder of an encumbrance in the material, extends to the security rights mentioned in paragraph (3).

COMMENTS

A. General

Chapter 5 of Book VIII contains extensive rules on production, combination and commingling of goods. Concerning the issues of production and combination, these provisions focus on: (i) the distribution of ownership of new goods that have been produced or combined using material owned by different persons; (ii) rights to payment owed by the owner of the new goods to former owners of material who have lost their ownership as a consequence of the production and combination; (iii) security rights in the new goods securing these rights to payment of the value of the lost assets.

The questions of the consequences of production and combination on security rights in the material that is used for production and combination are, however, not covered by Chapter 5 of Book VIII. These issues are dealt with in paragraphs (1) to (2) of this Article. Paragraphs (3) and (4) cover some questions of the delimitation between Book VIII and Book IX concerning the former material owner's security rights, see Comments E and F below.

If the material that is used for production or combination had not been subject to a security right, but to a retention of ownership device, the following Article applies instead of this Article.

B. Use of encumbered assets for production of new goods

Where encumbered assets are used for the production of new goods, these products cannot be regarded merely as replacements of the assets that were originally encumbered without any value being added. Instead, the products are the result not only of the original encumbered material used in the process of the production, but also of work by the producer and possibly of other assets that have been used for the production as well. Therefore, it would be inequitable vis-à-vis both the security provider and its other creditors to extend the original security right in assets that were used for the production of new goods into these products. In this respect it is irrelevant whether or not the production as such was permitted by the secured creditor.

It is true that the provisions in Book VIII automatically extend the proprietary rights of a former owner of material that has been used for the production into these new products, either by awarding ownership (if the owner is the producer) or by granting a security right in these products. However, the holder of merely a security right in those materials is obviously in a weaker position that does not justify an automatic extension of the security right into the products.

Paragraph (1) mentions two types of assets into which the original security right might be extended on the basis of an agreement between the security provider and the secured creditor if the collateral had been used for the production of new goods. Sub-paragraph (a) covers the new products themselves. If the security provider becomes the owner of the new goods that have been produced using the encumbered material (which according to the provisions of Chapter 5 of Book VIII will be the case where the security provider is the producer), then a security right in these new products may be created instead of the security right in the material which no longer exists.

> A owns some cloth in which she creates a non-possessory security right in favour of B. If A then produces garments using the encumbered cloth, A will become the owner of the garments; B's security right in the cloth, however, will cease to exist because the cloth no longer exists as an individual asset. If A and B have so agreed, however, B might acquire a security right in the garments instead.

Sub-paragraph (b) deals with a right to payment to which the security provider as former owner of the (encumbered) material is entitled by virtue of the production against the producer according to VIII.–5:201. If the security provider does not become the owner of the products, then the security provider cannot create a security right in these products in favour of the secured creditor because the security provider is not entitled to dispose of these products. As a substitute for losing ownership of the material, however, the security provider normally acquires a right to the payment of the monetary value of the material against the producer (see VIII.–5:201). This right to payment may be encumbered on the basis of an agreement with the original secured creditor.

> As in illustration 1, A owns some cloth in which she creates a non-possessory security right in favour of B. If then C produces garments using A's cloth which is encumbered in favour of B, C will become the owner of the garments. A's ownership of the cloth is lost and so is B's security right in the cloth. However, A has now a right to payment against C for the monetary value of the cloth. If A and B have so agreed, B might acquire a security right in this right against C instead of the original security right in the cloth.

Concerning the latter case, it should be added that the security provider who is the former owner of the material that has been used for the production and whose ownership has been lost by virtue of the production also acquires a security right in the new goods according to the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII (see also paragraph (3) sentence 1). This security right secures the security provider's right to payment against the owner of the product. If the latter right to payment is encumbered in favour of the secured creditor, i.e. the former holder of an encumbrance in the material that had been used for the production, then this security right in the right to payment extends also to the security right in the products securing the right to payment (see specifically for this situation paragraph (4); the general rule covering the extension of encumbrances of rights to payment into security rights for these rights is laid down in IX.–2:301 paragraph (4).

The facts are identical to those in illustration 2. In addition to the right to payment against C, A acquires as the result of the production and in replacement of the lost ownership of the cloth a security right in the garments owned by C. This security right serves as security for A's right to payment against C. B, in favour of whom A and B have encumbered A's right to payment against C, is therefore entitled to A's security right in the garments as well.

C. Combination of encumbered assets with other assets

According to paragraph (2) the same principles as laid down in paragraph (1) apply also to situations where encumbered assets have been combined with other assets in such a way that separation would be impossible or economically unreasonable (see VIII.–5:203). Also in this situation, value has been added to the original collateral so that it would be inequitable to extend the original security in the assets that were used for the combination into the new combined goods or into the secured right to payment for the value of the lost material if there is no party agreement to this effect.

D. Effectiveness and priority

Security rights in the new products or combined assets or in the security provider's right to payment against the owner of these assets are not exempted from the requirements of Chapter 3. Therefore there must be either possession, control or registration in order for these security rights of the former holder of an encumbrance in the material that was used for the production or combination to become effective.

If these security rights are effective, they preserve the priority of the security rights in the material (see IX.–4:103 paragraph (1)(a)); this includes the continuation of a superpriority of the original security right (see Comment A to IX.–4:103).

E. Paragraph (3): Delimitation between Books VIII and IX

It has already been noted that the provisions on production and combination in Chapter 5 of Book VIII also deal with security rights in favour of the former owner of material who has lost ownership in the course of the production or combination. The question whether such security rights are governed by Book VIII or Book IX is a rather complicated matter which is primarily to be determined on the basis of VIII.–5:101. In order to give a complete picture in the present context, paragraph (3) summarises this position as follows.

Sentence 1: Security rights arising by operation of law. If the security rights of the former owner of material have been acquired by the latter by operation of law, then the rules of Book VIII have priority over Book IX (see VIII.–5:101 paragraph (1) sentence 2 and paragraph (4) sentence 1). This covers especially the creation, the effectiveness and the priority of such security rights. Concerning other issues not covered by Book VIII, however, such as the enforcement of the security right, the provisions of Book IX remain applicable.

Paragraph (3) sentence 1 is expressly made inapplicable where the former owner of the material used for production or combination had been a holder of a retention of ownership device in the material. For assets subject to a retention of ownership device, the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII are not directly applicable (see the express exception in VIII.–5:101 paragraph (3)); instead, the consequences of production or combination of goods subject to a retention of ownership device are governed by IX.–2:308 paragraph (1), which in turn provides for a modified application of the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII.

Sentence 2: Security rights created by party agreement. Production and combination may also take place on the basis of an agreement of the parties. Such an agreement may then also provide for the creation of security rights similar to the ex lege security rights created by the provisions of Chapter 5 of Book VIII. VIII.–5:101 paragraph (4) sentence 2 provides that such security rights which are based upon a party agreement are subject to the provisions of Book IX. If material owner A agrees with producer B that the latter may produce new goods out of A's material and that, while B will be the owner of the products, A will have a right to payment for the value of the goods, secured by a security right in the products, then this security right is subject to the provisions of Book IX. The only exception laid down in VIII.–5:101 paragraph (4) sentence 2 is that VIII.–5:204 paragraph (3) is applicable, i.e. the former material owner's security right enjoys superpriority in the same manner as a purchase money security right or a retention of ownership device.

F. Paragraph (4): Security rights of former holder of encumbrance in material extend to security rights of former owner of material Paragraph (4) covers the situation which has already been dealt with in Illustration 3. Two security rights are here involved. On the one hand, the (typically ex lege) security right of a security provider who has lost ownership in the material as a result of the production or combination; and on the other hand, the consensual security rights of the secured creditor who originally held a security right in the material that was used for the production or combination. If the latter secured creditor acquires a security right in the rights of the security provider as former material owner against the new owner of the products or combined goods, then this security rights extends also to the security provider's security right in these new products or combined goods.

IX.–2:308: Use of goods subject to a retention of ownership device for production or combination

(1) The rules of Book VIII, Chapter 5 (Production, combination and commingling) apply to the consequences of production or combination of goods subject to a retention of ownership device; references to the owner of these goods are to be understood as references to the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee.

(2) Where materials subject to a retention of ownership device are used for the production of new goods, the seller, supplier or lessor may acquire a security right by party agreement:

(a) in the products; and

(b) in the right to payment to which the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee is entitled against the producer according to VIII.–5:201 (Production) on the basis of being regarded as the former owner of the material according to paragraph (1).

(3) The preceding paragraph applies accordingly if the goods are combined.

(4) In the case of paragraph (2)(b), the right of the seller, supplier or lessor extends to the security rights in the products or combined goods acquired by the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee as a result of the production or combination.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article covers production or combination involving assets subject to a retention of ownership device. It deals with two different aspects of such a production or combination:

First, there is the question of the distribution of ownership and of rights to reimbursement of value as between the producer, other owners of material used for the production or combination and the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee to whom the assets that were used for the production or combination had been supplied subject to a retention of ownership device. This issue is covered by paragraph (1) which provides for a modified application of the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII.

Second, there is the issue of whether the rights of the holder of the retention of ownership device continue in any rights acquired by the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee after the production or combination. This issue, which resembles the matters dealt with in paragraphs (1), (2) and (4) of the preceding Article for the case of a production or combination involving assets subject to a security right, is covered by paragraphs (2) to (4) of the present Article.

B. Modified application of Chapter 5 of Book VIII (paragraph (1))

The starting point for the rule in paragraph (1) is that the provisions of Chapter 5 of Book VIII do not apply to the production or commingling of assets that are subject to a retention of ownership device (see VIII.–5:101 paragraph (3)). The reason for this exemption is that the security purpose of retention of ownership devices distinguishes this type of proprietary right from ownership in general. While in general it is appropriate to extend the proprietary position of an (outright) owner of material into the products or combined assets resulting from a production or combination according to the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII, the situation is different in relation to the proprietary position of a person, whose ownership merely fulfils a security purpose under a contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment. At least if its extension into assets different from the original property is at issue, this proprietary position is weaker and cannot be treated as favourably as ownership in general under Chapter 5 of Book VIII.

This exemption of assets subject to retention of ownership devices from the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII makes it necessary that these issues are covered by the relevant rules in Book IX. Contrary to the cases of production or combination involving assets that are subject to a security right (IX.–2:308), Book IX has to deal in relation to the cases of production or combination involving assets that are subject to a retention of ownership device not only with the extension of this type of proprietary security, but also with the distribution of ownership of the products or combined assets.

Paragraph (1) of the present Article solves this issue by a modified reference to the rules of Book VIII. Referring to the rules of Book VIII ensures that issues of the distribution of ownership in cases of production or combination involving assets subject to a retention of ownership device do not follow entirely different rules than the same issues involving assets that are not subject to this type of proprietary security. This is especially relevant for the position of persons involved in the production or combination other than the holder of the retention of ownership device on the one hand or the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee on the other hand. The legal position of a third party producer or an owner of another asset involved in the same act of production or combination should not be affected by the question whether some assets used in this production or combination were subject to a retention of ownership device or merely encumbered with a security right. The reference in IX.–2:308 paragraph (1) avoids the need to reiterate the differentiated and detailed solution spelt out in Chapter 5 of Book VIII in the present Chapter.

However, this reference to the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII is made subject to an important proviso. For the purposes of the application of these provisions to cases of production or combination involving assets that are subject to a retention of ownership device, it is not the holder of the retention of ownership device who is to be regarded as the owner of these assets, but the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee, i.e. the person to whom the assets that are subject to a retention of ownership device and which are subsequently used for purposes of production or combination were supplied by their owner. This proviso emphasises the security function of the retention of ownership device and gives effect to the intentions of the parties to the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing and consignment. The buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee is the person who is able to use and benefit from the supplied assets; ownership is retained by the seller, supplier or lessor only for the purpose of securing the payment of the purchase price. An unqualified application of the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII would be in conflict with the principles of Book IX. According to the rules of this Book, there is in general no automatic extension of proprietary security into assets different from the assets originally serving as security. The result of an unqualified application of the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII, however, would be precisely such an automatic extension of the rights of the holder of a retention of ownership device into new products and combined assets. This outcome is avoided if any rights in the new products or in the combined assets or rights for reimbursement of value which would normally be awarded to the owner of the material used for production or combination according to the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII go to the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee instead.

In order to clarify this concept, the main constellations of the modified application of the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII to a production or combination involving assets subject to a retention of ownership device are set out in the following four illustrations. The same illustrations will be used in Comment C for the explanation of the rights of the holder of the retention of ownership device after production or combination according to paragraphs (2) to (4) of IX.–2:309.

Illustration 1
A sells iron ore under a retention of ownership clause to B. B produces steel out of this raw material. B is both producer and regarded as the owner of the material for the purposes of the application of Chapter 5 of Book VIII, therefore B becomes the owner of the steel.

Illustration 2
The iron ore supplied by A to B under a retention of ownership clause is mistakenly used by C to make steel. In the absence of an agreement between B and C, C becomes the owner of the steel; B, who is regarded as the owner of the material on the basis of IX.–2:308 paragraph (1) is entitled as against C to payment equal to the value of the steel, this right to payment is secured by a security right in B's favour in the steel (VIII.–5:201 paragraph (1)).

Illustration 3
A supplies paint under a retention of ownership clause to B. This paint is used for painting C's car. This is a case of combination (paint plus car), C's car is to be regarded as the principal part of the two components, therefore IX.–2:308 paragraph (1) read with VIII.–5:203 paragraph (2) provides that C becomes the sole owner of the whole. B is regarded as the owner of the paint for the purposes of the application of Chapter 5 of Book VIII, therefore B acquires a right to payment for the paint, secured by a proprietary security right in the combined asset (VIII.–5:203 paragraph (2)).

Illustration 4
A produces a special and expensive varnish used for musical instruments. This varnish is supplied under a retention of ownership clause to B. Some finish is applied to an industry-manufactured half-finished violin owned by C. Neither the varnish nor the violin can be regarded as principal part, therefore C as owner of a component becomes co-owner of the combined asset (violin plus varnish), see VIII.–5:203 paragraph (3) sentence 1. Since B is regarded as the owner of the varnish for the purposes of the application of Chapter 5 of Book VIII, also B becomes a co-owner of the combined asset (IX.–2:308 paragraph (1) read with VIII.–5:203 paragraph (3) sentence 1.

C. Rights of holder of retention of ownership device after production or combination

The rights of the holder of a retention of ownership device in assets that are used for production or combination are regulated in IX.–2:308 paragraphs (2) to (4) in parallel to the rights of a holder of a security right in assets that are used for production or combination according to IX.–2:307 paragraphs (1), (2) and (4). The general principle underlying IX.–2:308 paragraph (2) is that the rights of the holder of a retention of ownership device do not extend beyond the original supplied assets after these assets were used for production or combination, unless there is an agreement to this effect between the parties, i.e. between the seller, supplier or lessor and the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee.

If there is such an agreement, the rights which the holder of the retention of ownership device may acquire as a result of the production or combination depend upon the rights which the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee, i.e. the other party to the contract for proprietary security, acquires. Only rights acquired by the latter can be encumbered in favour of the holder of the retention of ownership device (see the general principle in IX.–2:105 sub-paragraph (a)). This can be illustrated by reference to the examples used in Comment B above.

Illustration 5
If buyer B becomes the owner of the steel produced using the iron ore supplied by A subject to a retention of ownership device, A may acquire, if this is so agreed by the parties, a security right in the steel (IX.–2:308 paragraph (2) (a)).

Illustration 6
If buyer B does not become the owner of the steel produced using the iron ore supplied by A subject to a retention of ownership device, but merely acquires a right to payment against C which is secured by a security right in the steel owned by C, A may acquire on the basis of an agreement with B a security right in this right to payment against C (IX.–2:308 paragraph (2)(b)). On the basis of IX.–2:308 paragraph (4), A may also exercise B's security right in the steel which secures this right to payment encumbered in A's favour.

Illustration 7
Also in the case of a combination rather than a production involving assets that are subject to a retention of ownership device, buyer B acquires a right to payment for the value of the supplied paint against C, who is the owner of the combined asset, secured by a security right in the combined asset. If supplier A and B had agreed on the extension of A's rights beyond the original assets subject to a retention of ownership device, B's right to payment against C is encumbered in favour of A (IX.–2:308 paragraph (2)(b)) read with paragraph (3)); A may also exercise B's security right in the combined asset securing this right to payment (see IX.–2:308 paragraph (4) read with paragraph (3)).

Where an asset supplied by A to B subject to a retention of ownership device is combined with another asset so that buyer B becomes co-owner of the combined asset, seller A may acquire, if this is so agreed by the parties, a security right in B's co-ownership share of the combined asset (IX.–2:308 paragraph (2)(a) read with paragraph (3)).

Any security rights which the holder of the retention of ownership device acquires in the new products or combined assets or in the buyer's, hire-purchaser's, lessee's or consignee's right to payment against the owner of these assets must fulfil the requirements of Chapter 3 in order to be effective as against third persons. If these security rights are effective, they preserve the priority of the original retention of ownership device (see IX.–4:103 paragraph (1)(a)) including its superpriority (see Comment A to IX.–4:103).

IX.–2:309: Commingling of assets subject to proprietary security

(1) Where encumbered goods are commingled in such a way that it is impossible or economically unreasonable to separate the resulting mass or mixture into its original constituents, but it is possible and economically reasonable to separate the mass or mixture into proportionate quantities, the security rights that had encumbered the goods continue as encumbrances of the rights which the former owners of the goods have in the resulting mass or mixture by virtue of VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) paragraph (1)); this encumbrance is limited to a share proportionate to the value of the respective goods at the moment of commingling.

(2) Where the goods that are commingled as set out in the preceding paragraph were subject to a retention of ownership device, VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) paragraph (1) applies with the proviso that the rights of the holder of the retention of ownership device are continued in a share of the resulting mass or mixture proportionate to the value of the respective goods at the moment of commingling.

(3) Any secured creditor is entitled to exercise the security provider's right to separate a quantity equivalent to that co-owner's undivided share out of the mass or mixture (VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) paragraph (2)).

(4) If encumbered financial assets held by the secured creditor are commingled by the latter in a fund, the security provider is entitled to a share in the fund. Paragraph (1) applies with appropriate adaptations.

(5) If in the cases covered by paragraphs (1), (2) and (4) the assets of the mass or fund do not suffice to satisfy all co-owners, VIII.–2:305 (Transfer of goods forming part of a bulk) paragraphs (4) and (5) apply accordingly.

COMMENTS

A. Commingling of goods subject to a security right

Paragraph (1) of this Article deals with the effects of commingling of goods that are encumbered with a security right. This provision covers various alternatives for the commingling of encumbered goods, without distinguishing between them. Only one of the several parts, or several of them, or all commingled parts may be encumbered by a security right or by security rights of one or several secured creditors.

The basic consequences of commingling are laid down in VIII.–5:202 paragraph (1). The owners of the different commingled assets become co-owners of the resulting mass or mixture, each for a share proportionate to the value of its respective asset at the moment of the commingling. For the details of the calculation of this share and for an explanation of the requirements for a commingling in the sense of VIII.–5:202 paragraph (1), reference can be made to the Comments on that provision.

VIII.–5:202 does not, however, address the issue whether security rights that had encumbered the goods before commingling remain in existence and extend to the commingled mass or mixture. Paragraph (1) of the present Article provides that a security right that had encumbered a specific part that has been integrated into the resulting mass or mixture is preserved.

This result is justified by the fact that despite the changed form (from asset to share), in essence there is full identity of the encumbered objects before and after commingling. This identity of the objects justifies the identity of the legal status before and after commingling.

Two additional consequences of this identity are (1) that the effectiveness of the security right in the part, which had been achieved before commingling, is automatically extended to the respective share in the resulting mass or mixture (IX.–3:101 paragraph (2) and IX.–3:106); and (2) that consequently the priority, including any superpriority, of the security rights encumbering the various shares is not affected by the commingling (IX.–4:103 paragraph (1)(b)).

B. Commingling of goods subject to a retention of ownership device

The commingling of goods that are subject to a retention of ownership device is exempted from the direct scope of application of the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII (see VIII.–5:101 paragraph (3)). However, paragraph (2) of the present Article declares these provisions to be applicable with only a slight proviso. The rights which the owner, i.e. the holder of the retention of ownership device, acquires in a share of the resulting mass or mixture are not regarded as (outright) ownership, but as a continuation of the original retention of ownership device and thus as generally subject to the rules of this Book. It should be pointed out, however, that the rights in the share of the resulting mass or mixture acquired by the holder of the retention of ownership device are exempted from any requirements for effectiveness against third persons under Chapter 3 (see IX.–3:101 paragraph (2) and IX.–3:106). Also any superpriority of the original retention of ownership device is not affected (see IX.–4:103 paragraph (1)(b)).

As in relation to the extension of security rights in assets that are commingled (see Comment A), this result is justified by the fact that the objects that were subject to a retention of ownership device before the commingling can still be regarded as being represented by the shares in the commingled mass or mixture.

C. Financial assets

Paragraph (4) covers slightly different issues of commingling. First, the assets that are commingled under this paragraph are financial assets; therefore, VIII.–5:202 is not applicable since this provision is limited to the commingling of goods. Second, paragraph (4) is concerned not only with the question whether the secured creditor obtains a security right in the commingled assets but also (in sentence 1) with the question whether the security provider holds any entitlement (even if encumbered in favour of the secured creditor, see sentence 2) in the commingled fund. Technically, the issue dealt with in paragraph (4) sentence 1, i.e. the commingling of financial assets by a person holding these assets for the owner, could be regarded as a matter outside the scope of the rules since it arises also where the assets are not encumbered in favour of the holder. However, since it is not dealt with in any other Book of the DCFR and since it is of specific importance in the context of these rules, it is covered by this Article as an annex to the other rules on commingling.

The first issue is whether and under which conditions a secured creditor might be allowed to commingle encumbered financial assets. While the duty to keep the encumbered assets identifiable under IX.–5:201 paragraph (1) is not directly applicable to the present situation since the secured creditor is not in possession of the intangible encumbered assets, it would seem that a similar rule must apply also to (intangible) financial assets under the secured creditor's control on the basis of the general requirement of good faith (see also Comment A on IX.–5:201). Consequently, the commingling of encumbered financial assets in a fund by a secured creditor in control which results in the individual assets being no longer identifiable will only be allowed if agreed by the parties.

Once the encumbered financial assets have been commingled by the secured creditor, which may be, but need not be, a bank or equivalent financial institution, with other financial assets of the same kind owned by other security providers, other clients or by the secured creditor itself, there can no longer be individual entitlements of the original owners to the specific assets originally contributed by them. Obviously, this is a general problem which also arises outside the area of proprietary security, i.e. if a client's financial assets held by a bank are not encumbered in favour of the latter.

The solution provided for by paragraph (4) sentence 1 conforms to that provided for the commingling of tangible assets by VIII.–5:202. The security provider, i.e. the owner of the assets, is entitled to a proportionate share in the fund. This share is proportionate to the value of its contribution (see paragraph (4) sentence 2 read with paragraph (1) sentence 2); moreover, this share is encumbered in favour of the secured creditor (see paragraph (4) sentence 2 read with paragraph (1) sentence 1).

As for the cases covered by paragraphs (1) and (2), if the fund due to events that occur later is no longer able to cover all justified claims of the holders of shares, paragraph (5) applies.

Section 4: Coverage of security

IX.–2:401: Secured rights

(1) The security covers, within its maximum amount, if any, not only the principal secured right, but also the ancillary rights of the creditor against the debtor, especially rights to payment of:

(a) contractual and default interest;

(b) damages, a penalty or an agreed sum for non-performance by the debtor; and

(c) the reasonable costs of extra-judicial recovery of those items.

(2) The right to payment of the reasonable costs of legal proceedings and enforcement proceedings against the security provider and against the debtor, if different from the security provider, is covered, provided the security provider had been informed about the creditor's intention to undertake such proceedings in sufficient time to enable the security provider to avert those costs.

(3) A global security covers only rights which originated in contracts between the debtor and the creditor.

COMMENTS

See Comments A to F on the corresponding rule in IV.G.–2:104.

CHAPTER 3: EFFECTIVENESS AS AGAINST THIRD PERSONS

Section 1: General rules

IX.–3:101: Effectiveness as against third persons

(1) A security right created according to Chapter 2 has no effects against the following classes of third persons:

(a) holders of proprietary rights, including effective security rights, in the encumbered asset;

(b) a creditor who has started to bring execution against those assets and who, under the applicable law, has obtained a position providing protection against a subsequent execution; and

(c) the insolvency administrator of the security provider, unless, subject to exceptions, the requirements of this Chapter are met.

(2) Where a security right that is effective against third persons according to the provisions of this Chapter is extended by virtue of the provisions of this Book without a need for an agreement to this effect to assets other than the assets that were originally encumbered, the extension of the security right is not subject to the requirements of this Chapter.

(3) A security right that had been acquired by a good faith acquisition in disregard of a retention of ownership device or an earlier security right in the asset to be encumbered is effective against the holder of the retention of ownership device or the holder of the earlier security right even if the requirements of this Chapter are not met. The effectiveness of the security right that had been acquired by a good faith acquisition against other third persons remains subject to the other rules of this Chapter.

COMMENTS

A. Chapter 3 in general

According to the general idea on which these rules are based, there is a basic distinction between the creation of a security right on the one hand (cf. Chapter 2) and its effectiveness as against third persons on the other hand; the latter aspect is dealt with in the present Chapter. The importance of this topic is also illustrated by the fact that Chapter 3 is by far the most comprehensive Chapter containing 44 rules; no fewer than 33 of these rules deal with registration. The distinction between creation and effectiveness – in Anglo-American law, "perfection" – is shared by all modern legislation the world over. The present rules have adopted it. They also strengthen it by the introduction of a modern and sophisticated registration system for all types of proprietary security, especially the – roughly said – non-possessory ones.

For economic reasons, the importance of the classical traditional possessory security rights has radically shrunk. The main reason for this phenomenon is the fact that in our times industrial or artisanal equipment and products as well as inventory are in practice the most important assets that are used as security rather than jewellery or objects of art. While the latter type of asset can be easily moved, those involved in industry and commerce cannot dispense with possession of their equipment or merchandise, lest they would have to stop the economic activity by which they expect to earn the money for payment of the obligations covered by the security.

A true newcomer has appeared in the (almost) new field of security rights in intangibles. It is control. The creditor's control exercised over the debtor's intangible assets – a growing field – is a true equivalent of possession of the debtor's corporeal assets by the secured creditor. In fact, possession can be conceived as a corporeal means of control.

Registration of the security provider as well as possession and control by the secured creditor is the modern triad for making a security right effective against third persons.

This scheme also provides the criteria for the subdivision of the Chapter: Section 1 contains a few general rules. Sections 2 and 3 deal with the means of achieving effectiveness, i.e. possession and control (Section 2) and registration (Section 3).

One final issue that deserves to be emphasised is that these rules on effectiveness as against third persons are applicable not only to security rights as limited proprietary rights, but also to retention of ownership devices. In general, the latter type of security device is effective as against third persons not by virtue of its creation according to the rules of Chapter 2, but only if the requirements of Chapter 3 (i.e. registration, see IX–3:107) are also fulfilled.

B. Three classes of third persons - paragraph (1)

This paragraph is the opening gate for the comprehensive Chapter 3. It sets out clearly the distinction between Chapters 2 and 3. In the enumeration of the three classes of third persons (sub-paragraphs (a) to (c)) one class is omitted, i.e. the security provider. This is an indirect confirmation of the basis on which the preceding Chapter 2 rests. A security right validly created according to Chapter 2 binds (only) the security provider and the secured creditor. However, unless it fulfils the requirements of Chapter 3, it does not bind the three classes of persons enumerated in sub-paragraphs (a) to (c). In other words, a security right merely created according to Chapter 2 is not a fully effective property right.

The negative formula used in paragraph (1) – used for pedagogical reasons – can be converted to a positive formula. The three classes of holders of rights against whom a security right created under Chapter 2 but not fulfilling the requirements of Chapter 3 cannot be asserted are identical with the persons against whom a security right can only be asserted if it is effective under the terms of Chapter 3. A brief explanation of each of the three classes of persons mentioned is useful.

Class (a): The class of holders of proprietary rights in the encumbered assets comprises especially the owner of the encumbered asset who is not the security provider (for such a constellation see Comment D on IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right)), a holder of a non-security proprietary right and the holder of an effective security right, including the holder of a retention of ownership device (cf. IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)) which covers a seller under a retention of ownership, a supplier under a contract for hire-purchase, a lessor under a contract of financial leasing and a supplier under a contract of consignment (see IX.–1:103 paragraph (2)).

Class (b): Since there are no uniform rules on judicial executions, the exact time when a creditor who has started to bring an execution against the assets of a debtor becomes an execution creditor against whom a security right is effective only if fulfilling the requirements of this Chapter must be left to the national law of the place where the execution is instituted. In some countries, the moment at which a judicial lien in favour of the execution creditor arises may serve as a criterion, since this is roughly equivalent to a private law proprietary right and fixes the rank of the execution creditor.

Class (c): Once an insolvency administrator is appointed, the security provider loses the power to dispose of the assets and security rights are effective against the insolvency administrator only if they fulfil the requirements of this Chapter. Again, there are no uniform rules as to when there is an appointment of an insolvency administrator, the exact point of time must be determined by the national law of the place where insolvency proceedings have been opened.

The three general methods of achieving effectiveness are set out in the following Article. Some of the exceptions which are announced at the end of paragraph (1) are established by paragraphs (2) and (3); another is to be found in IX.–3:107 paragraph (4).

As has already been pointed out in Comment A, the rules of Chapter 3 are applicable to retention of ownership devices as well. Generally, a retention of ownership device is effective as against the three classes of persons mentioned in paragraph (1) only if it is registered (see IX.–3:107).

C. Exempted cases - paragraph (2)

This paragraph establishes an exception to the general rules contained in paragraph (1). The exception is limited – as is required by the general idea on which Chapter 3 is based – to those special cases where on the basis of the provisions of this Book, which generally requires a contract for proprietary security as a basis for the creation of security rights, security rights are extended to assets other than the original collateral without a need for an agreement to this effect.

Two examples of such extensions may be given. First, this rule covers cases where a security right is lost due to a defect of, damage to or loss of the encumbered asset (IX.–2:306 paragraph (1)). In these cases, the security is extended to rights to payment that have come into being on the basis of these events, especially a right to damages against the person that has caused the damage or defect to, or loss of, the encumbered asset, as well as insurance proceeds. In these cases of an involuntary loss of the originally encumbered asset the lost security is compensated by the rights to payment replacing the lost encumbered asset. The special nature of these events justifies an automatic extension of the security right to the substitute asset and also the waiver of publicity. However, the secured creditors may, especially if rights to payment of high value are involved, wish to establish the otherwise required publicity in order to be warned against risks that may be triggered by ignorant third persons.

Second, this rule applies to cases governed by IX.–2:309 paragraphs (1) and (2). This provision deals with the commingling of encumbered assets of the same kind, where the originally encumbered assets are replaced by a share in the mass resulting from the commingling. Both in law and virtually in fact, the encumbered assets as such do not change; their legal identification has just become more difficult. Because of the unchanged identity of the encumbered assets there could be doubts as to whether this is actually a case of an extension of the original security right to other assets; in order to clarify the position, a specific rule dealing with this case has been included in IX.–3:106.

The exception in paragraph (2) applies to the listed security rights subject to an important condition. The security rights in the assets that were originally encumbered must have been effective against third persons according to the rules of this Chapter in order for the security rights based upon an ex lege extension of the secured creditor's rights to be exempted from the requirements of Chapter 3. It would be odd if the secured creditor actually benefited, e.g., from the destruction of the original collateral and the resulting extension of the security right into the insurance proceeds, if these extended security rights could be effective against third persons while for the original security rights the relevant conditions under Chapter 3 had not been met.

This paragraph contains another exception. Security rights covered by paragraph (3), i.e. security rights acquired on the basis of a good faith acquisition in disregard of an already existing proprietary security, are not exempted from the requirements of Chapter 3 altogether. Rather, it is only against the other persons mentioned in paragraph (3) sentence 1 that these security rights are effective without meeting the requirements of this Chapter in order to be regarded as effective. Paragraph (3) sentence 2 expressly provides that as against other third persons, the effectiveness of the security right that is covered by paragraph (3) remains subject to the other rules of this Chapter, i.e. there has to be possession or control by the secured creditor or a registration in order for this security right to be effective against third persons in general. This rule can be explained as follows. On the basis of the good faith acquisition, the new secured creditor is protected in its good faith reliance on the non-existence of any prior encumbrance of the asset in which this secured creditor has acquired a security right. In so far as other third persons are involved, however, the fact that the security right had been acquired on the basis of a good faith acquisition is irrelevant.

Where a security right had been acquired in an asset that was subject to a retention of ownership device because the secured creditor was in good faith and was able to rely on IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right), no registration of the security right or fulfilment of any other requirement of Chapter 3 is necessary against the owner of this asset, i.e. the holder of the retention of ownership device. In case the holder of the new security right wants to enforce this right against the security provider and no other person except the holder of the earlier retention of ownership device is involved, it is not necessary that the new security right fulfils the requirements of this Chapter. If other third persons are involved as well, however, such as the insolvency administrator or holders of other security rights which were not affected by the good faith acquisition, the security right acquired on the basis of IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) is effective against them only if the requirements of Chapter 3 are fulfilled.

If the security right had been acquired in disregard of an earlier encumbrance in the same asset on the basis of a good faith acquisition allowed by IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset), this security right need not fulfil any requirements under this Chapter in order to be effective against the holder of the earlier encumbrance in disregard of which the security right had been acquired. The good faith acquisition allows the secured creditor to be treated as if the earlier security right did not exist. Again, the requirements of this Chapter must be fulfilled if the holder of the new security rights wants to achieve effectiveness of this security right against other third persons as well.

It should be emphasised, however, that paragraph (3) of the present Article has a rather limited scope of application. As has been pointed out in the Comment A on IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right), at least if the earlier security right or retention of ownership device fulfils the requirements of Chapter 3 there will be only rarely the possibility for another secured creditor to acquire a security right in the collateral in disregard of the earlier proprietary security.

IX.–3:102: Methods of achieving effectiveness

(1) For security rights in all types of assets, effectiveness may be achieved by registration of the security right pursuant to Section 3.

(2) Effectiveness can also be achieved pursuant to Section 2:

(a) in the case of corporeal assets, by the secured creditor holding possession of the encumbered assets; or

(b) in the case of certain intangible assets, by the secured creditor exercising control over the encumbered assets.

COMMENTS

This Article enumerates the three main ways of achieving effectiveness of a security right.

A. Paragraph (1): registration

The broadest, most general way is registration pursuant to Section 3 of this Chapter. This paragraph is applicable to all types of assets – and not only to specific types such as those enumerated in paragraph (2) for the purposes of that provision.

In fact, it is quite possible and may under certain circumstances even be advisable to register a security right although the latter is effective also under one of the criteria of paragraph (2). Registration may be especially advisable where the actual exercise of possession by the secured creditor might be disputed by competing creditors or could be easily lost. Also the exercise of control could be in danger where the financial institution administering the book account might decline to follow the secured creditor's instructions.

For cases in which effectiveness is created in two ways, e.g. by possession as well as by registration, the question of the relationship between the two methods arises. That issue is settled by IX.–3:103. The possibility of a change of the method for effectiveness is addressed by IX.–3:104.

Registration according to paragraph (1) is especially important for retention of ownership devices and other acquisition finance devices. For these types of proprietary security, IX.–3:107 provides that registration is the mandatory method of achieving effectiveness.

B. Paragraph (2): possession and control

This paragraph presents two methods of achieving effectiveness in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b). The first of these, possession of the encumbered assets by the secured creditor, is in the long-standing tradition of the possessory pledge. Although largely outmoded today, there are still situations in which this form of security can be useful, and not only for luxury goods or pieces of art. For economically relevant situations, recourse is often taken to so-called field warehousing.

Illustration

A part of the supply of producer P is stored in a separate (part of a) building, which is locked. The lock may be opened only by a combination of two keys. One such key is held by A, the security provider, the other by F, acting for the field warehouse, who must not be an employee of A or otherwise be subject to A's instructions (limited-right possessor or possession-agent, cf. VIII.–1:207, VIII.–1:208).

By contrast, the second alternative covered by IX.–3:102 paragraph (1)(b) is of very recent origin and has been developed for a specific type of modern intangible, i.e. "control". It is of primary importance for establishing a security over modern types of intangible financial assets. For details, reference is made to IX.–3:204.

IX.–3:103: Security right made effective by several methods

(1) If a security right has been made effective by registration, possession or control, it may be made effective also by any of the other methods. Where the effects diverge, the stronger effects of a chosen method prevail.

(2) The preceding rules also apply if a security right that is exempted from the requirements of this Chapter is also made effective by registration, possession or control .

COMMENTS

A. Factual alternatives of applying more than one method to achieve effectiveness

The preceding Article enumerated three main methods by which a security right can be made effective as against third persons, scil. by registration, possession and control. Possession and control are alternatives which can only apply to corporeal assets and intangibles, respectively. The only method that can be applied to any object whatsoever, whether corporeal or intangible or even only intellectual (i.e., knowledge) is registration.

In practice, therefore a cumulation of methods will only occur between possession or control on the one hand, and registration, on the other hand. Especially in marginal situations where the secured creditor may regard its possession or control of the encumbered corporeal or intangible assets as being not beyond any doubt, a careful and well-advised creditor may wish to achieve effectiveness by a second, broadly accessible method, such as registration.

B. Legal issues

The first sentence of paragraph (1) makes it clear that it is always possible to cumulate the means of achieving effectiveness.

Wherever the parties in fact have used several methods of publicity for a specific security right, the question arises which effects attach to such a duplication of means. According to the second sentence, the “stronger effects” of one of the chosen methods prevail. However, under the rules of Book IX, generally speaking, the effectiveness of a security right does not differ according to the method chosen for achieving it. Still, this may be different in fields outside the rules on proprietary security proper, such as execution or insolvency proceedings.

Nevertheless, there is one point where there is a factual difference, which may have important practical consequences, and that is the time element. Under the present rules, effectiveness commences at the time when it has been achieved. The term “stronger effect”, therefore, as applied to the rules of Book IX means that a security right has become effective at the earlier of the times at which it became effective by one of the means of effectiveness.

Paragraph (2) broadens the scope of application of the Article to cases where – exceptionally – a security right is effective although none of the usual methods of achieving effectiveness has been employed. One such exemption is found in IX.–3:101 paragraph (2). For an explanation, cf. Comment C to that provision. An exemption of a certain class of persons for a limited type of security rights is laid down in IX.–3:107 paragraph (3). For an explanation, reference is made to the Comments to that provision.

Although in all of the these cases effectiveness exceptionally does not depend upon any form of publicity, the parties and especially the secured creditor may wish to insist on the voluntary observation of publicity; usually registration may be chosen because it allows the security provider under a security right or the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee under a retention of ownership device to preserve possession in the encumbered asset. In all these cases, then, paragraph (2) declares paragraph (1) to be applicable.

IX.–3:104: Change of method

If the method for achieving effectiveness is changed, effectiveness is continuous, provided the requirements of the new method are met immediately upon termination of the preceding method.

COMMENTS

This Article addresses a different aspect of the plurality of possible methods of achieving effectiveness. Its purpose is clear from its text and requires hardly any explanation. If a secured creditor wishes to change the method of publicity, an uninterrupted temporal continuity must be observed between the former and the new method. For example, if the parties decide to convert a possessory into a non-possessory security right, continuity of publicity and therefore of effectiveness is only preserved if registration of the non-possessory security right is effected before the secured creditor returns possession of the encumbered asset to the security provider.

IX.–3:105: Security right in an accessory to an immovable

A security right in an accessory to an immovable may upon accession also be made effective by registration or annotation in a land register, provided this is authorised by the law governing the land register.

COMMENTS

This Article deals with an issue which arises at the borderline between the laws on movables and on immovables. It deals with accessories (as defined in IX.–1:201 paragraph (2)) that are attached to an immovable (cf. the examples given in the Comments to the cited rule). Since the scope of the present provisions is limited to movables, the present Article can merely refer to the law governing the immovable and must leave it entirely to that law whether indeed a registration or at least annotation is possible or not. Of course, it would be desirable for that possibility to exist, since it may allow the protection of the secured creditor to be extended to cover the accessory to the immovable; in particular, an annotation may ensure effectiveness of the security right in an accessory as against creditors holding mortgages over the immovable.

IX.–3:106: Security right in commingled assets

(1) Where a corporeal asset, which is encumbered with an effective security right, is commingled, the security right in the corresponding share of the bulk according to IX.–2:309 (Commingling of assets subject to proprietary security) remains effective.

(2) The preceding paragraph applies with appropriate adaptations if financial assets are commingled in a fund.

COMMENTS

A. General remark

This Article is based upon IX.–2:309. It can be understood as a specific application of the general principle laid down in IX.–3:101 paragraph (2) and extends the effects of IX.–2:309 to effectiveness. It embodies the basic idea that there is legal continuity between the rights in the individual parts which by commingling have been integrated into the resulting mass or fund.

B. Paragraph (1)

Paragraph (1) draws a consequence for the issue of effectiveness. The effectiveness which may have been achieved for one, several or all of the individual contributions to the mass or bulk is continued individually for each of the respective shares in the bulk or mass which correspond, respectively, to the respective contribution.

C. Paragraph (2)

The same considerations apply if financial assets (IX.–1:201 paragraph (6)) are merged into a fund (IX.–2:309 paragraph (4)).

IX.–3:107: Registration of acquisition finance devices

(1) An acquisition finance device is effective only if registered.

(2) If registration is effected within 35 days after delivery of the supplied asset, the acquisition finance device is effective from the date of creation.

(3) If registration takes place later than 35 days after delivery, the acquisition finance device becomes effective only at the time of registration and does not enjoy superpriority under IX.–4:102 (Superpriority).

(4) Where a credit for assets supplied to a consumer is secured by an acquisition finance device, this proprietary security is effective without registration. This exception does not apply to security rights in proceeds and other assets different from the supplied asset.

COMMENTS

A. General remark

This Article contains several rules with respect to effectiveness which underline the privileged regime of acquisition finance devices, i.e. retention of ownership devices and (normal) security rights securing acquisition financing (IX.–1:201 paragraph (3)). The relevant rules deal with the special conditions under which these devices can become effective, which deviate in several respects from the ordinary regime that is established for security rights which are not acquisition finance devices.

B. Starting point

Paragraph (1) marks the starting point, and this corresponds to the general rules on effectiveness that form the basis of this chapter. Both types of acquisition finance devices, i.e. retention of ownership devices and security rights fulfilling the requirements of IX.–1:201 paragraph (3), are types of non-possessory security and therefore require registration in order to become effective (cp. IX.–3:102). This is supported by the point in time at which the grace period of 35 days starts to run. This is the date of delivery of the supplied asset. The delivery need not be to the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee but can also be to a third person to whom according to the instruction of the former the bought assets have to be delivered. Only upon delivery of the supplied asset, does the proprietary security in this asset become "non-possessory". Any acquisition finance devices, whether retention of ownership devices or security rights as limited proprietary rights, therefore cannot be effective, unless and until another kind of effectiveness has been created. The only practical alternative in the circumstances is registration.

C. Special aspects: Non-consumer buyers, hire-purchasers, lessors or consignees

Registration within 35 days after delivery. If registration of the seller's, supplier's, lessor's or other secured creditor's acquisition finance device is achieved within 35 days after delivery (as defined in B), the security has retroactive effect from the date of creation (paragraph (2)).

Why has the grace period been fixed at 35 days? This is not an arbitrary decision but takes into account a wide-spread commercial practice. Buyers are very often given a period of 30 days to effect payment; only payments after the expiration of this period, except if agreed upon, trigger an obligation to pay interest for delayed payment.

If a seller, supplier, lessor or other secured creditor wishes to be on the safe side, especially if the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessor or consignee (i.e. the security provider) is in financial straits, it may wish to register before expiration of the 35 days, on the day of delivery or even any time before delivery.

Whenever registration has taken place within the 35 days period, an important effect is achieved. The acquisition finance device becomes retroactively effective from the date of its creation and enjoys superpriority according to IX.–4:102 paragraph (1).

Effects of retroactivity on rights created in the interim. Three kinds of "inimical" rights may have to be distinguished.

A competing security right. The relationship between an acquisition finance device and a competing security right created and made effective in the interim period is determined by IX.–4:102 paragraph (1). Retroactivity and the superpriority of the acquisition finance device prescribed by the latter provision prevail over the ordinary time sequence of several registrations. This does not mean that the security right that had become effective in the interim period is invalid or ineffective. It merely means that the secured creditor holding an acquisition finance device can rely on the grace period and thereby set aside the ordinary sequence. In other words, the security made effective in the interim period remains effective; however, it ranks below the privileged security of the seller, supplier, lessor or other secured creditor holding an acquisition finance device.

Rights of an execution creditor of the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessor or consignee: Under these rules, it would appear that an execution creditor of the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessor or consignee who has brought an execution in the 35 days period would also be bound by the rule in paragraph (2). That ought to be the result at least in those member states which regard the execution creditor as holding a security right with a priority status corresponding to the time at which the execution proceedings were brought (cp. IX.–4:107). Since public authorities are bound to respect the private law relations into which they intervene, also the very limited retroactivity laid down by paragraph (2) ought to be respected.

Involvement of an insolvency administrator for the buyer's, hire-purchaser's, lessor's or consignee's assets. In principle, the secured creditor should be able to rely upon the retroactivity provided for by paragraph (2) also against an insolvency administrator who is appointed in the interim period. However, this solution is even less certain, since this administrator represents the interests of all creditors of the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessor or consignee and usually exercises public authority.

Conclusion: What practical conclusion must be drawn from the preceding considerations? Generally, the retroactivity provided for by paragraph (2) gives the holder of an acquisition finance device effective protection. However, in order to avoid disputes and legal risks, and especially if the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessor or consignee is financially weak and there are many unpaid creditors, it is advisable not to rely too much on the 35 days grace period, but to register as soon as possible.

Superpriority. Acquisition finance devices, i.e. retention of ownership devices and security rights securing acquisition financing (IX.–1:201 paragraph (3)), which are registered within the 35 days period of paragraph (2) enjoy superpriority. This is expressly laid down by IX.–4:102 paragraph (1). It can also negatively be deduced from paragraph (3).

Paragraph (3) confirms, although in a negative way, the positive features which attach to a registration before expiry of the 35 days limit. First, a "late" registration triggers the "normal" effects of a registration. It has no retroactive effect. Even more important is a second consequence, and that is the loss of the superpriority awarded to a "quick" registration within the 35 days period. This reduction of status is due to the fact that the prompt action rewarded by paragraph (2) is lacking here. The delay creates perhaps even the suspicion that a credit secured late is more in the nature of general credit than of true acquisition finance.

D. Special aspects: consumer buyers, hire-purchasers or lessees

Paragraph (4) establishes an exception from the preceding paragraphs. Again, this is also a deviation from the normal pattern. Exceptionally, security rights and retention of ownership devices in assets supplied to a consumer as security provider (especially as buyer, hire-purchaser or lessee) are effective without registration.

First, it is clear from the context that the privilege of non-registration is strictly limited to credit acquisitions of consumers; the most relevant types of acquisition finances will be sales under retention of ownership agreements and contracts of financial leasing.

Second, there is no requirement to register the security right or retention of ownership device in order to achieve effectiveness of the proprietary security in the consumer's acquired assets. Of course, as always in cases of such privileges, the secured creditor, i.e. especially the seller, lessor or other supplier, will nevertheless have to ascertain whether, if the consumer is financially weak, use of this privilege should or should not be made. The number of potentially competing creditors may also be relevant here, as may be the secured creditor's wish to avoid disputes and legal uncertainty which can easily be avoided by (voluntary) registration.

Third, although unregistered, the effectiveness of the security right or retention of ownership device is strengthened by IX.–4:102 paragraph (1). The proprietary security enjoys a superpriority. In effect, it has priority over security and other proprietary rights that may have been created earlier. Since the consumer security provider's possibility of creating security rights in future assets is already limited on the basis of IX.–2:107 paragraph (1)(b), however, the relevance of this superpriority is limited to other proprietary rights.

Fourth, the exception is limited to the primary objects supplied to the consumer and does not extend to proceeds and other assets. This limitation is dictated by the purpose of the Article – to protect acquisitions of consumers. It is not intended to establish a general privilege for all assets of consumers.

IX.–3:108: Importation of encumbered asset

If an encumbered asset is brought from a country outside the European Union into this area, any pre-existing security right which is effective remains effective if the requirements laid down in this Chapter are fulfilled within three months.

COMMENTS

A. Issue

The European internal market is integrated into world trade; the internal market is in a broader, but very real, sense part of the world market. The European economy depends upon imports from the world market. Since imports have to be financed and may be financed by extra-European sources, it is necessary to envisage the fact that frequently imported goods may have been encumbered abroad with security rights as coverage for credits financing the foreign exporter or perhaps even the European importer. How should such imported security rights be treated in Europe?

B. Solution

This Article offers the basic solution by providing that upon the crossing of the border of the European Union a security right (as well as a retention of ownership device, cf. IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)) that had been effective before entry into Europe remains effective upon one condition. It must be made effective according to these rules within three months.

This rule leaves some questions open – consciously, since there is little experience in this broad field.

First, must "importation" be strictly understood as a trade between a foreign exporter and a European importer? While this will probably cover most cases, it certainly would not cover all. Intended to be covered are all factual or legal/economic transports over the border of Europe: private removals; luggage and belongings of tourists, soldiers, diplomats, immigrants, etc.

Second, how can it be found out whether there had been – on crossing the border to Europe – an "effective" security right or retention of ownership device in the encumbered asset? These rules do not establish a conflicts rule which would be able to give a reply, since for the great variety of corporeal things and incorporeal rights probably no simple formula (such as lex rei sitae) would suffice. By leaving this issue open, flexibility is increased.

Third, the proprietary status of the imported goods during the three months grace period is also left open. It would seem to be preferable to assume that the effectiveness which the security right or retention of ownership device had achieved according to the applicable foreign law survives during this transitory period until either effectiveness according to these rules is established or the grace period has expired. Thereafter, effectiveness can only be achieved by complying with the present rules. This assumption is also in keeping with the similar rule in IX.–3:107 paragraph (2).

On the issue of the priority of the proprietary security in an imported asset, cf. IX.–4:106.

Section 2: Possession or control by creditor

IX.–3:201: Possession

Security rights in encumbered corporeal assets can be made effective by the secured creditor holding possession:

(a) if the secured creditor or an agent (other than the security provider) acting for the secured creditor exercises direct physical control over the encumbered assets;
(b) where the encumbered assets are held by a third person (other than the security provider), if the third person has agreed with the secured creditor to hold the encumbered assets only for the latter; or
(c) where the encumbered assets are jointly held by the secured creditor and the security provider or where a third person holds the encumbered assets for both parties, if in either case the security provider has no access to the encumbered assets without the secured creditor's express consent.

COMMENTS

A. Possession and control

"Possession" is one of the basic concepts of property law which is familiar to all legal systems in Europe. In the context of Chapter 3 on effectiveness, possession fulfils the function of being one of the three means of achieving effectiveness. In fact, in the context of the traditional pledge, possession by the pledgee was and still is the central requirement to bestow proprietary effect, i.e. effect against all the world on the pledge. In modern terms, the pledgee's possession of the pledged corporeal asset bestows effectiveness upon the pledge. This traditional function is confirmed by IX.–3:102 paragraph (2)(a); thus it continues to have the same function as formerly.

"Control", by contrast, is a novel term. It applies to intangibles as objects of security rights – a category of rapidly increasing importance – especially in the field of intellectual property law (which, however, cannot be further pursued here) and uncertificated financial assets (cf. IX.–1:201 paragraph (6)). See further IX.–3:204.

The functions of possession and control are the same; only their respective fields of application differ. It might therefore have been considered appropriate to merge the two concepts and institutions into one, i.e. into the more neutral one of control. Nevertheless, this idea has not been adopted because:

- its application to corporeal assets would introduce an element of uncertainty;
- the shades of meaning of possession as applied to the typical fact situations occurring in the context of a possessory pledge are well settled in most European countries and should not be placed in doubt by using a novel terminology; and
- Book VIII has preserved the term possession (especially VIII.–1:205 to VIII.–1:208).

In relation to this last point, it would be confusing if this Book deviated on such a central term, particularly as this Book refers in several places Book VIII.

B. The scheme of the Article

The present Article contains the central rules on possession as the means for achieving effectiveness for a security right, where the encumbered corporeal assets are held by the secured creditor. In traditional parlance, this is a possessory pledge. In the context of the present rules which have only one security right, possession has merely the function of being one of the three means to establish the effectiveness of a security right. This particular means is used to establish effectiveness for precisely the same fact patterns for which the possessory pledge has been used.

The essential elements of a possessory security right are expressed in the opening part of the Article. The secured creditor must hold possession of the encumbered corporeal assets. This main rule is then specified by three sub-rules. These reflect the most typical fact patterns that have been evolved in European practice over centuries and are still being used today.

The basic rule is to be found in sub-paragraph (a). The following sub-paragraphs (b) and (c) are variations of this basic rule and cover rather special fact patterns.

C. The three fact patterns

Sub-paragraph (a). The basic and typical fact pattern of a possessory security right made effective by virtue of the secured creditor's possession is specified by sub-paragraph (a). This contains two aspects, a personal and a technical. As to the personal element, it is required that the secured creditor must hold possession personally or through an agent. However, the security provider is disqualified as agent, since this would amount in fact – although perhaps not in law – to a non-possessory security right. An agent is a person who is authorised to act for another (see the Annex of definitions). Since the agent is a kind of "alter ego" of the principal, one can say that the latter acts through the agent; indirectly it is the creditor as principal who acts by means of the agent.

To exclude the security provider from the function of the agent is easily explicable. The security provider, who usually is the owner of the encumbered asset is not a disinterested third person acting as agent; rather, this person as owner of the encumbered asset has obvious personal interests which are as a rule opposed to those of the secured creditor. This justifies the exclusion of the security provider when acting as the secured creditor's agent.

Sub-paragraph (b). Sub-paragraph (b) allows a third person – again except the security provider – to hold the encumbered asset, provided this third person holds the encumbered asset only for the secured creditor. If a third person holds the encumbered assets exclusively for the secured creditor, this amounts in effect to an ad hoc agency. It is appropriate to regard this situation as a holding of the encumbered assets by the secured creditor. Practical examples are a warehousekeeper or an artisan who is charged by the secured creditor with doing some repair work on the encumbered asset. Again, as in sub-paragraph (a) and for the same reason, the pledged assets may not be held by the security provider acting as "agent" for the secured creditor.

Sub-paragraph (c). A typical example for such a two-keys arrangement is a store room which is equipped with corresponding slots; cf. also the example of field warehousing mentioned Comment B on IX.–3:102. In all these cases the decisive criterion is laid down in the final clause of sub-paragraph (c). The security provider must not have access to the encumbered assets without the express consent of the secured creditor.

D. Special types of possessory security rights

While IX.–3:201 applies to possessory security rights in corporeal assets only, IX.–3:202 and IX.–3:203 extend the scope of the use of possession for achieving effectiveness of security rights to certain constellations of encumbrances in intangible assets. For details, see the Comments on these last two Articles.

IX.–3:202: Negotiable documents of title and negotiable instruments

(1) Possession of a negotiable document of title or negotiable instrument is also sufficient for the effectiveness of a security right in the goods covered by the document of title or in the right embodied in the instrument.

(2) The security right in the goods covered by the document of title according to paragraph (1) is not affected if the covered assets are relinquished to the security provider or another person for a period of up to ten days against a duly dated formal trust receipt and for the purpose of loading or unloading, sale or exchange or other dealing with the goods except the creation of a competing security right.

COMMENTS

A. Possession of negotiable documents and negotiable instruments

As has already been explained in Comment A on IX.–2:302, the question whether possession can be of legal significance is somewhat problematic concerning assets that by their nature are not corporeals themselves or which are not themselves subject to the exercise of direct possession, but which are evidenced or embodied by these assets. Without intending to interfere with the general classification of the assets covered, this Article and the following Article provide, in relation to several types of such assets, that possession of the relevant document or certificate is sufficient also for achieving effectiveness of a security right in the asset evidenced or embodied by the document.

Paragraph (1) of this Article deals with the significance of possession of a negotiable document of title or negotiable instrument: IX.-2:304 paragraph (3) already states that possession of these documents or instruments is sufficient for creation of a possessory security right in the goods covered by the document of title or in the right embodied in the instrument. On this basis, paragraph (1) of the present Article provides that possession of such documents or instruments also suffices to achieve effectiveness against third persons for a security right in the goods covered by the document of title or in the right embodied in the instrument

B. Possession of negotiable documents and negotiable instruments

Paragraph (2) confirms on the level of effectiveness an exception which is accepted in international commercial practice. A short interruption of the secured creditor’s holding of the goods covered by a bill of lading does not destroy a validly and effectively established security right, provided the goods are handed over to the security provider or its agent:

- for a strictly limited period of time, i.e. for 10 days at most;
- against the issue of a subsidiary instrument, i.e. a formal trust receipt; and
- only for the enumerated purposes of loading or unloading, sale or exchange or other dealing with the goods represented by the bill of lading other than the creation of a competing security right.

IX.–3:203: Certificated shares and bonds

Paragraph (1) of the preceding Article applies with appropriate adaptations to possession of directly held certificates of shares of companies, if negotiable, and directly held bond certificates.

COMMENTS

For directly held certificated shares of companies, if negotiable, and directly held bonds embodied in a bond certificate, this Article declares applicable the principle contained in paragraph (1) of the preceding Article. This means that the possession of the paper certificate is sufficient for the effectiveness of a security right in the embodied right. This limited extension of the rule contained in paragraph (1) of the preceding Article to shares and bonds is in line with the approach followed in IX.–2:302 and IX.–2:303. Also the principle that possession of the paper is sufficient for the creation of a possessory security right is limited to these types of shares and bonds.

On the meaning of “directly held certificates or shares of companies”, see Comment B to IX.–2:302.

IX.–3:204: Control over financial assets

(1) Security rights can be made effective by the secured creditor exercising control over:

(a) financial assets which are entered into book accounts held by a financial institution (intermediated financial assets); and

(b) non-intermediated financial instruments registered in a register maintained by or for the issuer or which under national law is determinative of title.

(2) The secured creditor exercises control over the assets mentioned in paragraph (1)(a), if:

(a) the secured creditor with the assent of the security provider has instructed the financial institution administering the book account not to admit dispositions by the security provider without the secured creditor's consent;

(b) the assets are held by the financial institution for the secured creditor in a special account; or

(c) the financial institution is the secured creditor.

(3) The preceding paragraph applies with appropriate adaptations to the exercise of control by the secured creditor over the assets mentioned in paragraph (1)(b).

(4) The satisfaction of the requirements of paragraphs (2) and (3) must be evidenced in writing or recording by electronic means or any other durable medium.

COMMENTS

A. General remark

This Article aims at shaping a system of making effective security rights in intangible assets. Obviously, the means for achieving effectiveness for corporeal assets, i.e. possession by the secured creditor, cannot be extended to intangible assets in general. On the other hand, the increasing practical importance of intangible values, especially financial assets, calls for an alternative means of publicity which – unlike registration, which of course remains possible – practically is as efficient and clearly visible as is possession for corporeal assets. Following the model of American-Canadian practice and law and, in particular, the more recent example of the EU-Directive on Financial Collateral Arrangements of 2002 (FCD), the present Article adopts the criterion of "control" for making security rights in financial assets (as defined in IX.–1:201 paragraphs (6) and (7)) effective.

In all cases not covered by the present Article, intangibles are subject to the alternative technique of achieving effectiveness for security rights in intangibles, i.e. registration.

B. Scope of application of the concept of control

Paragraph (1) delimits the scope of application of control. The objective scope of control as resulting from this paragraph (1) are financial assets entered into book accounts. According to IX.–1:201 paragraph (6), financial assets are rights to payment and financial instruments; the latter term is defined in IX.–1:201 paragraph (7). This definition corresponds to that in the FCD Article 1 paragraph (4)(a) and in Article 2 paragraph (1)(d) and (e).

By contrast, the subjective scope of application of the present Article differs both in approach and extent from that of the FCD. Paragraph (1)(a) of the present Article merely demands that the financial assets be held by a financial institution. This criterion was adopted since financial institutions are subject to public supervision, and – if properly conducted – this provides some assurance of solidity and reliability. Assets meeting these criteria are "intermediated financial assets". Another category is "non-intermediated financial instruments", provided they are registered in a register maintained by or for the issuer. Examples are registers of shareholders of share companies, either held by the issuing company or by a neutral institution specialising in the registration of shares for other companies or where such registration under national law is determinative of title (such as CREST in the United Kingdom).

C. Methods of control over intermediated financial assets

Paragraph (2) deals with the methods by which the secured creditor can exercise "control", i.e. the means to achieve effectiveness. Three alternatives are provided for the exercise of control over intermediated financial assets.

(a) An instruction by the secured creditor with the security provider's assent to the financial institution not to allow dispositions by the security provider without the secured creditor's consent. This rule presupposes that the encumbered financial assets are still held in the name of the security provider, but its power to dispose of the assets is restricted.

(b) In order to avoid any remaining risk under solution (a) that the restriction of the security provider's power to dispose may be overlooked or disregarded, it is safer for the secured creditor to demand transfer of the encumbered assets to a special account of the secured creditor. A special account has the effect of keeping the encumbered assets not only separate from the security provider's general assets, but also from those of the secured creditor.

(c) There is a special situation, if the financial institution holding the security provider's assets is at the same time the secured creditor (sub-paragraph (c)). Basically, the two alternatives under sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) remain applicable, although slight adaptations are necessary. In the case of sub-paragraph (a), an instruction by the secured creditor is no longer necessary; rather, the financial institution as the secured creditor can by internal order achieve the same result. Likewise, in the case of method (b), a separate account instituted at the financial institution may increase the factual protection of the financial institution as secured creditor.

D. Methods of control over non-intermediated financial instruments

Paragraph (3) provides for the corresponding application of paragraph (2) to the assets mentioned in paragraph (1)(b). This provision does not require any comment.

E. Requirements of form

Paragraph (4) establishes formal requirements for the substantive requirements established by paragraphs (2) and (3). In view of the far-reaching effects that are achieved by control, on the one hand, and the lack of external factors that would be comparable to possession or registration, it is necessary to require some formality in order to achieve effectiveness by control. The alternative requirements of a writing, recording by electronic means or any other durable medium correspond to those of FCD Article 1 paragraph (5) and Article 2 paragraph (3); no explanation is necessary.

F. Control by different secured creditors

If control has been established successively for different secured creditors, the relationship between these several secured creditors is governed by the general rules on priority. According to IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)(a) second alternative, the time sequence at which the security rights have become effective is decisive for priority.

G. Superpriority

Of particular relevance is that control enjoys superpriority (IX.–4:102 paragraph (2)). That means that control prevails over any other security right or limited property right, even if these have been created or made effective earlier. However, as between several secured creditors, each exercising control over the same assets, the ordinary rules on the determination of priority are to be applied (see IX.–4:102 paragraph (2) sentence 2 and Comment F).

Section 3: Registration

Subsection 1: Operation of the register of proprietary security

IX.–3:301: European register of proprietary security; other systems of registration or notation

(1) A registration that is required or allowed for any security right or retention of ownership device under the rules of this Book is to be effected in a European register of proprietary security, subject to paragraph (2).

(2) Where systems of registration or notation on title certificates for security rights in specific types of assets exist, the effectiveness of a security right to be registered or noted in these systems depends upon compliance with any mandatory rules applicable for these systems. For systems established under the national law of a member state, this rule is subject to IX.–3:312 (Transitional provision in relation to entries in other systems of registration or notation under national law).

(3) An entry of security rights in financial instruments into a register maintained by or for the issuer of financial instruments or which under national law is determinative of title is not regarded as registration for the purposes of this Section but may constitute control if the requirements of IX.–3:204 (Control over financial assets) paragraph (3) are complied with.

COMMENTS

A. Publicity by registration as standard in modern proprietary security legislation

A number of member states have adopted systems of publicity by registration for their regimes of proprietary security in movables; also modern international conventions and model laws on matters of proprietary security such as the Cape Town Convention or the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development's Model Law on Secured Transactions operate on the basis of a system of registration of proprietary security in movables. Only a few national legal systems, notably the German and Austrian systems, have not yet introduced such a system of publicity by registration; also here, however, the modern legal development already appears to be directed to an approach that is more in line with international standards.

Publicity by registration for security in movables can therefore with sufficient justification be regarded as a principle of European private law and this principle constitutes the general basis of the approach followed in this Section.

The details of such registration systems, however, vary to a considerable extent between the individual member states. Firstly, there are differing general approaches as to the precise manner of the operation of the registration systems; the overall concept followed by the rules in this Section and the policy considerations underlying it will be explained in greater detail in Comment C and in the Comments to the following provisions of this Section. Secondly, the role of the registration itself is not identical in all member states. For the present rules, it must be emphasised that registration is not necessary in order to let a proprietary security right come into existence, i.e. the registration does not have a constitutive effect in relation to the creation of a security right or of a retention of ownership device. Security rights and retention of ownership devices come into being already when the requirements of Chapter 2 are fulfilled. Chapter 3 deals only with the effects against third persons, and these effects can be achieved by methods other than registration as well (i.e. by possession or control) or exceptionally do not require the fulfilment of any additional conditions (see IX.–3:101 paragraph (2), 3:107 paragraph (4)). Moreover, registration is not sufficient to let a security right or a retention of ownership device come into existence. If the requirements of Chapter 2 are not fulfilled, e.g. if a security provider does not have authority to create a security right in the assets concerned, the secured creditor does not acquire any rights merely on the basis of the registration.

B. Objectives of a system of publicity by registration

The publicity provided for proprietary security in movables by a registration in a public register is not an end in itself but serves several distinct objectives which can be briefly summarised.

Information for prospective creditors and other third persons dealing with the security provider. The main objective of a system of publicity by registration is to provide information for prospective creditors and other third persons dealing with the security provider. While a security provider may appear wealthy, persons intending to grant unsecured credit can access the register in order to obtain information as to whether assets held by the security provider would in fact be available to satisfy their claims in the event of the latter's default or whether these assets are already encumbered in favour of other creditors. Perhaps even more importantly, persons intending to acquire a proprietary right in the assets of the security provider (whether a security right or even full ownership) can obtain reliable information as to whether they could acquire their rights only subject to earlier encumbrances in the same assets. This possibility of obtaining information obviously also works to the advantage of the security provider. By being able to show that no security rights or retention of ownership devices are registered in relation to certain assets owned by the security provider, the latter can assure the parties it is dealing with that they will be able to acquire unencumbered rights in these assets (whether security rights or ownership) and on this basis the security provider will be likely to obtain a better price or at least better conditions for a secured credit.

Protection of the registered secured creditor. The secured creditor also benefits from the registration of its security rights. Publicity by registration gives notice to third persons of the existence of the encumbrance or retention of ownership device in the secured creditor's favour. Third persons can then be regarded as having actual or constructive notice preventing them from acquiring the collateral free of the original secured creditor's rights on the basis of a good faith acquisition.

Prevention of fraud. The registration of a security right or a retention of ownership device is an event that can both be precisely determined and easily proven. This allows a system of registration to function as a useful mechanism for the prevention of fraud. As between competing creditors priority of their relative security rights will generally be dependent upon some order in time. The registration could then serve as a means of proof of the time as from which the security is effective.

It also works as between the secured creditor and a security provider who attempts to obstruct execution against its assets by the secured creditor by claiming that the assets concerned are actually subject to an earlier security right created in favour of another creditor (who participates in the security provider's fraudulent conduct). A requirement of publicity by registration could give protection against the backdating of a security.

Basis for the operation of the rules on priority. A final and very important purpose that has already been alluded to and that to a large degree can be said to form the basis for achieving the objectives already mentioned is that the system of publicity by registration of proprietary security in movables can be used as a basis for the operation of the rules on priority. At least in so far as no other method of achieving effectiveness (especially control) or other exceptional rule (especially for acquisition finance devices) applies, the priority as between competing security rights encumbering the same assets is determined by the order of registration of the different encumbrances (see IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)(a)). The system of registration can deliver exact results and the order of priority is at least in general ascertainable directly from the register without the need for an investigation into the content and the order of any agreements concluded between the security provider and secured creditors.

C. General characteristics of the system of registration under these rules

The main characteristics of the system of registration under the provisions of this Section can be summarised as follows. It is a notice filing system; it is a direct entry system where entries can be made without the involvement of a public registrar; it operates electronically so that it is accessible online; and it covers all types of proprietary security.

Notice filing system. The notice filing system used here differs in an important respect from the traditional systems of (full) registration. In the latter form of publicity, all the essential particulars of a security right or retention of ownership device are registered, clearly setting out the precise content and scope of a security right or retention of ownership device. By contrast, in a notice filing system, the information to be made accessible directly from the register can effectively be limited to a notice that a security right or retention of ownership device might be in existence. Whether the proprietary security has in fact been created, has not ceased to exist and which assets exactly are used as collateral are questions which any interested person might be able to ascertain only by making further inquiries. It is true that the need for such inquiries might lead to an increase in transaction costs arising after the registration. However, it appears to be the generally accepted view that these costs are more than outweighed by the core advantages of a notice filing system, i.e. that filings can be made much more easily and quickly and that the reduction of necessary details and formalities makes filing less error-prone. The details that are missing from the content of the registration can later be obtained, if desired, by inquiries directed at the secured creditor (see Subsection 5).

Direct entry system. The system of registration as provided for by these rules can be described as a direct entry system, i.e. a system of publicity by registration in which, differing from more traditional models, entries into the register can be effected directly by the parties themselves without any need for an involvement of a public registrar who might have to check the particulars of the security device and the content of the registration. Again, a system of the former type can be expected to operate much more efficiently than a public registrar-based model, fulfilling the demands of the markets for a system of registration that operates swiftly and does not impede the creation of effective proprietary security. If the system of registration gave rise to unnecessary obstacles, it could not be suggested as a model rule of general application for all member states, particularly not for those (albeit few) member states which so far do not require publicity by registration for proprietary security in movables. In most systems which follow the public registrar-based model, there will be backlogs of applications for registrations which the public registrar has not yet had the time to process; this results in security rights or retention of ownership devices whose existence is not visible from the content of the register, thereby failing the objectives of a system of publicity by registration. Moreover, the introduction of a public body operating as a registrar for a pan-European register of proprietary security in movables would create enormous costs. This rather bold proposal can therefore have any prospects of realisation only if the involvement of a public body is kept to a minimum (see IX.–3:316).

Electronic register that is accessible online. While traditional models of registers for proprietary security typically are paper-based, their modern counterparts make use of the latest communication technology and tend to be accessible in an online format. Again, the main policy choice behind the decision to follow the latter approach in the present rules is the aim to reduce costs; the possibility of online access seeks to maximise the efficiency gains to be derived from a direct entry system in general. On the other hand, it is true that online access creates specific problems concerning the authentication and identification of the register's users, see the Comments on IX.–3:304.

Register including all security rights and retention of ownership devices. The register as provided by the rules in this Section is intended to cover all types of proprietary security that are not made effective by any other method allowed by this Chapter (i.e. possession, control) or that are not exempted from any such requirements altogether (see, e.g., IX.–3:101 paragraph (2)). This applies not only to security rights as limited proprietary rights, whether enjoying superpriority as acquisition finance devices or not, but to retention of ownership devices as well (see IX.–3:303). The main advantage of such an all-encompassing system is that inquirers do not have to search several registers; some deviations from this general rule, however, must be made in relation to specialist registers (see IX.–3:301 paragraph (2), IX.–3:312).

D. Deviations from other notice filing systems

The system of registration as laid down in this Section necessarily differs not only from more traditional systems of registration where the information supplied by the parties is checked by the public registrar before the particulars of the security right are entered into the register. There are also a number of differences in comparison to other notice filing systems used especially in the Common Law or Anglo-American world, which will only briefly be mentioned here and which will be explained more fully in the Comments to the relevant provisions: (i) the requirement of consent, which is regarded as central for the protection of the security provider against all sorts of unwanted entries into the register (see IX.–3:306 paragraph (1)(d), IX.–3:309); (ii) the principles of good faith acquisition, which might in some respects lead to results that differ from the content of the register (see Comments on IX.–3:322, IX.–3:330); (iii) a legal environment in some member states, especially in relation to the duration of court proceedings, which would make it impracticable to grant protection to security providers and other users of the register only via court proceedings and rights to payment of damages (see Comment A on IX.–3:309 and IX.–3:319).

E. Establishment of a European register of proprietary security

Subject to some exceptions (see F below), the publicity by registration required by these rules can only be achieved if a security right or retention of ownership device is registered in the European register of security rights. A registration in any register already established under national law for proprietary security in general (such as the English register for company charges) is not sufficient for the purpose of achieving effectiveness of the security right concerned under these rules. Due to the differences between the various national positions as to the details of a registration, its requirements and effects, these rules could not opt for a solution on the basis of the continuing operation of these registers only. Moreover, these rules are intended to describe a register for proprietary security which would achieve the objectives of a requirement of publicity by registration in a most efficient way; this aim makes it necessary to introduce a completely new register specifically designed for the purposes of these rules. Even if national registers could be adapted along the lines of these provisions, a fragmentation of the system of registration under these rules into 25 or more separate units on member state level does not appear to be compatible with the objectives of these rules in general.

F. Other registers or systems of notation

For some situations, paragraphs (2) and (3) of the present Article expressly spell out that entries in other registers can be sufficient to achieve effectiveness of the security right concerned.

First, where systems of registration or notation on title certificates exist which also cover security rights (as well as retention of ownership devices) in specific types of assets, a registration or notation of a security device in any such system that has been established under European or international law can replace a registration in the European register of proprietary security. Effectively, precedence is thus given to these European or international regimes; in respect of the latter, the effect of paragraph (2) sentence 1 corresponds to the precedence spelt out in IX.–1:105 paragraph (2). The position is different, however, for such systems which have been established under the national law of a member state. As a counter-exception to the rule in paragraph (2) sentence 1, a parallel registration in both registers is necessary (see IX.–3:312).

Second, paragraph (3) contains a special rule covering registers for financial instruments, especially shares in companies, whether operated by or for the issuer itself, i.e. the company, or by certain bodies independent from the issuer if this register is determinative of title as in the case of the English CREST register. If such registers allow the registration of a security device (whether a security right or a retention of ownership device) in the financial instruments covered by this register, then this registration is not be subject to any additional requirements under this Section. Instead, such a registration might constitute control (IX.–3:204); this method of effectiveness would trump registration of a competing security right in the same assets (IX.–4:102 paragraph (2)). Effectively, registers covering security devices in financial instruments and operated by or for the issuer (or by a settlement operator) thus enjoy precedence over the European register of proprietary security, even if they have not been established under international or European law. The reason for this position is that these rules are intended to interfere as little as possible with the national rules on transactions in company shares; moreover, it would be inconsistent with the Financial Collateral Directive to subject the creation of effective proprietary security in financial assets to additional requirements.

IX.–3:302: Structure and operation of the register

(1) The European register of proprietary security is to operate as a personal folio system, allowing entries concerning security rights to be filed against identified security providers.

(2) The register is to operate electronically and to be directly accessible for its users in an online format.

COMMENTS

In a personal folio system, entries are filed against certain persons, while in a real folio system entries would be filed against certain assets. The European register of proprietary security in movables is to operate in the former manner, i.e. all security devices of a single security provider, whether security rights or retention of ownership devices, are registered against this person. A real folio system would hardly appear to be feasible for proprietary security in movables given the fact that an exact specification and identification of certain assets that might serve as security would always be possible for some classes of assets only. However, the possibility of searching the register for descriptions of the collateral (see IX.–3:318) allows the register to some extent to be used like a real folio system.

By operating electronically and being accessible online, the European register of proprietary security will work more swiftly and at less cost than traditional paper-based systems of registration (see Comment C to the preceding Article).

IX.–3:303: Retention of ownership devices and security rights

(1) For the purposes of the European register of proprietary security no distinction is made between retention of ownership devices and security rights.

(2) Any reference in this Section to security rights includes retention of ownership devices.

COMMENTS

It has already been described as a basic feature of the European register of proprietary security suggested by this Section that it should be all-encompassing, i.e. include all types of proprietary security in movables. This Article follows this general principle by stating that the European register of proprietary security does not distinguish between security rights (whether or not enjoying superpriority as an acquisition finance device) and retention of ownership devices. Both types of proprietary security would be covered by the register and the operation of the register would be identical for both.

This extension of the scope of application of this register to retention of ownership devices is in line with the general approach of these rules concerning the identical treatment of retention of ownership devices and security rights (cf. IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)) and is also a consequence of the registration requirement for all types of acquisition finance devices including retention of ownership devices according to IX.–3:107 paragraph (1).

The uniform treatment, for purposes of registration, of security rights and retention of ownership devices covers, of course, only the operation of the register, not the substantive issues. Even though there are differences between these types of proprietary security, however, it was decided not to distinguish between them for purposes of registration. For the parties, it might be difficult to decide whether collateral is subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. Any indication that could be demanded from a secured creditor when registering the rights would therefore not be very reliable. Moreover, the most important issue for intending secured creditors is whether an asset is subject to prior rights of a secured creditor; in this context the distinction between the effects of security rights and retention of ownership devices will be of lesser importance.

The specific relevance of paragraph (2) of the Article lies then in emphasising that the general approach applies in the context of this Section without any qualifications. Whenever the rules of this Section refer to security rights, this reference includes retention of ownership devices as well. For necessary terminological adaptations, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (2). Exceptionally, retention of ownership devices are expressly mentioned in the rules of this Section alongside security rights (see especially IX.–3:301 paragraph (1)); this is for clarification purposes only.

IX.–3:304: Authentication as requirement for declarations to the register

(1) Any declaration to the online register, such as filing, amending or deleting an entry in the register or a declaration of consent, requires authentication by the person making the declaration.

(2) Authentication requires:

(a) the use of log-in information which is issued to individual users of the online register after an initial enrolment in the register during which the identity and the contact details of the user are verified; or

(b) the use of secure online identity verification systems of general application, if such systems are brought into operation at a European or member state level.

COMMENTS

The operation of the register of proprietary security as a personal folio system and in an online format involves a number of issues concerning the authentication and identification of its users. These rules are based upon a distinction between the following main concepts:

A. Authentication

Whenever declarations of any kind are made to the online register, it is necessary that they are authenticated by the person by whom these declarations purport to be made. The requirement of authentication is used as a safeguard against declarations fraudulently being made by other persons.

B. Enrolment or use of online identity verification systems of general application

Any reliable method of online authentication requires that the user's identity has been checked during some prior procedure of identification. In some member states, there are tendencies to bring into operation online identity verification systems of general application; wherever such systems are available, it is envisaged that they could be used also as the basis for the online authentication of declarations to the register under this Section.

As long as such systems are not generally available, however, it appears to be necessary that a special system of enrolment would have to be maintained for this European register of proprietary security. Before users can make their first declaration to the register, they have to undergo a procedure during which their identities and contact details are verified. Any user is then supplied with log-in information which allows it to authenticate any declarations to the register which it might want to make in the future.

C. Consent

In a number of situations, a declaration to the register by one person can be made only with the consent of another. The most notable example is the filing of an entry in the register by a secured creditor which requires consent by the security provider (see IX.–3:306 sub-paragraph (d), IX.–3:309). Such a consent is another type of declaration to the register, i.e. there must be an authentication by the secured creditor.

D. Identification

Whenever a declaration made by one user of the register refers to another person, e.g. when a secured creditor makes an entry in the register that security rights have been created over the assets of a certain security provider, that other person has to be exactly identified in this declaration. The requirement of identification is to be understood as being very strict under this Section. Since the identification of a security provider in an entry filed by the secured creditor must be exact enough to allow the online system to ascertain which person's consent is necessary, this identification must exactly match a personal identification number or other identification details of the security provider lodged with the register in the process of enrolment or used in the respective general system of online identification. However, since there will normally be a co-operation between the secured creditor and the security provider before the secured creditor makes an entry in the register, this requirement which is intrinsic to the operation of an online register requiring a consent by the other party as a condition for registration does not seem to give rise to insurmountable problems.

Subsection 2: Entries in the register

IX.–3:305: Entries to be made by secured creditor and advance filing

(1) Entries in the register can be made directly by the secured creditor.

(2) Entries can be made before or after the security right referred to has been created or the contract for proprietary security has been concluded.

COMMENTS

Paragraph (1) states that it is the secured creditor who may file entries rather than the security provider. In some national systems of registration, filings can be made by the security provider. These rules have opted against this alternative on the assumption that it will be the secured creditor who has a greater interest in the registration than the security provider. The former risks losing (or not acquiring effectively) its position as a secured creditor, while the latter would only be affected in so far as the creation of an effective security right could be made a condition for the granting of additional credit by the secured creditor.

Paragraph (2) deals with the time at which entries may be filed. It is expressly provided that entries may be made before or after the security right referred to has been created or the contract for proprietary security has been concluded. To file before creation of the security right or before conclusion of the contract for proprietary security is often called “advance filing”. That such a possibility exists under the present rules follows to some extent already from the fact that under a direct entry system the content of the entry in the register is not subject to any requirement of verification by a public registrar. Hence, the secured creditor is under no restrictions whatsoever in relation to the security covered by the registration, whether already in existence or only to be created in the future. Paragraph (2) confirms this position and makes it clear that filings will not be regarded as being effective for the purposes of priority only once the security right concerned has come into existence. Effective advance filing allows the secured creditor to secure a priority position e.g. already during the course of negotiations with the security provider concerning the provision of secured credit or in relation to security rights in assets which the security provider has not yet acquired; under paragraph (1)(d) of the following Article it is, however, necessary that the security provider has already at this earlier stage consented to the filing of an entry in the register.

Filing an entry is of course still possible after the security right has been created. It has to be noted, however, that effectiveness is only achieved once the registration is completed; and for priority purposes it is the time of registration rather than the time of creation that is relevant (see IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)(a)).

IX.–3:306: Minimum content of the entry in the register

(1) An entry can be entered into the register only if:

(a) it is made in respect of an identified security provider;

(b) it contains a minimum declaration as to the encumbered assets;

(c) it is indicated by one or several references to a list of categories of assets to which category the encumbered assets belong;

(d) the requirements of consent are fulfilled ; and

(e) it is accompanied by a declaration of the creditor that the latter assumes liability for damages caused to the security provider or third persons by a wrongful registration.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(b) a declaration that the creditor is to take security over the security provider's assets or is to retain ownership as security is sufficient.

COMMENTS

This Article covers the minimum content of an entry that is to be filed in the register. It is envisaged that the secured creditor makes an entry in the register by completing an online form and by submitting this data to the online register. If an entry does not include the minimum content set out here the secured creditor will not be able to submit it to the register.

There can be no entry in the register if it is not filed against an identified security provider (see paragraph (1)(a); for the meaning of identification see Comment D on IX.–3:304) and if it does not describe the encumbered assets (see paragraph (1)(b)). Without meeting these requirements it would not be possible to determine whether a secured creditor's security right in assets of a security provider is actually covered by the entry in question (see also IX.–3:310 paragraph (1)).

According to paragraph (1)(b) read with paragraph (2) the secured creditor has to give only a minimum declaration as to the encumbered assets, not a detailed description of them. The system of publicity by registration under these rules is a system of notice filing only. The secured creditor is not bound to identify specific assets that are subject to encumbrances in its favour; instead, it is sufficient that third persons can obtain from the register a warning that such a security right might be in existence, additional information might be obtained by further inquiries. However, entries in the register that are not limited to specific assets also carry some specific burdens for the secured creditor. First, there might be less situations in which the secured creditor is not obliged to answer requests for information under IX.–3:320 paragraph (4)(a). Second, the secured creditor is under a duty to restrict overly broad entries in the register to the actual extent of existing security rights under IX.–3:315.

In addition, the secured creditor has to indicate by one or several references to a list of categories of assets to which category the encumbered assets belong (see paragraph (1)(c)). This requirement (which would involve the use of a list of tick-boxes) is intended to allow other users to see at a glance whether assets of the security provider belonging to specific categories of assets might or might not already be subject to security rights or retention of ownership devices. This is thought to be necessary since entries in the register might be in a language not readily understandable for prospective creditors searching for information about proprietary security created in the security provider's assets. At the same time, it has to be ensured that this requirement does not operate as an obstacle in the process of achieving effectiveness for the secured creditor's proprietary security. The danger must be minimised that proprietary security is regarded as ineffective because the secured creditor indicated the wrong category. To some extent, this problem will have to be taken care of by the way the list of categories mentioned in paragraph (1)(b) is drafted. This is, however, not an issue to be dealt with in these Comments. At least some difficulties for the secured creditor are solved under the present Article by allowing the entry to include several references to different categories of assets. If the secured creditor is uncertain concerning the correct classification, it may simply – with the security provider's consent – tick more than one box in the online registration form.

An entry in the register requires that the security provider has declared its consent (paragraph (1)(d)). For the policy of this requirement, see Comment A to IX.–3:309.

The name and address of the secured creditor are not listed as parts of the mandatory information to be given when filing an entry. The reason is that this information is already available to the registration system on the basis of the secured creditor's prior enrolment or use of other online identity verification system which is necessary for the authentication of the secured creditor's declaration (see IX.–3:304).

These rules apply not only to entries which are intended to cover assets that are subject to a security right, but also to entries referring to retention of ownership devices. As follows from IX.–3:303 paragraph (1) the minimum content necessary for entering these two types of entries is identical. As always, however, terminological adaptations are necessary when applying IX.–3:306, which is drafted in terms of a security right, to a retention of ownership device. The entry is to be made in respect of an identified buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee as security provider (paragraph (1)(a)); there has to be a minimum declaration as to the supplied assets as encumbered assets (paragraph (1)(b)). For these terminological adaptations in general, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (2).

IX.–3:307: Additional content of the entry

An entry in the register may include the following additional content:

(a) additional information provided by the creditor in relation to the encumbered assets or the content of the security right;

(b) a date at which the entry is to expire provided that it is before the end of the regular period of expiry of five years; and

(c) a maximum amount of the security.

COMMENTS

This Article covers additional content of the entry, i.e. content that is not mandatory but may be added to the entry by the secured creditor.

Generally speaking, the secured creditor may add information of any kind in relation to the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device or the content of the proprietary security, such as the terms of the contract for proprietary security or the terms of default as agreed with the security provider (cf. sub-paragraph (a)). It should, however, be emphasised that sub-paragraph (a) is only intended to ensure that the secured creditor has the technical possibility to enter such additional content into the register. If the secured creditor is contractually prohibited from making such information public or if its publication amounts to a case of extra-contractual liability, then the secured creditor's liability towards the security provider (for damages, for deletion of the wrongful content) is not affected by this provision.

Two types of additional information are specifically mentioned in the Article, since this information might also be used in the course of the operation of the online register. According to sub-paragraph (b), the secured creditor may specify a date at which the entry is to expire and under sub-paragraph (c) the secured creditor may indicate a maximum amount of the security in the entry.

IX.–3:308: Information appearing on the register

In respect of each entry the following information appears on the register and is accessible to any user:

(a) the name and contact details of the security provider;
(b) the name and contact details of the creditor;
(c) the date of the entry;
(d) the minimum content of the entry under IX.–3:306 (Minimum content of the entry in the register) paragraph (1)(b) and (c); and
(e) any additional content of the entry under IX.–3:307 (Additional content of the entry) sub-paragraph (a) to (c).

COMMENTS

This Article lists the information that appears on the register once an entry has been successfully entered into the register according to the two preceding Articles.

IX.–3:309: Required consent of the security provider

(1) An entry in the register can be made only if the security provider has consented to it by declaration to the register. Any such consent can be freely terminated by the security provider by declaration to the register. A termination of consent does not affect entries that have been entered before the termination of the consent is declared to the register.

(2) The secured creditor may demand from the security provider a declaration of consent to an entry to the extent that such a consent is necessary to cover the security rights created in the contract for proprietary security.

(3) This Article does not affect the validity, terms and effects of any of the security provider's agreements with the secured creditor other than the declaration of consent to the register.

COMMENTS

A. The requirement of consent of the security provider in general

While there can be no doubt that in general proprietary security based upon a contract for proprietary security can be created only on the basis of a consensus between the parties, it is less obvious that the registration of such a security right or retention of ownership device by the secured creditor necessarily requires the consent of the security provider.

At least under a notice filing system as developed under these rules, the registration is irrelevant for the creation of a security right or retention of ownership device as between the secured creditor and the security provider. From a conceptual point of view, this could make it conceivable to argue that the secured creditor should be allowed to make an entry in the register unilaterally. Such a solution is often favoured in order to ensure the efficiency of the operation of the register. Any additional requirement of prior interaction between the secured creditor and the security provider in relation to the entry would slow down the process of registration; if there have to be declarations by the two parties, there might be additional transaction costs if their content has to be matched.

On the other hand, the possibility to file entries against a security provider without the latter's consent would bring with it considerable risks. First, there is the danger that entries are filed purely in order to inflict damage to the security provider's interests. Even though the registration in itself does not create a proprietary security in favour of the person named as secured creditor, the security provider's ability to obtain further secured credit might be negatively affected. Prospective secured creditors might shy away from taking security rights in the security provider's assets in respect of which entries have already been filed for fear that they could obtain only second-ranking security. In other situations the content of the entry might be defamatory or in breach of duties of confidentiality. Even if a security right or retention of ownership device has actually been created, the content of the entry might be drafted in overly broad terms; in this way, the secured creditor could obtain for itself a secured position also in respect of possible future security rights, thereby excluding other potential lenders and, at least indirectly, harming the security provider's business interests.

In a number of jurisdictions in which notice filing systems are in operation (especially in North America), experience shows that these dangers in fact might be not too relevant. Even though these systems allow a registration to be made without the security provider's consent, the latter is protected by the possibility to ask for the court's assistance in the removal of entries and by a right to claim damages for entries wrongfully filed. In so far as the substantive law is concerned, the position of the security provider is similar under the present rules (see especially IX.–3:315). It appears, however, that these alternative methods of protection of the security provider against frivolous, oppressive or otherwise wrongful entries can replace the need for a requirement of consent only if it is sufficiently certain that the security provider can rely on an efficient enforcement of its position before the courts. Regrettably, the duration and effectiveness of court proceedings do not yet meet these standards in all member states. Some preventive protection of the security provider is necessary which works independently of court proceedings; this solution is to be found in the requirement of consent.

At the same time, it must be ensured that this requirement to prove the security provider's consent does not unduly impede the speed and efficiency of the operation of the register. The methods designed to achieve this objective are described in the remainder of these Comments.

B. 'Formal' declaration of consent and 'substantive' consent distinguished

The register being operated in an electronic online format, the possible methods of ascertaining whether the security provider has consented to the entry are limited. It does not appear to be feasible to check whether such a consent follows from the content of the contract for proprietary security (in fact, paragraph (2) provides as a default position for a right based upon the contract for proprietary security to have such a consent declared) or has been declared by the security provider in any other document. Neither will an electronic system be able to verify the legal consequences of any agreement of the parties nor will this agreement be made accessible to the register at all; on the other hand, the mere declaration (or guarantee) by the secured creditor that the security provider has consented to the registration cannot be sufficient. Therefore, these rules have opted for a solution according to which the security provider must have consented to the entry by a separate declaration to the register. Even if the contract for proprietary security itself in substance contains a consent by the security provider to any filings to be made by the secured creditor, this consent will not be effective for the present purposes if it is not specifically declared to the register. This distinction between a 'substantive' consent and the 'formal' consent for the purposes of these rules is expressed in paragraph (3).

This distinction is especially relevant for the security provider's possibility to terminate the consent to the entry. On the basis of the content of the parties' agreement, the security provider might well be bound by its 'substantive' declaration of consent, i.e. once the parties have agreed to create a security right to be made effective by registration, the security provider might not be allowed to step back from this agreement by terminating its declaration of consent. In other cases, however, especially where the parties have concluded an agreement covering the creation of security rights in the future, it might be possible for the security provider to terminate this agreement. Since it is not possible for the electronic register to determine whether or not the security provider's 'substantive' consent is binding, these rules allow the security provider to terminate its 'formal' consent declared to the register at will. This termination does not affect the underlying agreements, i.e. the security provider might be in breach of these agreements, and nevertheless it seems that in order to protect the security provider, this termination of the 'formal' consent must be technically possible. This termination of consent does not, however, have a retroactive effect; if on the basis of this declaration of consent entries had already been entered into the register when the consent is terminated, these entries remain effective (paragraph (1) sentences 2 and 3).

C. Possible types of declarations of consent

It is envisaged that there will be various types of declaration of consent to the register. For purposes of illustration, some conceivable forms of consent which could be allowed by the online system of registration will be briefly described.

Unlimited consent in favour of a specified secured creditor. In situations where the parties are in a close business relationship the security provider might have strong confidence in the secured creditor, so that the latter could enjoy liberty in drafting entries to be made in the register. Thus, the security provider could declare an unlimited consent in favour of a specified secured creditor who then might freely file entries against this security provider without the need to secure an additional declaration of consent for every specific entry (subject only to the security provider's possibility to terminate the consent).

Consent to an entry with a specified content. If the security provider is more interested in protection against entries that are oppressive or unduly widely drafted, it might prefer an option to declare its consent to an entry with a specified content only. Only an entry exactly complying with the security provider's consent can be entered into the register. The question of compliance with the terms of the consent will have to be determined on a formalistic basis, since the system cannot evaluate whether a different content of the entry might be substantially equivalent to the content consented by the security provider.

Partially limited consent. It should also be possible to provide for more limited types of consent for situations where a specific consent would be impracticable but where the security provider still deems it too risky to declare an unlimited consent, which would give the secured creditor the possibility to enter oppressive entries into the register. These limited types of consent could use such criteria as can be ascertained even by an electronic system, i.e. whether the entry includes a maximum amount or whether it indicates the encumbered assets by reference to specific categories of assets only. It would then appear to be helpful if, should a secured creditor not be able to file an entry in the register for example because the maximum amount indicated in that entry would let the total maximum amount exceed the maximum amount consented by the security provider, the system would automatically inform the secured creditor what the remaining amount would be.

IX.–3:310: Identity of security provider, description of encumbered assets and effectiveness of registration

(1) If under the rules in this Book the effectiveness or priority of a security right encumbering assets of a certain security provider depends upon registration, an entry in the register according to this Subsection suffices only if:

(a) the entry is filed against the correct security provider;

(b) the creditor's declaration as to the encumbered assets as appearing on the register covers the assets encumbered by the security right;

(c) the encumbered assets actually belong to the category or categories of assets indicated in the entry; and

(d) the creditor's declaration is in an official language of the European Union. The creditor may add translations.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(b):

(a) the entry is effective in respect of fruits, products, proceeds and any other assets different from the original assets serving as security only if these assets are also covered by the creditor's declaration as to the encumbered assets; and

(b) a description identifying individual assets is not necessary.

(3) The creditor making the entry bears the risk that:

(a) the description of the encumbered assets, the translation of this description or the indication of the category or categories of encumbered assets is wrong; and

(b) the entry is filed against a wrong person.

COMMENTS

The general idea underlying this Article is that a security right is made effective by registration only if the assets in which the security right is created are covered by the content of the entry. On the basis of IX.–3:303 paragraph (2), this principle is applicable also to retention of ownership devices.

In order to avoid unnecessary burdens and risks for the secured creditor, it is sufficient that the content of the entry is drafted broadly enough to cover the assets that have actually been encumbered or that are subject to a retention of ownership device. It is not necessary that the description in the entry individualises specific assets. On the basis of general principles of property law, proprietary security can of course only be created in specified assets (see for the creation by granting as the main method of creation of security rights IX.–2:105 sub-paragraph (a)). However, a distinction has to be made between the creation of the proprietary security and the registration under the rules in this Section. In order not to impose unnecessary burdens on the secured creditor, the latter should not incur the risk that a security right or a retention of ownership device might not be effective merely by reason of the fact that the description of assets in the entry does not properly individualise specific assets. Other prospective creditors can get a warning that a security right or a retention of ownership device might be in existence already from a less specific entry, any further information could then be obtained by making an inquiry from the secured creditor.

However, it is still regarded as necessary that the declaration contained in the entry expressly covers proceeds of the original encumbered assets etc. if the rights of the secured creditor are to be extended to additional assets of this kind (see paragraph (2)). This position, i.e. that proceeds are not automatically included, is in line with IX.–2:306 paragraph (3), according to which proceeds of the original assets are encumbered only if the parties so agreed (the security rights covered by IX.–2:306 paragraphs (1) and (2) and IX.–2:309 paragraphs (1) and (2) are exempted from the requirements of Chapter 3 altogether, see IX.–3:101 paragraph (2) and IX.–3:106).

IX.–3:311: Amendments of entries

(1) The creditor may amend any of the creditor's entries after filing.

(2) An amendment to an entry can only be entered into the register if:

(a) it is made in respect of a specific entry;

(b) it contains a declaration as to the content of the amendment; and

(c) it is accompanied by a declaration of the creditor that the latter assumes liability for damages caused to the security provider or third persons by a wrongful amendment to the original entry.

(3) In case of an amendment, the register preserves and shows both the original text and the amendment as such, including the date of the amendment.

(4) An amendment to an entry is effective only if it does not extend the creditor's rights. In particular, an amendment can have the effect of limiting the creditor's rights, especially by subordinating the creditor's rights to another creditor's rights, by indicating a transfer of the security right to another creditor, by limiting the scope of assets covered according to the content of the creditor's declaration as to the encumbered assets or by setting or predating a date of expiry of the entry.

(5) An extension of the creditor's rights is effective only if contained in a new entry.

COMMENTS

The secured creditor may amend the entries that it has entered into the register; in that case both the original and the amended version of the entry will appear on the register.

It is important to note that an amendment cannot have the effect of extending the secured creditor's rights. Therefore, there is no need for a requirement of consent as the position of the security provider cannot be negatively affected by a mere amendment. Amendments purporting to extend the secured creditor's rights are ineffective; this effect can only be achieved by a new registration and not by a mere amendment to an existing entry.

This solution appears to be preferable in comparison to the suggestion to allow also the extension of the secured creditor's rights by amendment of the original entry if there is a consent of the security provider. (i) It would be impossible for the online system of registration to ascertain whether an amendment would effectively lead to an extension or a restriction of the secured creditor's rights. Under the approach followed by this Article, the secured creditor may still file an amendment purporting to extend the rights; however, this amendment would not be given legal effect. (ii) An extension of the secured creditor's rights does not affect the security provider alone, but possibly also third persons. Security provider and secured creditor may agree to extend the scope of the latter's rights including the coverage of the entry; such an extension, however, can be effective vis-à-vis other creditors only from the date of a declaration to the register to this effect and cannot enjoy the priority position that is based upon the date of the original entry.

IX.–3:312: Transitional provision in relation to entries in other systems of registration or notation under national law

(1) Where a security right is registered or noted in another system of registration or notation on title certificates under the national law of a member state, as long as such systems are still in operation for security rights in specific types of assets, an entry reiterating the content of that registration or notation, including the date of registration or notation, is to be entered into the European register of proprietary security against the security provider by the body operating the other register. An entry in the European register of proprietary security is required for the effectiveness of the registration or notation under this Book.

(2) For purposes of priority according to Chapter 4, the time of registration or notation in the national system is decisive.

COMMENTS

In relation to specific registers established under the national law of a member state, the general concept is that the creation of the European register of proprietary security should not necessarily replace these systems. If for certain segments of the market for secured credit these specific registers are regarded by the national legislator as being more efficient than the register, e.g. because these specific registers contain more reliable information on the basis of the involvement of a public registrar, registrations may continue to be effected in these specific registers (see IX.–3:301 paragraph (2)).

In the interest of the efficiency of the system of publicity based upon a European register, however, a parallel registration is necessary (paragraph (1) sentence 2). Security rights and retention of ownership devices will be effective only if registered in both the specific national system and the general European register – otherwise any prospective creditor could not rely on the content of the latter register but would have to check whether under national law any additional registers or systems of notation exist, in which the security right might be registered.

This rule applies to registers established under the national law of a member state only since its application to registers established under international law would be in conflict with the latter. Public authorities operating a specific system of registration or notation established under national law, however, are bound by paragraph (1) to file an entry against the security provider in the European register; this provision does not, of course, affect the secured creditor's possibility to file an entry itself. Moreover, even if the entry is filed by the public authority, the position of the secured creditor is the same as in relation to other entries under this Book, i.e. the secured creditor has to answer inquiries and is entitled to amend or delete the entry.

Since this Article requires a double registration, an additional rule is necessary determining which registration or notation is to be decisive for the order of priority. Paragraph (2) provides that the time of registration or notation in the specific system of registration or notation established under national law is the relevant time for the purposes of IX.–4:101.

IX.–3:313: Automated certification of entry to creditor and security provider

After an entry or an amendment to an entry has been filed, a certificate to that effect is to be communicated automatically to the creditor and the security provider.

COMMENTS

The use of an electronic online register allows an automated communication. Certificates can be sent automatically by the system and can then serve the purposes of both information and proof.

IX.–3:314: Third person acting as agent of the creditor

(1) As an additional content of the entry made by the secured creditor, the latter may identify a third person acting as agent of the creditor, whose name and contact details will appear on the register instead of those of the creditor. In such a situation, the entry can be entered into the register only if in addition to the requirements of the preceding Articles being satisfied this third person has also consented to it according to IX.–3:309 (Required consent of the security provider) paragraphs (1) and (3), applied with appropriate adaptations.

(2) By a declaration to the register that is subject to IX.–3:309 (Required consent of the security provider) paragraphs (1) and (3), applied with appropriate adaptations, a secured creditor may authorise a third person to make declarations to the register on the secured creditor's behalf.

(3) Where a third person acting as agent for the secured creditor is identified in the entry, the secured creditor and the third person are liable as solidary debtors for all obligations of secured creditors under this Section.

COMMENTS

Paragraph (1) sentence 1 allows the secured creditor to nominate a third person acting as agent of the creditor. Generally, after filing an entry the name of the secured creditor will appear on the register (see IX.–3:308 sub-paragraph (b)) in order to allow prospective creditors to contact the secured creditor and inquire whether specific assets are actually encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device in favour of the secured creditor (see Subsection 5). In some situations, however, a secured creditor might prefer that its role in financing the security provider does not become visible to the public. This is achieved by nominating a third person acting as agent of the creditor whose name and contact details will then appear on the register instead of those of the creditor.

This situation, i.e. the nomination of a third person who appears on the register instead of the secured creditor as the latter's agent, has to be distinguished from cases where security devices are held by someone who is not itself the creditor but who holds the proprietary security for the creditor(s). In such cases, the holder of the security devices, despite not being the creditor of the secured right, is regarded as the secured creditor for the purposes of these rules (see IX.–1:201 paragraph (12)),

If a third person is to appear on the register instead of the creditor, this third person will be subject to all the obligations of a secured creditor under this Section (paragraph (3)). If a secured creditor prefers that its name is not apparent from the entry, inquirers for example must be able to turn towards the third person nominated as agent for the secured creditor for information. The third person does not become a secured creditor itself, but has to answer requests for information as if it was the secured creditor. Moreover, the third person is not only under a duty to answer requests on the secured creditor's behalf, but the third person can also owe the inquirer or the secured creditor damages for a violation of the information duties under Subsection 5. Additionally, the secured creditor is also itself liable in damages for any non-performance by the third person and IX.–3:321 to IX.–3:323 are applicable as well.

Since the secured creditor's option to nominate a third person acting as its agent gives rise to such liabilities of the latter as have been described in the preceding paragraph, it is necessary that – in addition to any other relevant requirements under this Section –this third person agent has consented to the entry (paragraph (1) sentence 2). This consent is subject to the rules set out in IX.–3:309 paragraphs (1) and (3), i.e. there has to be a declaration to the register, this declaration of consent can be freely terminated and this 'formal' consent has to be distinguished from any 'substantial' agreements that might exist between the parties.

Often it will be more practicable for the secured creditors to let the third persons acting as their agent file the entry instead of entering it into the register themselves. Paragraph (2) provides for such a possibility, subject, however, to a requirement that the third person must have been authorised by the secured creditor. As with the declaration of consent according to paragraph (1) sentence 2, this authorisation is subject to the rules laid down in IX.–3:309 paragraphs (1) and (3), applied with appropriate adaptations.

Subsection 3: Protection of the security provider

IX.–3:315: Security provider's right to deletion or amendment of entry

The security provider is entitled against the secured creditor to deletion or amendment of an entry if and in so far as no corresponding security right exists.

COMMENTS

Entries can be entered, amended and deleted only by the secured creditor. There can be no possibility for the security provider to delete an entry unilaterally. However, the security provider can demand that the secured creditor deletes or amends entries, e.g. if these are drafted too broadly or if the underlying security right or retention of ownership device has ceased to exist.

The normal method of enforcement of such a demand will be proceedings in a competent court; an additional possibility is offered by the following Article.

IX.–3:316: Review of contested entries by registration office

(1) The security provider may apply for the assistance of the registration office in the assertion of the right to demand deletion or amendment of an entry from the secured creditor.

(2) On the security provider's application, the registration office asks the secured creditor whether the latter agrees to the security provider's demand.

(3) If the secured creditor does not object within two months of being asked by the registration office according to paragraph (2), the entry is deleted or amended according to the security provider's demand.

(4) If the secured creditor objects within the time limit of paragraph (3), the entry is marked as contested to the extent of the security provider's demand.

(5) The entry remains marked as contested until:

(a) the security provider withdraws the application by notice to the registration office;
(b) the secured creditor agrees to the security provider's demand by declaration made to the registration office;
(c) the secured creditor deletes the entry; or
(d) a final decision is rendered on the security provider's demand by a competent court.

COMMENTS

By virtue of this Article the security provider enjoys some protection by being able to apply for assistance by the registration office in the assertion of any demands under the preceding Article against a secured creditor.

Since the registration office is not intended to operate as an additional quasi-judiciary body, its powers are limited. According to paragraph (3), it may delete or amend an entry along the lines of the security provider's application if the secured creditor agrees (or at least does not object within two months). If the secured creditor objects to the security provider's demands, the registration office does not delete the entry, but marks it as contested (paragraph (4)). A decision as to the substance of the security provider's demands then has to be sought in the courts.

The fact that an entry is marked as contested does not mean that the entry becomes ineffective; instead this is merely regarded as a way by which the security provider can give some publicity to the fact that the existence of a corresponding security right is disputed.

Subsection 4: Accessing and searching the register

IX.–3:317: Access to the register for searching purposes

Access to the register for searching purposes is open to anyone, subject to the payment of fees; it does not depend upon a consent by the security provider or the secured creditor.

COMMENTS

Anyone may access the register for searching purposes; it is not intended that any information may only be obtained via a public authority that controls the access to the register. Also the payment of fees is not intended to restrict that access; rather, the payment of fees is mentioned only as it will be necessary for the maintenance of the register.

Neither is there a requirement of consent by the security provider or the secured creditor for the access to the register. By making an entry in the register and by consenting to this registration, the security provider and the secured creditor allow the information contained in the entry to be accessible to everyone.

IX.–3:318: Searching the register

The register can be searched for entries filed against individual security providers or for entries containing specified descriptions of the encumbered assets.

COMMENTS

A. Methods of searching the register

Operating as a personal folio system, the register can be searched for entries filed against specified security providers. I.e. after choosing a certain security provider, a user of the register can browse through all entries filed against that security provider.

In order to take full advantage of the possibilities offered by the fact that secured creditors may enter also a detailed description of the encumbered assets, the register will also allow searches to be made within these descriptions. I.e. if a secured creditor enters the unique serial number of an asset that is subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device, other users will be able to find the relevant entry even though they might not know against which security provider this entry has been filed.

B. Searching possibilities and third persons' constructive notice

The different methods in which the register can be searched are closely connected to the question whether it follows already from the registration of a security right or a retention of ownership device in certain assets that third persons can reasonably be expected to know that these assets are encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device, i.e. that third persons have constructive notice of the proprietary security. This is relevant for the possibility of good faith acquisition. Even if the third person does not have actual knowledge of the existence of the earlier right of another secured creditor, it can no longer acquire proprietary rights in the assets concerned free of that other secured creditor's right on the basis of the principles of good faith acquisition if it at least can reasonably be expected to know of the earlier right.

Since it is always possible to look up all security rights and retention of ownership devices registered against a certain security provider, a third person can always be expected to have notice of any earlier security right or retention of ownership device in assets in which this third person is about to acquire a proprietary security if the earlier security device is registered against the transferor. The situation is different, however, if the third person is to acquire not a security right but outright ownership in the ordinary course of the transferor's business (see IX.–6:102 paragraph (2)). In such a case, the third person – who is not itself a secured creditor – cannot be expected to care about any possible entries in the register for proprietary security.

Searching for descriptions of the assets serving as security, on the other hand, is also always possible, but not as certain to yield conclusive results as the possibility to search for certain security providers. This has the effect that since under these rules the secured creditor is not bound to give a detailed description of the assets serving as security, third persons cannot be expected to search the register for descriptions of these assets. Thus, even if a secured creditor has entered a detailed description of the collateral into the register, a third person cannot be expected to have notice of the security rights or retention of ownership devices in these assets if they are not registered against the person from whom the third person is about to acquire a proprietary right in those assets. (Such a situation might occur if the collateral is transferred by the security provider subject to the existing security right or retention of ownership device to another person who thus assumes the position of a security provider without the proprietary security being registered against this transferee, see IX.–3:330 and IX.–3:331).

Subsection 5: Registered creditors' duty to answer requests for information

IX.–3:319: Duty to give information

(1) Any registered secured creditor has a duty to answer requests for information by inquirers concerning the security right covered by the entry and the encumbered assets if these requests are made with the security provider's approval.

(2) The request must be in an official language of the member state of the European Union where the place of business or incorporation or the residence of the secured creditor is situated or in English.

(3) The request must be answered within fourteen days after the request, including the security provider's approval, has been received by the secured creditor.

(4) The secured creditor's duty to answer requests for information by inquirers according to the preceding paragraphs is owed both to the inquirer and to the security provider. To both parties, the secured creditor is liable in damages for any loss caused by breach of the duty.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article is based upon the consideration that the information directly accessible from the register under a direct entry system as suggested in these rules might be somewhat limited and unreliable. Information contained in an entry might be outdated, e.g. if the security right or retention of ownership device concerned has ceased to exist, but the entry has not been deleted. In other cases the description of the assets serving as security contained in the entry might have been too broad from the outset or too unspecific to individualise specific assets. The register therefore fulfils a warning function only, merely stating that a security right or retention of ownership device might be in existence. More specific and concrete information can only be obtained on the basis of an inquiry motivated by this warning.

Since inquiries and the information to be obtained in this way are central to the functioning of the register, they cannot be regarded as a matter to be left for the parties to regulate themselves. Persons holding the information concerning the existence of security rights or retention of ownership devices in the security provider's assets (i.e. registered secured creditors) might be tempted to delay answers to requests for information or not to answer them at all. Rules must exist which force them to give accurate information without undue delay.

The Article imposes a duty rather than an obligation because the consequences of non-compliance are regulated in a specific way in the following Articles. The difference is not significant, however, given the liability for damages imposed by paragraph (4) second sentence of this Article.

B. Parties involved

These rules have opted for placing a duty on the registered secured creditor to answer any request for information, i.e. the secured creditor whose name appears on the register in respect of a specific entry (for the situation in case of a transfer of the security right, see Comment B on IX.–3:328). Any prospective creditor or other interested party might as a matter of course also inquire from the security provider whether certain assets are encumbered with a security right or subject to a retention of ownership device or not. However, especially if the security provider is identical with the debtor of the obligation covered by the security, any declaration as to whether its assets are or are not already subject to security rights or retention of ownership devices might not be very reliable. Moreover, any prospective creditor might end up with nothing more than a personal right against the security provider if the information given by the latter turns out to be wrong. The only person who might give reliable information and whose liability might protect the prospective creditor therefore is the secured creditor.

Not only prospective secured creditors (i.e. persons intending to acquire a proprietary security right over the security provider's assets) will have a right to demand further information concerning the existence of a security right or a retention of ownership device in specific assets, but also other interested parties, especially persons intending to acquire (full) ownership in assets held by the security provider. Good faith acquisition does not protect such acquirers under all circumstances; therefore they need a possibility to obtain reliable information as to whether or not the asset to be acquired is subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device.

A requirement that the request for information must be made with the security provider's approval has been introduced in order to avoid the secured creditor being approached for information concerning its proprietary security by persons who do not have any legitimate interest in this information. On the other hand, it does not appear that the fact that the inquirer has to seek the security provider's approval would unduly limit the inquirer's chances of obtaining the information concerned. If the security provider does not give its approval, then a prospective creditor should simply refrain from granting credit. Similar possibilities would exist for a person intending to acquire full ownership in the security provider's assets in a situation where any prior proprietary security in these assets would not cease to exist by reason of the transfer.

For the technicalities of this approval, see the Comments on IX.–3:324.

C. Particulars of the duty to give information

Generally, the duty to give information arises only if the inquiry is in a language which the secured creditor can be expected to understand. In the first place, this will apply for an official language of the member state of the European Union where the place of business or incorporation or the residence of the secured creditor is situated. Since a strict requirement to communicate in that language might, however, create an unnecessary burden for the inquirer, the latter's request for information may also be in English (paragraph (2)).

The duty to answer a request for information is owed not only to the inquirer, but also to the security provider. The latter has an interest in the secured creditor answering such requests, since without reliable information being provided to the prospective creditors, the security provider might have difficulties in obtaining further credit (paragraph (4) sentence 1).

The basic remedy for any breach of the secured creditor's duty to answer requests for information is a liability for damages. This remedy can be of specific importance for the security provider if the latter is identical with the debtor of the obligation covered by the security. Should the secured creditor's conduct make it impossible for the security provider to obtain further secured credit, so that the latter can only obtain unsecured credit at higher interest rates, then the security provider could claim the difference as damages. For an inquirer who intended to assume the position of a secured creditor, however, damages are not the only conceivable remedy. Even though in cases of wrong or misleading information damages might put the inquirer into a position as good as that of a secured creditor, it is preferable that remedies actually attempt to give the inquirer the intended position. This objective is at least partly achieved by IX.–3:321 to IX.–3:323, which provide some more specific protection to the inquirer in addition to the foundations laid by general rules and principles, such as especially good faith acquisition.

Paragraph (3) provides for a period of two weeks which is allowed to the secured creditor to answer the request for information. This time limit does not rule out the possibility of a later answer, but the remedies against the secured creditor under paragraph (4) and IX.–3:323 will be available should the latter fail to answer the request for information within this period.

For the content of the information to be given and the remedies for a failure to comply with the duty to give information see the following Articles.

IX.–3:320: Content of the information

(1) Requests for information under the preceding Article must be answered by the secured creditor giving information concerning the existence of a security right in specific assets at the time when the information is given.

(2) The information may be given by:

(a) stating specifically whether the assets concerned are encumbered in favour of the secured creditor; or

(b) forwarding the relevant parts of the agreements between security provider and secured creditor covering the providing or retention of proprietary security.

(3) Where the security right has been transferred, the secured creditor must disclose the name and contact details of the transferee.

(4) The information must be given in an official language of the member state of the European Union where the place of business or incorporation or the residence of the secured creditor is situated or in English.

(5) No information needs to be given:

(a) if it is apparent directly from the entry that the asset concerned is not encumbered, provided that the entry complies with the requirements of paragraph (4); or

(b) if the secured creditor had already answered a request for information by the same inquirer in relation to the same asset within the past three months and the information given is still correct.

(6) These provisions do not affect the secured creditor's obligation to give information concerning the obligation covered by the security under IX.–5:401 (Secured creditor's obligation to give information about secured right) or any equivalent obligation owed to the debtor of the obligation covered by the security and the consequences of a non-performance of these obligations.

COMMENTS

A. Content of the information

The basic principle concerning the content of the information to be given by the secured creditor as an answer to a request under the preceding Article is that the secured creditor is only required to state whether or not the specific assets mentioned in the inquiry are encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device. (Again, the rules of this Section do not distinguish between security rights and retention of ownership devices.) The secured creditor is not bound to give a complete overview of all the security provider's assets serving as collateral for the secured creditor nor does the secured creditor have to set out details of the contract for proprietary security with the security provider if it is preferred that these details are kept confidential.

This standard way of answering a request for information is laid down in paragraph (2) (a). Alternatively, the secured creditor might also forward the relevant parts of the agreements between security provider and secured creditor covering the providing or retention of proprietary security (paragraph (2)(b)). If the secured creditor is in doubt whether a specific asset is subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device or wishes to avoid having to state in respect of an extensive list of assets whether or not they are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device it might seem preferable for the secured creditor to send, not necessarily the whole of the contract for proprietary security, but at least those parts of the agreement with the security provider by which proprietary security is created. Since the security provider has given its approval to the inquirer's request for information, such a method of answering the request does not appear to raise issues of confidentiality.

Specific rules apply where the security device has been transferred so that the secured creditor indicated in the entry – even though the transfer might not yet be mentioned in the register – is no longer the holder of the security device. According to paragraph (3), the registered secured creditor does not have to give any information whether or not the security right or retention of ownership device still exists: instead, the inquirer only has to be informed of the transfer so that the inquirer can turn to the transferee as the new secured creditor for further information.

B. Language of the information - paragraph (4)

Since it cannot necessarily be assumed that the inquirer and the secured creditor speak the same language, it had to be decided whether the former or the latter should bear the burden of a translation. By allowing the secured creditor to answer in the language of the member state where its place of business or incorporation or residence is located, this question was decided in the secured creditor's favour. There is already a contract for proprietary security between the secured creditor and the security provider, while this is not necessarily so between the latter and the inquirer; therefore it seems that the secured creditor should enjoy the better position in relation to the language of the information to be given. For the possibility to answer in English, see Comment C on IX.–3:319.

C. Exceptions - paragraph (5)

Paragraph (5) contains two exceptions where no information needs to be given by the secured creditor:

According to sub-paragraph (a) no information needs to be given if it is apparent from the content of the entry itself that the asset which the inquiry relates to is not subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. If a secured creditor has made an entry in the register stating that asset A is encumbered, no answer needs to be given to an inquiry concerning the existence of a security right in asset B. On the other hand, even if the description of the collateral in the entry individualises a specific asset as being encumbered in favour of the secured creditor, the secured creditor still has to answer a request for information concerning that asset. The security right might have ceased to exist and the inquirer cannot ascertain whether the information contained in the entry has become outdated.

The second exception in sub-paragraph (b) is intended to protect the secured creditor against repeated requests.

D. Information concerning the obligation covered by the security

Paragraph (6) provides that the rules of Subsection 5 do not affect any obligation of the secured creditor to give information concerning the obligation covered by the security and the consequences of a failure to comply with this obligation. Such an obligation owed by the secured creditor to the security provider is laid down in IX.–5:401; similar obligations might arise from the underlying secured transaction between the secured creditor and the debtor.

The consequences of a non-performance of these obligations will be different from those set out in this Subsection. Certainly the secured creditor must be bound by any answers given to requests under these obligations. However, since the amount of the secured right will more often than not be fluctuating or even not exactly known to the secured creditor, it would seem inappropriate to apply the strict regime laid down in this Subsection in relation to inquiries concerning the existence of a security right or a retention of ownership device to these inquiries concerning the scope and content of the secured right. Therefore, it seems to be preferable to leave inquiries of the latter kind out of the operation of the very specific and formalistic rules of Subsection 5 and to apply the general principles instead. To regulate such general principles in the context of this Section, it should be added, would be inconsistent with the fact that obligations to give information of this kind would not be limited to situations of registered proprietary security, but could be applicable also where the secured creditor exercises possession or control.

IX.–3:321: Consequences of correct information given by secured creditor

(1) If the secured creditor correctly informs the inquirer under this Subsection that the assets concerned are not encumbered, a security right in these assets which is subsequently created in favour of the secured creditor cannot enjoy priority conferred by the original entry over security rights of the inquirer. This rule applies only if the security rights of the inquirer are acquired by the latter within three months after the request for information had been made.

(2) If the secured creditor correctly informs the inquirer under this Subsection that the assets concerned are encumbered, the inquirer cannot acquire a proprietary right in the encumbered assets free of the encumbrance in favour of the secured creditor even if that would otherwise be possible under the principles of good faith acquisition.

COMMENTS

A. General survey

The specific consequences of performance or non-performance of the information duties under this Subsection are to be found in this and the next two Articles. This Article covers situations where the information given by the secured creditor is correct. The next Article deals with cases where the information given is not correct. And the third of the three Articles sets out the consequences of a complete failure or a delay in answering the inquirer's request for information.

B. Correct information that assets are not encumbered – paragraph (1)

Paragraph (1) deals with the situation where the secured creditor correctly informs the inquirer that the assets concerned are not subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. (Again, the rules of this Section do not distinguish between these two kinds of security.) If the inquirer subsequently acquires a proprietary right, the result should be that the inquirer can rely on the information given by the secured creditor and that the right acquired by the inquirer is not of a lower rank than the secured creditor's rights.

The result described in the preceding paragraph will be achieved without any difficulties in situations in which, after the information is given by the secured creditor, only the inquirer acquires any security right. However, the operation of IX.–4:101 causes some problems in cases where the secured creditor also acquires additional security rights. Since the priority of competing security rights is determined by the order of their registration, which might predate the actual creation, the secured creditor might on the basis of IX.–4:101 claim priority by virtue of the original entry over security rights created in favour of the inquirer, even if these security rights were actually created after the secured creditor had informed the inquirer that the assets concerned were not encumbered in its favour and before the security rights of the secured creditor were created.

Paragraph (1) is intended to remedy this specific problem. A secured creditor who informs an inquirer that an asset is not subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device in its favour will not be able to rely on priority conferred by the original entry over proprietary security created in favour of the inquirer. This does not, however, constitute a limit to the effectiveness of the security rights or retention of ownership devices and the entry filed by the secured creditor in other respects.

The solution suggested in this provision is rather a novelty, but it appears to be preferable in comparison to the available other alternatives. (i) Demanding the removal of the original secured creditor's entry would surely go too far. The secured creditor enjoys a priority position against any other potential secured creditor and should not be made to lose this position. Moreover, the scope of the entry might often be broader than the collateral to which the inquiry relates. (ii) To make the priority position of the inquirer dependent upon a subordination agreement appears to be unduly burdensome for the inquirer (and, indirectly, also for the debtor whose access to additional credits might be delayed). The inquirer should be able to obtain a security right with a secure priority position immediately after having received an answer by the secured creditor without the need for the conclusion of a subordination agreement in favour of the inquirer's rights.

The operation of paragraph (1) is limited in three respects. Firstly, the inquirer is protected for a period of three months only. If the rights are created more than three months after the request for information has been made, the inquirer can no longer rely on the assumption that the assets concerned are not encumbered in favour of the secured creditor.

Secondly, even during this period of time, the original secured creditor can create security rights that enjoy priority over rights to be acquired by the inquirer if the secured creditor enters a new entry into the register. The effect of paragraph (1) is limited to priority to be conferred by virtue of the original entry only.

Thirdly, paragraph (1) deals with proprietary security rights of the inquirer only, while paragraph (2) and also IX.–3:322 cover the acquisition of proprietary rights in general. The reason is that it is thought that in cases where the inquirer acquires full ownership in the assets concerned, the problems described above do not arise. Once the inquirer acquires ownership, the security provider can no longer validly create another security right in the asset concerned in favour of the secured creditor.

C. Correct information that assets are encumbered – paragraph (2)

Paragraph (2) covers situations where the secured creditor has correctly informed the inquirer that the assets concerned are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. If the inquirer subsequently acquires a proprietary right, the result must be that this proprietary right is subject to the secured creditor's prior rights.

In most cases, this effect follows already from the application of general principles. The secured creditor's rights have been created and made effective before the creation of the inquirer's rights and therefore enjoy priority over the latter. Some exceptions, however, could apply in situations where the inquirer could rely on principles of good faith acquisition. IX.–6:102 expressly allows the acquisition of ownership free of the prior registered security right or a retention of ownership device on the basis of a good faith acquisition if the security provider acts in the ordinary course of its business. Paragraph (2) makes sure that even in such situations the inquirer cannot acquire ownership in the collateral on the basis of a good faith acquisition if the secured creditor had informed the inquirer that these goods were actually subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device.

It should be noted that, while most provisions in this Subsection constitute a burden for the secured creditor, paragraph (2) creates an incentive for the latter to answer inquiries by giving the secured creditor additional protection.

D. Relative effects of the Article

In most cases, only the constellation of two competing creditors will have to be considered. In rare situations, however, the security provider might have created effective proprietary security in favour of three or more secured creditors. While this does not cause any specific problems as long as for example the application of this Article is identical towards all security providers, there might be exceptional situations where this is not the case. In these situations, the question of priority might be affected by circumstances that are effective only between some, but not all security providers. Similar problems, however, might arise in situations of a good faith acquisition (e.g. a secured creditor might be in good faith in respect of earlier security rights held by one other secured creditor, but might have notice of the rights of a third secured creditor). No detailed discussion of the rather complicated problems arising in this respect will be attempted here since the outcome will depend upon the individual circumstances of each case. It suffices to say that in the context of the present Article, the position of each secured creditor will largely depend upon whether this secured creditor can be regarded as having assumed the risk of being a second or lower-ranking secured creditor only.

IX.–3:322: Consequences of incorrect information given by secured creditor

(1) If the secured creditor incorrectly informs the inquirer under this Subsection that the assets concerned are not encumbered, the inquirer may within three months acquire a proprietary right in these assets free of any encumbrance in favour of the secured creditor on the basis of a good faith acquisition in spite of the entry in the register covering the secured creditor's rights.

(2) If the secured creditor incorrectly informs the inquirer under this Subsection that the assets concerned are encumbered, and the inquirer nevertheless acquires a proprietary security right in the assets concerned from the security provider, IX.–3:321 (Consequences of correct information given by secured creditor) paragraph (1) first sentence applies with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. Incorrect information that assets are not encumbered - paragraph (1)

If for whatever reason the secured creditor incorrectly informs the inquirer that the assets concerned are not subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device (the rules of this Section drawing no distinction between retention of ownership devices and security rights), the inquirer should be able to rely on this information, i.e. the inquirer should be able to acquire proprietary rights in the assets concerned that are not subject to prior rights of the secured creditor.

It is not entirely clear, however, that this result would always flow from the application of the general rules. Even the outright acquisition of ownership of goods free of the earlier registered proprietary security on the basis of a good faith acquisition seems to be barred if the security provider does not act in the ordinary course of its business; for intangibles there is under the general principles no good faith acquisition of the full title or a security right at all. Therefore it seems that an additional provision might be necessary.

The application of IX.–3:321 paragraph (1) would not be sufficient. It is not the relationship of the inquirer's rights vis-à-vis subsequently created rights of the secured creditor that has to be dealt with but the relationship towards earlier rights. The solution suggested by paragraph (1) of the present Article is that for a period of three months the existence of an entry in the register covering the secured creditor's rights will not affect the inquirer's possibility to acquire proprietary rights in the assets concerned free of the prior rights of the secured creditor.

This acquisition is, however, still based upon the inquirer's good faith. Should the latter have notice of the existence of the secured creditor's rights from any other source, then there can be no good faith acquisition.

B. Incorrect information that assets are encumbered – paragraph (2)

In situations where the secured creditor – even if incorrectly – informs the inquirer that the assets concerned are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device, the inquirer will typically refrain from the transaction. Thus, primarily only the security provider's right to damages will be of any importance. However, if the inquirer nevertheless acquires a security right (presumably because of its confidence in the security provider who can truthfully declare that the assets concerned are not subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device), the secured creditor should not have any advantage from having given wrong information.

The position should therefore not be better for the secured creditor than if the latter had informed the inquirer that the assets concerned are not already serving as security, i.e. the inquirer should be able to acquire proprietary rights in the assets concerned that are not subject to any prior rights of the secured creditor.

This result will in most situations already follow from general rules. The acquisition of proprietary rights by the inquirer is not barred merely by reason of the fact that an entry has been registered in relation to the assets concerned; the inquirer can therefore acquire a proprietary interest, whether a security right or ownership, from the holder of these rights, which in fact are not subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device in favour of the (alleged) secured creditor.

A specific provision is necessary only in respect of the situation set out in the Comment A on the preceding Article, i.e. where not only the inquirer but also the secured creditor subsequently acquire security rights in the assets concerned. According to paragraph (2) of the present Article, the rule in paragraph (1) of the preceding Article applies with appropriate adaptations, i.e. the secured creditor's subsequently acquired security right cannot enjoy priority conferred by the original entry.

Paragraph (2) goes a step further than paragraph (1) of the preceding Article by limiting the reference to sentence 1 of that provision. This can be regarded as an element of punishment of the secured creditor.

Concerning the situation of the inquirer acquiring not a proprietary security right but full ownership, see Comment A, last paragraph on the preceding Article.

IX.–3:323: Consequences of failure to give information

(1) If the secured creditor fails to answer the request for information under IX.–3:319 (Duty to give information) and IX.–3:320 (Content of the information) or incorrectly answers that its security rights in the assets concerned have been transferred, the inquirer is to be treated as if the secured creditor had given the information that the assets concerned are not encumbered. IX.–3:321 (Consequences of correct information given by secured creditor) paragraph (1) or IX.–3:322 (Consequences of incorrect information given by secured creditor) paragraph (1), respectively, apply with appropriate adaptations.

(2) If the secured creditor delays in answering the request for information under IX.–3:319 (Duty to give information) and IX.–3:320 (Content of the information), the preceding paragraph applies if a proprietary right is created in favour of or acquired by the inquirer before the secured creditor answers the request for information.

COMMENTS

Obtaining further information from the secured creditor is essential for the inquirer; therefore there must be protection against the secured creditor's refusal to answer requests for information under this Subsection.

A. Paragraph (1): failure to give information

If the secured creditor does not react to the inquirer's request for information, a mere liability for damages does not provide sufficient protection for the inquirer. In order not to let the secured creditor benefit from its inaction, the inquirer is to be treated in the most favourable way, i.e. as if the secured creditor had – correctly or not – stated that the assets concerned are not subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. (Paragraph (1) refers to security rights only, but this reference covers retention of ownership devices as well, see IX.–3:303 paragraph (2)).

This objective is achieved by declaring applicable IX.–3:321 paragraph (1) (in situations where the assets concerned are actually not subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device in favour of the secured creditor) and IX.–3:322 paragraph (1) (in situations where a security right or a retention of ownership device in favour of the secured creditor exists).

Paragraph (1) applies not only in situations of a complete failure to answer a request for information concerning specific assets, but also where the secured creditor incorrectly states that its security rights or retention of ownership devices have been transferred.

B. Paragraph (2): delayed answer

According to paragraph (2), the consequences set out in paragraph (1) apply as soon as the answer period of two weeks (see IX.–3:319 paragraph (3)) has elapsed without the secured creditor having answered the request for information. However, the inquirer cannot rely on the specific protection derived from the application of the present Article read with IX.–3:321 paragraph (1) and IX.–3:322 paragraph (1) if proprietary rights in the assets concerned are acquired by the inquirer only after the secured creditor actually had answered the request, even if delayed.

IX.–3:324: Form of requests and information

The request for information under this Subsection and the answer must be in textual form. Both may be made via an electronic means of communication provided by the register, in which case a certification of the inquiry or the answer is to be communicated by the register to the inquirer or the secured creditor, respectively, serving as proof of receipt of the information or the answer by the other party.

COMMENTS

As in IX.–3:313, the electronic online register can also be used as a means of communication. Since the times of receipt of a request for information or an answer are of specific importance for the operation of the provisions of this Subsection, there is a need for proof of such receipts which can be fulfilled by using the online register as a communication platform, similar to an internet e-mail provider.

If an inquiry is made by use of means of communication provided by the online register, it is assumed that the approval by the security provider could be effected in a manner similar to the security provider's consent to the registration.

Subsection 6: Duration, renewal and deletion of entries

IX.–3:325: Duration

(1) An entry expires five years after it has been entered into the register or at the date of expiry indicated in the entry.

(2) Once an entry expires, it no longer appears on the register and is no longer directly accessible for any user. It ceases to have any effect under this Section. The content of the entry is kept for reference purposes in the archives of the registration office.

COMMENTS

As a general position, it must be ensured that the register is not overloaded with entries that do not correspond to security rights or retention of ownership devices that are actually in existence. There is a danger that the register might become difficult to search. Moreover, each entry filed against a security provider might make it more difficult for the latter to obtain additional secured credit.

Paragraph (1) provides that entries do not remain on the register any longer after the date of expiry if such a date had been included in the entry by the secured creditor as additional content according to IX.–3:307 sub-paragraph (b). If there is no such expiry date, an entry expires five years after it has been filed.

After expiry of an entry, it ceases to have any effect under this Section, i.e. security rights or retention of ownership devices covered by this entry are no longer regarded as being made effective against third persons by virtue of this registration. The content of the entry is no longer directly accessible from the register. It will, however, still be kept in the archives in case the entry might become relevant in order to determine the legal position before its expiry.

IX.–3:326: Renewal

(1) Unless a date of expiry has been included in the entry, an entry may be renewed before the end of the regular period of expiry for an additional period of five years.

(2) The renewal of an entry is effected by a declaration of the secured creditor to the register.

COMMENTS

In most cases, the regular duration of an entry of five years will cover the whole lifespan of a security right or a retention of ownership device and the secured right will be satisfied or the security right be enforced before the expiry of this period. For exceptional cases, in which proprietary security in movables exists for a longer period (or in which the secured creditor repeatedly acquires proprietary security in the same type of assets which continue to be covered by the original entry) this Article allows the secured creditor to renew the entry for an additional period of five years. This renewal can be repeated. The renewal is to be effected by a unilateral declaration of the secured creditor (see paragraph (2)) and is not dependent upon a separate declaration of consent by the security provider. This position is in line with the recent Austrian draft proposal on a register of non-possessory security rights and seems to be preferable in comparison with a solution requiring the security provider's consent. This would effectively force the secured creditor to enforce the security right before expiration of the period of five years or to seek an arrangement with the security provider. Under the present rules, the latter appears to be sufficiently protected by the rights under IX.–3:315.

If an expiry date has been indicated in the entry, the possibility of renewal under the present Article does not apply. The secured creditor is bound by the content of its own declaration.

IX.–3:327: Deletion

(1) The secured creditor may at any time delete the entry by declaration to the register.

(2) For the consequences of a declaration according to the preceding paragraph, IX.–3:325 (Duration) paragraph (2) is applicable with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

Only the secured creditor may delete the entry. (The security provider, however, might be entitled to demand a deletion of the entry according to IX.–3:315). If the security provider could delete entries itself, it could unilaterally destroy the secured position of the secured creditor vis-à-vis third persons.

Subsection 7: Transfer of the security right or of the encumbered asset

IX.–3:328: Transfer of the security right: general rules

(1) Where the security right is transferred, it remains effective by virtue of the original entry.

(2) Even if there is no declaration indicating the transfer under IX.–3:329 (Transfer of the security right: declaration indicating the transfer), the transferee is bound under Subsection 5 in the same way as a secured creditor from the moment of the transfer.

(3) The transferor is liable towards the transferee for any damage caused by its conduct in relation to the entry, as well as to amendments and deletions thereof from the moment of the transfer of the security right until a declaration indicating the transfer is filed or until the transferor declares its consent to such a declaration under IX.–3:329 (Transfer of the security right: declaration indicating the transfer) paragraph (4)).

COMMENTS

A. General rules

As a general rule, the transfer of a security device that had been made effective by registration does not affect the effectiveness of this security device, whether a security right or a retention of ownership device. It remains effective even without an additional entry being filed by the original or the new secured creditor (paragraph (1); see also IX.–5:301 paragraph (3)(a)). The parties may, however, make such an entry in the register in order to obtain additional protection; the details of this declaration indicating the transfer are dealt with in IX.–3:329.

These rules have consciously decided against the option of making the continuing effectiveness of the security right or retention of ownership device dependent upon registration of the new secured creditor on the basis of the assumption that interests of other existing secured creditors (see Comment B) and prospective creditors (see Comment C), of the security provider (see Comment D) and the secured creditor (see Comment E) can be adequately protected without such a rule. Moreover such a rule would be rather harsh for the new secured creditor.

B. Other secured creditors

The position of other secured creditors who already hold proprietary security in the same encumbered assets should not be affected by a transfer of the security right. If these secured creditors' rights were of a lower rank than the transferor's proprietary security, then these other secured creditors should not obtain a windfall by enjoying a higher priority position after the transfer of the security right concerned.

C. Prospective creditors

As long as the transfer is not registered, third persons cannot determine from the register who the holder of the security right or retention of ownership device concerned is. It could therefore be assumed that most inquiries concerning that registered proprietary security would be directed at the transferor who is still registered, not at the transferee.

However, the prospective creditors still enjoy sufficient protection. (i) The transferor is under a duty to disclose the transfer of a security device to the inquirer (IX.–3:320 paragraph (3)); (ii) the transferee, even if not yet registered, is also bound to answer requests for information (IX.–3:328 paragraph (2)); (iii) answers given by the transferor in relation to security rights or retention of ownership devices that had already be transferred are binding against the transferee as well (IX.–3:328 paragraph (2)).

D. Security provider

In general, the position of the security provider is not affected by a change in the person of the secured creditor.

However, since security providers might prefer that all entries filed against them show the actual secured creditor in order to spare any prospective creditors the inconvenience of not being able to determine the actual holder of the security device concerned from the register, a security provider is entitled to demand that an entry is filed indicating the transfer of the proprietary security (IX.–3:329 paragraph (5)).

E. Secured creditor (transferee)

Obviously it constitutes an advantage for the new secured creditor that the transfer of the security right does not affect the effectiveness and priority of the security device. This is especially important since the transfer of a security right or retention of ownership device often is not specifically agreed upon by the parties but flows as an automatic consequence from the transfer of the secured right, so that the parties need not always be aware of a transfer of a security device.

However, as long as the transferee is not registered as the new secured creditor in the register, the transferee runs the risk that the transferor might delete the entry or give wrong information to inquirers. Protection against these risks is provided by several provisions. (i) There is a duty to inform the transferee of the existence of proprietary security on the basis of IX.–5:301 paragraph (2); (ii) from paragraph (3) of the present Article follows a liability of the transferor in damages for its conduct in relation to the entry (e.g. by deleting it or by informing inquirers that the security rights or retention of ownership devices covered by the entry do no longer exist); (iii) the transferee has a right to demand a consent by the transferor to the filing of a declaration indicating the transfer under paragraph (5) of the following Article.

IX.–3:329: Transfer of the security right: declaration indicating the transfer

(1) Where the security right is transferred, the original entry may be amended by a declaration indicating the transfer.

(2) The declaration indicating the transfer is subject to IX.–3:311 (Amendments of entries) and any additional rules as laid down in this Article.

(3) The declaration indicating the transfer can be entered into the register only if:

(a) it is made in respect of a specific entry;
(b) it indicates the security rights to be transferred;
(c) it identifies the transferee; and
(d) it is accompanied by a declaration of the person making the amendment that the latter assumes liability for damage caused to the secured creditor or third persons by a wrongful entry.

(4) The declaration indicating the transfer may be filed by the transferor or, with the transferor's consent, by the transferee.

(5) On the basis and to the extent of the transfer of the security right, the security provider is entitled as against the transferor to the filing of a declaration indicating the transfer and the transferee is entitled to a declaration of consent by the transferor according to the preceding paragraph. IX.–3:316 (Review of contested entries by registration office) applies with appropriate adaptations to the assertion of these rights.

(6) Once the declaration indicating the transfer is filed, the original entry is amended accordingly and is no longer regarded as covering the security rights indicated as having been transferred.

(7) Once the declaration indicating the transfer is filed, a new entry is automatically filed against the security provider reiterating the content of the original entry and stating that the security rights indicated are transferred to the transferee.

(8) The transferee assumes the position of the secured creditor in respect of the new entry for all purposes under this Section. In respect of the security rights indicated as transferred, the new entry preserves the priority conferred by the original entry.

COMMENTS

This Article spells out the details of the declaration indicating the transfer of a security device (whether a security right or a retention of ownership device, see IX.–3:303). These rules are somewhat complicated since in many cases the transferor will not transfer all security rights or retention of ownership devices covered by a single entry, but rather only some of them. This makes it necessary to create two separate entries, one still in favour of the transferor for its remaining rights, the other in favour of the transferee covering the security device that had been transferred.

A. Amendment of the original entry

In order to indicate the transfer, the original entry is amended; this amendment includes a declaration stating which assets have been transferred (paragraph (3)(b)). The effect of this amendment is that the original entry no longer covers the assets declared as having been transferred (paragraph (6)).

The amendment may be filed by the original secured creditor or, with the transferor's consent, by the transferee (paragraph (4)). A consent by the security provider is not necessary since such an amendment which is limited to security rights or a retention of ownership devices for which an entry already existed is less dangerous for the security provider than the registration of a new entry.

The transferor continues to be regarded as the secured creditor in relation to the (amended) original entry in its remaining (limited) scope. The transferor is responsible for answering demands for information and may decide to delete this entry.

B. New entry indicating the transfer

The amendment to the original entry has the additional effect of creating a new entry that is filed against the security provider and that indicates the new secured creditor as transferee of the security devices concerned (paragraph (7)).

This new entry preserves the priority of the original entry in relation to the security devices that had been transferred (cf. paragraph (8) sentence 2, which is a specific application of the general rule laid down in IX.–5:301 paragraph (4)). In respect of this new entry, only the transferee is regarded as the secured creditor for the purposes of this Section, i.e. the transferee has to answer demands for information and is the only person entitled to delete this entry.

IX.–3:330: Transfer of the encumbered asset: general rules

(1) Ownership of the encumbered asset may be transferred subject to the existing security right without a new entry being filed in the register.

(2) The continuation of effectiveness and the priority of the security right in the encumbered asset by virtue of the original entry in the register are governed by IX.–5:303 (Transfer of encumbered asset).

(3) For the purposes of this Section, the transferee assumes the position of the security provider in respect of the security right in the transferred assets from the moment of the transfer.

(4) The preceding paragraphs apply with appropriate adaptations where the rights of a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in or relating to the supplied assets are transferred subject to an existing retention of ownership device.

COMMENTS

While preceding two Articles cover the situation of a transfer of the encumbrance, this Article and the following Article deal with the transfer of ownership of the encumbered asset or the transfer by a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee of the rights in or relating to the supplied assets where the rights are transferred subject to an existing retention of ownership device. Whereas the transfer in itself does not give rise to any difficulties concerning the operation of the register (paragraphs (1) and (3), see Comment C), there might be specific problems in relation to possible conflicts between the original secured creditor and secured creditors of the acquirer of the encumbered asset or other persons acquiring proprietary rights in this asset from the latter. These problems are dealt with primarily in IX.–5:303, to which paragraph (2) of the present Article refers. To some extent, such conflicts are also solved on the basis of the principles of good faith acquisition, which are laid down in IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right), IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) and IX.–6:102 which all contain specific rules concerning the application of these principles in the situation of a good faith acquisition subsequent to a transfer of ownership of an asset that is subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. The fact that even after a transfer of ownership of the encumbered asset (or after the transfer of the buyer's, hire-purchaser's, lessee's or consignee's rights in the situation of a retention of ownership device) the security device might still be registered against the transferor only, not against the transferee as the new security provider, has specific consequences concerning the question whether parties dealing with the transferee can be expected to know that the assets concerned are encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device and that the transferee has no right or authority to transfer proprietary rights in these assets free of that earlier right.

In relation to the situations covered by the present Article, the general rule contained in IX.–3:303 applies that the European register of proprietary security does not distinguish between security rights and retention of ownership devices. However, the issues of substantive law are slightly different. Therefore, it was thought to be preferable to flag up these differences by the separate provision in paragraph (4). And in these Comments, the two situations will be treated separately. The transfer of ownership of an encumbered asset is dealt with in Comments A to C; the transfer by a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee of the rights in or relating to the supplied assets subject to an existing retention of ownership device is dealt with in Comment D.

A. Transfer of ownership of encumbered asset does not necessarily affect effectiveness of security right

Paragraph (2) read with IX.–5:303 paragraph (1) is based upon the assumption that the security provider may transfer ownership of the encumbered asset subject to the existing security right. The transferee acquires the rights without any need for a registration of this transfer (paragraph (1)).

According to paragraph (2) read with IX.–5:303, not even a new entry filed against the transferee is necessary for the continuation of the effectiveness of the secured creditor's rights in the transferred assets. The security right remains effective against the transferee and all unsecured (and some secured, see Comments B and C) creditors of the transferee by virtue of the original entry against the original security provider.

The preceding paragraphs do not apply, however, where the transferee acquires ownership of the assets concerned free of the earlier encumbrance. This might happen if the transferor security provider is entitled to make such transfers or if the transferee acquires ownership free of the earlier encumbrance on the basis of a good faith acquisition according to IX.–6:102 read with VIII.–3:102. In such cases, the transferee acquires the asset free of the security right and the secured creditor's security right can no longer be effective after the transfer (see also IX.–5:303 paragraphs (1) and (2).

B. Conflicts between original secured creditor and persons acquiring proprietary rights (including security rights) from transferee

In situations where the security right remains effective even though ownership of the encumbered asset has been transferred by the original security provider to a transferee, there might be conflicts between the original secured creditor and secured creditors of the transferee who might have acquired a security right in the encumbered asset from the latter or other persons who acquired other proprietary rights, especially ownership, in the assets concerned from the transferee.

(a) Secured creditor of transferee with security right acquired before transfer. The general rule on priority contained in IX.–4:101 has to be slightly adapted in relation to situations of a transfer of the encumbered asset. In situations where the events take place in the following order, the order of registration cannot be decisive. Firstly, secured creditor A acquires and registers security rights in (future) assets of type X of the security provider B; secondly, secured creditor C acquires and registers a security right in a (present) asset of type X of security provider D; thirdly, transferee B acquires the encumbered asset subject to the existing security right from transferor D. If the order of registration were decisive, the rights of secured creditor A would have priority over the rights of secured creditor C. Thus, the priority position of secured creditor C would be lost merely by reason of the asset serving as security being transferred to B.

Such a solution would be obviously untenable. Therefore, according to paragraph (2) read with IX.–5:303 paragraph (3) the rights encumbering the assets at the time of the transfer (i.e. the security rights of the transferor's secured creditor C) have priority over security rights created in favour of secured creditors of the transferee before the transfer of ownership of the encumbered asset (i.e. the security rights of the transferee's secured creditor A).

Questions of a good faith acquisition will in such cases normally not be relevant since the transferee is not yet in possession of the assets when these are encumbered in favour of its creditors (see IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) paragraph (1)(a) read with IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (1)(b).

(b) Secured creditor of transferee with security right acquired after transfer. A different problem arises in relation to secured creditors of the transferee who acquire their security right after the transfer of the encumbered asset. As long as an entry in the register concerning a security right in the asset in question has been filed only against the original security provider (transferor), the security right is invisible for the secured creditors of the transferee. Therefore, it has to be considered whether and under which requirements the original security right in the transferred asset can be effective even against these secured creditors of the transferee acquiring a security right in the same asset.

The solution is straightforward if the secured creditors acquired and registered their security rights only after an additional entry in the register had been filed against the transferee indicating that the latter had acquired the assets concerned subject to security rights created by the transferor. In such cases, the secured creditors of the transferee can acquire only a security right that is subject to the original secured creditor's prior rights in the same assets. The same result applies in cases in which the secured creditors of the transferee had notice of the security right of the original secured creditor. There is no reason not to uphold the priority of the original secured creditor's security rights.

The situation is different, however, if the secured creditors of the transferee acquire their rights before an entry has been filed against the transferee and without knowledge of the prior encumbrance. It must be assumed that the fact that a security right is registered against the transferor should not in every case exclude the possibility that another creditor who wants to acquire a security right in the same asset after it had been transferred might be worthy of protection. To which extent and under which circumstances such protection should be available can be regarded as an application of the principles of good faith acquisition, taking into account also any constructive rather than actual notice which might be based upon the existence of an entry in the register covering the security right concerned.

While the rules on good faith acquisition under IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) do not apply to intangibles, the possibility for a secured creditor, who wants to acquire a security right in goods free of any earlier encumbrance, to rely on the principle of good faith acquisition is not entirely ruled out merely by reason of the fact that the security right has been registered. IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) paragraph (1)(b) only requires that the creditor does not know and has no reason to assume that the transferor has no right or authority to grant a security right in disregard of any third person's limited proprietary right in the movable concerned. It will not be in every case that the mere existence of an entry in the European register of proprietary security would be decisive regardless of the content of the entry and other relevant circumstances of the case. Apart from the argument that entries are filed by the parties themselves and that these entries therefore are somewhat unreliable, it has to be kept in mind that the description of the encumbered assets contained in the entry might be unspecific. Searching the register not for entries filed against a specific security provider but for entries filed in relation to specific assets might therefore prove to be impossible. If the security right has not been registered against the transferee, the latter's secured creditors would – if the register does not contain any entry filed against the transferee – have to find out from whom the transferee has acquired ownership of the asset concerned and afterwards they might have to contact the transferor's secured creditor and inquire whether the asset concerned was actually encumbered in its favour. While it certainly can be said that prospective secured creditors are under stricter requirements than prospective acquirers of full title in relation to their duty to ascertain whether the assets concerned are already encumbered, it seems that such broad duties would go a step too far. The effectiveness of the system of publicity by registration would be greatly endangered if prospective secured creditors would always have to undertake research concerning the origins of the assets to be encumbered instead of merely having to check whether there is any relevant entry filed against the security provider.

On the basis of these considerations, IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) paragraph (2) expressly provides for a limitation of the effects of registration in the situation of a transfer of ownership of the encumbered assets, effectively allowing a good faith acquisition even if the security right is registered. As long as the entry covering the security rights in the assets concerned is not filed against the transferee, the fact that such an entry is filed against the transferor will not have the effect that a good faith acquisition of a proprietary security right from the transferee free of the earlier encumbrance is excluded. Unless the transferee's secured creditors have actual knowledge of the fact that the transferee has no right or authority to transfer a proprietary right in the asset concerned free of the earlier encumbrance, they are not required to search the register for entries filed against persons other than the transferee with whom they are dealing.

It has thus become evident that under the direct entry system suggested in these rules the original secured creditor cannot always rely on its original entry as a protection against secured creditors of the transferee of the encumbered asset acquiring a security right in these assets free of the original secured creditor's rights. These considerations show that there might be a practical need for an entry against the transferee which would provide protection against the loss of the original secured creditor's rights. This declaration of transfer is dealt with in the following Article.

(c) Persons who acquire other proprietary rights from transferee. Similar reasoning applies to persons who do not acquire proprietary security rights in the transferred assets from the transferee, but other proprietary rights, such as outright ownership.

IX.–6:102 paragraph (2) shows that the mere existence of an entry covering the security right concerned does not rule out all possibility of a good faith acquisition of ownership. While sub-paragraph (a) of that provision is limited to dispositions in the ordinary course of business, sub-paragraph (b) is applicable regardless of whether the disposition did or did not take place in the ordinary course of business. If after a transfer of ownership of the encumbered asset the security right is not registered against the transferee, the mere fact that the security right is registered against the transferor does not rule out a good faith acquisition of ownership free of the security right under IX.–6:102 read with VIII.–3:102.ZZZ

C. Transferee as security provider

The system of registration as suggested in this Section is highly formalised For this reason it could be assumed that the transferee can be regarded as the security provider only once a declaration indicating this transfer has been filed. Similarly to IX.–3:328 paragraph (2) in relation to the secured creditor, paragraph (3) therefore expressly provides that the transferee is to be regarded as security provider from the moment of transfer (even without a declaration of transfer according to IX.–3:331), thus allowing the transferee e.g. to make use of the means of protection under Subsection 3.

D. Transfer of assets subject to an existing retention of ownership device

According to paragraph (4), the rules laid down in paragraphs (1) to (3) are applicable with appropriate adaptations even if there is no transfer of ownership in encumbered assets but a transfer by a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee of the rights in or relating to the supplied assets subject to an existing retention of ownership device.

While the operation of the register is not affected by the question whether there is a transfer of ownership or of the rights of a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in or relating to the collateral, the issues of substantive law are different so that a separate treatment of these constellations appears to be preferable.

A buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee of assets supplied subject to a retention of ownership device is not the owner of these assets. Instead of ownership, these persons therefore can in general transfer only the rights in or relating to the supplied assets which arise on the basis of the respective contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment. Even though a transferee therefore in general does not become the owner, but merely the assignee, e.g., of the buyer's rights against the seller under the contract of sale, the transferee assumes the position formerly held by the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee. Paragraphs (1) and (3) are applicable with appropriate adaptations, i.e. no registration etc. is necessary in order for the transferee to assume this position for the purposes of the rules in this Section as from the moment of the transfer.

(a) Retention of ownership device in general not affected by this transfer. The reasoning set out in Comment A applies mutatis mutandis to the transfer by a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee of the rights in or relating to the supplied assets subject to an existing retention of ownership device. Such a transfer in general does not affect the retention of ownership device; IX.–5:303 paragraph (1) (which is applicable also to this situation, cf. IX.–5:303 paragraph (4)) confirms that not even a new entry filed against the transferee is necessary for the continuation of the effectiveness of the retention of ownership device.

The holder of the retention of ownership device loses the rights, however, if the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee agrees on a transfer of ownership to the transferee and the latter acquires the rights free from the earlier retention of ownership device on the basis of the principles of good faith acquisition, see IX.–6:102 paragraph (3) read with VIII.–3:101, or if the (true) owner had granted authority to the transferor.

(b) Conflicts between original secured creditor and persons acquiring proprietary rights (including security rights) from transferee. As long as the transfer of the rights held by the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee is subject to the existing retention of ownership device, the transferee does not become the owner of the assets subject to the retention of ownership device. Therefore, any persons purporting to acquire proprietary rights (including security rights) from the transferee do not acquire any rights in the assets concerned, unless they can rely on the principle of good faith acquisition.

Therefore, the solution to the situations dealt with in Comment B (a) is straightforward. No proprietary rights are acquired at all by a person who claims to be a secured creditor of the transferee on the basis of an alleged acquisition of a security right in these assets taking place before the transfer of the rights of the original buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee to the transferee. Since there is no good faith acquisition in such a situation, the transferee who was not and is not the owner of the assets concerned (as long as the original retention of ownership device is not lost) cannot create a proprietary right in these assets. This conflict is solved in favour of the holder of the retention of ownership device.

In the situation dealt with in Comment B (b) and (c), the results depend on whether the persons claiming to have acquired proprietary rights in the assets concerned from the transferee can rely on the principles of good faith acquisition. Where these rules do not apply, the transferee as a non-owner cannot create proprietary rights in the assets concerned. Where, however, IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) (for the acquisition of a security right) or IX.–6:102 read with VIII.–3:101 (for the acquisition of outright ownership) apply, the holder of the retention of ownership device must give precedence to the rights acquired by virtue of these provisions. The reasoning set out in B (b) concerning the relevance of a registration of an earlier security right is applicable in the present context as well. A registration of a retention of ownership device can prevent a third person from claiming to be in good faith only if this third person acquires the rights from the person against whom the security device is registered. If the retention of ownership device is registered only against the original buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee, but not against the transferee who has assumed the position of the former, a good faith acquisition by persons acquiring proprietary rights in the assets concerned from the transferee is no longer excluded.

IX.–3:331: Transfer of the encumbered asset: declaration of transfer

(1) A transferee acquiring ownership of an encumbered asset subject to an existing security right has a duty to enter in the register an entry against itself indicating the transfer, unless such a declaration has already been entered by the secured creditor.

(2) The transferee is liable towards the secured creditor holding a security right in the transferred asset for damage resulting from a breach of the duty under the preceding paragraph.

(3) The declaration of transfer can be entered by the transferee or the secured creditor if:

(a) it is made in respect of an identified security provider as transferee;
(b) it indicates the identity of an identified security provider as transferor;
(c) it contains a minimum declaration as to the transferred asset;
(d) it is indicated by one or several references to a list of categories of assets to which category the transferred asset belongs; and
(e) it is accompanied by a declaration of the person making the declaration of transfer that the latter assumes liability for any damage caused to the transferee, the secured creditor or third persons by a wrongful entry.

(4) The preceding paragraphs apply with appropriate adaptations where the rights of a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in or relating to the supplied assets are transferred subject to an existing retention of ownership device.

COMMENTS

For the reasons why a declaration of transfer might be of interest for the secured creditor, see Comment B (b) on the preceding Article. In general, the transferee and its unsecured creditors are bound even on the basis of the original entry filed against the original security provider (transferor); an entry filed against the transferee can provide additional protection for the original secured creditor against the transferee's secured creditors and other persons acquiring security rights or other proprietary rights free of a prior interest of the original secured creditor on the basis of the principles of good faith acquisition.

Often the secured creditor will not be informed of a transfer of ownership of the encumbered asset by the original security provider. In such cases the original secured creditor will not be able to file a declaration of transfer preventing a good faith acquisition in the above-mentioned sense on the basis of dispositions by the transferee; on the other hand, it would be inconsistent with the principles of good faith acquisition, which are applicable also in the area of proprietary security, to let the transferee's secured creditors (or other acquirers of proprietary rights in the assets concerned) bear the risk of liability towards the original secured creditor. Therefore these rules have opted for a duty on the transferee to enter an entry in the register against itself indicating the transfer.

While at first sight it might appear counter-intuitive to put the transferee under such a duty, this solution (which has been inspired by the Austrian draft proposal on a register of non-possessory security rights) is in fact very much in line with positions to be derived from general principles of property law and extra-contractual liability for an infringement of another's proprietary rights.

Firstly, the transferee can be bound only in situations where the transfer itself does not result in the loss of the proprietary security of the transferor's secured creditor. This is expressed in paragraph (1) in the requirement that the encumbered asset must be transferred subject to the existing security right in order for this provision to apply. In effect, the obligation to file a declaration will thus apply only in cases where the transferor does not have authority to dispose of the assets free of the encumbrance and the transferee is not in good faith. Hence the obligation under paragraph (1) cannot be said to be entirely unforeseeable for the transferee.

Secondly, the most important effect of the transferee's duty to file a declaration indicating the transfer is that the transferee is liable for damages under paragraph (2). Such damages can arise from the non-registration of the transfer only in cases where third persons acquire proprietary (security) rights in the transferred encumbered assets from the transferee in circumstances which lead to a loss of the priority position or of the entire rights of the original secured creditor, i.e. the third persons must be able to rely on the principles of good faith acquisition as has been described in the Comments on IX.–3:330. This will only be the case if the transferee has not informed the third persons of its knowledge (or reason to assume) that the asset concerned is already encumbered with security rights or subject to a retention of ownership device in favour of the original secured creditor. In such a situation, a liability of the transferee cannot be regarded as anomalous. It appears to be plain law that person A who knows or has reason to know that certain assets are subject to proprietary rights of another (B) is liable towards the latter if the former person (A) deals with these assets in a way that leads to the loss of the priority position of B's proprietary rights or to a complete loss of these rights, in this case by creating proprietary security rights or transferring other proprietary rights in the assets concerned without informing the acquirers of the existence or possible existence of the prior rights.

It might still be argued that the mere personal liability of the transferee is not sufficient for the protection of the original security provider who loses its proprietary security right. However, apart from the fact that it is also necessary to protect the persons acquiring proprietary rights from the transferee, it has to be considered that the transferee is not necessarily in as bad a financial position as the original security provider/debtor. Moreover, a secured creditor who leaves assets in possession of the original security provider can be regarded as accepting an increased risk of a loss of its proprietary position.

Paragraphs (1) and (3) expressly allow the declaration indicating the transfer to be filed by the secured creditor as well. This should provide additional protection for the latter in situations where the transferee does not perform its duty under paragraph (1).

Even if the declaration indicating the transfer is filed by the secured creditor, there is no requirement of consent by the transferee as new security provider. Such a declaration indicating the transfer is less dangerous for the security provider than an original entry might be since the latter can always point out to prospective secured creditors that certain assets were not acquired from the transferor and thus cannot be subject to the security right claimed by the secured creditor in a declaration wrongfully indicating a transfer of an encumbered asset.

The principles set out in paragraphs (1) to (3) for the transfer of ownership of encumbered assets are applicable according to paragraph (4) also to cases where the rights of a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in or relating to the supplied assets are transferred subject to an existing retention of ownership device. As has been explained in the Comment D on IX.–

3:331, in such cases also an additional entry in the register, even though not necessary for the transfer itself and the continuation of the validity and effectiveness of the retention of ownership device, can provide additional protection for the holder of the retention of ownership device against a good faith acquisition by a third person.

Subsection 8: Costs

IX.–3:332: Distribution of costs

(1) As between the parties:

(a) each party has to bear the costs of its enrolment or admission to a secure online identity verification system ; and

(b) the security provider has to bear any other costs reasonably incurred by the secured creditor in connection with the registration.

(2) The costs of inquiries and of answers to such inquires are to be borne by the inquirer.

COMMENTS

In general, the operation of the register will require the payment of fees by its users. These fees will be directly payable by the user to the register office whenever a declaration is made or any other action undertaken; there is no need to spell out these details here. This Article, however, covers the question whether a party might be entitled to reimbursement for these fees from any other person involved.

Subsection 9: Security rights created before establishment of register

IX.–3:333: Security rights created before establishment of register

(1) Security rights that were effective before the establishment of the European register of security rights do not require registration under this Section in order to remain effective thereafter.

(2) If the security rights were registered or noted in any system of registration or notation on title certificates under the national law of a member state, an entry reiterating the content of that registration or notation, including the date of registration or notation, is to be entered in the European register of proprietary security against the security provider by the body operating the other register once this register is established.

COMMENTS

This Article contains a transitional provision. While IX.–3:312 covers systems of registration or notation for security rights in specific assets which remain in operation even after establishment of the European register of security rights, the present Article deals with security rights or retention of ownership devices (the reference to security rights covering retention of ownership devices as well, see IX.–3:303) which have been created and made effective earlier.

According to this provision, security rights and retention of ownership devices which were effective earlier remain effective even after establishment of the European register of proprietary security without any need for an entry being made in this register. For proprietary security that had been registered in a national register, this position is in line with the prevailing approach in modern legal thinking, see the English Law Commission's proposals and the Austrian draft proposal on a register of non-possessory security rights.

For security rights and retention of ownership devices which were not registered before establishment of the new register it is often thought that there should be a requirement to register, at least after expiry of a certain transitional period. These rules, however, have opted against such a solution in order to protect the secured creditor. Since the secured creditor cannot make an entry in the register under this Section without the security provider's consent, its secured position vis-à-vis third persons would be at the latter's mercy.

The requirement of consent is dispensable if the entry is not entered by the secured creditor but by the body operating the system in which the security right had been registered or noted before establishment of the European register of proprietary security. Paragraph (2) requires these bodies to enter entries into the new European register reiterating the content of any registration or notation in the former national systems. The secured creditor may of course, if it obtains the security provider's consent, still make its own entry in the register against the security provider.

It has to be emphasised that – differing from the position under IX.–3:312 – the entry according to paragraph (2) is not a requirement for the continuation of the effectiveness of the security right. This follows already from paragraph (1) and from the fact that there is no equivalent to IX.–3:312 paragraph (1) sentence 2 in this provision.

CHAPTER 4: PRIORITY

IX.–4:101: Priority: general rules

(1) Subject to exceptions, the priority between several security rights and between a security right and other limited proprietary rights in the same asset is determined according to the order of the relevant time.

(2) The relevant time is:

(a) for security rights, the time of registration according to Chapter 3, Section 3, if any, or the time at which the security right has otherwise become effective according to the other rules of Chapter 3, whichever is earlier;

(b) for other limited proprietary rights, the time of creation.

(3) An effective security right has priority over an ineffective security right, even if the latter was created earlier.

(4) The ranking of two or more security rights which are ineffective is determined by the time of their creation.

(5) Subject to IX.–4:108 (Change of ranking), a security right that had been acquired by a good faith acquisition in an asset subject to a retention of ownership device or in disregard of an earlier encumbrance in the same asset always has priority over the retention of ownership device or earlier security right.

COMMENTS

A. Priority in general

The rules on priority deal with the question whether one person's rights in a specific asset have precedence over another person's competing rights in the same asset.

Often the starting point for the solution of problems of such conflicting proprietary rights is that one person's proprietary right, by virtue of its exclusive nature or the circumstances of its acquisition, excludes rights held by others. The acquisition of ownership by B is normally inconsistent with the continuation of ownership by A in the same asset; if a proprietary right in an asset is acquired in good faith concerning the non-existence of prior encumbrances held by other persons, the transferee acquires the rights free of these earlier rights (see, e.g., IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset), IX.–6:102). Security rights as defined under IX.–1:102 paragraph (1) of these rules, however, are limited proprietary rights only which are not exclusive. The creation of additional security rights in an already encumbered asset is possible and does not infringe the proprietary right of the holder of an earlier encumbrance; a security provider does not lose its authority to dispose of the asset concerned and may still create another valid and effective encumbrance (cf. Comment C on IX.–2:105).

Since conflicting security rights in the same asset are possible and valid, the issue arises as to their mutual relationship. This issue, which is relevant for the possibility to actually satisfy the secured right from the security right concerned, is solved by the rules on priority. A junior secured creditor will only participate in the proceeds from an enforcement proceeding brought by a senior secured creditor if these proceeds surpass the amount of the right to performance secured by the senior secured creditor's security right (IX.–7:215 paragraph (3). Even though in theory there can be an unlimited number of competing valid proprietary security rights in any asset, it will therefore normally only be the security right with the highest ranking in priority which is of real value to a secured creditor.

B. Rules on conflicting proprietary interests outside this Chapter

The provisions on good faith acquisition, especially IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) and IX.–6:102, have already been referred to as examples of rules governing the relationship between conflicting proprietary rights which operate outside the scope of this Chapter (which, however, refers to some of these rules in IX.–4:101 paragraph (5)). The most important rule of this type, however, is the principle of nemo dat quod non habet (see IX.–2:105 sub-paragraph (c)). Security providers cannot grant a security right if they are not entitled to dispose of the right to be encumbered. A prior transfer of ownership takes precedence over a subsequent attempt of the transferor to create a security right in favour of another person as secured creditor.

This principle also determines the relationship between outright transfers of a right to performance (e.g., where B sells the right to payment against A to C, see Book III, Chapter 5) and security assignments (e.g., where B transfers the right to payment against A to C as security for a credit granted by C). If B's right to performance against A is assigned by B to C only after there has been between B and D a security transfer of the right to performance which is effective against third persons, then assignee C can only acquire the right subject to D's security right. At the moment of the transfer from B to C, B's right to performance against A is already encumbered, therefore B cannot pass a better right to C. The result is different if the outright assignment precedes the purported security transfer of the same right to performance. Once the assignment is effective, the former holder of the right to performance in question no longer has any authority to create an encumbrance in that right in favour of its creditors. The latter therefore obtain nothing at all from the purported security transfer of the right to performance.

C. Priority and limited proprietary rights other than security rights

Chapter 4 also governs the priority between proprietary security rights and other limited proprietary rights, e.g. the usufruct, which is of importance in case of an enforcement of the security right. If the collateral is sold to a third person in the course of such enforcement proceedings, other lower-ranking limited proprietary rights are also lost (IX.–7:213 paragraph (1)(d).

D. Retention of ownership devices

On the basis of IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c), the priority rules in this Chapter on security rights cover retention of ownership as well. The general idea of subjecting retention of ownership devices in many, although not in all, respects to the same provisions as security rights, which has important consequences especially in the context of the rules on priority, has already been explained in Comment A on IX.–1:104.

E. Order of priority under this Article

The order of priority between competing proprietary rights in the same asset is under the present Article primarily governed by a single principle, i.e. the principle that the priority follows the order of the relevant time (paragraph (1)). This basic rule, however, is subject to a number of exceptions and specifications as to what amounts to the relevant time (paragraphs (2) to (5), IX.–4:102.

F. Order of relevant time as general rule

That the priority between conflicting proprietary security rights in the same asset is to be determined by reference to an order of time of these security rights is a general position that is universally accepted throughout the legal systems of the member states. In effect, this position also has some similarities to the results of the application of the principle of nemo dat quod non habet. Once the transferor has transferred ownership of one asset to one transferee, no other person can acquire ownership from the transferor, unless some exceptional rule applies. One important difference between the operation of this traditional principle and the priority rules of this Chapter is that the time that is relevant for the determination of the order of priority in the present context is only in exceptional cases the time of the transfer or the creation of the proprietary rights concerned.

G. Relevant time for registered security rights

For registered security rights, the relevant time is in general (exceptions apply where the security right has already earlier been made effective by some other method, see the following Comment) the point of time at which the security right is registered (paragraph (2)(a)). That the security right has already been created at this time is neither a prerequisite for registration nor relevant for the determination of the order of priority. Of course, the order of priority will only ever become relevant for any security right if it is validly created. The secured creditor does not obtain any proprietary right by virtue of the fulfilment of the conditions for effectiveness under Chapter 3 only; a participation as secured creditor in the distribution of proceeds from the enforcement of a proprietary security right in the security provider's assets depends upon the existence of such a proprietary security right in favour of the creditor.

The advantages of such a determination of priority by reference to the order of registration only are obvious. As opposed to the time of creation, which might not be apparent for third persons or which might even be disputed between the secured creditor and the security provider, the time of registration is easily ascertainable from the register. The European register of proprietary security is intended to provide publicity for proprietary security in movables; this objective is achieved most efficiently if third persons can rely on the content of the register for the determination of the order of priority, i.e. if they do not have to consider the possibility that for these registered security rights other factors (such as the date of creation) might have to be taken into consideration as well.

That the security right need not have been created at the time of registration for the latter to be decisive for the determination of the order of priority is of central importance for the practice of advance filing. The secured creditor can arrange with the security provider to register future security rights; the secured creditor is then protected against the risk of not obtaining a first-ranking priority position concerning its security rights if these are created at a later stage. Effectively, secured creditor A who had registered first enjoys priority over secured creditor B who has registered its security rights later even if B's security rights were created before the security rights of secured creditor A.

In cases of revolving proprietary security, especially where the security provider's inventory is encumbered in favour of the secured creditor (and where new items of inventory are always subject to security rights, replacing the original security rights that were terminated when the earlier items of inventory had been sold on to the security provider's customers), the priority of the secured creditor's security rights in the inventory can be determined on the basis of a single registration. If the secured creditor files an entry in the register of security rights which is drafted broadly enough to cover future security rights in the items of inventory as well, the priority of security rights in future items of inventory, which are actually acquired and encumbered at a later point of time, will be determined by reference to the original date of registration.

A negative consequence of determining priority by reference to the time of registration may follow from delayed registration. If a secured creditor fails to register its security rights immediately after creation, another secured creditor might obtain a higher-ranking priority position by registering a security right in the same assets before the first secured creditor eventually registers the rights. Even though its security right was validly created and could have been enforced against the security provider from the outset, this secured creditor must then give preference to the competing creditor.

H. Relevant time for security rights made effective by other means

Where security rights have been made effective by means other than by virtue of a registration, e.g. by the exercise of control or possession by the secured creditor, the relevant time for the determination of the order of priority is the time at which the security right became effective (paragraph (2)(a)). In essence, the principle dealt with in the preceding paragraphs, i.e. that for security rights made effective by registration the time of registration is decisive, appears as no more than a specific application of the general rule in the preceding sentence. Its prominent treatment in paragraph (2)(a), however, is justified on the basis of the assumption that it will be especially in relation to registered security rights that the existence of several security rights in the same assets might create problems of priority.

Whenever there is both possession by the secured creditor and a registration of the security right or any other situation in which the effectiveness of a security right can be based upon several grounds, the decisive moment of time is the earliest moment at which one of the relevant requirements for achieving effectiveness has been fulfilled (see IX.–3:103).

If a security right is made effective by possession, the time at which the secured creditor acquires possession is decisive. Where a security right made effective by possession is transferred, the new secured creditor must acquire possession or the transferor must agree to hold possession for the transferee (IX.–5:301 paragraph (3)(c)); if either of these requirements is fulfilled, the priority of the security right remains unaffected, i.e. the time at which the transferor has acquired possession remains decisive for the determination of the order of priority (see IX.–5:301 paragraph (4)). For a security right based upon a right of retention of possession according to IX.–2:114, a specific rule on priority is laid down in IX.–4:102 paragraph (3).

Where security rights in intangibles are made effective by the exercise of control by the secured creditor, the time at which the secured creditor obtains control over the encumbered assets is decisive for the determination of priority. For a transfer of the encumbrance to another secured creditor, the same rules apply as explained in the preceding paragraph for cases of possessory security rights, see IX.–5:301 paragraphs (3)(c) and (4). It is important to note, however, that security rights made effective by the exercise of control enjoy a superpriority in relation to other security rights on the basis of IX.–4:102 paragraph (2) sentence 1. The rules in IX.–4:101 therefore apply in relation to security rights made effective by control only for the relationship between several security rights that are all made effective by the exercise of control by the several secured creditors (see IX.–4:102 paragraph (2) sentence 2).

For security rights that are effective without any additional requirements having to be fulfilled (see for example the security rights covered by IX.–3:101 paragraph (2)) the relevant time is the time of their creation. These security rights are effective from the moment they come into existence. Therefore their priority has to be determined according to IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)(a) by reference to that time.

I. Relevant time for other limited proprietary rights

Paragraph (2)(b) provides for limited proprietary rights other than security rights that the time of creation is the relevant time which determines the order of priority. The distinction underlying this Book between the creation (Chapter 2) and the effectiveness against third persons (Chapter 3) is applicable only to proprietary security rights. Other limited proprietary rights generally become effective at the moment of their creation; this point of time is therefore relevant for the determination of their priority as well.

J. Priority between non-effective security rights

As between several security rights, all of which are not effective, according to paragraph (4) their priority is determined by the order of creation of these security rights, i.e. the moment all the requirements of Chapter 2 for the creation of a security right are fulfilled (see IX.–2:106, IX.–2:113 paragraph (2)). That a security right has not been made effective according to Chapter 3 does not necessarily deprive it of all effects against competing secured creditors. If also these other competing secured creditors failed to achieve effectiveness for their security rights or retention of ownership devices, all these security devices are effective as between the different secured creditors, in so far as they rely on their position as holders of proprietary security only. This might especially be the case where the security provider is not also the debtor of the obligation covered by the security, so that a competing secured creditor can take action against the security provider only on the basis of its security rights, which had not been made effective according to the rules of Chapter 3; an ineffective security right cannot, however, be raised against individual execution proceedings brought by a creditor, whether secured or not, on the basis of a right to performance against the security provider (see IX.–3:101 paragraph (1)(b)).

K. Priority for security right acquired by good faith acquisition

Paragraph (5) spells out a specific priority rule overriding the other principles of priority in this provision. Where a security right has been acquired on the basis of a good faith acquisition in disregard of a proprietary security in the same asset which had been created earlier, this security right enjoys priority over the earlier proprietary security, regardless of the order of registration or the other general rules of this Chapter. This rule is obviously the core of the principle of good faith acquisition in the area of proprietary security. If the secured creditor in good faith is to be protected on the basis of its good faith, this secured creditor must be treated as if the earlier proprietary security did not exist, i.e. the rights of the secured creditor who is protected on the basis of the provisions on good faith acquisition must have priority over the earlier proprietary security. However, the priority status of this earlier proprietary security towards other secured creditors or its effectiveness against the security provider or against other third persons are not affected. On the other hand, as a second-ranking security, the chances of participating in the distribution of the proceeds from a realisation of the encumbered assets are reduced. Paragraph (5) also does not affect the priority status of the (new) security right, i.e. the security right acquired on the basis of a good faith acquisition in relation to other security rights, if any, that are not affected by the good faith acquisition.

Paragraph (5) applies to all cases of a good faith acquisition of a security right on the basis of the provisions of this Book. This reference covers the acquisition of a security right in an asset that is subject to a retention of ownership device (IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right)), the acquisition of a security right in disregard of an earlier security right in the same asset on the basis of IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) or IX.–2:111 (Security right in cash, negotiable instruments and documents) as well as a good faith acquisition of a security right on the basis of IX.–3:322 paragraph (1) and IX.–3:323. Paragraph (5) does not apply, however, to the acquisition of ownership (see IX.–6:102). The good faith acquisition of ownership of the collateral involves the termination of earlier encumbrances or retention of ownership devices in the same assets (see IX.–6:101 paragraph (1)(e)).

The priority rule in paragraph (5) overrides all the other priority rules in this Chapter ("always has priority"); the only exception, which is expressly mentioned in paragraph (5), is IX.–4:108. A subordination agreement remains possible.

L. Exceptions for specific types of security rights

For some types of security rights, these general rules are subject to the exceptions laid down in IX.-4:102. For these specific rules on the superpriority for acquisition finance devices, security rights in financial assets made effective by the exercise of control or possession and for the right of retention of possession see the Comments on that provision.

M. Priority between effective and ineffective security rights

As between effective and ineffective security rights, the order of priority is determined by paragraph (3). Effective security rights have priority over ineffective security rights regardless of the order of creation.

The same rule applies as between an effective security right and a competing retention of ownership device which does not fulfil the requirements for effectiveness against third persons under Chapter 3 (IX.–3:107). Since the seller or lessor cannot rely on the retention of ownership device vis-à-vis third persons, the holder of an effective security right in the same asset prevails.

The relationship between limited proprietary rights other than security rights and ineffective security rights follows identical principles. Even though this case is not expressly mentioned in this Article – since, because of the scarcity of other limited proprietary rights in movables, it will rarely occur – it is clear from paragraph (2)(a) that an ineffective security right can never enjoy priority over another limited proprietary right since the requirements for the security right to become effective have never been fulfilled.

Finally, the general principle that ineffective security rights always have to respect the priority of effective security rights is not subject to the exceptional rules laid down in IX.–4:102. These specific provisions confer a superpriority on some types of security rights only, in respect of which the conditions for effectiveness are fulfilled. No security right that is not effective can therefore enjoy superpriority under IX.–4:102.

IX.–4:102: Superpriority

(1) An acquisition finance device that is effective against third persons according to the rules of Chapter 3 takes priority over any security right or other limited proprietary right created by the security provider.

(2) A security right in financial assets made effective by control according to IX.–3:204 (Control over financial assets) or by possession takes priority over any other security right or other limited proprietary right in the same asset. If control is created for different secured creditors, IX.–4:101 (Priority: general rules) paragraphs (1) and (2)(a) apply.

(3) A security right based upon a right of retention of possession according to IX.–2:114 (Right of retention of possession) takes priority over any other right in the retained asset.

(4) The preceding paragraphs are subject to IX.–4:101 (Priority: general rules) paragraph (5) and IX.–4:108 (Change of ranking).

COMMENTS

A. Superpriority in general

This Article contains exceptions to the general rules on priority laid down in the preceding Article. Some types of security rights enjoy superpriority on the basis of their nature as either acquisition finance devices, security rights in financial assets made effective by control or possession or right of retention of possession. Superpriority means that these security rights enjoy priority over any other security rights, irrespective of the order of the relevant time. Even if competing security rights had become effective earlier, security rights with superpriority take precedence. The only exceptions to these rules are covered by paragraph (4) (see Comment F).

B. Security rights as acquisition finance devices

Paragraph (1) covers security devices which are classified under these rules as acquisition finance devices. This term includes retention of ownership devices and security rights (i.e. limited proprietary rights) which fulfil the requirements of IX.–1:201 paragraph (3)(b). Both types of acquisition finance devices enjoy a special preferential position vis-à-vis competing and conflicting proprietary rights. Retention of ownership devices, however, may in effect confer on their holder such a preferential position on the basis of the application of rules other than the principles of priority covered by this Chapter. Therefore, these Comments deal with security rights as acquisition finance devices first, retention of ownership devices will be covered in Comment C.

The priority conferred by paragraph (1) on acquisition finance devices operates both against proprietary security rights and against other limited proprietary rights in the same assets. It is restricted, however, to proprietary rights created by the security provider, i.e. the person who has bought the encumbered asset if the credit for its acquisition is secured by the security right as an acquisition finance device. Should the assets concerned have been encumbered already before the sale, e.g. by the seller who has created a security right in these assets, these security rights continue to enjoy priority over the subsequently created acquisition finance device in favour of the seller or a third person financier.

The main effects of the rule in paragraph (1) can be illustrated by the following example. A, owner of a haulage firm, creates a security right in all his present and future lorries in favour of bank B, which is giving credit to A on a regular basis, on January 1. C, also an owner of a lorry, creates a non-possessory security right in it in favour of D on March 1. Afterwards, C sells his lorry to A on May 1, but retains a security right which qualifies as an acquisition finance device. All the security rights in this situation have been made effective immediately after the conclusion of the relevant agreement by registration. The lorry is caught by the terms of the agreement to create a security right in future assets between A and B. Therefore, it is encumbered with a security right in favour of B. However, even though B's security right in the lorry has been made effective prior to C's retained security right, the latter security right enjoys priority as an acquisition finance device over B's right by virtue of paragraph (1). This does not affect the position of D. Since D's security right has not been created by A (who is to be regarded as the security provider in relation to the acquisition finance device in this case), paragraph (1) does not apply and D's rights enjoy priority over C's security rights since they have been registered earlier.

This rule is based upon the following policy. Security for the financing of acquisitions (here, credit is typically given by sellers) deserves higher protection than security for general non-acquisition financing because acquisitions are particularly useful for the economy. Moreover, there is a specific reason for the protection of credit extended by sellers. Banks as financiers that are typically in a long-standing relationship with the debtor are better placed to secure encumbrances over the debtor's future property for themselves, just as bank B did in the example in the preceding paragraph. Sellers, on the other hand, normally do not have such a possibility. If their security rights in assets sold to the buyer enjoyed only normal priority, they would presumably be only second-ranking creditors with a low likelihood of obtaining satisfaction from the enforcement of their security rights. In addition to the obvious unfairness of such a solution which would invariably favour banks, there are also some specific reasons for giving priority to the sellers' security rights instead. By selling and transferring the assets concerned to the buyer, the seller has made a direct contribution to the pool of assets that are eventually available for the buyer's creditors, one of whom is also the seller as the creditor of the purchase price. Since without this contribution of the seller no other creditor of the buyer, whether secured or not, would be able to obtain satisfaction from the sold assets, it seems just and fair that the seller should enjoy priority over all other secured creditors in respect of any security rights in these assets.

It has to be noted, however, that security rights can enjoy the special priority as an acquisition finance device under this provision only under two conditions. First, they must be effective against third persons. If the conditions of Chapter 3 are not fulfilled, the priority of a purchase money security right is determined not by IX.–4:102 paragraph (1), but by IX.–4:101 paragraphs (3) and (4).

Second, if the security right as an acquisition finance device has to be registered according to IX.–3:107 paragraph (1), it can enjoy superpriority under IX.–4:102 paragraph (1) only if the registration is effected within the period of 35 days laid down in that provision. If this condition is not met, the security right is treated according to the general rules of IX.–4:101, especially paragraph (2)(a).

C. Retention of ownership devices

The preferential position conferred on a holder of a retention of ownership device is identical with the priority position of a secured creditor who holds a security right which qualifies as an acquisition finance device. While the underlying legal construction may be different and may involve the application of other legal concepts, the rules on priority in this Chapter and especially IX.–4:102 paragraph (1) therefore can be regarded as a restatement of the legal position for a retention of ownership device as well. The main constellations will be briefly described.

(a) Effective retention of ownership device prevails over competing proprietary rights. Provided that IX.–4:102 paragraph (1) applies – i.e. if the retention of ownership device is effective against third persons and if the registration, if necessary, has not been effected outside the 35 days period of IX.–3:107 paragraph (1) – the retention of ownership device prevails over all competing security rights or other limited proprietary rights in the same asset created by the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee (who is regarded as the security provider in the context of IX.–4:102, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (2)). For the policy behind this position and also for the restriction of the operation of this rule to competing proprietary rights created by the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee or other security provider, see Comment B above.

The superpriority laid down in IX.–4:102 paragraph (1) achieves the same protection that is awarded to the seller, supplier or lessor on the basis of the traditional conception of retention of ownership devices. Since the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee does not acquire ownership in the supplied assets, a third person normally cannot acquire a better title from the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in these assets, unless the latter had been authorised to dispose of them or the rules on good faith acquisition apply. Regardless of whether the purported transfer of a proprietary right to the third person took place before or after the acquisition of the asset subject to a retention of ownership device, the seller's, supplier's or lessor's rights prevail over rights in the same asset claimed by a third person who claims to have acquired these rights from the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee.

Of course, the outcome is different if the latter was authorised to dispose of the supplied assets or to create security rights in these assets or if the third person can rely on the provisions on good faith acquisition. If the concurrent security rights had been created and made effective by the seller, supplier or lessor before the retention of ownership transaction, these security rights constitute encumbrances of the seller's, supplier's or lessor's (retained) ownership. Even under the traditional construction the seller, supplier or lessor and everyone else (including the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee) who derives title from the latter would have to respect these security rights.

(b) Retention of ownership device that is not effective. If a retention of ownership device is not effective, IX.–4:102 paragraph (1) does not apply. Instead, as in the case of ineffective security rights, the priority position of the retention of ownership device is determined by IX.–4:101 paragraphs (3) and (4). Any secured creditor with an effective security right or even an ineffective security right that had been created earlier prevails over the holder of the retention of ownership device.

These results deviate from the traditional construction of retention of ownership devices. This is a consequence of the general decision in favour of a requirement of registration even for retention of ownership devices under IX.–3:107 of these rules. Without registration, the retention of ownership device does not fulfil the requirements for effectiveness vis-à-vis third persons; therefore the holder of an unregistered retention of ownership device must give precedence to the holders of security rights which are effective against third persons.

(c) Retention of ownership device registered after 35 days period of IX.–3:107. A retention of ownership that has been registered only after the expiry of the period of 35 days under IX.–3:107 is effective, but does not enjoy the superpriority under IX.–4:102 paragraph (1) (see IX.–3:107 paragraph (2)).

Such a retention of ownership device still enjoys priority over security rights that have become effective later; this resembles the traditional understanding of retention of ownership devices and their effects vis-à-vis third persons where an equivalent result follows from the principle of nemo dat quod non habet.

If, however, the competing security right has become effective earlier than the retention of ownership device, the holder of the latter cannot claim priority over the rights of the other secured creditor. Claiming priority over earlier security rights is the core content of superpriority under IX.–4:102; IX.–3:107 paragraph (2) expressly provides that this superpriority is not applicable for retention of ownership devices that have been registered after the expiry of the 35 days period. Instead, whether or not the holder of the retention of ownership device can claim preference over third persons and their proprietary rights in the asset concerned must then be determined on the basis of the general principles in IX.–4:101, especially paragraphs (1) and (2). The retention of ownership device is regarded as effective against third persons; as for security rights, this effectiveness, however, is limited in so far as the retention of ownership device cannot prevail over other security rights in the same asset which enjoy a higher-ranking priority position.

D. Security rights in financial assets made effective by control or possession

Paragraph (2) confers superpriority on all security rights in financial assets that are made effective by control according to IX.-3:204 or by possession (see esp. IX.-3:202 and IX.-3:203). This superpriority applies in relation to any other security right in the same assets, regardless of who created it and when it became effective (again, subject to exceptions under paragraph (4)). Moreover, the superpriority according to paragraph (2) also gives the security rights covered by this provision precedence over acquisition finance devices; paragraph (2) is an exception to the more general rule in paragraph (1): lex specialis derogat legi generali. Only if there are several security rights made effective by control is the priority of such security rights to be determined according to IX.-4:101 by reference to the order of the relevant time, i.e. the time at which the security rights became effective (see the reference in IX.-4:102 paragraph (2) sentence 2).

The main purpose of the rule explained in the preceding paragraph is that a security right in financial assets that has been made effective by the exercise of control or possession enjoys priority over a security right in the same asset that is only registered in the European register of proprietary security (it should be noted that a registration in registers which are operated by or for the issuer of financial instruments or which under national law are determinative of title and which cover also security rights in these assets is regarded as the exercise of control within the meaning of IX.-3:204, not as registration under the rules of Chapter 3, Section 3, see IX.-3:301 paragraph (3)). Control or possession of financial assets even trumps an earlier registration of a competing security right.

This preferred treatment of security rights in financial assets that have been made effective by the exercise of control or possession by the secured creditor is in line with common practice in modern proprietary security regimes. The same principle can be found in the US-American UCC Art. 9 (revised version 1999, Sec. 9-328) and in the English Law Commission's proposals for a revision of English company securities law (report no. 296 of 2005, draft reg. 39 paragraph (2)). Most importantly, this approach also reflects the position under the Financial Collateral Directive. Article 3 paragraph (1) read with Article 2 paragraph (2) of this Community legislation provides that taking control or possession of certain financial assets should suffice in order to acquire a security right in these assets (see also recital 9). In theory, it could be argued that these rules would already be in compliance with the FCD if the exercise of control or possession of financial assets could create a security right, even though this encumbrance could still have to give preference to any earlier security rights in the same assets that had been made effective by registration. However, such a line of reasoning would clearly contravene the spirit, though not the wording, of the FCD. A security right in financial assets would most likely be worthless for the secured creditor if it was only a second-ranking security. In order to give effect to the FCD, it must therefore be ensured that a secured creditor who acquires a security right in financial assets enjoys a first-ranking priority position.

The reference to the FCD in the preceding paragraph sheds light on the policy of this rule. Taking security over financial collateral is to be encouraged; secured creditors should not be obliged to consult the register in order to find out whether the assets concerned might already be encumbered in favour of another creditor. Even though this might correspondingly in effect limit the protection to be obtained by virtue of the registration of a security right, this disadvantage for registered creditors does not appear to give rise to grave concerns. The financial assets covered by IX.-3:204 are all easily disposed of; therefore every secured creditor would be ill-advised to rely on the registration of a security right in these assets alone since the creditor would run a considerable risk of an unauthorised disposition of these assets by the security provider if the secured creditor does not also exercise control or, where applicable, possession of these assets.

A similar preferential treatment specifically for possessory security rights in cash, negotiable instruments and documents to bearer (not, however, for security rights made effective by control) also follows from IX.-2:111 (Security right in cash, negotiable instruments and documents) read with IX.-4:101 paragraph (5). By virtue of these provisions, a secured creditor in possession of these assets always enjoys priority over earlier security rights in the same assets.

E. Right of retention of possession according to IX.–2:114

The superpriority according to paragraph (3) does not apply generally to all security rights made effective by possession within the meaning of IX.–3:201, but is limited to the rights of retention of possession covered by IX.–2:114.

The policy behind this rule can be explained as follows. A right of retention of possession which is regarded as giving rise to a proprietary security right is typically available in situations in which the secured creditor's efforts (for which the creditor is to be reimbursed by the other party) were spent for the repair or improvement or similar of the encumbered assets in the creditor's possession (see, e.g., the liens of repairers, warehousekeepers or transporters). Recognising a superpriority for this security right corresponds to some extent to the grounds justifying a superpriority for acquisition finance devices (see Comment B).

F. Exceptions – paragraph (4)

Paragraph (4) lays down exceptions that apply to all three types of superpriority covered by paragraphs (1) to (3). A security right or retention of ownership device does not enjoy superpriority conferred by paragraphs (1) to (3) if and in so far as IX.–4:101 paragraph (5) and IX.–4:108 apply. Where there is a subordination agreement, this agreement affects also superpriority under the present Article; if a security right is acquired on the basis of good faith acquisition in an asset subject to a security right or retention of ownership device enjoying superpriority, the latter security right or retention of ownership device does not enjoy priority over the rights of the secured creditor who can rely on the protection of the provisions on good faith acquisition.

G. Superpriority outside this Book

The present Article is not the only rule within these Principles providing for a superpriority of security rights. VIII.–5:204 paragraph (3) contains a similar rule for security rights arising in favour of the former owner of material in the context of production or combination. These security rights in the new products or combined assets enjoy priority over any other security right created by the producer or owner of the principal part, i.e. the owner of the new products or combined assets. VIII.–5:204 paragraph (3) is applicable to two cases. First, where there has been no agreement between the owner of the material and the producer or owner of the principal part concerning the production or combination (in such cases, the security rights created according to the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII can be regarded as ex lege security rights). Secondly, where there has been such an agreement, if this agreement provides for security rights equivalent to those arising under the rules of Chapter 5 of Book VIII (see VIII.–5:101 paragraph (4)). In both cases, the superpriority of these security rights of the former owner of the material can be regarded as being functionally equivalent to the superpriority for acquisition finance devices.

IX.–4:103: Continuation of priority

(1) Priority is not affected if the encumbered asset:

(a) becomes an accessory to a movable asset; or

(b) is used for the production of new goods, or is commingled or combined with other assets, provided that the security right extends to the security provider's rights in the asset resulting from the production, commingling or combination.

(2) Paragraph (1)(a) also applies if a movable asset becomes an accessory to an immovable, unless the law governing the immovable determines otherwise.

COMMENTS

A. Continuation of priority and individual determination of priority distinguished

The two preceding Articles are based upon the concept that the priority of each security right or retention of ownership device is to be determined individually, i.e. that priority depends upon the actual compliance with the relevant requirements in respect of the specific proprietary security in the assets concerned. This Article and the following one take a different approach. The priority of security devices covered by these special provisions is determined either by reference to the priority of security devices in some other asset (such as the principal asset from which fruits and proceeds are derived, or the assets that are commingled, combined or used for the production of new goods) or to the priority of the security devices in the same assets, but before an alteration of their status, such as the encumbered assets becoming an accessory to some other asset . This might be of specific importance especially if the other security device whose priority is decisive for the determination also of the priority of the security right in question enjoys superpriority. This special priority too might be continued. (For fruits and proceeds of the assets in which a security right or retention of ownership device with superpriority existed, however, this rule is subject to the restrictions laid down in IX.–4:105).

It follows already from the general ideas underlying IX.–4:101 and IX.–4:102 on the one hand and IX.–4:103 to IX.–4:105 on the other hand that, even if the latter provisions are not applicable in any given case, the security device in question is not without any protection. Rather, the priority of such a security device will have to be determined by applying the general rules of IX.–4:101 and IX.–4:102 (this is specifically spelt out in the case of IX.–4:104 paragraph (2)). These provisions, however, might result in a lower priority as compared to the results achieved by applying IX.–4:103 to IX.–4:105.

B. Continuation of priority as exception

Especially if they are in the possession of the security provider, the assets subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device might not remain unaltered. Rather, the assets, especially raw material, semi-finished goods or similar items, will often be used or applied in the course of the security provider's (or any other person's in possession of the assets) business. The extension of the original proprietary security to such situations as well as the continuation of effectiveness and priority of the original security devices is not self-evident. On the contrary, the general approach of these rules is that the creation of proprietary security in movable assets depends upon a party agreement specifying the assets concerned; also the effectiveness of a security right or a retention of ownership device is in general dependent upon some requirements under Chapter 3 (i.e. possession, control or registration) being fulfilled in relation to the collateral. In other words, the status of a secured creditor is not awarded on the basis of a general weighing of each secured creditor's relative worthiness of protection or contribution to the available pool of assets, but on the basis of rather restrictive criteria such as the parties' agreements. This excludes the possible argument that even after substantial alterations of the assets subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device, the security devices should in general remain in existence, remain effective and preserve the original priority already on the basis that the original assets could still be traced or followed into their present state. Instead, security devices remain in existence, remain effective and preserve the original priority following such substantial alterations only if and in so far as this is specifically provided for by these rules. For the continuation of the existence and the conditions of effectiveness, cf. the provisions in Chapters 2 and 3; IX.–4:103 deals with the question whether, if the proprietary security in question remains in existence and remains effective, there is also a continuation of priority, i.e. the question whether the priority remains unaffected, even though the collateral becomes an accessory or is used for production, commingling or combination.

C. Encumbered asset becomes an accessory

Paragraph (1)(a) and paragraph (2) deal with the case of an encumbered asset becoming an accessory to another asset. For the term "accessory" see IX.–1:201 paragraph (2); on the basis of the rule in IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c), the reference to an "encumbered asset" in IX.–4:103 covers assets subject to a retention of ownership device as well.

In fact, the asset subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device usually undergoes no change in substance even though it has become an accessory. Additionally, it is already part of the definition of the term "accessory" that it must be possible to sever the connection to the principal asset without damage being done to the substance of either asset. Therefore, in addition to the position that any security devices in the collateral remain in existence (see IX.–2:305 paragraph (2)), the general rule is that the priority of these security devices is also not affected by the fact that the collateral has become an accessory (see paragraph (1)(a) if the principal assets are movable assets and – subject to an exception – paragraph (2) for immovable assets as principal assets).

Some reservations must be made in relation to the effects of the law on immovable property, which these rules are not intended to touch upon. For collateral that becomes an accessory to immovable assets paragraph (2) provides that the security devices in these assets continue to enjoy the original priority only if this not incompatible with the law governing the immovable.

D. Production, commingling and combination

Production, commingling and combination are concepts that are defined in Book VIII on the transfer of ownership in goods (Book VIII, Chapter 5). In these cases, rights in the products, combined goods or masses or mixtures (in the case of commingling) replace the former proprietary rights in the (original) assets that were commingled, combined or used for the production. Security rights and retention of ownership devices that had existed in the original assets do not necessarily remain in existence in the results of the production, commingling or combination. These resulting new goods might be quite different in their nature from the original assets. Accepting that the original security device could extend to the resulting assets without any further requirements would be to the detriment of the other creditors for whom this might not be apparent. Concerning the existence of the security rights and retention of ownership devices after production, commingling or combination, this problem is solved on the basis of IX.–2:307 to IX.–2:309. The present Article follows that general position and does not contain any additional requirements for the continuation of priority; if the security devices remain in existence after production, commingling or combination, also their priority remains unaffected, i.e. the priority is identical to the priority position of the security devices in the assets that were used for the production, commingling or combination.

IX.–4:104: Fruits and proceeds: general rules

(1) Security rights in fruits and proceeds of the following types of assets preserve the priority of the security right in the encumbered original assets:

(a) fruits and proceeds of the same kind as the assets that were originally encumbered;

(b) rights to payment due to defects in, damage to, or loss of the assets that were originally encumbered, including insurance proceeds; and

(c) fruits and proceeds that are covered by the registration of the security right in the assets that were originally encumbered.

(2) In cases not covered by paragraph (1), the priority of security rights in fruits and proceeds is determined according to the general rules laid down in IX.–4:101 (Priority: general rules) and IX.–4:102 (Superpriority).

COMMENTS

A. General

The distinction between an individual determination of priority and the continuation of priority has already been explained in Comment A on the preceding Article. IX.–4:104 (Fruits and proceeds: general rules) and IX.–4:105 (Fruits and proceeds: exceptions) deal with cases of fruits and proceeds that have been derived from the assets that were originally encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device (on the basis of the general rule in IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)). While the security rights in these fruits and proceeds are not identical with the security devices in the assets that were originally encumbered, IX.–4:104 and IX.–4:105 contain the rule that to the limited extent provided for by these provisions the security rights in the fruits and proceeds can continue to enjoy the priority of the original security devices.

Both IX.–4:104 and IX.–4:105 are based upon the assumptions that the secured creditor's proprietary rights extend to the fruits and proceeds and that these encumbrances are as effective against third persons as the original security devices were; these precedential matters are dealt with in Chapters 2 and 3, respectively. The main importance of IX.–4:104 lies in the possibility that the security devices in the assets that were originally encumbered might enjoy a better priority position than that which would be applicable for the security devices in the fruits and proceeds, if their priority had to be determined individually. Even if the secured creditor holds a proprietary entitlement to the fruits and proceeds of the assets that were originally encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device, this security right might have arisen or become effective only later than the original security rights. If this later point of time were to be relevant for the determination of priority, then the security rights in the fruits and proceeds could be in a lesser priority position in relation to competing secured creditors' rights. The continuation of priority might be of even greater importance if the security devices in the assets that were originally encumbered enjoyed superpriority according to IX.–4:102; the continuation of superpriority in fruits and proceeds, however, is subject to the additional rules in IX.–4:105.

It has to be emphasised, however, that even if there is no continuation of priority under IX.–4:104, the security rights concerned can still be regarded as effective and their priority is determined according to the general rules, i.e. especially IX.–4:101 (see IX.–4:104 paragraph (2)).

B. Fruits and proceeds of the same kind as the original assets

The present Article covers three categories of fruits and proceeds. First, according to paragraph (1)(a) security rights in fruits and proceeds of the same kind as the assets that were originally encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device preserve the priority of the security devices in the latter assets. One example would be the lambs born in a flock of sheep encumbered with a non-possessory security right. If fruits and proceeds are of the same kind as the original assets, it would not be reasonable to treat them differently for priority purposes, should the fruits and proceeds be encumbered as well.

It has to be noted, however, that the relevance of this category is rather limited since there are broad overlaps with the situation covered by sub-paragraph (c). If the fruits and proceeds are of the same kind as the assets that were originally encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device, they will typically also be covered by the description in the entry in the register, unless this entry is limited to the individual original collateral only.

C. Rights to payment due to defects in, damage to, or loss of the original assets

The second category of fruits and proceeds mentioned in IX.–4:104 are rights to payment due to defects in, damage to, or loss of the original assets (paragraph (1)(b)). The reason why security rights in this type of proceeds preserve the priority of the security devices in the original collateral is the same as that which justifies the automatic extension of the security devices to this type of proceeds (IX.–2:306 paragraph (1)). These rights to payment are mere replacements of the original assets which have been damaged or lost. For the protection of the secured creditor it is necessary that its proprietary security extends to these proceeds without any change of priority (if the priority of a proprietary security in these proceeds had to be determined individually, priority would be determined from the time at which these rights to payment arose, see IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)(a) read with IX.–3:101 paragraph (2)). Since the amount of these rights to payment is equivalent to the loss in value of the original collateral and since these proceeds do not involve any addition of value, the interests of the other secured creditors are not affected.

D. Fruits and proceeds covered by the original registration

The last category of fruits and proceeds dealt with in the Article are fruits and proceeds that are covered by the original registration, i.e. the entry in the European register of proprietary security covering the security rights or retention of ownership devices in the original collateral.

To a large extent, the express mentioning of this category of fruits and proceeds in paragraph (1)(c) is declaratory only. If the original registration covers fruits and proceeds as well (security rights in the fruits and proceeds will in general be effective only if this condition is fulfilled, see IX.–3:310 paragraph (1)(b) sentence 2), then the priority of the security rights in the fruits and proceeds would be determined by the date of the original registration according to IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)(a), even if this was not specifically provided in IX.–4:104 paragraph (1)(c). However, since an extension of the original registration to fruits and proceeds of the original collateral will be the most important constellations where security rights in the fruits and proceeds share the same priority status as the original security rights or retention of ownership devices, this express provision might at least serve as a useful clarification.

Moreover, even for fruits and proceeds that are covered by the original registration the continuation of the priority of the original security device is of particular importance in cases where the original security device enjoys superpriority according to IX.–4:102. If covered by the original registration, creditor A's security rights in proceeds from the sale of an asset that was subject to an acquisition finance device in favour of A therefore have priority over security rights in these proceeds created by the buyer or lessee B in favour of secured creditor C (see IX.–4:105 paragraph (2)(b) and the Comments on that provision).

IX.–4:105: Fruits and proceeds: exceptions

(1) Security rights in fruits and proceeds of assets that are subject to an acquisition finance device or are covered by VIII.–5:204 (Additional provisions as to proprietary security rights) paragraph (3) do not enjoy the superpriority of the security right in the assets that were originally encumbered.

(2) The preceding paragraph does not affect the superpriority of security rights in:

(a) rights to payment due to defects in, damage to, or loss of the assets that were originally encumbered, including insurance proceeds; and

(b) proceeds of the sale of the assets that were originally encumbered.

COMMENTS

A. General

It has already been indicated (see Comments A on the preceding Article) that the continuation of priority is at least potentially of greatest importance in situations where the original security device, whose priority is preserved, enjoys superpriority under IX.–4:102. If, for example, the secured creditor originally held a retention of ownership device or a security right which qualified as an acquisition finance device, a security right in the proceeds itself will not be regarded as one of these special types of proprietary security. Therefore, this security right can only enjoy superpriority under IX.–4:102 (i.e. have priority even over earlier security rights in the same proceeds created in favour of other secured creditors) if it preserves the superpriority of the original retention of ownership device or other acquisition finance device.

The preceding Article establishes the basic rule on the continuation of priority, which also applies for security rights in fruits and proceeds of the assets that were originally encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device. For fruits and proceeds of assets that were subject to an acquisition finance device or a security right covered by VIII.–5:204 paragraph (3), however, the preceding Article applies only subject to the special rules in the present Article. Paragraph (1) of this Article establishes the general rule that security rights in fruits and proceeds of this type do not enjoy superpriority; this restriction is, however, partly reversed by paragraph (2).

The exceptional rules in the present Article do not cover all types of security rights enjoying superpriority. For fruits and proceeds of financial assets subject to a security right made effective by control or possession or of assets subject to a security right based upon a right of retention of possession, the general rule on the continuation of priority in IX.-4:104 is not affected. This is due to the fact that the fruits and proceeds to which the security right might be extended will be typically only those which would be exempted from the restrictions of paragraph (1) of the present Article on the basis of its paragraph (2). Fruits and proceeds that do not fall under the categories covered by paragraph (2) will be of any relevance only for security rights where the encumbered assets may remain in the possession of the security provider.

B. General rule: no continuation of superpriority for security rights in fruits and proceeds – paragraph (1)

In general, security rights in fruits and proceeds of assets that were subject to an acquisition finance device or a security right covered by VIII.–5:204 paragraph (3) do not enjoy superpriority.

If, for example, an asset that is subject to an acquisition finance device is rented out by the security provider and the security right extends to civil proceeds of the asset that was originally encumbered, the security right in the proceeds (i.e. the right to payment of rent) is a security right with standard priority only, i.e. it ranks subject to security rights in the same assets in favour of other secured creditors which have been made effective earlier.

The justification for restricting the superpriority to the original security right is the following. Retention of ownership devices and security rights which qualify as an acquisition finance device enjoy superpriority because the assets that are subject to these instruments of security would not have been acquired by the security provider but for the credit given by the respective holders of these instruments of security. The situation is similar for assets that are subject to a security right covered by VIII.–5:204 paragraph (3). Since, however, typically additional expenses by the security provider, such as marketing costs or the general expenses of its business, are necessary to derive fruits and proceeds from these assets, security rights in these fruits and proceeds do not in general deserve the same privileged priority position.

C. Exceptions – paragraph (2)

Two exceptions to the rule in paragraph (1) are established by paragraph (2). Security rights in two types of fruits and proceeds of assets that are subject to an acquisition finance device or a security right covered by VIII.–5:204 paragraph (3) may continue to enjoy superpriority, if this is so provided by the preceding Article.

According to sub-paragraph (a), rights to payment due to defects in, damage to, or loss of the assets that were originally encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device (the reference to the encumbrance in paragraph (2) covering retention of ownership devices as well, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)), including insurance proceeds, are exempted from the application of paragraph (1), i.e. security rights in this type of proceeds may preserve the superpriority of the original security devices. This exception is based upon the fact that rights to payment due to defects in, damage to, or loss of the assets that were originally encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device can be regarded as replacements of the original assets which are no longer available as security for the secured creditor. No value is added by the security provider; and the secured creditor would be put at a disadvantage if its security rights in these proceeds were not treated in the same way as the security devices in the original collateral. This result corresponds with the automatic extension of the original security devices to this type of proceeds under IX.–2:306 paragraph (1).

Sub-paragraph (b) covers proceeds of the sale of assets that were originally encumbered or subject to a retention of ownership device. Unlike the proceeds dealt with in sub-paragraph (a), these proceeds of a sale are not automatically covered by the original proprietary security according to IX.–2:306 paragraph (1); instead, a party agreement to this effect is necessary; moreover, these security rights must be registered (see IX.–3:310 paragraph (2)(a) sentence 2). This distinction is due to the fact that proceeds of a sale will often include elements of profit which derive from marketing efforts of the seller. It would be unfair in relation to other creditors, whether secured or not, to automatically extend the original proprietary security to these proceeds. If, however, there is a party agreement to this effect, then the secured creditor, whose rights in the original collateral that has been sold to a third person will be lost or at least difficult to exercise, should be protected by preserving the priority of the secured creditor's original rights. Thus, if the seller's rights under a retention of ownership device or a security right which qualifies as an acquisition finance are extended to the proceeds of the sale of the original collateral, this security right in the proceeds of the sale has priority over a security right in the same proceeds created in favour of another secured creditor even if the latter security right had been registered first. This result corresponds to the result which some national systems, notably German law, achieve for such a conflict between an extended retention of ownership and a prior security assignment of the proceeds also on the basis of the traditional understanding of retention of ownership devices. The use of the concept of priority, however, allows this to be done without reference to general, but probably not generally shared principles such as bona mores, which would be necessary under the traditional approach to achieve this economically reasonable result.

IX.–4:106: Importation of encumbered asset

If an encumbered asset is brought from a country outside the European Union into this area, the priority of a security right which was effective before removal of the encumbered asset into the European Union and which fulfils the conditions of IX.–3:108 (Importation of encumbered asset) is preserved.

COMMENTS

This provision is not to be mistaken as a rule of private international law. How and by the application of which law the effectiveness of a security right (or a retention of ownership device, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)) before the removal of the collateral into the European Union is to be determined, is not a question that is covered by this Article. The only requirement is that the security device in the asset brought into the area of the European Union had been effective.

This Article merely determines on the level of substantive law the priority consequences that arise after importation in the broadest sense of this term. If (because the relevant conditions for effectiveness under Chapter 3 are fulfilled within the three months period of IX.–3:108), a security device continues to be regarded as effective after importation according to IX.–3:108, the priority position of this proprietary security under these rules will be the same as it was before importation. In essence, the time at which a security right originally became effective will continue to be decisive for the determination of the order of priority; if a security right or a retention of ownership device enjoyed superpriority before the importation of the encumbered asset, this preferred treatment will be upheld under these rules.

If, on the contrary, the security device had not been effective under the applicable law before importation of the encumbered asset into the European Union, or if the conditions of IX.–3:108 are not fulfilled (e.g. because the registration is effected only after the three months period prescribed by this provision has expired), the security right or retention of ownership device may still be regarded as effective under these rules as soon as the requirements of Chapter 3 are fulfilled. The priority of this security device, which will be relevant if after the importation other secured creditors also claim to hold competing security rights in the same asset, will then be determined according to the general rules of this Chapter, i.e. at least in general the time at which the security device has been made effective after importation will be decisive for the determination of the order of priority of competing proprietary security in the same asset (see the general principle of IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)(a)).

IX.–4:107: Priority of execution creditor

For the purpose of determining priority, an execution creditor is regarded as holding an effective security right as from the moment of bringing an execution against specific assets if all preconditions for execution proceedings against these assets according to the procedural rules of the place of execution are fulfilled.

COMMENTS

This Article deals with the priority status of an execution creditor, i.e. a creditor of the security provider who brings execution proceedings on the basis of a right to payment against the security provider. According to IX.–3:101 paragraph (1)(b) a security right that does not fulfil the requirements of Chapter 3 is not effective against a creditor who has started to bring execution proceedings against those assets. This rule, however, leaves open the question of the relationship of an effective security device vis-à-vis an execution creditor. In particular, it has to be decided under which conditions an execution creditor can prevail over a secured creditor holding an effective security device and vice versa.

While it appears to be universally accepted that the execution creditor should only under certain restrictive conditions be able to prevail over an effective proprietary security created on the basis of an agreement, there is no unanimity as to the way this result should be achieved. One approach followed in some member states is to provide that execution proceedings brought by an unsecured creditor give rise to a security right in favour of the latter. This concept, however, cannot be regarded as constituting a common European principle and, given the fact that there is no harmonisation of procedural law, it would also be difficult to reconcile it with the general rules on enforcement laid down in Chapter 7.

These rules have therefore opted for the less far-reaching solution contained in the present Article. For the purposes of priority, i.e. for the determination of the relationship to security rights and other limited proprietary rights in the same asset , the execution creditor is regarded as holding an effective security right if all preconditions for bringing execution proceedings against specific assets according to the procedural rules of the place of execution are fulfilled. This security right is regarded as having become effective at the moment the execution proceedings are brought against the assets in question. This time at which effectiveness is regarded as having been achieved will then determine the priority status of this fictive security right (see the general principle in IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)). If competing security rights have become effective before execution proceedings were brought, the execution creditor will have to give preference to these security rights.

The Article does not specify at which moment exactly execution proceedings are to be regarded as being brought and which conditions have to be fulfilled for the execution proceedings against specified assets. For the last-mentioned conditions, it is expressly provided that the procedural law of the place of execution is decisive. While it is to be assumed that the mere fact that a judgment for the payment of a sum of money has been obtained cannot suffice, this deference in favour of national procedural law also applies for the determination of the moment at which execution proceedings are to be regarded as being brought. National procedural rules might differ concerning the requirements to be fulfilled by the judgment creditor in order to commence execution proceedings. Therefore no exact conditions can be laid down here apart from the fact that the execution proceedings must already be directed to specific assets.

IX.–4:108: Change of ranking

(1) The priority between a security right and other security rights as well as other limited proprietary rights in the same asset may be changed by an agreement in textual form between the holders of all rights that would be affected by the change of ranking.

(2) A third person acquiring a security right or a limited proprietary right that has been negatively affected by a change of ranking is bound only if the entry for the security right in the European register of proprietary security has been amended accordingly or if the third person at the time of the transfer knew or had reason to know of the change of ranking.

COMMENTS

While according to IX.–4:101 to IX.–4:107 the priority between different security devices (as well as limited proprietary rights other than security rights) is determined by law, paragraph (1) of this Article gives effect to the principle of party autonomy in the area of priority. If all relevant parties, i.e. the holders of the proprietary rights that would be affected, agree, the order of priority may be changed by an agreement in textual form. On the meaning of "textual form", see I.–1:106 ("In writing" and similar expressions").

In general, such an agreement is effective without registration. However, paragraph (2) provides that a transferee of a proprietary right (whether a retention of ownership device, a security right or another limited proprietary right) that has been negatively affected by the change of ranking may under certain conditions not be bound by this change of ranking, i.e. may acquire the proprietary right under its original priority position as it stood before the change of ranking. The third party transferee will only be bound if it had actual or constructive knowledge of the agreement on a change of ranking or if this change of ranking was registered, i.e. if the transferee acquired a registered security right or retention of ownership device which was negatively affected by this change of ranking and if the entry covering this proprietary security in the European register of proprietary security had been amended indicating the change of ranking (cf. IX.–3:311). This registration will normally also be regarded as creating constructive notice by the transferee of the change of ranking; this is expressly spelled out in paragraph (2) because it will constitute the most frequent way of binding the third party transferee to this agreement.

The restricted effectiveness of the agreement on a change of ranking in relation to third party transferees of the relevant rights under paragraph (2) is justified on the ground that the agreement itself does not contain an element of publicity which is normally central to the third party effectiveness (and hence, the order of priority) of proprietary rights. Third party transferees therefore should in general be entitled to rely on the order of priority that is apparent especially from the content of the register.

CHAPTER 5: PREDEFAULT RULES

Section 1: General principles

IX.–5:101: General principles

(1) The security provider and the secured creditor are free to determine their mutual relationship with respect to the encumbered asset, except as otherwise provided in these rules.

(2) Any agreement concluded before default and providing for the appropriation of the encumbered assets by the secured creditor or having this effect, is void, unless expressly provided otherwise. This paragraph does not apply to retention of ownership devices.

COMMENTS

A. Predefault stage

Chapter 5 contains rules governing proprietary security and the rights and obligations connected with it before an event of default. Once there is a default (see IX.–1:201 paragraph (5)), the secured creditor's rights and remedies are governed by Chapter 7.

The rules in the present Chapter are applicable whether or not later on there may or may not be a default. The predefault stage is nothing but the more or less extended period between the creation of a security device according to Chapter 2 and its termination – either through due performance of the obligation covered by the security or other events according to Chapter 6 – or else its extra-judicial enforcement according to Chapter 7.

B. Predefault rules: creation and effectiveness of security right

The main focus of the predefault rules of this Chapter is on the internal relationship between the secured creditor and the security provider (see esp. Sections 1, 2 and 4). Therefore, only the valid creation of a security right or a retention of ownership device is required; effectiveness against third persons according to the requirements of Chapter 3 is in general not necessary for the application of these provisions.

Section 3 of this Chapter covers the change of parties. That the transferee of the proprietary security or the transferee of the asset serving as security are bound by the original security device follows from the fact that in both cases an individual proprietary position is transferred to the transferee (for a transfer of the asset subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device see IX.–5:301 paragraph (2)). This does not presuppose that the transferred security must have been effective against third persons according to Chapter 3. But Section 3 also governs the continuation of effectiveness after the transfer. This special consequence obviously is only applicable if the security device concerned had already been effective against third persons according to the provisions of Chapter 3 before the transfer of the security device or of the asset subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device.

C. Retention of ownership devices

In general, all provisions of this Chapter are applicable not only to security rights, but also to retention of ownership devices (see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)).

This holds true without any reservations for the general principles contained in Section 1 and in IX.–5:201. The rights and duties of the security provider under Subsection 1 of Section 2 are applicable to buyers, hire-purchasers, lessees or consignees under retention of ownership devices as well; for factual reasons, however, there will be no scope for the application of Subsection 2 of Section 2 to holders of retention of ownership devices, since the seller, supplier or lessor will only rarely, if ever, be in possession of the supplied assets. Sections 3 and 4, finally, are fully applicable to retention of ownership devices with some adaptations, however, in IX.–5:303. For details of the application of the individual Articles to retention of ownership devices see the Comments on the relevant provisions.

D. Parties' freedom to determine their relationship concerning the encumbered asset

Paragraph (1) of the present Article espouses the principle that the parties are free to determine their mutual relationship with respect to the encumbered asset. The principle of freedom of contract, of course, is already enshrined in II.–1:102 paragraph (1). However, it is not at all clear that the parties enjoy such a freedom also in the area of property law which explains why it was thought to be necessary to confirm this principle here.

As between the secured creditor and the security provider, two different bases for their mutual relationship have to be distinguished. The first is the contract for proprietary security, i.e. a purely contractual relationship. This specific type of contract is not primarily covered by this Book and it goes without saying that it is subject to the general principles of contract law including the principle of freedom of contract. In addition, the relationship between secured creditor and security provider is governed also by the property law-based rules based upon the security right itself. While these rules are normally mandatory in so far as the consequences of an event of default are concerned (see Chapter 7), the parties may in general freely determine the terms of the security right for the predefault stage, arranging, amongst others, for rights of the secured creditor or the security provider to use the assets, for duties of preservation of the encumbered assets or for other rights and obligations with respect to the security right and the encumbered assets before default.

It has to be emphasised that these rights and obligations should not be characterised merely as part of the contract for proprietary security. The terms regulating the mutual relationship between secured creditor and security provider are binding also against and in favour of third persons who might acquire the encumbered assets or the security right itself from the original parties (see Section 3 of this Chapter). This extension of the binding force of the security right cannot be explained as the consequence of an assignment of contractual rights or as a transfer of a contractual position, especially since the transfer of a security right or of the encumbered asset might lead to a substitution of the person owing the obligations concerned under this Chapter without the approval of the other party.

Even in the predefault stage, however, the principle that the parties are free to determine their relationship with respect to the encumbered asset is not without limitations and exceptions (see paragraph (1) in fine). Some exceptions are expressly laid down in Chapter 5, most notably in paragraph (2) of the present Article. Also cases in which deviations from the default rules of this Chapter are possible only on the basis of an express agreement to the contrary can be regarded as examples of such limitations by excluding such agreements which have been concluded only impliedly.

E. No appropriation before or at default

Paragraph (2) contains a principle that was already known in Roman law (lex commissoria) and that – even if subject to a growing number of exceptions – still is universally accepted throughout the member states. The security provider is not to be deprived of its assets on the basis of an agreement concluded before default that provides for an appropriation of the encumbered assets by the secured creditor. Paragraph (2) prohibits such agreements if they purport to transfer ownership to the secured creditor before or at default; agreements that would have effect after default are covered by IX.–7:105.

The reason justifying this prohibition is that an agreement for the appropriation of the encumbered assets, i.e. the transfer of unencumbered ownership to the secured creditor in exchange for the extinction of the obligation covered by the security, contains grave risks for the security provider. The value of the encumbered assets might well surpass the amount of the secured right; by agreeing before default on an appropriation, the security provider would lose all the protection which attempts to protect the security provider against the loss of its assets for less than their value and which is available against the secured creditor's normal rights and remedies in the post-default stage.

Paragraph (2) in fine refers to exceptions from this rule. One exception can be found in IX.–5:208 (civil fruits which are covered by the security right in the principal asset may be used for the satisfaction of the secured right to performance even before default). Another apparent exception is found in IX.–5:207 which allows banks to dispose of and to appropriate encumbered financial assets, if expressly so agreed by the parties. However, this is merely a temporary permission since the bank is obliged to re-transfer equivalent assets under paragraph (2) of IX.–5:207.

Finally, it should be made clear that paragraph (2) in no way invalidates security transfers of ownership and of sale-and-lease-back arrangements. Even though the parties might purport to transfer ownership to the secured creditor, these are transfers for security purposes only and not an appropriation within the meaning of this provision. Consequently, both these forms of transactions are regarded under this Book as creating a security right as a limited proprietary right only (see IX.–1:102 paragraph (4)), i.e. the security provider continues to be regarded as the owner of the assets concerned. Additionally, it should be pointed out that in the case of an agreement for a security transfer of ownership or a sale-and-lease-back the assets concerned are not yet encumbered at the moment of the conclusion of the agreement as would be required by paragraph (2).

F. Retention of ownership devices

As provided by IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c), paragraph (1) of the present Article is applicable not only to security rights, but to retention of ownership devices as well. Historically, retention of ownership devices have been developed by legal practice, making use of the freedom of contract in order to overcome certain limitations of the traditionally recognised security rights. Therefore, in general the parties should enjoy such freedom under these rules as well.

Section 2: Encumbered assets

IX.–5:201: Care and insurance of the encumbered assets

(1) The party who is in possession of the encumbered assets has an obligation to keep them identifiable from assets owned by others and must preserve and maintain them with reasonable care.

(2) The other party is entitled to inspect the encumbered assets at any reasonable time.

(3) The security provider has an obligation to insure the encumbered assets against such risks as are usually insured against by a prudent owner at the location of the assets. Upon request of the secured creditor, the security provider must furnish proof of the insurance coverage. If there is no or only insufficient insurance coverage or no proof of it, the secured creditor is entitled to take out sufficient insurance and to add any expenses to the obligation covered by the security.

COMMENTS

A. Specific application of the principle of good faith

This Article contains obligations of care binding whichever party is in possession of the collateral, i.e. the secured creditor in case of a possessory security right and the security provider in case of a non-possessory security right. Ownership of the encumbered asset is not relevant. A security provider who has created a non-possessory security right over its assets can be bound in the same way as a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in possession of assets subject to a retention of ownership device (see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)).

These obligations of care can be understood as applications of the principle of good faith. If the security provider is left in possession of the collateral, it follows from the general purpose of the security right (i.e. to use the value of the collateral for the satisfaction of the right to performance covered by the security) that the security provider must ensure that the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device are preserved in a good condition in order to protect the secured creditor's security from becoming worthless.

In the case of a possessory security, the result that the secured creditor is under an obligation of care owed to the security provider is based upon the fact that the encumbered assets are still owned by the security provider (retention of ownership devices will normally not involve possession of the supplied asset by the secured creditor). The secured creditor is entitled to the encumbered assets only for the limited purpose of security. Therefore the secured creditor should be under an obligation to the security provider to care for the latter's property which is out of its owner's reach.

B. Preservation and maintenance

The obligations of preservation and maintenance constitute the core content of the obligation under paragraph (1). The party in possession of the collateral is not under a strict liability for the usual depreciation in value of the encumbered assets but is only liable if damage arises from any omission to apply reasonable care in the preservation and maintenance of these assets.

C. Obligation to keep assets identifiable

Additionally, the party in possession of the collateral is obliged under paragraph (1) to keep the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device identifiable. The objective of this obligation is to prevent the other party's proprietary rights in the collateral from becoming lost due to a commingling of these items with other assets of the same type owned by the holder or third persons. It is not necessary to keep the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device separately, as long as they remain identifiable even if stored alongside other assets.

D. Right to inspection

Since only the party in possession of the collateral will have (physical) control over the latter, there is always the need for the other party to inspect the collateral from time to time in order to investigate the state of the assets concerned. As a default rule, IX.–5:201 paragraph (2) gives this other party the right to inspect the collateral at any reasonable time. The parties are free, of course, to agree on any other time or specific mode of inspection.

E. Insurance

According to paragraph (3) sentence 1, the security provider is obliged to insure the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. Differing from paragraph (1), the security provider is bound to insure even if the collateral is in the possession of the secured creditor. The security right in the encumbered asset is intended to give the secured creditor the possibility to satisfy the secured right from the collateral. In case the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device are damaged or lost, there should at least be a right to payment under an insurance policy to cover the secured creditor's interest; this position is also in line with IX.–2:306 paragraph (1) which extends the proprietary security to such insurance proceeds.

The obligation to take out insurance is limited to insurance against those risks that would usually be insured against by a prudent owner at the location of the assets.

The possibility to request proof of the insurance coverage (paragraph (3) sentence 2) allows the secured creditor to verify whether the security provider has in fact performed the obligation under paragraph (3) sentence 1. While the secured creditor may always take out insurance cover for the collateral at its own cost, the secured creditor may do so at the security provider's cost if the latter has not itself sufficiently insured the collateral or has not provided proof of it.

F. Sanctions

The non-performance of any of the obligations under this provision will give rise to the usual remedies for non-performance of an obligation under Book III, Chapter 3. The most usual remedy would be damages. If the secured creditor fails to meet the standards required by paragraph (1), it will be liable for any resulting losses suffered by the security provider. When determining the amount of damages owed, however, it will have to be taken into account that the secured creditor could have enforced its proprietary security against the assets concerned. The security provider will be liable for any losses resulting from a reduction of the amount which the secured creditor can realise from the proprietary security. See also Comment A on

IX.–5:205 for a more detailed description of the calculation of the secured creditor's right to damages.

G. Exceptions and agreements to the contrary

Since this Article contains a default rule only, the parties are free to agree to the contrary (see also IX.–5:101 paragraph (1)). Moreover, the following Subsections contain a number of provisions allowing the holder of the collateral to use or dispose of the latter. Both possibilities, of course, are not compatible with and override the duties of preservation, of maintenance and of keeping the assets identifiable.

Subsection 1: Security provider's rights and obligations

IX.–5:202: Rights in general

If and as long as the security provider is entitled to possession of the encumbered assets, the security provider is entitled to make use of them in a reasonable manner.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article and the other provisions of this Subsection 1 deal with non-possessory security devices. Historically, the practical purpose of the development of this type of proprietary security was to enable the security provider to continue to use the encumbered assets. Collateral that had to be in the possession of the secured creditor (as was the case in the traditional possessory security) could no longer be applied for its economic purposes and would have to be regarded as unproductive dead capital. As a default rule, this Article therefore provides that in the case of non-possessory security devices the security provider is entitled to make use of the collateral in a reasonable manner.

As provided by IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c), the present Article is applicable not only to security rights, but to retention of ownership devices as well. Under this type of security, the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee is regularly in possession of the supplied assets so that the restriction of the right to use to a use in a reasonable manner is particularly relevant.

B. Use in a reasonable manner

What is allowed as a use in a reasonable manner depends upon the circumstances of the case and the nature of the collateral. An encumbered car might continue to be used for daily transportation (presumably not for trans-continental journeys); a stationary machine may continue to be used in situ for the security provider's production (but may not – without the secured creditor's consent – be dismantled and reassembled at another site); vehicles of a car-rental company may continue to be rented out to customers. Such types of use might within reasonable limits lead to some wear and tear of the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. Neither the exploitation of the substance nor dispositions of the collateral, however, can be regarded as use in a reasonable manner within the meaning of the present Article, as follows e contrario from the more specific rules in the following two Articles.

C. Sanctions

If the security provider acts outside the limits of using the collateral in a reasonable manner, the secured creditor may be able to obtain an injunction prohibiting such use; if agreed, an unauthorised use may also constitute an event of default (see IX.–1:201 paragraph (5)(b)). Additionally, the secured creditor may claim damages if the security provider's conduct causes depreciation in value of the collateral which results in a loss for the secured creditor. For more details on the security provider's liability towards the secured creditor see the Comments on IX.–5:205.

IX.–5:203: Use of encumbered industrial material

A security provider in possession of encumbered industrial material, such as raw material or semi-finished products, may apply such material for production, unless expressly prohibited.

COMMENTS

This Article covers the specific case of industrial material as collateral which is in the possession of the security provider and constitutes an exception to the rules in the two preceding Articles. Like the rules of this Chapter in general, the Article is applicable both where the industrial material is subject to a security right and where these assets are subject to a retention of ownership device (IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)).

Again, one objective of a non-possessory security device is that the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device may continue to be used for their economic purposes. The economic purpose of the assets covered by this Article is being used for production by the security provider. Such a use would not be allowed under IX.–5:202 because it would usually involve the destruction of the original collateral and hence the loss of the secured creditor's proprietary security. Since, however, it is self-understood, economically reasonable and to some degree in the secured creditor's own interest that a security provider in possession of encumbered industrial material should be allowed to use these assets for production in the course of its business, this Article confers such a right on the security provider as a default position, i.e. without requiring an agreement of the parties to this effect.

The parties may agree to the contrary; such agreements, however, must be concluded expressly. It cannot be deduced merely from the circumstances of the agreement that the parties' true intention was to prohibit the use of encumbered industrial material for production.

It is obvious that, even after having applied the collateral for production, the security provider – if identical with the debtor – remains liable towards the secured creditor for performance of the obligation covered by the security. Whether or not after an authorised production the secured creditor's rights extend to the product is an issue solved by the rules in Chapter 2. There is under these rules no automatic extension of the security device into the products of the original collateral in general even in the case of an unauthorised production (Cf. IX.–2:307 and IX.–2:308. The position is different under Book VIII Chapter 5 where the former owner of material used for production automatically acquires a proprietary right in the product, cf. VIII.–5:201). The liability of the security provider for unauthorised dispositions is governed by IX.–5:205. See also Comment A on that provision for a description of the security provider's liability for damages in case of an unauthorised production.

IX.–5:204: Dispositions of encumbered assets by traders and manufacturers

(1) A security provider acting in the ordinary course of its business as a trader or manufacturer may dispose of the following types of encumbered assets free of any security right if they are in the security provider's possession:

(a) assets designated for sale and lease and industrial material (inventory); and

(b) products of industrial material.

(2) A trader or manufacturer may not dispose of items of its encumbered equipment, unless expressly so authorized by the secured creditor.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article covers another specific situation of collateral left in the possession of the security provider. In the situation dealt with by this Article, the economic purpose of the non-possessory security (as opposed to a possessory security) requires that the security provider is allowed to dispose of the collateral. While under IX.–5:202 the security provider may – in order to protect the secured creditor's interests – only make use of the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device in a reasonable manner, this Article authorises the security provider to sell the collateral covered by this provision even if this involves the loss of the secured creditor's rights in these assets.

This Article is only applicable if the security provider in possession of the collateral is a trader or manufacturer. For these persons, it is particularly evident that there can be an assumption that encumbered items of inventory left in their possession as well as products of industrial material are intended to be disposed of in order to generate revenue from the sale so that this Article may confer such an authority as a default position.

In theory, there could be a distinction between the question whether the security provider is entitled as against the secured creditor to dispose of the collateral and the question whether a transferee can acquire a valid title from such a disposition as against the secured creditor. Normally, however, the relationship between the secured creditor and the security provider will also determine the security provider's authority in relation to third persons; the present Article is intended to cover both aspects and to subject them to identical rules.

As a final general issue, it should be pointed out that, even though the wording of the Article refers to security rights and encumbrances only, this provision is applicable also where the assets concerned are subject to a retention of ownership device (IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)).

B. Dispositions of inventory or products – paragraph (1)

Paragraph (1) allows the trader or manufacturer to dispose of encumbered inventory (sub-paragraph (a)) and products of industrial material (sub-paragraph (b)). By "inventory" is meant defined assets held for sale and lease and industrial material, which covers raw material and semi-finished products (see the preceding Article). Additionally, the security provider may also dispose of the products of industrial material. If the security provider may use industrial material for production in spite of the secured creditor's rights in these assets (as allowed by the preceding Article), it is only natural that such items may be disposed of as well. The products of industrial material, finally, are produced by the manufacturer exactly for the purpose of being sold; therefore the security provider can reasonably be assumed to be authorised to dispose of these assets.

Again, agreements to the contrary are possible, i.e. the parties may agree that even a manufacturer is not entitled to dispose of encumbered inventory or the products of industrial material. However, paragraph (1) does not require an express agreement in order to deviate from the default rule.

C. Prohibition of dispositions of equipment – paragraph (2)

While a trader or manufacturer may dispose of its encumbered inventory under paragraph (1), paragraph (2) of this Article limits this right by prohibiting dispositions of encumbered equipment. The reason is not only that individual items of equipment will often be more valuable than inventory; the decisive factor is that even for traders and manufacturers it cannot be assumed that the sale of these assets is the typical manner of applying items of equipment within the course of their business. A secured creditor in whose favour a security right or a retention of ownership device over equipment is created therefore should be entitled to rely on the assumption that these assets will not be disposed of by the security provider.

This reasoning, however, should not be interpreted as excluding any possibility that a security provider could ever be entitled to dispose of equipment that is subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device. Often such a sale will have to be regarded as economically reasonable or even necessary. This will especially be the case where outworn or outdated equipment is sold and replaced by new assets. Giving the security provider a broad discretion, however, to dispose even of equipment would create an intolerable risk for the secured creditor. The latter could never be sure that its proprietary security does not risk being lost by way of a disposition by the security provider based on the ground that the assets in question are no longer complying with the latest technological standards. Especially since equipment such as high value factory machines, aircraft or industrial engines is used over a longer period of time, the vague criterion of being outdated could apply to nearly every case except for proprietary security in brand new equipment. Instead, such dispositions by the security provider are allowed only if and in so far as they are expressly authorised by the secured creditor. This means that the security provider has to seek the secured creditor's approval for any disposition of an item of equipment which is subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device in favour of the secured creditor. A mere implied agreement would not suffice; in the interests of the protection of the secured creditor an express authorisation is necessary.

D. Position of the transferee

If either by paragraph (1) or on the basis of an authorisation by the secured creditor the security provider is authorised to dispose of the collateral free of the encumbrance, the transferee can acquire proprietary rights in the assets (especially ownership) free of the secured creditor's rights. It has to be noted, however, that proprietary rights of other third persons, if any, could remain unaffected. If neither this Article nor an agreement of the parties authorises the security provider to dispose of the collateral free of the secured creditor's rights, the transferee could acquire unencumbered ownership of the assets concerned on the basis of a good faith acquisition, see IX.–6:102 and Book VIII, Chapter 3. If the security rights or retention of ownership devices in the assets concerned are registered, however, a good faith acquisition under these provisions will only rarely be possible for items of equipment, since a disposition of equipment (as opposed to inventory) is not likely to be regarded as occurring within the security provider's ordinary course of business.

E. Position of the security provider after disposition

If the security provider was authorised by this provision or by an agreement with the secured creditor to dispose of the collateral, no personal liability of the security provider arises from the disposition. If identical with the debtor, the security provider will still be liable for the obligation covered by the security. Whether or not the security right that had existed in the assets that were originally encumbered is extended to the proceeds of the disposition, is a matter to be decided on the basis of the rules in Chapter 2.

For the security provider's liability towards the secured creditor arising from an unauthorised disposition, see the following Article.

IX.–5:205: Unauthorised use or disposition

(1) A security provider in possession of the encumbered assets has an obligation to the secured creditor not to use or dispose of them in breach of the limits imposed by the preceding Articles of this Subsection.

(2) In addition to liability for damages for non-performance of the obligation referred to in paragraph (1), the security provider who is in breach of those limits is obliged to account to the secured creditor for the value derived from the use or the proceeds of the disposition and to pay the resulting amount, but only up to the amount of the secured right that would otherwise remain unsatisfied.

COMMENTS

A. Liability for damages

The present Article covers consequences as between the security provider in possession and the secured creditor of an unauthorised use or disposition of assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device (for the application of this Article to this type of security see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)) by the security provider.

Paragraph (1) imposes an obligation on the security provider not to use or dispose of the assets in breach of the limits established by the preceding Articles of this Subsection. Non-performance of the obligation will give rise to the usual remedies under Book III, Chapter 3. The most usual remedy will be damages for any loss caused by the unauthorised use or disposal.

The liability for damages is a liability to pay the creditor such sum as will put the creditor as nearly as possible into the position in which the creditor would have been if there had not been a breach of duty (see III.–3:702). In the present situation, the secured creditor may claim compensation for the loss of the rights in the collateral (whether security rights or retention of ownership devices) or for losses suffered as a result of depreciation in value of the encumbered assets by reason of the unauthorised use.

For security rights as limited proprietary rights, the following rules apply for the determination of the amount of damages. Since the secured creditor is affected only in its security right, the relevant losses must be calculated by reference to the difference between the value that could hypothetically have been realised by way of an enforcement of the security rights in the encumbered assets in their original state, on the one hand, and any payments actually received by the secured creditor under the secured right or from the remaining collateral or other security rights securing this right to performance, on the other hand. If the secured creditor is fully paid by the debtor or can be satisfied from the enforcement of any other security right, or if the remaining value of the encumbered assets which were used by the security provider in an unauthorised manner suffices for the satisfaction of the secured creditor, there is no right to damages.

In case of an unauthorised use or disposition of assets subject to retention of ownership devices, the amount of damages to which the holder of a retention of ownership device may be entitled is generally identical, even though the seller, supplier or lessor loses, or is affected in, its retained ownership and not only a mere security right. This is due to the fact that the seller, supplier or lessor is contractually bound to supply the asset concerned to the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee. Even if the asset is worth more, the seller, supplier or lessor is thus entitled to payment of the agreed price only, i.e. the secured right. The right to payment of damages should put the seller, supplier or lessor into the position in which the latter would have been if there had not have been a non-performance of the obligation. Therefore the seller, supplier or lessor can claim as losses suffered due to the unauthorised use or disposition only a resulting shortfall in the payment of the agreed price. This result is not affected by the facts that the seller, supplier or lessor would be entitled in the event of the buyer's, hire-purchaser's, lessee's or consignee's default to any surplus to be realised from the supplied assets and that this entitlement would not be limited to the amount of the secured right. As long as there has not actually been a termination of the underlying contractual relationship before the unauthorised use or disposition, the seller, supplier or lessor should not be able to profit from the buyer's, hire-purchaser's, lessee's or consignee's unauthorised use or disposition by being awarded more than the payment due under the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment, i.e. the payment which the seller, supplier or lessor could legitimately expect under the underlying contract.

B. Obligation to account

In addition to the right to damages described above, paragraph (2) of the Article provides that an unauthorised use or disposition of the collateral by the security provider triggers a liability of the latter to account for any value derived from the unauthorised use or for proceeds from the unauthorised disposition and to pay the resulting amount to the secured creditor. This is a personal obligation only. Paragraph (2) does not create any proprietary entitlement of the secured creditor to such value or proceeds received by the security provider.

Since the purpose of the secured creditor's security rights is the satisfaction of the secured right only, the secured creditor's remedies for an unauthorised use or disposition of the collateral cannot go further than is necessary for this objective; the resulting amount to be paid over is therefore limited to the amount of the secured right that would otherwise remain unsatisfied. For the reasons set out in Comment A, the possibility of the holder of a retention of ownership device to claim the surplus under IX.–7:301 paragraph (3) after default of the buyer or lessee does not justify any different treatment for this special type of proprietary security.

While there are some similarities between the liability to account and pay under paragraph (2) and the security provider's liability for damages, the former differs from the latter by not being limited to the amount that could have been realised by enforcement of the secured creditor's security rights in the assets concerned. Instead, if necessary for the satisfaction of the secured right, the security provider can be liable for the full amount of the value or proceeds derived from the unauthorised use or disposition. By stripping the security provider at least partly of its unlawful profits, paragraph (2) fulfils – as a secondary purpose – also a preventive function.

C. Position of the transferee

Whether or not the transferee may acquire unencumbered rights as a result of an unauthorised disposition of the collateral by the security provider is not a matter that is covered by this Article. See Comment D on IX.–5:204 for further details.

Subsection 2: Secured creditor's rights and obligations

IX.–5:206: Limited right of use

A secured creditor who is in possession or control of the encumbered assets is not entitled to use the assets, unless and in so far as proper use is indispensable for their up-keep and preservation.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Subsection deals with the secured creditor's rights and consequential obligations before default. This Article covers the very limited right of use of the encumbered assets by the secured creditor. Even these limited rights of use apply only in situations in which the secured creditor is in possession or control of the encumbered assets. Without possession or control, it would not be practicable for the secured creditor to exercise a right of use.

From this it follows that in practice, the provisions in this Subsection will apply to security rights only, not to retention of ownership devices. The latter form of security will rarely be used in cases where the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee (i.e. the person who is regarded as the security provider, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (2)) is not intended to hold the collateral.

B. Limited right of use

While the security provider who is in possession of the assets that are subject to a security right or a retention of ownership device enjoys broad rights to use and even to dispose of the collateral under the preceding Subsection, the secured creditor's rights are much more limited. The latter is entitled to use the encumbered assets under this provision only if such proper use is indispensable for the up-keep and preservation of the encumbered assets. A notable example would be a horse that needs to be worked. The right of use provided for by this Article is thus rather a more special type of the general duty of care under IX.–5:201 than a right to use the encumbered assets in the secured creditor's own interest. The reason for this distinction between the positions of the security provider under Subsection 1 and of the secured creditor under Subsection 2 is that the secured creditor does not exercise possession over the encumbered asset in order to be able to exploit its economic value, but in order to protect its position as a secured creditor. Since the security right's primary purpose is to secure the satisfaction of the secured right only, there is no reason to allow the secured creditor the use of the encumbered assets in general which would inevitably create the risk of a depreciation in value of the encumbered assets which are (at least in the case of a security right as a mere limited proprietary right) still owned by the security provider.

The position is different after default. Once the security right becomes enforceable, the secured creditor may – under the conditions set out in Chapter 7 – use the encumbered asset in order to apply any income so received for the satisfaction of the secured right, cf. IX.–7:207 paragraph (1)(b).

C. Exceptions and sanctions

Within the limits of IX.–5:101 paragraph (2) (i.e. as long as they do not allow the secured creditor to appropriate the encumbered assets), the parties may deviate from the default position under this Article; some exceptions to this rule are also to be found in IX.–5:207 and IX.–5:208.

In case of an unauthorised use by the secured creditor the sanctions available for the security provider comprise injunctions restraining the unauthorised use and rights to payment of damages, especially if the encumbered assets have lost value or were disposed of by the secured creditor. In calculating damages, however, it has to be considered that the secured creditor could have enforced the security right against the asset concerned; in addition, there might be – if the security provider is identical with the debtor of the obligation covered by the security – the possibility to set off the latter obligation against the security provider's right to damages.

In addition, the secured creditor might be accountable for any value received without authorisation from the use of the security provider's assets under the rules of Book VII on unjustified enrichment

IX.–5:207: Banks entitled to dispose of financial assets

(1) Banks and equivalent financial institutions holding financial assets as secured creditors are entitled to use, appropriate and dispose of the encumbered assets, provided this is expressly agreed.

(2) Upon satisfaction of the secured right, the secured creditor is only obliged to transfer financial assets of the same kind, quality and value to the security provider.

COMMENTS

A. Banks' and equivalent financial institutions' right of use, appropriation and disposition of encumbered assets – paragraph (1)

Paragraph (1) allows the parties to agree by way of an express agreement that banks and equivalent financial institutions as secured creditors may use, appropriate and dispose of financial assets (see IX.–1:201 paragraphs (6) and (7)) which are held by them as collateral. While it is generally permissible that the secured creditor and the security provider agree that the former may use the encumbered assets in deviation from the default rule of IX.–5:206 (see Comment C on that provision), paragraph (1) of the present Article goes a step further by creating an exception to IX.–5:101 paragraph (2). Contrary to the general rule contained in that provision, paragraph (1) provides for a limited possibility of an agreement by the parties on an appropriation of the collateral by the secured creditor.

Paragraph (1) covers financial assets only, i.e. financial instruments and rights to payment of money, which are held by banks and equivalent financial institutions. If expressly so agreed by the parties, these secured creditors may dispose of the financial assets held by them as collateral or may acquire ownership of these assets free of any rights of the security provider without any requirement of a prior default. The policy behind this rule is that it should be possible for the parties to arrange that financial assets need not be kept as dead capital by the secured creditor, but may be applied within the ordinary course of the latter's business. Banks and equivalent financial institutions routinely deal in such assets, and therefore it appears economically reasonable that they should not always be prohibited from using also financial assets held by them as collateral for their business purposes. No overriding interests of the security provider are concerned. Financial assets are fungible; no specific interest of the security provider in particular items of this sort is apparent, so that instead of a continuing proprietary right in the original assets, the secured creditor's obligation to retransfer financial assets of the same kind, quality and value to the security provider (paragraph (2)) is sufficient. Moreover, banks and financial institutions are subject to regulatory supervision and can therefore be regarded as being more trustworthy than other secured creditors.

B. Secured creditor's obligations after satisfaction of the security right

Where the secured creditor has appropriated or disposed of financial assets held as collateral on the basis of an express party agreement under paragraph (1), upon satisfaction of the secured right an obligation arises to return equivalent assets to the security provider according to paragraph (2).

Paragraph (1) does not require a preceding event of default and if the secured right is satisfied subsequent to the appropriation or disposition, e.g. by payment by the security provider, then the security provider must be able to demand the return of financial assets that are of the same kind, quality and value as its original financial assets. The duty to return cannot arise, of course, if the secured right has been satisfied after default by appropriation or if the secured creditor, i.e. the bank, had enforced its proprietary security against the financial assets. Not only would such a position be manifestly unsound; in addition, such situations are outside the scope of application of this Chapter which is restricted to the predefault stage, so that the obligation under paragraph (2) can no longer arise.

As is expressed by the word "only" in paragraph (2), the secured creditor is – deviating from the general rule in IX.–6:105 – not obliged to account for any fruits or profits derived from dispositions of the collateral. The possibility of obtaining such benefits is precisely the objective of the exceptional permission of appropriation under paragraph (1). Of course, however, the security provider should be entitled to any interest and similar payments payable on the financial assets held as collateral, but this is a matter for the bank-client agreement.

C. Consequences of commingling of financial assets by secured creditor

One special aspect of the banks' rights of disposition is their right to commingle financial assets of their clients which they hold as secured creditors. The consequences of such commingling are covered by IX.–2:309 paragraphs (4) and (5) in the context of other rules dealing with the consequences of commingling.

IX.–5:208: Appropriation of civil fruits

If the security right extends to civil fruits of the assets that were originally encumbered, the secured creditor is entitled to collect and to apply money received as civil fruits to reduce the secured right even before it has become due.

COMMENTS

A. Security right extending to civil fruits

This Article is applicable only where the security right (or retention of ownership device, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)) extends to civil fruits (i.e. fruits such as rent payments which are obtained only by way of a contractual agreement allowing a third person to use the encumbered assets) of the original collateral. Whether civil fruits are covered by the security right or retention of ownership device depends upon the provisions of Chapter 2. While in general a party agreement is necessary for the extension of the proprietary security beyond the assets that were originally subject to a security right or retention of ownership device (IX.–2:306 paragraph (3)), there is a presumption for the extension of possessory proprietary security to both civil and natural fruits of the original collateral (IX.–2:306 paragraph (2)).

B. Secured creditor's right to collect and appropriate civil fruits

If the rights of the secured creditor extend to civil fruits (see Comment A), the secured creditor may not only collect but also appropriate these fruits by using money received as civil fruits for the reduction of the secured right even before default or even before the right to performance has become due. This exception to the rule that an appropriation before default is not permissible (see IX.–5:101 paragraph (2)) is based upon the argument that the security provider will be less interested in the fruits than in the principal assets, so that the protective rules concerning the former may be less stringent. Moreover, since only money may be used for the reduction of the secured right under this provision, there is no danger that this possibility of appropriation is abused by the secured creditor to the effect that the collateral is acquired free of the security provider's rights at an undervalue. This reasoning even justifies the adoption of this exceptional provision as a default position, i.e. while the parties obviously may agree to the contrary, no agreement of the parties is necessary in order to confer on the secured creditor this limited right of appropriation.

For the secured creditor's similar right to lease the encumbered asset after default to a third person in order to use the income for the satisfaction of the secured right see IX.–7:207 paragraph (1)(b).

Section 3: Change of parties

IX.–5:301: Transfer of the secured right

(1) If a secured right is transferred to another creditor, the security right also passes to that creditor.

(2) The transferor is obliged to inform the transferee of any security right securing the transferred right.

(3) Effectiveness of the security right against third persons is achieved:

(a) by virtue of the original registration according to IX.–3:328 (Transfer of the security right: general rules) paragraph (1);

(b) if either possession or control of the encumbered asset is transferred to the transferee;

(c) if the transferor agrees to hold possession or control for the transferee; or

(d) if the security right had been effective without observation of any requirements under Chapter 3.

(4) If the security right remains effective, its priority is not affected by the transfer.

COMMENTS

A. Security right follows the secured right

Paragraph (1) contains the generally accepted principle that proprietary security devices as accessory rights follow the secured right if the latter is transferred to another creditor (see also III.–5:115 paragraph (1)).

This principle applies both to security rights as limited proprietary rights and to retention of ownership devices , to which the reference to security rights extends on the basis of IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c). Under several national legal systems, especially ownership transferred for security purposes and ownership retained for security purposes is often regarded as being transferable only on the basis of the rules on the transfer of ownership, which may involve additional criteria. The present rules do not follow this traditional approach and extend the principle that security rights follow the secured rights also to these types of security. The accessory nature of these security rights under these rules justifies this solution. Moreover, the essentially agreement-based rules on the transfer of ownership under the DCFR allow a simplification of the traditional understanding of the transfer of a retention of ownership device and of ownership that had been transferred for security purposes (the latter transaction is recharacterised as a creation of a security right under these rules according to IX.–1:102 paragraph (4)).

Effectiveness is not required for the transfer of the security right; even an ineffective security right can be transferred together with the secured right. Paragraph (3) only covers the question whether a security right is effective after the transfer.

B. Transferor’s obligation of information

Paragraph (2) imposes an obligation on the transferor to inform the transferee of the existence of a security right (or a retention of ownership device, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)). Often the transferor will give such information in its own interest (where rights to performance against third persons are sold, the transferee will be likely to pay a better price for a secured right to performance as compared to an unsecured right) but the obligation laid down in this provision might fulfil a gap-filling function in other cases.

C. Effectiveness of security right after transfer

Since these rules distinguish between the creation of the security device according to Chapter 2 and the effectiveness against third persons according to Chapter 3, another issue is whether the transferee has to undertake some additional steps in order to ensure that the security device remains effective after the transfer. This problem arises especially in view of the fact that the methods of achieving effectiveness under Chapter 3 typically focus on the position of the secured creditor, i.e. the latter has to hold possession or exercise control or the security right or retention of ownership device has to be registered in its favour.

Paragraph (3) provides that if the security device has been made effective by possession or control, it remains effective only if possession or control is transferred to the transferee or if the transferor agrees to hold possession or control for the transferee (see paragraph (3) sub-paragraphs (b) and (c)).

If, however, the transferred security device had originally been made effective by registration, i.e. by an entry in the register of proprietary security filed by the transferor as the original secured creditor, there is no need for an additional entry or a declaration to the register indicating the transfer of the security device; the security remains effective by virtue of the original entry (see paragraph (3)(a) and IX.–3:328 paragraph (1)). For an explanation of this position see the Comments on IX.–3:328.

Another obvious situation where the security device remains effective after the transfer without any additional requirements concerns security rights or retention of ownership devices that had been effective before the transfer without any requirements under Chapter 3 having to be fulfilled (see paragraph (3)(d)). Some security rights of this kind are covered by IX.–3:301 paragraph (2); other examples include acquisition finance devices in the assets of a consumer (IX.–3:107 paragraph (4)), ex lege security rights and security rights created before establishment of the European register of proprietary security (IX.–3:333 paragraph (1)).

D. Priority of security right after transfer

A final issue is the priority of the security device after its transfer. As long as the security right or retention of ownership device remains effective, i.e. if it was effective before the transfer and if continuation of its effectiveness is achieved according to paragraph (3), paragraph (4) makes clear that its priority is not affected by the transfer. This is in line with the general principle set out in Comment A that the transferee can rely on accessory security rights and retention of ownership devices just as the transferor could.

Outside the scope of application of paragraph (4), i.e. in cases where the security device was not effective before the transfer or where the conditions of paragraph (3) are not fulfilled, the priority of the security device after the transfer is to be determined according to the general rules of Chapter 4. If a security right is no longer effective after the transfer, it has to give precedence to all effective security rights (IX.–4:101 paragraph (3)); its priority in relation to other ineffective security rights is determined by the date of its (original) creation (IX.–4:101 paragraph (4)). If a security right has become effective only after the transfer, the point in time when the conditions for effectiveness were fulfilled is decisive for the application of IX.–4:101 paragraph (2).

IX.–5:302: Partial transfer of the secured right

If the secured right is divided into parts held by different persons as the result of a transfer of a part of the secured right or of a transfer of the whole secured right to different transferees each acquiring a part only:

(a) each holder of a part of the secured right is entitled to a part of the security right in proportion to the nominal amount of its part of the secured right; and

(b) the effectiveness of the security rights of each holder of a part of the secured right is to be determined individually; possession or control of the encumbered asset may be held by one holder of a part of the secured right for the others also.

A. General

This Article is applicable in situations in which the secured right has been divided into different parts held by different secured creditors. Such a result may follow from either a transfer of a part of the secured right only or from a transfer of the entire secured right to different transferees who each acquire a part of the original secured right only. Neither III.–5:115 paragraph (1) nor IX.–5:301 covers the specific consequences which such partial transfers of the secured right have for the corresponding proprietary security devices (whether security rights or retention of ownership devices, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(c)) securing satisfaction of this right to performance.

B. Pro rata entitlement to security right

Since each secured creditor holds a part of the secured right only, the entitlement of each secured creditor to the accessory proprietary security must be divided up. It is not apparent that any of the several secured creditors, including the transferor if the latter still holds a part of the secured right, should have a better right to the security than any other. So these rules have opted for a pro rata entitlement of each secured creditor to the security rights or retention of ownership devices. Each secured creditor's share is determined in proportion to the nominal amount of this secured creditor's part of the secured right in relation to the whole of the original secured right. Of course, the parties can agree on shares differing from a pro rata division.

C. Effectiveness of each secured creditor's rights

Sub-paragraph (b) provides that the effectiveness of each part of the security devices held by the different secured creditors has to be determined individually. The consequences of this rule, however, are somewhat ameliorated by the second half-sentence of sub-paragraph (b). Any individual secured creditor may hold possession or control of the encumbered asset not only for itself, but also for the other secured creditors. For registered security rights, the original registration is sufficient to ensure effectiveness of the transferred right on the basis of the general rules in paragraph (3)(a) of the preceding Article and IX.–3:328 paragraph (1).

D. Priority

This Article does not contain any specific rules on priority. Here the general rule in IX.–5:301 paragraph (4) applies, i.e. provided that the security device remains effective, priority is not affected by the transfer of the security right or retention of ownership device, even if based upon a partial transfer of the secured right.

IX.–5:303: Transfer of encumbered asset

(1) Where ownership of an encumbered asset is transferred to another person, neither the existence nor the effectiveness against third persons of a security right in the asset is affected. As of the time of the transfer, the transferee is regarded as the security provider.

(2) The preceding paragraph does not apply if the transferor acted with authority to dispose of the encumbered asset free of the encumbrance or if the transferee acquires the asset free of the encumbrance on the basis of a good faith acquisition.

(3) Security rights which before transfer of ownership of the encumbered asset had been created for secured creditors in future assets of the new owner do not have priority over security rights encumbering the transferred asset at the time of the transfer.

(4) The preceding paragraphs apply with appropriate adaptations where there is a transfer of the rights of a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in or relating to the supplied assets subject to an existing retention of ownership device.

COMMENTS

A. Existence of security right not affected by transfer of encumbered asset

The rule in the first sentence of paragraph (1) is a direct consequence of the proprietary nature of the security rights dealt with in this Book. The encumbrance binds not only the original security provider (as a party to the contract for proprietary security), but also every subsequent owner of the encumbered asset. The security provider may be (and usually is) the owner of the encumbered assets and may transfer ownership to another person. Being the owner of the encumbered assets does not, however, confer on the security provider authority to dispose of the collateral free of the security rights. This principle applies both to the transfer of ownership of encumbered corporeal assets and to an assignment of an encumbered right to performance.

Two exceptions to this rule are mentioned in paragraph (2). First, the security provider may transfer unencumbered ownership of the collateral if authorised to do so. The transferor, i.e. the security provider, may be authorised either on the basis of an agreement with the secured creditor or by law. One example of an authorisation of the latter type is provided by IX.–5:204 paragraph (1). Second, the transferee may acquire unencumbered ownership even if no authority has been conferred on the security provider to dispose of the collateral free of the secured creditor's rights if the transferee can rely on the provisions on good faith acquisition. According to IX.–6:102 read with VIII.–3:102 the security right can be lost even if the security right had been registered.

B. Transferee assumes position of security provider

Paragraph (1), second sentence, provides that the transferee assumes the position of the security provider for the purposes of this Book. This is a consequence of the proprietary nature of the security right. By virtue of the transfer of ownership of the encumbered asset, the new owner is the person who is under the obligations of a security provider and against whose property, i.e. the transferred encumbered asset, enforcement of the security right is to be sought. This rule is also qualified by the exceptions in paragraph (2).

C. Effectiveness of security right after transfer of encumbered asset

Another consequence of the transfer mentioned in paragraph (1) is that, again provided that the security right has not been lost as a result of the transfer of ownership of the encumbered assets, the effectiveness of the security right is not affected by the transfer of ownership of the encumbered asset.

For security rights made effective by possession or control, of course, it has to be pointed out that if the transfer of ownership has only been made possible by the secured creditor losing possession or control, the security right may indeed cease to be effective. But then the reason is not the transfer in itself but the fact that the conditions for effectiveness under Chapter 3 are no longer fulfilled.

For registered security rights, these rules have opted against a requirement of a new registration against the new owner of the encumbered assets who assumes the position of a security provider replacing the original security provider. Even though the publicity of the security right might be limited (only a search of the register against the original security provider might yield any results, while the security right cannot be found by searching entries filed against the new security provider), the secured creditor should not be burdened with the danger of an automatic loss of its secured position in general or with a duty to re-register against the new security provider. Under the present solution, the interests of other persons, especially other secured creditors of the transferee, are to some extent, however, protected on the basis of the rules on good faith acquisition (see Comment B on IX.–3:330). An additional entry in the register indicating the transfer is nevertheless possible and may provide additional protection for the secured creditor (see IX.–3:331).

D. Priority of security rights created by transferee before transfer

Paragraph (3) deals with a specific problem of priority which might arise in relation to registered security rights if the transferee had created security rights in its future assets (i.e. in the encumbered assets which are subsequently acquired by the transferee) and if this security right had been registered before the security right which encumbers the collateral at the moment of its transfer. Since this problem concerns registered security rights only, it is dealt with in the context of the provisions on registration, see Comment B(b) on IX.–3:330 .

E. Retention of ownership devices

Paragraph (4) provides that paragraphs (1) to (3) are applicable with appropriate adaptations also to cases where there is a transfer of the rights of a buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in or relating to the supplied assets subject to an existing retention of ownership device. While the position concerning the legal consequences laid down in paragraphs (1) to (3) is similar, the underlying situation as well as the legal construction is rather different so that it appeared to be necessary to include a separate provision for retention of ownership devices.

The main differences stem from the fact that in the case of a retention of ownership device the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee does not become the owner of the supplied asset but rather, if at all, the holder of a contingent right (VIII.–2:307). Hence, the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee can transfer the rights in or relating to the supplied assets derived from the respective transaction only.

Since the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee does not have the authority to transfer ownership to a third person because of the principle of nemo dat quod non habet, the seller's, supplier's or lessor's retained ownership is in general not affected by the transfer of the buyer's, hire-purchaser's, lessee's or consignee's rights. If the retention of ownership device is effective against third persons, a person to whom the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee has purported to transfer ownership therefore cannot become owner and must respect the seller's, supplier's or lessor's retained ownership in the assets concerned. This corresponds to the consequences of a transfer of the collateral spelt out in paragraph (1); also for retention of ownership devices, the effectiveness of the security device should not be affected by reason of the transfer. Again, the outcome is different if the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee acted with authorisation or if the transferee is protected by the rules on good faith acquisition: the rule laid down paragraph (2) applies also to the transfer of assets subject to a retention of ownership device. In such situations, the transferee may become the owner of the assets concerned and the rights of the holder of the retention of ownership device are lost.

Provided that this is not the case, however, the transferee, i.e. the person acquiring the rights in or relating to the supplied assets from the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee assumes the position of the latter for the purposes of these rules on proprietary security (see the principle laid down in paragraph (1) second sentence). The transferee is bound by the obligations set out in Subsection 1 of Section 2 of this Chapter; the holder of the retention of ownership device may reclaim possession from the transferee after default under IX.–7:301.

The rule in paragraph (3) can be applied on the basis of paragraph (4) to situations of a transfer of assets subject to a retention of ownership device as well; however, there will only be a need for the application of this provision if the retention of ownership device does not enjoy superpriority according to IX.–4:102 paragraph (1).

Section 4: Secured creditor's obligation to give information about secured right

IX.–5:401: Secured creditor's obligation to give information about secured right

(1) The security provider has a right to, and the secured creditor has an obligation to provide on request by the security provider, information concerning the amount of the obligation covered by the security. The security provider can require this information to be given to a third person.

(2) If the security provider is not the debtor of the obligation covered by the security, the security provider's right under the preceding Article depends upon the debtor's approval.

COMMENTS

A. Security provider's right to information about secured right

Subsection 5 of Chapter 3 Section 3 (IX.–3:319 ss.) contains a duty of information owed by the secured creditor specifically for the situation of a registered proprietary security. That duty of information, however, is limited to the question whether specific assets are encumbered by the registered security. The secured creditor's obligation of information under this Article, on the other hand, refers to the amount of the obligation covered by the security (whether a security right or a retention of ownership device, see IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(a)). For the reasons why these duties of information are dealt with separately, and why they are expressed as duties and not obligations, see Comment A to IX.–3:319 and Comment D to IX.–3:320.

The information required under this Article is of particular interest primarily not for the security provider itself, but for third persons who might consider giving further secured credit to the security provider or who might want to acquire proprietary rights in the assets concerned subject to the existing security devices. The remaining value of these assets can only be determined after deduction of the amount of the obligation secured by a proprietary security in these assets. Therefore, the security provider may demand that the information is given to any third person who might be interested.

B. Participation of the debtor

In general, the debtor will also be entitled as against the secured creditor on the basis of the underlying agreement to information about the outstanding amount of its obligation. If the debtor is identical with the security provider, then these information duties are concurrent; only the duty of information arising from the proprietary security, however, is covered by this Article. For cases in which the debtor is not identical with the security provider, paragraph (2) provides that the duty of information under this provision depends upon the debtor's approval. This rule serves to protect the confidentiality of the debtor's affairs. A security provider would therefore be well advised to seek an advance consent of the debtor in which the latter irrevocably authorises the security provider to demand information from the secured creditor about the amount of the obligation covered by the security.

C. Sanctions

The sanctions for a failure to comply with the obligation of information laid down in this Article and any other consequences of such a statement by the secured creditor need not, and indeed should not, be spelt out here, but are left to the general rules. One of the most relevant consequences of any information given will be that the secured creditor will be bound by it and will not be able to claim vis-à-vis the recipient of the information that the proprietary security concerned is liable for a greater amount. However, the exact operation of these effects will depend upon the circumstances of the individual case. The secured creditor might have given information that is expressly stated as being subject to developments beyond its control; therefore the harsh consequences applicable for the more formalised duty of information under Subsection 5 of Chapter 3 Section 3 cannot apply to the present constellation.

CHAPTER 6: TERMINATION

IX.–6:101: Instances of termination of proprietary security

(1) A security right is terminated if, and in so far as:

(a) the security provider and secured creditor so agree;

(b) the secured creditor waives the security right, such a waiver being presumed where the secured creditor returns possession of the encumbered asset to the security provider;

(c) the encumbered asset ceases to exist;

(d) ownership of the encumbered asset is acquired by the secured creditor;

(e) ownership in the encumbered asset is acquired by a third person free from the security right; or

(f) any other provision so provides or this consequence is implied, such as where the debtor and creditor of the secured right become identical, especially by inheritance or merger.

(2) A security right is also terminated if the secured right ceases to exist entirely, especially if a right to payment is fully satisfied by payment to the secured creditor, unless the security right with the secured right passes to another person who has made payment to the secured creditor;

(3) Paragraph (1) Sub-paragraphs (a) to (c), (e) and (f) and paragraph (2) apply with appropriate adaptations to the termination of a retention of ownership device. A retention of ownership device is also terminated if the rights of the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in or relating to the supplied assets under the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment cease to exist.

COMMENTS

A. General

Termination of a security right is treated before the consequences of default (Chapter 7), since in reality it is the most frequent cause for bringing a security to an end. Apart from satisfaction of the secured right, voluntary acts by one or both of the parties aiming at, or involving, the extinction of the security right are in practice the most frequent examples. However, termination may also be the consequence of legal events (cf. IX.–6:101 paragraph (1) sub-paragraphs (d), to (f)).

B. Meaning of termination

Termination of a security right means its complete extinction. Not only are its effects vis-à-vis third persons extinguished, but also its effects between the parties are brought to an end, i.e. the secured creditor is no longer entitled against the security provider to possession of assets formerly subject to a possessory security right and may not bring execution proceedings in the event of default. Further details of the consequences of termination in respect of proprietary security are spelt out in IX.–6:104.

The mere loss of effectiveness against third parties does not in general mean that the security right is terminated. Just as there can be a creation of a security right without the fulfilment of the requirements for effectiveness against third persons under Chapter 3, so can a security right cease to be effective against third persons without being terminated. This rule is, however, subject to a slight qualification dealt with in paragraph (1)(b) second half-sentence.

C. Instances of termination of a security right

Paragraphs (1) and (2) enumerate seven specific instances of termination. This enumeration is exhaustive; however, paragraph (1)(f) is deliberately formulated in open terms in order to allow the termination of a security right as an implied consequence of other provisions (see (f) below).

In cases covered by sub-paragraphs (a) to (f) of paragraph (1) termination of the security right may be either complete or merely partial, as is indicated in the main sentence. It depends on the individual circumstances in each of these cases whether complete or merely partial termination is intended and, in the latter case, which part or proportion of the security is to be terminated.

(a) Agreement by secured creditor and security provider – paragraph (1)(a). Paragraph (1)(a) provides as one instance of the termination of a security right an agreement by the secured creditor and the security provider to this effect. A security right is created by agreement and it may be terminated by agreement. No additional requirements are necessary for the termination by agreement other than that the secured creditor and the security provider validly agree to this effect. In particular, there is no need for a transfer of possession of the encumbered asset (the secured creditor may, however, be obliged to retransfer possession as a consequence of the termination, see IX.–6:104 paragraph (2)).

(b) Waiver by the secured creditor – paragraph (1)(b). Following the traditional position concerning the termination of a limited proprietary right, paragraph (1)(b) provides for the possibility of a unilateral waiver of the security right by the secured creditor. Such a waiver of a security right may be express or implied; only the latter case requires brief explanation. An implied waiver is not easily to be assumed, since that would run counter to the interests of the secured creditor. However, the circumstances may be so obvious as to allow an unambiguous conclusion. One example is if, in the case of a possessory security, the secured creditor returns the encumbered asset to the security provider. Under such circumstances, a waiver by the secured creditor can be presumed and the latter is under a heavy burden to discharge this presumption by showing that there was no intention to waive the security right. At any rate, the effectiveness of that possessory security right is terminated by return of possession to the security provider.

(c) Encumbered asset no longer in existence – paragraph (1)(c). Since there can be no creation of a security right unless the asset to be encumbered is in existence (see IX.–2:102 sub-paragraph (a)), it is self-explanatory that a security right is terminated if the encumbered asset is no longer in existence. That an encumbered asset is no longer in existence may be due to reasons of fact (e.g. an encumbered car is destroyed in an accident) or reasons of law (e.g. the contract from which an encumbered right to payment arises is avoided). Even if the original collateral no longer exists, however, the secured creditor's rights may not be entirely lost if the security right extends to proceeds or other assets replacing the original collateral, see IX.–2:306 ss.

(d) Secured creditor acquires ownership of encumbered asset – paragraph (1) (d). Paragraph (1)(d) provides that the security right is terminated if and in so far as the secured creditor acquires ownership of the encumbered asset. At least for proprietary security in movables, there does not appear to be a point in distinguishing between a security right and ownership in the same asset held by the same person. Such an acquisition of ownership of the encumbered asset may occur in two sets of circumstances. First, the secured creditor may have purchased the asset from the security provider who is the owner of the encumbered asset; second, the secured creditor may have exercised an exceptional possibility for an appropriation of the collateral.

A similar constellation is covered by paragraph (1)(f). While under paragraph (1)(d), the secured creditor and the owner of the encumbered asset are identical, paragraph (1)(f) covers the subsequent identity of the creditor and the debtor of the secured right due to a later event, such as succession or merger.

(e) Acquisition of ownership by third person free from security right – paragraph (1)(e). A security right may be terminated by an acquisition of ownership of the encumbered asset by a third person free from a security. This may occur in various circumstances. First, the person transferring ownership in the encumbered asset may have been authorised by the secured creditor to dispose of the asset free from the security right. Even in the absence of an agreement, the security provider has such an authority to dispose of encumbered inventory free of any security right (see IX.–5:204). Second, the person acquiring ownership in the encumbered asset may be able to rely on the principles of good faith acquisition. A detailed rule for such a good faith acquisition of ownership free from a security right is contained in IX.–6:102.

(f) Other instances of termination – paragraph (1)(f). Paragraph (1)(f) reserves other provisions which may expressly provide for, or may have the implied effect of, a termination of a proprietary security right. One example is expressly mentioned – where debtor and creditor of the secured right become identical, especially by inheritance or merger. This corresponds to the idea of merger of obligations (III.–6:201).

(g) Secured right no longer in existence – paragraph (2). Proprietary security rights under the rules of this Book are accessory, or dependent, security rights. The existence of a secured right is necessary for the creation of these security rights, and if the secured right no longer exists, the security right is terminated.

However, paragraph (2) contains an important exception from the general scheme of paragraph (1) which explains why this instance of termination is dealt with separately. Paragraph (2) proceeds from the generally accepted rule that a partial extinction of the secured right, e.g. by part payment to the secured creditor, per se does not extinguish a corresponding portion of the security right; rather, the latter remains fully effective. Of course, the parties may agree otherwise (such an agreement on a partial termination as consequence of part payment would fall under paragraph (1)(a)). Concerning the specific – and important – example of payment of the secured right, paragraph (2) clarifies that there is no termination of the security right if a person other than the debtor has made payment to the creditor, so that the security together with the secured right passes to the payer (for payment by a third party security provider see IX.–6:106 read with IV.G.–2:113: other security rights pass to the third party security provider).

C. Instances of termination of a retention of ownership device

For retention of ownership devices, most of the instances of termination contained in paragraphs (1) and (2) are applicable as well; therefore paragraph (3) sentence 1 contains a broad reference to these provisions. The only exception is paragraph (1)(d). Since the holder of a retention of ownership device is still the owner of the supplied assets, this provision cannot apply to retention of ownership devices. Instead, it is the extinction of the rights of the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee in or relating to the supplied assets under the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment which constitutes an additional instance of termination of a retention of ownership device (paragraph (3) sentence 2). Partly, this covers situations in which, e.g. by termination of the underlying contractual relationship, the right to payment of the holder of a retention of ownership device is also brought to an end, so that this situation resembles paragraph (2). If only the rights of the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee cease to exist (e.g. on the basis of a waiver), the retained ownership also no longer fulfils a security function since the supplier can reclaim the assets regardless of whether the rights to payment are fulfilled or not. It should be pointed out that the termination of a retention of ownership device does not necessarily have the consequence that the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee becomes the owner of the supplied assets, for details see IX.–6:104 paragraph (5) sentence 2.

IX.–6:102: Loss of proprietary security due to good faith acquisition of ownership

(1) Whether a security right is lost due to good faith acquisition of ownership of the encumbered asset by a third person free from a security right is determined by VIII.–3:102 (Good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights).

(2) For the purposes of VIII.–3:102 (Good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights) paragraph (1)(d) sentence 1, a transferee is regarded as knowing that the transferor has no right or authority to transfer ownership free from the security right if this right is registered under Chapter 3, Section 3 unless:

(a) the transferor acts in the ordinary course of its business; or

(b) the entry is filed against a security provider different from the transferor.

(3) Whether a retention of ownership device is lost due to good faith acquisition of ownership of the supplied asset by a third person is determined by VIII.–3:101 (Good faith acquisition through a person without right or authority to transfer ownership). Paragraph (2) above applies with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. General

A security right and a retention of ownership device may be lost if another person acquires ownership of the collateral free of earlier security devices. Such an acquisition of the assets concerned free of any existing security rights and retention of ownership devices may occur on the basis of the principle of good faith acquisition.

Book VIII contains in its Chapter 3 two provisions on the good faith acquisition of ownership. While VIII.–3:101 deals with the good faith acquisition of ownership through a person not entitled to transfer ownership, i.e. typically the good faith acquisition from a non-owner, VIII.–3:102 covers the good faith acquisition of ownership free of limited proprietary rights, i.e. situations in which the transferor transfers ownership in its assets in disregard of earlier limited proprietary rights.

A security right under this Book as defined in IX.–1:102 paragraph (1) is a prime example of such a limited proprietary right; the acquisition of ownership by the acquirer free of an earlier security right is therefore governed by VIII.–3:102, to which paragraph (1) of the present Article refers.

In the case of a retention of ownership device, however, the buyer, hire-purchaser, consignee or lessee (cf. IX.–1:103 paragraph (2)) is according to the traditional understanding of this legal instrument regarded as a non-owner. The acquisition of ownership by a third party on the basis of a good faith acquisition in disregard of the rights of the holder of the retention of ownership device is therefore to be dealt with by VIII.–3:101 (see the present Article paragraph (3) sentence 1). Apart from the fact that different provisions of Book VIII are applicable, however, the legal issues to be dealt with in the situations of security rights on the one hand and retention of ownership devices on the other hand are largely identical. Therefore, paragraph (3) sentence 2 of this Article provides that paragraph (2) – which covers the loss of security rights due to a good faith acquisition of ownership – is applicable to cases of a loss of retention of ownership device as well. In the following Comments both cases can be dealt with together.

B. Registration and good faith acquisition in general

While the requirements and the scope of a good faith acquisition of ownership in general are outside the scope of this Book, the effects of a registration in the European register of security rights (Chapter 3, Section 3) on a possible good faith acquisition are to be dealt with here. A good faith acquisition cannot take place where the acquirer knows that the transferor had no right or authority to transfer proprietary rights in the assets concerned free of the earlier rights. The same applies where the acquirer could reasonably be expected to have notice of that lack of right or authority by the transferor (see VIII.–3:102 paragraph (1)(d) sentence 1 (security rights) and VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1)(d) sentence 1 (retention of ownership devices)).

As a general rule, it is especially the fact that a security device is registered which gives publicity to this security right or retention of ownership device and on the basis of which any acquirer could be expected to know that the transferor has no right or authority to transfer ownership free from the security right. In order to avoid disputes concerning the effect of a registration and whether it actually would be reasonable under the concrete circumstances of the case to expect the acquirer to know of the transferor's lack of right or authority, paragraph (2) applies a legal fiction. Subject to exceptions (see Comments C to E), any acquirer is regarded as knowing that the transferor has no right or authority to transfer ownership free from a security right or retention of ownership device if this right is registered under Chapter 3 Section 3. The same legal technique of a legal fiction which excludes any attempt of the other party to show that it did not know and could not be expected to know of the transferor's lack of right or authority is also applied in IX.–2: (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (2) and IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset) paragraph (2).

C. Registration and good faith acquisition of ownership in the ordinary course of business – paragraph (2)(a)

While creditors who want to acquire a proprietary security right in the asset concerned are subject to stricter rules as to whether they can be expected to search the register for the existence of earlier competing security rights and retention of ownership devices (or whether they can be regarded as having – constructive – knowledge of such security devices), the rules must be more lenient in relation to persons who want to acquire ownership in the assets concerned. Transactions conducted in the ordinary course of the transferor's business should be protected; it would constitute a major obstacle for commerce in general if parties could no longer have confidence in the possession of the goods by the transferor and if it were necessary to investigate whether any registered security rights and retention of ownership devices existed in these assets.

Therefore, paragraph (2)(a) expressly provides that the mere fact that there is an entry in the European register of security rights covering the security rights or retention of ownership devices in the assets concerned does not have the effect that a person who wants to acquire ownership in these assets is to be regarded as knowing that the transferor does not have a right or authority to transfer ownership free of the earlier encumbrance, provided that the transferor acts in the ordinary course of its business.

If, on the other hand, the transferor acted outside the ordinary course of its business, the exception contained in paragraph (2)(a) does not apply and the registration of the security right gives rise to the legal fiction that the acquirer can be regarded as knowing that the transferor does not have a right or authority to transfer ownership free of the earlier encumbrance, which excludes a possible good faith acquisition. The same result applies even if the transferor acted within the ordinary course of its business, provided that the acquirer positively knew or could be expected to know from any other source that the transferor lacked this right or authority. The legal fiction contained in paragraph (2) does not apply, but the acquirer cannot show that it is in good faith as required by VIII.–3:102 paragraph (1)(d) sentence 1 or VIII.–3:101 paragraph (1)(d) sentence 1.

A specific situation where good faith acquisition may be excluded even where the transferor acted in the ordinary course of its business is regulated in IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) paragraph (2): where the acquirer had been informed by the registered secured creditor that the asset concerned is subject to a security device, the acquirer cannot claim to be in good faith.

D. Registration against person different from transferor – paragraph (2)(b)

Another limitation of the effects of a registration in the European register of security rights is laid down in paragraph (2)(b). A person who wants to acquire a proprietary right in an asset is not required to search the register for entries concerning security rights or retention of ownership devices in that asset that are not filed against the transferor but against the person from whom the transferor had acquired the asset in question. In such situations the transferee is not regarded as knowing that the transferor has no right or authority to transfer ownership in disregard of the earlier right; thus, a good faith acquisition is possible even though the security right or retention of ownership device is registered. See Comment B (b) and (c) on IX.–3:330.

E. Other exceptions to the rule in paragraph (2)

As in the case of IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) and IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset), the rule that the registration of a security right or retention of ownership device gives rise to (constructive) knowledge of the transferor's lack of right or authority is subject to some exceptions based upon other rules, which, however, have only a very limited scope of application. One exception is expressly laid down in IX.–3:322 paragraph (1). Where the holder of a security right had incorrectly informed the acquirer of a proprietary right in the encumbered asset that this asset is not subject to an encumbrance, the acquirer may acquire the rights free from this encumbrance even if it was registered. A second exception may follow from the general principle of good faith and fair dealing, see for the operation of this principle in the present context Comment B on IX.–2:109 (Good faith acquisition of security right in encumbered corporeal asset).

F. Systems of registration or notation other than the European register of security rights

The principles explained in the preceding paragraphs do not necessarily apply, however, to the effects of registrations or notations of security devices in systems of registration or notation other than the European register of security rights. IX.–3:301 paragraph (2) and IX.–3:312 allow the continued operation of such systems even if these specialist systems are established under the national law of a member state. The more specialised these other registers or systems of notation are, the more likely it is that it would be more in line with the objectives of the relevant (national) legislation to impute constructive knowledge on the basis of a registration or notation in these systems even if the assets concerned were acquired in the ordinary course of the transferor’s business.

IX.–6:103: Prescription of the secured right

A security right can be enforced even if the secured right is prescribed and up to two years after the debtor of the secured right has invoked this prescription as against its creditor.

COMMENTS

This provision deals with a very controversial issue which must first be clarified.

A. Effect of prescription in general

The periods of prescription and other details are laid down by III.–7:201 ss. Relevant in the present context, however, are only the effects of the prescription of a secured right on the possibility to enforce a security right.

According to III.–7:501, after the expiry of the period of prescription the debtor is entitled to refuse performance. However, any performance made by the debtor after expiry of the period may not be reclaimed merely because the period of prescription had expired. These two rules demonstrate that the expiry of the period of prescription of a right to performance does not extinguish the prescribed right, but merely affords the debtor the right to refuse performance of the corresponding obligation.

B. Effect of prescription on proprietary security

Countries in Europe are divided on the issue of the effect produced if the debtor has invoked prescription of the secured right. Most countries appear to negate any effect on the secured creditor's right to assert its security. But several other countries, especially the Romanic countries, allow the security provider to invoke prescription if the debtor of the secured right to payment had successfully invoked prescription.

The main reason relied upon for this latter solution is the idea that the proprietary security is an accessory to the secured right and therefore shares the fate of the latter (For personal security, cf. references in Drobnig, Personal Security 214, 222 f.).

By contrast, the opposite opinion of the majority of European countries regards proprietary security as a strengthening confirmation of the secured right which, since typically granted by the debtor itself, prevails over the accessory nature of the security. The latter reason is more convincing than the more theoretical argument based on accessority.

Nevertheless, it appears desirable to accommodate to some degree also the other view. Therefore, the last part of the present Article sets a time limit of two years after the debtor of the secured right had invoked the expiry of the period of prescription. Admittedly, this time limitation is arbitrary. However, it leaves enough time for the secured creditor to determine its future course of action after the debtor had raised this defence.

IX.–6:104: Consequences of termination

(1) The full or partial termination of a security right implies the corresponding termination of the encumbrance of the asset concerned.

(2) If and in so far as a security right is terminated, the secured creditor is no longer entitled to possession or control of the asset that was encumbered as against its owner. For the right to deletion of an entry in the European register of proprietary security, IX.–3:315 ((Security provider's right to have entry deleted or amended) applies.

(3) The secured creditor is obliged to inform any third person holding the encumbered assets of the removal of the encumbrance and, if the third person holds the assets for the secured creditor's account, to ask the security provider for instructions.

(4) Where in the case of an encumbered right to payment notice of the encumbrance had been given to the third party debtor, the secured creditor is obliged to notify the debtor of the removal of the encumbrance.

(5) If and in so far as a retention of ownership device is terminated, the seller's, supplier's or lessor's ownership of the supplied assets is no longer subject to the rules of this Book. An acquisition of ownership of the supplied assets by the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee or the latter's right to use the supplied assets is subject to an agreement of the parties. For the right to deletion of an entry in the European register of proprietary security, paragraph (2) second sentence applies.

COMMENTS

A. Security right automatically extinguished

Termination of a security right implies that this proprietary right as an encumbrance of the collateral is automatically extinguished (paragraph (1)). While this is an obvious consequence for typical security rights such as the pledge, national legal systems sometimes do not provide for an automatic extinction of proprietary security but oblige the secured creditor to re-transfer its proprietary position in the assets serving as collateral to the security provider instead. These rules do not follow this approach. There does not appear to be a justification to provide for an automatic extinction of the security right as a proprietary right in only some cases, while in other cases the security provider would merely have a (personal) entitlement as against the secured creditor to have the encumbrance released or removed.

Obviously, this distinction is irrelevant if the encumbered assets are lost, or where the latter had been acquired by the secured creditor or a third party (IX.–6:101 paragraph (1) (c) to (e)); in these cases a reversal of the encumbrance by an act of the secured creditor is even under the traditional position outlined in the preceding paragraph not necessary nor even possible. Whether there is any liability as between the secured creditor and the security provider in such a situation (for the loss of the former's security right or the latter's ownership) depends upon the circumstances of the case, i.e. primarily on the question whether one party is in breach of any of the obligations under Chapter 5.

It should be pointed out that this Article provides for the consequences of a "full or partial" termination of a security right (paragraph (1)) or provides such consequences "if and in so far" as the security right is terminated (paragraph (2)). This is due to the fact that IX.–6:101 paragraph (1) allows for some instances of termination, e.g. waiver of the security right, a partial termination of a security right if these events relate to a part of the security right only. Termination of the security right by payment, however, can be complete only, i.e. only after full payment of the secured right (see IX.–6:101 paragraph (2)). Therefore, the consequences of the present Article do not apply in cases of a merely partial payment towards satisfaction of the secured right.

B. Possession, control and registration

While the security right itself is terminated automatically, the secured creditor may in fact still exercise possession or control of the encumbered assets or there may be an entry in the European register of proprietary security covering this security right.

Paragraph (2) sentence 1 provides that the secured creditor is after termination no longer entitled to possession of the formerly encumbered assets. Obviously, if the secured creditor has a right to possession on any other basis, it can still reject any claim for repossession. If this is not the case, the secured creditor – if holding possession – must return the formerly encumbered assets to the security provider as the owner of these assets. Where fungible encumbered assets held by the secured creditor had been commingled by the secured creditor (see IX.–2:309), the secured creditor's duty to return possession of the encumbered assets under paragraph (1) refers to the security provider's undivided share of the mixture or bulk that had resulted from the commingling.

The same principles apply to control exercised by the secured creditor. The secured creditor is no longer entitled to the exercise of control over the formerly encumbered financial assets as against their owner. Since control is typically exercised through a third person holding the encumbered assets, the secured creditor has to instruct the third person to lift the control. Details of the secured creditor's obligation upon termination of the security right are spelt out in paragraph (3) (see Comment C).

The secured creditor's obligation to delete an entry in the European register of proprietary security if this entry does not correspond (or no longer corresponds) to an existing security right, follows from the general rule in IX.–3:315 to which paragraph (2) sentence 2 of the present Article refers.

C. Assets held by third person

In many cases, encumbered assets are not held by the secured creditor or the security provider, but by a third person. A typical example is a control arrangement according to IX.–3:204. For this case, paragraph (3) provides that the secured creditor must inform the bank holding the encumbered financial assets that it waives its control and that the security provider's original powers are to be re-established. The security provider is to be allowed to dispose of its "blocked" account (IX.–3:204 paragraph (2)(a)). In the case of a special account according to IX.–3:204 paragraph (2)(b), the secured creditor will have to ask the security provider for instructions.

D. Reversal of notice in case of notification of account debtor

A specific issue concerning the removal of an encumbrance is regulated in paragraph (4). Where a right to payment is encumbered, notice of the security right can be given to the third party debtor, although this is not necessary for the security right to be created or to become effective. Nevertheless, in practice notification is frequent. If this has occurred, the secured creditor is obliged to inform the third party debtor about the reversal of the assignment.

Otherwise the third party debtor will be – to say the least – in doubt as to the person to whom it can validly perform.

E. Retention of ownership devices

Paragraph (5) contains separate rules for the consequences of a termination of a retention of ownership device.

As for a security right, termination means that there is no longer a proprietary right fulfilling a security function. However, since there has not necessarily been between the parties an agreement on the transfer of ownership (such an agreement is notably absent in many cases of financial leasing, where the acquisition of ownership by the lessee, if envisaged at all, is often subject to the exercise of an option to this effect by the lessee) it would certainly go too far to provide that in every case of a termination of a retention of ownership device ownership of the supplied assets should automatically pass from the seller, supplier or lessor to the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee. Instead, it is preferable to follow a more differentiated approach. A termination of a retention of ownership device generally has the effect that the secured creditor's rights, i.e. the retained ownership, if not affected by the events leading to the termination, are no longer subject to the rules of this Book (paragraph (5) sentence 1). If, e.g., the secured right is fully paid, the ownership no longer fulfils a security purpose and in the absence of a duty of registration for leases in general (apart from finance leases) there does not appear to be any longer a basis to demand compliance with any publicity requirements under this Book as a condition for the effectiveness of this proprietary right against third persons.

Whether, however, the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee is entitled to use the supplied assets after the event leading to the termination or whether these persons may even acquire ownership in the supplied assets depends entirely upon the content of the underlying agreement of the parties and upon the event leading to the termination of the security right in question.

This position, which is expressed in paragraph (5) sentence 2, can be explained by a closer look at the possible acquisition of ownership as a consequence of payment of the secured right. It depends upon the arrangements between the parties, whether a buyer or a hire-purchaser will automatically acquire ownership of the supplied assets. This will occur if the parties had agreed upon a transfer of ownership under the suspensive condition of full payment of the purchase price; if this condition is fulfilled, the buyer will automatically become owner. The same result will be achieved under a hire-purchase since full payment of the hire rates opens the way to the purchase, i.e. the transfer of ownership. If these clauses for an automatic transfer of ownership upon full payment of the purchase price are missing, the seller, supplier or lessor (usually) is obliged to transfer ownership to the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee. In the case of non-payment, the proprietary position of the seller, supplier or lessor will remain unchanged.

The arrangements of the parties also cover the question whether after the event leading to the termination the former holder of the retention of ownership device is entitled to possession of the supplied assets; therefore there is no equivalent to paragraph (2) sentence 1 in paragraph (5). Paragraph (5) sentence 2 contains the same reference to IX.–3:315 as paragraph (2) sentence 2.

IX.–6:105: Secured creditor liable to account for proceeds

Upon termination of the security right, the secured creditor is liable to account for any proceeds from the encumbered assets, whether or not it has received, used or consumed them, and to transfer them to the security provider.

COMMENTS

This and the following article deal with indirect consequences of the termination of a proprietary security. Both provisions are concerned with such consequences outside the area of enforcement after default. The rules on the distribution of value realised from the enforcement of a security right are to be found in IX.–7:215.

The secured creditor's liability to account for and to return proceeds according to the present Article presupposes, of course, that the secured creditor had obtained proceeds of the encumbered assets. Primarily this will only have occurred if the secured creditor had been in possession or control of the encumbered assets.

The general conditions for extending a security right into proceeds of the original collateral are fixed by IX.–2:306. In the cases covered by paragraph (1) of this provision, the proceeds practically replace the originally encumbered assets. Although they do not constitute an additional value, the secured creditor is bound to account for them and return them, since they have replaced the original collateral.

The same is true for proceeds to which the security right had been extended by party agreement according to IX.–2:306 paragraph (2) and for civil and natural fruits (paragraph (3)).

One exception to this rule is spelt out in IX.–5:207 for proceeds of financial assets held by a bank as secured creditor; in general, the secured creditor is not obliged to account for any proceeds, if and in so far as these proceeds have been used for the satisfaction of the secured right, whether by way of appropriation or set-off.

IX.–6:106: Recourse of third party security provider

(1) If a security provider who is not the debtor of the secured right (a third party security provider), pays the outstanding amount of the obligation covered by the security, IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance), IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) and IV.G.–1:107 (Several security providers: recourse against debtor) apply with appropriate adaptations.

(2) A security provider other than the debtor has as against the debtor the same position as a person who has provided dependent personal security.

COMMENTS

This Article deals with a special case. Instead of the debtor, a third party had assumed a proprietary security in favour of the secured creditor; and this third party has satisfied the secured creditor by payment of the outstanding amount of the obligation covered by the security (where satisfaction of the secured creditor is by enforcement into a third party security provider's assets, IX.–7:109 applies).

In such situations, the third party security provider will usually wish to be reimbursed by the debtor. If so, the situation resembles that of a provider of personal security who, on the creditor's demand, has made payment to the creditor. It is appropriate to apply to this case the rule of IV.G.–2:113.

If there are several proprietary security providers and/or personal security providers, the mutual rights and obligations of recourse between these persons among themselves and towards the debtor are governed by IV.G.–1:106 and IV.G.–1:107. Again, the similarity of this situation to personal security justifies the reference to the rules of Book IV.G., the same principle is already contained in IV.G.–1:105 paragraph (2).

Paragraph (2) of the Article contains an additional broad reference to the law of personal security by stating that a third party security provider has as against the debtor the position of a provider of dependent security. In addition to IV.G.–2:113, which is applicable to the third party security provider already on the basis of the reference in IX.–6:106 paragraph (1), this allows the application of rules such as IV.G.–2:111 and IV.G.–2:112, in so far as applicable, as between the debtor and the provider of proprietary security.

CHAPTER 7: DEFAULT AND ENFORCEMENT

Section 1: General rules

IX.–7:101: Secured creditor's rights after default

(1) After an event of default, and provided that any additional conditions agreed by the parties are fulfilled, a secured creditor may exercise the rights under this Chapter.

(2) If a third person listed in IX.–3:101 (Effectiveness as against third persons) paragraph (1) and fulfilling the requirements of that provision is involved, a secured creditor may exercise the rights under this Chapter only if the security right is effective according to the rules of Book IX Chapter 3. If no such third person is involved, it is sufficient that the security right has been validly created. The provisions on priority remain unaffected.

COMMENTS

A. General remarks on Chapter 7

This Chapter is the important final piece of Book IX on proprietary security in movables. The Chapter deals only marginally with default, i.e. non-performance of the secured right, which in practice is mostly a right to payment (IX.–7:101). This is a matter of the law of obligations, especially of contract law. The emphasis is on the consequences which are triggered by a non-performance or, as it is customarily called in this field, a default of the debtor of the obligation covered by the security.

Extra-judicial and judicial enforcement. Rules on the substantive aspects of security in movables would be toothless, or would fail to achieve the goal of harmonising proprietary security in movable assets in Europe, if they left enforcement of those rights entirely to the – diverging – procedural laws and rules of the member states. On the other hand, these rules do not intend to cover judicial execution of proprietary security since this is a field essentially reserved to the member states.

Therefore, the rules in this Chapter essentially focus on a small sector of enforcement, namely extra-judicial enforcement. However, quite apart from the formal "jurisdictional" limitations which in the present project demand to be respected, there is also a valid substantive consideration which justifies this limitation. It appears that in many European countries there is an increasing movement seeking an alternative to the traditional method of enforcing security rights because of its delays, costs and often disappointing results.

It is therefore hoped that the rules of this Chapter may not only serve the immediate needs of Book IX, but may also be useful beyond.

Enforcement of security rights and of retention of ownership devices. It is remarkable that for enforcement – as for creation but not for the purposes of Chapters 3 to 6 – the basic difference between security rights and retention of ownership becomes visible and relevant again. The great majority of the rules on enforcement – even for extra-judicial enforcement – deal with the enforcement of security rights. The reason is obvious. The encumbered assets are owned by the security provider; the rights must be respected, even if – and especially if and because – enforcement involves the loss of the security provider's encumbered asset, fully or at the very least partly.

By contrast, the enforcement of a retention of ownership device is relatively easy. Basically, the secured creditor as owner merely needs to regain possession of the affected assets. Only possession had been transferred to the debtor, i.e. the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee. These persons have to return only possession of the goods which they had bought, hired or leased – in exchange for those payments which they had made to the owner of the assets which they had obtained with a view to future acquisition. It goes without saying that this mere return of possession of the other party's goods is less complicated than the recovery of assets that are already owned by their present possessors. If the buyer has obtained ownership under the suspensive condition of full payment in a sale under retention of ownership, this conditional ownership is automatically terminated if the seller terminates the buyer/seller relationship.

Mandatory rules. It goes without saying that the rules of this Chapter are mandatory, unless expressly provided otherwise (see IX.–7:102).

Special rules for consumer security providers. The rules of this Chapter also apply to enforcement of a security right against a consumer. There are, however, within this Chapter several exceptions where it is necessary to take into account the special condition of most consumers as debtors or as security providers.

By contrast, any national special rules that may exist for the enforcement of security for micro–credits, as circumscribed by IX.–1:105 paragraph (1), remain unaffected by the provisions of this Chapter.

B. Event of default

Paragraph (1) of the present Article refers to the event of default as the central requirement which triggers the availability of the rights and which is the starting point of the obligations under this Chapter in general. Before an event of default, the secured creditor only holds the collateral as security, but may not actually realise it in order to satisfy the obligations covered by the security right. (One exception to this rule is to be found in IX.–5:208).

The definition of the event of default in IX.–1:201 paragraph (5) refers to elements that are outside the scope of this Book. Primarily, it is the non-performance of the obligation covered by the security (IX.–1:201 paragraph (5)(a)) which is regarded as an event of default; the creation, conditions and maturity of this obligation and other elements of non-performance are subject to the rules applicable for the obligation concerned. Even if there is no non-performance of this obligation, the secured creditor may have agreed with the security provider on additional events or sets of circumstances which are to be regarded as default (IX.–1:201 paragraph (5)(b)), e.g. under a cross-default clause (see Comments on IX.–1:201 paragraph (5)).

C. Additional conditions agreed by the parties

While IX.–1:201 paragraph (5)(b) allows the parties to agree on additional events or sets of circumstances which shall be regarded as events of default, paragraph (1) of the present Article refers to additional conditions agreed by the parties. In other words, the security provider and the secured creditor may agree on additional requirements which must be fulfilled before the latter may exercise the rights under this Chapter. Examples of such additional conditions are time restrictions (i.e. if the rights under this Chapter may only be exercised before or after an agreed time) or a requirement that the secured creditor must have undertaken attempts to obtain satisfaction from the debtor, if the latter is not the security provider (for similar concepts in the context of personal security cf. IV.G.–2:108 and IV.G.–2:106).

D. Exercise of the rights under this Chapter

Paragraph (1) refers to the exercise of the rights under this Chapter in general. In other words, after default, the secured creditor may exercise all the rights of preservation and realisation and similar rights which are provided under this Chapter, whether in the course of judicial enforcement proceedings or without the assistance of a court or other competent authority. A default under a valid and effective security right will not suffice for all of these rules; as to these additional requirements for some of the rights of a secured creditor under this Chapter see the Comments on the relevant Articles.

E. Creation and effectiveness of security right

Paragraph (2) deals with the issue whether it is sufficient that the security right which is sought to be enforced has been validly created according to Chapter 2 (and not been terminated under Chapter 6) or whether a secured creditor may exercise the rights under this Chapter only if the security right is also effective according to Chapter 3. The answer depends upon whether third persons are involved (paragraph (2) sentence 1) or not (paragraph (2) sentence 2).

(a) Third persons involved: effectiveness required. IX.–7:101 paragraph (2) sentence 1 establishes the connection between the requirements for effectiveness against third parties under Chapter 3 and the present Chapter on the secured creditor's rights after default. According to this provision, if any third person listed in IX.–3:101 paragraph (1) is involved, a secured creditor may exercise the rights under this Chapter only if – in addition to having been validly created and not having been terminated – its security right is also effective according to the provisions of Chapter 3.

Third persons listed in IX.–3:101 paragraph (1) are involved in the following situations:

(i) whenever the secured creditor attempts to exercise the rights based upon a security right in an asset in which also other third parties (apart from the security provider itself, see (b) below) have a proprietary right, especially an effective security right (IX.–3:101 paragraph (1)(a));

(ii) where the secured creditor attempts to exercise the rights based upon a security right in an asset if another creditor has already started to bring execution against those assets and has obtained under the applicable law a position protecting it against a subsequent execution (IX.–3:101 paragraph (1)(b)); and

(iii) where the security provider is insolvent and a formal insolvency proceeding has been opened, so that the enforcement of a security right in the security provider's asset involves the insolvency administrator (IX.–3:101 paragraph (1)(c)).

If one of these third persons is involved and the qualifying facts are present, a secured creditor may not exercise rights as an enforcing secured creditor under this Chapter, unless its security right is effective.

However, even if the enforcing secured creditor's rights are effective, its chances of actually obtaining satisfaction will depend upon its priority position vis-à-vis any other secured creditors holding effective competing security rights (see paragraph (2) sentence 3). This issue must be solved by the criteria established in Chapter 4.

(b) No third persons involved: creation sufficient. If no third persons listed in IX.–3:101 paragraph (2) sentence 2 are involved it is sufficient that the enforcing secured creditor's security right has been validly created and has not already been terminated; it is not necessary that the requirements for effectiveness against third persons under Chapter 3 are fulfilled (IX.–7:101 paragraph (2) sentence 1). As long as no third person is involved, the secured creditor may therefore enforce its security right against the security provider even if this security right is not registered or the encumbered assets are not in the secured creditor's possession or control. Nor is the secured creditor in such situations limited to enforcing the obligation covered by the security right.

Neither is the effectiveness of the enforcing secured creditor's security right required where the only third persons involved are competing secured creditors whose security rights also are not effective. (Such holders of ineffective security rights are not covered by IX.–3:101 paragraph (1)(a)). It has to be pointed out, however, that if both the enforcing secured creditor's and the competing secured creditors' security rights are not effective, there is still the issue of priority between these security rights which is determined according to the order of their creation (see IX.–4:101 paragraph (4)).

IX.–7:102: Mandatory rules

As between the enforcing secured creditor and the security provider, the rules of this Chapter are mandatory, unless otherwise provided.

COMMENTS

This Article expressly spells out the mandatory nature of the rules of this Chapter.

While other Chapters of this Book – in line with the general approach of the DCFR – follow the principle of party autonomy, even though this Book covers matters of property law, the position must be different under this Chapter. In the context of the consequences of default, the different policies underlying the rules of this Chapter (especially the protection of the security provider and the general objective of ensuring the availability of efficient enforcement procedures) require that there is scope for a party agreement between the secured creditor and the security provider only if this is expressly so provided under this Chapter.

Such exceptions are to be found in a number of provisions of this Chapter. Partly, it is the security provider who may waive in an agreement with the secured creditor the protection to which the former would be entitled under the default provisions of this Chapter; partly it is the secured creditor who may agree to additional requirements or forms of enforcement which are more protective for the security provider.

This Article limits the possibility of agreements between the secured creditor and the security provider only; inter-creditor agreements, i.e. agreements between several secured creditors, are not prohibited by this Article.

IX.–7:103: Extra-judicial and judicial enforcement

(1) Unless otherwise agreed, the secured creditor may carry out extra-judicial enforcement of the security right.

(2) A security right in an asset of a consumer can only be enforced by a court or other competent authority, unless after default the consumer security provider has agreed to extra-judicial enforcement.

(3) In the case of retention of ownership devices the parties may not agree to exclude extra-judicial enforcement and paragraph (2) does not apply.

(4) Enforcement is to be undertaken by the secured creditor in a commercially reasonable way and as far as possible in cooperation with the security provider and, where applicable, any third person involved.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article deals with the main alternative with which the parties are confronted if a default occurs under these rules. Enforcement of a security right may either be undertaken by the secured creditor applying for enforcement by a court or other competent authority (judicial enforcement) or by the secured creditor taking enforcement into its own hands (extra-judicial enforcement). While the former method of enforcement is traditionally more accepted than the latter (mostly due to its perceived greater degree of protection of the security provider), it is extra-judicial enforcement which can be expected to operate in a faster and less costly way. For this reason it is the main rule under these Principles, unless consumer security providers are involved.

B. Extra-judicial enforcement

While traditionally extra-judicial enforcement tended to be allowed under national law only if specifically agreed by the parties, paragraph (1) of this Article allows enforcement proceedings to be undertaken by the secured creditor without any need for an agreement to this effect (unless the security provider is a consumer, see paragraph (2)). There is no right of extra-judicial enforcement, if the parties have agreed otherwise. The agreement can be made from the very beginning, e.g. in the contract for proprietary security; or it can be made later, before enforcement is commenced or even thereafter.

The policy behind the main rule is not adopted primarily to confer an advantage specifically upon the secured creditor. Since it is in the end the security provider who will – as against the secured creditor – have to bear the costs of enforcement proceedings, the security provider also has an interest in the reduction of the costs of realising the security right in the encumbered assets which is to be expected by allowing the secured creditor to undertake the enforcement itself.

At the same time, safeguards must exist which ensure that the gains in efficiency to be derived from extra-judicial enforcement do not come at the expense of a lack of protection of the security provider and other interested persons. Specific provisions ensure, e.g., that the security provider's assets are not sold at an undervalue or without the security provider and other interested parties being informed in due time. While these specific provisions are to be found in Subsections 1 and 2 of Section 2, paragraph (4) of the present Article contains the general principles that the secured creditor has to undertake enforcement as far as possible in cooperation with the security provider and in a commercially reasonable way. Extra-judicial enforcement may not be abused in order to harass the security provider; the security provider may not be burdened by the enforcement more than is necessary for the satisfaction of the secured creditor's secured rights; economic waste of the collateral must be avoided. The general duty of cooperation also extends to those cases where a third party is involved, especially where a right to payment is to be enforced which the security provider has against a third person.

Finally, the fact that the secured creditor may enforce its security right extra-judicially does not deprive the secured creditor of the possibility of invoking the assistance of a court or other competent authority under the following Article. It is unnecessary to say this expressly here as it follows in any event. The precise content of this assistance and the relevant procedural provisions are to be found in the applicable national law, i.e. the law of the member state where assistance of the court or other competent authority is sought.

C. Judicial enforcement

While it is always possible for the secured creditor to seek judicial enforcement, i.e. an enforcement of the security right through the courts or other competent authorities, paragraph (1) implies that the parties may agree on the exclusion of extra-judicial enforcement. If the security provider and the secured creditor have so agreed, enforcement of a security right may only be undertaken by a court or other competent authority. For some indications with respect to this form of enforcement, see Subsection 3 of Section 2.

D. Consumer security providers

For consumer security providers, the relationship between extra-judicial enforcement and judicial enforcement, which has been described in Comments B and C for security providers in general, is different. Extra-judicial enforcement of security rights against the assets of a consumer security provider is possible only if there is an agreement to this effect between the secured creditor and the consumer security provider; moreover, this agreement is effective only if concluded after default (paragraph (2).

The policy behind this preference for judicial enforcement against consumer security providers is the need for the protection of the latter. Typically being less experienced in matters of finance and security, consumer security providers are better protected if enforcement proceedings are in the hands of a court or other competent authority. On the other hand, non-judicial enforcement is less formal and therefore less expensive. This may be a reason even for a consumer to accept this procedure, at least in simple cases.

E. Retention of ownership devices

While the rules in paragraph (4) apply to retention of ownership devices as well (see the general rule in IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(d)), an exception must be made for the opening words of paragraph (1) (Unless otherwise agreed") and paragraph (2). According to Section 3, the holder of a retention of ownership device does not have to realise the collateral by sale or any other method; instead it is sufficient that the holder of a retention of ownership device terminates the legal relationship resulting from the underlying contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment with security purpose and takes back possession of the supplied goods. The holder of the retention of ownership device may, however, ask for the assistance of the court in obtaining possession of the supplied goods (see Comment B above and IX.–7:302 combined with IX.–7:203).

IX.–7:104: Right to seek court assistance and damages

Any party or third person whose rights are violated by enforcement measures or by resistance to justified enforcement measures may:

(a) call upon a competent court or other authority, which must decide expeditiously, to order the party responsible to act in accordance with the provisions of this Chapter; and
(b) claim damages from the party responsible.

COMMENTS

A. Violation of rights by enforcement measures or resistance

This Article contains a general statement of the remedies available if there is a violation of a person's rights by either unlawful enforcement measures or by a resistance to justified enforcement measures. Enforcement measures (or the resistance to them) may occur both in the context of judicial as well as extra-judicial enforcement proceedings. Concerning the latter, there is, however, also a more specific provision on the right to ask for the intervention of a court or other authority in IX.–7:203.

Protection under the present Article may be claimed by the secured creditor who may be affected by resistance to justified enforcement measures. Protection may also be invoked by the security provider and by any third person, i.e. other persons whose legally protected interests are affected by enforcement measures.

B. Right to call upon a competent court or other authority

Sub-paragraph (a) makes it clear that a person whose rights are violated by either unlawful enforcement measures or by resistance to justified enforcement measures always must have the right to call upon a competent court or other authority, in both judicial and extra-judicial enforcement, to order the party responsible to act in accordance with the provisions of this Chapter. The secured creditor may be ordered to stop its enforcement measures and the security provider or other holder of the encumbered asset may be ordered to stop its resistance.

Which court or other authority is competent to decide on the application of the person seeking assistance has to be determined by national law; the same applies to the rules of procedure of this court or other authority. The only slight intrusion into this field of procedural law provided by this Article is that the party whose rights are violated should have the possibility to make use of procedures which allow an expeditious decision.

C. Right to damages

The person whose rights are violated by either unlawful enforcement measures or by resistance to justified enforcement measures is under IX.–7:104 sub-paragraph (b) also entitled to claim damages from the party responsible, i.e. from the security provider or from the secured creditor, as the case may be. It should be noted that both parties are not only responsible for their own actions but may also be regarded as responsible for the actions of third persons acting on their behalf in relation to enforcement proceedings. The legal basis for the right to payment of damages is VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession); details are governed by the rules in Book VI.

IX.–7:105: Predefault agreement on appropriation of encumbered assets

(1) Any agreement concluded before default providing for the transfer of ownership of the encumbered assets to the secured creditor after default, or having this effect, is void.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply:

(a) if the encumbered asset is a fungible asset that is traded on a recognised market with published prices; or

(b) if the parties agree in advance on some other method which allows a ready determination of a reasonable market price.

(3) Paragraph (2)(b) does not apply to a consumer security provider.

(4) Where appropriation is allowed, the secured creditor is entitled to appropriate encumbered assets only for the value of their recognised or agreed market price at the date of appropriation. The security provider is entitled to any surplus over the obligations covered by the security right. The debtor remains liable for any deficit.

(5) This Article does not apply to retention of ownership devices.

COMMENTS

A. No predefault agreement on appropriation after default

The first paragraph of this Article contains the time-honoured and generally accepted principle that no agreement is effective that is concluded between the secured creditor and the security provider before default and that is intended to transfer (or would have the effect of transferring) ownership of the encumbered assets to the secured creditor, thereby depriving the security provider of its assets.

While paragraph (1) deals with such agreements on appropriation that would be effective after default, this issue is covered in relation to agreements that would be effective before default by IX.–5:101 paragraph (2). The policy behind both rules is identical; therefore, reference can be made to Comment B on IX.–5:101.

After default, the encumbered assets may be appropriated by the secured creditor under the conditions set out in IX.–7:216.

B. Exceptions – paragraph (2)

As in IX.–5:101 paragraph (2), the prohibition against agreements on appropriation concluded before default is also under the present Article subject to some exceptions that are expressly (and exhaustively) enumerated in paragraph (2).

First, the security provider may agree with the secured creditor before default on an appropriation that is to take effect after default if the encumbered asset is a fungible asset that is traded on a recognised market with published prices (paragraph (2)(a)). The policy behind this rule is that in such cases, e.g., where the encumbered assets are shares that are publicly traded on a stock exchange, there is less risk that the encumbered assets are appropriated by the secured creditor at an undervalue. If the secured creditor – in exchange for the acquisition of ownership of the encumbered assets – credits the security provider with the published market price of the collateral as of the date at which appropriation is to take effect (or accepts ownership of the encumbered assets in full or partial satisfaction of the obligation covered by the security, depending on the published market price of the encumbered assets), no disadvantage is caused to the security provider.

The second situation where a pre-default agreement on the appropriation of the encumbered assets after default is allowed is where the parties agree in advance on any other method which allows a ready determination of a reasonable market price (paragraph (2)(b)). Again, the decisive element of this exception is that – even though there might be no published market price for the encumbered asset – there is another possibility which allows the determination of the value of the collateral so that the security provider is protected against the loss of its assets at an undervalue. One example of such a situation could be where the secured creditor and the security provider agree that for an encumbered used car the prices listed in a specific used car guide will be decisive.

C. Consumer security providers

Consumer security providers are only partly exempted from the possibility of agreeing on the appropriation of the encumbered assets. If the encumbered asset is a fungible asset that is traded on a recognised market with published prices, a consumer security provider may agree with the secured creditor before default on an appropriation of the encumbered assets that is to take effect after default. In substance, this position resembles the situation concerning appropriation that is to take effect before default. A bank holding as secured creditor the security provider's encumbered financial assets, i.e. the typical example of fungible assets traded on a recognised market with published prices, may appropriate these assets before default even if the security provider is a consumer (no consumer protection exception is included in IX.–5:207).

The broader exception to the prohibition of agreements on appropriation of the encumbered assets under paragraph (2)(b) of the present Article, however, does not apply to consumer security providers (see paragraph (3)). Since consumer security providers typically are not experienced in financial matters, they will often be unable to make an informed decision concerning any method for the determination of the value of the encumbered assets.

D. Valuation of appropriated asset

An important aspect of appropriation is the valuation of the appropriated asset. Only a valuation according to an objective yardstick avoids the risk that the security provider may be disadvantaged.

The yardsticks are set out in paragraph (2). The common denominator of the two methods set out in (a) and (b) is that both look at objective yardsticks. Sub-paragraph (a) refers to a recognised market with published prices. The "recognition" of the market may be an official one, e.g. by some authority, or one that is rooted in general public opinion. Moreover, published prices are a certain guarantee of general public control. Sub-paragraph (b) establishes a somewhat lower demand; however, where the conditions of sub-paragraph (a) are not available, a method allowing the determination of a "reasonable market price" is the only reasonable alternative. However, due to this lower degree of objective certainty, a strict and narrow interpretation of this criterion is called for.

E. Retention of ownership devices

It goes almost without saying that IX.–7:105 cannot apply to retention of ownership devices since in these cases the secured creditor already is and remains the owner.

IX.–7:106: Security provider's right of redemption

(1) Even after default, if the outstanding amount of the obligation covered by the security right is paid, the security provider may require the secured creditor to terminate the exercise of the rights under this Chapter and to return possession of the encumbered asset.

(2) The security provider's rights under paragraph (1) may no longer be exercised if:

(a) in the case of an enforcement under Section 2, the encumbered asset has been appropriated or sold or the secured creditor has concluded a binding contract to sell the asset to a third person; or

(b) in the case of exercising the rights under Section 3, the holder of the retention of ownership device has terminated the relationship arising under the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment.

COMMENTS

A. Security provider's right of redemption (paragraph (1))

The security provider may at any time after maturity of the obligation covered by the security and also after the secured creditor has commenced enforcement pay the outstanding amount of its obligation to the secured creditor. The main issue dealt with in this Article is whether and until when payment by the security provider has the effect that the secured creditor must stop enforcement proceedings and return possession of the encumbered assets.

This right to redeem is spelt out by paragraph (1). If the security provider fully satisfies the obligation covered by the security (partial payment not being sufficient), the secured creditor may no longer exercise the rights under this Chapter, i.e. the secured creditor must return possession of the encumbered assets to the security provider and may no longer continue enforcement proceedings. This includes, e.g., the cancellation of planned auctions of the encumbered assets and the termination of any agreement to lease the encumbered asset to a third party according to Book IV.B. for the purposes of generating income. If, however, the secured creditor has already sold the encumbered asset or is bound by a contract to sell, paragraph (2)(a) applies and the security provider's right under paragraph (1) may no longer be exercised.

The basis of the security provider's right to redeem under these rules is the following. If the security provider satisfies the obligation secured by a security right by payment, the security right is terminated (IX.–6:101). The secured creditor thus loses its position and is no longer entitled to exercise the rights under this Chapter. The results are similar for retention of ownership devices, even though in this context traditionally a different terminology and legal technique is applied. In case of a sale under a retention of ownership clause, the seller usually transfers its ownership under the suspensive condition of full payment of the purchase price. Once this price is paid, the buyer becomes unconditional owner and the seller has no longer any rights in the sold asset. If this abbreviated route has not been used, the seller is obliged to transfer the ownership which it had retained to the buyer.

B. Limitations of the right to redeem (paragraph (2))

Paragraph (2) contains limitations of the right to redeem. The mere fact that the secured creditor has commenced enforcement proceedings under this Chapter does not have the effect that the security provider may no longer demand return of the encumbered assets after full payment of the obligation covered by the security right. However, once the secured creditor has in the course of the exercise of the rights under this Chapter undertaken the steps enumerated in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b), the security provider will not obtain the collateral back, even if the security provider subsequently pays the obligation covered by the security.

Sub-paragraph (a) covers situations where the encumbered asset has been appropriated or sold by the secured creditor or where the latter is bound by an agreement to sell the encumbered asset to a third party. Typically the fulfilment of these conditions will go hand in hand with a satisfaction of the secured right – and the extinction of the obligation covered by the security – from the proceeds of the sale (or on the basis of the fact that the secured creditor in the case of an appropriation of the encumbered assets according to IX.–7:105 accepts them in full or partial extinction of the obligation covered by the security right). If this obligation has already been extinguished following the realisation of the encumbered assets, a subsequent payment by the security provider can no longer have any of the effects described in comment A. Sub-paragraph (a) clarifies this position by expressly providing that the security provider's rights under paragraph (1) may no longer be exercised once the encumbered asset has been appropriated or sold by the secured creditor or once the latter is under an unconditional obligation to sell the asset to a third party. On the basis of this express provision, it is also made clear that it is irrelevant whether the secured creditor has already received proceeds from the realisation of the encumbered asset; the security provider's right of redemption therefore is lost even if the obligation covered by the security right might not yet be extinguished.

The policy behind this rule is obvious. If the secured creditor has already disposed of the encumbered asset, appropriated it or has at least undertaken a commitment to sell the encumbered asset, the secured creditor would at least potentially be put at a severe disadvantage if it was still under an obligation to return possession of the encumbered asset to the security provider after payment by the latter. Obviously, however, the secured creditor may not keep both the proceeds from the realisation of the collateral and the payment from the security provider, if the total amount exceeds the amount or value of the obligation covered by the security. The secured creditor's liability for restitution of the overpayment by the security provider is, however, outside the scope of these rules on proprietary security, see instead Book VII on Unjustified Enrichment.

Sub-paragraph (b) deals with retention of ownership devices. After default, the holder of such a legal instrument only needs to terminate the relationship arising from the underlying contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment in order to reclaim possession of the supplied assets without any need for additional enforcement measures, e.g., an appropriation in the normal sense or a sale of the assets concerned. Therefore, sub-paragraph (a) cannot apply in this context. Instead, sub-paragraph (b) provides that in such situations it is the termination of the relationship arising from the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment which marks the end of the buyer's, hire-purchaser's, lessee's or consignee's rights according to paragraph (1). Once this relationship has been terminated, the buyer's, hire-purchaser's, lessee's or consignee's outstanding obligations come to an end (III.–3:509 paragraph (1)); performance of these obligations is no longer possible and the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee is no longer entitled to possession of the supplied assets vis-à-vis the seller, supplier or lessor.

IX.–7:107: Enforcement notice to consumer

(1) A secured creditor may exercise the rights under this Chapter against a consumer security provider only if the secured creditor delivers at least ten days before enforcement is to begin an enforcement notice in textual form to the security provider and, if the latter is not the debtor, also to the debtor, if the debtor also is a consumer.

(2) The enforcement notice must:

(a) unequivocally designate the obligation covered by the security right and state the amount that is due by the end of the day before the notice is sent;

(b) state that any other condition for enforcement agreed by the parties has been fulfilled;

(c) state that the secured creditor intends to enforce the security and identify those encumbered assets against which the secured creditor intends to enforce it; and

(d) be signed by or on behalf of the secured creditor.

(3) The notice must be in an official language of the consumer's place of residence.

COMMENTS

A. Brief survey of rules on notices

This Chapter provides for a number of different notices to be given by the secured creditor. In order to aid understanding, the following paragraphs present a short survey of these notices, apart from the enforcement notice to a consumer security provider as regulated by the present Article.

Other notices must be given at the following occasions:

- A third party debtor has to be notified where a security right in a right to payment is to be enforced. The third party debtor has to be informed about the fact that its obligation is to be paid to another person instead of the original creditor (IX.–7:204).

- A notice of extra-judicial disposition has to be given before the secured creditor is allowed to dispose of the encumbered asset (IX.–7:208 to IX.–7:210).

- If the secured creditor intends to appropriate the encumbered assets it must give advance notice of this intention (IX.–7:216).

B. Enforcement notice to consumer security provider

The enforcement notice according to IX.–7:107 must be given in every case in which a secured creditor intends to exercise the rights under this Chapter against a consumer security provider. This notice is intended as a warning that the secured creditor is about to commence enforcement. Depending on the type of realisation chosen by the secured creditor, additional notices may also be necessary (cf. the survey in Comment A) in the case of a consumer security provider, effectively giving the latter a second warning. Ten days before any enforcement measure under this Chapter may be undertaken (including protective measures of realisation), such a notice must be delivered by the secured creditor to the consumer security provider. In this way, the consumer security provider has an additional ten days time for payment of the obligation secured by the security in order to avoid enforcement against his or her assets.

Addressees. If the security provider is a consumer, an enforcement notice must be sent to this person. If the security provider is not identical with the debtor and the latter is a consumer, this person must also receive an enforcement notice. If, on the contrary, only the debtor is a consumer, but not the third party security provider, there is no need for an enforcement notice under this Article.

In the case of an enforcement with respect to a right to payment held by the consumer security provider, the third party debtor must receive a copy of the enforcement notice as well (see IX.–7:204 paragraph (1)(a) no. (i)); this information to be given to the third party debtor, however, is not in itself subject to the rules of the present Article and need not be given ten days before the secured creditor may commence enforcement.

Time of notice. The notice must be delivered to its addressees at least ten days before enforcement is to begin. It is the time at which the notice reaches its addressees which is decisive, not the time at which it is sent by the secured creditor.

Indication of secured obligation. According to paragraph (2)(a) the secured creditor has to make several statements concerning the secured obligation. The objective of these requirements is to provide information to the consumer security provider. The latter should be enabled to evaluate whether there is any merit in the secured creditor's claim to be entitled to enforcement into the consumer security provider's assets.

Indication of agreed conditions for enforcement. Paragraph (2)(b) requires that the secured creditor states in the enforcement notice that any condition for enforcement that may have been agreed by the parties (see IX.–7:101 paragraph (1)) has been fulfilled.

Intention of enforcement and indication of collateral. Concerning the information required by paragraph (2)(c), it is the function of the enforcement notice as a last warning for the consumer security provider which justifies the imposition of this requirement. The consumer security provider must be informed that the secured creditor actually intends to commence enforcement proceedings and against which of the security provider's assets encumbered in favour of the secured creditor the security right is to be enforced.

Textual form and signature. The enforcement notice must be in textual form (paragraph (1)) and must be signed by the secured creditor or on its behalf (paragraph (2)(d)). These requirements serve purposes of proof and also strengthen the warning function of the enforcement notice.

Language. Paragraph (3) provides that the notice must be in an official language of the consumer's place of residence. This requirement can be expected to provide the highest level of protection for consumers, even if the member state where their place of residence is located has several official languages for different regions.

C. Retention of ownership devices

The requirements described in Comment B also apply to the exercise of the rights of which the holder of a retention of ownership device disposes (IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)(d)). Where goods have been supplied under a retention of ownership device to a consumer buyer, hire-purchaser or lessee, the holder of the retention of ownership device, i.e. the seller, supplier or lessor, therefore may terminate the relationship arising from the contract of sale, hire-purchase or financial leasing and claim back its goods only if the consumer buyer, hire-purchaser or lessee has received an enforcement notice by the holder of the retention of ownership device ten days before the exercise of the rights under IX.–7:301. Also in this situation, the consumer is to have an additional last chance to pay the outstanding amounts to the seller, supplier or lessor.

D. Security provider's remedies

If the secured creditor fails to comply with the requirements for the enforcement notice according to this Article, or if the secured creditor commences enforcement against a consumer security provider without having given such a notice or without ten days having passed between the delivery of the notice and the commencement of enforcement, the security provider is entitled to the remedies stated in IX.–7:104. The security provider may call upon a competent court or other authority in order to obtain an injunction preventing the secured creditor from proceeding with enforcement under this Chapter without giving a proper enforcement notice; in addition or alternatively, the security provider may claim damages.

Should the secured creditor already have disposed of the encumbered asset, however, the position of the third party transferee is not affected by any failure of the secured creditor to comply with the requirements of this Article (see IX.–7:213). The security provider may only exercise remedies against the secured creditor.

In the case of a retention of ownership device, the consumer buyer, hire-purchaser or lessee of the supplied assets is entitled to the same remedies as the security provider under a security right.

IX.–7:108: Solidary liability of several security providers

(1) To the extent that several proprietary security rights have been created covering the same obligation or the same part of an obligation, the creditor may seek satisfaction from any, several or all of these security rights. IV.G.–1:105 (Several security providers: solidary liability towards creditor) applies accordingly.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies with appropriate adaptations if, in addition to one or more proprietary security rights, personal security has been granted by one or more persons.

COMMENTS

A. Solidary proprietary liability

This Article is modelled on IV.G.–1:105, as the express reference to that provision indicates. It transposes the general rule to which it refers to the special case that several proprietary security rights have been created as security for the same obligation (or the same part of an obligation). The underlying factual situation may be that apart from the debtor one or more other persons (or only several persons other than the debtor) have created proprietary security rights for the same (part of an) obligation. Alternatively, only several persons, but not the debtor, may have granted security rights for the same obligation (or part of it). In all such cases, the secured creditor may proceed – according to choice – against one, several or all of these security providers. Their proprietary liabilities are solidary.

B. Solidary mixed proprietary and personal liability

The basic rules of IV.G.–1:105 also apply if there is a combination of one or more proprietary security(ies) with one or more personal security(ies), cf. IV.G.–1:105 paragraph (2).

IX.–7:109: Rights of recourse of third party security provider

If the obligation covered by the security right is satisfied by enforcement against the assets of a security provider who is not the debtor, the rights of recourse between several providers of proprietary security or between providers of proprietary security and personal security as well as recourse against the debtor are governed by IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance), IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) and IV.G.–1:107 (Several security providers: recourse against debtor), applied with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

This Article covers the rights of recourse that arise if an obligation covered by a security right is satisfied by enforcement against the assets of a security provider who is not the debtor, but a third party security provider. The effect of the references in the Article to Book IV.G. is that the rights of recourse are the same as for providers of personal security.

A third party security provider may have recourse against the debtor (see the reference to IV.G.–2:113). If there are several providers of proprietary security or both providers of personal and of proprietary security, the third party security provider(s) against whose assets the secured creditor had enforced the security right may also seek internal recourse from the security providers who are solidarily liable according to the preceding Article.

Section 2: Enforcement of security rights

Subsection 1: Extra-judicial enforcement: rules preparatory to realisation

IX.–7:201: Creditor's right to possession of corporeal asset

(1) The secured creditor is not entitled to take possession of an encumbered corporeal asset, unless:

(a) the security provider consents at the time when the secured creditor exercises this right; or

(b) the security provider had agreed to the secured creditor's right to take possession and neither the security provider nor the actual holder objects at the time when the secured creditor exercises this right.

(2) In enforcements against a consumer, the right to take possession according to paragraph (1) does not arise until ten days have elapsed since an enforcement notice has been served.

(3) Unless it indicates otherwise, a consent or agreement to the taking of possession according to paragraph (1) covers the right to enter the security provider's or other holder's premises for the purpose of exercising the right to take possession.

COMMENTS

A. Scope of application of Section 2

Section 2 deals, as its title indicates, only with the enforcement of security rights. It does not apply to the "enforcement" of retention of ownership devices; this topic is dealt with separately in Section 3. However, some of the rules in Section 3 refer back to rules in Section 2.

Where an owner exceptionally has transferred ownership to a buyer and merely retained a security right securing the seller's right to payment of the (remaining) purchase price, the rules of Section 2 apply. Due to the transfer of ownership to the buyer the seller is in the same position as any other security provider who has granted a security right to a secured creditor. The former owner has merely retained the position of a secured creditor.

B. Summary of contents of Section 2

Section 2 deals broadly with extra-judicial and briefly also with judicial enforcement of security rights. The two first Subsections of Section 2 are devoted to extra-judicial enforcement. Subsection 1 deals essentially with the means by which the secured creditor may enforce the right to take possession of the encumbered corporeal assets or at least to immobilise them as well as with the creditor's right to preserve them. The second topic covered is the "freezing" of rights for the payment of money, whether or not embodied in negotiable instruments. Subsection 2 is entirely devoted to the realisation of the encumbered assets. Subsection 3 contains a single Article only. It covers judicial enforcement by merely referring to national procedural law. This reference is supplemented by enumerating a few substantive rules contained in the preceding Subsections on extra-judicial enforcement.

C. Scope of Article and issue at stake

The present Article applies only to corporeal encumbered assets and more precisely only to those corporeal assets which the secured creditor does not already hold in its possession. In other words, the rule applies to the practically most important category of non-possessory security rights in corporeal assets. In order to remove this kind of asset from the reach of the security provider and avoid the risk of unjustified dispositions, obtaining possession is of primary importance as a first step towards realisation.

The dilemma for the secured creditor arises if, as happens frequently, the security provider who is in possession of the encumbered assets and who may need them urgently for the continuation of its production or sales or other commercial activity, refuses or attempts to delay the transfer of possession. This Article is designed to solve this dilemma. Without saying so expressly, self-help by the secured creditor is clearly excluded.

Enforcement of a security right in a negotiable instrument and a negotiable document is also subject to this and the next two Articles.

D. Solutions

The rules of the Article proceed on the basis that the secured creditor may proceed against a holder of the encumbered assets only in a peaceful way. Therefore, the latter's present or a past consent is necessary.

Paragraph (1)(a) allows the secured creditor to proceed when the security provider agrees to the taking of possession by the secured creditor at the time of the demand for possession.

Sub-paragraph (b) deals with the situation where after a preceding agreement (especially in the contract for proprietary security concluded by the parties) the "actual holder" does not object when the secured creditor requires handing over or unilaterally takes possession of the assets. Even without a consent at the time possession is taken by the secured creditor, the actual holder, who need not be the original security provider, is bound by its own or by the original security provider's former agreement.

Paragraph (2) increases the requirements for enforcement against a consumer security provider or consumer holder of an encumbered asset: the secured creditor's right to demand possession of the encumbered assets arises only if at least ten days have passed since service of a formal enforcement notice according to IX.–7:107 . In addition, paragraph (1) remains applicable.

This rule also applies if the first security provider had sold or otherwise disposed of the encumbered asset: if the encumbrance had remained effective, the present holder who has acquired the encumbered asset is now regarded as the security provider.

Paragraph (3) extends the security provider's consent according to paragraph (1). Unless it indicates otherwise, such consent is regarded as covering also consent to the secured creditor entering the premises (e.g. the house, business premises or factory) of the security provider or of a third person holding the encumbered assets for the security provider.

IX.–7:202: Creditor's right to immobilise and to preserve encumbered asset

(1) The secured creditor is entitled to take any steps necessary to immobilise the encumbered asset, to prevent unauthorised use or disposition of it, and to protect it physically. Paragraphs (1) to (3) of the preceding Article apply with appropriate adaptations.

(2) The secured creditor is entitled:

(a) to take reasonable steps to preserve, maintain and insure the encumbered asset and to obtain reimbursement for such actions from the security provider;

(b) to lease the encumbered asset to a third party for the purpose of preserving its value; or

(c) to take any other protective measures agreed with the security provider.

COMMENTS

General. This Article deals with alternatives to the preceding provision on the creditor's right to obtain possession of the encumbered corporeal asset. There may be objective or subjective reasons for the secured creditor not to wish to obtain possession of the encumbered assets. These may physically be too big or too heavy to be easily moved. Or the secured creditor may have subjective reasons for not moving the encumbered assets, such as the discomfort of moving the assets or excessive expenses for moving or preserving the asset.

Paragraph (1). Paragraph (1) mentions some measures which the secured creditor may wish to undertake to secure the collateral, if it is not taken back. This list is merely illustrative and is intended to assist the creditor in arriving at an informed decision. The reference to paragraphs (1) to (3) of the preceding Article is intended to ensure respect for the agreement of the security provider to all steps that are necessary to obtain access to the encumbered assets held by the security provider.

Paragraph (2) exemplifies some of the major alternatives between which the secured creditor may choose for its protection. Since such steps are also taken in the security provider's interest in its assets, it is only reasonable that the latter is to bear the expenses that will be incurred.

Another option for the parties is to lease the encumbered asset to a third party (see Book IV.B.). At this point there is no intention to gain a profit for the secured creditor by leasing (such as in the case envisaged by IX.–7:207 paragraph (1)(b)). Rather, the lease is for the purpose of preserving the value of the encumbered asset. Typical cases were formerly horses which had to be exercised, lest their health suffered. Today, similar considerations may apply to certain technical equipment.

Negotiable instrument. Although this Article applies to the enforcement of security rights in rights embodied in a negotiable instrument (see IX.–7:205 (Negotiable instrument)), the physical difficulties addressed by it will hardly ever arise in the case of a negotiable instrument. Therefore the Article will hardly ever become an issue for this kind of encumbered asset.

IX.–7:203: Intervention of court or other authority

(1) The secured creditor may apply to the competent court or other authority for an order to obtain possession of or access to the encumbered asset, if the security provider or a third person in possession of the asset refuses delivery to or access by the secured creditor.

(2) Upon application by either party, a court or other authority may order the taking of any of the protective measures mentioned in the preceding Article.

COMMENTS

The two preceding Articles deal with extra-judicial enforcement which is based upon an agreement of the parties. However, if there is a deadlock because the parties cannot reach an agreement, a secured creditor is entitled to an ultimate remedy by calling upon a court or another competent authority.

The first paragraph of the present Article envisages court intervention, where necessary, in order to vindicate the secured creditor's rights of access to, and taking away of, the encumbered assets according to IX.–7:201.

By contrast, the second paragraph, by allowing the imposition of protective measures, is geared towards IX.–7:202.

IX.–7:204: Encumbrance of a right to payment

(1) Where the encumbered asset is a right entitling the security provider to payment from a third party debtor, the secured creditor may exercise the rights under this Chapter only if the secured creditor:

(a) sends to the third party debtor:

(i) where the security provider is a consumer, a copy of an enforcement notice complying with all the requirements of IX.–7:107 (Enforcement notice to consumer); and

(ii) in other cases, an enforcement notice complying with paragraph (2)(a) and (d) of that Article; and

(b) informs the third party debtor as precisely as possible in the circumstances of the nature, amount and maturity of the security provider's right to payment against the third party debtor.

(2) The third party debtor is obliged to inform the enforcing secured creditor about the amount and maturity of competing rights of other secured creditors known to the third party debtor.

COMMENTS

Introductory remark. This Article deals with the enforcement of a security over a very important economic asset. Money is the most liquid asset and for this reason much more preferred and useful than the great variety of corporeal assets which, more often than not, have to be converted to money by selling them. This difference is vividly reflected by contrasting the short rule on the collection of a right to payment (IX.–7:214) with the complicated rules on realisation of encumbered corporeals (IX.–7:207 to IX.–7:213).

A slight price, though, must be paid in order to benefit from an enforcement in a right to payment, as the rules of the present Article show.

It should be noted that this Article does not apply to negotiable instruments (cf. IX.–7:205 second sentence).

Paragraph (1) deals with the essential peculiarities distinguishing enforcement against a right to payment from enforcement against corporeal assets. The object of enforcement against a right to payment is not a physical object held by the creditor of this right to payment as security provider, but a value located in a relationship between the security provider and the latter's debtor, i.e. the third party debtor.

The introductory half-sentence states the elements of the factual situation covered. The object of encumbrance and therefore of the enforcement is a right to payment of the security provider against a third party debtor. Its essential elements are binding upon the enforcing creditor.

Sub-paragraph (a) requires the enforcing secured creditor to convey to the enforcement debtor one of two kinds of document, depending on whether the holder of the right to payment, against which enforcement is brought, i.e. the security provider, is a consumer or not.

If the holder of the right to payment (the security provider) is a consumer, the enforcing secured creditor is already required by virtue of IX.–7:107 to send before commencement of enforcement to the consumer an enforcement notice (sub-paragraph (a)(i)). In this case, the enforcing creditor has to send a copy of this enforcement notice to the third party debtor.

If the holder of the right to payment (the security provider) is not a consumer, the creditor is required to send to the third party debtor an enforcement notice that must comply with some, but not all of the requirements of IX.–7:107 paragraph (2). The application of the requirements established by sub-paragraphs. (a) and (d) of that paragraph does not require justification or explanation.

In addition, according to sub-paragraph (b) the security provider's right to payment against which the enforcing creditor intends to bring execution must be identified as clearly as "possible in the circumstances." This requirement obviously is a compromise. On the one hand, the third party debtor must know which of possibly many (in the case of a business, possibly thousands) of its obligations owed to third parties the execution creditor's enforcement aims at; on the other hand, the enforcing creditor does not know the security provider's books and therefore would have difficulty in fully specifying the intended right to payment. The minimum information that must be required is the name of the security provider.

Paragraph (2) obliges the third party debtor to inform the enforcing secured creditor about the amount and maturity of competing rights of other secured creditors known to the third party debtor. The information about other competing secured creditors, including details about the amounts of the secured rights and their maturity, is relevant for the secured creditor in order to estimate the existence and especially the value of prior ranking rights of competing creditors. Since prior ranking rights precede, the remaining economic value of the right to payment may determine the factual value of the right to payment covered by the security right.

Any wrong information intentionally or negligently provided by the third party debtor will give rise to a right to payment of damages according to VI.–1:101 paragraph (1).

IX.–7:205: Negotiable instrument

(1) IX.–7:201 (Creditor's right to possession of corporeal asset), IX.–7:202 (Creditor's right to immobilise and to preserve encumbered asset) and IX.–7:203 (Intervention of court or other authority) apply to the taking of possession of a negotiable instrument as such.

(2) IX.–7:204 (Encumbrance of a right to payment) does not apply to negotiable instruments.

COMMENTS

This provision deals with the enforcement of a security right established in a negotiable instrument. Two phases of enforcement have to be distinguished:

In the first phase, which is addressed by paragraph (1), the apprehension of the negotiable instrument as a document is at issue. This route is dictated by the fact that the enforcing creditor's access to the right to payment incorporated in the instrument is only possible via the instrument. Since the negotiable instrument is a corporeal, the rules dealing with the apprehension of general corporeals in IX.–7:201 and IX.–7:203 apply. IX.–7:202 will hardly ever become relevant since the handing over of only a document is at issue; therefore the special reasons that may motivate a secured creditor to immobilise and preserve encumbered assets in the hands of the security provider usually will not be present.

In the second phase, the enforcement of the rights embodied in the negotiable instrument by the secured creditor is at issue. Here, the general rules on enforcement of a security right in a right to payment apply (IX.–7:214). However, there is less protection for the rights of the third-party debtor: paragraph (2) of the Article disapplies the provisions of the preceding Article.

IX.–7:206: Negotiable document of title

The preceding Article applies also to the taking of possession of a negotiable document of title.

COMMENTS

This Article deals with the enforcement of a security right in a document of title. The issues and their solutions closely resemble those with respect to the enforcement of a security right in a negotiable instrument. This justifies the application of the provisions of the preceding Article.

Subsection 2: Extra-judicial enforcement: realisation of encumbered asset

IX.–7:207: General rule on realisation

(1) The secured creditor is entitled to realise the encumbered asset in order to apply the proceeds towards satisfaction of the secured right:

(a) by sale of the encumbered asset according to IX.–7:211 (Sale by public or private auction or by private sale), unless agreed otherwise by the parties;

(b) by leasing the encumbered asset to a third person and collecting the fruits;

(c) by appropriation according to IX.–7:216 (Appropriation of encumbered asset by secured creditor); or

(d) by exercising the methods of realisation (collection, sale or appropriation) for rights to payment and negotiable instruments according to IX.–7:214 (Realisation of security in right to payment or in negotiable instrument).

(2) Where an enforcement notice is required under IX.–7:107 (Enforcement notice to consumer), paragraph (1) applies only if ten days have elapsed since the delivery of that notice.

(3) The secured creditor may appoint a private agent or apply to a competent court officer to undertake all or some of the steps for realisation of the encumbered assets.

COMMENTS

A. General

The provisions on the extra-judicial enforcement of security rights in Section 2 of Chapter 7 are divided into two Subsections. Subsection 1 deals with protective measures. Obtaining possession of the encumbered assets or immobilising them and notifications to the security provider and third persons. All these steps precede realisation, Subsection 2 covers the actual realisation of the encumbered assets and includes rules on the different possibilities for realisation as well as their conditions and consequences.

B. Realisation of encumbered asset

Introductory remark. In general, the realisation of the encumbered asset is the process by virtue of which the enforcing secured creditor on the basis of its proprietary right in these assets uses them or the income to be derived from them in order to obtain satisfaction of the secured right.

The method by which the secured creditor may obtain satisfaction by virtue of the realisation depends upon the method of realisation chosen. If the collateral is appropriated by the secured creditor, ownership of the encumbered asset itself is accepted in (partial) satisfaction of the secured right or the security provider is credited with the value of the assets (this credit would be set off against the obligation covered by the security). If money is received by the secured creditor (by virtue of a sale of the collateral, of a collection of an encumbered right to payment or by leasing the collateral to a third party according to Book IV.B.), these payments may be accepted by the secured creditor in satisfaction of the secured right. Any surplus is to be distributed according to the principles laid down in IX.–7:215.

Paragraph (1) of the present Article enumerates the four main methods of realisation which are recognised under these rules. For most of these methods of realisation, paragraph (1) merely refers to the specific relevant provisions; however, there are also some substantive rules in this paragraph.

Sale of the encumbered assets. The most important method of realisation is the sale of the encumbered assets, which is dealt with in IX.–7:211. Paragraph (1)(a) of the present Article provides that the secured creditor has in every case of an extra-judicial enforcement at least the possibility of a sale of the encumbered asset; this method of realisation is excluded only if so agreed by the parties. However, this does not necessarily mean that the secured creditor is able to exercise every possible method of a sale under these rules if there is no agreement to this effect. A realisation of the encumbered asset by sale may be by public or private auction or by a private sale of the collateral. The latter possibility, however, is open to the secured creditor only if this has been agreed by the parties or if there is a published market price for the collateral (see IX.–7:211 paragraph (2)).

Should the parties, i.e. the secured creditor and the security provider, have agreed on an exclusion of the secured creditor's right to sell the encumbered asset, then the secured creditor may still exercise the other options for a realisation of the collateral enumerated in this Article. Moreover, the secured creditor is of course free to apply for judicial enforcement in the course of which there may be a sale of the encumbered asset administered by the court or other competent authority.

Leasing the encumbered assets. While IX.–7:202 paragraph (2)(b) covers the secured creditor's right to lease the encumbered assets to a third person according to Book IV.B. for the purpose of the preservation of their value, paragraph (1)(b) of the present Article provides that the secured creditor may also lease the encumbered assets in order to generate income. Before default, a similar possibility exists for the secured creditor under IX.–5:208. Paragraph (1)(b), however, goes beyond the scope of that provision by allowing the secured creditor to lease the encumbered assets to a third person after default even if the security right has not been extended to civil fruits of the assets that were originally encumbered.

The realisation of the encumbered assets by leasing them to a third person is a rather simple process which – unlike the other methods of realisation under this Subsection – does not necessitate any additional specific provisions. The main elements of this type of realisation are the following.

Contrary to the other methods of realisation, leasing the encumbered assets to a third person does not require a previous notice of extra-judicial disposition (IX.–7:208) or advance notice of acquisition (IX.–7:216). No equivalent notice would be required under IX.–7:202 paragraph (2)(b) and since it will often be difficult to decide whether the preservation of the encumbered asset or the generation of income is the main purpose of leasing the encumbered asset to a third person, there should not be different requirements of notice. Moreover, leasing the encumbered asset to a third person does not lead to a permanent and irreversible loss of the security provider's rights so that there is less need for a notice in these situations than in cases of a sale or appropriation of the encumbered assets where an advance notice is required. If the security provider is a consumer, however, the rights to lease the encumbered asset may be exercised by the secured creditor only if a notice had been given to the consumer security provider according to IX.–7:107.

Even though there is no specific provision equivalent to the requirement of a commercially reasonable price according to IX.–7:212 that would be applicable where the secured creditor realises the encumbered assets by leasing them to third persons, similar principles are applicable on the basis of the general rule in IX.–7:103 paragraph (4). Extra-judicial enforcement (including realisation by leasing the collateral to a third person) must be undertaken in a commercially reasonable way, i.e. the secured creditor must not lease the collateral at an undervalue and the preservation of the encumbered assets must be ensured.

Civil fruits derived by this method of realisation, i.e. the payments of rent, may be directly applied by the enforcing secured creditor to the satisfaction of the secured right; any surplus must of course be paid out to the security provider. Other secured creditors are not affected; their rights in the encumbered assets are not lost by reason of the encumbered assets being leased to a third party.

Appropriation. Thirdly, paragraph (1)(c) mentions the possibility of realising the encumbered asset by appropriation according to IX.–7:216. This method of appropriation, which is arranged after default, must be distinguished from a predefault agreement on appropriation which is generally prohibited by IX.–7:105 paragraph (1) (subject to the exceptions laid down in paragraph (2) of that provision). A number of safeguards which are contained in IX.–7:216 ensure that the risks normally connected with a predefault agreement on appropriation are avoided.

Collection of an encumbered right to payment. Finally, paragraph (1)(d) provides that for rights to payment, realisation may be by all the three methods mentioned in IX.–7:214. While sale and appropriation apply to encumbered rights to payment as for other encumbered assets, there is also an additional method of realisation. Collection, i.e. obtaining payment from the third party debtor, will be the usual method of realisation of a security right in a right to payment.

C. Enforcement notice against consumer security provider

For clarification purposes, paragraph (2) reiterates the principle already stated in IX.–7:107 paragraph (1) that enforcement against a consumer security provider is possible only if the secured creditor has delivered an enforcement notice ten days before enforcement is to commence. For the details of this notice and the consequences of a failure to comply with this requirement of an enforcement notice, see the Comments B and D on IX.–7:107.

D. Appointment of private agent or application to court officer

Paragraph (3) allows the secured creditor to appoint a private agent or apply to a competent court officer to undertake all or some of the steps for realisation of the encumbered assets. The secured creditor does not have to act in person, but may, e.g., use the professional expertise and services of a private auction house to conduct a sale by private auction. In addition, even though the rules on extra-judicial enforcement allow the secured creditor to take enforcement into its own hands, the secured creditor may always ask for the assistance of a court in this context, e.g., in the course of a public auction.

E. Realisation in the course of extra-judicial and judicial enforcement

While IX.–7:201 forms part of the rules on extra-judicial enforcement, the different methods for the realisation of the encumbered assets mentioned in this provision are relevant in the context of judicial enforcement as well. IX.–7:217 paragraph (2) sentence 1 provides that in the course of judicial enforcement, the secured creditor may apply to the court or other competent authority to exercise any of the rights which according to these rules are available in extra-judicial enforcement. Whether or not there is an agreement to this effect between the secured creditor and the security provider, is irrelevant (see IX.–7:217 paragraph (2) sentence 2); therefore there may be a sale of the encumbered assets in the course of judicial enforcement even if the parties had excluded such a possibility which would prevent the secured creditor from using this method of realisation in the context of extra-judicial enforcement.

IX.–7:208: Notice of extra-judicial disposition

(1) A secured creditor may exercise its right to dispose of the encumbered asset only if the secured creditor gives notice of its intention to do sot.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply if the encumbered asset is perishable or may otherwise speedily decline in value or is a fungible asset that is traded on a recognised market with published prices.

COMMENTS

A. Notice of extra-judicial disposition

This Article requires the enforcing secured creditor to give notice if the creditor intends to dispose of the encumbered asset. The notice ensures that the addressees will receive a last warning before their rights in the encumbered asset might be lost due to the disposition. Being informed of the secured creditor's intentions they can consider whether they should avert enforcement by paying the outstanding amount of the obligation covered by the security or whether they should participate in the realisation, i.e. whether they should acquire the encumbered asset for themselves.

The notice under this Article has to be given even if the secured creditor had already delivered an enforcement notice to a consumer security provider according to IX.–7:107. The notices under this Chapter are in general not mutually exclusive; moreover, the notice according to this Article has to be sent to a larger group of addressees (see IX.–7:209) than the enforcement notice according to IX.–7:107.

Scope of application. The notice requirement under this Article applies whenever a secured creditor has the intention to dispose of the encumbered assets in the course of extra-judicial enforcement. Whether the disposition, i.e. the sale of the encumbered asset, is to be by public or private auction or by private sale is irrelevant for the application of this Article. The same holds true for the type of encumbered assets. The Article applies both to corporeal assets and to encumbered rights to payment.

No notice, however, needs to be given where the secured creditor merely intends to lease the encumbered asset to a third party (see Comment B on the preceding Article) or where the secured creditor intends to appropriate the collateral according to IX.–7:216, since the latter provision contains a separate requirement of notification by the secured creditor.

This provision is also not applicable in the course of judicial enforcement. IX.–7:217 paragraph (2) sentence 1 provides that the secured creditor may apply to the court or other competent authority to exercise any of the rights spelt out in the Subsections on extra-judicial enforcement; this reference does not include procedural provisions such as the present Article.

Addressees, time and content of the notice. These matters are governed by the following two Articles.

Remedies for and consequences of failure to make notification. For the remedies in case of a failure by the secured creditor to comply with the notification requirement in this Article, as supplemented by the following two Articles, reference can be made to the Comment D on

IX.–7:107. While every party concerned may seek an injunction against the secured creditor and claim damages, the position of a third party buyer of the collateral is not affected by any violation of the procedural provisions of these Articles.

An indirect, but not insignificant consequence of a failure to notify the security provider and the debtor relates to the costs of the enforcement proceeding. According to IX.–2:401 paragraph (2) the right to payment of "reasonable costs" is covered by the security right, provided the security provider had been informed of the secured creditor's intention to undertake such proceedings in sufficient time to enable the security provider to avert these costs by performing the outstanding obligations.

B. Excluded cases

Paragraph (2) of the Article mentions two situations in which no notification is necessary under this provision. First, the secured creditor need not give such notice if the encumbered assets are perishable or may otherwise speedily decline in value. The reason for this exception is obvious. The notification would delay the disposition and that may result in depreciation of the encumbered asset and, hence, reduce the proceeds to be derived from the disposition. Since this would be manifestly commercially unreasonable and to the detriment of all parties concerned, it would be in conflict with IX.–7:103 paragraph (4).

Second, notification is not required where the encumbered asset is a fungible asset that is traded on a recognised market with published prices. This exception is based upon a similar ground as the exception to the prohibition of predefault agreements on appropriation for the same category of assets (see Comment B on IX.–7:105). If the encumbered asset is fungible and if its price can be easily and objectively determined by reference to a published market price, then the security provider and the other holders of proprietary interests in the encumbered asset are not likely to be disadvantaged by the secured creditor's disposition of this asset since the result achieved ought to correspond to the market price.

IX.–7:209: Addressees of the notice

The notice required by the preceding Article must be given:

(a) to the security provider, the debtor (if different from the security provider) and other persons who, to the knowledge of the secured creditor, are liable for the obligation covered by the security; and

(b) to the following persons with rights in the encumbered asset:

(i) other secured creditors who have registered such rights;

(ii) persons who were in possession or control of the encumbered asset when enforcement commenced; and

(iii) other persons who were actually known to the secured creditor to have a right in the encumbered asset.

COMMENTS

This Article enumerates the persons to whom notice of the secured creditor's intention to dispose of the encumbered assets must be given.

According to sub-paragraph (a), the notice must be given to the security provider, the debtor (if not identical with the security provider, i.e. if the latter is a third party security provider) and to other persons who, as known to the secured creditor, are liable for the obligation covered by the security. The last-mentioned category covers especially providers of personal security. These persons might be interested in the possibility of averting enforcement by payment of the secured obligation since they could be subject to a claim for recourse brought by a third party security provider. The secured creditor is not under an absolute obligation to inform these persons; rather, the requirement of notification is limited to those addressees whose liability for the obligation covered by the security is actually known to the secured creditor. Notification might actually, however, prove to be beneficial for the secured creditor, since some third person might be willing to voluntarily pay the outstanding amount of the obligation covered by the security in order to be subrogated to the secured creditor's security right because that may strengthen the third person's position in seeking recourse.

The list of persons to whom notice is to be given is further extended by sub-paragraph (b) which covers other persons holding rights (in the widest sense) in the encumbered assets. This sub-paragraph mentions registered secured creditors as well as other persons holding proprietary rights in the encumbered assets. While the enforcing secured creditor is under an absolute obligation to inform the former, notice must be given to the latter only if the enforcing secured creditor actually has knowledge of their proprietary rights. These persons have to be notified because their proprietary rights in the encumbered asset might be affected by the disposition and therefore they should be enabled to evaluate especially whether they should acquire the encumbered asset for themselves. Finally, notice must also be given to persons in possession of the encumbered asset at commencement of enforcement (sub-paragraph (b)(ii)). Even though these persons do not necessarily hold proprietary rights in the assets concerned, they might prefer to acquire them for themselves in order to be able to continue to exercise possession.

IX.–7:210: Time and contents of notice

(1) The notice required by IX.–7:208 (Notice of extra-judicial disposition) must be given in due time. A notice that reaches its addressees at least ten days before the disposition is regarded as given in due time.

(2) The notice must indicate:

(a) the place and time of the planned disposition;
(b) a reasonable description of the encumbered asset to be disposed of;
(c) any minimum price for the disposition of the encumbered asset and payment terms; and
(d) the right of the security provider, of the debtor and of other interested persons to avert disposition of the encumbered asset by payment of the outstanding amount of the obligation covered by the security.

(3) The notice must be in a language that can be expected to inform its addressees.

COMMENTS

A. Notice to be given in due time

Paragraph (1) sentence 1 stipulates that the notice of extra-judicial disposition must be given in due time. If the notice reaches its addressees only shortly before the disposition, it will fail to achieve its purpose (see Comment A on IX.–7:208).

In order to avoid disputes and uncertainties as to when a notice is to be regarded as being given in due time, sentence 2 provides that a notice that reaches its addressees at least ten days before the disposition is regarded as given in due time. The secured creditor may of course give the notice even earlier. In order to be able to prove the time of receipt, a registered letter or delivery by messenger may be advisable.

B. Content of notice

Paragraph (2) enumerates several items of information which have to be included in the secured creditor's notice of extra-judicial disposition These are largely self-explanatory and do not require further comment. All the information required under paragraph (2) is intended to ensure that the addressees of the notice are informed about the circumstances of the disposition intended by the secured creditor and about the possibility of averting enforcement by payment of the outstanding amount of the obligation covered by the security.

C. Language

Under a pan-European regime of proprietary security the problem of different languages arises, especially if – as is the case under this notice of extra-judicial disposition – notifications are required between persons who had not necessarily already dealt with each other. Paragraph (3) attempts to solve this language problem by requiring the secured creditor to draft the notice in a language which can be expected to inform its addressees. Effectively, this puts the secured creditor under an obligation to provide translations, if required by the addressees. It has to be emphasised, however, that the secured creditor will not always have to use the language of the member state where the addressee concerned has its place of residence or incorporation. At least in the commercial sphere, a secured creditor will normally be entitled to expect that a notice in English will be understood by its recipients.

IX.–7:211: Sale by public or private auction or by private sale

(1) Realisation of all or parts of the encumbered assets by sale may be by an officially supervised auction (public auction) or by an auction to which the public is invited (private auction).

(2) Realisation of all or parts of the encumbered assets by sale may be by private sale, if so agreed by the parties or if there is a published market price for the encumbered asset.

(3) The details of the arrangements to be made under the preceding paragraphs can be fixed by the secured creditor.

(4) If the transfer is subject to pre-existing prior rights and upon demand, the secured creditor must disclose to the purchaser the relevant details.

(5) If the secured creditor acquires the encumbered asset in a sale by public or private auction, the sale may be set aside by the security provider within a period of ten days after the auction.

(6) Where the owner of the encumbered asset participates as buyer in a realisation of the encumbered asset according to this Article, the sale operates as an agreement to release encumbrances of the asset.

COMMENTS

A. General remarks

At least for encumbered assets other than rights to payment (for which there is also the possibility of collection according to IX.–7:214), the most important method of realisation is the sale of the collateral. A purchaser acquires ownership of the encumbered assets and the purchase price may be applied by the enforcing secured creditor for the satisfaction of the secured right.

Also the secured creditor may acquire the collateral in a public or private auction. The acquisition of ownership of the collateral by the secured creditor in the course of extra-judicial enforcement outside such an auction would not be regarded as an acquisition by private sale, but by appropriation according to IX.–7:216. The legal idea which in general underlies the purchase of the encumbered assets by the secured creditor in the course of extra-judicial enforcement is that the secured creditor is authorised by virtue of law to dispose of the security provider's assets. Only the secured creditor is the party to the contract of sale concluded with a third party purchaser; there is no contractual relationship between the security provider and the third party who acquires the collateral; payment of the purchase price is owed by the latter only to the secured creditor.

B. Sale by public or private auction

Paragraphs (1) and (2) distinguish between two methods of a realisation of the encumbered assets by sale. While paragraph (2) covers the private sale (see Comment C), paragraph (1) deals with the sale by auction, which may be either by public or by private auction.

A public auction is defined by paragraph (1) as an auction which is officially supervised. This supervision by an official does not affect the character of the enforcement as extra-judicial enforcement in the hands of the secured creditor; it is already provided by IX.–7:207 paragraph (3) that in the course of extra-judicial enforcement proceedings the secured creditor may seek official assistance in the process of the realisation of the encumbered assets.

In a private auction, there is no official supervision; it is required, however, that the public is invited to this auction. This requirement distinguishes a private auction from a private sale; the secured creditor must advertise the intended private auction in a reasonable manner (possibly using the assistance of the court) and all members of the public must be given sufficient access to the tendering process.

C. Private sale

As opposed to a sale by public or private auction, realisation of an encumbered asset by private sale is possible only where this had been agreed upon by the secured creditor and the security provider (whether or not this agreement had been concluded before or after default) or where there is a published market price for the encumbered asset. These requirements are based upon the following considerations. A realisation of the encumbered asset by private sale might give rise to the risk that the secured creditor sells the collateral at an undervalue. The secured creditor might be tempted to do so because of collusion with the buyer or simply because it might be easier to find a buyer if the secured creditor sets a lower asking price. Even though this would be in breach of the obligation to achieve a commercially reasonable price according to IX.–7:212 (and of the general requirement of commercial reasonableness according to IX.–7:103 paragraph (4)), such a misconduct might be difficult to prove and therefore the secured creditor might not be deterred by the possibility of a liability in damages according to IX.–7:104 sub-paragraph (b). If the sale is by auction, whether public or private, the participation of the public provides some protection against these risks and the sale price can be expected to be nearer to the market value of the encumbered assets.

On the other hand, an auction is both time-consuming and costly; therefore, there is no need for a sale by auction where the parties have agreed on a private sale or where there is a published market price for the encumbered assets. In both situations there is sufficient protection for the security provider. In the first situation, the security provider can have recourse to the procedure set out in IX.–7:212 paragraph (4). In the second situation, the existence of a published market price allows the reasonableness of the secured creditor's conduct in a private sale to be evaluated more easily.

D. Details of the realisation by sale

In addition to these general provisions distinguishing between a sale by auction and a private sale, the present Article contains two rules concerning the details of the realisation of the encumbered assets by sale that are applicable whether there is an auction or a private sale:

Paragraph (4) stipulates that the secured creditor must inform the purchaser, if so demanded by the latter, whether the purchase is subject to any pre-existing prior rights. The general position under these rules is that a sale in the course of extra-judicial enforcement does not affect security rights that enjoy priority over the enforcing secured creditor's rights (see IX.–7:213 paragraph (2)(a)). If the asset concerned is encumbered with such senior security rights in addition to the enforcing secured creditor's rights, the purchaser can acquire ownership in the asset concerned only subject to the senior security rights. If contrary to paragraph (4) the purchaser is not informed by the secured creditor, the latter will be liable to the former.

As a general rule, however, paragraph (3) provides that the secured creditor is free to determine the details of the disposition, i.e. place and time and other conditions. This freedom, of course, is subject to the general requirement of commercial reasonableness according to IX.–7:103 paragraph (4) and to the specific requirement of obtaining a commercially reasonable price according to IX.–7:212. In practice the secured creditor will often act through an agent (see IX.–7:207 (General rules on realisation) paragraph (3)).

E. Acquisition by secured creditor

If the secured creditor acquires the encumbered asset for itself by being the highest bidder in a public or private auction, paragraph (5) provides that this sale may be set aside by the security provider within a period of ten days after the auction. No reason needs to be given and no violation of any procedural or substantive law provision proven; this possibility to set aside the sale follows a strict and prophylactic approach. The consequence of such a setting aside is that a new realisation of the encumbered assets becomes necessary.

F. Acquisition by security provider

The possibility of a realisation of the encumbered asset by sale is not limited to a purchase by a third party. The security provider may participate as buyer in this sale as well. This is expressly provided for by paragraph (6). At first impression, it may appear absurd that the owner of the encumbered asset might wish to acquire its own asset. However, this is a practice which is at least firmly rooted in auctions of encumbered land and can be easily transposed to encumbered movables. Surely, the security provider's interest in retaining its encumbered good by participating in the auction deserves to be protected; there is no legitimate reason for barring the security provider from defending its interests in competition with other interested people. If the security provider offers the highest price, under the rules governing auctions it must be accepted that it may in this way preserve (by re-acquisition) its property. If the price to be paid by it is lower than the valuation of that asset by the secured creditor, the latter must bear the consequences of having misjudged the market value of the encumbered asset. Cf. also IX.–7:213 paragraph (4).

According to paragraph (6), a sale of the encumbered assets to the owner is to be regarded as a (pro tanto) release of the secured creditor's security right (cf. also IX.–7:213 paragraph (1)(b)). Of course, the secured creditor's right to payment is also correspondingly reduced (IX.–7:215 paragraph (2)).

IX.–7:212: Commercially reasonable price

(1) The secured creditor must realise a commercially reasonable price for the encumbered asset.

(2) If there is a recognised market which is easily accessible for the secured creditor, a price is commercially reasonable if it corresponds to the market price at the time of the sale, having due regard to any special features of the encumbered asset.

(3) If the preceding paragraph does not apply, a price is commercially reasonable if the secured creditor took such steps as could be expected to be taken in the circumstances.

(4) If the sale is by private sale, the security provider may demand that the creditor communicates to the security provider the expected price or price range. If the security provider can show that it is likely that this price range is significantly below what might reasonably be achieved at a private or public auction, the security provider may demand that the secured creditor arrange for a private or a public auction. Subject to paragraph (5) of the preceding Article, a price achieved in this way is binding upon the parties.

COMMENTS

A. Commercially reasonable price

Paragraph (1) of this Article requires the secured creditor to realise a commercially reasonable price on the sale of the encumbered asset. This rule is a specific application of the general requirement of commercial reasonableness according to IX.–7:103 paragraph (4). Its policy can be explained as follows. The sale is conducted by the secured creditor for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction of the secured right only. The security provider is still owner of the encumbered assets and as such entitled to receive any surplus from the realisation (see IX.–7:215 paragraph (4). Therefore it is not sufficient that the secured creditor realises by the sale a price equivalent to the outstanding amount of the obligation covered by the security; instead, it is necessary that the proceeds of the sale are equivalent to the actual value of the rights in the collateral acquired by the buyer.

This does not necessarily mean that a price realised by the secured creditor can never be commercially reasonable where it is not equal to the actual value of the assets concerned. This may partly be the case where paragraphs (2) and (3) apply (see Comment B). Moreover a sale might be subject to existing encumbrances of senior secured creditors (see IX.–7:213 paragraph (2). Naturally, any third party buyer will in such situations pay only the actual value of the encumbered asset minus the amount for which the asset is still liable (and which is not easily retrievable from the actual debtor or a co-security) under this security right.

B. Specific instances where price regarded as commercially reasonable

The absolute requirement to realise a commercially reasonable price according to paragraph (1) constitutes a substantial risk for the secured creditor. If this requirement is not fulfilled, the secured creditor might incur a liability in damages to the security provider according to IX.–7:104 sub-paragraph (b). In order to avoid disputes concerning the commercial reasonableness of concrete prices realised by the secured creditor, paragraphs (2) and (3) provide that if the secured creditor complies with the requirements laid down in these rules, the prices obtained will be regarded as commercially reasonable.

C. Right to demand auction instead of private sale where expected price insufficient

Paragraph (4) covers a specific possibility for the security provider to demand an auction where the expected price to be realised by virtue of a private sale is insufficient. Even if there is the possibility of a private sale, i.e. where the secured creditor and the security provider had so agreed or where there is a published market price for the asset concerned, the security provider may still demand that the secured creditor communicates the expected price or price range. If the security provider deems this price to be insufficient and can show that it is likely that this price is significantly below what might reasonably be achieved at an auction, the secured creditor can be required to realise the encumbered asset by auction instead of by private sale. If the price realised in the auction turns out to be insufficient for the security provider as well, however, this price must be accepted by the latter (see paragraph (4) sentence 3). The only exception would be if in this auction the secured creditor acquires the encumbered asset for itself. The security provider could then exercise the rights under IX.–7:211 paragraph (5), i.e. set aside the sale within a period of ten days after the auction.

D. Remedies

Where the secured creditor fails to comply with the requirements of this Article and sells the encumbered asset to a purchaser for a price which is below what would be regarded as commercially reasonable, the security provider (and the holders of junior proprietary rights that are affected by this sale because of the loss of their rights according to IX.–7:213 paragraph (1)(c) can exercise the rights generally stated in IX.–7:104, i.e. demand from the secured creditor that the intended sale is aborted, if it has not yet been completed, and claim damages for any losses suffered as a result.

If the sale has already taken place, however, the position of the buyer is not affected by any violation of the requirements of this Article, see IX.–7:213 paragraph (3). An exception applies where the secured creditor itself has acquired the encumbered assets. In such cases, the court may order a return of ownership on the basis of IX.–7:104 sub-paragraph (a) if the sale was not for a commercially reasonable price. This right can be exercised even after the expiry of the period of ten days which is applicable for the right to set aside the sale according to IX.–7:211 paragraph (5).

IX.–7:213: Buyer's rights in the assets after realisation by sale

(1) The buyer acquires rights in the sold assets free of the rights of:

(a) the security provider;

(b) the enforcing secured creditor;

(c) junior secured creditors, whether holders of security rights or retention of ownership devices; and

(d) holders of other limited proprietary rights with lower priority than the enforcing secured creditor's rights.

(2) The following rights in the sold assets remain in existence after the transfer, unless the enforcing secured creditor acted with authority to dispose of the encumbered assets free of these rights or the buyer acquires in good faith according to IX.–6:102 (Loss of proprietary security due to good faith acquisition of ownership):

(a) rights of senior secured creditors, whether holders of security rights or retention of ownership devices; and

(b) other limited proprietary rights with higher priority.

(3) The buyer's position is not affected by any failure to comply with notice requirements under this Chapter or by any other violation of procedural provisions under this Chapter for the auction or private sale.

(4) If the secured creditor or the security provider participate in the realisation by sale as buyers, the preceding paragraphs apply with appropriate adaptations with respect to the effects of the sale.

COMMENTS

A. Effects of a realisation by sale in general

It has already been noted that the realisation by sale in the course of extra-judicial enforcement is based upon a contract of sale between the secured creditor and the buyer (see Comment A on IX.–7:211). Payment is owed to the secured creditor, who has to apply the purchase price according to the rules laid down in IX.–7:215. The present Article regulates the proprietary position of a buyer by virtue of a sale of an encumbered asset in the course of extra-judicial enforcement against the security provider.

B. Acquisition of ownership free of the secured creditor's rights

According to paragraph (1)(a) the buyer acquires rights in the sold assets free of the security provider's rights. Usually, this means that the buyer may acquire ownership. Even though the security provider is not a party to the contract of sale between the buyer and the secured creditor, the latter is authorised by law to transfer the security provider's ownership to the buyer. The position is different, however, if the encumbered assets are not actually owned by the security provider but by a third person. In such an exceptional case, the buyer can become the owner only if the secured creditor had been authorised by this third person, which will be rather unlikely, or if the buyer can rely on the principles on good faith acquisition contained in VIII.–3:101. Since this specific constellation is rather a problem of the acquisition of ownership in general, it is not specifically dealt with in paragraphs (1) and (2). According to VIII.–1:101 paragraph (3) first sentence, the rules of Book VIII on the acquisition and loss of ownership of goods apply also in the framework of the acquisition and loss of ownership by extrajudicial enforcement.

The enforcing secured creditor's rights cease to exist upon the enforcement (paragraph (1)(b)). The buyer therefore can acquire the rights in the bought assets free of the security rights whose enforcement was the basis of the sale.

C. Junior proprietary rights are lost

Paragraph (1)(c) and (d) provide that the buyer acquires the rights in the sold asset free of proprietary security rights with a lower priority than the enforcing secured creditor's rights and free of other limited proprietary rights ranking below the enforcing secured creditor's rights. The junior proprietary security rights which may be lost according to this provision can be both security rights and retention of ownership devices, if the latter exceptionally do not enjoy priority over any other security right in the same asset (this may occur where the retention of ownership devices have not been registered at all or only after expiration of the 35 days period of IX.–3:107, if there is a subordination agreement to this effect or if another security right in the same asset has been acquired by virtue of good faith (see IX.–4:101 paragraph (5)). An example of another limited proprietary right which ceases to exist after the transfer, if it is of a lower rank than the enforcing secured creditor's rights, is the usufruct (for the determination of the order of priority between proprietary security rights and other limited proprietary rights see the rules of Chapter 4, especially IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)(b)).

The reasons justifying this loss of junior-ranking proprietary rights are the following. By virtue of its position as senior creditor, the enforcing secured creditor acts with authority conferred by operation of law to dispose of the encumbered assets free of the proprietary rights with a lower rank. When selling the encumbered assets in the course of extra-judicial enforcement, the secured creditor may therefore convey to the buyer rights in the sold assets that are no longer encumbered with the junior proprietary rights.

Holders of these lower-ranking proprietary rights, whether security rights or not, are to some extent compensated for their losses by virtue of their participation in the distribution of the proceeds of the realisation of the encumbered assets according to IX.–7:215 paragraph (3). However, if the proceeds are not sufficient to meet the outstanding amounts of the obligations covered by the lower-ranking security rights or the value of the other limited proprietary rights, the holders of these rights do not obtain anything. This result cannot be regarded as unfair since it is merely a consequence of the risk which these creditors incurred when they accepted the lower priority of their proprietary rights. Usually they will have, and will use, the opportunity of minimising their increased commercial risk by requiring a higher rate of interest for the credit secured by the lower ranking security right.

D. Senior proprietary rights generally not affected

Senior-ranking proprietary rights, i.e. especially proprietary security rights that enjoy priority over the enforcing secured creditor's rights, are not mentioned among the rights that are lost according to paragraph (1); instead, paragraph (2)(a) and (b) provide that in general these rights remain in existence after the transfer. Unless the exceptions stated in paragraph (2) apply, the buyer acquires rights in the assets that are sold in the course of extra-judicial enforcement only subject to these senior encumbrances.

This result corresponds to the general approach under this Chapter that a secured creditor is not prevented from enforcing its security rights by reason of the fact that there are security rights of other secured creditors which enjoy priority over the rights of the creditor who wants to enforce the rights. The only exception to this rule is contained in IX.–7:214 paragraph (2). A junior secured creditor may not collect an encumbered right to payment. If in general a junior secured creditor may proceed with enforcement, then the senior secured creditor's rights should not be affected. This is why paragraph (2) of the present Article provides that these rights should in general continue to exist even after the transfer. Correspondingly, the holders of these senior proprietary rights do not participate in the distribution of proceeds according to IX.–7:215 since they may still enforce their rights against the encumbered assets. For these holders of senior proprietary rights, the situation is no different from cases of transfer of ownership of the encumbered assets by the security provider to a third party subject to the existing encumbrances (see IX.–5:303).

Of course, the fact that encumbrances that enjoy priority over the enforcing secured creditor's rights continue to exist may constitute a major obstacle for the sale of the encumbered asset. Buyers will prefer to obtain unencumbered rights; at least the price to be realised will be substantially lower than what could be realised if the assets could be acquired by the buyer free of any encumbrances. Therefore, enforcing secured creditors whose rights are only junior security rights are well-advised to seek an arrangement with the holders of the senior security rights (such inter-creditor agreements are generally possible under this Chapter, see the final Comments on IX.–7:102). The enforcing secured creditor could be granted authority by a senior secured creditor to dispose of the encumbered assets free of the secured creditor's rights and thus the buyer would acquire the rights free of these senior encumbrances (see IX.–7:213 paragraph (2)). In exchange, the senior secured creditor would be given by its agreement with the enforcing secured creditor a right to participate in the proceeds in accordance with its rank of priority. For the senior secured creditor, such an agreement would provide the opportunity of obtaining preferential satisfaction of its secured right without itself having to enforce its security rights against the security provider.

Apart from such an authorisation of the enforcing secured creditor to dispose of the encumbered assets free of senior encumbrances, paragraph (2) mentions a second possible situation where the buyer acquires the rights in the encumbered assets free of these encumbrances: the buyer can rely on the principles of good faith acquisition. Specifically, the buyer might be protected by IX.–6:102 which covers the good faith acquisition of ownership free of earlier security devices. Whether or not the buyer can rely on this provision will depend upon the circumstances of the case. If it is not apparent to the buyer that the secured creditor sells the encumbered asset in the exercise of rights of extra-judicial enforcement, the sale might be regarded as taking place in the ordinary course of business of the seller; therefore, even a registration of the senior secured creditors' security rights might not have the result that the buyer is to be regarded as being in bad faith (see IX.–6:102 paragraph (2)). In the case of a sale by auction, however, it is not likely that the buyer will be able to invoke the protection offered by IX.–6:102 paragraph (2) for sales taking place in the ordinary course of business. The buyer will then be expected to have knowledge of security rights that are registered against the security provider whose assets are sold by auction.

If a senior secured creditor's rights are lost by virtue of a good faith acquisition of ownership by the buyer according to the principles stated in the preceding paragraph, it is not envisaged that this senior secured creditor can claim to participate in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale according to IX.–7:215. However, the enforcing secured creditor might be liable towards the senior secured creditor in damages according to the general provision in IX.–7:104 sub-paragraph (b) and might possibly be liable also on the basis of Book VII on Unjustified Enrichment, if the enforcing secured creditor has actually obtained a higher price for the encumbered asset due to the fact that the buyer assumed that the rights were unencumbered (and actually acquired unencumbered rights).

E. Participation of secured creditor or security provider as buyers

The principles stated in the preceding paragraphs generally apply also to cases where the secured creditor or the security provider participate as buyers in the realisation of the collateral (see paragraph (4)). If the security provider acquires the collateral, i.e. agrees with the secured creditor on the release of the latter's security rights (cf. IX.–7:211 paragraph (6)), the enforcing secured creditor's rights in these assets are lost. Conversely, if the secured creditor buys the collateral in an auction, the rights of the security provider are lost. Moreover, both the secured creditor and the security provider will in such circumstances acquire rights in the encumbered assets free of any junior-ranking encumbrances.

Encumbrances which enjoy priority over the enforcing secured creditor's rights, on the other hand, will remain in existence. Neither the secured creditor nor the enforcing security provider will be able to rely on the principle of good faith acquisition in order to acquire rights free of these senior-ranking encumbrances.

F. Violation of procedural provisions irrelevant

Paragraph (3) provides that a mere violation of procedural provisions under this Chapter for the sale or auction does not affect the buyer's position. The buyer acquires the rights according to the rules described in the preceding paragraphs even if, e.g., the enforcing secured creditor did not comply with notice requirements under this Chapter or did not realise a commercially reasonable price.

An exception to this rule can be based upon the application of IX.–7:104 sub-paragraph (b). Where the secured creditor itself acquires the encumbered assets in an auction conducted in violation of the procedural provisions of this Chapter, the secured creditor may be ordered to return ownership of the collateral, provided the secured creditor has not in the meantime passed ownership to a third party; in the latter case, the secured creditor may, however, be liable extra-contractually (VI.–2:101 paragraph (1)(b)).

IX.–7:214: Realisation of security in right to payment or in negotiable instrument

(1) Where the encumbered asset is a right to payment or a negotiable instrument, the secured creditor may collect the outstanding performance from the third party debtor or may sell and assign or appropriate the right to payment or to the negotiable instrument.

(2) If there are other security rights in the encumbered right to payment or the negotiable instrument which enjoy priority, the secured creditor is not entitled as against these senior secured creditors to collect the encumbered right to payment or to the negotiable instrument.

(3) The third party debtor, except a debtor under a negotiable instrument, may refuse to pay unless the secured creditor sends a notice indicating the amount duet, supported by adequate proof.

(4) The secured creditor may also collect or otherwise enforce any personal or proprietary security right to which the security in the right to payment extends according to IX.–2:301 (Encumbrance of right to payment of money) paragraph (4).

COMMENTS

This provision deals with the special features of realising a security right in an encumbered right to payment or negotiable instrument.

Paragraph (1) offers three alternative ways which may be chosen by a secured creditor, if its security right encumbers a right to payment or a negotiable instrument. The creditor may collect or it may sell or appropriate the right to payment or the negotiable instrument. Collection is mentioned first since, generally speaking, in practice it is the more efficient method since the secured creditor can quickly obtain cash, provided the third party debtor is solvent. Usually this route is also faster.

The collection of a right to payment is also governed by IX.–7:204. The collection of a negotiable instrument is primarily subject to the rules applicable to the specific kind of negotiable instrument that is in issue and subsidiarily to IX.–7:214.

Alternatively, the secured creditor may sell or appropriate the right to payment or the negotiable instrument. The sale is subject to the involved procedure according to IX.–7:207 to IX.–7:213; for appropriation, IX.–7:216 applies.

Paragraph (2) draws the practical consequence from the rules on priority established by Chapter 4 of Book IX. If another secured creditor or holder of a limited proprietary right enjoys priority, this prevents a creditor with lower priority from proceeding to enforcement by collection.

Paragraph (3) is designed to protect the third party debtor. The debtor need not make payment, unless and until the secured creditor sends a notice to the third party debtor. The notice must indicate the amount which the secured creditor claims as being due to it under the obligation covered by the security. The amount must be supported by adequate proof. Adequate proof is a copy of a bill or of a current account showing the debt balance of the debtor of the obligation covered by the security.

As a matter of course, the third party debtor may decline payment also if it disputes the existence of the encumbered right to payment or its maturity or other conditions for its enforceability. The position of the third party debtor towards the secured creditor who claims collection of the encumbered right to payment does not differ from that towards an assignee of the right to performance in the case of an outright assignment.

If enforcement is brought before maturity, the enforcement debtor cannot be forced to pay at once. In such a case, collection of the right to payment is excluded for the time being. The secured creditor may wish to wait until maturity or, if it wants to realise the security quickly, to sell and transfer the right to payment; in this case, the enforcing creditor's right of election does not operate.

That paragraph (3) cannot apply to negotiable instruments is due to the fact that these instruments establish a stricter liability.

Paragraph (4) refers to IX.–2:301 paragraph (4) which extends the secured creditor's rights of enforcement to personal or proprietary security rights which are accessory to the right to payment. These accessory rights may consist of the various forms of personal or proprietary security (IV.G.–2:113 paragraph (3) first sentence).

IX.–7:215: Distribution of proceeds

(1) The proceeds of any extra-judicial enforcement of an encumbered asset according to the preceding provisions are to be distributed by the secured creditor in the following order.

(2) First, the secured creditor who has enforced may apply the proceeds for the satisfaction of the secured right including the expenses incurred for enforcement.

(3) Second, any secured creditor whose proprietary security has a lower priority than the enforcing secured creditor's right is entitled to receive any remaining proceeds after any deductions according to paragraph (2) up to the amount of the obligation covered by this secured creditor's security. If there are several junior secured creditors, the remaining proceeds are distributed in accordance with the order of priority between their rights. The preceding sentences apply with appropriate adaptations to holders of other limited proprietary rights with lower priority than the enforcing secured creditor's rights; instead of an obligation covered by the security, the value of these limited proprietary rights is decisive.

(4) Third, any remaining proceeds after any deductions according to paragraphs (2) and (3) must be repaid to the security provider.

(5) No secured creditor may receive more than any maximum amount that has been agreed or registered for that creditor's security right. This limit does not apply to reasonable expenses incurred for enforcement.

COMMENTS

The rules on distribution of the proceeds of an enforcement must, of course, take into account the relative ranking and priorities of the security and other property rights of all the parties who are involved in, or may be affected by, the process of enforcement.

Paragraph (2) proceeds on the basis of the rule that the existence of secured creditors with lower ranking security rights in the asset does not prevent the secured creditor from proceeding with the enforcement of its security right. This is affirmed by the rules in paragraph (3) which describe broadly the enforcing secured creditor's post-enforcement obligations.

The Article does not mention senior security rights that may exist in the encumbered asset. This silence impliedly means that these security rights which have priority over the security of the enforcing secured creditor are not affected by the sale of the encumbered asset. Rather, they continue to encumber the sold asset. A good faith and therefore unencumbered acquisition of the assets will normally be excluded if the security rights are registered, cf. Comment D on IX.–7:213.

As far as the satisfaction of the enforcing creditor's rights is concerned, it may use the enforcement proceeds to satisfy the obligations covered by the security. These obligations are enumerated in IX.–2:401.

Paragraph (3) contains no fewer than three rules, expressing and affirming the general rules on priority. The secured creditors mentioned in the first and second sentences are competing secured creditors, but with a lower ranking according to the rules of Chapter 4 of this Book IX. The secured rights of these post-ranking secured creditors are satisfied from that part of the proceeds that may remain after the enforcing creditor's secured rights have been satisfied according to paragraph (2). If there are several such junior ranking secured creditors with differing priorities – an unlikely event in the case of security rights in a movable – each of them is entitled to satisfaction after any prior ranking secured creditors have been satisfied.

The third sentence of paragraph (3) deals with the rights to which holders of any other limited proprietary rights are entitled to share in the proceeds of an execution. The circle and number of any such limited proprietary rights is uncertain since they are not covered by the present rules; they are rooted in the national laws. However, if under the applicable national law they are attributed a ranking, that must be respected by these rules. One example is a usufruct in movables.

For ranking and satisfaction of these rights, a specific rule is provided by IX.–4:101 paragraph (2)(b), according to which the time of the creation of these rights determines their ranking. This is applicable not only for the possible ranking inter se of several rights of this kind but also for the ranking of these rights vis-à-vis proprietary security rights, as can be deduced from the position of the cited provision in the context of the general priority rules of Chapter 4.

The second peculiarity is due to the fact that these rights do not secure a right to payment. Therefore their extent has to be determined differently. The nearest equivalent to a secured right is the monetary value of such rights. This is laid down by the second half-sentence of sentence 3.

Paragraph (4) expresses the general rule that any sum of money that remains after satisfaction of the preceding creditors must be paid to the security provider. This amount represents the net value of the encumbered asset owned by the security provider. Therefore, the latter is entitled to this part of the proceeds resulting from the liquidation of the encumbered asset.

Paragraph (5) affirms and underlines the principle embodied by paragraph (2): it is important to underline that the enforcing secured creditor must not be enriched by way of the enforcement of its security right.

IX.–7:216: Appropriation of encumbered asset by secured creditor

The secured creditor may accept the encumbered assets in total or partial satisfaction of the secured right under the following conditions:

(a) the secured creditor must give advance notice of the intention to acquire all or parts of the encumbered assets in total or partial satisfaction of the secured right, specifying the relevant details;

(b) the proposal must be sent to the persons specified in IX.–7:209 (Addressees of the notice);

(c) the conditions of IX.–7:210 (Time and contents of notice) paragraphs (1), (2) (b) and (d) and (3) and IX.–7:212 (Commercially reasonable price) paragraph (1), applied with appropriate adaptations, must be fulfilled;

(d) the proposal must indicate the secured amount owed as of the end of business on the day before the proposal is sent and the amount of the right that is proposed to be satisfied by accepting the encumbered asset; and

(e) no addressee objects to this proposal in writing within ten days after the proposal has been received by every addressee.

COMMENTS

Introduction. The appropriation of the encumbered asset in practice plays a modest role. A secured creditor will only be interested in taking over a corporeal asset if it can either make use of it for its own purposes or has an opportunity to resell it for a profit.

Nevertheless, this alternative has been accepted because in some situations it may be very useful. Instead of waiting for payment from a security provider who probably is in financial distress, the secured creditor may save money by acquiring the encumbered asset for its own purposes at a reduced price or by obtaining cash by reselling it to a third party.

On the other hand, allowing appropriation opens up a certain risk for the security provider since the secured creditor naturally pursues its own interests. That means that the law must also protect the legitimate interests of the security provider. This is the reason for the conditions imposed upon the secured creditor by the present Article.

Opening words of Article. The secured creditor has the choice of appropriating the encumbered asset(s) either completely or partly only, depending upon its intentions. This is not spelt out, but is implied in the text. The choice may, but need not, coincide with the alternative of the text between total or partial satisfaction of the secured right. If the value of the encumbered assets easily covers the secured right, appropriating them will lead to full satisfaction of the secured creditor. If, by contrast, the encumbered assets have lost much of their value, their appropriation may result in only partial satisfaction.

The preceding considerations may also determine the secured creditor's decision whether or not it should decide for appropriation.

Sub-paragraph (a). This paragraph requires an advance notice by the secured creditor of its intention to appropriate, i.e. to acquire the encumbered assets. In terms of contract law, this is an offer by the secured creditor to the persons indirectly mentioned in sub-paragraph (b). This offer needs to be quantified with respect to the two elements mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) and also in the preceding comments on the opening words of the Article. Firstly, the secured creditor must indicate whether it proposes to acquire all or merely parts of the encumbered assets; in the latter case, of course, specification of the desired parts is necessary. Secondly, the secured creditor must indicate whether the proposed appropriation is to be in full or merely in part satisfaction of the secured right; in the latter case, again, which percentage or part amount of the right to payment the secured creditor intends to cover by the appropriation.

In terms of a contract of sale, the first element specifies the asset to be bought and the second element the purchase price offered for the acquisition.

Sub-paragraph (b). This specifies the addressees of the secured creditor's notice of intention: these are the persons enumerated in IX.–7:209, i.e. the addressees of the notice of extra-judicial disposition. The list is, roughly speaking:

- all persons liable for the obligation covered by the security right (IX.–7:209 sub-paragraph (a)); and
- all persons having rights in the encumbered asset (IX.–7:209 sub-paragraph (b)).

It is obvious that these two classes of persons would be directly affected by the secured creditor's proposal to purchase all or part of the collateral and the price offered for this acquisition.

Sub-paragraph (c). This enumerates indirectly – by referring to various provisions – six additional conditions that have to be fulfilled. These conditions may here briefly be summarised.

(i) The notice must be given in due time, i.e. it must reach the addressees ten days before the intended disposition (IX.–7:210 paragraph (1)).

(ii) The notice must reasonably describe the encumbered asset to be disposed of (IX.–7:210 paragraph (2)(b). Transposed to the case covered here this means that the secured creditor must specify exactly – unless it proposes to appropriate all the assets encumbered in its favour – which of the encumbered assets it wishes to acquire.

(iii) The notice must indicate the option of the persons mentioned in IX.–7:210 paragraph (2)(d) – who are also the receivers of the notice – to avert the proposed disposition of the encumbered assets by payment of the outstanding amount of the obligation covered by the security.

(iv) "The notice must be in a language that can be expected to inform the addressee" As required by IX.–7:210 paragraph (3); on this requirement see Comment C on that Article.

(v) The price offered by the secured creditor must be "commercially reasonable" (IX.–7:212 paragraph (1)). This yardstick is a general principle that informs all the methods of extra-judicial enforcement.

Sub-paragraph (d). In order to obtain a full and precise picture of the actual amount of the monetary obligation covered by the security, the secured creditor must communicate the exact amount which is still open "as of the end of business on the day" before the proposal is sent. Further, the secured creditor must indicate the amount of the obligation that the secured creditor proposes to cover by appropriating the encumbered assets or part of these assets (IX.–7:216 sub-paragraph (d)).

Sub-paragraph (e). According to the final important sub-paragraph, the secured creditor's proposal is regarded as accepted, if none of the addressees objects in writing to the secured creditor's proposal. The time for objecting to the proposal is limited to ten days after the proposal has been received by every addressee. Proving the time of receipt will be difficult for the secured creditor. However, that difficulty can be surmounted by sending the notice by registered letter or by messengers against dated receipts.

Subsection 3: Judicial enforcement

IX.–7:217: Applicable rules

(1) Judicial enforcement is to be undertaken according to the procedural rules of the member state where enforcement by a court or other competent authority is sought by the secured creditor.

(2) The secured creditor may apply to the court or other competent authority to exercise any of the rights under the preceding Subsections. These rights may be exercised by the court or other competent authority regardless of whether they are under the preceding Subsections dependent upon or excluded by a party agreement or a consent or the absence of an objection of the security provider or other persons.

COMMENTS

A. Judicial enforcement

A secured creditor may always apply to the courts or other competent authorities for judicial enforcement of its security rights. Regardless of whether the parties have or have not agreed on the possibility of extra-judicial enforcement or whether the secured creditor would be free to commence extra-judicial enforcement under the default position of the rules of this Chapter, the secured creditor can never be deprived of the right to seek enforcement of its security right through an action before a court or other competent authority.

In practice, the secured creditor will seek judicial enforcement especially in the following sets of circumstances. First, where the possibility of extra-judicial enforcement has been excluded by party agreement according to IX.–7:103 paragraph (1). Second, in the case of consumer security providers: where extra-judicial enforcement has not been agreed upon after default, see IX.–7:103 paragraph (2)). Third, even where extra-judicial enforcement would be possible, the secured creditor might prefer judicial enforcement because it is to be expected that the security provider would show too much resistance (so that even in the context of extra-judicial enforcement proceedings, the secured creditor would have to ask for the assistance of the court or other competent authority anyway) or because the legal situation is too complicated so that the secured creditor prefers not take enforcement into its own hands in order to avoid potential liability arising from wrongful enforcement measures (cf. the liability in damages provided by IX.–7:104 sub-paragraph (b)).

B. Applicable procedural rules

Whenever the secured creditor applies to a court or other competent authority for judicial enforcement of its security right, the court or other competent authority will apply its own procedural law (see paragraph (1)). Judicial enforcement of a security right under these rules is subject to the national procedural provisions of the member state where judicial enforcement is sought, including this member state’s provisions on jurisdiction.

Procedural safeguards established in the preceding Subsections for extra-judicial enforcement do not apply to judicial enforcement. Instead, notification requirements and similar issues are governed exclusively by the applicable national procedural law.

C. Available remedies

While these rules must not interfere with national procedural law, they may regulate issues of substantive law even in so far as these issues may arise in the context of judicial enforcement of a security right. Paragraph (2) sentence 1 therefore stipulates that the secured creditor should be able to enjoy the same rights as are provided in the preceding Subsections (i.e. in the rules on extra-judicial enforcement). The secured creditor is as a matter of substantive law entitled to a sale or an appropriation of the encumbered asset or to the proceeds of a lease of the collateral to a third party; all these rights of the secured creditor may be enforced in judicial proceedings against the security provider. The collection of an encumbered asset has to be enforced through proceedings brought against the third party debtor. Whenever such enforcement measures are administered by a court or another competent authority, the rules on the distribution of proceeds described in the preceding Subsection (which essentially qualify the secured creditor's rights) are also applicable.

Since the exercise of these rights of the secured creditor by a court or other competent authority is subject to the procedural safeguards existing under national procedural law, there is no need to require an agreement between the secured creditor and the security provider or a consent (or the absence of an objection) of the former or of other persons (paragraph (2) sentence 2). The court or other competent authority may seize possession from the security provider regardless of whether the latter had consented or objected; protective measures of any kind may be ordered even if there was no agreement to this effect; an agreement between the secured creditor and the security provider excluding a sale of the encumbered asset is ineffective in the context of judicial enforcement; an appropriation of the encumbered asset administered by a court is not dependent upon the absence of any objections by a person mentioned in IX.–7:209.

For the rights of the security provider and other persons who might be affected by the enforcement, the general rule in IX.–7:104 applies. However, whether these rights can be brought in an independent action or whether they merely can be raised as defences within the main enforcement proceedings is a matter left for the national procedural law to decide.

Section 3: Rules for retention of ownership devices

IX.–7:301: Consequences of default under retention of ownership devices

(1) The holder of a retention of ownership device exercises the rights under the retention of ownership device by termination of the contractual relationship under a contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment according to the general rules of Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5.

(2) Any rights in the supplied asset that were transferred or created by the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee will terminate, unless:

(a) the latter had been authorised to create or transfer such rights;
(b) the transferee is protected by IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) to IX.–2:111 (Security right in cash, negotiable instruments and documents) or IX.–6:102 (Loss of proprietary security due to good faith acquisition of ownership); or
(c) the rights of the transferee exceptionally enjoy priority over the rights of the holder of the retention of ownership device.

(3) On resale or re-leasing, the holder of the retention of ownership device is entitled to any surplus over the original price for the supplied assets which may be realised.

(4) A third party to whom the retention of ownership device has been transferred by agreement or by law is entitled to the rights under paragraphs (1) to (3).

COMMENTS

A. Starting point

Most of the rules of Book IX apply not only to ordinary security rights, but also to retention of ownership devices (IX.–1:104 paragraph (1)). However, one of the major exceptions relates to the consequences of the debtor's default and the closely connected area of enforcement. The chief reason why the special features of retention of ownership become relevant in this area is that, since the seller, supplier or lessor as secured creditor had retained ownership, it had remained the owner of the supplied asset. Consequently, the creditor need not proceed to obtain ownership of the encumbered asset from the debtor or a third-party security provider. Rather, it must merely seek to obtain possession from the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee, consignee or other holder of the asset.

Consequently, the main function of the present Article is to re-establish the owner's possession of the supplied asset. Incidental to this is to re-establish, as far as possible, the situation of the parties, as it existed before the conclusion of the contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial lease or consignment.

B. Obtaining possession

Although the main function of paragraph (1) is to enable the holder of a retention of ownership device to regain possession of the supplied asset, that aim cannot be achieved without paying due regard to the buyer's, hire-purchaser's, lessee's or consignee's acquired rights.

The first step that must be taken by the seller, supplier or lessor is to terminate the contractual relationship arising from the underlying contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment which entitles the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee to possession of the supplied asset. Termination of this relationship will under general contract law be possible if the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee has defaulted on the payments due to the seller, supplier or lessor (cf., in general, Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5). If it is impossible to return the supplied assets (e.g. if they do no longer exist or have been disposed of to a third party), their value has to be paid to the seller, supplier or lessor (cf. III.–3:513).

On the owner's steps for regaining possession of the supplied assets, cf. IX.–7:302.

On the other hand, the seller, supplier or lessor is obliged to return any payments received for the supplied assets, e.g. as purchase price or rent, including interest (see III.–3:511 paragraphs (2) and (5)).

C. Compensation for use and diminution of value of assets

The seller, supplier and lessor are also entitled as against the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee and consignee to fair compensation for the use and any diminution of value of the supplied assets. This rule is derived from the general principles established by III.–3:513 to III.–3:515.

D. Extinction of rights created by buyer, hire-purchaser, lessor or consignee – paragraph (2)

Basic position. While they were in possession of the supplied goods, the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee, respectively, may have created rights in the supplied assets which they held. They may have resold or re-leased those assets or encumbered them with security rights.

Generally speaking, all such rights will be extinguished, because they were obtained from a person who, generally speaking, had no authority to create or transfer such rights. The buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee was not the owner or – at most – merely owner under a suspensive condition. If the seller, supplier or lessor had transferred any ownership, it was conditional ownership – the condition being the full payment of the purchase price or of all the leasing rates; and this condition did not occur.

Exceptions. There are, however, three exceptions to this basic position.

First, exceptionally the seller, supplier or lessor may have authorised the buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee to transfer ownership in the supplied assets (sub-paragraph (a)). This corresponds to commercial practice under retention of ownership sales, under which the buyer is entitled to sell the bought goods in the ordinary course of its business (in exchange for an encumbrance being created in any proceeds). Some other cases of an authority of the security provider to sell the encumbered assets are mentioned in IX.–5:204 paragraph (1).

Second, the transferee may be protected by good faith acquisition of ownership or of a limited proprietary right, especially a security right; cf. the rules of IX.–2:108 (Good faith acquisition of security right) to IX.–2:111 (Security right in cash, negotiable instruments and documents) and IX.–6:102 (Loss of proprietary security due to good faith acquisition of ownership) (see sub-paragraph (b)).

Third, even if neither one of the two preceding alternatives applies, a transferee may prevail over the owner, provided it enjoys priority over the rights of the seller, supplier or lessor (sub-paragraph (c)). This will be the case only in exceptional circumstances. One example is where the holder of a retention of ownership device has concluded a subordination agreement with another secured creditor. A second situation where the retention of ownership device has a lower priority rank than other security rights occurs where the retention of ownership device has been registered only after expiry of the 35 days period of IX.–3:107 paragraph (2). In such a situation the retention of ownership device does not enjoy superpriority; therefore, a security right in the supplied asset that has been made effective earlier takes precedence over the retention of ownership device. A third situation is where other security rights in the same asset were acquired on the basis of a good faith acquisition (see IX–4:101 paragraph (5)). This situation overlaps with the cases covered by sub-paragraph (b). It is appropriate to mention these cases separately because sub-paragraph (b) covers also the good faith acquisition of ownership which would not fall under sub-paragraph (c).

E. Resale or releasing

Paragraph (3) solves a controversy which has arisen in practice. In order to avoid unnecessary controversy the factual situation must be clarified. The provision addresses the situation which arises after a contractual relationship arising from a contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment has been terminated and the supplied asset has been duly returned to the seller, supplier or lessor. If now the seller, supplier or lessor concludes a new contract of sale or financial leasing with another buyer or lessee and exceptionally realises a higher price – due to changed market conditions or more intensive personal efforts – the issue is whether any surplus over the originally agreed price may be retained by the seller or lessor or whether it is due to the other party under the original contract of sale, hire-purchase, financial leasing or consignment.

The solution chosen by the text attributes the additional profit to the seller, supplier or lessor. The new contract has been concluded separately and independently of the original contract. The original buyer, hire-purchaser, lessee or consignee has not contributed in any way to achieving the additional profit – except indirectly by its default. How could such a non-performance justify a reward?

F. Position of third person transferee of retention of ownership device Paragraph (4) addresses the position of a third person to whom a retention of ownership device has been transferred, particularly on the basis of a transfer of the secured right which includes a transfer of the security right, including a retention of ownership device (IX.–5:301).

Such a transferee of the retention of ownership device assumes the same position as the original seller, supplier or lessor. Consequently, paragraphs (1) to (3) apply to these persons as well.

IX.–7:302: Possession, immobilisation and preservation

IX.–7:201 (Creditor's right to possession of corporeal asset), IX.–7:202 (Creditor's right to immobilise and to preserve encumbered asset) and IX.–7:203 (Intervention of court or other authority) apply in relation to retention of ownership devices with the adaptations set out in IX.–1:104 (Retention of ownership devices: applicable rules) paragraph (2).

COMMENTS

This Article has the purpose of making the rules of this Chapter on regaining possession by the secured creditor and on protective measures after the debtor's default applicable also to retention of ownership devices. The relevant rules are IX.–7:201 to IX.–7:203.

BOOK X

TRUSTS

CHAPTER 1: FUNDAMENTAL PROVISIONS

Section 1: Scope of application and relation to other rules

X.–1:101: Trusts to which this Book applies

(1) This Book applies to trusts created under Chapter 2 (Constitution of trusts).

(2) With appropriate modifications this Book also applies to trusts:

(a) constituted by:

(i) a declaration to that effect set out in an enactment; or

(ii) a court order with prospective effect; or

(b) arising by operation of law set out in an enactment relating to a matter not determined by these rules.

(3) In this Book, "court" includes a public officer or body, if authorised to act under the applicable national law, but does not include an arbitral tribunal.

X.–1:102: Priority of the law of proprietary securities

In relation to trusts for security purposes, this Book is subject to the application of the rules in Book IX (Proprietary security in movable assets).

Section 2: Definition, special legal effects and parties

X.–1:201: Definition of a trust

A trust is a legal relationship in which a trustee is obliged to administer or dispose of one or more assets (the trust fund) in accordance with the terms governing the relationship (trust terms) to benefit a beneficiary or advance public benefit purposes.

X.–1:202: Special legal effects of a trust

(1) A trust takes effect in accordance with the rules in Chapter 10 (Relations to third parties) with the effect that the trust fund is to be regarded as a patrimony distinct from the personal patrimony of the trustee and any other patrimonies vested in or managed by the trustee.

(2) In particular (and except for some reason other than merely that the trust fund is vested in the trustee):

(a) the personal creditors of the trustee may not have recourse to the trust fund, whether by execution or by means of insolvency proceedings;

(b) the trust fund is not subject to rules allocating property rights on the basis of matrimonial or family relationships; and

(c) the trustee's successors are not entitled to benefit from the trust fund on the trustee's death.

X.–1:203: Parties to a trust

(1) The truster is a person who constitutes or intends to constitute a trust by juridical act.

(2) The trustee is the person in whom the trust fund becomes or remains vested when the trust is created or subsequently on or after appointment and who has the obligation set out in X.–1:201 (Definition of a trust).

(3) A beneficiary is a person who, according to the trust terms, has either a right to benefit or an eligibility for benefit from the trust fund.

(4) A trust auxiliary is a person who, according to the trust terms, has a power to appoint or remove a trustee or to consent to a trustee's resignation.

(5) Except as otherwise provided for by this Book:

(a) a truster may also be a trustee or a beneficiary;

(b) a trustee may also be a beneficiary; and

(c) any of those parties to a trust may also be a trust auxiliary.

(6) In this Book a person's "successor" is the heir or representative who under the law of succession becomes entitled to that person's personal patrimony on that person's death. Where the context permits, a reference to a party (or former party) to a trust is a reference to that person's successor if that person has died.

X.–1:204: Plurality of trustees

(1) Where there are several trustees, the trust is solidary.

(2) Where trust assets are vested in several trustees together, their co-ownership is joint.

X.–1:205: Persons entitled to enforce performance of trustee's obligations

(1) A beneficiary has a right to performance of the trustee's obligations so far as they relate to that beneficiary's right to benefit or eligibility for benefit.

(2) The persons who may enforce performance of the trustee's obligations under a trust to advance public benefit purposes are:

(a) any public officer or body having that function; and

(b) any other person having sufficient interest in the performance of the obligations.

(3) A trustee may enforce performance of the obligations of a co-trustee.

X.–1:206: Right to benefit and eligibility for benefit

(1) A person has a right to benefit if the trust terms require the trustee in given circumstances to dispose of all or part of the trust fund so as to confer a benefit on that person.

(2) A person has an eligibility for benefit if the trust terms permit the trustee in given circumstances to dispose of all or part of the trust fund so as to confer a benefit on that person, but whether or not that person is to obtain a benefit depends on an exercise of discretion by the trustee or another.

(3) A beneficiary's eligibility for benefit becomes a right to benefit if the trustee gives the beneficiary notice of a decision to confer benefit on that beneficiary in accordance with the trust terms governing that eligibility.

(4) In this Book "benefit" does not include the exercise by a trustee of a right of recourse to the trust fund.

Section 3: Modifications of and additions to general rules

X.–1:301: Extended meaning of gratuitous

(1) In this Book "gratuitous" means done or provided without reward.

(2) A juridical act or a benefit is also regarded as gratuitous in this Book if, considering the value of the rights created by the juridical act or the benefit provided, the value of the reward is so trivial that fairness requires it to be disregarded.

X.–1:302: Notice

(1) Where this Book requires notice to be given to a person, but it is not reasonably practical to do so, notice may be given instead to the court.

(2) Where there are several trustees, a requirement to give notice to the trustees is satisfied by giving notice to any one of them, but a notice relating to a change in trustees must be given to a trustee who will continue to be a trustee after the change takes effect.

X.–1:303: Mandatory nature of rules

The rules of this Book are mandatory, except as otherwise provided.

CHAPTER 2: CONSTITUTION OF TRUSTS

Section 1: Basic rules on constitution by juridical act

X.–2:101: Requirements for constitution

A trust is constituted in relation to a fund vested in the truster, without any further requirement, if:

(a) the truster declares an intention to constitute a trust in relation to that fund;

(b) the declaration satisfies the requirements set out in X.–2:201 (Requirements for a declaration); and

(c) either X.–2:102 (Constitution by transfer) or X.–2:103 (Constitution without transfer) applies.

X.–2:102: Constitution by transfer

(1) If the other requirements for constitution are satisfied, a trust is constituted when in implementation of the declaration the fund is transferred to a person who agrees to be a trustee or is identified in the declaration as a person who is or is to be a trustee.

(2) The rules on contracts for donation apply analogously to an agreement between truster and intended trustee for the transfer of the fund in the truster's lifetime.

(3) Where the truster has made a binding unilateral undertaking to constitute a trust to a person who is intended to be a trustee of the fund, that person is a trustee of the right to performance of the obligation created by the underaking, unless that right is rejected.

X.–2:103: Constitution without transfer

(1) If the other requirements for constitution are satisfied, a trust is constituted by the declaration alone, without a transfer, if:

(a) the declaration indicates that the truster is to be a sole trustee;

(b) the declaration is testamentary and does not provide for a trustee; or

(c) (i) the truster does all of the acts required of the truster to transfer the fund to the intended trustee,

(ii) the intended trustee does not or cannot accept the fund, and

(iii) the declaration does not provide otherwise.

(2) When a trust is constituted under paragraph (1), the truster becomes a trustee.

Section 2: Declaration

X.–2:201: Requirements for a declaration

(1) The requirements referred to in Section 1 (Basic rules on constitution by juridical act) for a declaration of an intention to constitute a trust are that:

(a) the declaration is made by the truster or a person who has authority to make it on the truster's behalf; and

(b) the declaration complies with any requirement as to form set out in X.–2:203 (Formal requirements for declaration).

(2) No notice or publication of the declaration to any party is required.

X.–2:202: Mode of declaration

(1) A person declares an intention to constitute a trust when that person by statements or conduct indicates an intention that the person in whom the fund is or is to be vested is to be legally bound as a trustee.

(2) In determining whether one or more statements contained in a testamentary or other instrument determining rights over an asset amount to a declaration of an intention to constitute a trust in relation to that asset, an interpretation of those statements which gives effect to their entirety is to be preferred.

X.–2:203: Formal requirements for declaration

(1) Where the transfer of a fund requires the making of an instrument by the transferor, the declaration of an intention to constitute a trust is of no effect unless contained in the instrument of transfer or made in the same or an equivalent form.

(2) A declaration that the truster is to be the sole trustee is of no effect unless made in the same form as a unilateral undertaking to donate.

(3) Where the trust is to be created on the death of the maker of the declaration, the declaration is of no effect unless made by testamentary instrument.

X.–2:204: Revocation or variation of declaration

(1) The maker of a declaration may revoke or vary the declaration or a term of the declaration at any time before the trust is constituted.

(2) A revocation or variation is of no effect unless it satisfies the formality requirements, if any, which applied to the declaration.

(3) However, a declaration or term set out in an instrument may be revoked by substantially destroying or defacing that instrument, so far as it relates to that declaration or term, if the applicable national rules permit a statement intended to have legal effect contained in such an instrument to be revoked by that means.

X.–2:205: Effects when declaration does not satisfy requirements

If the fund is transferred to the intended trustee in implementation of a declaration which does not satisfy the requirements of X.–2:201 (Requirements for a declaration), the transferee takes the fund on the terms of a trust to re-transfer the fund to the truster.

Section 3: Refusal of trust and rejection of right to benefit

X.–2:301: Right of trustee to refuse the trust

(1) If a person has become a trustee without agreeing to act when a trust is constituted, that person may refuse to act as a trustee by notice to:

(a) the truster; or

(b) any co-trustee who has full legal capacity and agrees to act as a trustee.

(2) Refusal may take the form of either a rejection of all the rights which have vested or a disclaimer of the whole trust, but operates as both a rejection and a disclaimer.

(3) A refusal may not be revoked.

(4) Where a person reasonably incurs costs in order to refuse, that person has a right to be reimbursed by any co-trustees who accept the trust fund and agree to act or, if there are no such co-trustees, the truster.

(5) Where a sole trustee refuses or there is no co-trustee who accepts the trust fund and agrees to act, the truster becomes a trustee of the fund in accordance with X.–2:103 (Constitution without transfer) paragraph (1)(c), unless the declaration of the intention to constitute a trust provides otherwise.

(6) Subject to the previous paragraphs of this Article, the requirements for a refusal and its effects are determined by the application or analogous application of II.–4:303 (Right or benefit may be rejected).

X.–2:302: Rejection of right to benefit or eligibility for benefit

A beneficiary's right under II.–4:303 (Right or benefit may be rejected) to reject a right to benefit or an eligibility for benefit is exercised by giving notice to the trustees.

Section 4: Additional rules for particular instances

X.–2:401: Whether donation or trust

(1) Where a person transfers an asset to another gratuitously and it is uncertain whether or to what extent the transferor intends to donate the asset or to constitute a trust in respect of it for the benefit of the transferor, it is presumed that the transferor intends:

(a) to donate to the transferee, if this would be consistent with the relationship between the parties and past or concurrent dealings of the transferor;

(b) in any other case, that the transferee be a trustee for the benefit of the transferor.

(2) A presumption in paragraph (1) may be rebutted (and the alternative intention in paragraph (1) established) by showing that at the time of transfer the transferor did not or, as the case may be, did intend to dispose of the asset for the exclusive benefit of the transferee.

(3) Paragraphs (1) and (2) apply correspondingly where the transfer is to several transferees (including where the transfer is to the transferor and another).

(4) Where it is shown or presumed that the transferor intends to dispose of the fund for the benefit of a transferee only in part, or for the benefit of one transferee, but not a co–transferee, the transferor is to be regarded as intending to constitute a trust for the benefit of the transferee to that extent.

X.–2:402: Priority of rules of succession law

Where the trust is to take effect on the truster's death, the trust is subject to the prior application of those rules of succession law which determine:

(a) how the deceased's estate is to be disposed of in satisfaction of the funeral costs and debts of the deceased; and

(b) (i) whether the truster was free to dispose of any part of the fund,

(ii) whether any person has a claim in respect of any part of the fund by reason of a family or other connection to the deceased, and

(iii) how such claims are to be satisfied.

X.–2:403: Trust in respect of right to legacy pending transfer of legacy

Where a truster declares that a legatee is to be a trustee in relation to a legacy from the truster and that declaration satisfies the requirements set out in X.–2:201 (Requirements for a declaration), but the legacy has not yet been transferred, the legatee is a trustee of the right against the truster's successor which arises in respect of the legacy on the truster's death.

CHAPTER 3: TRUST FUND

Section 1: Requirements for the initial trust fund

X.–3:101: Trust fund

(1) Trust assets, whether or not of the same kind, form a single trust fund if they are vested in the same trustees and either:

(a) the trust terms relating to the assets indicate that they form a single fund or require them to be administered together; or

(b) separate trusts relating to the assets are merged in performance of the obligations under those trusts.

(2) Where trusts are constituted at the same time, on the same terms, and with the same trustees, the trust assets form a single trust fund unless the trust terms provide otherwise.

(3) In this Book "part of the trust fund" means a share of the trust fund, a specific asset or share of an asset in the fund, or a specific amount to be provided out of the fund.

X.–3:102: Permissible trust assets

Trust assets may consist of proprietary or other rights, so far as these are transferable.

X.–3:103: Ascertainability and segregation of the trust fund

(1) A trust is only created in relation to a fund in so far as, at the time the trust is to come into effect,

(a) the fund is sufficiently defined in the trust terms or the assets forming the fund are otherwise ascertainable; and

(b) the fund is segregated from other assets.

(2) A declaration of intention to create a trust in relation to an unsegregated fund is to be regarded, so far as the other terms of the declaration permit, as a declaration of an intention to create a trust of the entire mixture containing the fund on the terms that:

(a) the trustee is obliged to segregate the intended trust fund; and

(b) until the fund is segregated, the rights and obligations envisaged by the terms of the declaration apply in relation to a corresponding part of the mixture.

Section 2: Changes to the trust fund

X.–3:201: Additions to the trust fund

(1) After a trust is created, an asset which is capable of being a trust asset becomes part of the trust fund if it is acquired by a trustee:

(a) in performance of the obligations under the trust;
(b) as an addition to or by making use of the trust fund;
(c) by making use of information or an opportunity obtained in the capacity of trustee, if the use is not in accordance with the terms of the trust; or
(d) when or after the trustee disposed of that asset otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the trust.

(2) Where there are several trustees, an asset may become part of the trust fund in accordance with this Article without being acquired by all of them.

X.–3:202: Subtractions from the trust fund

(1) An asset ceases to be part of the trust fund when it ceases to be vested in a person who is under the obligation set out in X.–1:201 (Definition of a trust).

(2) Where there are several trustees, an asset remains part of the trust fund so long as it is vested in at least one of the trustees in that capacity.

X.–3:203: Mixing of the trust fund with other assets

(1) If trust assets are mixed with other assets vested in the trustee in such a way that the trust assets cease to be identifiable, a trust arises in respect of the mixture and VIII.–5:202 (Commingling) applies analogously, as if each patrimony had a different owner, so as to determine the share of the mixture which is to be administered and disposed of in accordance with the original trust.

(2) If the other assets are the personal patrimony of the trustee, any diminution in the mixture is to be allocated to the trustee's personal share.

X.–3:204: Loss or exhaustion of trust fund

(1) A trust ends when the trust fund has been completely disposed of in performance of the obligations under the trust or for any other reason there ceases to be a trust fund.

(2) Where the trustee is liable to reinstate the trust fund as a result of non-performance of obligations under the trust, the trust revives if the trust fund is reinstated.

CHAPTER 4: TRUST TERMS AND INVALIDITY

Section 1: Trust terms

X.–4:101: Interpretation

Without prejudice to the other rules on the interpretation of unilateral juridical acts, if the meaning of a trust term cannot otherwise be established, interpretations to be preferred are those which:

(a) give effect to the entirety of the words and expressions used;

(b) prevent reasonable conduct of a trustee from amounting to a non-performance;

(c) prevent or best reduce any incompleteness in provision for disposal of the trust fund; and

(d) confer on the truster a right to benefit or enlarge such right, if the trust is constituted gratuitously in the truster's lifetime and the truster has or may have reserved such a right.

X.–4:102: Incomplete disposal of the trust fund

(1) To the extent that the trust terms and the rules of this Book do not otherwise dispose of the trust fund in circumstances which have arisen, the trust fund is to be disposed of for the benefit of the truster.

(2) However, if the incomplete disposal of the trust fund arises because effect cannot be given to a trust for advancement of a public benefit purpose or because performance of the obligations under such a trust does not exhaust the trust fund, the trust fund is to be disposed of for the advancement of the public benefit purpose which most closely resembles the original purpose.

X.–4:103: Ascertainability of beneficiaries

(1) A trust term which purports to confer a right to benefit is valid only if the beneficiary is sufficiently identified by the truster or is otherwise ascertainable at the time the benefit is due.

(2) A trust term which permits a trustee to benefit those members of a class of persons which the trustee or a third person selects is valid only if, at the time the selection is permitted, it can be determined with reasonable certainty whether any given person is a member of that class.

(3) A person may be a beneficiary notwithstanding that that person comes into existence only after the trust is created.

X.–4:104: Ascertainability of right to benefit or eligibility for benefit

(1) A right to benefit or eligibility for benefit is valid only in so far as the benefit is sufficiently defined in the trust terms or is otherwise ascertainable at the time the benefit is due or to be conferred.

(2) If the benefit to be conferred is not ascertainable only because a third party cannot or does not make a choice, the trustees may make that choice unless the trust terms provide otherwise.

X.–4:105: Trusts to pay creditors

A trust for the purpose of paying a debt, or for the benefit of a creditor as such, takes effect as a trust to benefit the debtor by a performance of the debtor's obligation discharging the debtor.

Section 2: Invalidity

X.–4:201: Avoidance by the truster

Without prejudice to other necessary adaptations, Book II Chapter 7 (Grounds of invalidity) is modified as follows in its application to trusts constituted gratuitously in the truster's lifetime:

(a) the truster may avoid the trust or a trust term if the trust was constituted or the term included because of a mistake of fact or law, regardless of whether the requirements of II.–7:201 (Mistake) paragraph (1)(b) are satisfied;

(b) a truster who was dependent on, or was the more vulnerable party in a relationship of trust with, a beneficiary may avoid the trust or a trust term in so far as it provides for benefit to that beneficiary unless that beneficiary proves that the beneficiary did not exploit the truster's situation by taking an excessive benefit or grossly unfair advantage;

(c) the reasonable time for giving notice of avoidance (II.–7:210 (Time)) does not commence so long as:

(i) the truster exercises an exclusive right to benefit from the income; or

(ii) the trust fund consists of one or more rights to benefit which are not yet due; and

(d) where sub-paragraph (c)(i) applies, acceptance of benefit is not to be regarded as an implied confirmation of the trust

X.–4:202: Protection of trustees and third parties after avoidance

(1) The trustee's title to the trust fund is unaffected by avoidance.

(2) Unless the trustee knew or could reasonably be expected to know that the trust or trust term might be avoided:

(a) a trustee is not liable in respect of any administration or disposition of the trust fund which was in accordance with the terms of the trust before the trust was avoided;

(b) a trustee may invoke against the person entitled to benefit as a result of avoidance defences which the trustee could have invoked against the beneficiary who had a right to that benefit before avoidance; and

(c) a trustee retains any right of recourse to the trust fund which arose before avoidance.

(3) Avoidance of the trust does not affect the rights of a third party who before avoidance acquired a beneficiary's right to benefit, or a security right or other limited right in that right to benefit, if:

(a) the third party neither knew nor had reason to know that the trust or trust term could be avoided; and
(b) the disposition is not gratuitous.

X.–4:203: Unenforceable trust purposes

(1) A trust which is for a purpose other than to benefit beneficiaries or to advance public benefit purposes takes effect as a trust for the truster.

(2) The trustee has a revocable authority to dispose of the trust fund in accordance with the original trust for the advancement of the unenforceable purpose in so far as:

(a) advancement of that purpose does not infringe a fundamental principle or mandatory rule and is not contrary to the public interest;
(b) it can be determined with reasonable certainty whether any given disposal of the trust fund is or is not for its advancement; and
(c) the disposal is not manifestly disproportionate to any likely benefit from that disposal.

CHAPTER 5: TRUSTEE DECISION-MAKING AND POWERS

Section 1: Trustee decision–making

X.–5:101: Trustee discretion

(1) Subject to the obligations of a trustee under this Book and exceptions provided for by other rules, the trustees are free to determine whether, when and how the exercise of their powers and discretions is best suited to performing their obligations under the trust.

(2) Except in so far as the trust terms or other rules provide otherwise, the trustees are not bound by, and are not to regard themselves as bound by, any directions or wishes of any of the parties to the trust or other persons.

(3) The trustees are not obliged to disclose the reasons for the exercise of their discretion unless the trust is for the advancement of a public benefit purpose or the trust terms provide otherwise.

X.–5:102: Decision-making by several trustees

If there are several trustees, their powers and discretions are exercised by simple majority decision unless the trust terms or other rules of this Book provide otherwise.

X.–5:103: Conflict of interest in exercise of power or discretion

Unless the trust terms provide otherwise, a trustee may not participate in a decision to exercise or not to exercise a power or discretion if the effect of the decision is to confer, confirm, or enlarge a right to benefit or eligibility for benefit in favour of the trustee.

Section 2: Powers of a trustee

Sub-section 1: General rules

X.–5:201: Powers in general

(1) Except where restricted by the trust terms or other rules of this Book, a trustee may do any act in performance of the obligations under the trust which:

(a) an owner of the fund might lawfully do; or

(b) a person might be authorised to do on behalf of another.

(2) Subject to restrictions or modifications in the trust terms, the other Articles of this Section provide for the powers of a trustee in particular cases.

X.–5:202: Restriction in case of minimum number of trustees

(1) Where there are fewer trustees than a minimum required by the trust terms or these rules, the trustees may only exercise:

(a) a power to appoint trustees;

(b) the right to apply to court for assistance;

(c) a right under X.–6:201 (Right of reimbursement and indemnification out of the trust fund); and

(d) any other right or power of a trustee to the extent that its exercise is:

(i) expressly provided for in the circumstances by the trust terms;

(ii) necessary for the preservation of the trust fund; or

(iii) necessary for the satisfaction of trust debts whose performance is due or impending.

(2) If the trust is constituted by a transfer to at least two trustees the minimum number of trustees is two, unless the trust terms provide otherwise.

Sub-section 2: Particular powers of a trustee

X.–5:203: Power to authorise agent

(1) The trustees may authorise an agent to act on behalf of the trustees and, subject to the restrictions set out in the following Articles of this Section, may entrust to another performance of obligations under the trust.

(2) Several trustees may authorise one of them to act on their behalf.

(3) However, personal performance by a trustee is required for decisions as to whether or how to exercise:

(a) a discretion to confer benefit on a beneficiary or to choose a public benefit purpose to be advanced or its manner of advancement;

(b) a power to change the trustees; or

(c) a power to delegate performance of obligations under the trust.

(4) A person to whom performance of an obligation is entrusted has the same obligations as a trustee, so far as they relate to that performance.

(5) A trustee is obliged not to conclude, without good reason, a contract of mandate which is not in writing or which includes the following terms:

(a) a term conferring an irrevocable mandate;

(b) terms excluding the obligations of an agent set out in Book IV.D., Chapter 3, Section 1 (Main obligations of agent) or modifying them to the detriment of the principal;

(c) a term permitting the agent to subcontract;

(d) terms permitting a conflict of interest on the part of the agent;

(e) a term excluding or restricting the agent's liability to the principal for non-performance.

(6) The trustees are obliged to keep the performance of the agent under review and, if required in the circumstances, give a direction to the agent or terminate the mandate relationship.

X.–5:204: Power to transfer title to person undertaking to be a trustee

(1) The trustees may transfer trust assets to a person who undertakes to be a trustee in relation to the assets and to dispose of them as the original trustees direct and in default of any such direction to transfer them back to the original trustees on demand.

(2) The recipient must be:

(a) a person who gives such undertakings in the course of business;

(b) a legal person controlled by the trustees; or

(c) a legal person designated in an enactment as eligible to carry out such a trust obligation or satisfying requirements set out therein for this purpose

(3) X.–5:203 (Power to authorise agent) paragraphs (5) and (6) apply correspondingly.

X.–5:205: Power to transfer physical control to a storer

(1) The trustees may place trust assets and documents relating to those assets in the physical control of a person who undertakes to keep the trust assets safe and to deliver them back to the trustees on demand.

(2) X.–5:204 (Power to transfer title to person undertaking to be a trustee) paragraphs (2) and (3) apply correspondingly.

X.–5:206: Power to delegate

A trustee may entrust to another the performance of any of the trustee's obligations under the trust and the exercise of any of the trustee's powers, including the exercise of a discretion, authority to dispose of trust assets and the power to delegate, but remains responsible for performance in accordance with III.–2:106 (Performance entrusted to another).

X.–5:207: Power to select investments

In so far as the trustees are obliged to invest the trust fund, the trustees may invest in any form of investment and determine the particular manner of investment which is best suited to fulfil that obligation.

X.–5:208: Power to submit trust accounts for audit

Where appropriate, a trustee may submit the trust accounts for an audit by an independent and competent auditor.

CHAPTER 6: OBLIGATIONS AND RIGHTS OF TRUSTEES AND TRUST AUXILIARIES

Section 1: Obligations of a trustee

Sub-section 1: General rules

X.–6:101: General obligation of a trustee

(1) A trustee is obliged to administer the trust fund and exercise any power to dispose of the fund as a prudent manager of another's affairs for the benefit of the beneficiaries or the advancement of the public benefit purposes, in accordance with the law and the trust terms.

(2) In particular, a trustee is obliged to act with the required care and skill, fairly and in good faith.

(3) Except in so far as the trust terms provide otherwise:

(a) these obligations include the particular obligations set out in X.–6:102 (Required care and skill) and the following sub-section; and

(b) an administration or disposal of the trust fund is of benefit to a beneficiary only if it is for that person's economic benefit.

X.–6:102: Required care and skill

(1) A trustee is required to act with the care and skill which can be expected of a reasonably competent and careful person managing another's affairs, having regard to whether the trustee has a right to remuneration.

(2) If the trustee is acting in the course of a profession, the trustee must act with the care and skill that is expected of a member of that profession.

Sub-section 2: Particular obligations of a trustee

X.–6:103: Obligations to segregate, safeguard and insure

(1) A trustee is obliged to keep the trust fund segregated from other patrimony and to keep the trust assets safe.

(2) In particular, a trustee may not invest in assets which are especially at risk of misappropriation unless particular care is taken for their safekeeping. Where the asset is a document embodying a right to a performance which is owed to whoever is the holder of the document, such care is taken if the document is placed in a storer's safekeeping in accordance with X.–5:205 (Power to transfer physical control to a storer).

(3) So far as it is possible and appropriate to do so, the trustee is obliged to insure the trust assets against loss.

X.–6:104: Obligation to inform and report

(1) A trustee is obliged to inform a beneficiary who has a right to benefit of the existence of the trust and that beneficiary's right.

(2) A trustee is obliged to make reasonable efforts to inform a beneficiary who has an eligibility for benefit of the existence of the trust and that beneficiary's eligibility.

(3) In determining what efforts are reasonable for the purposes of paragraph (2), regard is to be had to:

- (a) whether the expense required is proportionate to the value of the benefit which might be conferred on that beneficiary;
- (b) whether the beneficiary is a member of a class whose members the trustee is required to benefit; and
- (c) the practicalities of identifying and communicating with the beneficiary.

(4) So far as appropriate, a trustee is obliged to make available information about the state and investment of the trust fund, trust debts, and disposals of trust assets and their proceeds.

X.–6:105: Obligation to keep trust accounts

A trustee is obliged to keep accounts in respect of the trust funds (trust accounts).

X.–6:106: Obligation to permit inspection and copying of trust documents

(1) A trustee must permit a beneficiary or other person entitled to enforce performance of the obligations under the trust to inspect the trust documents and to make copies of them at that person's own expense.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply to:

- (a) the opinions of a legal adviser relating to actual or contemplated legal proceedings by the trustees in that capacity against the person seeking inspection; and evidence gathered for such proceedings;
- (b) communications between the trustees and other beneficiaries and any other communications whose disclosure would result in a breach of confidence owed by the trustees in that capacity to another.

(3) The trustees may refuse inspection and copying of trust documents so far as these relate to information which is confidential to the trustees in that capacity if the beneficiary does not provide adequate assurance that the confidentiality will be maintained.

(4) Unless the trust is for the advancement of public benefit purposes, the trustees may also refuse inspection and copying of documents so far as the documents disclose the reasons for the trustees' decision to exercise or not to exercise a discretion, the deliberations of the trustees which preceded that decision, and material relevant to the deliberations.

(5) The trust terms may enlarge the rights of inspection and copying which are provided for by this Article.

(6) In this Book "trust documents" are:

(a) any documents containing the truster's declaration of intentions relating to the trust (whether or not intended to be binding) and any juridical act or court order varying the trust terms;

(b) minutes of meetings of the trustees;

(c) records made and notices and other communications in writing received by a trustee in that capacity, including the opinions of a legal adviser engaged by a trustee at the trust fund's expense;

(d) any documents containing juridical acts concluded or made by the trustees;

(e) receipts for disposal of trust assets; and

(f) the trust accounts.

X.–6:107: Obligation to invest

(1) A trustee is obliged to invest the trust fund, so far as available for investment, and in particular:

(a) to dispose of assets which ordinarily neither produce income nor increase in value and to invest the proceeds;

(b) to take professional advice on investment of the fund, if the trustees lack the expertise required for the efficient and prudent investment of funds of the size and nature of the trust fund;

(c) to make a spread of investments in which overall:

(i) the risks of failure or loss of particular investments are diversified; and

(ii) the expected gain significantly outweighs the potential failure or loss; unless the trust fund is so small that a spread of investments is inappropriate; and

(d) to review at appropriate intervals the suitableness of retaining or changing the investments.

(2) A trustee is not obliged to invest assets:

(a) which are imminently required for transfer to or use by a beneficiary or for satisfaction of a trust debt; or

(b) whose investment would otherwise impede the trustees in carrying out their other obligations under this Book.

(3) The obligation to invest does not authorise a trustee to dispose of trust assets which according to the trust terms are to be retained by the trustees or transferred in kind to a beneficiary.

X.–6:108: Obligation not to acquire trust assets or trust creditors' rights

(1) A trustee is obliged not to purchase a trust asset or the right of a trust creditor against the trustees, whether personally or by means of an agent.

(2) A contract for the sale of a trust asset which is concluded as a result of non-performance of this obligation may be avoided by any other party to the trust or any person entitled to enforce performance of the obligations under the trust.

(3) The right to avoid is in addition to any remedy for non-performance.

(4) This Article applies with appropriate modifications to other contracts for the acquisition or use of a trust asset or a right corresponding to a trust debt.

X.–6:109: Obligation not to obtain unauthorised enrichment or advantage

(1) A trustee is obliged not to make use of the trust fund, or information or an opportunity obtained in the capacity of trustee, to obtain an enrichment unless that use is authorised by the trust terms.

(2) A trustee may not set off a right to performance from a beneficiary, which is owed to the trustee in a personal capacity, against that beneficiary's right to benefit.

X.–6:110: Obligations regarding co-trustees

A trustee is obliged to:

- (a) cooperate with co-trustees in performing the obligations under the trust; and
- (b) take appropriate action if a trustee knows or has reason to suspect that:
  - (i) a co-trustee has failed to perform any obligation under, or arising out of, the trust, or such non-performance is impending; and
  - (ii) the non-performance is likely to result or have resulted in loss to the trust fund.

Section 2: Rights of a trustee

X.–6:201: Right to reimbursement and indemnification out of the trust fund

A trustee has a right to reimbursement or indemnification out of the trust fund in respect of expenditure and trust debts which the trustee incurs in performance of the obligations under the trust.

X.–6:202: Right to remuneration out of the trust fund

(1) A trustee has a right to such remuneration out of the trust fund as is provided for by the trust terms.

(2) Unless this is inconsistent with the trust terms, a trustee who acts as a trustee in the course of a profession has a right to reasonable remuneration out of the trust fund for work done in performance of the obligations under the trust.

(3) Paragraph (2) does not apply if:

- (a) the trustee, in the capacity of beneficiary, is entitled to significant benefit from the trust fund; or

(b) the trust was created as a result of a contract between the trustee and the truster; or

(c) the trust is for the advancement of public benefit purposes.

X.–6:203: Rights in respect of unauthorised acquisitions

(1) This Article applies where:

(a) a trustee acquires an asset or other enrichment as a result of a non-performance of an obligation under the trust; and

(b) the asset becomes part of the trust fund or the enrichment is added to the trust fund in performance of an obligation to disgorge.

(2) The trustee has a right to reimbursement or indemnification for any expenditure or obligation which it was necessary to incur to make the acquisition. If the trustee previously satisfied in full or in part a liability under X.–7:201 (Liability of trustee to reinstate the trust fund), the trustee has a right to reimbursement from the trust fund to the extent that after the acquisition the trust fund is more than reinstated.

(3) The trustee also has a right to reasonable remuneration if:

(a) the acquisition was made in good faith to increase the trust fund; and

(b) the trustee would be entitled to remuneration under X.–6:202 (Right to remuneration out of the trust fund) paragraph (2)(b) if the acquisition had been in performance of an obligation under the trust.

(4) If the acquisition resulted from a non-performance of the obligation under X.–6:109 (Obligation not to obtain unauthorised enrichment or advantage) to which a beneficiary validly consented, the trustee may waive the rights under paragraphs (2) and (3) and take over the consenting beneficiary's right to benefit from the acquisition.

(5) A trustee is not entitled under this Article to more than the value of the acquisition.

X.–6:204: Corresponding rights against beneficiaries

(1) Where the right of a trustee under X.–6:201 (Right to reimbursement and indemnification out of the trust fund) exceeds the trust fund, the trustee may recover the excess from the beneficiaries.

(2) The liability of a beneficiary under paragraph (1) is:

(a) limited to the enrichment which that beneficiary has obtained in accordance with the trust terms; and

(b) subject to the defence of disenrichment, VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment) applying with appropriate adaptations.

(3) The right to recover under paragraph (1) ends six months after the right to reimbursement or indemnification has arisen.

X.–6:205: Right to insure against personal liability at trust fund's expense

(1) A trustee has a right to reimbursement or indemnification out of the trust fund in respect of expenditure or a debt which the trustee reasonably incurs to obtain insurance against liability under X.–7:201 (Liability of trustee to reinstate the trust fund).

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply in so far as:

(a) the trustee has a right to remuneration for performing the obligations under the trust; or

(b) the insurance is against liability arising out of a non-performance which is intentional or grossly negligent.

Section 3: Obligations of a trust auxiliary

X.–6:301: Obligations of a trust auxiliary

(1) A trust auxiliary is obliged to disclose the identity of the trustees if this information is known to the trust auxiliary and is not otherwise apparent.

(2) In deciding whether to exercise a power a trust auxiliary is obliged:

(a) to act in good faith; and

(b) not to obtain an enrichment which is not authorised by the trust terms.

CHAPTER 7: REMEDIES FOR NON-PERFORMANCE

Section 1: Specific performance, judicial review and ancillary remedies

X.–7:101: Specific performance

(1) The enforcement of specific performance of an obligation under the trust includes the prevention of a trustee from disposing of or otherwise dealing with a trust asset otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the trust.

(2) Specific performance cannot be enforced if performance requires a trustee to exercise a discretion.

X.–7:102: Judicial review

(1) On the application of a party to the trust or a person entitled to enforce performance of an obligation under the trust, a court may review a decision of the trustees or a trust auxiliary whether or how to exercise a power or discretion conferred on them by the trust terms or this Book.

(2) A former trustee who has been removed by the trustees or a trust auxiliary without the trustee's consent has a corresponding right to judicial review of that decision.

(3) A court may avoid a decision of the trustees or a trust auxiliary which is irrational or grossly unreasonable, motivated by irrelevant or improper considerations, or otherwise an abuse of power or outside the powers of the trustees or the trust auxiliary.

X.–7:103: Further remedies

Other rules may provide for:

(a) accounts and inquiries concerning the trust fund and its administration and disposal, as directed by court order;

(b) payment or transfer into court of money or other assets in the trust fund;
(c) the appointment by court order of a receiver to administer a trust fund;
(d) the exercise of rights and powers of a trustee by a public officer or body, in particular in relation to trusts to advance public benefit purposes;
(e) suspension of the rights and powers of the trustees to administer and dispose of the fund;

in cases of actual or suspected non-performance of the obligations under the trust.

Section 2: Reparation and disgorgement of unauthorised enrichment

X.–7:201: Liability of trustee to reinstate the trust fund

(1) A trustee is liable to reinstate the trust fund in respect of loss caused to the trust fund by non-performance of any obligation under, or arising out of, the trust, if the non-performance:

(a) is not excused; and
(b) results from the trustee's failure to exercise the required care and skill.

(2) However, a person is liable under paragraph (1) only if that person knew, or it was manifest, that that person was a trustee.

(3) A trustee is not liable merely because a co-trustee, an agent or other person entrusted with performance, or an authorised recipient of trust assets has caused loss to the trust fund.

(4) Paragraph (3) does not prejudice any liability of the trustee arising:

(a) under paragraph (1) out of the trustee's own non-performance of an obligation under the trust, in particular:

(i) an obligation to act with the required care and skill when choosing to appoint or engage that person and agreeing the terms of the engagement; or
(ii) the obligation to keep the performance of that person under review and, if required in the circumstances, to take measures to protect the trust fund; or

(b) out of delegation of performance (X.–5:206 (Power to delegate));

(c) under VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives); or

(d) because the trustee induced, assisted or collaborated in that person's non-performance.

(5) III.–3:702 (General measure of damages) applies with appropriate adaptations to determine the measure of reinstatement.

(6) The following rights of a trustee are suspended until the trustee has completely reinstated the trust fund:

(a) any right of recourse to the trust fund; and
(b) any right to benefit which the trustee has in the capacity of beneficiary.

(7) This Article is subject to the trust terms.

X.–7:202: Liability of trustee to compensate a beneficiary

(1) A trustee who is liable under X.–7:201 (Liability of trustee to reinstate the trust fund) is also obliged to compensate a beneficiary who, despite reinstatement of the trust fund, does not obtain a benefit to which that beneficiary was entitled or, if there had been no failure of performance, would have been entitled under the trust terms.

(2) The beneficiary has the same right to compensation as arises from non-performance of a contractual obligation.

(3) This Article is subject to the trust terms.

X.–7:203: Disgorgement of unauthorised enrichment

Where a trustee obtains an enrichment as a result of non-performance of the obligation under X.–6:109 (Obligation not to obtain unauthorised enrichment or advantage) and that enrichment does not become part of the trust fund under X.–3:201 (Additions to the trust fund), the trustee is obliged to add the enrichment to the trust fund or, if that is not possible, to add its monetary value.

Section 3: Defences

X.–7:301: Consent of beneficiary to non-performance

(1) A trustee has a defence to liability to the extent that reinstatement, compensation or disgorgement would benefit a beneficiary who validly consented to the non-performance.

(2) A beneficiary consents to a non-performance when that beneficiary agrees to conduct of the trustee which amounts to a non-performance and either:

- (a) the beneficiary knew that such conduct would amount to a non-performance; or
- (b) it was manifest that such conduct would amount to a non-performance.

(3) Paragraph (1) applies whether or not the non-performance enriched or disadvantaged the beneficiary who consented.

(4) Where a beneficiary participates in the non-performance in the capacity of trustee, paragraph (1) applies in relation to any co-trustees who are liable. A right of recourse between the solidary debtors as regards any residual liability to reinstate the trust fund or compensate a beneficiary is unaffected.

(5) A consent is not valid if it results from a mistake which was caused by false information given by the trustee or the trustee's non-performance of an obligation to inform.

X.–7:302: Prescription

The general period of prescription for a right to performance of an obligation under a trust does not begin to run against a beneficiary until benefit to that beneficiary is due.

X.–7:303 Protection of the trustee

(1) A trustee is discharged by performing to a person who, after reasonable inquiry, appears to be entitled to the benefit conferred.

(2) The right of the beneficiary who was entitled to the benefit against the recipient of the benefit arising under Book VII (Unjustified enrichment) is unaffected.

Section 4: Solidary liability and forfeiture

X.–7:401: Solidary liability

(1) Where several trustees are liable in respect of the same non-performance, their liability is solidary.

(2) As between the solidary debtors themselves, the shares of liability are in proportion to each debtor's relative responsibility for the non-performance, having regard to each debtor's skills and experience as a trustee.

(3) A debtor's relative responsibility for a non-performance to which that debtor consented is not reduced merely because that debtor took no active part in bringing it about.

X.–7:402: Forfeiture of collaborating beneficiary's right to benefit

(1) Where a beneficiary collaborated in a trustee's non-performance, a court may order on the application of that trustee or another beneficiary that the right to benefit of the beneficiary who collaborated be forfeited.

(2) The right to benefit of a beneficiary who validly consented to the non-performance, but did not collaborate in it, may be forfeited only to the extent that the beneficiary has been enriched by the non-performance.

(3) To the extent that a beneficiary's right to benefit is forfeited under this Article, benefit which is otherwise due to that beneficiary is to be applied so as to satisfy the trustee's liability until either the liability is extinguished or the right to benefit is exhausted.

CHAPTER 8: CHANGE OF TRUSTEES OR TRUST AUXILIARY

Section 1: General rules on change of trustees

X.–8:101: Powers to change trustees in general

(1) After the creation of a trust, a person may be appointed a trustee and a trustee may resign or be removed:

(a) in accordance with a power:

(i) under the trust terms or

(ii) conferred on the trustees by this Section; or

(b) by court order under this Section.

(2) The exercise of a power within paragraph (1)(a) is of no effect unless it is in writing. The same applies to a binding direction to trustees regarding the exercise of such a power.

(3) An exercise of a power under the trust terms by a person who is not also a continuing trustee does not take effect until notice is given to the continuing trustees.

(4) The resignation or removal of a sole trustee is effective only if a substitute trustee is appointed at the same time.

X.–8:102: Powers to change trustees conferred on trustees

(1) The powers conferred by this Section on trustees may only be exercised:

(a) by unanimous decision; and

(b) if in the circumstances a trust auxiliary does not have a corresponding power or the trust auxiliary cannot or does not exercise such a power within a reasonable period after a request to do so by the trustees.

(2) Subject to paragraph (1), the trustees are obliged to exercise their powers under this Section in accordance with any joint direction by the beneficiaries if the beneficiaries have a joint right to terminate the trust in respect of the whole fund.

(3) The trust terms may modify or exclude the powers conferred by this Section on trustees.

Section 2: Appointment of trustees

X.–8:201: General restrictions on appointments

(1) An appointment of a person as trustee is of no effect if:

(a) it is manifest that the co-trustees would have power to remove that person, if appointed, on grounds of that person's inability, refusal to act, or unsuitability;

(b) the person appointed does not agree to act as trustee; or

(c) the appointment exceeds a maximum number of trustees provided for by the trust terms.

(2) A provision in the trust terms that there is to be only one trustee takes effect as a maximum of two.

X.–8:202: Appointment by trust auxiliary or trustees

(1) The trustees may appoint one or more additional trustees.

(2) The continuing trustees may appoint a substitute trustee for a person who has ceased to be a trustee.

(3) Unless the trust terms provide otherwise, a self-appointment by a trust auxiliary is of no effect.

X.–8:203: Appointment by court order

On the application of any party to the trust or any person entitled to enforce performance of an obligation under the trust, a court may appoint:

(a) a substitute trustee for a person who has ceased to be a trustee, or

(b) one or more additional trustees,

if in the circumstances:

(i) no one else is able and willing to exercise a power to appoint; and

(ii) the appointment is likely to promote the efficient and prudent administration and disposal of the trust fund in accordance with the trust terms.

Section 3: Resignation of trustees

X.–8:301: Resignation with consent of trust auxiliary or co-trustees

(1) A trust auxiliary who may appoint a substitute trustee in the event of the trustee's resignation may consent to a resignation.

(2) A trust auxiliary may consent to a resignation without the consent of the continuing trustees only if a substitute trustee is appointed at the same time.

(3) The continuing trustees may consent to a resignation.

(4) A trustee may only resign with the consent of a trust auxiliary or co-trustees if after resignation there will be at least two continuing trustees or a special trustee.

(5) Special trustees, for the purposes of this Book, are:

(a) any public officer or body having the function of acting as a trustee; and

(b) any legal persons designated as such in an enactment or satisfying requirements set out in an enactment for this purpose.

X.–8:302: Resignation with approval of court

A court may approve the resignation of a trustee who cannot otherwise resign if it is fair to release the trustee from obligations under the trust, having regard in particular to whether after resignation an efficient and prudent administration and disposal of the trust fund in accordance with the trust terms can be secured.

Section 4: Removal of trustees

X.–8:401: Removal by trust auxiliary or co-trustees

(1) Where a court might remove a trustee on grounds of inability, refusal to act, or unsuitability, the continuing trustees may remove that trustee.

(2) The removal of a trustee by a trust auxiliary or the trustees does not take effect until notice of the removal is given to the trustee who is to be removed.

X.–8:402: Removal by court order

(1) On the application of any party to the trust, a court may remove a trustee without that trustee's consent and regardless of the trust terms if it is inappropriate for the trustee to remain a trustee, in particular on grounds of the trustee's:

(a) inability;

(b) actual or anticipated material non-performance of any obligation under, or arising out of, the trust;
(c) unsuitability;
(d) permanent or recurrent fundamental disagreement with co-trustees on a matter requiring a unanimous decision of the trustees; or
(e) other interests which substantially conflict with performance of the obligations under, or arising out of, the trust.

Section 5: Effect of change of trustees

X.–8:501: Effect on trustees' obligations and rights

(1) A person who is appointed a trustee becomes bound by the trust and acquires the corresponding rights and powers. Subject to the following paragraphs of this Article, a trustee who resigns or is removed is released from the trust and loses those rights and powers.

(2) The obligation to cooperate with co-trustees does not end until the expiry of a reasonable period after resignation or removal.

(3) A former trustee's right of recourse to the trust fund takes effect as a right against the continuing trustees. A right to reimbursement, indemnification or remuneration by a beneficiary is unaffected.

(4) A former trustee remains bound by:

(a) the obligation in X.–6:109 (Obligation not to obtain unauthorised enrichment or advantage);
(b) trust debts; and
(c) obligations arising from non-performance.

X.–8:502: Vesting and divesting of trust assets

(1) Title to a trust asset vests in a person on appointment as a trustee, without a court order to that effect, if that title is:

(a) capable of transfer by agreement between a transferor and a transferee without the necessity for any further act of transfer or formality; or
(b) regarded under the applicable national law as vested in the trustees as a body.

(2) The vesting of an asset in a person who is appointed a trustee does not divest any continuing trustees.

(3) A person who resigns or is removed as a trustee is divested correspondingly.

X.–8:503: Transmission of trust documents

A continuing or substitute trustee is entitled to the delivery up of trust documents in the possession of a former trustee. The person in possession has the right to make and retain copies at that person's own expense.

X.–8:504: Effect of death or dissolution of trustee

(1) Where one of several trustees dies or a corporate trustee is dissolved, the trust fund remains vested in the continuing trustees. This applies to the exclusion of any person succeeding to a deceased or dissolved trustee's other patrimony.

(2) Where a sole trustee dies, the deceased trustee's successors become trustees and accordingly:

(a) the trustee's successors become subject to the trust and acquire the corresponding rights and powers;

(b) the trustee's successors become liable for trust debts incurred by the deceased trustee to the extent of the deceased trustee's estate; and

(c) the trust fund vests in the trustee's successors, but the trustee's successors may only exercise the powers set out in X.–5:202 (Restriction in case of minimum number of trustees) paragraph (1), of regardless of the number of successors.

(3) A trustee's testamentary disposition of the trust fund is of no effect, but. the trust terms may confer a testamentary power to appoint a trustee.

(4) Obligations arising from non-performance devolve on the deceased trustee's successor.

Section 6: Death or dissolution of trust auxiliary

X.–8:601: Effect of death or dissolution of trust auxiliary

A power of a trust auxiliary ends when the trust auxiliary dies or is dissolved, but the trust terms may permit a testamentary exercise of the power.

CHAPTER 9: TERMINATION AND VARIATION OF TRUSTS AND TRANSFER OF RIGHTS TO BENEFIT

Section 1: Termination

Sub-section 1: General rules on termination

X.–9:101: Modes of termination

(1) A trust in respect of a fund or part of a fund may be terminated:

(a) by a truster or beneficiaries in accordance with a right provided for by the trust terms;

(b) by a truster in accordance with X.–9:103 (Right of truster to terminate a gratuitous trust);

(c) by a beneficiary in accordance with X.–9:104 (Right of beneficiaries to terminate);

(d) by a trustee under X.–9:108 (Termination by trustee);

(e) by merger of rights and obligations under X.–9:109 (Merger of right and obligation)

X.–9:102: Effect of termination on trustee liabilities

(1) To the extent that the trust is terminated the trustee is discharged.

(2) Unless the parties concerned agree otherwise, termination of the trust does not release a trustee from liability:

(a) to a beneficiary arising out of the trustee's non-performance of any obligation under, or arising out of, the trust; or

(b) to a trust creditor.

Sub-section 2: Termination by truster or beneficiaries

X.–9:103: Right of truster to terminate a gratuitous trust

(1) Except as provided for by paragraphs (2) and (3), a truster has no implied right to terminate a trust or a trust term merely because the trust was constituted gratuitously, irrespective of whether:

(a) the trust was constituted without a transfer by the truster;

(b) the truster reserved a right to benefit during the truster's lifetime.

(2) A truster may terminate a gratuitously constituted trust, or a term of such a trust, which is for the benefit of a person who does not yet exist.

(3) A truster may terminate a gratuitously constituted trust for the benefit of another to the same extent that the truster might have revoked a donation to that beneficiary if the benefit had been conferred by way of donation.

X.–9:104: Right of beneficiaries to terminate

(1) A beneficiary of full legal capacity may terminate the trust in respect of a fund or part of the fund which is for that beneficiary's exclusive benefit.

(2) If each is of full legal capacity, several beneficiaries have a corresponding joint right to terminate the trust in respect of a fund or part of the fund which is for the exclusive benefit of those beneficiaries.

(3) A trust may not be terminated in respect of part of the fund if this would adversely affect the trust in respect of the rest of the fund for the benefit of other beneficiaries or for the advancement of public benefit purposes.

X.–9:105: Meaning of "exclusive benefit"

(1) A fund or part of a fund is to be regarded as for a beneficiary's exclusive benefit if all of that capital and all of the future income from that capital can only be disposed of in accordance with the trust terms for the benefit of that beneficiary or that beneficiary's estate.

(2) For the purposes of paragraph (1) the possibility that the beneficiary might give a consent, or might fail to exercise a right adverse to that beneficiary's own benefit, is to be disregarded.

X.–9:106: Notice of termination and its effects

(1) A truster or beneficiary exercises a right to terminate by giving notice in writing to the trustees.

(2) A trust or part of a trust which is terminated by the truster takes effect from that time as a trust for the benefit of the truster.

(3) Where a beneficiary, exercising a right to terminate, instructs the trustee to transfer to someone other than the beneficiary, notice of termination vests in that person the right to benefit from the fund or part of the fund which is to be transferred.

(4) Unless the transfer is impossible or unlawful, the trustee is obliged to transfer the fund or part of the fund in accordance with the notice of termination and without delay. The obligation to transfer supersedes the obligation to administer and dispose of the fund or part in accordance with the trust terms.

(5) If a transfer is impossible because it would require the grant of an undivided share in an asset for which undivided shares are not allowed, the trustee is obliged:

(a) to divide the asset and transfer the divided share, so far as this is possible and reasonable; and otherwise

(b) to sell the asset, if this is possible, and transfer the corresponding share of the proceeds.

(5) The trust is terminated when and to the extent that the required transfer is made.

X.–9:107: Trustee's right to withhold

(1) A trustee may withhold such part of the fund which is to be transferred as is needed to satisfy:

(a) trust debts;

(b) the trustee's accrued rights of recourse to the fund; and

(c) the costs of transfer and of any required division or sale of an asset, so far as those debts, rights and costs are allocated to the part of the fund which is to be transferred.

(2) The right to withhold ends if the person exercising the right to terminate pays compensation for the debts, rights and costs allocated to the part of the fund which is to be transferred.

Sub-section 3: Other modes of termination

X.–9:108: Termination by trustee

(1) Where a beneficiary has a right to terminate a trust under X.–9:104 (Right of beneficiaries to terminate) paragraph (1), a trustee may give a notice to that beneficiary requiring that beneficiary to exercise that right within a period of reasonable length fixed by the notice. If the beneficiary fails to do so within that period, the trustee may terminate the trust by a transfer to that beneficiary. The beneficiary is obliged to accept the transfer.

(2) A trustee may also terminate the trust by payment of money or transfer of other assets of the trust fund into court where other rules so provide.

X.–9:109: Merger of right and obligation

(1) A trust ends when the sole trustee is also the sole beneficiary and the trust fund is for that beneficiary's exclusive benefit.

(2) Where there are several trustees, paragraph (1) applies correspondingly only if they have a joint right to benefit.

(3) If a trust subsists in relation to the beneficiary's right to benefit or the right to benefit is encumbered with a security right or other limited right, the trustee remains bound by that trust or encumbrance.

Section 2: Variation

X.–9:201: Variation by truster or beneficiary

(1) The trust terms may be varied by a truster or beneficiary in accordance with:

(a) a right provided for by the trust terms;
(b) the right provided for by paragraph (2).

(2) A truster or beneficiary who has a right to terminate a trust has a corresponding right to vary the trust terms so far as they relate to the fund or part of the fund in respect of which the trust might be terminated.

(3) The exercise by several beneficiaries of a joint right to vary the trust terms requires their agreement to that effect.

(4) A variation which is to take effect from the death of the person exercising the right to vary is of no effect unless it is made by testamentary instrument.

(5) A variation does not take effect until notice in writing is given to the trustees.

X.–9:202: Variation by court order of administrative trust terms

(1) On the application of any party to the trust or any person entitled to enforce performance of obligations under the trust, a court may vary a trust term relating to the administration of the trust fund if the variation is likely to promote a more efficient and prudent administration of the fund.

(2) A variation under paragraph (1) may not significantly affect the operation of the trust terms governing its disposal unless the court also has power to vary those terms under one of the following Articles.

X.–9:203: Variation by court order of trusts for beneficiaries

(1) On the application of any party to the trust or any person who would benefit if the term to be varied were removed, a court may vary a trust term which confers a right to benefit or eligibility for benefit on a person who:

(a) does not yet exist; or

(b) does not presently conform to a description, such as membership of a class, on which the right depends.

(2) The same applies where the trust term confers a right to benefit or eligibility for benefit at a remote time in the future or which is conditional on the occurrence of an improbable event.

X.–9:204: Variation by court order of trusts for public benefit purposes

(1) On the application of any party to the trust or any person entitled to enforce performance of obligations under the trust, a court may vary a trust term which provides for the advancement of a public benefit purpose if, as a result of a change of circumstances, the advancement of the particular purpose provided for by the trust term cannot be regarded as a suitable and effective use of resources.

(2) A variation under paragraph (2) must be in favour of such general or particular public benefit purposes as the truster would probably have chosen if the truster had constituted the trust after the change in circumstances.

Section 3: Transfer of right to benefit

X.–9:301: Transfer by juridical act of right to benefit

(1) Subject to the other paragraphs of this Article, the transfer by juridical act of a right to benefit is governed by Book III Chapter 5 Section 1 (Assignment of rights).

(2) A gratuitous transfer is of no effect unless it is made in writing.

(3) A transfer which is to take effect on the death of the transferor takes effect only in accordance with the applicable law of succession.

CHAPTER 10: RELATIONS TO THIRD PARTIES

Section 1: General provisions on creditors

X.–10:101: Basic rule on creditors

(1) A person to whom a trustee owes a trust debt (a trust creditor) may satisfy that person's right out of the trust fund (in accordance with X.–10:202 (Rights of trust creditors in relation to the trust fund)), but other creditors may not except in so far as these rules provide otherwise.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not affect any right of a creditor of a party to a trust to invoke a right of that party relating to the trust fund.

X.–10:102: Definition of trust debt

(1) An obligation is a trust debt if it is incurred by the trustee:

(a) as the owner for the time being of a trust asset;

(b) for the purposes of, and in accordance with the terms of, the trust;

(c) in the capacity of trustee and by a contract or other juridical act which is not gratuitous, unless the creditor knew or could reasonably be expected to know that the obligation was not incurred in accordance with the terms of the trust;

(d) as a result of an act or omission in the administration or disposition of the trust fund or the performance of a trust debt; or

(e) otherwise materially in connection with the trust patrimony.

(2) The obligations of trustees to reimburse, indemnify or remunerate a former trustee or an intended trustee who has exercised a right of refusal are also trust debts.

(3) Other obligations of a trustee are not trust debts.

Section 2: Trust creditors

X.–10:201: Rights of trust creditors against the trustee

(1) A trustee is personally liable to satisfy trust debts.

(2) Unless the trustee and the trust creditor agree otherwise:

(a) liability is not limited to the value of the trust fund at the time the trust creditor's right to performance is enforced; and

(b) subject to the rules on change of trustees, liability does not end if the trust fund ceases to be vested in the trustee.

(3) A party to a contract is not to be treated as agreeing to exclude or limit liability merely because the other party discloses that that other party is concluding the contract in the capacity of trustee.

X.–10:202: Rights of trust creditors in relation to the trust fund

A trust creditor may satisfy a right out of the trust fund:

(a) to enforce performance of a trustee's personal liability under X.–10:201 (Rights of trust creditors against the trustee); or

(b) in the exercise of a security right in trust assets.

X.–10:203: Protection of the truster and beneficiaries

A truster or beneficiary is not in that capacity liable to a trust creditor.

Section 3: Trust debtors

X.–10:301: Right to enforce performance of trust debtor's obligation

(1) Where a trustee has a right to performance and that right is a trust asset, the right to enforce performance of the obligation of the debtor (the trust debtor) accrues to the trustee.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not affect:

(a) a beneficiary's right to performance by the trustee of obligations under the trust in respect of the right against the trust debtor; or

(b) procedural rules which allow a beneficiary to be a party to legal proceedings against the trust debtor to which the trustee is also a party.

X.–10:302: Set-off

A trustee's right against a trust debtor may only be set off against:

(a) a right corresponding to a trust debt; or

(b) a beneficiary's right to benefit out of the trust fund.

X.–10:303: Discharge of trust debtor

The discharge of a trust debtor by a trustee is of no effect if:

(a) the discharge is not in performance of the trustee's obligations under the trust; and

(b) (i) the discharge is gratuitous; or

(ii) the debtor knows or has reason to know that the discharge is not in performance of the trustee's obligations under the trust.

Section 4: Acquirers of trust assets and rights encumbering trust assets

X.–10:401: Liability of donees and bad faith acquirers

(1) Where a trustee transfers a trust asset to another and the transfer is not in accordance with the terms of the trust, the transferee takes the asset subject to the trust if:

(a) the transfer is gratuitous; or

(b) the transferee knows or could reasonably be expected to know that the transfer is by a trustee and is not in accordance with the terms of the trust.

(2) A transferee on whom a trust is imposed under paragraph (1) has a corresponding right to a return of any benefit conferred in exchange.

(3) The trust imposed under paragraph (1) is extinguished if:

(a) benefit which was provided by the transferee in exchange is disposed of in performance of an obligation under the trust; or

(b) the trustee or a third party satisfies an obligation to reinstate the trust fund.

(4) A transferee can reasonably be expected to know a matter if:

(a) it would have been apparent from a reasonably careful investigation; and

(b) having regard to the nature and value of the asset, the nature and costs of such investigation, and commercial practice, it is fair and reasonable to expect a transferee in the circumstances to make that investigation.

(5) This Article applies correspondingly where a trustee creates a security right or other limited right in a trust asset in favour of another.

Section 5: Other rules on liability and protection of third parties

X.–10:501: Liability for inducing or assisting misapplication of the trust fund

(1) Non–contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another by virtue of VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of non-performance of obligation) is modified as provided for by paragraph (2).

(2) A person who intentionally induces a trustee's non-performance of an obligation under the trust, or intentionally assists such non-performance, is solidarily liable with that trustee, if the trustee is liable to reinstate the trust fund.

X.–10:502: Protection of third parties dealing with trustees

(1) A contract which a trustee concludes as a result of a non-performance of an obligation under the trust with a person who is not a party to a trust is not void or avoidable for that reason.

(2) In favour of a person who is not a party to the trust and as against a trustee, a person who has no knowledge of the true facts may rely on the apparent effect of a trust document and the truth of a statement contained in it.

ANNEX

DEFINITIONS

(General notes. These definitions are introduced by I.–1:108 (Definitions in Annex) which provides that they apply for all the purposes of these rules unless the context otherwise requires and that, where a word is defined, other grammatical forms of the word have a corresponding meaning. For the convenience of the user, where a definition is taken from or derived from a particular Article a reference to that Article is added in brackets after the definition. The list also includes some terms which are frequently used in the rules but which are not defined in any Article. It does not include definitions which do not contain any legal concept but which are only drafting devices for the purposes of a particular Article or group of Articles.)

Accessory

An "accessory", in relation to proprietary security, is a corporeal asset that is or becomes closely connected with, or part of, a movable or an immovable, provided it is possible and economically reasonable to separate the accessory without damage from the movable or immovable. (IX.–1:201)

Acquisition finance device

An "acquisition finance device" is (a) a retention of ownership device; (b) where ownership of a sold asset has been transferred to the buyer, those security rights in the asset which secure the right (i) of the seller to payment of the purchase price or (ii) of a lender to repayment of a loan granted to the buyer for payment of the purchase price, if and in so far as this payment is actually made to the seller and (c) a right of a third person to whom any of the rights under (a) or (b) has been transferred as security for a credit covered by (a) or (b).
