(g) Insolvency proceedings over debtor's assets

18. GERMAN CC § 773 para. 1 no. 3 and GREEK CC art. 857 no. 3 exclude the exception of prior execution against the principal debtor if bankruptcy proceedings have been instituted against the debtor, unless the creditor can obtain satisfaction from a security right in a movable of the debtor (para. 2). In effect the same rule applies in BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG. In the latter countries it is thought that the requirements spelt out in CC art. 2023 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2300) express that the beneficium discussionis can no longer be invoked if an insolvency or equivalent proceeding has been opened over the debtor's assets, since this foils easy and fast execution against the debtor's assets (BELGIUM: Dirix and De Corte no. 410 at p. 270; Van Quickenborne no. 378 at p. 193; Lebon, Borgtocht no. 10; FRANCE:

Cass.civ. 21 December 1897, DP 1898, 262; Simler no. 511). In ITALY with the opening of bankruptcy proceedings against the debtor the possibility for the individual creditor to do execution against the debtor's assets is barred by law (L.fall art. 51) and in this case it is obviously impossible for the security provider to exercise the beneficium excussionis (Giusti 187).

19. In SWEDEN the opening of bankruptcy is not enough for a subsidiary security to become due; on the other hand, the creditor need not wait until the bankruptcy proceeding is closed, if and in so far as the creditor can provide some evidence that the bankruptcy will not give the creditor any dividend (Walin, Borgen 157 s.). Also in FRANCE the security provider cannot invoke the subsidiarity of liability if it is clear that the creditor will only obtain partial satisfaction from the debtor's assets (Simler no. 511 fn. 384). In AUSTRIA, the opening of insolvency proceedings over the debtor's assets cannot be invoked by a creditor who has acted negligently (CC § 1356), e.g. by failing to file a claim (Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1356 no. 4).

20. According to FINNISH law and DANISH and FRENCH literature the provider of a dependent personal security is liable after e.g. an insolvency proceeding over the debtor's assets has been completed without satisfying the creditors (FINNISH LDepGuar § 21; RP 189/1998 rd 58 s.; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 33; CFI Herning 6 April 1982, UfR 1983 A 739; FRANCE: in case of insolvency "liquidation judiciaire" Simler no. 511). In effect the same result has been achieved by a decision of the SWEDISH Supreme Court (HD 23 April 1990, NJA 1990, 245).

(h) Failure of insolvency proceeding due to insufficient assets of the debtor

21. In DENMARK and FRANCE the security provider under a dependent personal security is liable if the opening of a proceeding has failed due to insufficient assets of the debtor (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 33; CA Søndre Landsret 10 October 1927, UfR 1928 A 194; FRANCE: Cass.com. 8 June 1993, JCP G 1993, II no. 22174; Simler nos. 517 and 725; cf. Ccom art. L 643-11 III). Pursuant to BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN law the debtor regains full disposition over assets in case the insolvency procedure has failed due to insufficient assets of the debtor; in this case the procedural impediments to an easy and smooth execution disappear. The security provider regains the possibility to invoke the beneficium discussionis. An exception to this rule exists where the insolvency proceeding has failed due to insufficient assets of the debtor, but where the debtor has nevertheless been discharged of debts (Lebon, Borgtocht no. 10 a fortiori). According to ITALIAN case law, when contracting the beneficium excussionis the parties may also choose to subordinate the security provider's liability to a definitive impossibility to pay as certified by the conclusion of the bankruptcy proceeding without the satisfaction of the creditor's rights (Cass. 17 July 1985 no. 4218, Giur.it.Mass. 1985, 803).

IV.G.–2:107: Requirement of notification by creditor

(1) The creditor is required to notify the security provider without undue delay in case of a non-performance by, or inability to pay of, the debtor as well as of an extension of maturity; this notification must include information about the secured amounts of the principal obligation, interest and other ancillary obligations owed by the debtor on the date of the notification. An additional notification of a new event of non-performance need not be given before three months have expired since the previous notification. No notification is required if an event of non-performance merely relates to ancillary obligations of the debtor, unless the total amount of all non-performed secured obligations has reached five percent of the outstanding amount of the secured obligation.

(2) In addition, in the case of a global security, the creditor is required to notify the security provider of any agreed increase:

(a) whenever such increase, starting from the creation of the security, reaches 20 percent of the amount that was so secured at that time; and

(b) whenever the secured amount is further increased by 20 percent compared with the secured amount at the date when the last information according to this paragraph was or should have been given.

(3) Paragraphs (1) and (2) do not apply, if and in so far as the security provider knows or could reasonably be expected to know the required information.

(4) If the creditor omits or delays any notification required by this Article the creditor's rights against the security provider are reduced by the extent necessary to prevent the latter from suffering any loss as a result of the omission or delay.

COMMENTS

A. Information on debtor's default

In accordance with modern trends in the law on personal security, these rules impose certain requirements on the creditor; especially of information towards consumer providers of security even in the pre-contractual phase, if the creditor is to preserve full rights against the security provider.

According to paragraph (1) the creditor is required to inform the provider of a dependent security as soon as any critical situation arises with respect to the secured obligation which may lead to demands upon the security provider. The creditor must, in order to allow the security provider to evaluate the possible risk and request relief from the debtor, inform the security provider about a non-performance or inability to pay of the debtor or an extension of maturity of the secured obligation. In this notification the creditor must indicate the outstanding amounts of principal, interest and other ancillaries as of the date at which the information is given. If the default continues, the information must be renewed every three months after the preceding information.

According to the third sentence of paragraph (1), a notification is as a rule not required if merely an ancillary obligation has not been performed. The requirement of information, however, is revived, if the total of all unperformed secured obligations which are due amounts to five percent or more of the outstanding total of the secured obligations. In other words, while a certain percentage of due but unpaid ancillary obligations does not call for a reaction by the creditor, the percentage of five percent triggers the requirement to report according to paragraph (1).

B. Information by creditor of global security

The provider of a global dependent security is not protected by the Rules of IV.G.– 2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (4) against any increase of the secured amounts or aggravation of the secured obligation because this would run counter to the essence of a global dependent security. However, the security provider's legitimate interest in knowing the approximate extent of the risk must be satisfied by information about any major increases of the total amount of potential obligations agreed by the creditor. Since information about the actual amount of indebtedness which may change daily is too burdensome, only major increases must be notified. The first "major" increase is fixed at 20 per cent over the amount of the secured obligations that were secured by the global security at the time of its creation. Correspondingly, subsequent "major" increases require notification to the security provider if they amount to an additional 20 percent over the secured amount at the time when the preceding information was given or should have been given.

C. Exception for informed provider of dependent security

The information requirements under paragraphs (1) and (2) are unnecessary if and in so far as the security provider is already informed, or can easily acquire the relevant information, e.g. as the director of the debtor company. The burden of proof for this exception must be borne by the creditor.

D. Sanction

The sanction for delaying or omitting altogether the information required under paragraphs (1) and (2) is spelt out in paragraph (4). The creditor's rights against the security provider are reduced to the extent necessary to prevent the latter from suffering any loss as a result of the omission or delay. Such loss may arise if due to the omitted information the security provider will be unable to obtain relief or satisfaction from the debtor because the latter has in the meantime become insolvent.

E. Consumer as security provider

The present Article is a provision for the protection of the security provider; as such, it is applicable not only to a dependent security assumed by a consumer security provider but also to a consumer's purported assumption of an independent personal security (cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) as well as to a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)).

Although there is a specific rule limiting global securities assumed by consumer security providers (IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a)), the additional protection provided for by paragraph (2) fulfils an important role also in the consumer context. The creditor is required to inform the consumer security provider of any increase of the secured obligation, even if this does not exceed the maximum limit which in the consumer context a global security must have.

According to IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2), the rules of the present Article are mandatory in favour of the consumer. And in the context of a consumer security provider's co-debtorship for security purposes the term "debtor" means the debtor whose obligation is secured.

NOTES

I. General attitude on information requirements orduties

1. Pursuant to the opinion of many FRENCH authors, post-contractual information duties of the creditor vis-à-vis the provider of dependent security seem to be contrary to the unilateral character of the dependent security (cf. Delebecque 256; Simler nos. 416 ss.). In GERMAN law and in other legal systems such duties are denied by courts and almost all authors (CA Bamberg 13 December 1999, WM 2000, 1582, 1584; MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 nos. 85, 91; Schimansky/Bunte/Lwowski/Siol § 44 nos. 57, 61; Lwowski no. 406). Additionally it is argued that the imposition of duties of information would weaken the dependent personal security as a security (CA Köln 7 February 1995, WM 1995, 1965; Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 119). But because of their restricted scope they are tolerated in BELGIUM, DENMARK, FRANCE, ITALY, the NETHERLANDS and SWEDEN.

2. By contrast, FINLAND imposes upon the creditor firstly a general duty of information whenever any provider of dependent security so requests (LDepGuar § 14 para. 1). In addition, the creditor must inform consumer providers of dependent security upon request about the debtor's obligations and any circumstances which are relevant for appreciating the debtor's ability to pay, provided the creditor knows these facts, or can easily obtain information (§ 14 para. 2). Any violation of these duties which causes damage to the provider of dependent security is sanctioned by a reduction of the security provider's obligation (paragraph 3).

3. In GREECE there is a "soft law" provision in the Hellenic Banker's Code of Conduct of March 1997 of the Hellenic Bank Association. This Code is regarded by writers as a set of general business conditions, which can be invoked by third parties, especially consumers. They apply according to one opinion if they were incorporated into the contract or were made accessible to clients (Karakostas 23), according to another view in any case, since they were published and a disregard would constitute a misleading advertisement (Georgakopoulos, DEE 4, 774). According to the Bankers´ Code of Conduct art. 42 para. 1, the banks are obliged to inform the provider of dependent security of the contracting parties´ rights and obligations under the law and to provide the security provider with all relevant information which is given to the debtor (the banks are obliged by law to give the debtor copies of the credit contracts and a detailed report of the debt within 90 days after the latter's request, cf. Law 2873/2000 art. 47 para. 3 as replaced by Law 2912/2001 art. 42). Hence, the provider of dependent security is able to request from the bank this information (cf. Bankers´ Code of Conduct art. 39) and should receive any further information.

4. BELGIAN ConsCredA provides for the creditor's specific obligations of notification towards the provider of personal security securing a consumer credit – without distinguishing between consumer and other security providers: the creditor has to inform this security provider of the respites of payment granted to the debtor as well as of any modification of the credit contract (ConsCredA art. 35 sentence 2). In FRANCE the creditor of professional claims must remind a consumer provider of dependent security of the right to terminate at any time a dependent security without time limit (Madelin Act art. 47 II para. 2 read with MonC art. L 313-22). According to Law Dutreuil no. 2003-721 of 1 August 2003 this obligation also applies to creditors of consumer debts (ConsC art. L. 341-6 sentence 2). Moreover, according to FRENCH CC art. 2016 para. 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2293 para. 2) information on the changes in the amount (any increase or decrease) of the secured debt including its collateral obligations should be made to a private provider of dependent security at least once every year. Although the provision applies according to its wording only to indefinite dependent securities, the courts have extended it also to definite dependent securities (Cass.civ. 16 March 1999, D. 1999 I.R. 99). It is irrelevant whether the secured debt is owed by a consumer or a professional, as long as the provider of the dependent security is a consumer. However, in the case of a professional debt of an individual entrepreneur, the consumer provider of dependent security has to be given exact information about the amounts of principal and interest and not only about the changes in the amount of the debt (Madelin Act art. 47 II para. 2 read with MonC art. L 313-22). The Law Dutreuil no. 2003-721 of 1 August 2003 has extended this protection by a duty of detailed information to the consumer provider of dependent security, whether or not the secured debt has a professional character (ConsC art. L. 341-6 sentence 1). The Grimaldi Commission had proposed to merge these three provisions on a regular duty of information (CC art. 2016 para. 2 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 2), Madelin Act art. 47 II para. 2 read with MonC art. L 313-22 and ConsC art. L. 341-6 sentence 1) into one provision of the Civil Code (new art. 2307), similar to the existing ConsC art. L. 341-6 sentence 1; however, this proposal was not adopted in the revision of 2006.

5. By contrast in GERMANY even a creditor bank is not obliged to inform the provider of dependent security at the end of a year about the remaining balance of the secured debt (Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 121 referring to BGH 26 April 1976, WM 1976, 709, 711). The case Law in SPAIN is highly consistent with the idea that the creditor has no postcontractual duty to advice the guarantor as to the amount of the risk just borne by the non performance of the debtor; moreover, the creditor has only to notify the surety when he asks him for payment (TS 20 October 1993, RAJ 1993/7753, TS 14 July 2006, RAJ 2006/5342; Carrasco, Tratado, p. 108).

II. Information on debtor's default or inability to pay

(a) Legal systems with a special information duty

6. A general obligation to inform about default within one month is established by FINNISH LDepGuar § 4 para. 2 (RP 189/1998 rd 35 s.). In the NETHERLANDS, if the creditor gives notice to the debtor to pay, the creditor has to inform the provider of dependent security at the same time (CC art. 7:855 para. 2). No deviation from this provision to the disadvantage of a non-professional provider of dependent security is possible (art. 7:862 lit. a)).

7. In several countries, creditors are bound to inform consumer providers of dependent security about the debtor's default. In AUSTRIA, ENGLAND and FRANCE, a consumer provider of dependent security must be informed about the debtor's default (AUSTRIA: ConsC § 25 b para. 2; ENGLAND: ConsCredA s. 111; FRANCE: ConsC art. L. 313-9 sentence 1, Law no. 94-126 of 11 February 1994 (Loi Madelin) art. 47 II para. 3, and ConsC art. L. 341-1 sentence 1). There is a duty of information, irrespective of any breach of the bank's duty of confidentiality, if this information permits the consumer provider of dependent security to exercise the right to recourse before payment according to FRENCH CC art. 2032 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2309) and also to take judicial protective measures (cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:111). If the secured obligation arises from a consumer credit, the information has to be given in case of a qualified inability of the debtor to pay (incident de paiement caractérisé, ConsC art. L. 313-9 sentence 1). This implies at least a delay of three months after the debt becomes due (JO débats Assemblée Nationale 8 December 1989, 6153 ss.). By contrast, if the secured obligation arises from any professional contract, the creditor has to inform the consumer provider of dependent security about the default within one month after delay (ConsC art. L. 341-1 sentence 1 and Law no. 94-126 of 11 February 1994 (Loi Madelin) art. 47 II para. 3 sentence 1).

8. In BELGIUM the creditor has to inform the provider of a personal security for a consumer credit if the debtor has defaulted on two payments or at least one fifth of the total sum due (ConsCredA art. 35 sentence 2). Pursuant to the DANISH Consumer Council and the Financial Councils agreement (in force since 1 January 2002), the creditor's obligation to inform providers of dependent security within six months in case of a debtor's default of payment will eventually be replaced by an obligation to inform within three months.

9. Under SWEDISH law the creditor has an obligation to make sure that the right of the provider of dependent security to take recourse is not lost (or diminished in value) (cf. HD 16 June 1992, NJA 1992, 351). Therefore, the provider of dependent security must be informed of circumstances which are of importance in this respect (e.g. initial doubts about inability to pay, delays), when it cannot be assumed that the provider of a dependent security will already be informed. The requirements on banks and other similar creditors are higher than on private creditors (Walin, Borgen 53 ss.).

(b) Legal systems without a special information duty

10. No information is required to be given under GREEK, GERMAN, ENGLISH, LUXEMBOURGIAN, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law.

11. According to GREEK literature, in addition to the obligation of the creditor to refrain from actions, which hinder the debtor from satisfying the creditor or endanger the right of the provider of dependent security to be reimbursed after paying (GREEK CC arts. 862, 863), the principle of bona fides (GREEK CC arts. 200, 288) sometimes creates an obligation of the creditor to take positive action, e.g. by informing the provider of dependent security of events which worsen the financial situation of the debtor, in order to achieve the same results (Markou, DEE 8, 366, 367). Furthermore, according to the Banker's Code of Conduct art. 42 § 2 (cf. no. 3 above), the banks as creditors must inform the provider of dependent security in case of a realisation of the assumed risks in the future. In GERMANY there may exceptionally be a duty of information derived from the principle of bona fides (CC § 242; cf. CA Bamberg 13 December 1999, WM 2000, 1582, 1584; CA Köln 7 February 1995, WM 1996, 1965; Graf Lambsdorff and Skora no. 246; Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten no. 864 with further references). The requirements are very high since there must be an extremely severe offence against the interests of the provider of dependent security (cf. CA Bamberg 13 December 1999 and CA Köln 7 February 1995). Similarly under ENGLISH law, such a duty to disclose unusual facts is limited to exceptional cases such as fidelity bonds (cf. Andrews and Millett nos. 5-018 ss.). In general, however, the creditor has to inform the security provider e.g. about the debtor's default only if such a notification is required by the terms of the security (O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-101). Also in LUXEMBOURG some minor duties are imposed upon the creditor, which are based on good faith (Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 916). The creditor may not unnecessarily increase the burden of the security provider. This general guideline can to some extent be specified by a couple of specific duties for the creditor, e.g. a duty of information. In PORTUGAL, the creditor must inform any providers of dependent security in case of the debtor's default to pay in order to prevent an increase of their liability according to the principle of bona fides (CC art. 762 para. 2; cf. STJ 20 April 1999, 162/99 www.dgsi.pt). However, a duty of information does not, in principle, exist in relation to a mere delay of the debtor in payment or any other increase of the risk of the provider of dependent security; at least a violation of such a duty could not lead to a release of the security provider but only to damages, if at all (PORTUGAL: STJ 5 March 2002, 3971/01 www.dgsi.pt; STJ 6 May 1997, 88428 www.dgsi.pt).

(c) Sanctions

Partial release of provider of dependent security

12. In AUSTRIA, FINLAND and FRANCE, if the creditor does not give the required information, the consumer provider of dependent security is discharged from certain collateral obligations, e.g. penalties or default interest (AUSTRIA: ConsC § 25 b para. 2; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 4 para. 2; FRANCE: ConsC arts. L. 313-9 sentence 2, L. 341-1 sentence 2 and Madelin Act art. 47 II para. 3). But in FINLAND and FRANCE the creditor loses ancillary rights only for a limited time, namely until making notification (FINNISH LDepGuar. § 4 para. 2 sentence 2; FRENCH ConsC arts. L. 313-9 sentence 2, L. 341-1 sentence 2 and Madelin Act art. 47 II para. 3 sentence 2). According to the FINNISH LDepGuar § 4 para. 2 sentence 3 the provider of dependent security is also liable in relation to certain ancillary obligations, e.g. default interest, if the creditor can prove that the security provider is partly to blame for the delayed payment. The provider of dependent security must cover these ancillary obligations from the time when informed about the delay (RP 189/1998 rd 36). Pursuant to DANISH and SWEDISH law, if a creditor omits what reasonably could have been done, the provider of dependent security is relieved/discharged in so far as the omission has reduced the possibility for the provider of dependent security to take recourse against the debtor (DENMARK: H 14 January 1975, UfR 1975 A 168; Pedersen, Kaution 67 s.; SWEDEN: the creditor must prove that the omission has not caused such a loss; HD 16 June 1992, NJA 1992, 351; HD 22 April 1993, NJA 1993, 163; HD 13 June 1994, NJA 1994, 381; HD 22 December 1998, NJA 1998, 852).

(d) Damages

13. The BELGIAN Consumer Credit Act 1991 and the GREEK Bankers´ Code of Conduct do not provide any special sanction. The general rules on contractual liability apply (Van Quickenborne no. 432). A breach of the provisions of the GREEK Bankers´ Code of Conduct due to fault of the bank is regarded as a contractual fault and the bank is obliged to pay compensation for the damage caused (Georgakopoulos 775).

III. Duty of information in case of global guarantee

(a) Existence of a regular duty of information

14. In FINLAND the security provider under a global guarantee must be informed by the creditor every six months about the amount of the debtor's secured obligation (LDepGuar § 13 para. 1). In FRANCE a regular, annual information must be given by the creditor to the consumer provider of security of an indefinite dependent security, i.e. a global guarantee (CC art. 2016 para. 2 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 2) or Madelin Act art. 47 II para. 2 read with MonC art. L 313-22). But the scope of these provisions is very reduced, since private persons are prohibited from assuming a security under a global guarantee in relation to consumer credits (ConsC art. L. 313-7) as well as professional debts (ConsC art. L. 341-2 as introduced by Law Dutreuil no. 2003-721 of 1 August 2003). According to the Grimaldi Commission´s proposal all these rules on information duties in the case of indefinite securities (CC art. 2016 para. 2 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 2), Madelin Act art. 47 II para. 2 read with MonC art. L 313-22) should be replaced by only one provision in the Civil Code (proposed CC new art. 2307) that establishes a permanent information duty in favour of a security provider requiring special protection, irrespective of the definite or indefinite character of the dependent security. Contrary to former solutions, the Grimaldi Commission also would have allowed a natural person requiring special protection to assume a dependent security without time limit (cf. CC new art. 2300). However, none of these proposals was adopted by the reform of 2006. In ITALY a duty of information must be implied since the provider of dependent security in relation to a future obligation is discharged if the creditor has given credit without the authorisation of the security provider although aware that the financial situation of the debtor had worsened to the point that performance by the debtor had become clearly more difficult (CC art. 1956 – a mandatory provision, cf. para. 2). Further, the ITALIAN Banking Law contains general provisions on banking contracts, applicable whether or not the contracting party is a person requiring protection according to which the bank has to inform the client clearly and completely once a year about the course of the relationship (DLgs 1 September 1993 no. 385 art. 119 para. 1). This Law is held applicable to dependent personal securities (Chinè, I contratti di garanzia 327). It is to be noted that in ITALIAN banking practice this rule is usually applied to a global guarantee and that this is the type of dependent personal security mainly requested by banks as creditors. In SPAIN in order for the creditor to be bound to provide this post-contractual advice in the case of a global guarantee it is required that the surety itself call for this information, or that the creditor advance new credit in a situation where the debtor's financial situation has deteriorated, or that the creditor knew that the relationship between the surety and debtor has changed so that it is highly dubious that the surety continues to know the financial situation of the debtor (Carrasco 163).

(b) Sanctions

Partial release of provider of dependent security

15. If the creditor omits or delays required information, the consumer provider of dependent security is definitely released from any liability in relation to ancillary obligations (FRENCH CC art. 2016 para. 2 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 2)). This sanction is very harsh in situations where the creditor is not a professional (FRANCE: Legeais no. 14; Piedelièvre, Cautionnement et lutte contre l´exclusion no. 8). For this reason, the FRENCH Senate had (unsuccessfully) opposed this provision (JO débats Sénat 8 July 1998, 3718). However, for professional debtors (Madelin Act art. 47 II para. 2 read with MonC art. L 313-22) the sanction is not so hard since the creditor loses only provisionally the benefit of ancillary rights until performance of the information duty. The Grimaldi Commission´s proposal to merge these different provisions into one general rule (CC proposed new art. 2307) was not adopted in 2006 (cf. no. 14 above).

16. Pursuant to FINNISH LDepGuar § 13 para. 2 the liability of a provider of dependent security can be reduced if the creditor neglects the duty of information (RP 189/1998 rd 49).

(c) Full release

17. According to ITALIAN CC art. 1956 para. 1 the provider of dependent security for a future obligation will be discharged if the creditor grants credit without specific authorisation of the security provider, although aware that the financial situation of the debtor was such that performance by the debtor had become clearly more difficult. On the basis of the duty to act in good faith (CC art. 1175 and 1375), ITALIAN case law goes further and recognises that, even in case of waiver of the right arising for the security provider from CC art. 1956, the security provider is not liable if the creditor grants credit to the debtor knowing that the latter will not be able to repay (CA Catania 24 March 1999, BBTC 2001 II 699; Cass. 28 January 1998 no. 831, Giur.it. 1998, 1645; Cass. 18 July 1989 no. 3362, BBTC 1989 II 357; Cass. 20 July 1989, no. 3386, Foro it. 1989 I 3100; this trend is supported by scholarly writings: Sacco, Il contratto 801; di Majo 45 ss.; Cantillo 59 ss.).

(d) Damages

18. Contrary to earlier decisions, the Commercial Chamber of the FRENCH Supreme Court no longer holds the creditor liable for damages, unless gross negligence has been established (Cass.com. 25 April 2001, JCP E 2001, no. 1276, note Legeais).

IV. Exception to the duty of information

19. In BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, there is no duty of information if the debtor has all the information (BELGIUM: Dirix, Zekerheidsrechten 318; CA Brussels 11 September 1987, T.B.H. 1989, 7 note Devos; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente 917). On the contrary, in FRANCE a duty to give information is not affected by the fact that the provider of dependent security already knows about the development of the debt (cf. Cass.com. 25 May 1993, JCP G 1993, II no. 22147, note Croze; Piedelièvre, Cautionnement et lutte contre l´exclusion no. 8).

IV.G.–2:108: Time limit for resort to security

(1) If a time limit has been agreed, directly or indirectly, for resort to a security establishing solidary liability for the security provider, the latter is no longer liable after expiration of the agreed time limit. However, the security provider remains liable if the creditor had requested performance from the security provider after maturity of the secured obligation but before expiration of the time limit for the security.

(2) If a time limit has been agreed, directly or indirectly, for resort to a security establishing subsidiary liability for the security provider, the latter is no longer liable after the expiration of the agreed time limit. However, the security provider remains liable if the creditor:

(a) after maturity of the secured obligation, but before expiration of the time limit, has informed the security provider of an intention to demand performance of the security and of the commencement of appropriate attempts to obtain satisfaction as required according to IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider) paragraphs (2) and (3); and

(b) informs the security provider every six months about the status of these attempts, if so demanded by the security provider.

(3) If performance of the secured obligations falls due upon, or within 14 days before, expiration of the time limit of the security, the request for performance or the information according to paragraphs (1) and (2) may be given earlier than provided for in paragraphs (1) and (2), but no more than 14 days before expiration of the time limit of the security.

(4) If the creditor has taken due measures according to the preceding paragraphs, the security provider's maximum liability is restricted to the amount of the secured obligations as defined in IV.G.–2:104 (Coverage of security) paragraphs (1) and (2). The relevant time is that at which the agreed time limit expires.

COMMENTS

A. General

Provisions on time limits. This Article and the following one deal with dependent securities with or without time limits. While this Article is applicable where the parties have agreed on a time limit for resort to a security, the following Article provides for a possibility to limit the scope of a security in respect of the coverage of future obligations in cases without an agreed time limit. IV.G.–4:107 (Limiting security with time limit), which is applicable for consumer security providers only, extends this possibility to certain securities with an agreed time limit.

Other consequences of agreed time limits. Not all consequences of agreed time limits are spelt out in these two Articles. Depending on the type of time limit in question, a main effect is typically to restrict the scope of a security in respect of the coverage of future obligations. As this consequence directly flows from the agreement of the parties and depends on the terms of this agreement, it appears to be neither necessary nor possible to regulate this effect in the text of the Rules.

B. Types of time limits

Common features. While the parties can agree on different types of time limits for their security, such time limits share a common objective as a means to limit the security provider's liability, and hence risk, under the security. Moreover, the existence of any type of agreed time limit for a security typically precludes the possibility to unilaterally limit the security according to IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit). Cf. the Comments on that Article.

Time limits restricting the scope of the security. In one type of time limit, only the scope of the security is limited, e.g. the coverage of the security is limited to secured obligations arising, falling due or fulfilling other requirements before the expiration of the agreed time limit (such a time limit could for instance be agreed using the following formula: "This security is valid only for secured obligations arising until August 31"). Thus, even if a security provider assumes a security for obligations of the debtor that at the moment of the creation of the security are not yet in existence and whose scope is not known, especially in cases of global securities, the risk might be limited by excluding such obligations that do not arise or do not fall due or fulfil other requirements within a foreseeable period of time, i.e. before expiration of the agreed time limit. These effects are dealt with below. Such a type of time limit is not subject to the present Article, however, since the parties did not agree on a time limit for the creditor's right to rely on the security vis-à-vis the security provider.

Time limits for resort to security. The type of time limit covered by the present Article focuses not on the scope of a security, but on the creditor's right to resort to the security. By setting a time limit for resort to the security, whether directly (e.g. "The creditor may rely on this security until May 31") or indirectly (e.g. "This security expires 6 months after maturity of the secured obligation"), the risk assumed by the security provider in relation to the solvency of the debtor is limited to a period of time which is specified in the agreement or can be indirectly determined, i.e. until expiration of the agreed time limit in question. However, such a time limit typically also affects the scope of the security, i.e. restricts the scope of the security in respect of the coverage of future obligations.

Both types of time limits independent from each other. It has to be emphasised that these two types of time limits are quite independent from each other. A variety of combinations is possible, depending upon the construction of the agreement of the parties. The parties may have agreed on a time limit restricting the scope of the security, but may at the same time not have intended to restrict the possibility of resorting to the security. In special cases there might also be a time limit for resort to the security that does not give rise to a restriction of the scope of the security. It is also possible to have two separate agreed time limits for a single security: e.g. one restricting the scope of the security to obligations arising until expiration of this time limit, and a second one setting a (subsequent) time limit for resort to the security. In other cases, finally, one and the same reference to a limit may have to be regarded as restricting at the same time the possibility of resorting to the security and the scope of the security. See Comment H below.

C. Time limit for resort to security

Matter of construction. The existence of a time limit for resort to a security is, unless it is clearly set out, largely a matter of construction of the parties´ agreement. If the parties do not expressly refer to a time limit as being one for resort to a security, the following considerations might be of some assistance.

Indication for time limit for resort to security. As a rule of thumb, the fact that the personal security in question covers only existing obligations or specific future obligations will be an indication that an agreed time limit constitutes a time limit for resort to the security.

In such cases, there seems to be less of a need for a security provider to seek to be protected against a liability of an unforeseeable amount on the basis of future obligations of the debtor; rather, it is the additional protection of a time limit for resort to the security which limits the period of time during which the security provider assumes the risk of the debtor's solvency that might be of any interest for the security provider.

Date of maturity of secured obligations. A mere reference to the date of maturity of the secured obligations typically does not give rise to a time limit for resort to the security. Otherwise the creditor would lose the protection provided by the personal security by failing to immediately enforce the secured obligation or the security as soon as the secured obligation became due.

D. Consequences of expiration of time limit for resort to security

General rule: extinction of liability. The general rule is that if a time limit has been agreed for resort to a security, the security provider is no longer liable towards the creditor after expiration of the agreed time limit. For contracts of personal security establishing solidary liability, this is provided for in paragraph (1) sentence 1; in cases of subsidiary liability of the security provider paragraph (2) sentence 1 applies. This extinction of liability not only bars any liability of the security provider under the security for future obligations of the debtor, but also affects obligations already in existence: the security provider is no longer liable towards the creditor even in relation to obligations covered by the security that have become due by the time the agreed time limit expires.

Continuation of liability if additional requirements are fulfilled. The security provider remains liable towards the creditor after the expiration of the agreed time limit only if additional requirements are fulfilled. Generally speaking, only if the creditor has acted timeously upon the security in such a manner as to hold the security provider liable according to the terms of the security in question will the security provider's liability with respect to existing obligations not be extinguished. The details of the requirements to be fulfilled in this respect differ between situations of solidary liability of the security provider and those of subsidiary liability of the latter. See below.

Security provider's maximum liability determined by paragraph (4). Even if the creditor has in good time fulfilled the requirements for the continuation of the security provider's liability, this liability is restricted. According to paragraph (4), the security provider's maximum liability is limited to the amount of the secured obligations upon expiration of the agreed time limit. Principal and ancillary obligations are covered, however, only within the further limitation of an agreed maximum amount for the security, if any. For the determination of the maximum amount of the liability, any defences available vis-à-vis the creditor at the time at which the agreed time limit expires, have to be taken into account; thus, the amount of secured obligations that are not due yet does not increase the maximum amount of the security provider's liability.

Scope of security restricted according to terms of time limit. Also in case of a time limit for resort to the security, there will typically be an additional restriction of the scope of the security according to the terms of the parties´ agreement.

E. Continuation of liability in case of solidary liability

Request for performance. If the security provider had assumed solidary liability, the creditor only has to request performance from the security provider in good time in order for the latter to remain liable even after expiration of the agreed time limit (paragraph (1) sentence 2). A simple declaration by the creditor suffices; it is not necessary in this context that the creditor commences legal action against the security provider.

Time for request. The request is effective for this purpose only if it is made after maturity of the secured obligation but before expiration of the agreed time limit (paragraph (1) sentence 2). The first requirement, that the request must be made before expiration of the agreed time limit, is the essence of a personal security with a time limit for resort to the security: the security provider assumes the risk of the debtor's solvency only until the agreed time limit; should the creditor at a later point of time discover that due to the debtor's insolvency performance can only be expected from the security provider, this is no longer covered by the terms of this security, even if the secured obligation in question came into existence in time. The second requirement as to the time for the request for performance, i.e. that the request must be made after maturity of the secured obligation, has been introduced in order to prevent the request for performance becoming a mere formality for the creditor to be made already at the time of creation of the security: the request can be made in earnest only if the secured obligation is due. Specific provision is made for secured obligations becoming due upon, or within fourteen days before expiration of the time limit.

F. Continuation of liability in case of subsidiary liability

General. A security provider who is subsidiarily liable remains liable even after expiration of the agreed time limit only if the creditor has fulfilled stricter requirements than in the case of solidary liability of the security provider. The rationale is obvious: in the situation of subsidiary liability, the security provider is liable towards the creditor only if the latter has fruitlessly attempted to obtain satisfaction from the debtor or other security providers with solidary liability, if any. If additionally a time limit for resort to the security has been agreed, it follows that the creditor has to show that these requirements have been fulfilled before expiration of the agreed time limit.

Appropriate attempts to obtain satisfaction. According to paragraph (2)(a) the creditor must have started to undertake appropriate attempts to obtain satisfaction as required by IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider) paragraphs (2) and (3). The reference to paragraph (3) imports the exceptions provided for in that paragraph. Thus, in situations where the security provider may not invoke the subsidiary character of the liability vis-à-vis the creditor even though the latter has not attempted to obtain satisfaction from the debtor or any other security provider, as the case might be, the creditor does not have to start such attempts for the purposes of paragraph (2)(a) of the present Article either. It has to be emphasised that the attempts required by paragraph (2)(a) need not be completed – for the purposes of this provision it is sufficient that the creditor has started to undertake such attempts since demanding (fruitless) completion of these attempts to obtain satisfaction from other sources would be too onerous and time-consuming for the creditor.

Information required according to paragraph (2)(a). According to paragraph (2)(a) the creditor firstly has to inform the security provider of an intention to demand performance. In contrast to paragraph (1) sentence 2 no request for performance is necessary since in the situation dealt with by paragraph (2)(a) the security provider might still be able to rely on the subsidiary character of the liability. Additionally, the creditor has to assert that the attempts described in the preceding paragraph have started.

Time for information. As in the situation of solidary liability of the security provider, the information required according to paragraph (2)(a) has to be given after maturity of the secured obligation, but before expiration of the agreed time limit. See Comment G below for the situation of the secured obligations becoming due upon, or within fourteen days before expiration of the agreed time limit.

Information required according to paragraph (2)(b). If the security provider so demands, the creditor also has to inform the security provider every six months about the status of the attempts to obtain satisfaction. This is a continuing obligation, i.e. if the creditor should even after expiration of the agreed time limit fail to comply with this requirement until completion of these attempts, then the security provider is no longer liable towards the creditor.

G. Maturity of secured obligations close to expiration of time limit

Modification of time for request or information. In certain situations, the point of time at which the request has to be made or the information to be given according to paragraphs (1) and (2) does not seem practicable: should the secured obligations become due only upon, or within a short period of time before expiration of the agreed time limit, the security provider might have only a very limited possibility to consider the options before having to turn against the security provider in order to avoid the loss of rights against the latter. Paragraph (3) applies in these situations and makes sure that the creditor has at least a period of fourteen days to make the request or to inform the security provider before the time limit of the security expires.

H. Time limit restricting scope of security

Legal basis. Agreed time limits typically also restrict the scope of the security with respect to the coverage of future obligations. This consequence is not limited to time limits for resort to a security within the meaning of the present Article: it flows directly from the agreement of the parties and is therefore not spelt out in the text of the Rules.

Existence of time limit restricting scope of security. Whether a reference to a time limit in the agreement of the parties is to be regarded as a time limit that restricts the scope of the security with respect to the coverage of future obligations is once more, unless clearly spelt out by the parties, a matter of construction of the agreement. In general every agreement by the parties including a time limit which has the effect of excluding future obligations – whether these are obligations arising or falling due or fulfilling other requirements after a certain date – from the scope of the security, is to be regarded as a time limit in this sense.

Time limits for resort to security. Time limits for resort to the security do typically also have the effect of restricting the scope of the security in the sense of the preceding paragraph. This follows from the fact that where a creditor is bound to resort to the security before expiration of a certain time limit, the creditor will after that point of time no longer be able to rely on the security in respect of any future obligations. There are, however, exceptions to this rule: agreements of the type “This security for all future indebtedness of the debtor towards the creditor expires in respect of each individual obligation secured 6 months after maturity of that obligation” do not provide for a time limit for the security as a whole. Thus such time limits do not restrict the scope of the security with respect to the coverage of future obligations.

Duration of agreement giving rise to secured obligation as time limit. The mere fact that the agreement from which the secured obligation arises has a time limit should not in itself be regarded as indirectly giving rise to a time limit for the security. It should be noted, however, that even if such securities are regarded as unlimited, in cases where the security is restricted to cover obligations arising from specific contracts the applicability of IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit) is excluded according to paragraph (1) sentence 2, cf. Comments on that Article.

Restriction of coverage of security. The effect of a time limit for the security is that the scope of security is limited accordingly, i.e. only those secured obligations are covered which are not excluded by virtue of the agreed time limit. The details depend upon the terms of the parties´ agreement: the coverage of the security could be restricted to obligations that arise or fall due or fulfil other requirements until that time, whatever the terms of the agreed time limit might be. Since IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit) is inapplicable in any of these cases, there is no possibility for the parties on the basis of that provision to unilaterally set an earlier time limit by giving notice (cf., however, the exception provided for in IV.G.–4:107 (Limiting security with time limit) for consumer security providers).

Restriction of scope of security in case of a time limit for resort to security. In the case of a time limit such as "The creditor may resort to this security until August 31" or "This security expires August 31" it might not be easily determinable from the terms of the time limit whether the security is intended to cover secured obligations that have arisen, but are not due yet at that point of time. It is submitted that in general such time limits within the meaning of the present Article will restrict the liability of the security provider to secured obligations that have fallen due since only in respect of such obligations can the requirements of paragraph (1) sentence 2 and paragraph (2) sentence 2 be fulfilled. The additional restriction of the amount of the security provider's maximum liability according to paragraph (4) of the present Article, however, will often make a decision on this point unnecessary.

I. Consumer as security provider

Applicability to all types of consumer security providers. Chapter 4 does not contain any specific provisions on time limits for resort to security; therefore, the present Article is applicable directly and without modifications to consumer providers of dependent security. The same result is achieved for consumer providers of independent security (cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) and for consumer security providers in a co-debtorship for security purposes (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)). The application of the present Article to the last-mentioned type of consumer security providers is justified because the Article is favourable to them in so far as this rule provides legal certainty; otherwise it would be necessary to turn to uncertain general principles of contract law in order to determine the scope and the effect of an agreed time limit for resort to security.

Mandatory character. By virtue of IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2), the present Article is mandatory in favour of all types of consumer security providers.

NOTES

I. In general

1. In all member states a distinction has to be made between dependent personal security given for an unlimited time (see national notes to following Article) and dependent personal security given for a fixed time. The proper classification of the dependent security is decisive for the determination of the extent of the security provider's obligation.

2. The following national notes deal with what may be designated as dependent security for a fixed time or as security with a time limit for resort to the security right. In FRANCE and GERMANY a dependent security for an existing obligation is usually regarded as meaning a dependent security for a fixed time (FRANCE: Simler nos. 771 ss.; GERMANY: BGH 6 May 1997, NJW 1997, 2233), whereas the assumption of a security for future obligations, especially those resulting from a current account, is a hint for the second type (FRANCE: Simler no. 771; GERMANY: BGH 17 December 1987, NJW 1988, 908).

3. According to GREEK and PORTUGUESE court practice, the sole fact that the secured obligation is limited in time does not restrict the dependent security to the same time limit, as long as the secured obligation has not yet been paid (GREECE: A.P. 463/1994, EEN 62, 332; PORTUGAL: STJ 20 April 1999, 162/99 www.dgsi.pt). In SPAIN it has been highly controversial whether the time limit agreed in the security has to be regarded as a limit within which the secured obligations have to arise or, to the contrary, as a limit for raising claims against the guarantor. As a matter of construction, case law favoured the first approach (see Carrasco, Tratado, p. 226). When parties have fixed a time limit for claiming payment from the surety, Spanish law does not know of any further grace period.

II. Dependent securities with a time limit for the resort to security

4. Only some continental legal systems provide expressly for dependent securities that have a time limit for resort to the security (AUSTRIAN CC § 1363 sentence 2; FINNISH LDepGuar § 19 para. 2; GERMAN CC § 777; GREEK CC art. 866).

(a) Agreement on time limit

5. Dependent securities may be limited in time by the parties not only by referring to a calendar date but also by referring to an (uncertain) event or a period of time (GERMANY: BGH 6 May 1997, NJW 1997, 2233 and MünchKomm/Habersack § 777 no. 7; GREECE: A.P. 463/1994, EEN 62, 335 and Georgiades § 3 no. 194).

(b) Consequences upon expiration of time limit

6. Most member states seem to agree that the provider of dependent security is discharged from the obligation when the agreed time limit expires and the creditor did not take action against or at least demand performance from the security provider (DENMARK: H 30 April 2001, UfR 2001 A 1543; Ussing, Kaution 301; Agreement between the Consumer Council and the Financial Council of 17 September 2001; ENGLAND: O´Donovan and Phillips no. 9-24; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 19 para. 2; RP 189/1998 rd 57; GERMAN CC § 777 para. 1; GREEK CC art. 866; ITALY: Giusti 149 and 253 s.; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 310; Carrasco a.o. 226). GERMAN court practice demands, in addition, that the secured claim must fall due before expiration of the time limit (BGH 14 June 1984, BGHZ 91, 349 at 355 ss.)

7. If however, such suspensive conditions on the security provider's liability are fulfilled, under FRENCH and SPANISH law the time limit serves to freeze the continuing liability of the provider of dependent security to the amount at the expiration of the time limit (FRANCE: Simler no. 321 ss.; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 226). In SPANISH law it depends upon the wording of each particular dependent security whether liabilities incurred within the time limit of a continuing dependent security, but due and payable only after the dependent security came to an end, fall within the ambit of the security provider's liability (Carrasco a.o. 226).

8. In BELGIUM and in the NETHERLANDS the expiration of the time limit has the same effect as a unilateral termination of the contract of dependent security by the security provider for the future (BELGIUM: CA Brussels 25 May 1992, JLMB 1993, 870, note de Patoul and Baudoux; T´Kint no. 771; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist no. 16 at p. 30-31). The provider of dependent security is only liable for those obligations that arose before the expiration date (BELGIUM: T´Kint no. 771; Van Quickenborne no. 253; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist no. 16 at p. 30-31; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 226).

(c) Preservation of the liability of the provider of dependent security

9. The main issues in this context are until which point of time the creditor has to demand performance from the provider of dependent security and in which form.

(d) No differentiation between solidary and subsidiary dependent securities

10. In AUSTRIA, FINLAND, FRANCE and ITALY, solidary and subsidiary dependent securities are treated equally (AUSTRIAN CC § 1363 sentence 2; FINLAND: RP 189/1998 rd 56; FRANCE: Simler no. 488; ITALY: CC art. 1957; Giusti 281 s.). The same is true in SPAIN.

11. In ITALY, the provider of dependent security impliedly limited to the term of the secured obligation remains liable even after maturity of the principal obligation, if the creditor has diligently brought suit against the debtor within six months and has diligently pursued it (ITALIAN CC art. 1957 para. 1). This provision is also applied if the provider of dependent security has expressly limited the security to the same term as the secured claim; in this case, however, the debtor must be sued within two months (ITALIAN CC art. 1957 para. 2 and 3; Giusti 285 ss.). However, ITALIAN courts are agreed that CC art. 1957 does not apply to dependent securities without time limit (Cass. 27 November 2002 no. 16758, Giust.Civ.Mass. 2002, 2059). According to FINNISH LDepGuar § 19 para. 2 the creditor loses rights against the provider of dependent security on failing to demand payment from the latter before expiration of the fixed time. The demand does not have to comply with any form nor does it have to indicate the sum demanded by the creditor (RP 189/1998 rd 57). A corresponding rule has been developed in AUSTRIA, also without distinction as to the type of dependent security (OGH 11 April 1956, ÖJZ 1957, 129 no. 84, obiter dictum; Rummel/Gamerith § 1363 no. 4). The same is true for SPAIN. Since there are no legal provisions preserving the liability under a dependent security after expiration of the time limit, the creditor must ask for performance before that date (Carrasco a.o. 227).

(e) Differentiation between solidary and subsidiary dependent securities

12. Some countries differentiate between solidary and subsidiary dependent securities (GERMAN CC § 777 para. 1). Although GREEK CC art. 866 does not contain such a differentiation, the same results are achieved in GREECE due to the application of the general rules on dependent securities (cf. Georgiades § 3 no. 195).

(f) Solidary dependent security with time limit -Iimmediate notice

13. According to GERMAN CC § 777 paragraph 1 sentence 2 in connection with sentence 1, the provider of dependent security under a solidary dependent security in relation to an existing obligation is discharged upon expiration of the fixed time, unless the creditor gives immediately after expiration notice to the provider of the dependent security of an intention to demand performance from the latter. Although the provision refers to an "existing obligation", it is common opinion that it can be applied to dependent securities for future obligation(s) as well (Erman/Herrmann § 777 no. 1; MünchKomm/Habersack § 777 no. 5 referring to the genesis of the provision). The creditor's notice does not have to comply with any form nor contain the sum demanded by the creditor (MünchKomm/Habersack § 777 no. 11). The creditor has to give the notice immediately which means without culpable delay (GERMAN CC § 121 para. 1 sentence 1). Notice can also be given in the creditor's action against the debtor by serving a third party notice upon the security provider (CA Koblenz 14 July 2005, WM 2005, 2035 at 2036). However, the creditor's immediate notice achieves its purpose only if the secured obligation becomes payable before or at the latest at the expiration of the agreed time limit (BGH 29 June 2000, NJW 2000, 3137, 3138; MünchKomm/Habersack § 777 no. 5). The parties may waive the requirement of notice but it is highly controversial whether such stipulation is allowed in standard terms (Palandt/Sprau § 777 no. 2a).

(g) Legal action within time period

14. According to GREEK CC art. 866, the creditor has to take legal action for the satisfaction of the claim within one month after the expiration of the fixed period and has to pursue the legal proceedings without delay. Since in the case of a solidary dependent security the creditor can commence legal proceedings directly against the security provider, the creditor has to do so within a one month period after expiration in case of a dependent security for a fixed time, whereas it is not necessary for the provider of dependent security to turn against the debtor as well (A.P. 133/1956, NoB 4, 617 ss.; Georgiades § 3 no. 195). Legal action may be taken by commencing a civil action, by raising a defence or by submitting the claim in an insolvency or enforcement proceeding; on the other hand, a simple extra-judicial notice does not suffice (Georgiades § 3 no. 195 with further references, cf. fn. 139).

(h) Subsidiary dependent security with time limit

15. In case of a dependent security with subsidiary liability it is according to GERMAN CC § 777 para. 1 sentence 1 not sufficient for the creditor to notify the security provider after expiration of the fixed time that performance will be demanded from it. Rather, the creditor has to proceed immediately after expiration of the fixed time to the collection of the secured claim pursuant to § 772, continue the proceeding without serious delay, and, after termination of the proceeding, immediately give notice to the security provider that performance is demanded from the latter (GERMAN CC § 777 para. 1 sentence 1; for details concerning the proceeding according to § 772, see national notes to IV.G.–2:106 nos. 7-12). The notice must comply with the same requirements as in the case of a dependent security with solidary liability (see no. 13 above).

16. Again, the situation is similar in GREECE: As already said above (no. 14), the creditor has to take legal action within one month after expiration of the fixed time period and to pursue these proceedings without delay. But contrary to the preceding case, in the case of a subsidiary dependent security the creditor in accordance with the general rules on dependent securities has to commence legal proceedings against the debtor; commencement of legal action directly against the dependent security provider is not sufficient (Georgiades § 3 no. 195). If, however, the creditor has an enforceable title against the debtor, the existence of the claim is confirmed and the creditor does not have to take legal action against the debtor or the provider of dependent security (A.P. 210/1993, NoB 42, 399, applying CC art. 866 to an independent security). As to the types of possible proceedings, cf. no. 14 above).

17. According to the prevailing FRENCH opinion, if in case of a subsidiary dependent security the beneficium discussionis (see national notes on IV.G.–2:106) is invoked by the security provider, a prior notice to the debtor to pay is necessary. If the debt is not paid by the debtor, the creditor has to proceed against the provider of the dependent security as well. Proceedings against the debtor alone are not sufficient to force the provider of dependent security to pay, regardless of the solidary or subsidiary character of the dependent security (Simler no. 491).

18. Since dependent securities with subsidiary liability are very rare in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND there does not appear to be any discussion as to whether notice by the creditor to the provider of dependent security of an intention to commence or actual commencement of proceedings against the debtor is necessary in order to preserve the liability of the provider of dependent security after expiration of the agreed time limit, does not seem to be discussed anywhere. Given that in these cases proceedings against the debtor are a condition precedent for the accrual of the security provider's liability it would then seem to depend upon the wording of each particular dependent security whether, in the absence of timely proceedings against the debtor, the security provider's liability survives the time limit of the dependent security.

(i) Legal consequences if expiration has been avoided

19. In GERMANY, if the creditor has given notice in due time in conformity with the rules, the liability of the provider of dependent security is restricted to the amount of the debtor's obligation at the time of expiration of the fixed period in cases of solidary dependent security or at the time of the termination of the proceedings in cases of subsidiary dependent security, respectively (GERMAN CC § 777 para. 2). In FRANCE the provider of dependent security is not released after expiration of the fixed time, unless the parties agree otherwise (Simler nos. 321 ss.); only the extent of the security provider's liability is limited by the expiration of time.

IV.G.–2:109: Limiting security without time limit

(1) Where the scope of a security is not limited to obligations arising, or obligations performance of which falls due, within an agreed time limit, the scope of the security may be limited by any party giving notice of at least three months to the other party. The preceding sentence does not apply if the security is restricted to cover specific obligations or obligations arising from specific contracts.

(2) By virtue of the notice, the scope of the security is limited to the secured principal obligations performance of which is due at the date at which the limitation becomes effective and any secured ancillary obligations as defined in IV.G.–2:104 (Coverage of security) paragraphs (1) and (2).

COMMENTS

A. General

Provisions on time limits. This Article deals with dependent personal securities which do not have a time limit, i.e. that cover future secured obligations over an indefinite period. In accordance with the general principle contained in III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2), the present Article provides for a possibility to limit the duration of such a security, i.e. to limit the scope of the security to obligations performance of which is due at the time when the limitation becomes effective. An additional provision, IV.G.–4:107 (Limiting security with time limit), is applicable for consumer security providers only.

Limitation of duration of security outside scope of Article. The duration of a security might be unilaterally limited by any of the parties to the agreement even outside the scope of the present Article, e.g. where the parties have provided for such a right to limit the duration of a security in their agreement. In such situations, the Article may nevertheless be applicable in order to determine details or consequences of such a contractual term.

B. Security without agreed time limit

The Article provides for a possibility to limit the scope of a security in cases where such a restriction does not already follow from a time limit agreed by the parties. Whether a security is unlimited in this way must be determined by interpreting the parties´ agreement. This issue is dealt with in Comment C to the preceding Article. Generally, the existence of any type of time limit for the security leads to the inapplicability of the present Article, the only exception being such time limits as do not affect the security as a whole, e.g. time limits which apply to certain secured obligations only. For consumer security providers, cf. IV.G.–4:107 (Limiting security with time limit).

C. Limitation by giving notice

Declaration by any party sufficient. Any party may limit the security, i.e. limit its scope to secured obligations due at the time when the limitation becomes effective by simple declaration vis-à-vis the other party. An act of the court is not necessary, neither does the party have to show the existence of good reasons. Although the Article gives both the creditor and the security provider the right to limit the security, in fact it will typically only be the security provider who exercises this right.

Notice period. The limitation of the security by giving notice can become effective only after a period of at least three months that has to be set by the party giving notice has expired. This minimum length of the period of notice has been introduced in order to protect the interests of the creditor and the debtor: typically, if the security provider limits a security covering future obligations the creditor will immediately stop granting any further credit to the debtor which might cause short-term illiquidity of the latter. The three months period of notice should give the debtor the opportunity to arrange alternative security or credit from another source. The security provider is protected by the principle of good faith against any undue increases of the secured obligations agreed between debtor and creditor within this period (if covered at all, cf. IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (4)).

D. Effect of limitation of security

Secured principal obligations due at the time the limitation becomes effective. If notice is given, the scope of the security provider's liability is restricted to secured obligations that are due as of the date at which the limitation becomes effective. The limitation by giving notice in this respect has similar effects to those of an agreed time limit according to which the scope of the security would cover secured obligations that arise or fall due or fulfil other requirements before expiration of the time limit. For the purposes of this Article, it is thought to be preferable to restrict the liability of the security provider to secured principal obligations that are due as of the date at which the limitation becomes effective, since this is the solution that is most favourable to the security provider. Moreover, the fact that a dependent personal security is limited according to this Article will typically give the creditor the right to accelerate the maturity of obligations secured by this security that have arisen but are not yet due, such as a credit paid out to the debtor that under its original terms was repayable at a date after the three months.

Secured ancillary obligations covered even though arising or falling due at a later time. The requirement that secured obligations must be due as of the date at which the limitation becomes effective does, however, only apply to the secured principal obligations. Ancillary obligations as defined in IV.G.–2:104 (Coverage of security) paragraphs (1) and (2) are covered by the scope of the security even if they arise or fall due at a later point of time. These obligations typically arise and fall due later than the principal obligation; in the absence of an agreement to the contrary it would seem unreasonable that a security should cover a secured principal obligation, but not e.g. interest owed by the debtor in respect of that obligation even if accruing only after the limitation of the security became effective, since the source of the obligation to pay interest is the non-payment of the principal obligation.

Limitation does not create time limit for resort to security. The limitation of the security according to this Article does not, however, create a time limit for resort to the security, i.e. the security provider remains liable after the limitation of the security even if the creditor does not take any further action until that date. Should the parties also have agreed on a time limit for resort to the security, then this time limit is not affected by the fact that a party exercises the right conferred by the present Article.

E. Exceptions

Cases outside scope of the Article. Paragraph (1) second sentence sets out situations in which the parties may not unilaterally limit the scope of the security by giving notice. If the security is agreed to cover specific obligations or obligations arising from specific contracts the exercise of the right according to the Article by the security provider would run counter to the interests of the creditor who may have agreed to contract with the debtor only on the basis of the existence of a dependent security and who may not be able to terminate the relationship resulting from the agreement. The creditor could, for example, have entered into a contract for the lease of an apartment only on the strength of a security provided in relation to the debtor's obligations to pay rent. According to the Article it is not possible to unilaterally limit the duration of a security in such a situation regardless of whether the lease contract itself has a time limit or is concluded for an indefinite period. The main example of a dependent security not covered by these exceptions (and therefore subject to the parties´ right to give notice) is a global security. It is clear that for a security covered by one of these exceptions, recourse to the general principle of III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2) is not possible: lex specialis derogat legi generali (see I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development)).

Other bases of protection of security provider. In certain situations, the exclusion of the right to limit a security by giving notice might cause hardship to the security provider. It is assumed, however, that in appropriate circumstances protection for the security provider against an unreasonable duration of a security could be offered on other legal bases. Apart from the possible application of the rules on change of circumstances (cf. III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances)), the creditor might in certain cases be prohibited from relying on a security running over an excessively lengthy period of time on the basis of the principle of good faith (cf. III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing)); in other situations it is not inconceivable that the right to relief (IV.G.–2:111(Debtor's relief for the security provider)) might include a right to demand that the debtor terminates the contractual relationship comprising the secured obligation in order to prevent the creation of new secured obligations which would increase the security provider's liability.

F. Consumer as security provider

Applicability to all types of consumer security providers. This Article is directly applicable to consumer providers of dependent security and allows them to limit securities given for an unlimited time, subject to the exceptions provided for in paragraph (1) sentence 2. The protection of consumer security providers is supplemented by IV.G.–4:107 (Limiting security with time limit), which allows the security provider to limit securities with an agreed limit under the conditions set out in that provision. These principles also apply to consumer providers of independent security (cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) and to consumer security providers in a co-debtorship for security purposes (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules). The application of the present Article to these types of security providers includes the exceptions provided for in paragraph (1) sentence.2.

Mandatory character. By virtue of IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2), the present Article may not be deviated from to the detriment of a consumer security provider in any type of security.

NOTES

I. Limiting security without time limit for secured obligations

(a) Limitation of principal obligation extended to security

1. As a general rule, in all countries even a security whose scope is not specifically restricted to obligations arising within a specified time limit will be interpreted as being limited to the duration of the secured obligation (BELGIUM: T´ Kint no. 771; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 4-019; FRANCE: Simler no. 270; GERMANY: Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 13; ITALY: Cass. 8 February 1989 no. 786, Giur.it. 1989 I 1 1517; Giusti 251 ss.; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo 431). Securities in SWEDEN will not often set out a separate validity time, but the security will be tied to the underlying contract. In cases where a private person is a security provider in relation to a commercial entity there seems to be developing a rule that the security provider's undertaking is limited in time in the above-mentioned sense (although there is not yet any clear and general rule to such effect) (Gorton, Suretyship 591).

(b) Limitation by the security provider - Reason for termination of security

2. In AUSTRIA, any dependent personal security given for an unlimited time, i.e. with a scope that does not only cover obligations arising within an agreed time limit, may be terminated by the security provider giving notice to the creditor (OGH 22 June 1993, ÖBA 1994, 239 (240 requiring a reasonable duration of the security; without this requirement OGH 8 November 1970, JBl, 1971, 257 (258)). Even an "irrevocable" security may be terminated if there is an "important reason" (OGH 28 April 1971, ÖJZ 1971, 522 (523) no. 281).

3. In BELGIUM, DENMARK, FINLAND, FRANCE, ITALY and the NETHERLANDS if a security given for an unlimited time secures future debts or in case of a global dependent security without time limit, the security provider can also unilaterally terminate the security by giving notice to the creditor (BELGIUM: T´ Kint no. 771; DENMARK: for future debts, Pedersen, Kaution 53; DUTCH CC art. 7:681 para. 1 lit. a with effect for future obligations (art. 7:861 para. 2); FINLAND: HD 18 March 1997, KKO 1997:31; LDepGuar § 6 para. 1 for a global dependent security, including for a current account; FRANCE for all undetermined obligations: cf. Grimaldi Commission´s proposed art. 2302 para. 3 sentence 2; Cass.com. 3 December 1979, JCP G 1980, IV no. 67; Simler no. 282; ITALY: according to the general rule of CC art. 1373 para. 2 on unilateral withdrawal from the contract; Cass. 15 March 1999 no. 2284, Giust.Civ.Mass. 1999, 565; Cass. 2 July 1998 no. 6473, BBTC 1999 II 657; CFI Milano 15 July 1993, BBTC 1994 II 548; Petti 154; moreover, the limitations of CC art. 1957 are not applicable). In BELGIUM the sole requirement is a notice of reasonable length to the other party (CA Bergen 4 February 1986, Pas belge 1986 II 61; T´ Kint no. 771). However, in LUXEMBOURG, the provider of a dependent security cannot unilaterally terminate a security without such a time limit, if a time limit is fixed in the underlying contract (e.g. caution réelle CA Luxembourg 14 May 2003, BankFin 2004 169). In FRANCE the parties can agree on a notice of reasonable length (Simler no. 284). If the security provider is a consumer, the creditor of professional claims must remind the consumer security provider annually of the right of termination (Madelin Act of 11 February 1994, art. 47 II para. 2 read with MonC art. L 313-22). Since Law no. 2003-721 of 1 August 2003 this obligation has also to be fulfilled for consumer debts (ConsC art. L. 341-6 sent 2). But the scope of these provisions is reduced, since it is forbidden for private persons to contract global dependent securities both if they acted as consumers (ConsC art. L. 313-7) and if they acted as professionals (ConsC art. L. 341-2 introduced by Law no. 2003-721 of 1 August 2003).

4. The security provider's right to terminate a security whose scope is not limited to obligations arising within an agreed time limit by giving notice depends in ENGLISH law on the consideration for the security provider's promise to secure: if the consideration is divisible, the security provider can at any time terminate the security (Re Crace [1902] 1 Ch 733) by giving notice; if the consideration is indivisible, the security provider cannot do so unless with the creditor's agreement (Lloyds v. Harper (1880) 16 ChD 290, CA, Halsbury,para. 1200, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008). Thus, a security for the balance of a current account is terminable because the security provider's promise is "divisible as to each advance" and only after the advance is made to the debtor does the promise become irrevocable (cf. Coulthart v. Clementson (1879) 5 QBD 42; Andrews and Millett no. 8-003). This is achieved by treating the security given for a divisible consideration as a standing offer which is pro tanto accepted when a fresh advance is made, since as a general rule every offer may be revoked before it is accepted (Halsbury/Salter para. 1200, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008); Goode, Commercial Law 821). The divisibility of the consideration is sometimes difficult to determine; as a rough guide it seems appropriate to examine the nature of the relationship the creditor has entered into in reliance on the security: if that relationship is terminable it is reasonable not to deprive the security provider of the right to revoke the security; if, on the other hand, the relationship is not terminable for a certain period, it would prejudice the creditor if the security provider could revoke the security and thereby deprive the creditor of the security (Chitty/Whittaker no. 44-017). Similarly in SCOTLAND: continuing securities are regarded as containing offers of securities for future advances which then can be revoked before acceptance of each particular offer (Gloag and Irvine 857). The security provider can therefore withdraw from the security with effect for a future advance by giving notice to the creditor (Stair/Clark no. 980; Gloag and Irvine 857). There is no such right, however, where the security is given in respect of the debtor's liability arising in a specific transaction (Stair/Clark no. 980).

5. In PORTUGAL the security provider with beneficium discussionis may demand that the creditor, once the principal obligation has fallen due, tries to obtain satisfaction from the debtor within two months after the moment the secured obligation fell due (however, this time limit does not run out before one month after the notice to the creditor). The security provider is released from liability if the creditor does not follow this demand. If the principal debt becomes due only after the creditor has given notice to the debtor, a security provider with beneficium discussionis may one year after having assumed the security demand that the creditor takes action against the debtor. Again, the security provider is released if the creditor does not comply with this demand (CC art. 652; Almeida Costa 784). It has been held that a dependent personal security is also terminated if the credit is transferred without the security provider's approval (STJ 2 July 1996, 165/96 www.dgsi.pt).

6. In GERMANY and SPAIN there are no statutory provisions on termination of dependent personal securities. Consequently, they are regarded, as a rule, as not terminable (GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 229; Palandt/Sprau § 765 no. 16; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 227). However, some important exceptions are accepted for dependent personal securities securing future obligations without time limit. In GERMANY, the security provider has, based upon the principle of bona fides (CC § 242), a right of termination if a dependent personal security has been assumed for future obligations without time limit and if a reasonable time after the assumption of the security has passed (BGH 10 June 1985, NJW 1986, 252, 253; BGH 22 May 1986, NJW 1986, 2308, 2309; approved in BGH 21 January 1993, NJW-RR 1993, 944, 944 s.; Erman/Herrmann § 765 no. 8; MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 55; contra: Derleder, NJW 1986, 102), since long-term relations (Dauerschuldverhältnisse) must be terminable to re-establish freedom of contract (cf. CA Düsseldorf 24 November 1998, ZMR 2000, 89; Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 130). For the German Supreme Court a minimum period of at least three years seems to be sufficient (BGH 4 July 1985, NJW 1985, 3007, 3008; cf. Bülow, Kreditsicherheiten no. 807; Schimansky/Bunte/Lwowski/Lwowski appendix to § 91 no. 10). SPANISH scholarly opinion and case law, as well as contractual practice, agree in giving the surety the right to withraw the unlimited security (Carrasco, Tratado, p. 161)

7. In GERMANY, apart from expiration of a reasonable period of time, a second ground for termination is recognised: dependent personal securities for future obligations without time limit may also be terminated by the security provider on the basis of the principle of bona fides (CC § 242) for grave reason (see only BGH 10 June 1985, NJW 1986, 252, 253; BGH 4 July 1985, NJW 1985, 3007, 3008; Erman/Herrmann § 765 no. 8; MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 56). In 2002, this case law has been codified in a generalised form for all long-term contracts by CC § 314. Termination is effective immediately (para. 1), but it must be exercised within a reasonable period after the security provider received information on the critical event (para. 3). A grave reason has been assumed e.g. if the debtor's financial situation had seriously worsened (BGH 21 January 1993, NJW-RR 1993, 944, 945), if there were no obligations to secure for a longer period (BGH 22 May 1986, NJW 1986, 2308, 2309) and if a manager or shareholder of a company who in consideration of this had secured the company's obligations leaves the company (BGH 10 June 1985, NJW 1986, 252, 253; CA Celle 5 October 1988, NJW-RR 1989, 548, 548; Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 131). The right of termination for grave reason is extended by some authors to dependent personal securities with time limit (MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 56; Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 235). Similarly, according to DUTCH CC art. 7:861 para. 1 lit. b) a dependent security that secures a future obligation may be terminated after five years even if it is given for a limited time.

8. Also in GREECE, there is no general right of the security provider to terminate a security for an unlimited period. According to GREEK literature, a right of termination is exceptionally admitted on the ground of good faith for securities without a maximum amount securing the outstanding balance of a current account and only if there is a grave reason (Georgiades § 4 no. 49; Chelidonis, EllDik 1998, 39, 1034, 1036). GREEK CC arts. 867, 868 allow, however, the security provider to set time limits to the unlimited liability. According to art. 867, a security provider who assumed the obligation for an unlimited period may upon maturity of the secured debt request the creditor to take legal action within one month for the satisfaction of the claim and to pursue the legal proceedings diligently. If the secured debt becomes due and payable only upon notice by the creditor, then according to CC art. 868 the security provider may, on the expiry of one year after assuming the security, demand that the creditor give notice to the debtor, take legal action within one month and pursue the legal proceedings diligently. In both cases, if the creditor does not comply with the security provider's demand, the latter is discharged (Georgiades § 3 no. 199).

(c) Period of notice to the creditor

9. In GERMANY a security provider who has a right of termination (see nos. 6 s. above) must in general set a reasonable period for the notice to take effect, since the security provider has to show consideration for the legitimate interests of both creditor and debtor to enable them to adapt their relationship to the changed situation (BGH 10 June 1985, NJW 1986, 252, 253; BGH 4 July 1985, NJW 1985, 3007, 3008; CA Celle 5 October 1988, NJW-RR 1989, 548, 548). However, the reason for termination has also to be considered (Schimansky/Bunte/Lwowski/Schmitz § 91 no. 113; Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 232): in cases of termination due to expiry of time for dependent personal securities securing a loan, reference is especially made to GERMAN CC § 489 para. 2 concerning the termination of a loan with variable interest; consequently, a period of notice of three months is regularly accepted (CA Celle 5 October 1988, NJW-RR 1989, 548, 548; MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 55; cf. also Derleder, NJW 1986, 102). In cases of termination for a grave reason, however, a shorter period of notice (CA Celle 5 October 1988, NJW-RR 1989, 548, 548: 4 to 6 weeks) or even immediate termination (BGH 4 July 1985, NJW 1985, 3007, 3008: no opposing interests of debtor and creditor and various reasons for termination; MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 56; Derleder, NJW 1986, 102) have been accepted due to special circumstances. The new general legislative provision of CC § 314 allows termination with immediate effect (above no. 7). In ENGLAND, if the consideration for the security provider's promise is divisible and the period of the security is unlimited then, in the absence of a notice provision, the security provider can terminate the security at any time.(Halsbury para.1200, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008)).

10. According to GREEK literature, the period of notice must be reasonable, according to the circumstances of each particular case (Georgiades § 4 no. 51).

(d) Demand of security provider against debtor for early recourse

11. For details, cf. national notes to IV.G.– 2:111 (Debtor's relief for the security provider).

II. Amount of the security upon termination

12. In FRANCE, GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY, the NETHERLANDS and SCOTLAND a security for future or conditional (and global) obligations is limited to those obligations that exist at the time of termination of the security (FRANCE: Simler nos. 780 ss.; GERMANY: BGH 10 June 1985, NJW 1986, 252, 253; BGH 22 May 1986, NJW 1986, 2308, 2309; GREECE: C*helidonis*, EllDik 1998, 39, 1034; ITALY: Cass. 19 June 2001 no. 8324, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 1217; Cass. 6 August 1992 no. 9349, Giur.it 1993 I 1, 1255; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:861 para. 2 – mandatory rule for non-professionals (CC art. 7:862 lit. a), but also applicable to professional providers of security (Blomkwist no. 16 at p. 30); SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 980; Gloag and Irvine 858). In FRANCE and GERMANY, obligations that are created after termination has become effective are not covered, unless these obligations are only ancillary obligations or costs (FRANCE: Cass.civ. 10 May 1988, Bull.civ. 1988 I no. 134 p. 93; GERMANY: CC § 767 para. 1 sentence 2 or para. 2; MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 57). However, in GERMANY the security provider is liable for those obligations that are created after the notice reaches the creditor but before it becomes effective, provided these obligations are not extraordinary (cf. Schimansky/Bunte/Lwowski/Schmitz § 91 no. 114; contra: Derleder, NJW 1986, 97, 102). GERMAN CC § 777 is not applicable so that the creditor has not to demand performance from the security provider before or immediately after termination becomes effective (BGH 4 July 1985, NJW 1985, 3007, 3008).

13. In case of termination, the amount of the security will be determined in AUSTRIA, ITALY and the NETHERLANDS by the date on which the security provider communicates the intention to terminate (AUSTRIA: Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1353 no. 8; ITALY: Cass. 15 March 1999 no. 2284, Giust.Civ.Mass. 1999 565; CA Milano 17 March 1998, BBTC 2000 II 402; CFI Milano 15 July 1993, BBTC 1994 II 548; DUTCH CC art. 7:861 para. 2; du Perron and Haentjens art. 861 no. 3). By contrast, according to GREEK literature, the termination becomes effective upon expiration of the reasonable period of notice (Georgiades § 4 no. 52). In SPAIN it has been held that the liability is restricted to the amount outstanding at the time the (necessary) notice reached the creditor, provided that the creditor has had a real possibility to avoid new sums being added (Carrasco 250).

14. Under ENGLISH law, termination of a security will not affect the liability of the security provider as it stands at the date of termination (cf. Thomas v. Nottingham Inc. Football Club Ltd. [1972] Ch 596; Andrews and Millett no. 8-006). It seems that the security provider's liability will also cover new secured obligations arising during the notice period, although there is little authority on this point (cf. Andrews and Millett no. 8-009; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 9-75). It is also not entirely clear whether the security provider is liable for secured obligations that have been incurred or undertaken before termination of the security but which only accrue at a later date (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 9-72, 9-22 ss.).

IV.G.–2:110: Reduction of creditor's rights

(1) If and in so far as due to the creditor's conduct the security provider cannot be subrogated to the creditor's rights against the debtor and to the creditor's personal and proprietary security rights granted by third persons, or cannot be fully reimbursed from the debtor or from third party security providers, if any, the creditor's rights against the security provider are reduced by the extent necessary to prevent the latter from suffering any loss as a result of the creditor's conduct. The security provider has a corresponding right to recover from the creditor if the security provider has already performed.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies only if the creditor's conduct falls short of the standard of care which could be expected of persons managing their affairs with reasonable prudence.

COMMENTS

A. Basic idea

Since a security provider usually assumes the security without remuneration, the security provider should, if obliged to perform to the creditor, be able to seek reimbursement from the debtor. IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) makes various rights available to the security provider: a claim for reimbursement according to paragraph (1) first sentence as well as a subrogation to the creditor's rights against the debtor, both the personal rights (paragraph (1) second sentence) and the personal and proprietary rights securing this latter claim (paragraph (3)).

The present Article deals with the consequences if, due to the conduct of the creditor, these rights are lost or are diminished and therefore cannot pass fully or partly to the security provider, after the latter has performed to the creditor. Such conduct may result in the creditor being deprived of rights against the security provider.

B. Details

The rule in this Article may come into operation in various ways. One typical example is that the creditor delays collection of a sum which is due by the debtor, although well aware that the debtor's financial situation is worsening. If the creditor waits until the debtor has become insolvent before demanding payment from the provider of dependent security, the creditor will lose the right to proceed against the security provider to the extent that the latter has, because of the creditor's conduct, lost the right to be reimbursed from the debtor's insolvent estate. Another example is that the creditor, believing that the debtor will remain solvent, gives up a personal or proprietary security against the debtor who later, against expectations, becomes bankrupt. Another typical instance occurs where the creditor negligently allows a security right against the debtor to deteriorate or to disappear, especially if, as is usually the case, the encumbered assets are held by the debtor.

Which yardstick is appropriate in order to determine how carefully the creditor must act in order to avoid losing rights against the security provider? Paragraph (2) makes it clear that the standard is that which could be expected of persons managing their affairs with reasonable prudence. This is an objective standard which does not depend on, for example, the creditor's abilities or professional experience. However, it requires some negligence on the creditor's part. A creditor who fails to take action when no reasonable person would be expected to do so will not lose rights. This is important for security providers too because the present Article is applied by reference in IV.G.–1:107 (Several security providers: recourse against debtor).

If the creditor prejudices the security provider's position by failing to preserve rights where this could reasonably be expected, the sanction may consist of a (pro tanto) discharge of the dependent security provider or by granting the security provider a claim for damages for breach of an obligation or duty imposed on the creditor. The former alternative has been chosen since it seems undesirable to place an obligation or duty on a creditor to protect the creditor's own interests and to place a creditor with a security in a potentially worse position (by virtue of an award of damages which might surpass the amount of the security) than a creditor without a security. In practice the two solutions would almost always lead to the same results.

C. Application to recourse claims

It should be noted that the rules of this Article are also applied with appropriate adaptations in the context of recourse claims as between several security providers. Where a security provider acts so as to deprive another security provider of the possibility of having secondary recourse against the debtor or of sharing any benefits recovered from the debtor, the former security provider may find that rights of recourse are correspondingly reduced, cf. Comments on IV.G.– 1:107 (Several security providers: recourse against debtor).

D. Consumer as security provider

The Article, as a rule protecting the security provider applies to a consumer who has provided a dependent personal security, one who has purported to assume an independent personal security (cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) and for consumer security providers in a co-debtorship for security purposes (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)). According to IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1), the rules of this Article are mandatory in favour of the consumer. And in the context of a consumer security provider's co-debtorship for security purposes the term "debtor" in the Article means the debtor whose obligation is secured.

NOTES

I. Damages or discharge

1. The subrogation of the security provider to the creditor's rights against the debtor after the security provider has paid the secured debt, or otherwise performed under the security, is one of the ubiquitous features of the law of dependent personal securities within the different legal systems. It is also a common feature that acts of the creditor which deprive the security provider of the right to subrogation, or diminish this right, do not operate to the disadvantage of the security provider. In this respect two favourable solutions for the security provider are possible: the security provider can either be discharged (fully or pro tanto) from liability or be entitled to a claim for damages against the creditor. Most legal systems have opted for discharge of the liability of the provider of personal security (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2037 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2314): full discharge; FRENCH Grimaldi Commission´s proposal of a new CC art. 2322: discharge pro tanto; however, this proposal was not adopted by the legislator of 2006;

DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 85 ss.; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett nos. 9-040 ss.; GERMAN CC § 776; GREEK CC art. 863; cf. Doublis, Chrimatodotiseon 238 ss., 240; ITALIAN CC art. 1955; PORTUGUESE CC art. 653; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark nos. 976 s.; SPANISH CC art. 1852; SWEDEN: W*alin*, Borgen 198 s.). Only a few legal systems uphold the liability of the security provider but grant a right to damages against the creditor (AUSTRIA: CC § 1364 sentence 2; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:850 para. 3 read with art. 6:12 read with art. 6:154; Blomkwist no. 21; there may be no derogations from CC art. 6:154 to the detriment of a non-professional security provider (CC art. 7:862 lit. b); Blomkwist no. 30)). The different approaches do not necessarily affect the end result since a security provider may set off a claim for damages against the creditor's claim for performance.

II. General scope of creditor's duties

2. The security provider's right of subrogation may be affected in several ways. The loss of co-providers of personal security or of proprietary security granted by a third party is strictly speaking not the loss of a right, which the creditor already had vis-à-vis the debtor. Due to these losses, however, the security provider's possibilities to be subrogated to the rights the creditor holds as security for the debtor's obligation are diminished or completely lost. Since under most legal systems, as well as under the present Rules, the security provider's right of subrogation comprises third party security – be it personal or proprietary – not only detrimental acts of the creditor concerning the secured obligation but moreover detrimental acts concerning third party security fall within the ambit of the relevant rules.

3. In GERMANY, on the other hand, only detrimental acts concerning security rights fall within the ambit of the relevant statutory provision (GERMAN CC § 776) while the legislator denied in general any duty of care (Diligenzpflichten) of the creditor vis-à-vis the security provider due to the unilaterally binding character of dependent personal securities (cf. Protokolle II 481); creditors should only be burdened with charges as against themselves (Obliegenheiten), i.e. duties which are not enforceable by the security provider, but the creditor has to bear the disadvantages resulting from a breach of such duties (cf. Staudinger/Horn § 776 nos. 1, 17; Erman/Herrmann § 765 no. 10). As far as the creditor's acts affect the secured obligation and cause damage to the security provider, the latter is only protected by the principle of bona fides (GERMAN CC § 242; cf. only Palandt/Sprau § 776 no. 2 and § 768 no. 2). Although the requirements as to the creditor's behaviour in order to establish a liability according to this principle seem to be less severe now, the level of protection of the security provider seems to be still inferior to those legal systems in which a specific statutory provision exists. The situation appears to be similar in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, cf. no. 6 below.

III. Delayed collection of secured claim

4. One situation in which the security provider's subrogated rights against the debtor are affected occurs when the creditor delays collection of a claim from the debtor and the latter suffers a deteriorating financial position or even becomes insolvent.

5. AUSTRIAN law expressly holds the creditor responsible for a delay in demanding performance from the debtor if that delay affects the security provider's claim against the debtor (CC § 1364 sentence 2). Such damage has been assumed if the debtor has become insolvent and the security provider will probably not be able to recover but a small dividend (OGH 7 December 1955, ÖJZ 1956, no. 125 at p. 237). Some aspects of the rule are uncertain, e.g. whether the creditor must have acted culpably (formerly the courts did not demand this, e.g. OGH 7 December 1955, above, but they seem now to follow the writers´ contrary view, cf. OGH 26 May 1987, ÖBA 1987, 924; Rummel/Gamerith § 1364 no. 4; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1364 no. 3). Controversial is also whether solidary providers of security can rely on the provision (denied by OGH 22 October 1935, SZ 17 no. 146 at p. 416 s.; but apparently affirmed now by OGH 26 May 1987, above, and by most writers, e.g. Rummel/Gamerith § 1346 no. 6). However, the security provider's contributory negligence may diminish the claim; thus CC § 1364 sentence 1 entitles the security provider to demand security from the defaulting debtor (cf. OGH 7 December 1955, ÖJZ 1956, no. 125 at p. 237 (238)).

6. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, the delayed collection of the secured claim by the creditor will normally not discharge the security provider (ENGLAND: Black v. Ottoman Bank (1862) 15 Moore KB 472, 15 ER 573; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 8-109; Halsbury/Salter para. 1230, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008); SCOTLAND: Gloag and Irvine 865). The reason is that it is the security provider's duty to see that the principal debtor performs (ENGLAND: Wright v. Simpson (1802) 6 Ves Jun 714, 31 ER 1272); moreover, the security provider is entitled at any time to pay off the creditor and then to sue the debtor in the creditor's name (ENGLAND: Swire v. Redman (1875-76) 1 QBD 536; Andrews and Millett no. 9-029). Should it be agreed as a condition of the security, however, that the creditor uses the utmost efforts to obtain payment from the debtor, a breach of this condition discharges the security provider (ENGLAND: London Guarantie Co. v. Fearnley (1879-80) 5 App. Cas. 911; Andrews and Millett no. 9-036; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 964). The security provider is also discharged from liability if the creditor agrees with the debtor to give time to the latter (cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:102 no. 29). Also according to ITALIAN legal writers on CC art. 1955, a simple delay of the creditor in collecting the secured obligation is not sufficient to discharge the security provider, even if the creditor knew of the debtor's precarious patrimonial situation or if such delay caused a deterioration of the securities (Fragali, Della fideiussione 475 s.).

7. In GREECE, there are two relevant provisions: according to CC art. 862, a security provider shall be discharged if by reason of a fault committed by the creditor, the latter cannot be satisfied by the debtor; but according to CC art. 863, a security provider shall be discharged if the creditor has desisted from enforcing securities covering exclusively the creditor's claim, in respect of which the personal security was issued, as a result of which the security provider is damaged. The GREEK Supreme Court held in decision 1230/1997 (DEE 4, 280 ss.) that the creditor's delay of 21 months before initiating legal proceedings against the debtor is a strong indication for gross negligence on the part of the creditor (the security provider had waived the beneficium of CC art. 862; this waiver, however, is only valid in so far as the creditor's fault is slight considering that CC art. 332 renders null any prior agreement excluding or limiting liability arising from gross negligence). It is also necessary, however, to show that this delay actually reduced the effectiveness of collecting measures against the debtor (cf. Doublis, Chrimatodotiseon, 244, 245).

8. In BELGIUM, FRANCE, LUXEMBOURG, PORTUGAL and SPAIN the security provider is generally discharged as soon as the creditor's responsibility for the loss of priority rights is established (FRANCE: Simler nos. 823 ss.; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 785). Especially if, due to an intervening insolvency of the debtor, the delayed collection of claims leads to a loss of assets, the creditor may be liable (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2024 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2301); PORTUGUESE CC art. 653; SPANISH CC art. 1833). However, in some decisions the security provider has been relieved without proof of the actual loss of priority rights, since the delayed collection of a secured claim by the creditor would constitute a case of inexcusable negligence (FRANCE: cf. Cass.civ. 23 January 1980, D. 1980, I.R. 408; Simler no. 826). By contrast, in PORTUGAL an effective loss of the security provider's right must be established and the discharge operates only in so far as the security provider actually suffered losses (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 671).

9. There is no specific provision in GERMANY concerning this issue. The creditor has according to court practice in general no collateral duties vis-à-vis the security provider and is consequently not obliged to preserve the security provider's rights against the debtor, especially not in execution against the debtor (Erman/Herrmann § 765 no. 11; Staudinger/Horn § 776 no. 2; critical Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 245; see also no. 3 above). However, the principle of bona fides (CC § 242) applies and the security provider is therefore at least protected against an abuse of rights by the creditor, i.e. if the creditor violates the security provider's interests in a grossly negligent way or in bad faith (BGH 5 December 1962, WM 1963, 24, 25; Palandt/Sprau § 768 no. 2). This has been assumed when the creditor is responsible for the debtor's economic breakdown and by this prevents the security provider from having recourse against the debtor (BGH 23 February 1984, WM 1984, 586; BGH 7 February 1966, WM 1966, 317). Moreover, the creditor is obliged to act vis-à-vis the debtor as if the secured obligation was not secured in order to preserve the creditor's own interests, especially to reduce possible damage (BGH 30 March 1995, NJW 1995, 1886, 1888; BGH 15 July 1999, NJW 1999, 3195, 3197). If one of these exceptional duties is violated the security provider has a claim for damages against the creditor who consequently loses rights against the security provider (Erman/Herrmann § 765 no. 11).

IV. Release of co-providers of security

10. In BELGIAN, FRENCH, DUTCH, ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law the release of co-providers of security may result in the security provider being either fully or pro tanto discharged (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 590 at p. 311; FRANCE: Simler no. 854; NETHERLANDS: Asser/Hartkamp no. 597). The security provider will be fully discharged if the released security provider's liability was joint or joint and several (i.e. "solidary" in the terminology of IV.G.–1:105) with the liability of the remaining security provider in which case the continued existence of the co-security provider is regarded as a condition of the other security provider's liability (ENGLAND: Smith v. Wood [1929] 1 Ch 14; Andrews and Millett no. 9-041; Halsbury/Salter para. 1246, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008); SCOTLAND: Mercantile Amendment Act (Scotland) 1856 s. 9). If there is no such condition of the security, the discharge will operate pro tanto only in so far as the remaining security providers´ right of contribution is affected by the release (ENGLAND: Re Wolmershausen (1890) 62 LT (N.S.) 541; Ward v. National Bank of New Zealand Ltd. (1882-83) 8 App. Cas. 755; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 8-26; SCOTLAND: Morgan v. Smart (1872) 10 M 610, 615). There is no discharge if there is no actual release of the co-security provider but e.g. merely a covenant not to sue or a giving of time to the co-security provider (ENGLAND: Halsbury/Salter para. 1247 Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008)); SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 976). According to GERMAN CC § 776, if the creditor waives the right against a co-provider of security the other security provider is released in so far as compensation could have been obtained by virtue of the waived right as provided for in § 774. This applies even if the waived right was not created until after the assumption of the security. This leads in general to a proportional release according to § 774 para. 2, § 426 para. 1; the situation is similar under the FINNISH LDepGuar § 18 para. 1 (RP 189/1998 rd 53 s.)

11. According to FRENCH CC arts. 1285 para. 2, 1287 para. 3 read with 1288, a security provider is either fully or partly discharged (Simler nos. 746 and 854) if a co-provider of security is released. SPANISH CC art. 1850 provides for pro tanto-discharge in case of release of a co-provider of security. In AUSTRIA it is expressly provided that the release of one security provider does not affect the relationship towards the other providers of security (CC § 1363 sentence 3). This means that a security provider who has performed to the creditor may take recourse also against the security provider released by the creditor (Rummel/Gamerith § 1363 no. 5 ss.). By contrast, the prevailing opinion in GREECE does not apply CC art. 863 which effectuates a discharge of the security provider's obligation to the case of a co-provider of security because of the solidary liability of the co-providers of security resulting from CC arts. 854 and 860 (cf. Doublis, Chrimatodotiseon, 249 fn. 109). According to PORTUGUESE case law, the release of one co-provider of security has the effect of discharging the other providers of security proportionally to the released security provider's share of the total liability (CA Coimbra 28 February 1989, CJ XIV, I-69).

V. Loss and deterioration of proprietary security rights held by creditor

12. Under BELGIAN, LUXEMBOURGIAN, DUTCH, GREEK and SWEDISH law the position is in general as follows: The creditor may not act or neglect to act so as to worsen the position of the security provider, and if by the creditor's act or omission the benefit of a security is lost or diminished, the security provider will be discharged, either wholly or in part (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 590; GREECE: CC art. 863; A.P. (Plenum) 6/2000, EED 51, 285 ss.; LUXEMBOURG: Ravarani, Jurisprudence récente, 918; NETHERLANDS: Asser/Hartkamp no. 597; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 122 ss.). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, the security provider is discharged in full if the release of a security by the creditor constitutes a breach of a condition of the security (ENGLAND: Carter v. White [1884] 25 Ch. D 666; Halsbury para. 1244, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008); SCOTLAND: Drummond v. Rannie (1836) 14 D 437). The same consequence applies where the release is agreed between creditor and principal debtor as a variation of the terms of the principal agreement (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 8-47; see also national notes to IV.G.–2:102 no. 27). If the security provider, however, cannot show that the giving up of a proprietary security amounts to a breach of condition of the security by the creditor, the security provider is only pro tanto discharged by this release to the extent that the security provider's rights have been impaired (ENGLAND: Halsbury para. 1244, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008)); SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 977). Apart from the question of a release of securities, the creditor is also under an equitable duty to maintain securities for the benefit of the security provider; if the creditor violates this duty, the security provider's liability will be reduced to the extent of losses suffered as a consequence of the creditor's dealings (ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 9-041; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 8-49; the situation is similar in SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 977). The extent of this duty of the creditor, however, has not been exactly defined in the case law yet (ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett no. 9-043; O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 8-55 ss.). It has been held, however, that the creditor is not under an obligation to enforce securities even though a delayed enforcement of the security might lead to less money being realised from it (China and South Sea Bank Ltd. v. Tan [1990] 1 AC 536).

13. In FRANCE, if the priority or proprietary rights existing at the time of contracting (Simler no. 836) are lost due to the creditor's fault (Cass.ch.mixte 10 June 2005, JCP E 2005, II no. 1088, note Legeais; Simler no. 842), the security provider is released from liability (CC art. 2037 (since 2006: CC art. 2314)). The Grimaldi Commission´s proposal to limit the security provider's release to the amount of damage suffered (CC new art. 2322), in conformity with court practice, sets out in fact a partial discharge; however, the proposal was not adopted by the legislation of 2006. According to court decisions, the security provider is only partially discharged if e.g. the value of the lost priority rights is less than the value of the secured obligation (Cass.civ. 9 May 1994, JCP G 1994, IV no. 1730; Simler no. 854). Since 1984 (Law no. 84-148 of 1 March 1984 on prevention of enterprises's insolvency) the provision on the security provider's release is mandatory (CC art. 2037 sentence 2 (since 2006: CC art. 2314 sentence 2)). According to the SPANISH CC art. 1852 the providers of security, even if they are solidary, are discharged from their obligation whenever an act of the creditor prevents them from being subrogated to the creditor's rights, mortgages, and privileges. Most important legal writers agree on considering as "acts of the creditor" any conduct imputable to the creditor (Díez-Picazo 460), including omissions (Díez-Picazo 460; Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 410). The security provider will be discharged even if having failed to claim anticipated discharge (Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 412). In any case, the conduct must have taken place before the security provider has performed (Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 410). The wording of ITALIAN CC art. 1955 is parallel to its SPANISH equivalent, but it does not cover any conduct or any inactivity of the creditor. The act of the creditor must be a culpable violation of a legal or contractual duty (Cass. 6 February 2004 no. 2301, Giust.civ. 2004, 1479) and must have as consequence the complete loss of a right of the security provider. A mere difficulty in exercising this right due to acts of the creditor is not sufficient (Bozzi, La fideiussione 267; Cass. 21 January 2000 no. 675, BBTC 2001 II 431). PORTUGUESE CC art. 653 refers explicitly to "positive and negative acts of the creditor" and although it only mentions "rights", it does so with a general meaning, including therefore mortgages and privileges (see Antunes Varela and Pires de Lima 671).

14. According to GERMAN CC § 776 if the creditor waives a right of preference attached to the claim or a proprietary security right (cf. Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 241 s.; Erman/Herrmann § 776 no. 2; partly critical e.g. Staudinger/Horn § 776 no. 8), the provider of dependent personal security is discharged in so far as the provider could have obtained satisfaction by virtue of the waived right as provided for in CC § 774. This applies even if the waived right was created after the assumption of the dependent personal security. Contrary to the legal systems mentioned in preceding no. 13, under GERMAN law it is mostly held that only wilful acts of the creditor are sanctioned, excluding mere negligence (Erman/Herrmann § 776 no. 4; MünchKomm/Habersack § 776 no. 8 with references; however, the author takes a less strict view; contra: Staudinger/Horn § 776 no. 12). Omissions are not sanctioned either (Erman/Herrmann § 776 no. 4; see also BGH 15 July 1999, NJW 1999, 3195, 3197: it is not sufficient if the value of another security diminishes and the creditor does nothing; contra Staudinger/Horn § 776 no. 12). Concerning the reference to § 774 see again national notes to IV.G.–1:106 no. 4: there must be a right of recourse (cf. Staudinger/Horn § 776 no. 15). Finally, the waived security right must have an economic value (Erman/Herrmann § 776 no. 6).

15. There are contradictory decisions in GREECE on whether the creditor's negligence in respect of proprietary security releases the security provider from liability: the application of CC arts. 862, 863 stipulating the security provider's discharge if due to the creditor's negligence the security provider's claim for reimbursement against the debtor has been rendered impossible, has been denied in a case where, due to the creditor's negligence in safeguarding the pledged merchandise, it was received by the debtor and sold to third parties, thus depriving the security provider of any possibility to be satisfied out of the pledged things (A.P. 1260/94, DEE 1, 307 ss. = EllDik 1996, 101 ss.). In an older Supreme Court decision, on the other hand, the creditor was held responsible for not timeously selling perishable merchandise, which was eventually destroyed (A.P. 807/72, ND 1973, 235 ss. annotated by Kalogeras 260 ss.). In a recent case the creditor negligently returned pledged goods to the debtor. The security provider had waived the benefit of CC art. 863 on release of securities, and the Supreme Court had to answer the question whether or not the loss of securities could be qualified in the context of CC art. 862 as gross negligence of the creditor, resulting in an inability to be satisfied by the security provider. The Supreme Court denied this since the security provider's waiver of discharge due to release of securities by the creditor was exactly intended to enable the latter to waive securities, without losing at the same time the security (A.P. (Plenum) 6/2000, EED 2000, 285 ss., with strong minority opinion of four members; also critical on this position Chelidonis, EpiskED 2001, 351 ss.).

16. Again, AUSTRIAN law offers a different solution. CC § 1360 final sentence provides that the creditor is "not allowed" to give up a pledge created by the debtor or a third person before or at the time of assumption of the dependent personal security. In conformity with the corresponding rule discussed above no. 5, the waiver of the security is effective but the creditor is responsible without fault for the ensuing damage to the provider of dependent personal security (Rummel/Gamerith § 1360 no. 2; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1360 nos. 2, 4). The provision is extended to other security rights, e.g. a reservation of title under a contract of sale between creditor and debtor (Rummel/Gamerith § 1360 no. 5).

17. A comprehensive duty of care of the creditor vis-à-vis the provider of dependent personal security in AUSTRIAN law is derived from CC § 1364 sentence 2 (above no. 5; OGH 26 May 1987, ÖBA 1987, 924; 14 April 1996, Ecolex 1996, 744). In the latter case the Supreme Court held a creditor liable for the delayed enforcement of a reservation of title in a bus sold to the debtor although such enforcement had been promised.

IV.G.–2:111: Debtor's relief for the security provider

(1) A security provider who has provided a security at the debtor's request or with the debtor's express or presumed consent may request relief by the debtor:

(a) if the debtor has not performed the secured obligation when performance became due;

(b) if the debtor is unable to pay or has suffered a substantial diminution of assets; or

(c) if the creditor has brought an action on the security against the security provider.

(2) Relief may be granted by furnishing adequate security.

COMMENTS

A. The principle

Under certain conditions, the provider of a dependent security may demand relief from the debtor even before the security provider has in fact performed to the creditor. Such exceptional "preceding" relief presupposes, however, that the security provider had assumed the security upon the demand of the debtor or with the debtor's actual or presumed consent (e.g., by virtue of benevolent intervention) – this, of course, will almost always be the case, except in the rare situation of assuming a personal security as a gift to the debtor. In this latter case, any claim of the security provider for relief from the debtor is excluded.

In many cases, the provider of a dependent security may not be prepared to assume a security, unless a potential claim for reimbursement against the debtor is secured from the very beginning, e.g. by a personal counter security furnished by a third person or by a proprietary security, furnished either by the debtor or a third person.

B. Conditions

The conditions for requesting relief from the debtor are exhaustively enumerated in paragraphs (1)(a), (b) and (c). The condition in (a) refers to the debtor's non-performance of the secured obligation upon maturity, since this may easily trigger the creditor's demand upon the security provider. The condition in (b) refers to the debtor's financial position. It covers the debtor's inability to pay (even if no insolvency proceeding has been opened) because this virtually precludes the creditor's recovery from the debtor; and it covers the situation where the debtor's assets have been substantially diminished – a fact that threatens the creditor's chances of successful recovery from the debtor and therefore increases the security provider's risk of being held liable by the creditor on the one hand and of having small chances of recuperating from the debtor, on the other hand. The substantial diminution which is required must be measured by the amount of the creditor's outstanding claims and the chances of realising a claim for reimbursement from the debtor's assets. The condition in (c) refers – independently of the conditions in (a) and (b) – to an action for performance brought by the creditor against the dependent security giver. This clearly justifies relief by the debtor.

The chances of obtaining relief from the debtor personally will usually be small. But the debtor may be able to raise money or at least personal or proprietary security from a third party, e.g. a relative or a related company.

C. Form of relief

Since in all the cases mentioned in paragraph (1), the provider of a dependent security has not yet performed to the creditor, the security provider cannot demand payment. Primarily the security provider is entitled to demand security for future performance to the creditor (cf. paragraph (2)). Such security may be granted by the debtor or by any third person on behalf of the debtor; the latter alternative will practically be the rule in the situations covered by paragraph (1)(a) because the debtor in these cases usually will not be able to furnish security.

If an insolvency proceeding has been opened over the debtor, a claim for relief will in fact be without chances.

D. Consumer as security provider

The Article is directly applicable to consumer providers of dependent security. Since the Article is favourable for consumer security providers, the rule also applies to consumers who have assumed an independent personal security (cf. IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)) and to consumer security providers in a co-debtorship for security purposes (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1)).

According to According to IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2), the rules of the present Article are mandatory in favour of the consumer. And in the context of a consumer security provider's co-debtorship for security purposes the term "debtor" means the debtor for whom security is being provided.

NOTES

I. Security provider's anticipated recourse

1. In most European countries the provider of dependent security may have before performance a right of anticipated recourse against the debtor (AUSTRIAN CC § 1364; BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC arts. 2032 and 2039 (since 2006: FRENCH CC arts. 2309 and 2316); ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett nos. 10-024 ss.; FINNISH LDepGuar § 36 para. 2; RP 189/1998 rd 75 s.; GERMAN CC § 775; GREEK CC art. 861; ITALIAN CC art. 1953; PORTUGUESE CC art. 648; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark nos. 936-938; SPANISH CC art. 1843). However, such security provider's recourse is in FRANCE very rarely practised (Simler no. 611). In SPAIN the efficacy of such a right in practice is questioned by the authors (Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 297) and its scope has been narrowly construed by the courts (TS 21 October 2003, RAJ 2003/7517, TS 13 July 2007, RAJ 2007/4864).
2. In the NETHERLANDS, the security provider's anticipative recourse has been abrogated by the New Civil Code in 1992.

II. Reasons

3. In BELGIUM, FRANCE and SPAIN it is thought that the provider of dependent security has to be protected against additional risks of the debtor's insolvency, since the assumption of a dependent security is in principle considered as an act of friendship (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 504; FRANCE: Simler no. 610; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 295 s.). In ENGLISH law the right of the provider of dependent security to anticipated recourse is founded in equity and based on the equitable principle that an anticipated "injury" is to be prevented before it is suffered, "it being unreasonable that a man should always have such a cloud hang over him" (Ranelaugh(Earl of) v. Hayes (1863) 1 Vern 189 per Lord Keeper North, 190). In SCOTTISH law the right to anticipated relief is based on an implied mandate between debtor and security provider, and the latter is entitled to relief once "liability is threatened to be imposed" (Cuningham v. Montgomerie (1879) 6 R 1333 per Lord President Inglis). GERMAN CC § 775 is intended to protect the provider of dependent security against special risks that may occur after assumption of the security and that may affect the claim for recourse against the debtor (Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 426). There is special need for this rule in GERMAN law since the rules on mandate that are generally applicable to the relationship between provider of dependent security and debtor are not suitable for this special situation (cf. Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 425; Staudinger/Horn § 775 no. 1). Also in ITALIAN law the anticipated security provider's recourse is considered to be an instrument of protection, mainly based on the principle rebus sic stantibus, which allows the security provider to be secured from the debtor's failure to perform or to avoid payment (Giusti 247).

III. Conditions

(a) Subjective: dependent security assumed with debtor's consent

4. In AUSTRIA, FRANCE, BELGIUM and PORTUGAL the debtor must have agreed to the granting of a dependent security. If the dependent security is assumed without the debtor's consent or without information of the debtor, the security provider has no anticipated recourse against the former (AUSTRIAN CC § 1364 sentence 1; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 510; FRANCE: Simler no. 615; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 782); in SPAIN, the same approach is taken in Carrasco, Tratado, p. 277; FRANCE: Simler no. 615; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 782). A presumed intent of the debtor by virtue of benevolent intervention is not sufficient in FRANCE (Simler no. 615). Also in ENGLISH law anticipated relief may only be granted if the provider of dependent security had assumed the security on the express or implied request of the debtor (Andrews and Millett no. 10-025); the same seems to apply in SCOTTISH law because no mandate can be implied if the security provider has not acted on the debtor's – at least: implied – request. The situation is similar in GERMANY since according to the wording of § 775 the provider of dependent security has a claim for release only if having assumed the security by reason of a mandate of the debtor or if having the rights of a mandatory against the debtor under the provisions on benevolent intervention; this means that there must be an express or at least implicit mandate of the debtor (CC §§ 670, 683). A mandate is held to exist if a shareholder guarantees the company's obligations; consequently, after leaving the company the shareholder may demand release from the security obligation (Palandt/Sprau § 775 no. 1; Staudinger/Horn § 775 no. 3). However, if the provider of dependent security cannot claim recourse against the debtor for a legal reason, e.g. due to Insolvency Act § 254 para. 2 sentence 2, there is no claim for release (Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 426 s.).

(b) Objective conditions - Debtor's default or inability to pay, substantial decrease of debtor's property or proceedings against the provider of dependent security

5. In most European countries, at least two of the above-mentioned cases are dealt with: the debtor's inability to pay and proceedings of the creditor against the provider of dependent security:

(c) Debtor's default

6. According to GERMAN CC § 775 para. 1 no. 3 and GREEK CC art. 861 no. 3 the provider of dependent security can demand from the debtor release from the security if the debtor is in default in performing the obligation. It is irrelevant that the creditor extends maturity, unless the security provider has agreed (GERMANY: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 438).

(d) Debtor's inability to pay

7. In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG reference is made to the professional or civil insolvency of the debtor (FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2032 no. 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2309 no. 2)), in ITALY and SPAIN to the debtor's bankruptcy or insolvency (ITALIAN CC art. 1953 para. 1 no. 2 speaks of insolvency, meaning any inability to pay: Giusti 245 fn. 217; SPANISH CC art. 1843 para. 1 no. 2), in PORTUGAL more generally to the increased risk of the provider of dependent security (CC art. 648 lit. b)). As a form of protection of anticipated recourse in FRANCE the Grimaldi Commission had proposed that the provider of dependent security should be entitled, before any performance, to declare a future or present claim at the opening of an insolvency proceeding of the debtor (CC new art. 2319 para. 3); but this proposal was not adopted by the legislator in 2006. In SCOTTISH law the security provider can take precautionary measures if the debtor is vergens ad inopiam (declining towards poverty; Kinloch v. M´Intosh (1822) 1 S 457).

(e) Substantial decrease of debtor's property

8. According to GERMAN CC § 775 para. 1 no. 1 and GREEK CC art. 861 no. 1, the provider of dependent security is protected if the financial position of the debtor has worsened. In addition, the claim for recourse must be endangered which is not the case if this claim is secured e.g. by a counter-security (Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 435). The same is true in AUSTRIA if the debtor's proprietary situation has so seriously worsened that there is "founded fear of the debtor being unable to pay" (CC § 1365).

(f) Proceedings against the provider of dependent security

9. According to BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2032 no. 1 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2309 no. 1), ITALIAN CC art. 1953 para. 1 no. 1 and SPANISH CC art. 1843 para. 1 no. 1, the provider of dependent security has the right to exercise the right to anticipated security provider's recourse if proceedings are engaged by the creditor against the security provider. By contrast, GERMAN CC § 775 para. 1 no. 4, GREEK CC art. 861 no. 4 and PORTUGUESE CC art. 648 lit. a require that the creditor has already obtained an enforceable judgment for satisfaction against the security provider.

(g) Other cases - Express extension of maturity of the secured debt

10. Generally, cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:102. In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, the provider of dependent security is entitled to exercise recourse in case of an express extension of the maturity of the secured debt (FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2039 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2316)). The parties can derogate from this provision (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 510; FRANCE: Simler no. 469).

(h) Implied extension

11. In FRANCE, BELGIUM, LUXEMBOURG, ITALY, PORTUGAL and SPAIN the rule on anticipated recourse applies if the debtor had promised to release the provider of dependent security within a certain period of time and this time limit has expired (FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2032 no. 3 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2309 no. 3); ITALIAN CC art. 1953 para. 1 no. 3; PORTUGUESE CC art. 648 lit. d); SPANISH CC art. 1843 para. 1 no. 3) or if the secured debt falls due because the maturity date has been reached (FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2032 no. 4 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2309 no. 4); ITALIAN CC art. 1953 para. 1 no. 4; SPANISH CC art. 1843 para. 1 no. 4). In AUSTRIAN, ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law the right of the provider of dependent security to anticipated relief arises once the secured debt is due and the security provider's liability has accrued in the sense that performance of the security obligation could be enforced by the creditor (AUSTRIAN CC § 1364 sentence 1). In ENGLAND the provider of dependent security can apply for quia timet relief (Tate v. Crewdson [1938] Ch 689; Morrison v. Barking Chemicals Co. Ltd. [1919] 2 Ch 325), and in SCOTLAND has an actio mandati (Cuningham v. Montgomerie (1879) 6 R 1333; Scott v. Grahame (1830) 8 S 749 (CA)). In case of demand securities it is now accepted that the security provider's right to anticipated relief is not dependent on a demand having been made by the creditor (ENGLAND: Thomas v. Nottingham Inc. Football Club Ltd. [1972] Ch 596; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark no. 936).

(i) Debt without time limit

12. If the principal debt is agreed without time limit, the right to recourse may be exercised under FRENCH, BELGIAN, LUXEMBOURGIAN law after expiration of ten years (CC art. 2032 no. 5 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2309 no. 5)). A similar provision exists in ITALIAN and PORTUGUESE law where, however, only a period of five years must have passed (ITALIAN CC art. 1953 para. 1 no. 5; PORTUGUESE CC art. 646 lit. e)). In PORTUGAL this rule applies even to a debt agreed with time limit, if there is a legally imposed extension of time (CC art. 646 lit. e in fine). The same is true under SPANISH CC art. 1843 para. 1 no. 4. However, the rule does not apply if according to the nature of the secured obligation it cannot be extinguished except after this period.

(j) Change of domicile or residence of debtor

13. In PORTUGAL, if after the conclusion of the dependent security the debtor cannot be sued or executed within the national territory and its adjacent islands (CC art. 648 lit. c)), the rule on anticipated recourse applies. A similar rule obtains in AUSTRIA (CC § 1365). In GERMANY and GREECE if the taking of legal action against the debtor has become difficult to a substantial degree by reason of a change of domicile or residence that occurred after the issue of the dependent security, the security provider may demand security from the debtor even before the debt has become due (GERMAN CC § 775 para. 1 no. 2, para. 2; GREEK CC art. 861 no. 2).

IV. Consequences

(a) Damages

14. In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, the provider of dependent security may claim from the debtor compensation for damages (CC art. 2032; (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2309)) or may in case of the extension of time force the debtor to pay (CC art. 2039 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2316)). In practice however, according to the FRENCH majority opinion (Marty/Raynaud/Jestaz no. 60; Aubry/Rau/Ponsard no. 236) the debtor's liability cannot be enforced since there is no present damage, whereas a minority of FRENCH writers and court decisions maintain that a present damage may well be caused by an undue extension of the security provider's obligation (CA Paris 2 March 1971, GazPal 1971, 2, 824). FRENCH majority opinion considers that the security provider cannot obtain any payment or any reimbursement as compensation for many other reasons: on one hand, there cannot be reimbursement without any payment by the security provider; on the other hand, the payment is mostly impossible due to the debtor's inability to pay. According to BELGIAN opinion, CC art. 2032 tends to avoid damage that would arise from the impossibility of the guarantor-solvens to obtain any recourse from the debtor (Van Quickenborne nos. 504-505).

(b) Release or security

15. In ITALY, PORTUGAL and SPAIN the provider of dependent security may claim release or require security for the security provider's own claims against the debtor (ITALIAN CC art. 1953 para. 1; PORTUGUESE CC art. 648 para. 1; SPANISH CC art. 1843 para. 2). In SPAIN it is asserted that the non-release entitles the provider of dependent security to claim damages but this is also considered inefficient in practice since the damage is difficult to specify and prove (Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 298, 299). By virtue of the quia timet action under ENGLISH law the security provider can either apply for a declaration of entitlement to be exonerated and an order that the debtor should pay whatever is due to the creditor (Ascherson v. Tredegar Dry Dock & Wharf Co. Ltd. [1909] 2 Ch 401), or for an order that the debtor is to set aside a particular fund to pay the creditor (Andrews and Millett no. 10-025; O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 11-147 ss.). In the case of a corporate debtor established under the Companies Act 1985, the provider of dependent security can further petition for winding-up of the debtor company by virtue of the Insolvency Act 1986 s. 124 para. 1. The same principles apply in SCOTLAND (Stair/Clark nos. 936 s.). Additionally, in SCOTLAND the security provider is entitled to apply for a court order of precautionary execution against the debtor's estate (Kinloch v. M´Intosh (1822) 1 S 457).

16. In GERMANY, if the secured obligation is due, the provider of dependent security may demand release from the debtor (cf. Staudinger/Horn § 775 no. 4). Contrary to earlier court practice, the GERMAN Supreme Court no longer allows the provider of dependent security to convert the claim for release against the debtor into a claim for reimbursement, not even if the debtor's inability to pay and the security provider's future performance to the creditor are certain (BGH 14 January 1999, BGHZ 140, 270, 272 ss. overruling RG 12 January 1934, RGZ 143, 192, 194). If the debtor, even after being condemned to release the security provider, does nothing, the security provider can pay the creditor and on the basis of the judgment demand these costs from the debtor by means of execution according to CCP § 887 (Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 442; Staudinger/Horn § 775 no. 5). If the secured obligation is not yet due, the debtor is entitled to give security to the security provider instead of a release (CC § 775 para. 2).

(c) Security only

17. In AUSTRIA, the only remedy available to the provider of dependent security is a demand for security from the debtor (CC §§ 1364 sentence 1, 1365). Security may be furnished primarily by creating a proprietary security right for the security provider, otherwise by a third person's personal security (§§ 1373 f). Also pursuant to the majority of BELGIAN, FRENCH, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH writers, the furnishing of adequate security (proprietary or personal) is the only remedy that is available and reveals the true nature of the anticipated recourse as a measure of preservation of rights (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 504; FRANCE: cf. Simler no. 613 ss.; PORTUGAL: Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 664; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 299). As a result of this opinion, according to the FRENCH Grimaldi Commission´s proposal (CC new art. 2319 para. 2) the provider of dependent security may require the furnishing of adequate security; however, the legislator of 2006 did not adopt this proposal. According to GREEK literature, the request for security must be asserted by the provider of dependent security by a legal action or a request to the competent court (Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 861 no. 8). According to a minority opinion in GREECE, if the security provider is in a position to know about the worsening of the debtor's financial situation and nevertheless does not exercise this right, then the security provider should share the damage with the creditor, if the latter has been negligent in collecting the debt from the debtor (cf. Doublis, Metavivasi pistosis 55 ss., 62).

IV.G.–2:112: Notification and request by security provider before performance

(1) Before performance to the creditor, the security provider is required to notify the debtor and request information about the outstanding amount of the secured obligation and any defences or counterclaims against it.

(2) If the security provider fails to comply with the requirements in paragraph (1) or neglects to raise defences communicated by the debtor or known to the security provider from other sources, the security provider's rights to recover from the debtor under IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) are reduced by the extent necessary to prevent loss to the debtor as a result of such failure or neglect.

(3) The security provider's rights against the creditor remain unaffected.

COMMENTS

A. Basic idea

This Article introduces requirements of notification and inquiry before the provider of a dependent security performs to the creditor. The requirements are introduced in order to protect the rights of the debtor.

The requirements of notification and inquiry imposed by paragraph (1) must be interpreted in the light of the rights pertaining to the debtor that according to earlier Articles may be invoked by the provider of a dependent security on the strength of the principle of dependency.

B. Sanctions

If the provider of a dependent security performs to the creditor without having informed the debtor and made relevant inquiries this is not only contrary to the security provider's own interests, but may damage the debtor's rights. The same is true if the security provider neglects to raise debtor's defences which are available to the security provider. In all these cases, the security provider's rights to reimbursement or subrogation against the debtor will be reduced correspondingly.

If the debtor fails to reply to the security provider or gives incomplete or incorrect information, the sanction indicated by paragraph (2) is not justified. Alternatively, it may be justified only in part if the debtor had given some wrong information, but other information, although correct, had been overlooked or disregarded by the security provider.

The sanction imposed by paragraph (2) on the security provider is an appropriate reduction of the rights to recover from the debtor.

C. Preservation of rights as against creditor

Any mistakes which may be committed by the provider of the dependent security vis-à-vis the debtor do not affect the security provider's rights as against the creditor (paragraph (3)).

D. Consumer as security provider

This Article is directly applicable to consumer providers of a dependent personal security, which are not treated differently from non-consumers in this respect; the only difference is that the provision is mandatory in favour of the consumer security provider according to IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2).

Although the present Article does not create rights for but introduces requirements to be observed by a security provider, nevertheless these rules also apply to all consumer security providers. They apply directly to consumers who provide a dependent personal security. By virtue of IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c) they also apply to consumer providers of an independent security and by virtue of IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) (1) to consumer providers of a co-debtorship for security purposes. The requirements laid down in the Article are necessary ingredients of a well-balanced system of personal security where the security provider must respect the legitimate interests of the principal debtor. The information by the security provider may be beneficial to the debtor since in appropriate cases it may prevent or reduce a performance by the security provider if it turns out that the debtor has already made partial or even full performance to the creditor or has defences of which the security provider also may take advantage.

NOTES

I. Legal basis

1. Although there is no general provision or rule in any member state that requires the provider of dependent security to give information to the debtor, all legal systems seem to agree that the security provider should not be reimbursed if a failure to inform the debtor caused harm. For this reason there are in some countries specific statutory provisions on the security provider's duty to inform the debtor about the creditor's request or the security provider's intention to perform, in order to prevent unjustified payment (AUSTRIAN CC § 1361; BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2031 para. 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2308 para. 2); GREEK CC art. 859; ITALIAN CC art. 1952 para. 2; PORTUGUESE CC arts. 645 para. 1 and 647; SPANISH CC art. 1840). Furthermore in some countries specific rules exist sanctioning the security provider for not notifying the debtor of payment to the creditor if this results in the debtor also paying the creditor (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2031 para. 1 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2308 para. 1); DUTCH CC art. 7:867; ITALIAN CC art. 1952 para. 1; PORTUGUESE CC art. 645 para. 1; SPANISH CC art. 1842).
2. In GERMANY, however, the legislator expressly rejected such specific provisions (Motive, in: Mugdan II 377) so that – in the absence of any contractual stipulation – the solution of these cases must be based upon the principle of bona fides (CC § 242) and the underlying relationship (cf. Soergel/Mühl § 774 no. 8; Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 106, § 768 no. 41; cf. also already Motive, in: Mugdan II 377 s.; similarly BGH 19 September 1985, BGHZ 95, 375, 388).
3. Two countries expressly sanction the provider of dependent security who does not raise against the creditor defences of the debtor of which the security provider knew or ought to have known. In this case GREEK CC art. 859 denies a claim of recourse against the debtor, while DUTCH CC art. 7:868 allows the debtor to raise these defences against the security provider. In all other countries a sanction for this neglect of the debtor's interests must be derived from the general rules concerning the relationship between security provider and debtor.

II. Duty of the dependent security provider to notify the debtor

(a) Requirements

Security provider's duty of information

4. In many countries, the provider of dependent security is held responsible if the provider had paid the creditor (GERMANY: cf. CC § 670 and MünchKomm/Habersack § 774 no. 19) without having notified the debtor and if there were defences the debtor could have raised at the time of the dependent security provider's payment (AUSTRIAN CC § 1361; OGH 19 October 1976, SZ 49 no. 121 at p. 570, 571; GREEK CC art. 859 and Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 859 no. 2; ITALIAN CC art. 1952 para. 2, NETHERLANDS: CC arts. 7:867, 7:868; Blomkwist no. 37; PORTUGUESE CC art. 647 and SPANISH CC art. 1840). BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2031 para. 2 further limits its application to those cases where the provider of dependent security spontaneously paid without being called to pay by the creditor, i.e. if the provider of dependent security was not threatened by immediate execution against assets (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 498; FRANCE: Simler no. 606). The security provider is not held responsible for not notifying the debtor of an intention to perform or of the creditor's request for performance, but for not raising the debtor's defences (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 497; FRANCE: Simler no. 606). In BELGIUM and FRANCE, the provider of dependent security has to invoke all defences available to the debtor (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 499; FRANCE: cf. Cass.com. 14 January 1963, Banque 1963, 199). Hence, in these countries the provider of dependent security bears indirectly the burden of notifying the debtor. In fact, such notification is the only way for the provider of dependent security to obtain information about possible defences of the debtor against the creditor's claim for performance which the security provider is entitled to raise under the principle of accessority.

5. According to GREEK CC art. 859, the provider of dependent security who has paid the creditor is held responsible if the provider had omitted to invoke well-founded defences of the debtor of which the provider knew or ought to have known. The debtor can defend by proving that the provider of dependent security was or should have been aware of the debtor's defences (GREECE: ErmAK/Zepos art. 859 no. 5), whereas the security provider can prove that the lack of knowledge was justifiable (GREECE: Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 859 no. 6). The security provider's duty to obtain information before performing towards the creditor derives from CC art. 859.

6. In GERMANY the provider of dependent security is obliged to respect the debtor's interests as the latter is the principal within the usually existing relationship of mandate between debtor and security provider (BGH 19 September 1985, BGHZ 95, 375, 388 with further references). Therefore, the provider of dependent security is obliged to inform the debtor immediately about the creditor's request for payment and to ask the debtor whether defences exist (Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 106; Schimansky/Bunte/Lwowski/Schmitz § 91 no. 95; see also BGH 19 September 1985, BGHZ 95, 375, 389 and Palandt/Sprau no. 5 preceding § 765). Furthermore, the provider of dependent security has to examine on the basis of bona fides whether there is an obvious abuse of rights (Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 107 with further references). However, the duty of the provider of dependent security to inform the debtor does not mean that the security provider has to ask for the debtor's approval (Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 108; Palandt/Sprau no. 5 preceding § 765).

7. There is no such duty of information under ENGLISH law.

(b) Notification by the security provider

8. It has been held that there is an implied notification of the debtor if the provider of dependent security serves upon the debtor an extra-judicial document asking for information in due time of defences as against the creditor (GREECE: Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 859 no. 6) or a document causing a third party notice in judicial proceedings brought by the creditor (AUSTRIA: OGH 19 October 1976, SZ 49 no. 121 at p. 571).

(c) Sanctions

9. In GREECE the failure of the provider of dependent security to fulfil the aforementioned duties before performance – the failure to invoke the debtor's defences, or indirectly also the failure to notify the debtor – deprives the security provider of the right of recourse (CC art. 859). The situation appears to be similar in SCOTLAND (Maxwell v. Earl of Nithsdale (1632) Mor 2115; Stair/Eden no. 935). Some ROMANIC countries provide the same sanction if the security provider after payment to the creditor does not inform the debtor and the latter also makes payment to the creditor (cf. BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2031 para. 1 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2308 para. 1); DUTCH CC art. 7:867; ITALIAN CC art. 1952 para. 1; PORTUGUESE CC art. 645 para. 1; SPANISH CC art. 1842). Similarly in GERMANY the provider of dependent security who paid the creditor despite the existence of defences against the secured obligation may only claim recourse according to CC § 670 if the provider could reasonably assume according to the circumstances that there was an obligation to pay (BGH 19 September 1985, BGHZ 95, 375, 388). The latter is not the case if the provider of dependent security paid without informing the debtor. In BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBOURG the same harsh sanction applies if the security provider, without demand by the creditor and without notifying the debtor, makes payment to the creditor while the debtor had defences against such performance (CC art. 2031 para. 2 (since 2006: FRENCH art. 2308 para. 2)).

10. In other cases where the provider of dependent security had not raised defences against the creditor which pertained to the debtor, the security provider retains a right of recourse against the debtor, but the latter may raise those exceptions and defences which were available against the creditor at the time payment was made (cf. AUSTRIAN CC § 1361; DUTCH CC art. 7:868; ITALIAN CC art. 1952 para. 2 and SPANISH CC art. 1840). Whether a provider of dependent security in ENGLAND is entitled to a full recourse against the debtor after having paid the creditor without raising the debtor's defences vis-à-vis the creditor depends upon the circumstances of the case: if the security provider had assumed the security without any request of the debtor, the security provider can only have a restitutionary claim to a reimbursement, which requires that the debtor has received a benefit, i.e. the discharge of debts that could have been enforced by the creditor against the debtor (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-44). If, however, the security was provided at the request of the debtor, it is said to depend upon the true construction of the agreement between security provider and debtor whether the former is entitled to reimbursement even though the secured obligation was not enforceable against the debtor: if, on the one hand, the security provider is bound to pay if the principal debtor does not, then the security provider has a right to reimbursement even though the secured debt was not enforceable; if, on the other hand, the security provider should pay only such amounts that the debtor was legally obliged to pay, then there is no right to reimbursement in such situations (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-39; there is a rebuttable presumption for the former meaning, cf. Argo Caribbean Group Ltd. v. Lewis [1976] 2 Lloyd´s Rep 289). It seems that even in this situation the security provider's right to reimbursement by the debtor should not be affected by the fact that the security provider failed to take advantage of a set-off open to the principal debtor since the latter could still assert a claim against the debtor at a later stage (cf. Andrews and Millett no. 11-007 at p. 400).

(d) Exclusion: Failure of debtor to inform the provider of dependent security

11. If the debtor, although notified, keeps silent so that the provider of the dependent security cannot or does not raise exceptions of the debtor, then the security provider has done everything which could be expected. In this case, the debtor is precluded from relying – vis-à-vis the security provider – on defences against the creditor's claim (AUSTRIA: OGH 19 October 1976, SZ 49 no. 121 at p. 570, 571; GREECE: Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 859 no. 4; Kaukas 471; PORTUGAL: CC art. 647). Similarly in GERMANY the security provider who has not been informed by the debtor about the extinction of the secured obligation and who has therefore paid the creditor in good faith has a right of recourse against assignment of the claim for unjustified enrichment vis-à-vis the creditor (MünchKomm/Habersack § 774 no. 19; Graf Lambsdorff and Skora no. 296; cf. Erman/Herrmann § 774 no. 12). Not only is the provider of dependent security generally obliged to inform the debtor but also the latter is inversely obliged on the basis of bona fides to communicate all defences to the provider of dependent security as mandatory, even without being asked by the latter. The debtor may further be obliged to provide information about the debtor's financial situation upon the security provider's request (Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 109 with further references). Also in GREECE a duty of the debtor to inform the provider of dependent security about defences may be derived from the principle of good faith, especially if the liability of the provider of dependent security liability is solidary (Georgiades § 3 no. 155).

III. Security provider's rights against creditor

12. The provider of dependent security remains entitled to reclaim the payment from the creditor (so expressly e.g. BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2031 para. 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2308 para. 2) in fine, action en répétition de l´indû; DUTCH CC art. 7:867; ITALIAN CC art. 1952 para. 3; PORTUGUESE CC art. 645 para. 2; SPANISH CC art. 1842 in fine).

IV. General duty of information

13. Besides the specific rules holding the security provider responsible for not notifying the debtor in the above circumstances there seem to be no general statutory provisions creating a wider duty of information for the security provider. In GERMANY, however, a more general duty of information may be derived from the relationship between debtor and security provider (cf. Soergel/Mühl § 774 no. 8 and the general remarks in BGH 19 September 1985, BGHZ 95, 375, 388).

V. Duty of the provider of dependent security to invoke defences

14. The provider of dependent security may be obliged not only to inform the debtor but also to raise all defences of the debtor. According to GREEK CC art. 859 the provider of dependent security who has paid the creditor is deprived of the right to be reimbursed if the provider had omitted to invoke well-founded defences of the debtor of which the provider knew or ought to have known. In order for a defence to be qualified as well-founded, on the one hand it must be of decisive importance in regard to the validity of the debt, and on the other hand it must be a defence which the provider of dependent security is entitled to invoke as against the creditor, i.e. the defence may not be invokable only by the debtor (GREECE: Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 859 no. 3). Furthermore, the defence must relate to the secured debt, so that the provider of dependent security is not liable for failing to raise the provider's own personal defences as against the creditor (GREECE: ErmAK/Zepos art. 859 no. 6). Hence, in proceedings of the provider of dependent security against the debtor, the latter must assert and prove that the security provider was or should have been aware of the debtor's defences (GREECE: ErmAK/Zepos art. 859 no. 5), whereas the provider of dependent security can show that the lack of knowledge was justifiable (GREECE: Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 859 no. 6). The same rules operate under ITALIAN law on the basis of a general duty of the security provider to act with diligence (Fragali, Della fideiussione 380 ss.).

15. Also in GERMANY the provider of dependent security who refrains from invoking a defence against the creditor's demand and pays the creditor loses the right to recourse against the debtor in so far as the defence could have been opposed to the creditor's demand, since the provider of dependent security can not assume, in the context of the underlying mandate relationship, the costs for the payment as necessary in the meaning of CC § 670 (Motive, in: Mugdan II 377s.; MünchKomm/Habersack § 774 no. 19; unclear Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 110 and § 768 no. 41 who seems to want to grant a claim for damages as well). This is especially true in cases of obvious abuse of rights (Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 107). The defences must be available and provable (Palandt/Sprau no. 5 preceding § 765; Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 107; Schimansky/Bunte/Lwowski/Schmitz § 91 no. 95; cf. also BGH 19 September 1985, BGHZ 95, 375, 388 s.) and the provider of dependent security must or ought to know them (Staudinger/Horn § 774 no. 34). If the provider of dependent security performed although the secured obligation did not exist, the security provider is entitled to demand repayment from the creditor on the basis of unjustified enrichment (MünchKomm/Habersack § 774 no. 6; Staudinger/Horn § 768 no. 40 with further references).

VI. Waiver of rights

16. An agreement between the provider of dependent security and the debtor that the former will retain nevertheless and in any case the right of recourse, even on paying the creditor upon simple demand, without verifying the validity of the debt, is void in so far as the provider of dependent security did not invoke these defences on purpose or due to gross negligence (GREECE: cf. CC art. 332 para. 1; Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 859 no. 1). On the other hand, if the debtor waives the right to damages, this waiver is valid if the provider of dependent security upon instruction by the debtor has also waived as against the creditor the right to invoke defences, especially in cases of securities on first demand (GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 156).

17. In GERMANY the former standard terms of the banks provided that the bank as provider of dependent security should be entitled to pay the creditor "on the unilateral demand of the creditor". The bank was thus liberated from the duty to ask for information and to invoke defences. This term has been considered as valid with the restriction that the principles that have been developed for first demand securities (see national notes to IV.G.–3:104) are to be applied so that the bank remains obliged to invoke defences in cases of obvious abuse of rights (BGH 17 January 1989, NJW 1989, 1480, 1481; for further details cf. Graf Lambsdorff and Skora no. 240 and Schimansky/Bunte/Lwowski/Schmitz § 91 no. 95). The term has now been deleted.

IV.G.–2:113: Security provider's rights after performance

(1) The security provider has a right to reimbursement from the debtor if and in so far as the security provider has performed the security obligation. In addition the security provider is subrogated to the extent indicated in the preceding sentence to the creditor's rights against the debtor. The right to reimbursement and rights acquired by subrogation are concurrent.

(2) In case of part performance, the creditor's remaining partial rights against the debtor have priority over the rights to which the security provider has been subrogated.

(3) By virtue of the subrogation under paragraph (1), dependent and independent personal and proprietary security rights are transferred by operation of law to the security provider notwithstanding any contractual restriction or exclusion of transferability agreed by the debtor. Rights against other security providers can be exercised only within the limits of IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse).

(4) Where the debtor due to incapacity is not liable to the creditor but the security provider is nonetheless bound by, and performs, the security obligation, the security provider's right to reimbursement from the debtor is limited to the extent of the debtor's enrichment by the transaction with the creditor. This rule applies also if a debtor legal entity has not come into existence.

COMMENTS

A. Survey

This Article deals with the rights of the security provider after having fully or partly performed the security obligation to the creditor. Paragraphs (1) to (3) regulate the "normal" consequences of such performance, whereas paragraph (4) deals with the special case of a performance in favour of a debtor who is incapable. It can be taken for granted that a security provider who "volunteers" payment knowing that performance of the security obligation is not due (for example, because of the expiry of a time limit on it or the non-fulfilment of a suspensive condition) is not regarded for this purpose as performing the security obligation but is rather in the position of someone making a gift. Such a security provider should not have rights under the present Article.

The Article regulates the ordinary case of a payment by a security provider to the creditor. The situation becomes more complicated if several security providers are involved, and possibly providers both of personal and of proprietary security. Before attempting to recover from the debtor who at this stage usually is insolvent, the security provider who has satisfied the creditor may wish to proceed against one or more of the other security providers since these may be in a better financial position than the debtor. The issues of such recourse against other security providers and, eventually, against the debtor are primarily regulated by IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse) and IV.G.–1:107 (Several security provider's: recourse against the debtor) since they may involve providers not only of personal, but also of proprietary security. The present Article is relevant; however, in that context in so far as it determines which rights against the debtor and against other security providers become available as the basis of this recourse.

B. Right to reimbursement and subrogation

Under paragraph (1) the security provider who has performed the security obligation has a right to reimbursement from the debtor in so far as the obligation has been performed. The security provider is also subrogated to all personal (and proprietary rights, cf. paragraph (3)), which the creditor had held against the debtor, especially contractual rights for payment of the secured obligation or other performance. On the special problems of security rights, cf. Comment F below.

Contrary to many legal systems, the last sentence of paragraph (1) allows a cumulation of the right to reimbursement and the rights acquired by subrogation. Cumulation is useful in order to enable the security provider to obtain full recovery.

C. Debtor's exceptions

The debtor may invoke as against the security provider two sets of defences. First, the debtor can invoke those which the debtor was entitled to invoke vis-à-vis the creditor. This follows from the fact that the security provider could have invoked such defences against the creditor and from the fact that the security provider's subrogation to the creditor's rights against the debtor means that the security provider takes over those rights such as they are. Secondly, the debtor may invoke defences deriving from the debtor's relationship with the security provider. For example, the security provider may have waived the right to reimbursement (cf. Comment D below).

However, the debtor will be precluded from raising a defence which the debtor has against the creditor if the debtor failed to communicate it to the security provider when requested for information about defences under IV.G.– 2:112 (Security provider's obligations before performance) paragraph (1) since this omission caused the damage.

D. Exclusion of rights

The security provider may, exceptionally, have assumed the security without the intention of claiming reimbursement from the debtor and may have accordingly waived the rights conferred by paragraph (1). This does not, however, necessarily also exclude recourse claims against other security providers under IV.G.–1:106 (Several security providers: internal recourse).

E. Part performance by security provider

A security provider who performs only in part is, of course, entitled only to a corresponding part of the rights mentioned in paragraph (1). In order to protect the creditor, the creditor's partial rights to which the security provider has not (yet) been subrogated, enjoy preference in case of the debtor's bankruptcy or upon execution by a third person, over those of the security provider (paragraph (2)). This is a general principle in order to protect the priority of an earlier holder of a right as against a holder who derives rights from the former.

F. Subrogation to security rights

If and in so far as the security provider has paid to the creditor, it is subrogated to the rights which the creditor holds against the debtor. Among these rights are the creditor's "dependent and independent personal and proprietary security rights", as paragraph (3) explicitly confirms. There is no reason why the creditor should retain these rights, which are either accessory or of such a nature that to allow the creditor to retain and exercise them would be to allow the creditor to be unjustifiably enriched. Interests of other persons are not endangered. There will rarely be such interests of third parties; if there are, e.g. security rights in those security rights, they will, of course, be respected and enjoy priority over the rights of the subrogated security provider.

Subrogation to the creditor's personal or proprietary security rights presupposes that these are transferable. The debtor and third person security provider may have attempted to exclude transferability by a term in their contract. Since the security provider had acted in the debtor's or third person's interest, it would be inequitable if the latter were allowed to invoke such a term. Therefore, paragraph (3) expressly declares such terms to be ineffective to prevent the subrogation.

G. Reimbursement from incapable debtor

According to IV.G.–2:103 (Debtor's defences available to the security provider) paragraph (3), a security provider cannot invoke the lack of capacity of the debtor or the non-existence of the debtor legal entity if the relevant facts were known to the security provider when the security became effective. So the security provider may be bound to pay the creditor even although the debtor (or apparent debtor) has a defence against the creditor. Paragraph (4) makes it clear that the security provider's right to reimbursement from the debtor is in these circumstances limited to the extent of the debtor's enrichment. The enrichment here is not the performance of the secured obligation, because the debtor was not liable for that performance and gained nothing by the fact that it was made, but the enrichment which the debtor may have received by a performance made by the creditor, e.g. the amount of a loan received.

It will be remembered that "debtor" in the case of a legal entity which is not only incapable but is even non-existent means "apparent debtor" (IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) paragraph (d). A legal entity may be inexistent if its creation was affected by a grave defect which according to the applicable law prevented it from coming into existence.

H. Consumer as security provider

This Article remains applicable to a dependent security assumed by a consumer; however, the provision becomes mandatory (cf. IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2)).

The application of this Article to any independent personal security is already assured by IV.G.–3:108 (Security provider's rights after performance). This provision requires that application to be subject to "appropriate adaptations". However, in the present context it is not necessary to search for such adaptations since a consumer purporting to assume an independent personal security is according to IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c) treated like a provider of a dependent personal security. Therefore, the Article fully applies in the same way as it applies to a consumer assuming a dependent personal security, cf. preceding Comment.

The application of this Article to a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes may be defended on policy grounds if and in so far as that process does not involve an unequivocal disadvantage for the consumer as compared to the situation under the otherwise applicable rules on solidary debtors. This has to be examined for each part of the Article.

The first sentence of paragraph (1) corresponds, in effect, to III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) paragraph (1) which gives a co-debtor who has performed more than the correct share a personal right of recourse. The correspondence is not absolute since in a true co-debtorship each of the co-debtors, in their internal relationship, bears some portion of liability. By contrast, in the context of a co-debtorship for security purposes, in the end the "secured" co-debtor is fully liable, while the security co-debtor is not liable at all. Therefore, if the creditor had received full payment from the "secured" co-debtor, the latter cannot claim any reimbursement from the security co-debtor. Conversely, if the security co-debtor had fully paid the creditor, that co-debtor may demand full reimbursement from the "secured" co-debtor.

An equivalent of the subrogation rules of the present Article is to be found in III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) paragraph (2), which provides for subrogatory recourse. This equivalence is subject to the comments made in the preceding paragraph about the difference between normal co-debtorship and co-debtorship for security purposes.

Paragraph (4) of the present Article has no equivalent in III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors). In the application of those general rules to the situation here addressed the question would be whether there was a co-debtor at all. In so far as paragraph (4) gives relief against an only apparent debtor it can only be of advantage to the consumer security provider.

In short, there is no policy reason for not applying the present Article to the consumer co-debtor for security purposes.

Mandatory rules. All the preceding rules are mandatory in favour of the consumer (IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2)). And in the context of a consumer security provider's co-debtorship for security purposes the term "debtor" as used in the Article refers to the debtor whose obligation is secured.

NOTES

I. Reimbursement and subrogation

1. In most countries, the security provider normally has two routes to recovery from the debtor: one based on a personal right to reimbursement derived from the relationship between security provider and debtor; the other based upon the security provider's subrogation to the rights of the creditor against the debtor (AUSTRIAN CC §§ 896 and 1358; BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC arts. 2028 and 2029 (since 2006: FRENCH CC arts. 2305 and 2306); DUTCH CC art. 7:850 para. 3 read with art. 6:12 and art. 7:866 (read with art. 6:10); Blomkwist no. 34 at p.57; GERMAN CC § 774 para. 1 sentence 1 and general rules on mandate or on similar relationships, CC §§ 670, 675, 683, 684; cf. Palandt/Sprau § 774 nos. 1-4; GREEK CC art. 858; ITALIAN CC arts. 1949 and 1950; PORTUGUESE CC art. 644 and general rules on mandate or similar relationships, arts. 468, 473, 1167; cf. Almeida Costa 780; SPANISH CC arts. 1838 and 1839; TS 13 February 1988, RAJ 1988/1985, 15 December 1997, RAJ 1997/8817, though coming to no special conclusion on this point; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millett nos. 10-003, 11-017; SCOTLAND: Stair/Clark nos. 929, 935 s.).

(a) Reimbursement

Legal bases

2. Many countries specifically grant the security provider who has paid off the secured debt a claim for reimbursement against the debtor (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2028 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2305); DUTCH CC art. 7:866; ITALIAN CC art. 1950; SPANISH CC art. 1838). Although no-one will deny that the ground for this recourse has to be found in the relationship between the security provider and the debtor (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 450; FRANCE: Simler no. 558; ITALY: Fragali, Fideiussione 370), it is very controversial on which legal ground this recourse can be based. Both the arguments that the recourse can be based upon a mandate which the security provider has been granted or upon the fact that the security provider acted as a benevolent intervener have been criticized as unconvincing (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 450 and cited references; FRANCE: Simler nos. 13 and 558; ITALY: Fragali, Fideiussione 374), for in FRANCE the security provider assumes the obligation towards the creditor without having any intention of representing the debtor and the relationship between the security provider and the debtor is based upon a credit agreement (Simler nos. 13 and 558). Admittedly, this is a purely academic question as the instrument of dependent personal security itself gives rise to the recourse: the one who pays another's debt must be enabled to recover the money paid (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 451; FRANCE: cf. Cass.civ. 2 June 1992, JCP G 1992, I no. 3632 (6), note Billiau; ITALY: Bozzi, La fideiussione 260 s.; NETHERLANDS: Korthals Altes 94).

3. Neither the GERMAN, the GREEK nor the PORTUGUESE Civil Codes contain specific rules on reimbursement but only one on subrogation; however, GREEK CC art. 858 mentions the existence of the security provider's claim to be reimbursed as a necessary condition for the right of subrogation. Nevertheless, in these countries the security provider mostly has a claim for reimbursement against the debtor arising from the legal relationship between them that is the legal basis for the security provider's assumption of the security, such as a mandate or – especially in case of nullity of the contract of mandate – benevolent intervention (GERMANY: Erman/Herrmann § 774 no. 12; PORTUGAL: cf. Almeida Costa 780). In GERMANY, in all these cases CC § 670 is applicable. This rule grants a claim for reimbursement to the mandatary if for the purpose of the execution of the mandate the mandatary incurs any expense regarded as necessary under the circumstances. In PORTUGAL, a distinction is made between a mandatary or benevolent intervener with or without representation, the practical result being here the same for they are all entitled to reimbursement of the indispensable expenses and to indemnity for their loss (CC arts. 1167 litt. c), d), 1182 in fine, 468 and 471). Under special circumstances the security provider may even be entitled only to a claim for unjustified enrichment according to GERMAN CC § 684 and PORTUGUESE CC art. 473 ff (GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn § 765 no. 104; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 780). In GREECE as well, the security provider's claim for reimbursement depends on the internal relationship between the former and the debtor, i.e. whether the security provider acted as mandatary (GREEK CC art. 722) or as benevolent intervener (cf. GREEK CC art. 736 read with art. 722 or art. 737 read with art. 904; A.P. (Plenum) 10/1992, NoB 41, 70 ss.; Georgiades § 3 no. 153).

4. But there is no claim for reimbursement if the security provider assumed the security as a donation or as another form of liberality (GERMANY: cf. Palandt/Sprau § 774 no. 2; Staudinger/Horn § 765 nos. 103 s.).

5. Similarly in ENGLISH law the security provider has a right to be indemnified by the debtor once the security provider has paid the creditor or otherwise discharged the debt. This right may be based on either of three footings: (i) express agreement; (ii) implied agreement; or (iii) restitution in quasi-contract (Andrews and Millett nos. 10-002 s.). In case of an express agreement between security provider and debtor, the extent and nature of the indemnity are determined according to the agreement (Re Richmond Gate Property Co. [1965] 1 WLR 335; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-01), and there will be no implied or restitutionary right to be indemnified (Toussaint v. Martinnant (1787) 2 T. R. 100, 100 ER 55). An implied agreement as to indemnification is likely to be accepted if the security provider has assumed the security at the express or implied request of the principal debtor (Re Debtor (No. 627)[1937] Ch 156). The nature and extent of the debtor's implied promise to indemnify the security provider has to be construed in accordance with the intention of the parties and be ascertained by the court in each particular case (Andrews and Millett no. 10-007). It has been held to be effective even though neither the debtor nor the security provider are legally liable because the debtor's promise is presumed to be "pay if I do not", and not "pay if I do not and if I am legally compellable to pay" (Argo Caribbean Group Ltd. v. Lewis [1976] 2 Lloyd´s Rep 289; contrary in IRELAND: Morris, Re [1922] 1 IR 81); this presumption may be rebutted (Sleigh v. Sleigh (1850) 19 LJ Exch 345). Indemnification based on a restitutionary right in quasi-contract, on the other hand, is only awarded if the security provider was (i) legally bound to pay under the terms of the security (Re Cleadon Trust Ltd. [1939] 1 Ch 286); (ii) has not voluntarily exposed himself to make payment (Owen v. Tate [1976] QB 402); and (iii) has discharged a legal liability of the debtor (Garrard v. James [1925] Ch 616; Re Law Courts Chambers Co. Ltd. (1889) 61 LT 669; cf. further Andrews and Millett nos. 10-008 ss.). The first two conditions are regularly fulfilled if the security provider has acted on the request of the debtor (Batard v. Hawkes (1853) 2 E & B 287, 118 ER 775), although then there will be no need for a restitutionary claim since it is likely that an implied agreement will be established.

6. In SCOTTISH law the security provider's right to relief against the debtor, in the absence of an express agreement to that effect, is based on an implied mandate between debtor and security provider (Stair/Clark no. 935) and may be excluded or limited by agreement (Williamson v. Foulds 1927 SN 164 (CFI)). If the security provider has acted on the request of the creditor only and without the knowledge of the debtor, the security provider's right of recourse cannot be based upon a contract with the debtor, but may be based upon restitution or subrogation (Stair/Eden no. 834). The legal situation seems to be different in GERMANY. If the security provider assumed the security on the basis of a specific relationship to the creditor, especially if the creditor pays a commission to the security provider, the latter performs to the creditor in such circumstances that the rules on benevolent intervention are inapplicable (Staudinger/Horn § 765 nos. 104, 132). A claim for unjustified enrichment against the debtor might be excluded.

7. According to DANISH and SWEDISH literature and FINNISH law the security provider who has performed the security may claim reimbursement from the debtor (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 85 ss.; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 28; RP 189/1998 rd 67 (see also HD 27 November 1986, KKO 1986-II-154; HD 7 June 1994, KKO 1994:47; HD 10 February 1995, KKO 1995:9; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 198 ss.). The FINNISH LDepGuar § 29 sentence 2 also affords the security provider a recourse unless there were good reasons not to pay, even if the debtor was not liable (RP 189/1998 rd 67 s.).

(b) Items covered

Principal, interests and costs

8. In most countries the Civil Codes establish the right of recourse of the security provider against the debtor for principal, interest and costs. This is true for BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2028 paragraph 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2305 para. 2) and for GREECE, according to the principle arising from the nature of the security, that the security provider may not suffer any damage due to the fulfilment of the obligation assumed (Theodoropoulos 233). Interest arises automatically – without any notification to the principal debtor – from the moment of the security provider's performance (BELGIUM: T´Kint no. 782; France: Simler no. 578). Nevertheless, the security provider has only recourse for costs incurred after having informed the principal debtor of the proceedings (BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2028 paragraph 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2305 paragraph 2); GREECE: Theodoropoulos 234). In GREECE the question was raised whether the security provider's claim for interest, in case the sum paid to the creditor already included interest on the principal debt, violated CC art. 296 paragraph 1 regulating interest on interest (compound interest). The answer was negative, since for the security provider who has paid, this part of the debt is capital and not interest (CFI Athens 4621/1967, EED 18, 522).

9. In the NETHERLANDS as well, the security provider has a claim against the debtor for the entire amount the security provider paid to the creditor in principal, interests and costs (DUTCH CC art. 7:866 para. 1). The security provider, however, cannot derive a claim against the debtor for legal interest which accrues over a period in which the security provider has been in default by reason of personal circumstances or which it was not reasonable to incur (DUTCH CC art. 7:866 paragraph 2). According to ITALIAN CC art. 1950 paragraphs 2 and 3 the right of reimbursement comprises the principal, interest and expenses after the security provider has informed the debtor about the legal action taken against it. The security provider has also the right to the legal interest on the paid sum from the day of performance. If the principal debt bears interests above the legal interest, the security provider has also the right to these sums until reimbursement takes place (Bozzi, La fideiussione 261). According to SPANISH CC art. 1838 the indemnification consists of: (1) the total amount of the debt, (2) legal interest on the same from the time the debtor has been notified of the payment, even when it did not produce interest for the creditor, (3) expenses incurred by the security provider after notifying the debtor that payment has been demanded and (4) damages, when appropriate. All this, even when the security has been provided without the knowledge of the debtor.

10. In GERMANY the security provider's claim for reimbursement according to CC § 670 covers all outlays which the security provider may regard as necessary under the circumstances, especially the secured performances that the creditor is entitled to demand from the debtor and that the security provider has paid to the creditor (Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 381), i.e. regularly the principal debt and the contractual interest thereon. Furthermore, the security provider may demand reimbursement of the costs of proceedings with the creditor, the costs of legal defence, interest on outlays, consequential damage and legal interest on the paid sum (cf. Staudinger/Horn § 774 no. 4 and MünchKomm/Habersack § 774 nos. 18 s. with further references). In PORTUGAL, according to CC art. 468 or art. 1167 litt. c) and d), the reimbursement covers, with legal interest, the expenses the security provider has considered as indispensable; the security provider may also receive an indemnification for loss.

11. In ENGLAND, the indemnity usually covers the sum the security provider has paid on the debt (Davies v. Humphreys (1840) 6 M & W 153, 151 ER 361; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-57) and thus comprises interest (Re Fox, Walker & Co, Ex p. Bishop (1880) 15 Ch. D 400) as well as costs for reasonable legal defences – even if fruitless – against the creditor's call, especially if approved by the debtor or unavoidable (Garrard v. Cottrell (1847) 10 QB 679, 116 ER 258; Pierce v. Williams (1854) 23 LJ Exch 322. As to the extent of the recourse, SCOTTISH law is almost identical with ENGLISH law (Stair/Clark no. 935).

(c) Damages

12. In most countries also damages, if any, can be recovered by the security provider on the ground of the right of recourse. This is expressly stated by BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2028 para. 3 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2305 para. 3) and by SPANISH CC art. 1838 no. 4. The same result is reached by PORTUGUESE law through the application of the rules on benevolent intervention or mandate (respectively, CC art. 468 para. 1 and art. 1167 lit. d)), by ENGLISH case law (Badeley v. Consolidated Bank (1886) 34 Ch. D 536) and by legal doctrine in ITALY, also along the line of old CC of 1865 art. 1915 para. 3 (Giusti 236 s.).

(d) Subrogation

Legal bases

13. According to AUSTRIAN CC § 1358, BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2029 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2306), GERMAN CC § 774 para. 1 sentence 1, ITALIAN CC art. 1949, PORTUGUESE CC art. 644 and SPANISH CC art. 1839 a security provider who pays the debt is subrogated to all the rights which the creditor had against the debtor. These provisions are an application of the general rules on subrogation in BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1251 no. 3, GERMAN CC § 412, ITALIAN CC art. 1203 no. 3, PORTUGUESE CC art. 589 ff and SPANISH CC art. 1210 no. 3. In AUSTRIA, CC § 1358 embodies itself the general rule on subrogation (Rummel/Gamerith § 1358 no. 5); it is generally understood, beyond its wording, as providing a statutory, automatic subrogation of the security provider into the creditor's rights against the debtor (Rummel/Gamerith § 1358 no. 1). By contrast, according to GREEK CC art. 858 the subrogation claim depends upon the existence of the claim for reimbursement.

14. In the NETHERLANDS, the subrogative recourse of the security provider is not explicitly provided for, but can be derived from CC art. 7:850 para. 3 that refers to the general rules on solidary liability; there, CC art. 6:12 para. 1 provides for subrogation against the co-debtor(s) (Blomkwist no. 34 at p. 57; du Perron and Haentjens, art. 7:850 no. 9). In DENMARK and SWEDEN the security provider is subrogated to the rights, which the creditor had against the debtor (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 86; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 198 s.). Pursuant to the FINNISH LDepGuar § 30 para. 1 the security provider has the same rights as the creditor against the debtor (RP 189/1998 rd 68). Equally under ENGLISH law the security provider is entitled to stand in the shoes of the creditor by being subrogated in all the creditor's rights against the debtor. The right is equitable – not contractual – in nature and arises out of the relationship of security provider and creditor itself (Duncan Fox & Co. v. North & South Wales Bank (1880-81) 6 App. Cas. 1; see also Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856, s. 5; Andrews and Millett no. 11-017; Lord Goff of Chieveley and Jones no. 3-023; for the details of the dogmatic construction of the right to subrogation cf.

Dieckmann 200 ss.). The situation is similar in IRELAND: also here the doctrine of subrogation applies in order to prevent the debtor being unjustly enriched (Highland Finance Ireland Ltd. v. Sacred Heart College of Agriculture Ltd. [1992] 1 IR 472; White 543 s.). In SCOTTISH law the security provider has the so-called beneficium cedendarum actionum which gives a right, on full payment of the security obligation, to be put in the creditor's place vis-à-vis the debtor (Ewart v. Latta (1863) 1 M 905; Gloag and Irvine 803) and thus to demand from the creditor transfer of the secured claim and any security held for it (Lowe & Burns v. Greig (1825) 3 S 375; Sligo v. Menzies (1840) 2 D 1478; Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985 s. 60 para. 3 read with para. 4). In certain situations it can be desirable to demand a formal transfer from the creditor, e.g. in order to safeguard the priority of a claim (Graham v. Gordon (1842) 4 D 903; Stair/Clark no. 929).

(e) Items covered

15. According to GERMAN CC § 774 para. 1 sentence 1 the security provider is subrogated to the creditor's claim against the debtor in so far as the security provider paid off the creditor. The subrogation covers the secured claim and accessory claims that have been secured (cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:102), as e.g. contractual interest that became due before the security provider's payment. Pursuant to court practice the security provider shall even be subrogated to the claim for contractual interest in so far as the interest becomes due after the security provider's payment (BGH 18 May 1961, BGHZ 35, 172, 174; Staudinger/Horn § 774 no. 15; critical: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht nos. 351 s.).

16. Via a subrogative recourse, the security provider can claim the sums mentioned in BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2016 para. 1 – since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2293 para. 1 – (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 480; FRANCE: Simler no. 593 ss.). According to PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law via subrogation the security provider can also claim the interest and accessories of the credit (PORTUGAL: Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 660; Almeida Costa 780; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo 441). The security provider cannot claim more than what was effectively paid to the creditor (FRANCE: cf. Simler no. 593; NETHERLANDS: Blomkwist no. 34 at p. 57; PORTUGUESE CC art. 644; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 276). DUTCH CC art. 7:866 para. 2 limits the security provider's recourse with respect to legal interest for a period in which the security provider had been for personal reasons in delay in performance and for expenses incurred in a personal interest. In ITALY the security provider is subrogated to the rights which the creditor had even after the creation of the security and the scope of the subrogation is the same as indicated by CC art. 1950 para. 2 and 3 for the security provider's recourse claim (cf. no. 9 above), except for the costs sustained by the security provider after he has informed the debtor of the legal actions taken against him (Giusti 230).

(f) Relation between the two claims

Independent claims

17. All countries recognise the independence of the security provider's claim for reimbursement against the debtor, on the one hand, and of the creditor's rights against the debtor, into which the security provider has been subrogated, on the other hand. Consequently, each of these claims and rights is subject to its proper regime, e.g. with respect to prescription (AUSTRIA: OGH 26 March 1987, SZ 60 no. 55 at p. 285 ss.; Rummel/Gamerith § 896 nos. 1a, 5, 11; BELGIUM: T´Kint no. 781 ss.; FRANCE: Simler nos. 555 ss.; GERMANY: MünchKomm/Habersack § 774 no. 15; Graf Lambsdorff and Skora nos. 296 ss.; GREECE: G*eorgiades* § 3 no. 165). In ITALY the distinction between the two actions is still controversial (Andreani 710), and also in SPAIN, due to procedural barriers (Carrasco 258). Some authors are for an identification of the two actions, because the claim for reimbursement is seen as the technical way of exercising the subrogation (so Fragali, Fideiussione 375). The prevailing view, however, points out the autonomy of the two figures also because they have different legal base: respectively CC arts. 1949 and 1950 (Bozzi, La fideiussione 261).

(g) Cumulation of the claims

18. In most countries the security provider may, but need not cumulate the two claims: the security provider may rely upon one or the other or upon both claims (AUSTRIA: OGH 27 November 1928, SZ 10 no. 332 at p. 803; Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1358 no. 23; ENGLAND: for the independence of the right to subrogation from the security provider's right to reimbursement Dieckmann 484 s.; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn § 774 no. 5; GREECE: CFI Thessaloniki 1699/1967, ND 24, 369; Theodoropoulos 236; ITALY: G*iusti* 231 ss.; NETHERLANDS: Pitlo/Croes no. 866 at p. 374; PORTUGAL: Almeida Costa 780; SCOTLAND: Smithy´s Place Ltd. v. Blackadder & McMonagle 1991 SLT 790; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo 441 with extensive references).

19. On the other hand, in BELGIUM and in FRANCE it is the traditional view that the security provider has to choose between both types of recourse; but several authors plead in favour of allowing the cumulation of both claims (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 484-489 with further references; FRANCE: Simler no. 556; Cass.com. 30 November 1948, GazPal 1949, 1).

II. Debtor's exceptions

20. According to DUTCH CC art. 7:868, a debtor from whom reimbursement is demanded pursuant to CC art. 6:10 may invoke against the security provider the defences which the debtor had against the creditor at the time the claim for recovery has arisen, unless a different result follows from the relationship between the debtor and the security provider (art. 868 read with art. 6:11 para. 4). The same is true under BELGIAN and FRENCH law where the security provider exercises the subrogative recourse, i.e. the creditor's recourse against the debtor (BELGIUM: T´Kint nos. 783 ss.; FRANCE: Cass.civ. 18 October 2005, D. 2005, 2870 for a plurality of security providers; Simler no. 591). The debtor cannot invoke defences that arose after the security provider's claim for reimbursement (Blomkwist no. 38). In case of a subrogative recourse, the debtor may invoke all defences which the debtor has against the creditor without any limitations against the security provider (Blomkwist no. 38 at p. 62-63; du Perron and Haentjens art. 868 no. 4). Further the debtor is no more liable according to FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2031 para. 2 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2308 para. 2), if the security provider pays without informing the debtor. Under ITALIAN law, if the debtor had the possibility of exemption from liability by raising an exception to the creditor relating to the secured claim, the security provider's reimbursement is given only if (a) the security provider informed the debtor of the intention to pay and (b) raised the exceptions to the creditor which the security provider knew of or had reason to know of if acting with due diligence (Giusti 237; CC art. 1952 para. 2). The same is true in SPAIN, according to CC art. 1840.

21. In GERMANY and in PORTUGAL the debtor may invoke against the security provider's claim for reimbursement only those defences that are based on the internal relationship between these two parties (GERMANY: Palandt/Sprau § 774 no. 4; MünchKomm/Habersack § 774 no. 15). Against the subrogative claim, however, the debtor may invoke both defences (PORTUGAL: Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 663) arising from the internal relationship with the security provider (GERMAN CC § 774 para. 1 sentence 3) as well as those arising from the relationship between debtor and creditor (GERMAN CC §§ 412, 404; cf. Palandt/Sprau § 774 no. 4; MünchKomm/Habersack § 774 no. 15).

22. In ENGLAND the security provider's right to be indemnified by the debtor is restricted as described above (no. 5): If no express or implied agreement on the right to indemnity can be established, the security provider can rely only on a restitutionary right based on quasi-contract, which is subject to an existing obligation to pay. Since the right to be indemnified is an independent claim of the security provider, it is subject to any right of set-off which the debtor can raise against the security provider (Thornton v. Maynard (1874-75) LR 10 C.P. 695). In relation to claims based upon subrogation, however, it seems that the debtor cannot rely on a set-off vis-à-vis the security provider (cf. Andrews and Millett no. 11-017 citing Commonwealth decisions).

23. According to GREEK CC art. 463 para. 1, as applied by analogy (cf. Georgiades-Stathopoulos/Vrellis art. 858 no. 8), the debtor may raise as against the security provider acting as assignee under the subrogation – in contrast to the case where defences are raised against the security provider's claim for reimbursement – all the defences, which the debtor had as against the creditor arising from the secured obligation which had arisen before the subrogation took place (i.e. satisfaction of the security provider).

III. Exclusion of claims

24. DUTCH, GERMAN, GREEK and ITALIAN law grant the security provider the subrogative claim, unless it is completely or partially excluded by the underlying relationship between security provider and debtor (NETHERLANDS: CC art. 7:868 read with art. 6:11 para. 4; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn § 774 nos. 6, 15 and 40; cf. for contractual interest BGH 18 May 1961, BGHZ 35, 172, 174; GREECE: cf. wording of CC art. 858; ITALY: Bozzi, La fideiussione 260). Consequently, the security provider cannot rely upon the subrogative claim if excluded from recourse according to the internal relationship, e.g. in case the security provider did not intend to be reimbursed (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 491; FRANCE: Simler nos. 551 and 582; GREECE: Georgiades-Stathopoulos/Vrellis art. 859 no. 8).

25. Moreover, the security provider does not have any recourse if the debtor did not gain any profit from the security provider's payment. This happens for instance in case the security provider paid more than the debtor had to pay to the creditor, with reference to the differential amount (SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 272). Furthermore, reimbursement is excluded if the security provider violates the duty of information or of exercising the debtor's defences (cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:112).

26. Reimbursement on the basis of an agreement of indemnity under ENGLISH law is subject to the security provider being requested to assume the security by the debtor. If no agreement (implied or express) to that effect can be established, a right to reimbursement can exist only as a restitutionary claim and it is not clear on the authorities whether or not a restitutionary claim would lie, a possible argument against this being that the surety provider officiously stepped forward. See Chitty, para. 44-109.

IV. Part performance by security provider

27. One has to distinguish again between the claim for reimbursement and subrogation to the creditor's rights.

(a) Claim for reimbursement

A security provider who performs only in part is under BELGIAN, ENGLISH, FRENCH, LUXEMBOURGIAN, ITALIAN and SPANISH law entitled to partial recourse only against the debtor (ENGLAND: Davies v. Humphreys (1840) 6 M & W 153, 151 ER 361; Soutten v. Soutten (1822) 5 B & Ald 852, 106 ER 1403; FRANCE: Simler no. 568; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 164; ITALY: Giusti 236 fn. 197; SPAIN: Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 268, 276 and 278).

29. If the security provider bases the recourse claim on BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2028 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2305), a clash between the security provider's claim for reimbursement and the creditor's claim for payment of the residual debt is possible. The creditor does not have any priority over the security provider (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 460; CA Gent 10 February 1883, Pas belge 1883 II 224; CA Luik 13 February 1950, Pas belge 1950 II 100; FRANCE: cf. Insolvency Act of 25 January 1985 art. 60 para. 2 integrated into Ccom art. L 622-33 para. 2; Cass.civ. 25 November 1891, DP 1892, I, 261; except the parties agree otherwise Simler no. 568). The opposite is true in case of a subrogative recourse based on BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 2029 (since 2006: FRENCH CC art. 2306); cf. no. 30 below.

(b) Subrogated claims

30. In BELGIUM, FRANCE, DENMARK, GERMANY, ITALY, SPAIN and PORTUGAL, even a partial satisfaction of the creditor leads to a corresponding partial subrogation. The creditor, benefiting from the maxim "nemo censetur subrogasse contra se", enjoys priority for the remaining claim over the (partial) claims of the security provider to which the latter is subrogated (BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 479 p. 248; CA Antwerpen 26 October 1987, Pas belge 1988, II 46; FRANCE: but according to the predominant court practice only if the security provider wants to exercise a priority or a security, which belongs to the creditor: Cass.civ. 28 June 1977, JCP G 1979 II no. 19045, note Guillot; Simler no. 592; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 88, 92; GERMAN CC § 774 para. 1 sentence 2; ITALY: Giusti 226; PORTUGUESE CC art. 593; SPAIN CC art. 1213 and Insolvency Law art. 87.7).

31. In ENGLAND the general rule being that subrogation is only available if the creditor is paid in full, a partial discharge of the secured obligation by the security provider does not normally entitle the security provider to be subrogated to the creditor's rights. Thus it is accepted that where there is a security for the whole debt with a limitation on the amount of the security provider's liability, a payment of the security provider which only partly satisfies the creditor does not entitle the security provider to a transfer of a proportionate interest in the creditor's securities (Re Sass Ex p. National Provincial Bank of England Ltd. [1896] 2 QB 12; Andrews and Millett no. 11-020; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-273). Where, however, the security provider is a surety for part of the secured debt only, the security provider is subrogated pro rata to any rights held by the creditor in respect of that debt after performance of the security (Hobson v. Bass (1870-71) LR 6 Ch. App. 792; Andrews and Millett no. 11-020; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-273). There is ENGLISH authority that subrogation only arises if the creditor has been fully satisfied by the security provider (Re Howe Ex p. Brett (1870-71) LR 6 Ch. App. 838; Ewart v. Latta (1865) 3 M (HL) 36); modern AUSTRALIAN decisions, however, point to the contrary view and argue that the security provider should be pro tanto subrogated to the creditor's rights once the security provider has performed the security obligation, even though another part of the debt was paid by the principal debtor or another security provider (A. E. Goodwin Ltd v. A. G. Healing Ltd (1979) 7 ACLR 481; McColl´s Wholesale Pty Ltd v. State Bank (NSW) Ltd [1984] 3 NSWLR 365 (SCt); Raffle v. AGC (Advances) Ltd [1989] ASC 58, 528, all cited by Andrews and Millett no. 11-018; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-272). It is submitted that this view should be followed in ENGLAND too, and the contrary decisions not be followed (Andrews and Millett no. 11-018). Furthermore, there is ancient ENGLISH authority to the same effect (Gedye v. Matson (1858) 25 Beav 310, 53 ER 655), which has not been cited in the later ENGLISH decisions. In SCOTLAND the security provider's right to an assignation of the creditor's rights arises only if the security obligation has been fully performed (Ewart v. Latta (1863) 1 M 905; Stair/Clark no. 933).

32. According to GREEK literature, the claims of the creditor and of the security provider as against the debtor are concurrent and are to be proportionately satisfied (cf. GREEK CCP art. 977 para. 3; cf. also the critical approach of Georgiades § 3 no. 164).

V. Subrogation to security rights

33. GERMAN CC § 774 para. 1 sentence 1 read with §§ 412, 401 provides that the security provider is not only subrogated to the secured claim but also into the related dependent rights, especially security rights (Staudinger/Horn § 774 no. 19). The independent collateral rights are not transferred ex lege but the security provider is regularly entitled to demand their transfer (Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 358; Staudinger/Horn § 774 no. 21 with further references to court practice). Similarly in PORTUGAL, where the security provider acquires the securities and other dependent rights (CC arts. 593 para. 2, 594 read with art. 582). According to GREEK CC art. 458 applied by analogy, accessory proprietary rights are also transferred to the security provider which secure the claim, created either before or after the issue of the security, either by the debtor or a third party (Georgiades-Stathopoulos AK/Vrellis art. 858 no. 12). The security provider is also subrogated to any judicial acts commenced by the creditor (ErmAK/Zepos art. 858 no. 9) as well as to the rights of the creditor against a third party in whose hands the creditor attached a claim belonging to the principal debtor (Kosadinos 762-763). The same is true under BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1250 no. 1 since this subrogation covers all "rights, claims, priorities or mortgages [of the creditor] against the debtor". Subrogation in security rights is also the rule in SPANISH law (Carrasco 261).

34. Also under ITALIAN law the subrogation of the security provider affects all kinds of security rights for the secured claim (CC art. 1955 and, more generally, art. 1204; Bozzi, La fideiussione 259).

35. Under ENGLISH law the security provider is subrogated to all the security rights held by the creditor in respect of the secured claim (Duncan Fox & Co. v. North & South Wales Bank (1880-81) 6 App. Cas. 1; Chatterton v. Maclean [1951] 1 All ER 761), whether or not already existing at the time of assumption of the security (Forbes v. Jackson (1881-82) 19 Ch. D 615; Pledge v. Buss (1860) Johns 663, 70 ER 585), and whether granted by the debtor or third persons (Goddard v. Whyte (1860) 2 Giff 449, 66 ER 188; Dering v. Winchelsea (Earl of) (1787) 1 Cox 318, 29 ER 1184). There are only a few rights a security provider cannot be subrogated to: private insurance policies (Dalby v. India and London Life Assurance Co. (1854) 15 CB 365, 139 ER 465), purely personal rights of the creditor (such as the right to seize goods under a hire-purchase agreement, cf. Chatterton v. Maclean [1951] 1 All ER 761), and rights wrongfully obtained by the creditor (Andrews and Millett no. 11-023). It is doubtful whether the security provider can be subrogated to floating charges (cf. the discussion in Andrews and Millett no. 11-022 and O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 12-319 s.). Under SCOTTISH law the security provider is entitled to demand transfer of all security rights held by the creditor over the principal debtor's estate and in relation to co-providers of security against whom there is a right of relief (Thow´s Trustee v. Young 1910 SC 588; Scott v. Young (1909) 1 SLT 47; Stair/Clark no. 930).

VI. Reimbursement from an incapable debtor

36. According to ITALIAN CC art. 1950 para. 4 a recourse against the incapable debtor is admitted only if and in so far the debtor has benefited from the security provider's payment. A similar view is held in FRANCE (Simler no. 224). According to GREEK literature, the security provider may have a claim for reimbursement but may not be subrogated to the claim of the creditor, because this claim is against a minor and is, hence, void. Furthermore, since the security remains valid, the security provider may not reclaim anything conferred by the performance according to the principles of unjustified enrichment (ErmAK/Zepos art. 850 nos. 11-12). It is unclear whether under ENGLISH law the security provider has a right to be indemnified from a minor debtor; this question is not dealt with in the Minors Contracts Act 1987; the Law Commission suggested that there should be a right to be indemnified if the minor could have been sued by the creditor under the common law rules (Law Commission Report on Minors´ Contracts, Law Commission 134). In other cases where the security provider could not rely on having assumed the liability at the request of the debtor, e.g. for lack of authority of the person acting for the company debtor, the security provider was held to have neither a contractual claim for reimbursement nor a restitutionary claim against the debtor (Re Cleadon Trust Ltd. [1939] Ch 286; Andrews and Millett no. 10-009).

CHAPTER 3: INDEPENDENT PERSONAL SECURITY

IV.G.–3:101: Scope

(1) The independence of a security is not prejudiced by a mere general reference to an underlying obligation (including a personal security).

(2) The provisions of this Chapter also apply to standby letters of credit.

COMMENTS

A. General

Due to the independence of the independent personal security from any underlying obligation, the rules applying to them are much simpler and can be less numerous than the corresponding rules on the dependent personal security. The latter have to spell out the extent and limits of dependence upon the secured obligation and the technical devices by which that dependency is realized. That, obviously, is not necessary for independent personal security since this stands largely on its own feet.

B. Definition

The independence from any other agreement, especially an underlying contract between the creditor and the debtor, is laid down and specified in IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) sub-paragraph (b). In particular it is irrelevant for the security provider's obligation whether the underlying obligation (such as a seller's obligation to deliver or a buyer's obligation to pay the price under a contract of sale or for services) is based on a valid contract or not, which terms it contains and the extent of the debtor's obligations. The same independence exists with respect to any contract by which the debtor instructs the security provider to assume the independent personal security. The UN Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995 defines the "Independence of undertaking" in a similarly broad manner (art. 3).

On the other hand, the validity of the contract or other juridical act from which the security provider's undertaking itself arises is crucial for the security provider's obligation. Thus the security provider must have full capacity and the undertaking must have been created without any defects of consent which might give rise to a right of avoidance.

The independent character of an independent security must be expressly or impliedly agreed. This rule dovetails with IV.G.–2:101 (Presumption for dependent personal security) paragraph (1) which establishes a presumption for any security being a dependent security, unless the creditor shows that it was agreed otherwise. For letters of credit and stand-by letters of credit, UCP 500 (1993) art. 3 and 4 explicitly and broadly emphasize the independence of the "credit" from underlying contracts or the objects of those contracts, such as goods, services and other performances. More succinctly in the same sense is UN Convention on Independent Guaranties article 3.

C. General reference to underlying obligation innocuous

Paragraph (1) serves to specify the independent character of a security. Usually, an independent security refers to an underlying contract (e.g., of sale or services) or another security (e.g., a "confirming" security to the security given by the bank opening a letter of credit; or a "counter security" to the security issued by the security provider on the instruction of the issuer of the counter security) in order to specify the event upon the occurrence (or non-occurrence) of which performance of the security may be demanded by the creditor. Any such general reference to an underlying obligation does not affect the independent character of a security. The decisive point is that the security provider's obligation to perform is independent of the obligation of the principal as debtor of the underlying contract with the creditor.

D. Stand-by letters of credit

According to paragraph (2), Chapter 3 applies to stand-by letters of credit. This clarification appears to be useful since the name of this instrument does not reveal its legal character as security. However, the "stand-by" letter of credit at least hints to the security function which letters of credit may fulfil and which, originally for reasons of American internal banking law, this kind of letter of credit does fulfil. This is confirmed by the fact that stand-by letters of credit are also covered by the UN Convention on Independent Guaranties and "Stand-by Letters of Credit" of 1995. Functionally, the same is true for the "genuine" letter of credit, as used in international contract practice, since it secures claims for payment arising from various types of contract; the fact that in practice the security obligation represented by the letter of credit assumes the role of the primary obligation of a means of payment does not detract from its legal function as a mere security. The idea of independence of the security covers even cases where no preceding demand under the underlying contract has been made. Cf. also the preceding Comment.

E. Independent security of a consumer

According to IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c), a consumer's "agreement purporting to create an independent security is considered as creating a dependent security, provided the requirements of the latter are met." For details, cf. the Comments on that provision.

NOTES

I. Legal sources

1. While the dependent security is broadly regulated in all Civil Codes of the CONTINENTAL countries, there is almost no legislation on independent security. An "early" exception is AUSTRIAN CC § 880a sentence 2 (enacted in 1916) according to which a security provider is fully liable if the promised performance of a third person is not rendered by the latter. Much more explicit is the new FRENCH regulation of 2006, enacting CC art. 2321 which in four paragraphs deals with essential elements of the independent security.
2. In view of the dearth of legislation, case law and writings are of prime importance everywhere. This is even true for AUSTRIA and FRANCE: for the former country because of the abstract character of the legislative provision; and for FRANCE because of the very recent date of its legislation.

II. Qualification of instrument as "independent security"

(a) Generally

3. It is common opinion that the denomination of an agreement as "dependent security" or "independent security" is not conclusive. In all countries, any case of doubt has to be resolved by interpretation of the contract. However, in ENGLAND the designation "indemnity" or "independent guarantee", especially if frequently repeated or used in the heading, indicates the independent character of that security (cf. Goulston Discount Co. Ltd. v. Clark [1967] 2 QB 493 at 498, per Danckwerts LJ; Western Credit Ltd. v. Alberry [1964] 1 WLR 945 at 949, per Davies LJ; Heald v. O´Connor [1971] 1 WLR 497 at 502; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 1-94). The true construction of the contract as a whole, however, may lead to a different conclusion (Stadium Finance Co. Ltd. v. Helm (1965) 109 SJ 471). In this respect, it has been said that especially the following factors should be regarded as arguments against interpreting a contract of security as a dependent security: (i) the contract relates to an underlying transaction between parties in different jurisdictions; (ii) the security is issued by a bank; (iii) the security contains an undertaking to pay "on demand" (whether or not "on first demand" or "on written demand"); and (iv) the security does not contain terms excluding or limiting the defences available to the security provider (Gold Coast Ltd. v. Caja de Ahorros del Mediterraneo [2002] EWCA Civ 1806, [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 142; Hapgood 731). While the first three of these factors relate to the factual situations of international commerce in which the independent security is the preferred method of security, the rationale of no. (iv) appears to be as follows: in the case of an independent personal security, the security provider's possibility to take advantage of any defences against the creditor's claim are rather limited in comparison to the situation of a dependent personal security. It is therefore typically the latter situation where the creditor might see a practical need for the exclusion of defences of the security provider.

4. CONTINENTAL legal systems start from the general notion that the legal nature of a contract is to be determined by the parties´ intention and not by the terms the latter may, often mistakenly, have used (AUSTRIAN CC § 914; FRENCH and BELGIAN CC art. 1156; GERMAN CC §§ 133, 157; GREEK CC art. 173; ITALIAN CC art. 1362; PORTUGUESE CC arts. 236, 238; SPANISH CC art. 1281).

5. In BELGIUM (overview: Simont/Bruyneel; Wymeersch/Dambre/Troch no. 56, p. 1835-1837), some aspects of a contract for personal security may indicate the independence of that security: the internationality of the contract and the professional acting of the contractors (Vliegen nos. 175-193). The question whether a personal security is a unilateral obligation of the security provider or a bilateral agreement, is not yet solved. In the first case, only the intention of the security provider needs to be revealed, in the latter case, the intention of all parties involved. It cannot be denied, however, that the intentions of the creditor will always have to be taken into account, because the exact wording of the personal security will almost always be the result of negotiations between security provider and creditor (Vliegen no. 172; Simont 102-103).

6. Under GERMAN law the wording of the agreement is not decisive. Nevertheless, it is at least an important indication (CA Hamburg 18 December 1981, WM 1983, 188, 189; Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht no. 1124). The use of legal terms even by persons familiar with those terms merely creates a rebuttable presumption (BGH 5 March 1975, WM 1975, 348). Finally, the motivation and interest of the security provider to assume an independent security is relevant (Hadding, Häuser, Welter 702). A major indication for the security provider's intention to assume an independent personal security is the security provider's own economic interest in the transaction (BGH 22 February 1962, WM 1962, 577). If there remains any doubt, the contract is considered to be a dependent personal security in order to protect the security provider (RG 28 September 1917, RGZ 90, 415, 417; BGH 5 March 1975, WM 1975, 348, 349). Similarly in FRANCE, where, in case of doubt, the courts qualify an agreement – even if expressly declared to be independent – as a dependent personal security. Since even a dependent personal security must not be presumed (FRENCH CC art. 2015: since 2006, CC art. 2292), there is even less a presumption for an independent personal security (CA Paris 17 December 1992, JCP E 1993 I no. 243 (39)).

7. AUSTRIAN and PORTUGUESE courts and writers rely on the independent character of a personal security as the decisive criterion for assuming an independent personal security. Personal securities indicating that the security provider waives all objections rooted in the underlying contract are regarded as independent personal securities (AUSTRIA: OGH: 24 October 2000, JBl. 2001, 380; 24 June 1999, ÖBA 2000, 322, 323; 9 November 1993, SZ 66 no. 140 p. 327 and 4 May 1977, SZ 50 no. 66 p. 324; Schwimann/Apathy § 880a no. 5; Avancini/Iro/Koziol II no. 3/26-3/27; PORTUGAL: CA Lisboa 18 October 1988, CJ XIII, IV-129; CA Porto 13 November 1990, CJ XV, V-187; STJ 1 June 2000, 316/00 www.dgsi.pt; Galvão Telles 285; Ferrer Correia 252). In other cases, the interests of the parties are considered; an independent personal security is assumed if the creditor was to obtain a strong and secure position (AUSTRIA: OGH 14 July 1992, SZ 65 no. 109 p. 68-69, and 10 April 1991, ÖJZ 1991, 595 no. 134) and especially if the security provider is a bank (OGH 24 June 1999, above).

(b) Particular case of first demand securities

8. In BELGIUM, the "on first demand term" can be considered as a rebuttable presumption of independence (Romain 33-40; Simon/Bruyneel 523); some authors think that the term cannot validly be added to dependent personal securities (Van Ransbeek nos. 15-23; contra Wymeersch/Dambre/Troch 1836). Also in FRANCE a personal security on first demand (for payment) is regarded as an independent personal security (Simler no. 894). Similarly in DENMARK: "If a personal security is expressed as a personal security on first demand, it is deemed to be an independent personal security" (Pedersen, Bankgarantier 140). Also in AUSTRIA, a first-demand term is a strong indication for an independent guarantee, especially if it is supplemented by a waiver of all defences and exceptions (OGH 26 August 1999, ÖBA 2000, 328).

9. In ITALY, the NETHERLANDS and SPAIN the demand term does not per se define the nature of the contract as independent personal security, therefore the term needs to be interpreted with the rest of the contract in order to determine the real will of the parties (ITALY: Cass. 20 April 2004 no. 7502, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, 912; Cass. 25 February 2002 no. 2742, BBTC 2002 II 653; Cass. 23 June 2000 no. 8540, Foro pad. 2001 I 242; Cass. 21 April 1999 no. 3964, Arch. civ. 2000, 222; Cass. 14 July 1994 no. 6604, BBTC 1995 II 422 and 1 July 1995 no. 7345, Giur.it. 1996 I 1 620; Portale, Le garanzie bancarie 6; SPAIN: Carrasco, Las nuevas garantías 688; Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 145). Although ITALIAN case law often regarded the demand term as a very stark presumption of non-ancillarity of the contract, legal doctrine quite unanimously considers the term compatible both with dependent and independent security contracts (Bonelli, Le garanzie contrattuali 205-208). Sometimes ITALIAN case law requires express contractual terms barring the possibility for the security provider to invoke exceptions arising from the underlying relationship (Cass. 7 January 2004 no. 52, BBTC 2004 II 497 ss.). DUTCH writers attach great weight to a "first demand" term, especially if it is accompanied by terms indicating that the security provider's obligation of performance is independent from any underlying transaction or from any approval by the obligor of that transaction (Boll 82-84, Croiset van Uchelen 10, both with references to and quotations from case law). However, in one recent case, the Supreme Court denied that a bank guarantee on first demand gave a personal security an independent character (HR 25 September 1998, NJB 1998 no. 892 at p. 5153).

10. In ENGLISH as well as GERMAN law demand terms are mainly used in independent personal securities; they have, however, been held legally effective in dependent personal securities as well (ENGLAND: Bradford Old Bank v. Sutcliffe [1918] 2 KB 833; Andrews and Millett no. 1-011; GERMANY: BGH 2 May 1979, BGHZ 74, 244 for dependent and BGH 12 March 1984, BGHZ 90, 287 for independent personal securities) and are usually stipulated for in bank personal security forms (ENGLAND: Cresswell, Blair, Hill, Hooley, Phillips and Wood I E 2068). At least in relation to securities given by security providers other than banks, demand terms should not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the parties intended to create an independent security if this would be inconsistent with other provisions of the security (ENGLAND: Marubeni Hong Kong and South China v. Mongolia [2005] EWCA Civ 395, [2005] 1 WLR 2497).

11. According to SWEDISH doctrine personal securities on first demand are considered to be dependent personal securities (Dalman 182). According to the FINNISH government's proposition (RP 189/1998 rd 17), the LDepGuar may be used in many legal matters, e.g. for bank personal securities. However, personal securities on first demand are not covered by the Law (RP 189/1998 rd 29).

12. In GREECE it is accepted that the term "on first demand" may be irrelevant if there are other countervailing terms (Georgiades § 6 no. 43). In SPAIN there is no firmly established rule. In TS 28 May 2004, RAJ 2004/3553, the Supreme Court regarded as a dependent security a guarantee in which the security provider promised to pay on first demand and surrendered the right to oppose any exception the debtor could raise against the creditor.

III. Autonomous undertaking

13. See national notes on IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) sub III D.

IV. Reference to underlying obligation

14. A mere reference to an underlying obligation does not prejudice the independence of a personal security. Since the occurrence (or non-occurrence) of the event, which justifies the creditor's demand, is usually rooted in the relationship between creditor and debtor, a general reference to that relationship is almost unavoidable. In practice it is the rule; in GREECE (Georgakopoulos 256; Psychomanis 371; Gouskou 104) and FRANCE (CA Besançon 11 April 1991, JCP E 1991, I no. 90 p. 466) it is even obligatory. FRENCH law goes even further and holds valid personal securities with a sliding scale of liability (garanties glissantes: Cass.com. 5 December 1989, RD banc 1990, 139): The amount of the garantie glissante is progressively reduced with the performance of the main obligation; it is nevertheless independent, because it constitutes a mere modality of computation. Also in ITALY it is acknowledged that independent personal security contracts always contain a reference to the underlying obligation (Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 52 ss.) and that a contract term reducing the security to the amount of the secured obligation does not per se impair the independence of the security (CA Milano 15 October 1999, Contratti 2000, 468). According to an eminent GERMAN author (Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht no. 1137) reducing terms (Reduzierungsklauseln) have to be admitted as part of the personal security contract and may be raised as defences (inhaltliche Einwendung), although independent personal securities with reducing terms apparently function like dependent personal securities on first demand (cf. Hadding 704, Staudinger/Horn no. 240 preceding §§ 765).

15. Also in other countries a general reference to the underlying relationship between creditor and debtor is held not to destroy the independent character of the personal security (AUSTRIA: OGH 9 November 1993, SZ 66 no. 140 p. 328, and 2 December 1975, SZ 48 no. 130 p. 661; Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/6; BELGIUM: Romain 444-447; ITALY: Cass. 3 February 1999 no. 917, Giust.civ.Mass. 1999, 245; Mastropaolo 140 s.; PORTUGAL: CA Lisboa 18 October 1988, CJ XIII, IV-129). In ENGLAND, although the obligation has no reference in law to the debt of another (Yeoman Credit Ltd. v. Latter [1961] 1 WLR 828 at 830-831), most indemnities contain references to the underlying transaction. In SPAIN, the mere reference to the underlying transaction has been regarded as an indication that the parties do not want to agree upon a true independent guarantee (CA Rioja 17 October 2005, JUR 2006/11295).

V. Types of secured obligations

16. All types of obligation may be secured by an independent personal security. Hence, also claims for reimbursement that a (primary) security provider may acquire against the debtor under a primary security may be secured by a so-called counter security. In BELGIUM (Delierneux 21-27), GREECE (Georgiades § 6 nos. 168 ss.), ENGLAND (Goode, Commercial Law 1020), DENMARK (known as re-garanti: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 17), FRANCE (Simler no. 914) and PORTUGAL (Almeida Costa and Pinto Monteiro 25) counter-securities are well known and frequently used – mostly in an international context. The same is true in SPANISH and ITALIAN law (SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 63, 64; ITALY: Mastropaolo 145, 318 ss.; Cass. 17 May 2001 no. 6757, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 989). The GERMAN Supreme Court had recently to deal with a type of counter security and had no doubt concerning its general validity (BGH 10 October 2000, BGHZ 145, 286).

VI. Letters of credit and stand-by letters of credit

(a) Letters of credit

17. Views on the relationship between independent personal securities and letters of credit are to some degree influenced by the differing sources from which the rules governing personal securities have developed. Where, as in most member states, the relevant rules have been developed from the traditional rules on dependent personal securities, the differences from letters of credit tend to be emphasized. Admittedly, a common denominator is the independence of both types of instruments from any underlying transaction (AUSTRIA: Avancini/Iro/Koziol II no. 3/46 and Avancini/Iro/Koziol II no. 4/15; BELGIUM: Byttebier 56; Van Lier, JT 1980 no. 24; Van Quickenborne no. 904; GERMANY: Zahn, Eberding and Ehrlich no. 9/15; ITALY: Pontiroli, Il credito documentario 233; CA Milano 14 January 2004, BBTC 2005 II 419; FRANCE: cf. exceptionally Ripert and Roblot no. 2385; NETHERLANDS: Dutch Business Law § 6.05 [4] [a]; Croiset van Uchelen 13; PORTUGAL: STJ 17 April 1970, 63029, BolMinJus no. 196, 275; Cortez 566-567; SPAIN: Marimón Durá, Planteamiento 389 ss., 397 ss.).

18. The major difference, however, are the different purposes. The letter of credit is a technique of payment, while the personal security has a security function (AUSTRIA: Koziol, above; ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 1017 s.; FRANCE: Ripert and Roblot no. 2384; GERMANY: Zahn, Eberding and Ehrlich no. 9/14; ITALY: Pontiroli, Il credito documentario 12; NETHERLANDS: Boll 88; Mijnssen 20; PORTUGAL: Galvão Telles 284; even though a letter of credit may constitute a firm personal security cf. STJ 17 April 1997, CJ (ST) V, II-53; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 109 ss.). AUSTRIAN writers emphasize that the different functions imply also some different rules: The letter of credit obligation is primary, while that of the personal security is subsidiary to non-performance of the secured obligation or non-occurrence of the secured event (Koziol, above, no. 3/47; Avancini, above, no. 4/15).

19. However, one AUSTRIAN banking expert, while acknowledging the legal differences, underlines that these are marginal from an economic point of view; in letter of credit transactions, whose purpose is not payment, even the legal difference disappears completely (Avancini, above, no. 17, no. 4/15), e.g. where the letter of credit is intended to secure that another bank accepts or negotiates a bill of exchange drawn by the buyer (Avancini, above, no. 17, no. 4/91, 4/93).

20. DUTCH and ITALIAN writers base the strong resemblance between independent personal securities and letters of credit also on the fact that historically the rules on those personal securities were developed by the courts by using the regime of letters of credit as a model (NETHERLANDS: Dutch Business Law § 6.05 [4] [a]; Mijnssen 21; ITALY: CC art. 1530 para. 2; Portale, Fideiussione 1062 ss.).

21. BELGIAN and ITALIAN legal scholars, besides pointing to the close relationship between letters of credit and independent personal securities, emphasize the differences, which are seen in the different purposes (payment v. security), the documentary character of letters of credit (BELGIUM: Bertrams 57; ITALY: Pontiroli, Il credito documentario 78) and the fact that letters of credit may only be issued by professional credit institutions (BELGIUM: Van Lier no. 2.4). However, the rules on documentary credits are generally used to solve problems resulting from the lack of rules for the independent personal security (ITALY: De Nictolis 43).

22. In ENGLAND letters of credit are rather distinct from personal securities, dependent or independent. They originated in international trade and mainly operate as a payment technique (Todd 6-18), while independent personal securities have evolved in a purely domestic environment and serve a security purpose. It is, however, admitted that letters of credit resemble performance bonds and demand personal securities, which are clearly based on personal securities (Goode, Commercial Law 1017).

(b) Stand-by letters of credit

23. See national notes on IV.G.–1:102 (Scope) sub II B.

IV.G.–3:102: Notification to debtor by security provider

(1) The security provider is required:

(a) to notify the debtor immediately if a demand for performance is received and to state whether or not, in the view of the security provider, performance falls to be made;

(b) to notify the debtor immediately if performance has been made in accordance with a demand; and

(c) to notify the debtor immediately if performance has been refused notwithstanding a demand and to state the reasons for the refusal.

(2) If the security provider fails to comply with the requirements in paragraph (1) the security provider's rights against the debtor under IV.G.–3:109 (Security provider's rights after performance) are reduced by the extent necessary to prevent loss to the debtor as a result of such failure.

COMMENTS

A. Introductory

This Article requires the security provider to notify the debtor if a demand for performance is received from the creditor or is met or is refused and sets out the sanction for failure to comply with the requirements.

B. Requirement of notification of receipt of demand

The first paragraph obliges the security provider to inform the debtor of any demand for performance received from the creditor. It may be expected that the security provider would also state whether or not the demand complies with the terms of the contract from which the security obligation arises. The information is to be given not only in order to keep the debtor informed about the creditor's demand from which other consequences may ensue in the relationship between the debtor and the creditor. A more direct purpose of the information is to prevent the risk of double payment (by the debtor as well as the security provider) and to provoke the debtor to bring to the attention of the security provider any possible objections or doubts concerning the creditor's full compliance with the terms of the contract or other juridical act creating the security. Also, the debtor may furnish objections which, exceptionally, may qualify the creditor's demand as manifestly abusive under IV.G.–3:104 (Manifestly abusive or fraudulent demand).

C. Requirement of notification of performance or refusal of performance

A security provider who performs the obligation on demand is required to inform the debtor immediately. Again this serves to prevent double payment.

Also, if the security provider's examination of the creditor's demand leads to the conclusion that performance of the demand must be refused, the security provider should forthwith inform the debtor stating the reasons for refusal. This requirement serves the purpose of clarifying the situation for the security provider and the debtor so that they are enabled to consider and prepare any steps which may be appropriate. For instance, the debtor may confirm that the reasons for refusal are justified, or point out that they are not justified.

D. Consequences of failure to notify immediately

The consequences of a failure by the security provider to comply with the requirements in the Article are that the security provider's rights to reimbursement from the debtor are reduced by the extent necessary to prevent any loss to the debtor as a result of the security provider's omission or delay. If, for example, a failure to notify leads the debtor to pay the creditor again in such circumstances that the payment cannot be recovered, it would clearly prejudice the debtor if the security provider could still obtain reimbursement from the debtor. The debtor would then pay twice because of the security provider's failure to notify. In such a case the most appropriate way of avoiding loss to the debtor is to extinguish altogether the security provider's right to reimbursement

NOTES

Security provider's notification to debtor

1. In most member states the security provider is required to inform the debtor of the receipt of a demand for payment by the creditor, together with the required documents when so agreed, and after having checked its compliance with the terms of the personal security (AUSTRIA: Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/57; BELGIUM: Bertrams 124-127; Poullet 149; Van Houtte 306; DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 68; GREECE: Liakopoulos, NoB 35, 290; Loukopoulos 737; Georgiades § 6 no. 117; ITALY: Laudisa 17 s.; Mastropaolo 308; NETHERLANDS: Boll 118-119; PORTUGAL: Castelo Branco 78; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 365; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 177, contra Bergström 12). In GERMANY it is disputed whether the security provider is always obliged to inform the debtor of any demand (Staudinger/Horn no. 332 preceding §§ 765 ss.; cf. BGH 19 September 1985, BGHZ 95, 375, 389 for dependent personal securities); or whether this obligation only exists in case the security provider decides to perform (Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht no. 1110; in general Graf von Westphalen 235 s.). According to FRENCH banking customs, it is usual to inform the debtor of the demand for performance by the creditor. Some FRENCH authors claim that the security provider has for practical reasons a duty to inform the debtor (Rives-Lange and Contamines-Raynaud no. 799; Gavalda and Stoufflet no. 18). But there is no legal obligation to do so if the relationship between the security provider and the debtor is essentially regarded as a credit commitment and not as a mandate (Simler no. 965; cf. Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3689).
2. In most other countries, the duty to inform is a consequence of the agency character of the relationship between the debtor and the security provider. SPANISH CC art. 1720 and Ccom art. 263 establish the obligation to render account to the mandator of the operations which have taken place in execution of the agency. Moreover, ITALIAN CC arts. 1710 and 1176 and SPANISH CC art. 1719 establish the obligation of the agent to perform the mandate diligently. Some authors have based the duty of information on these rules (ITALY: Capo 157). Other ITALIAN authors base it on the principle of good faith in performing the contract (CC art. 1375; Tommaseo, Autonomia negoziale 423; Cassera 2768). According to the first opinion, the security provider as agent must inform the debtor (as principal) so that the latter will be able to take position as to the demand and take any action necessary as against the security provider or the creditor. This duty has been considered compulsory by SPANISH authors (Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 365). Nevertheless, some ITALIAN writers hold that there is no obligation but merely a right to inform the debtor (Calderale, Demand Guarantees 135 ss.). In banking practice this duty is usually derogated from in the contracts. The validity of such terms has been thoroughly discussed by ITALIAN authors (cf. De Nictolis 111). In the banking practice of DENMARK and GREECE usually the debtor waives the right of information (Pedersen, Bankgarantier 68; Georgiades § 6 no. 70).

3. A duty of information in ENGLISH law may result from the underlying mandate (cf. Goode, Commercial Law 981).

IV.G.–3:103: Performance by security provider

(1) The security provider is obliged to perform only if there is, in textual form, a demand for performance which complies exactly with the terms set out in the contract or other juridical act creating the security.

(2) Unless otherwise agreed, the security provider may invoke defences which the security provider has against the creditor.

(3) The security provider must without undue delay and at the latest within seven days of receipt, in textual form, of a demand for performance:

(a) perform in accordance with the demand; or

(b) inform the creditor of a refusal to perform, stating the reasons for the refusal.

COMMENTS

A. Introductory

This Article lays down the requirements for a demand for performance and most of the reasons which the security provider may invoke against such a demand and the procedures which must be observed in this respect. The security provider must examine the creditor's demand for performance or a demand to extend the security or pay. The security provider may raise personal objections and defences available against the creditor. The security provider must either perform promptly or notify the creditor promptly of a refusal to perform and will be liable in damages for non-performance.

B. Requirements for creditor's demand

The creditor's demand for performance must be in textual form. This requirement has been established for the sake of legal certainty and because of the high sums of money that are usually involved. The text must specify the contract of security to which it relates and the amount of money or the quantity and kind of other performance which is demanded. The expression "textual form" means "a text which is expressed in alphabetical or other intelligible characters by means of any support which permits reading, recording of the information contained in the text and its reproduction in tangible form" (see I.–1:106 ("In writing" and similar expressions).

The creditor's demand must comply with all the terms and conditions laid down in the contract or other juridical act creating the security. One may distinguish between simple and documented demands. A simple demand is one which merely contains a demand for payment of a definite sum of money or an equivalent act, without requiring further written support. By contrast, a so-called documentary demand is one where the demand for payment must be supported by documents, the type and contents of which must strictly comply with the requirements fixed by the security contract. The UCP 500 (1993) devote almost 20 elaborate provisions to general prescriptions concerning the minimum requirements as to form and substance of various types of documents which the beneficiary typically may have to present for a demand under a letter of credit (articles 20–38) and the ISP98 contain over 20 such provisions (rules 4.01–4.21).

C. Examination of creditor's demand

It is implicit in this and the preceding Article that the security provider must examine the creditor's demand for performance. In the interest of the debtor, the security provider should carefully investigate whether the creditor's demand strictly satisfies all the terms and conditions of the security. Even if exceptionally the security provider was not instructed by another person, it is in the security provider's own interest to undertake this examination in order to ensure that payment is not made without the conditions for payment having been fulfilled. The security provider must also check whether any objections may have to be raised with respect to the validity of the contract or other juridical act creating the security. Any failure to do this tends to endanger the security provider's claim for recourse against the debtor.

The security provider's examination of the demand must take place within a reasonable period of time. Both the UCP 500 (1993) (art. 13 lit. b) and the ISP98 (rule 5.01 (a) (i)) as well as the UN Convention on Independent Guarantees (art. 16 (2)) fix a maximum of seven business days for the reasonable period, unless the parties have agreed otherwise. This maximum appears to be sensible also for the present Article. (See paragraph (3).) Of course, the parties are free to fix a different time limit.

If the demand or any documents accompanying it do not fully comply with the terms of the contract or other juridical act creating the security, the security provider is, vis-à-vis the creditor, not obliged to perform. This rule implies that the security provider, in spite of doubts, may decide to perform. However, a security provider must also take care to perform any obligations owed to the debtor. If time permits, the security provider should also inform the creditor and ask the creditor to remedy any open point.

D. "Extend or pay"

Occasionally a creditor may set forth the alternative demand of "extend or pay". This is to be understood as an offer to the security provider to extend the time limit for the guarantee or, if that offer is rejected, to perform the security. If the security provider accepts the requested extension of time, the demand for performance must be regarded as withdrawn. If the security provider does not accept the requested extension, the security provider must examine the demand for performance according to the rules set out above at C. In the same sense ISP98 rule 3.09.

E. Security provider's personal objections and defences

Apart from objections and defences relating to the validity of the contract or other juridical act creating the security and as to full compliance with its terms, the security provider may also invoke objections and defences to which the security provider is personally entitled as against the creditor. This covers also the security provider's right to set-off a personal monetary claim against the creditor's claim under the security (cf. UN Convention on Independent Guarantees art. 18).

Usually, these objections and defences may be rooted in earlier and different legal relationships between the security provider and the creditor. Consequently, it would be irreconcilable with the independence of the security if the security provider could invoke an objection or defence arising from a claim which another person, especially the debtor, had assigned to the security provider. It is equally inadmissible for the security provider to set-off a right acquired by assignation from such a debtor. Invoking such defences or asserting such a set-off would run counter to the independent character of an independent security whose essence is the insulation from any underlying relationship between the creditor and a debtor.

The parties may expressly or impliedly exclude other personal objections as well. An exclusion may e.g. be implied if the security provider promises "unconditional" performance upon the creditor's demand.

F. Duty of information on refusal of performance

If the security provider's examination of the creditor's demand leads to the conclusion that performance of the demand must be refused, the security provider must inform the creditor, stating the reasons for refusal. This obligation to inform serves the purpose of clarifying the situation for the parties directly affected so that they are enabled to consider and prepare any steps which may be appropriate. For instance, the creditor, if time limits allow, may wish to remedy any defect in the demand pointed out by the security provider.

G. Remedies for security provider's non-performance

The creditor will have the usual remedies under Book III for non-performance of a security provider's obligations under this Article.

NOTES

I. Form of the demand

1. The demand for performance is in all countries usually made in writing (AUSTRIA: Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/85; DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 17; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 115; ITALY: De Nictolis 101; NETHERLANDS: Boll 110; Mijnssen 44; PORTUGAL: Castelo Branco 78; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 349). For commercial personal securities this form is in GERMANY agreed to be a binding commercial usage (cf. Ccom § 346: Staudinger/Horn no. 233 preceding §§ 765 ss. for personal security on first demand). BELGIAN and SPANISH authors allow to present a demand orally; however, its evident difficulties of proof do not make it adequate for this contract, being never used in banking practice (De Marez no. 97; Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 350).
2. Demands transmitted by any telegraphic or electronic technique have been considered valid by BELGIAN, DUTCH, FRENCH, GERMAN and SPANISH authors (BELGIUM: De Marez no. 59; FRANCE: Simler no. 962; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 233 preceding §§ 765 ss.; NETHERLANDS: Mijnssen 45; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 349; cf. Rivero 443) as well as by the GERMAN Federal Supreme Court (BGH 10 October 2000, WM 2000, 2334, 2337).
3. By contrast, if the security provider had prescribed a specific formal requirement, this has to be observed strictly (AUSTRIA: an agreed "registered letter" cannot be replaced by a telex: OGH 24 March 1988, SZ 61 no. 79, p. 395; and a local authority's letter with an official stamp cannot be replaced by a fax: OGH 5 December 1995, SZ 68 no. 230, p. 749-753; but some writers plead for more flexibility: e.g. Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/86). Also the DUTCH Supreme Court has insisted on strict observance of the agreed method of demand (a simple letter does not suffice if formal service had been agreed, HR 9 June 1995, NJB 1995 no. 639 at p. 3090).

II. Terms of the demand

4. The legal systems of most member states have adopted the doctrine of strict compliance (garantieformalisme). It is the duty of the security provider to examine whether the demand and also the documents presented comply exactly with the terms and conditions agreed for the personal security (the AUSTRIAN OGH demands a "pedantical" examination, e.g. OGH 5 December 1995, SZ 68 no. 230 p. 750, 751; BELGIUM: De Marez 17-25; DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 69; FRANCE: Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3688; Cass.com. 21 June 1988, RD banc 1988, 204; GERMANY: MünchKomm/Habersack no. 30 preceding § 765; BGH 10 October 2000, WM 2000, 2334, 2336: "Garantiestrenge"; for documentary credits cf. Schütze no. 380; ITALY: Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 81 ss.; PORTUGAL: Menezes Cordeiro, Direito 609; Galvão Telles 289; for documentary credits cf. Calvão da Silva 18; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 377). "There is no room for documents which are almost the same, or which will do just as well" (Equitable Trust Co. of New York v. Dawson Partners Ltd. (1927) 27 Lloyd's L. Rep 49, 52). Also purely terminological deviations may lead to refusal of the demand. In the ENGLISH case of J. H. Rayner & Co. Ltd. v. Hambros Bank Ltd. [1943] KB 37 documents evidencing shipment of "coromandel groundnuts" were required by the credit, but the documents delivered referred to "machine-shelled groundnut kernels". In fact, these are synonyms, but the court held that it was impossible for a banker to know all the different trades he is dealing with. By contrast, the GERMAN Supreme Court and PORTUGUESE authors only require that the content of the creditor's demand for payment has to correspond to the requirements that have been stipulated in the contract of personal security for the demand; but the wording must not be identical, unless otherwise agreed by the parties (GERMANY: BGH 10 October 2000, WM 2000, 2334, 2336; PORTUGAL: Pinheiro 449; Almeida Costa and Pinto Monteiro 29). Obvious typographical errors are generally disregarded by ENGLISH and FRENCH courts (ENGLAND: cf. Hing Yip Hing Fat Co Ltd v. Daiwa Bank [1991] 2 HKLR 35 (Supreme Court of Hong Kong); Goode, Commercial Law 977; FRANCE: CFI Paris 27 September 1993, GazPal 1994, 2, Somm.Comm. 464).

5. By contrast, UCP 500 (1993) art. 39 contains a few rules on tolerances regarding strict compliance of the documents presented for the purpose of making a demand with the terms of the personal security, e.g. that a deviation of 5% in terms of quantity is permissible unless the contract otherwise states.

6. In AUSTRIA and the NETHERLANDS, the security provider is obliged to inform the creditor if the latter's demand does not comply with the terms of the personal security and to invite the creditor to repair any deficiency, provided time permits to do so; violation of this duty of good faith exposes the security provider to a claim for damages (AUSTRIAN OGH 5 December 1995, SZ 68 no. 230 p. 753 ss.; cf. also Avancini/lro/Koziol no. 3/89; DUTCH HR 9 June 1995, NJB 1995 no. 639 p. 3091; cf. also Dutch Business Law § 6.05 [4] [b]).

III. Time for examination of the demand

7. Unless expressly fixed by the parties, the time necessary for the security provider to examine the demand and the documents depend on the circumstances of each case. The criterion of "reasonable delay" sounds satisfactory but has been criticized in SPAIN as being vague (Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 378). In most countries, the "reasonable delay" is in practice thought to be a period between three and seven days after receipt of the demand. The UN-Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995 art. 16 (2) allows "reasonable time, but not more than seven business days following the day of receipt of the demand …". In DENMARK, GREECE and SPAIN a period of one to three days as established by international banking practice is accepted (DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 138 ss.; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 117; Gouskou 136, 149; contra: CFI Athens 9790/1992, EED 43, 522; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 379). In BELGIUM, ENGLAND and GERMANY three (working) days are generally admitted, being extended to one week depending on the circumstances (BELGIUM: Schrans 1176; De Marez no. 30; ENGLAND: Bankers Trust Co v. State Bank of India [1991] 2 Lloyd´s Rep 443; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 235 preceding §§ 765 ss. for personal security on first demand; contra Zahn, Eberding and Ehrlich no. 9/113: one to two days; also UCP 500 (1993) art. 43(a)). In FRANCE the customary reasonable delay has been fixed in one case by an appellate court at five days (CA Paris 10 July 1986, D. 1987, Somm.Comm. 217). In SWEDEN no concrete time limit has been defined (Dalman 202).

IV. Personal securities with time limit and creditor's demand "extend or pay"

8. Personal securities very often are agreed with a time limit aiming at reducing its costs and risks for the security provider. When the time limit is about to expire, creditors often require the security provider to extend it or perform the personal security. This demand is called "extend or pay". If the security provider does not extend, there is an obligation to perform, of course, only in so far as the demand is in full compliance with the formal requirements of the contract of personal security (BELGIUM: De Marez nos. 67-75; GERMANY: BGH 23 January 1996, NJW 1996, 1052; ITALY: Viale 206 s.; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 333). In case of personal securities on first demand a demand "extend or pay" suffices to oblige the security provider to extend or to perform (BELGIUM: De Marez nos. 77, 93 and no. 103). In FRANCE the demand "extend or pay" is valid as a demand for payment without discretionary character (CA Paris 9 January 1991, RD banc 1991, 152; Simler no. 957; contra Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3688). However, some other FRENCH courts consider the demand "extend or pay" as a non-serious demand (CA Paris 28 May 1985, D. 1986, I.R. 155) constitutive of abuse because the creditor seems to oblige the security provider to extend the personal security (Cass.com. 24 January 1989, JCP G 1990, II no. 21425). In ITALY if the debtor does not approve the extension of the personal security, the security provider must perform, no other demand of payment being necessary. The request of extension is made by the creditor to the security provider, the latter being obliged to inform the debtor who is the only person entitled to decide whether or not to extend (Bozzi, Le garanzie 78). The issue of the abusive character of the "extend or pay" term might arise depending on the circumstances of the case, e.g. if it is proved that the creditor seeks performance of the security only in order to exercise pressure and obtain an extension of the security (CFI Milano, 2 March 1994, Giur.it. 1995 I 308).

9. In ENGLAND in order to extend the personal security, the security provider must without delay inform the party who gave the instructions; the security provider has to suspend payment for a period of time as long as is reasonable for the creditor and the debtor to agree on the extension (Goode, Commercial Law 1029). The silence of the security provider or a decision to inform the debtor about the demand and to return to the subject later have in GERMANY been regarded as insufficient to extend (BGH 23 January 1996, NJW 1996, 1052; Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht no. 1128).

10. Especially for the demand "extend or pay" it is of special importance whether the security provider is obliged to inform the creditor about any inaccuracy of the demand.

While this issue is not finally settled by GERMAN courts, they seem to favour such a duty, at least if the creditor is obliged to present documents (BGH 23 January 1996, NJW 1996, 1052 referring to UCP 500 (1993) art. 14 d (i) concerning documentary credits; cf. also without this restriction CA Karlsruhe 21 July 1992, WM 1992, 2095 with further references).

V. Consequences of non-compliance with demand

11. Any demand which does not exactly comply with the terms and conditions of the personal security is void. According to most laws, if the demand does not comply with the terms and conditions of the personal security, the security provider is not obliged vis-à-vis the creditor to perform the personal security (BELGIUM: De Marez nos. 17-25; DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 69; ENGLAND: J. H. Rayner & Co. Ltd. v. Hambros Bank Ltd. [1943] KB 37; Goode, Commercial Law 974; GERMAN BGH 12 March 1996, NJW 1996, 1673; Staudinger/Horn no. 234 preceding §§ 765; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 122; A.P. 342/1970, NoB 18, 1092; PORTUGAL: Castelo Branco 79; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 371 and 381; SWEDEN: Dalman 202). The FRENCH Supreme Court held that inconsistencies of the documents required to be presented which could only be clarified by reference to the underlying transaction entitle the bank to refuse performance of a stand-by letter credit (Cass.com. 28 March 2006, D. 2006, 1284). In FRANCE and ITALY the security provider is practically obliged to refuse performance (FRANCE: Simler no. 1003; ITALY: De Nictolis 102; CFI Bologna 27 September 1984, BBTC 1986 II 339). According to the rules on agency, the negligence of the security provider in performing the duty of examination incurs liability against the debtor (ITALY: Bozzi, L´autonomia negoziale 248; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 381). In BELGIUM a security provider who violates the duty to examine may lose recourse against the debtor or become exposed to counterclaims by the latter (De Marez no. 33).

VI. Objections and defences of the security provider as against the creditor

12. In all countries the security provider may invoke personal objections and defences as against the creditor arising from the personal security (BELGIUM: De Marez no. 39; DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 87; FRANCE: Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3700; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 247 preceding §§ 765 ss.; ITALY: Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 78 ss.; NETHERLANDS: Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie 59 at no. 5; PORTUGAL: Castelo Branco 79; SPAIN: TS 27 October 1992, RAJ 8584 no. 1992 and 30 March 2000, RAJ 2314 no. 2000; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 179 ss.).

13. In several countries objections and defences (set-off, etc.) arising between the security provider and the creditor from any other relationship between these two parties may also be invoked (AUSTRIA: OGH 3 December 1998, ÖBA 1999, 558, 562, although the parties may exclude this, p. 563; Avancini/lro/Koziol no. 3/97; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne no. 566 ss.; ENGLAND: Hongkong & Shanghai Banking Corp. v. Kloeckner & Co. AG [1990] 2 QB 514; Goode, Commercial Law 973; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 247 preceding §§ 765 ss.; GREECE: Liakopoulos, NoB 35, 297; Gouskou 152; ITALY: Viale 190; but see with regard to set-off the conflicting decisions: allowing the defence of set-off, Cass. 24 December 1992 no. 13661, Vita not. 1993, 769; contra: CA Roma 22 May 2001, GRom. 2002, 14; NETHERLANDS: Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie 59 at no. 5; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 385).

14. However, for set-off restrictions are made in some countries. In GERMANY and some other countries it is common opinion that the security provider is not allowed to set off if this is contrary to the purpose of the personal security so that the security provider is especially prevented from setting off claims, which are derived from the "secured contract" and had been assigned to the security provider (Staudinger/Horn no. 248 preceding §§ 765 ss.). This point of view is also shared by some writers in other countries (AUSTRIA: Avancini/lro/Koziol no. 3/97; BELGIUM: De Marez nos. 39-44; ITALY: Mastropaolo 371; Villanacci 101; Portale, Le garanzie bancarie 15; NETHERLANDS: Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie/borgtocht no. 5 at 59; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 395). Apart from this restriction, the overwhelming opinion in GERMANY allows set-off provided the counter-claim can be proven easily (Staudinger/Horn no. 248 preceding §§ 765 ss. with further references, also to the opposite opinion; Horn, Bürgschaften und Garantien no. 535 now even demands that the counter-claim must be rooted in the financing of the transaction secured by the independent security).

VII. Security provider's duty of information upon refusal of payment

15. If the creditor's demand is rejected, the security provider has to inform the creditor as soon as possible in ENGLAND, FRANCE and SPAIN (ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 986; FRANCE: Simler no. 965; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 380, 381). Otherwise the security provider may be liable for the damage resulting from late performance. Electronic and telegraphic means may be used (SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 380).

IV.G.–3:104: Independent personal security on first demand

(1) An independent personal security which is expressed as being due upon first demand or which is in such terms that this can unequivocally be inferred, is governed by the rules in the preceding Article, except as provided in the two following paragraphs.

(2) The security provider is obliged to perform only if the creditor's demand is supported by a declaration in textual form by the creditor which expressly confirms that any condition upon which performance of the security becomes due is fulfilled.

(3) Paragraph (2) of the preceding Article does not apply.

COMMENTS

A. The special feature of a first demand security

An independent personal security that falls due upon "first demand" enjoys a higher degree of independence than a simple independent security. Being more efficient than a simple independent security, it is also more risky to the security provider who therefore deserves a somewhat better protection. This Article provides for both these features (see Comments C and D).

B. Applicable rules

Since the independent security on "first demand" is a special type of independent security, the general rules on demand of a security, as laid down in the preceding Article apply to it, subject to the special rules in the present Article, paragraphs (2) and (3).

C. Restriction of security provider's defences

As the name of the security "on first demand" indicates, it is the special feature of this particular kind of independent security that the creditor is entitled to a fast and effective satisfaction. Therefore, the security provider's possible defences against liability must be restricted. The general reference to the preceding Article covers also the defences contained in that provision, cf. Comment B. In addition, paragraph (3) of the present provision excludes defences to which the security provider in a personal capacity is entitled as against the creditor, including set-off with any counter-claim which the security provider may have against the creditor.

On the other hand, the defence of a manifestly abusive demand under the following Article remains available to the security provider since this defence is not rooted in the person of the security provider but, to the contrary, in that of the creditor.

D. Conditions for creditor's entitlement

As explained in Comment C, a security on first demand restricts the security provider's exceptions against the demand to the very exceptional cases of a fraudulent or abusive demand by the creditor. By contrast, performance on first demand does not mean that the creditor is only required to present a mere demand. There can also be a first demand guarantee if the creditor is contractually obliged to present additional documents. Such documentary securities and letters of credit are very frequent in practice.

In order to curb abusive demands which not infrequently have been made under "first demand" securities, recent practice sometimes requires the creditor to confirm expressly that the conditions upon which the security becomes due, are fulfilled. Such an express confirmation must be given in textual form by the creditor. While it imposes no real burden upon an honest creditor, such a declaration may be at least a moral warning to a dishonest person, and it may assist in bringing claims or even criminal prosecutions against a fraudulent creditor. If this declaration is not produced by the creditor, the security provider need not perform. A merely tacit implication of such a confirmation upon the model of the UN Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995 art. 15 (3) does not appear to provide an effective assurance against fraudulent or abusive demands of performance.

NOTES

I. Introduction

1. In all European countries, except SWEDEN, personal securities on "first demand" are known and accepted as a special type of independent personal security, although almost no country has special statutory provisions for them (BELGIUM: Romain 437; DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 140; ENGLAND: Edward Owen Engineering Ltd. v. Barclays Bank International Ltd. [1978] QB 159; FRANCE: CC new art. 2321 para. 1 of 2006; Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3652; Simler no. 905; GERMANY: BGH 12 March 1984, BGHZ 90, 287; GREECE: Gouskou 79; ITALY: Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 37 ss.; Cass. 17 May 2001 no. 6757, Giust.civ. 2002 I 729; Cass. 1 July 1995 no. 7345, Giur.it. 1996 I 1 p. 620; PORTUGAL: STJ 6 April 2000, 135/00 www.dgsi.pt; SPAIN: TS 27 October 1992, RAJ 1992 no. 8584, TS 17 February 2000, RAJ 2000 no. 1162, TS 30 March 2000, RAJ 2000 no. 2314; Sánchez-Calero, El reconocimiento 541 ss.; Barres Benlloch 314 s.; Marimón Durá, Garantía independiente 479 ss.). By contrast, according to SWEDISH doctrine personal securities on first demand are considered to be dependent personal securities (Dalman 182, similar Bergström 14). According to this opinion a personal security on first demand is an irregular form of the dependent personal security.

2. An independent personal security on first demand means that the creditor is entitled to performance of the personal security by mere demand upon the security provider who, as a rule, is precluded from invoking objections against the demand. This is how BELGIAN and FRENCH authors define a simple personal security on first demand (garantie à première demande pure et simple/garantie op eerste eenvoudig verzoek); other terms may however create further conditions for the personal security, e.g. presentation of specified documents can be demanded (De Marez no. 78; Malaurie and Aynès*/Aynès and Crocq*, Les sûretés no. 331). The same is true for other countries: according to the principle of freedom of contract, it will be necessary to interpret the term precisely (DENMARK: Beck Thomsen 107 ss.; GERMANY: cf. Staudinger/Horn no. 231 preceding §§ 765 ss.; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 nos. 40-41; ITALY: Bonelli, Le garanzie contrattuali 208 ss.; PORTUGAL: CA Lisboa 11 December 1990, CJ XV, V-134; SPAIN: Carrasco, Las nuevas garantías 688 and 716; Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 145). The basic understanding of personal securities on first demand – i.e. undertakings predominantly securing payment or performance in international trade – in ENGLISH law is that the security provider is liable on the first written demand for payment (Goode, Commercial Law 1018 s.).

II. Creditor's confirmation of entitlement

3. There is no unanimity as between the member states as to whether the creditor is required to declare at the time of calling on the personal security that the conditions upon which the personal security becomes due, are fulfilled. Some BELGIAN authors find such an obligation to be incompatible with the nature of an independent personal security (for an overview: De Marez no. 87; contra Bertrams 79; Prüm no. 106). However, in all countries, parties are free to stipulate a demand term. In BELGIUM and FRANCE, this is regarded as a personal security on first demand on justified request (BELGIUM: De Marez no. 86; FRANCE: Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3653).

4. In ENGLAND a "demand guarantee" (Goode, Commercial Law 1018 ss.) is payable on a written demand upon the occurrence of a specified event; in this case the beneficiary's demand must state that the event has occurred, see Esal (Commodities) Ltd. v. Oriental Credit Ltd. [1985] 2 Lloyd´s Rep 546. It has been argued in a domestic context that in spite of a demand having been expressly stipulated for in a personal security the creditor, by virtue of the primary character of the undertaking of a provider of an independent security, might be entitled to sue the latter without such an additional prior demand (cf. M. S. Fashions Ltd. v. Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA [1993] Ch 425; Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Alstonbridge Properties Ltd. [1975] 1 WLR 1474 at 1483; Andrews and Millett no. 7-006), but this does not seem to be entirely clear (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 10-118 ss.; Halsbury para. 1105, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008).

5. A DUTCH court has held that, if such a declaration is missing, the security provider does not need to pay (CA Amsterdam 27 February 1992, NJB 1992 no. 735), and in DUTCH practice, this is regularly done (Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie/borgtocht no. 1 at 58; Boll 110).

6. In GREECE the creditor must simply invite the bank to pay without any further declarations. If along with the first demand term there is also a term "if damage was incurred", only then must the creditor declare (or prove or establish by prima facie evidence, depending on the contents of the letter) that the secured obligation has not been fulfilled (Georgiades § 6 no. 41). This personal security, however, is then conditional and not on first demand, despite the existence of the first demand term (Georgiades § 6 nos. 40-41).

III. Restriction of security provider's objections

7. In all countries, the very limited availability of defences is one of the most prominent advantages of personal securities on first demand. So the security provider cannot raise any exceptions based upon the underlying contract concluded between the beneficiary and the debtor or between the debtor and the security provider (GERMANY: BGH 22 April 1985, BGHZ 94, 167, 170 s. (including such claims if these have been assigned to the security provider); Staudinger/Horn nos. 202, 204 preceding §§ 765 ss. However, the court allows a set-off with a liquid counterclaim, p. 171 ss.; approving Staudinger/Horn nos. 248 s. preceding §§ 765 ss., but under the additional restriction that the counterclaim must closely relate to the financing of the underlying transaction, cf. Horn, Bürgschaften und Garantien no. 535; LUXEMBOURG: CFI Luxembourg 17 June 1982, Pas luxemb XXV (1981-1983) Jur. 450; ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 1026 s.). However, the security provider can invoke the invalidity of the personal security, or that the demand on the personal security is not in strict compliance with the letter of the personal security (AUSTRIA: Avancini/Iro/Koziol nos. 3/91-3/92; BELGIUM: De Marez nos. 17-25 and no. 38;

DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 148; FRANCE: Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3691; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn nos. 241-249 preceding §§ 765 ss.; MünchKomm/Habersack no. 33 preceding § 765; GREECE: Gouskou 148-149; PORTUGAL: Galvão Telles 289; ITALY: Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 79 ss.; NETHERLANDS: Bank's refusal to honour a performance bond justified where the necessary expert opinion had not been delivered by agreed expert but by another, since agreed expert had refused to give opinion; however, Supreme Court remanded case in order to examine whether due to changed circumstances contract needed to be adapted: HR 26 March 2004, NJB 2004 no. 309 with approving note by PVS; SPAIN: Carrasco, Las nuevas garantías 687). In ENGLAND, the doctrine of strict compliance has sometimes been said to be less strictly applied to personal securities on first demand than to documentary credits. In the Esal case (above no. 4), this question has been differently answered by the judges and remained unresolved in the end. In I. E. Contractors Ltd. v. Lloyds Bank plc. [1990] 2 Lloyd´s Rep 496 the question was said to be one of careful drafting and, hence, the degree of documentary compliance required may be strict or not so strict depending on the construction of the bond.

8. In AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, ITALY and PORTUGAL the security provider can also invoke the illegality of the underlying agreement. When the contract is prima facie illegal, as being contrary to public order or morality, the creditor is not allowed to sue on the contract and therefore, the call on the personal security may not be accepted by the security provider (AUSTRIA: Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/91; BELGIUM: De Marez no. 36; Wymeersch, Bank guarantees no. 4; Wymeersch, Dambre and Troch no. 57; Devos 29-32; ITALY: Cass. 7 March 2002 no. 3326, BBTC 2002 II 653; CA Milano 12 February 2005, BBTC 2005 II 481 ss.; Bonelli, Escussione abusiva 522; PORTUGAL: Ferrer Correia 253; Simões Patrício 709).

9. In GERMANY it is disputed whether personal objections of the security provider vis-à-vis the creditor, especially the right to set-off, are excluded (cf. Hadding, Häuser and Welter 697; Staudinger/Horn nos. 248 s. preceding §§ 765 ss.).

IV.G.–3:105: Manifestly abusive or fraudulent demand

(1) A security provider is not obliged to comply with a demand for performance if it is proved by present evidence that the demand is manifestly abusive or fraudulent.

(2) If the requirements of the preceding paragraph are fulfilled, the debtor may prohibit:

(a) performance by the security provider; and

(b) issuance or utilisation of a demand for performance by the creditor.

COMMENTS

A. The issue

Any independent security is, due to its independence from any underlying contractual or other relationship between the creditor and the debtor, a risky undertaking both for the security provider and especially for the debtor. This risk is even higher in the case of a security on first demand. Experience in many countries has shown again and again that some creditors may call for performance by wrongfully asserting that the agreed conditions for a demand are fulfilled.

Such unjustified demands, if accepted and performed by the security provider, often place the debtor in a very difficult situation. The debtor may have to reimburse the security provider and then seek reimbursement from the creditor. The creditor's place of business, however, may be located in a distant country; enforcement of a judgment, whether obtained locally or abroad, may be subject to similar difficulties.

In order to protect debtors against extreme instances of such abuse, courts in many countries have evolved remedies against abusive or fraudulent demands for performance of independent securities. Evidence that either the creditor's assertion about the justification of the demand is wrong or that documents presented are falsified, can usually only be adduced by the debtor. Exceptionally, in these cases, the principle of the independence of the security is disregarded and the security provider is allowed to rely on the terms of the underlying contract between creditor and debtor.

In shaping any such remedies, a carefully defined balance must be struck between the interests of honest creditors and also security providers, who are interested in a smooth, speedy and reliable system of honouring independent securities, on the one hand; and the prevention of truly abusive or fraudulent demands by unscrupulous creditors, on the other hand. The Article is based upon the practice that has been developed by the courts of the major trading nations and which has been approved by the majority of writers. It in essence corresponds to UN Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995 art. 19.

In the following, first the position of the security provider and then that of the debtor will be considered.

B. Security provider's position in relation to creditor

The basic rule is that the security provider has to comply with a demand for performance, provided this demand strictly complies with the formal and substantive conditions for an effective demand established by the parties and by the two preceding Articles. This Article provides a strictly limited exception to that basic rule. The grounds why a demand for performance, although on its face complying with the conditions for a demand, may nevertheless be unfounded in substance, derive from the underlying relationship between the creditor and the debtor. Such a recourse to an underlying relationship to which the security provider is not a party, must, of course, be very exceptional; its conditions are therefore very narrowly circumscribed.

According to paragraph (1), two conditions must be fulfilled before the exception applies. First, in substance, there must be a manifest abuse or fraud; and secondly, procedurally, this must be proved by present evidence.

The strong terms "abuse" and "fraud" require that the non-compliance of the demand with the terms of the security must be unequivocal, obvious and commercially relevant for the debtor.

> Illustration
> A contract for the sale of 10 000 t coffee provides for "shipment: September". The bill of lading is dated 29 September, whereas in reality shipment took place on 3 October. This is a clear case of fraud: There is a manifest non-performance of the obligation under the contract of sale since prices vary from month to month.

In order to prevent unwarranted allegations of manifest abuse or fraud, the security provider must be able to rely on "present evidence". This will usually have to be furnished by the debtor who had instructed the security provider to issue the security. All types of evidence are admissible, especially documents and witnesses. A restriction to documents only, which is sometimes preferred, is difficult to justify; also, the borderline is sometimes doubtful, e.g. in the case of affidavits. The weighing of the evidence is a matter for the court which is bound by the relevant procedural rules of the law of the forum.

If after honouring the creditor's demand it is found out that this demand had not been justified or was even "manifestly abusive or fraudulent", the security provider is entitled to reclaim from the creditor (cf. IV.G.–3:106 (Security provider's right to reclaim).

C. Security provider's position in relation to debtor

The security provider's position vis-à-vis the debtor differs, of course, from that towards the creditor. Compliance with an obviously abusive demand might well be a non-performance of a contract with the debtor and might therefore expose the security provider to the debtor's contractual remedies, especially a claim for damages. The debtor could set off this claim against the security provider's claim for reimbursement of the money or other performance which the security provider had paid or furnished to the creditor. More directly, the security provider would lose any right to reimbursement from the debtor under IV.G.–3:109 (Security provider's rights after performance.

On the other hand, the security provider is, in principle, obliged to perform the undertaking to the creditor. Refusing to do so by invoking the present Article will almost inevitably expose the security provider to a confrontation with the creditor; the latter often will not easily accept the security provider's objection.

In order to escape from this dilemma, the security provider may be well advised to turn to the debtor and ask for clarification and instructions. Without the debtor's assistance, the security provider will hardly be able to adduce the necessary proof of the creditor's manifest abuse or fraud. In practice, however, often the debtor may be well aware of the true situation and press the security provider to refuse performance of the security. In such circumstances it may be the debtor who will not only be willing to support the security provider by supplying information and documents; but will also strongly urge the security provider not to honour the creditor's demand.

D. Debtor's preventive remedies

According to paragraph (2), if the requirements of paragraph (1) are fulfilled, the debtor is entitled to remedies both against the security provider and the creditor.

The remedy against the security provider is in line with the security provider's obligation towards the debtor to refrain from complying with the creditor's demand.

The debtor's remedy against the creditor is rooted in the direct relationship between these two parties and the manifestly abusive or fraudulent non-performance of that contract. This rule, in essence, corresponds to the UN Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995 art. 20. The specific form of court remedies that are available or may be fashioned by the court, is left to the procedural law of the forum state and the discretion of the court. However, three specific remedies mentioned by UN Convention art. 20 paras. (1) and (2) should be mentioned here as means of achieving a balance between the contradictory interests of the creditor, on the one hand, and the security provider and/or the debtor, on the other hand:

> (1) the security provider may be ordered not to transfer the amount of the creditor's demand to the latter and to hold the amount of the security;
>
> (2) if payment has already been effected, the court may order that the creditor may not dispose of the proceeds;
>
> (3) the person applying for a court order may have to furnish security in a form to be determined by the court.

NOTES

I. Protection against abuse or fraud

1. In most EUROPEAN countries the right of the creditor against the security provider under an independent personal security or a letter of credit is subject to the prohibition of abusive exercise of rights. The prohibition of abusive exercise of a right constitutes a basic principle of private law for the exercise of all private rights and is mostly based on the duty of good faith and fair dealing (AUSTRIAN CC § 1295 para. 2; GERMAN CC § 242; GREEK CC art. 281; Georgiades § 11 nos. 73 ss.; CA Thessaloniki 449/1996, DEE 2, 826; contra CFI Patras 1683/1997, DEE 3, 1184; ITALIAN CC art. 1375; Portale, Fideiussione 1072 s.; Nanni 197 ss.; see also Gambaro 5; PORTUGUESE CC art. 334; SPANISH CC art. 7 para. 2). While in DENMARK and BELGIUM there is no such statutory general term, the principle is broadly acknowledged (DENMARK: Ussing, Aftaler 27 ss.; BELGIUM: Cass. 10 September 1971, Arr.Cass. 1972, 31; Van Gerven nos. 70-72). This prohibition is compulsory and may not be deviated from.

2. The demand of the creditor is always exercised abusively when the secured risk has not occurred and subsequently there is no need for covering any damage caused thereby (GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 135; ITALY: in such a case there is a defect of causa of the personal security according to Cass. 6 October 1989 no. 4006, Giust. civ. 1990 I 731; CA Milano 12 February 2005, BBTC 2005 II 481 ss.; SPAIN: Sánchez Calero, El contrato autónomo 384; TS 1 October 2007, RJ 20078087). Furthermore, there is an abuse of rights when the creditor demands performance from the security provider although vis-à-vis the debtor not entitled to demand this security (BGH 10 February 2000, BGHZ 143, 381, 384; BGH 8 March 2001, BGHZ 147, 99 for the special case of a dependent personal security on first demand). It is sometimes said that invoking an abuse of right is invoking an objection from the underlying relationship, contrary to the independent nature of the independent personal security and therefore permissible only in exceptional circumstances as against the creditor (BELGIUM: De Marez no. 70; FRANCE: cf. Simler nos. 984 ss.; GERMANY: BGH 12 March 1984, BGHZ 90, 287, 292; Staudinger/Horn nos. 309 s. preceding §§ 765 ss.; for documentary credits see Schütze nos. 427 s.; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 136; ITALY: Cass. 19 March 1993 no. 3291, Foro it. 1993 I 2171; SPAIN: Carrasco, Las nuevas garantías 741; Sánchez Calero, El contrato autónomo 385 and 387; SWEDEN: Dalman 199). More correctly, the security provider is only obliged within the limits of the security obligation, and may refuse performance if it can be proved that the creditor's assertion that the protected event has occurred is wrong (GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 136).

3. In ENGLAND, IRELAND, SCOTLAND and the NETHERLANDS, however, the term "fraud" is used instead of "abuse", i.e. the personal security may not be called upon if the demand is fraudulent (ENGLAND: United City Merchants (Investments) Ltd. v. Royal Bank of Canada [1983] 1 AC 168 (letter of credit); Edward Owen Engineering Ltd. v. Barclays Bank International Ltd. [1978] QB 159 (performance bond); IRELAND: White 658; NETHERLANDS: Dutch Business Law § 6.05 [4] [e]; Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie/borgtocht 54, 58; SCOTLAND: Centriforce Engineering Ltd. v. Bank of Scotland 1993 SLT 190). The fraud exception does not apply, however, where the beneficiary only after the demand has been made discovers that the conditions of the personal security are not fulfilled (ENGLAND: Montrod Ltd. v. Grundkötter Fleischvertriebs GmbH [2001] EWCA Civ 1954, [2002] 1 WLR 1975).

4. In other countries the two terms abuse and fraud are cumulatively or alternatively used without distinction. This is so in AUSTRIA, BELGIUM, in FRANCE and in PORTUGAL, where the duty of the security provider not to pay upon a manifestly abusive or fraudulent call on the personal security (AUSTRIA: "firm court practice", OGH 28 June 2005, ÖBA 2006, 62 at 64 and 24 June 2003, ÖBA 2003, 956 at 957; BELGIUM: Wymeersch, Dambre, Troch no. 57; FRANCE: Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen nos. 3702 ss.; PORTUGAL: Galvão Telles 289; STJ 14 October 2004, CJ (ST) XII, II-55) is considered to be one of the exceptions to the general rule of strict compliance (garantieformalisme). Some FRENCH authors expressly say that "fraud" is equivalent to the "abuse of rights" (Simler nos. 985 ss.). In case of counter-securities, the payment is prohibited in so far as the demands of both the creditor and the provider of independent security are "manifestly abusive". This requires either a fraudulent collusion between the creditor and the provider of independent security or a fraudulent intention of the latter (Cass.com. 9 October 2001, Bull.civ. 2001 IV no. 158

p. 149, RTD com 2002, 144). In FRANCE the exceptions to the principle of independence were first very restricted; the FRENCH courts seemed to require a fraudulent intention of the creditor (Cass.com. 11 December 1985, JCP G 1986, II no. 20593). Since 1987, a payment upon a manifestly abusive call may also be refused (Cass.com. 20 January 1987, JCP G 1987, II no. 20764). This court practice is confirmed by CC, new art. 2321 para. 2 of 2006, which requires for the discharge of the security provider a manifest abuse or a manifest fraud of the creditor or a fraudulent collusion between the creditor and the debtor.

5. In DENMARK the demand must be "unwarranted", in order for the security provider to deny payment (Pedersen, Bankgarantier 155).

6. Three cases decided in different countries dealt with the consequences of the revolutionary changes and expropriations that occurred in Iran in late 1979. European entrepreneurs working in Iran on constructions projects gave up these activities because they were expelled or otherwise forced to stop work. When their Iranian contracting parties or successors demanded payment under independent performance guaranties, a DUTCH court prohibited this upon the request of the Dutch contractor (CFI Amsterdam 18 December 1980, Schip en Schade 1981 no. 135) and the FINNISH Supreme Court rejected the demand as being unfair (HD 26 October 1992, KKO 1992:145, English translation in Sisula-Tulokas 41 ss.); for a related case, but with only a preliminary negative ruling cf. GERMAN BGH 12 March 1984, BGHZ 90, 287.

II. "Manifestly" abusive or fraudulent demand and evidence

(a) "Manifestly" abusive or fraudulent demand

7. According to most of the relevant statutory provisions or generally accepted rules (above no. 1), the abuse of rights must be "manifest". This term implies the gravity of the abuse, on the one hand, and the feasibility of proving it, on the other. Manifest is an abuse if the abusive demand is detectable by anybody, e.g. if the underlying claim has been held by court or arbitral decision to be invalid or when the demand is made for reasons of political vengeance (AUSTRIA: letter of personal security accidentally sent to a wrong person who promised return but demands performance, OGH 8 July 1993, SZ 66 part 2 no. 82 p. 21; generally speaking, there must be an evident abuse of right or fraud to be proved by liquid means of evidence: OGH 16 December 1981, SZ 54 no. 189 p. 929; OGH 14 November 1985, JBl. 1985, 424, 426; BELGIUM: "abuse that stares one in the face", Wymeersch, Bank guarantees no. 4; De Marez no. 35 at 23; FRANCE: Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3707; GERMANY: BGH 12 March 1984, BGHZ 90, 287, 292; Staudinger/Horn no. 313 preceding §§ 765 ss.; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 138; ITALY: Mastropaolo 307; Cassera 2768; CFI Milano 3 May 1984, BBTC 1985 II 85 and 12 October 1985, BBTC 1987 II 57; CA Milano 27 May 1994, BBTC 1995 II 423; CFI Verona 30 December 2003, Giur.mer. 2005, 176; PORTUGAL: STJ 14 October 2004, CJ (ST) XII, II-55; STJ 1 June 1999, 347/99 www.dgsi.pt; Almeida Costa and Pinto Monteiro 20-21; the same for documentary credits, GERMANY: Schütze no. 429; GREECE: Georgiades § 11 nos. 73-77). Concerning personal securities on first demand, only legal or factual objections that exist obviously to everybody are relevant, all other legal or factual problems or questions having to be settled between creditor and debtor (GERMANY: BGH 12 March 1984, BGHZ 90, 287, 239 s.; cf. also BGH 17 January 1989, NJW 1989, 1480, 1481; for dependent personal security cf. recently BGH 5 March 2002, NJW 2002, 1493). Also the ITALIAN Supreme Court tends to restrict the possibility of invoking the exceptio doli (Cass. 19 March 1993 no. 3291, Foro it. 1993 I 2171; De Nictolis 114).

8. In ENGLISH law the fraud exception applies only if it is "seriously arguable that, on the material available, the only realistic inference is that [the creditor] could not honestly have believed in the validity of its demands" (United Trading Corp. SA v. Allied Arab Bank Ltd. [1985] 2 Lloyd´s Rep 554, at 561 per Ackner LJ.; see also Goode, Commercial Law 992 s.). These strict requirements stem from the fact that the courts are reluctant to interfere with the smooth operation of documentary credits which are regarded as the "life-blood of international commerce" (R. D. Harbottle (Mercantile) Ltd. v. National Westminster Bank Ltd. [1978] QB 146, at 155 per Kerr J.).

9. In DENMARK it must be proven that the claim is unwarranted (Pedersen, Bankgarantier 156).

10. There is neither court practice nor literary opinion on this specification of the abuse and its proof in SPAIN. Authors have merely indicated in general that, in order to preserve the economic function of independent personal securities and their legal nature, objections to the creditor's demand must be limited (Sánchez Calero, El contrato autónomo 384; for an in-depth discussion of the topic on the basis of references to foreign countries Carrasco, Fianza 216 ss.).

(b) Present evidence

11. In some countries the proof can be made with any evidence which is "present" and allowed by law, i.e. not only with documents, but also with witnesses or affidavits (ENGLAND: Etablissement Esefka International Anstalt v. Central Bank of Nigeria [1979] 1 Lloyd´s Rep 445; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 315 preceding §§ 765 ss.; contra CA Köln 7 August 1986, WM 1988, 21, demanding documentary means of evidence; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 140; for documentary credits cf. Georgiades § 11 no. 75). Furthermore, it suffices e.g. that the security provider is informed of the abuse by the debtor or by certain information in the newspapers, or just by certain well-known facts (BELGIUM: De Marez no. 29; PORTUGAL: STJ 14 October 2004, CJ (ST) XII, II-55; Cortez 513 ss.).

12. In other countries, however, courts admit a manifest fraud or abuse only if based on documentary evidence, e.g. a final judgement against the creditor, a certificate of payment from the creditor, because the proof must be beyond doubt (DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 155); the same in FRANCE, where in only one decision the manifestly abusive call was not proved by documentary evidence, but by the admission of the creditor (CFI Paris 1 August 1984, JCP G 1984, II no. 20526). In ITALY opinions on this point are more fragmented (for the necessity of documentary evidence Mastropaolo 307; Pontiroli, Garanzie autonome 76 s.; but contra Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 107, fn. 70; for an overview of the diverging opinions expressed on this point by scholars and courts see Calderale, Fideiussione 305 ss.; more recently Barillà, L´abuso 93 ss., fn. 15; Cuccovillo 103 ss. and CFI Bologna 20 January 2003, BBTC 2005 II 79 on the relevance of testimonial evidence in proceedings for the granting of an interim injunction inhibiting payment by the security provider).

(c) Consequences for security provider

13. In some countries the security provider is not obliged, but can refuse, or is only entitled not to pay the creditor in cases of abusive/fraudulent demand (DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 155; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 312 preceding §§ 765 ss.; PORTUGAL: CA Lisboa 11 December 1990, CJ XV, V-134; Almeida Costa and Pinto Monteiro 21: the security provider however should not pay and may lose the right of recourse; in AUSTRIA one writer concludes that the security provider is only entitled to refuse performance if fully convinced, on the basis of present evidence, that the conditions summarized above (no. 6) have been met; if there is merely a doubt, performance must be made: Harrer 67).

14. In other countries the security provider must refuse payment because there is a duty to protect the debtor and the security provider is thus obliged as against the latter to omit payment (BELGIUM: de Marez no. 33; FRANCE: Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3708; however, according to new CC art. 2321 para. 2 of 2006 the security provider is not obliged to refuse to pay, but only entitled to; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 143; CFI Athens 9714/1996, EED 49, 45; for documentary credits Georgiades § 11 no. 73; ITALY: so according to the prevailing opinion among scholars and courts, often on the basis of the principal-agent relationship existent between debtor and security provider; see for all De Nictolis 113; Calderale 259 ss.; Tommaseo, Autonomia negoziale 425; CFI Torino 27 September 2003, Giur.mer. 2004, 280; CFI Bologna 20 January 2003, BBTC 2005 II 79; CFI Treviso 24 December 1997, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1998 II 443; CFI Roma 26 May 1995, Foro it. 1996 I 1091; SPAIN: Sánchez Calero, El contrato autónomo 389). In ENGLAND the security provider may be restrained from performance towards the creditor by an injunction sought by the debtor if clear knowledge of the fraud on the security provider's part can be shown (Andrews and Millet no. 16-021; O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 13-28 ss.).

15. As to the security provider's claim for return of what has been conferred by performance against the creditor, cf. national notes on IV.G.–3:106 (Security provider's right to reclaim) sub IV.

(d) Scope of debtor's protection

As against both the security provider and the creditor

16. The debtor may take legal action against the creditor: the debtor has a claim arising from the relationship with the creditor that the latter omit to demand performance of the personal security, if the secured risk has not occurred (BELGIUM: de Marez no. 39; ENGLAND: Andrews and Millet nos. 16-025 ss.; there is some discussion whether the standard of proof for a case of fraud might be lower in such a constellation as opposed to an action against the security provider, cf. Themehelp Ltd. v. West [1996] QB 84; see also O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 13-38 s.; minority opinion in GREECE: CFI Athens 7913/1998, EED 50, 279; Georgiades § 6 no. 148; for documentary credits, Georgiades § 11 no. 60; PORTUGAL: Pinheiro 461). In the NETHERLANDS and in ITALY often for procedural reasons the debtor enjoins both the security provider and the creditor, the former from performing the personal security, the latter from utilizing it (NETHERLANDS: Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie/borgtocht 54, 58; Dutch Business Law § 6.05 [4] [e]; ITALY: CFI Roma 26 January 1996, Foro it. 1996 I 2540; CFI Genova 9 December 1992, Giur.comm. 1993 II 757; however, interim protection of the debtor is rarely claimed against the creditor, especially in international commerce: Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 153 ss.; see however also, no. 17 below).

17. The debtor may demand that the security provider makes no payment to the creditor. This right can be enforced in court by requesting an interim order prohibiting payment (AUSTRIA: OGH 16 December 1981, SZ 54 no. 189 at p. 931; GERMANY: Horn, Bürgschaften und Garantien nos. 583-591 with case law; ITALY: CCP arts. 700 ss.; Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 133 ss.; Tommaseo, Autonomia negoziale 426 ss.; e.g.

CFI Milano 17 July 2003, Foro pad. 2003 I 398; CFI Bologna 20 January 2003, BBTC 2005 II 79; PORTUGAL: STJ 14 October 2004, CJ (ST) XII, II-55).

(e) As against the security provider only

18. In other countries, however, the debtor may only prohibit the security provider from making payment if the creditor abuses the creditor's rights. This right of the debtor can be enforced by an interim order (AUSTRIA: OGH 28 June 2005, ÖBA 2006, 62, 64 ("firm court practice"); 16 December 1981, SZ 54 no. 189 p. 931; FRANCE: Devèze, Couret and Hirigoyen no. 3692; Simler no. 971; GERMANY: MünchKomm/Habersack no. 35 preceding § 765). In some countries however, the debtor is not allowed to intervene in the relationship between security provider and creditor and therefore may not prohibit the security provider from making payment to the creditor (SPAIN: Sánchez Calero, El contrato autónomo 391; GREECE: CA Athens 3425/1985, Arm 41, 578; minority opinion in GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn nos. 320 ss. and 336 ss. preceding §§ 765 ss.).

(f) As against the creditor only

19. In DENMARK the debtor is entitled to try to prohibit the calling-up of a manifestly abusive payment only as against the creditor (Pedersen, Bankgarantier 65, 148, 155 and 158).

IV.G.–3:106: Security provider's right to reclaim

(1) The security provider has the right to reclaim the benefits received by the creditor if:

(a) the conditions for the creditor's demand were not or subsequently ceased to be fulfilled; or

(b) the creditor's demand was manifestly abusive or fraudulent.

(2) The security provider's right to reclaim benefits is subject to the rules in Book VII (Unjustified Enrichment).

COMMENTS

A. The issue

In the factually triangular situation of an independent security it is not quite clear who is entitled to request return of a performance that had been made by the security provider on the creditor's demand, although the conditions for the demand had not been fulfilled or later disappeared or the demand was abusive or fraudulent. Is the security provider entitled or rather the debtor or both?

National legal systems vary considerably on this issue, using sometimes very fine distinctions in allocating the right to the one or the other party. However, in this field any such distinction does not appear to be practicable since it leaves a margin of uncertainty. Therefore, only the alternative between security provider and debtor offers clarity and certainty.

Doubts may arise due to the fact that the security provider's performance of the creditor's demand at the same time often will extinguish (or reduce) an obligation of the debtor vis-à-vis the creditor in the framework of an underlying relationship between these two parties. This fact is sometimes invoked as justifying that return of such performances can only be requested by the debtor. However, this thesis overlooks the fact that the security provider's obligation is a separate and independent obligation and usually its content will also differ from the debtor's obligation to the creditor. The security provider only performs the security obligation; usually, of course, such performance may also extinguish (or reduce) the debtor's obligations towards the creditor, but this effect is incidental.

The better reasons speak for entitling the security provider. The person who performed has the greatest interest in rectifying an unjustified performance. Also, the security provider is more familiar with the circumstances under which performance was made and with defences and objections against the creditor's claim which the security provider had been precluded from raising against the creditor. This solution also avoids the duplication of remedies which would be involved in giving the debtor a right to reclaim from the creditor and then giving the security provider a right to claim from the debtor. Not only would this be inefficient but it would also expose the security provider to risk if the debtor has become bankrupt.

However, the security provider often will require the debtor's assistance with respect to the facts or legal rules envisaged by the terms regulating the independent security for justifying the creditor's demand. Such assistance is even more important if the conditions for the creditor's demand under the independent security had originally been fulfilled but later disappeared.

If the parties feel that it is more convenient to let the debtor bring the claim or an action against the creditor, they are free to agree on an assignment of the security provider's rights to the debtor.

However, there is an important outer limit to the security provider's entitlement. This follows from the wording of paragraph (1). The security provider may only invoke the terms of the independent security as against the creditor. By contrast, the security provider is not entitled to invoke the terms of an underlying contract or other juridical act between the debtor and the creditor. If the security provider's promise of performance had been invoked and honoured although the debtor had performed the secured obligation to the creditor in circumstances where performance was not due, any claim for the return of what was conferred by this performance must be brought by the debtor against the creditor. The only exception to this limitation is the case of an evidently abusive or fraudulent demand; but this exception is to be very strictly construed.

B. Terms of demand not fulfilled

Upon receiving a demand for performance, the security provider must examine the validity of the independent security and whether the demand exactly complies with the terms and conditions of the independent security; the debtor must be informed of the demand (cf. IV.G.–3:102 (Notification to debtor by security provider). Nevertheless, due to a misunderstanding or due to temporary absence of a competent person in either the security provider's or the debtor's office it may occur that the security provider erroneously believes that performance is due on the creditor's demand and in fact performs. The security provider is then entitled to demand return of the benefits conferred by the performance.

Illustration 1
B in France has concluded with S in England a contract of sale for 500 English sheep. On S's demand, B requests X-Bank in London to assume an independent security for payment of the purchase price which may be utilised by S on the day of shipping the sheep to France and on presentation of a veterinary certificate for the sheep. Although S has not presented such a certificate because he did not apply for it, he demands payment. An employee at X-Bank overlooks the absence of the required certificate and therefore honours S's demand for payment. X-Bank may request repayment of the amount paid under the independent security from S.

C. Security provider's defence or counterclaim

The security provider may have a defence or a counterclaim against the creditor which the security provider was not permitted to raise or to set off under the terms of the independent security or under an independent security on first demand. After having performed the security, the security provider is entitled to request return of the performance made on the basis of those defences or to raise the counter-claim.

D. Terms of demand subsequently disappeared

The justification for a demand that existed at the time of presentation of the security may later have disappeared.

Illustration 2
The basic facts are as in Illustration 1. However, S has applied for and obtained such a certificate, and X-Bank duly makes payment to him. Thereafter, the veterinary certificate is revoked due to the BSE crisis in England.

For the reasons set out in Comment A, the security provider should also in this case be entitled to request return of the money paid.

It deserves to be mentioned that the provider of an independent security is entitled to demand return of the benefits conferred by performance only if the conditions of the independent security had not been fulfilled or had later fallen away. If performance of the independent security for reasons rooted only in the underlying relationship never was justified or subsequently is no longer justified, then only the debtor as a party to that contract is entitled to request "return" of the performance.

Illustration 3
As in Illustration 2, but it turns out that the sheep are infected and therefore the French customs authorities refuse entry of the sheep to France. B terminates the contractual relationship. Only B and not X-Bank may request repayment of the purchase price from S.

E. Manifestly abusive or fraudulent demand

If the provider of independent security for whatever reason performs a demand which is, and is proved by present evidence to be, manifestly abusive or fraudulent, the security provider is entitled to request return of the performance made. The reasons correspond to those mentioned in Comment A.

However, if the security provider has already been (or may in future be) reimbursed by the debtor for the performance to the creditor, it may be more convenient for the parties to have the claim for repayment brought by the debtor; the security provider may then simply assign the right against the creditor to the debtor.

F. Consequences governed by rules on unjustified enrichment

The conditions set out in the first paragraph of the Article closely correspond to the basic conditions of a claim for unjustified enrichment. It is therefore consistent to refer with respect to the details of the provider's claim for return of the performance to those rules, as set out in Book VII.

In particular, the rules on unjustified enrichment may preclude a security provider's claim for return if the security provider knew (or ought to have known) at the time of the creditor's demand that this demand did not comply with the terms and conditions of the independent security or that the demand was manifestly abusive or fraudulent, if and in so far as the security provider had been entitled to raise those defences.

NOTES

I. Restitution if independent security is invalid

1. According to AUSTRIAN, DANISH, GERMAN, GREEK, ITALIAN, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law, the provider of independent security may claim restitution from the creditor of what has been conferred by performance if the contract of independent security was invalid (AUSTRIA: OGH 11 May 2005, ÖBA 2005, 899, 901; Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/156; DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 72 s.; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 346 preceding §§ 765 ss.; Hadding, Häuser and Welter 727; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 128; ITALY: Cass. 6 October 1989 no. 4006, Giust.civ. 1990 I 731; Rossetti 16; PORTUGAL: Pinheiro 455; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 402).

II. Restitution upon non-compliance with terms of independent security – para (1) lit. (a)

2. According to GERMAN, GREEK, ITALIAN, PORTUGUESE and SPANISH law, the provider of independent security may claim restitution from the creditor if there was no right to claim under the independent security because the performance, as effected by the provider of the independent security, was according to the terms of the independent security not owed as to its amount, at this time or to this beneficiary (GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn nos. 346 and 244-246 preceding §§ 765 ss.; Hadding, Häuser and Welter 727; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 128; ITALY: Cass. 6 October 1989 no. 4006, Giust.civ. 1990 I 731; Viale 203; De Nictolis 196; NETHERLANDS: Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie 63; PORTUGAL: Castelo Branco 79; Pinheiro 455; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 403). Similarly, in ENGLISH law, the security provider might in appropriate circumstances be entitled to reclaim what has been conferred by the performance where the security provider has inadvertently paid against non-conforming documents; it is thought by one eminent writer, however, that such a recovery is limited to situations where the documents presented are totally valueless (cf. Goode, Commercial Law 998).

III. Restitution upon non-compliance with terms of underlying relationship

3. Apart from cases of a manifestly abusive demand, in GERMANY the provider of independent security may not rely upon the relationship between debtor and creditor, unless, and only in so far as, the security refers to that relationship. However, it is controversial (cf. Hadding, Häuser and Welter 729) in how far without such a reference, especially in the case of an independent security on first demand the provider of independent security may rely upon a lack in the underlying relationship. The Federal Supreme Court and the majority of writers today do not in such a case allow the security provider to claim restitution from the creditor and merely consider a claim for damages for breach of contract against the debtor (BGH 25 September 1996, ZIP 1997, 275, 277 s.; contra Staudinger/Horn nos. 347 s. preceding §§ 765 ss.; cf. also Horn, FS Brandner 632; Zahn, Eberding and Ehrlich no. 9/122). Even less may the provider of independent security reclaim anything conferred by performance when the debtor performs subsequently (cf. Canaris, ZIP 1998, 500 and Bankvertragsrecht no. 1143). Also in AUSTRIA, ENGLAND, FRANCE, ITALY, the NETHERLANDS and PORTUGAL it is the debtor who is entitled to reclaim a payment made under the independent security if that was not justified according to the terms of the underlying agreement with the creditor (AUSTRIA: Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/157; OGH 12 August 1996, ÖBA 1997, 64, 66; OGH 16 March 1988, SZ 61 no. 63 p. 327; ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 998; FRANCE: Simler no. 1002; ITALY: Cass. 6 October 1989 no. 4006, Giust.civ. 1990 I 731; De Nictolis 197; NETHERLANDS: Dutch Business Law § 6.05 [4] [b]; Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie 63; cf. also CFI Breda 27 April 1993, NJB 1996 no. 99; PORTUGAL: Galvão Telles 283).

4. In GREECE, in the case of documentary credits which according to prevailing opinion are regarded as a payment order lato sensu according to CC arts. 876 ss., the debtor is entitled to a claim for unjustified enrichment if an underlying relationship is lacking or it has been defectively performed (cf. Georgiades § 11 no. 65).

5. According to DANISH law, the creditor has to pay back an amount, which has been paid under an independent security if it turns out that the security provider's payment according to the contract between creditor and debtor was in fact unwarranted; normally, both the security provider and/or the debtor are entitled to this claim (see Pedersen, Bankgarantier 72 s.).

IV. Restitution upon manifestly abusive demand – para (1) lit. (b)

6. According to the law of most member states, the provider of independent security who has performed may claim restitution in cases of manifestly abusive demand (AUSTRIA: Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/57; DENMARK: Andersen, Madsen, Nørgaard, Aftaler 144; ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 997; GERMANY: for an independent security on first demand BGH 10 November 1998, BGHZ 140, 49, 51 s.; Staudinger/Horn no. 358 preceding §§ 765 ss.; GREECE: Demetriades 77; ITALY: Cass. 6 October 1989 no. 4006, Giust.civ. 1990 I 731; Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 176; NETHERLANDS: Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie 63 s., on the ground that if the creditor's demand is obviously abusive, the security provider is to refuse performance and therefore may not debit the debtor; PORTUGAL: Ferrer Correia 257; SPAIN: Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 389; Carrasco a.o. 339, 360).

7. However, in AUSTRIA an exception from the preceding rule is made if the security provider performs an independent security, although the security provider knows or ought to know that the creditor's demand is unjustified or abusive. In this case, only the debtor is entitled to reclaim performance from the creditor (OGH 11 May 2005, ÖBA 2005, 899, 902 and 23 June 2005, ÖBA 2005, 902, 904). Also in FRANCE, the debtor is entitled to claim restitution of the performance in case of an unjustified demand (Simler no. 1002).

V. Bases of security provider's claim

(a) Unjustified enrichment including undue payment – cf. para (2)

The rule

8. In several countries, the security provider's claim for restitution is based upon unjustified enrichment (AUSTRIA: Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/156; DENMARK: cf. also Vinding Kruse chap. 8 although there are no general rules on unjustified enrichment; GERMANY: MünchKomm/Habersack no. 20 preceding § 765; Hadding, Häuser and Welter 727 ss.; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 nos. 127 ss. and 144, § 11 no. 65; PORTUGAL: Pinheiro 455).

9. In BELGIUM, ITALY, the NETHERLANDS and SPAIN, the claim for recovery of the performance can only be based upon the more specific provisions on return of a payment erroneously made but not owed (BELGIUM: CC arts. 1235 para. 1 and 1376 ss.: Vliegen nos. 252-255; Dirix, Obligatoire 264 s.; ITALY: CC art. 2033; Rossetti 16; Cass. 6 October 1989 n. 4006, Giust.civ. 1990 I 731; NETHERLANDS: CC art. 6:203 ss.; Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie 63 s.; Croiset van Uchelen 25, 27; SPANISH CC art. 1895-1901). Undue is a payment if the debt had already been fulfilled, or the debt had been discharged by set-off, or the person accepting the payment was in reality not the creditor, or the one paying (the solvens) was not the real debtor (cf. BELGIAN CC art. 1377; SPANISH CC art. 1901). It is not necessary that the solvens made a mistake; fault does not impede a claim for repayment on the ground of undue payment. A mistake will only have to be proved if it is doubtful whether the payment was really undue: e.g. if the solvens knew that the money was not due but paid, it will have to be found out why the solvens really paid and whether the payment was really undue (Vliegen no. 252). The consequences of a claim founded on undue payment are stipulated by BELGIAN CC arts. 1377 to 1381, especially in art. 1378: "If there was bad faith on the part of the one who received, he is required to make restitution of the capital as well as interests or fruits from the day of payment". Corresponding provisions are to be found in the NETHERLANDS (CC arts. 6:206, 3:121) and in SPAIN (CC art. 1896 para. 1).

10. In ENGLISH law, the security provider's claim against the creditor for recovery of money paid may be based upon a mistake of fact (cf. Edward Owen Engineering Ltd. v. Barclays Bank International Ltd. [1978] QB 159, 170; Bank Tejarat v. Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation (CI) Ltd. [1995] 1 Lloyd´s Rep 239, 244). However, it is argued that a mistake of fact concerning the genuineness or conformity of the documents as a restitutionary basis for the recovery of money will only be available for a security provider against the creditor in cases involving fraud on the latter's part or the tender of documents that are totally valueless. It is thought that the claim for recovery of money would amount to a rejection of documents which had already been accepted and that this as a matter of policy should be discouraged (cf. Goode, Commercial Law 998; Jack, Malek and Quest no. 5.81).

11. By contrast, in FRANCE, some authors consider that neither the case law rules on unjustified enrichment nor the rules on undue payment (cf. no. 9 above) may be applied (see Simler no. 1004; Malaurie and Aynès/Aynès and Crocq no. 346). The payment is not unjustified because it is based on a (independent security) contract. But see no. 14 below.

(b) Restrictions

12. If the security provider has satisfied the creditor fully knowing the lacking justification of the creditor's demand, especially an abuse, a claim for unjustified enrichment may be excluded according to AUSTRIAN CC § 1432, GERMAN CC § 814 and GREEK CC art. 905 (AUSTRIA: OGH 23 June 2005, ÖBA 2005, 902, 904; Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/156; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn nos. 349, 358 preceding §§ 765 ss.; Hadding, Häuser and Welter 727; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 144 and § 11 no. 65 for letter of credit). Similarly, in ITALIAN law the right of restitution of the security provider is excluded if he knew or had evident proof of the abusive character of the demand (CFI Milano 13 December 1990, BBTC 1991 II 588). In SPAIN it is said along the same lines that merely negligent ignorance of the creditor's fraud, due to negligent checking of the tendered documents, does not bar the security provider's right to restitution from the creditor (Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 403). By contrast, in PORTUGAL the decisive element is the security provider's intention to perform, knowledge of the lack of justification of the creditor's demand being irrelevant (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela 464).

(c) Breach of contract

13. Damages may also be claimed for the creditor's breach of contract (GERMANY: Horn, FS Brandner 630). Also in ENGLISH law, there is some discussion whether a creditor presenting non-conforming documents is liable for damages for breach of an implied warranty that the documents are genuine and that there is no latent non-conformity with the terms of the security (cf. Goode, Commercial Law 998; for the contrary view see Jack, Malek and Quest no. 5.81).

(d) Non-contractual liability for damages

14. Additionally, GERMAN CC § 826 and GREEK CC art. 919 allow the provider of independent security in some cases of abusive demand the right to claim damages for immoral, wilful and malicious injury (GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 358 preceding §§ 765 ss.; GREECE: Georgiades § 6 no. 144). Also in FRANCE such a claim is considered, especially in cases of manifest abuse (cf. Simler no. 1004); of course the creditor's fault has to be proved (see CA Paris 14 March 1988, D. 1989, Somm.Comm. 152).

VI. Cross-reference

15. On restitution after assignment of the independent security, cf. national notes on IV.G.–3:107 no. 13.

IV.G.–3:107: Security with or without time limits

(1) If a time limit has been agreed, directly or indirectly, for the resort to a security, the security provider exceptionally remains liable even after expiration of the time limit, provided the creditor had demanded performance according to IV.G.–3:103 (Performance by security provider) paragraph (1) or IV.G.–3:104 (Independent personal security on first demand) at a time when the creditor was entitled to do so and before expiration of the time limit for the security. IV.G.–2:108 (Time limit for resort to security) paragraph (3) applies with appropriate adaptations. The security provider's maximum liability is restricted to the amount which the creditor could have demanded as of the date when the time limit expired.

(2) Where a security does not have an agreed time limit, the security provider may set such a time limit by giving notice of at least three months to the other party. The security provider's liability is restricted to the amount which the creditor could have demanded as of the date set by the security provider. The preceding sentences do not apply if the security is given for specific purposes.

COMMENTS

A. General

Basic idea. Within this Part, it is intended that dependent and independent personal securities should follow substantially identical rules as regards the question of agreed time limits and their legal consequences. This approach is in line with the position under international regulations, which at least in relation to matters of time limits for resort to a security subject independent securities to rules similar to the one contained in IV.G.–2:108 (Time limit for resort to security) for dependent securities (cf. UCP 500 (1993) art. 42, UN Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995 art. 11 (1) (d) read with art. 12 (a)).

Content of the rule. Paragraph (1) covers independent securities with an agreed time limit for resort to security, while paragraph (2) deals with the possibility of the security provider limiting liability in cases where the security is given without a time limit. In both paragraphs the rules are drafted in a way closely resembling the provisions of IV.G.–2:108 (Time limit for resort to security) and IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit) respectively. However, minor differences stem from the independent nature of the personal securities covered by this Chapter.

B. Security with time limit for resort to security

Scope. An independent security can be subject to different types of time limits. Some time limits relate to the point of time at which the conditions for liability under the security, if any, must be fulfilled. A time limit for resort to security as covered by paragraph (1), however, exists where the parties have agreed that the security provider ceases to be liable after a certain point of time. This will typically be the case where the parties have used formulas such as "This security expires August 31" or "The security provider is liable under this security only until August 31".

Consequences of expiration of time limit. As follows indirectly from paragraph (1) sentence 1 ("the security provider exceptionally remains liable"), the general rule is that the security provider is no longer liable at all towards the creditor after expiration of the agreed time limit. The security provider remains liable after expiration of the agreed time limit only if the creditor had demanded performance at the proper time and in the required manner.

Time for demand for performance. Obviously, the demand for performance can have the effect of continuing the security provider's liability only if it is made before expiration of the agreed time limit. Moreover, for reasons equivalent to those described in the Comments to IV.G.–2:108 (Time limit for resort to security), the creditor generally must be entitled to performance at the time of the demand, i.e. the additional conditions for liability under the security, if any, must be fulfilled. In situations where these conditions are fulfilled only close to expiration of the agreed time limit, this rule could cause difficulties for the creditor; in order to solve this problem, paragraph (3) of IV.G.–2:108 (Time limit for resort to security) is declared applicable with appropriate adaptations. Thus, where the aforementioned conditions (replacing in the context of independent securities the maturity of the secured obligations as referred to in the text of IV.G.–2:108 (Time limit for resort to security) paragraph (3)) are fulfilled at the moment of, or within fourteen days before, expiration of the time limit of the security, the demand for performance under the security may be made earlier than otherwise possible, but no more than fourteen days before expiration of the time limit.

Security provider's maximum liability. Even if a demand for performance is made in accordance with the preceding requirements, the security provider's maximum liability is limited to the amount which the creditor could have demanded under the security as of the date when the time limit expired. Subsequent developments cannot increase the security provider's liability; from the agreed time limit itself also follows that the security provider is liable only if and in so far as the conditions for liability under the security are fulfilled by that time.

C. Security without time limit

Scope. Paragraph (2) covers securities that do not have any time limit, i.e. neither a time limit for resort to security as covered by paragraph (1) nor any other kind of restriction according to which the liability of the security provider effectively depends upon certain conditions being fulfilled before a certain time. Whether or not a security does have such a time limit, is a matter of construction of the parties´ agreement; some general guidelines for interpretation might be found in the Comments to Article IV.G.–2:108 (Time limit for resort to security).

Possibility to set time limit. According to paragraph (2) sentence 1, the provider of an independent security without a time limit may set such a limit by simple declaration with a notice period of at least three months. For the rationale behind this minimum period of notice, cf. Comments to IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit).

Effect of limitation. If the security provider sets a time limit according to paragraph (2), the security provider's liability after expiration of this time limit is restricted to the amount which could have been demanded by the creditor at that point of time. In the exceptional case of a non-monetary obligation of the security provider under the security, the extent of that obligation at the moment of expiration of the time limit set by the security provider is decisive. In any case, the security provider is only liable if and in so far as any conditions for liability under the security are fulfilled when the time limit expires. The limitation by the security provider does not, however, give rise to a time limit for resort to the security.

Exceptions. Paragraph (2) does not apply if the security is given for specific purposes. As with IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit) the possibility of limiting a security under this Article is therefore of importance predominantly in situations where the security is assumed in order to secure the creditor against risks that are not exactly specified, resembling a global security, e.g. where the security provider undertakes to secure the payment of all demands that the creditor may make against the debtor arising from their business relationship. As under IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit), no recourse to the general principle in III.–1:109 (Variation or termination by notice) paragraph (2) is possible where the special exception in paragraph (2) sentence 3 of the present Article applies.

NOTES

I. Independent securities with a time limit for resort to security

1. In international commercial practice only rarely are independent personal securities issued without agreed time limits. Often also the meaning of these time limits will be spelt out in detail in the parties´ agreement. In the absence of such an agreement, it is a very debated question in the member states especially in relation to time limits for resort to the security whether the equivalent rules on time limits for dependent personal securities are applicable.

2. Most member states seem to embrace the general idea of these Rules by applying substantially identical rules with respect to time limits for resort to security in relation to both dependent and independent security. In a few states, this result is achieved by extending the rules on time limits for dependent securities to independent securities as well (nos. 3 and 4 below); others apply identical principles of general contract law concerning this issue in both types of securities (nos. 5 and 6 below). Some member states, however, expressly rule out the applicability of these rules and developed rules specific to independent securities (nos. 7 ss. below).

(a) Application of identical rules for dependent and independent security

Recourse to rules on time limits for dependent security

3. According to GREEK court practice, CC art. 866 on the time limit for resort to dependent securities applies to independent securities (A.P. (Plenum) 10/1992, NoB 41, 70 ss.); however, it constitutes jus dispositivum (A.P. 133/1956, NoB 4, 617-618). On the other hand, some writers deny its application to independent securities (Gouskou 90 ss.; Psychomanis, NoB 42, 1619 ss.).

4. Some ITALIAN authors think that the rules on the dependent security with a time limit for resort to the security (CC art. 1957) also apply to the independent security (Bianca 520; critical Portale, Fideiussione 1070 s.); according to CC art. 1957 para. 1, the provider of a security with time limit remains liable six months after the secured obligation has fallen due, provided that the creditor within six months commenced and diligently pursued available actions against the debtor. But this is not the majority's view in doctrine and it is not shared by the majority of recent case law (see no. 11 below).

(b) Application of general contract law rules to both types of personal security

5. In BELGIUM and PORTUGAL, obligations from dependent as well as independent securities expire according to rules of general contract law. Obviously the termination of the main contract does not affect the existence of the independent security. But the issuer of a security does not have to respond to demands on the security after its expiration (BELGIUM: T´ Kint nos. 858-859; PORTUGAL: Castelo Branco 77; Pinheiro 449).

6. Also in SPANISH law, specific rules concerning the time limits for resort to dependent or independent securities do not exist. Therefore, rules of general civil law are applicable to both kinds of contracts. CC art. 1117 provides that if an obligation is conditional on the occurrence of a certain event within a given time the obligation is extinguished after the passing of the time, or when it becomes certain that the event will not occur. Therefore, the issuer of a security with a time limit should no longer be liable after expiration of the agreed time. Regarding specifically the contract of independent security, it has been doubted whether the extinction of the obligation should take place if no demand for performance is received or if the agreed event does not occur within the time limit. This problem is solved in international practice by an explicit term providing an express time limit for resort to the security, so that after expiration of such a time limit a call on the security is no longer valid (Sánchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 351).

(c) Application of general contract law rules to independent security

7. According to DANISH literature it is not possible to apply the rules on dependent securities generally to independent securities (Pedersen, Kaution 14). The meaning of a time limit in an independent security must be ascertained by interpretation (Ussing, Kaution chap. 37; Pedersen, Kaution 14 and Bankgarantier 138).

8 Also in ENGLAND, it has been said to be rather doubtful in general whether independent personal securities with time limits follow identical rules as applicable to dependent securities (cf. City of London v. Reeve & Co Ltd. [2000] C.P.Rep 73). However, the inclusion of a date of expiration is regarded as a vital statement in an independent security, especially in commercial practice (cf. Goode, Commercial Law 981); it is thought to be generally accepted practice that a claim for payment under such a security has to be made before it expires (cf. Gorton, Independent Guarantees 250).

9. The analogous application of the rules on dependent securities is also excluded in FRANCE (Simler nos. 951 ss.). Because of its autonomous character, the duration of the independent security does not depend on the terms regulating the underlying obligation. Contrary to the dependent security, the expiry of the independent security discharges entirely the provider of independent security (Simler nos. 952 and 955). Beyond these two basic assertions, rules of general civil law are applicable to the contract of independent security (Simler no. 953).

10. In GERMANY independent securities are in general limited in time by the parties (Staudinger/Horn no. 205 preceding §§ 765 ss.; Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht no. 1126; Graf von Westphalen 50, 113). If an express agreement is missing, a limitation may be derived from other contractual stipulations by interpretation as well as from the circumstances (Staudinger/Horn no. 207 preceding §§ 765 ss.). Whether the demand has to be made or the secured event has to occur before expiration of the agreed time depends on the stipulation of the parties (Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht no. 1126). The corresponding rule for dependent securities in GERMAN CC § 777 is not applicable, so that after expiration of an agreed time the provider of independent security may refuse payment (GERMAN CC §§ 163, 158 para. 2; Staudinger/Horn no. 205 preceding §§ 765 ss.; cf. also Hadding, Häuser and Welter no. 712; in favour of the application of § 777 MünchKomm/Habersack no. 19 preceding § 765); consequently, an additional period as according to § 777 para. 1 sentence 2 is not available, unless the contract has to be interpreted otherwise (cf. Staudinger/Horn no. 206 preceding §§ 765 ss.).

11. In ITALY the majority of recent court decisions (Cass. 21 April 1999 no. 3964, RN 1999 1271; Cass. 1 June 2004 no. 10486, Assicurazioni 2005 177; Cass. 31 July 2002 no. 11368, BBTC 2003 II 245; CFI Milano 2 July 2004, BBTC 2004 II 620) and writers regard the statutory provision of CC art. 1957 para. 1 on time limits for dependent personal security to be inapplicable to independent security (contra Bianca 520; cp. also Portale, Fideiussione 1070 s.). However, opinions widely diverge as to the alternative solution of the issue. The Supreme Court refers to the interpretation of the contract of security to find out whether the parties wanted or did not want the application of CC art. 1957 to independent security. The opinions of legal writers are quite diverse: According to one opinion based on CC art. 1340, an independent security is subject to a general implicit time limit to be derived from commercial customs; if there is no commercial custom, the time limit shall be derived from the nature of the contract according to CC art. 1374 (Mastropaolo 227). Another opinion considers that, unless a time limit has been agreed by the parties, according to CC art. 1183 no. 1 the judge must fix a reasonable one, which could be a six months period, according to art. 4 of the Uniform Rules for Contract Guarantees of 1978 (Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 61).

II. Independent securities without a time limit

12. In BELGIUM as well as in FRANCE, independent securities without time limits can be terminated by one of the parties after giving notice (BELGIUM: Vliegen 202; contra T´Kint no. 859; FRANCE: Simler no. 952). Without special contractual stipulation, unlimited contracts of independent security may in GERMANY not be terminated in general (Staudinger/Horn no. 209 preceding §§ 765 ss.; Hadding, Häuser and Welter 713; Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht no. 1155). But since securities are long-term relations (Dauerschuldverhältnisse, cf. Hadding, Häuser and Welter 713; contra: Canaris, Bankvertragsrecht no. 1133a at p. 772), they must be terminable to re-establish freedom from contract at least under special circumstances. If a security has been assumed for a long period of time or even without any time limit, it may be terminated if there is exceptionally a grave reason. Furthermore, the contract of security may be open to the interpretation that it impliedly contains a right of termination. In both these cases any termination may only be effective ex nunc (Hadding, Häuser and Welter 713; cf. Staudinger/Horn no. 209 preceding §§ 765 ss.). In PORTUGAL the rules for dependent securities are applicable to independent securities without a time limit in respect of an eventual release according to CC art. 648 lit. e) (Pinheiro 450).

IV.G.–3:108: Transfer of security right

(1) The creditor's right to performance by the security provider can be assigned or otherwise transferred.

(2) However, in the case of an independent personal security on first demand, the right to performance cannot be assigned or otherwise transferred and the demand for performance can be made only by the original creditor, unless the security provides otherwise. This does not prevent transfer of the proceeds of the security.

COMMENTS

A. The issues

One must distinguish between two closely related issues, i.e. the transfer of the proceeds of a security, on the one hand, and the transfer by contractual assignment or otherwise of the creditor's right to performance, on the other hand.

B. Transferability of proceeds

The transferability of the proceeds which result from the performance of the independent security upon the creditor's demand is everywhere affirmed (cf. UN Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995 art. 10). This is in line with the principle of free disposition. On this, therefore, no rule is needed.

C. Transferability of the right to performance

The present Article deals only with the second issue which in part is quite controversial and therefore requires regulation.

Many international instruments prohibit transfer of the creditor's right to demand performance, unless otherwise agreed by the parties (UN Convention on Independent Guarantees of 1995 art. 9; UCP 500 (1993) art. 48; ICC Rules for Demand Guarantees art. 4; ISP98 rule 6.01 lit. a.). The reason for this deviation from the general principle that one can freely dispose of rights is the fear that a new creditor as transferee of an independent security may abuse the right. However, as a general assumption that fear appears to be unfounded. Paragraph (1) of the present Article therefore allows assignability as a general rule. It reaffirms for this context the general rule on assignability in III.–5:105 (Assignability: general rule). The paragraph also allows transferability – e.g. on death or bankruptcy.

The more risky type of independent security, the security on first demand, is declared to be non-transferable by paragraph (2) of the present Article. This exception is justified by the fact that an independent security on first demand is a rather risky instrument because the security provider may not even invoke its personal defences and exceptions (cf. Article 3:103 (3)). Paragraph (2) therefore seeks to strike an adequate balance between the general principle that, as a rule, a holder of a right can freely dispose of it, on the one hand, and means of defence against potential risks of abuse, on the other hand. However, the parties may deviate from this rule and allow assignment.

D. Straight and qualified demands for performance

Finally, in cases covered by paragraph (1), it is necessary to distinguish between straight and qualified demands for performance. A straight demand is one where the creditor merely needs to put forward its demand, without additional declarations or documents. The assignment of a right which can be exercised in this way is risky since the assignee merely has to submit the agreed demand for performance. In these cases the debtor and the security provider may wish to protect themselves against abuse of the security by an unknown third person by excluding assignability of the security right.

The risks of a straight demand for security are avoided or, at least, considerably mitigated, if the independent security is qualified beyond a simple demand for performance. This is achieved if the parties agree that the demand as such must be accompanied by additional documents or declarations which would show that the substantive conditions for invoking the demand are present. The creditor as the direct partner of the debtor in the underlying transaction would be best qualified to produce the required documents; by contrast, an assignee will usually be a stranger to the underlying transaction. The optimal way out of this dilemma is for the assignee and assignor to co-operate and arrange for the latter to furnish in case of need the documents which according to the terms of the security must be produced. In other words, this problem cannot be solved by a general rule, but must be left to a suitable agreement between the assignee and the assignor.

NOTES

1. In most member states the contractual transfer of a security is a very controversial issue. The following national notes deal with its several aspects: first, the assignment of the right to performance (leaving questions of who can demand performance on one side); then, the question of who can demand performance; thereafter, with the assignment of the secured obligation; and finally, with the combined assignment of the security right and of the secured obligation.

I. Assignability of right to performance

2. This is sometimes discussed under the heading of “assignability of the proceeds”. In all member states the assignability of the right to receive the proceeds of the security contract is admitted unanimously (AUSTRIA: Avancini, Iro and Koziol/Koziol II no. 3/107; Jud/Spitzer 397; DENMARK: Andersen, Kaution og bankgarantier 59 s.; ENGLAND: Jack, Malek and Quest no. 10.34; GERMANY: BGH 12 March 1984, BGHZ 90, 287, 291; Graf Westphalen 149; FRANCE: Simler no. 886; ITALY: Bonelli, Le garanzie bancarie 68 s.; Calderale, Demand guarantees 130; NETHERLANDS: Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie 65; SPAIN: Carrasco a.o. 366).

3. Even if the parties exclude the transferability of the actual demand for performance, this prohibition may be interpreted narrowly as allowing the transfer of the right to the proceeds to the assignee (FRANCE: CFI Paris 22 February 1989, D. 1990, Somm.Comm. 204, note Vasseur).

II. Assignability: Demand for performance by assignee

4. Whether an assignment of the security right with performance to be due on a demand by the assignee is possible and under which conditions is very controversial. The controversy centres around the issue whether or not a right to payment on demand is a highly personal one and therefore is transferable at all. It is also open to doubt whether the consent of the security provider (no. 9 below) and also that of the debtor is required (no. 10 below).

(a) Assignability denied

5. BELGIAN, DANISH, FRENCH, GREEK and SWEDISH legal writers do not permit an assignment of the security right (BELGIUM: RPDB, Les garanties bancaires autonomes no. 48 at 568; Van Malderen 3203; Dehouck 2; contra: Vliegen 205-207 and 213-215; DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 85; FRANCE: Simler no. 886; GREECE: CC art. 455; Georgiades 6 no. 157; Gouskou 91 ss.; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 52, 87). Two reasons are given. First, even an independent security functions like a security and therefore has to be accompanied by transfer of the right to performance of the underlying obligation. Second, the obligation of a provider of an independent security is regarded as highly personal, so that the right to activate it by demanding performance cannot be transferred to another creditor without the agreement of the security provider (no. 9 below).

(b) Assignability affirmed

6. In ENGLAND and GERMANY, in effect, such a personal character of the security provider's obligation is in general denied. In both countries the right to enforce an independent security is assignable (ENGLAND: cf. Re Perkins [1898] 2 Ch 182; British Union and National Insurance Co. v. Rawson [1916] 2 Ch 476; Halsbury/Salter para. 1263, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008)); GERMANY: BGH 25 September 1996, ZIP 1997, 275, 278; 20 June 1987, NJW 1987, 2075; 12 March 1984, BGHZ 90, 287, 291; Staudinger/Horn no. 225 preceding §§ 765 ss. with further references).

(c) Assignability controversial

7. In other countries, the matter is controversial: In AUSTRIA, the Supreme Court has allowed it in two recent cases (OGH 23 May 2005, ÖBA 2005, 902, 905 sub no. 4; 18 January 2000, SZ 73 no. 10), but an influential writer has severely criticised this position (Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/108-3/110). In ITALY, the opinions of writers are divided (against assignability Dolmetta and Portale 91 s.; Laudisa 16; pro, Bonelli, Le garanzie contrattuali 233 s.); but the famous Supreme Court decision legitimating independent personal security in ITALIAN law concerned a case where the assignee could demand performance (Cass. plenary decision 1 October 1987 no. 7341, Giur.it. 1988 I, 1, 1204). In the NETHERLANDS, courts and writers are also divided (against transferability CA Amsterdam 21 February 1991, NJB 1992 no. 141; Boll 103; Pabbruwe, Bankgarantie 66; for transferability CFI Haarlem 12 January 1993, NJB 1995 no. 53; Mijnssen 66-69). In PORTUGAL, although case law seems to accept transferability (STJ 17 April 1970, BolMinJus no. 196, 275), writers tend to deny it because of the nature of the obligation (Pinheiro 451).

(d) Additional requirements

8. Several countries allow assignability if the security provider agrees to it (no. 9 below); other voices even demand the debtor's consent (no. 10 below).

9. According to FRENCH case law, an assignment is valid if the provider of independent security expressly agrees to the transfer (Cass.com. 7 January 1992, Bull.civ. 1992 IV no. 3 p. 3). This has recently been confirmed by the legislator (CC new art. 2321 para. 4 of 2006). The security provider's consent can also be given by the term "pay to order" in the security contract. A merely implied agreement of the security provider, resulting from the circumstances in the relationship between the security provider and a new creditor, does not seem to be sufficient. According to FRENCH case law the transfer of the security right, in contravention to a term prohibiting the transfer constitutes a fraud (CA Paris 23 September 1988, D. 1989, Somm.Comm. 156). The security provider is then discharged from the performance of the independent security. In PORTUGAL in the corresponding case of documentary credits an eminent writer considers that the consent of the security provider is always necessary because not only a credit, but the complete contractual position is transferred (Vaz Serra, Note on acordão de 16. 6. 1970, at 176).

10. Some DUTCH, ITALIAN and GREEK authors think that an assignment is only valid if the debtor agrees to the transfer (ITALY: when the possibility to transfer the security is convenient for the debtor, the debtor's consent suffices according to Calderale 236; references in De Nictolis 151; GREECE: Georgiades 6 no. 157; Gouskou 91 ss.; NETHERLANDS: Ensink 553 – both debtor and security provider must agree).

(e) Consequences of an effective assignment

11. In GERMANY where an assignment of the security right as such is allowed (above no. 6) it has been held that the assignment does not per se also comprise the conditions for invoking the security; however, the assignor is obliged to request the assignee to observe those conditions and would otherwise be liable for damages (BGH 25 September 1996, ZIP 1997, 275, 278 s.).

12. The GERMAN Supreme Court dealt in one case with the question which counter-claims can be set off after an assignment. It held that counter-claims arising from the relationship between the original creditor and the debtor cannot be set off against the security right, even if such claims had been assigned to the security provider (BGH 22 April 1985, BGHZ 94, 170 s.); by contrast, liquid counter-claims of the security provider can be set off against the assignee's claim under the assigned security right (ibidem p. 172 s.).

13. AUSTRIAN courts have dealt with the question from whom the debtor may demand restitution if after the security provider's performance it turns out that the independent security was invalid. Generally, the debtor may claim restitution from the original creditor, i.e. the assignor (OGH 23 May 2005, ÖBA 2005, 902, 905 sub no. 4; and 18 January 2004, SZ 73 no. 10 p. 48 ss. with careful reasoning and broad references). However, if there is a clear case of abuse of rights, especially an obvious disproportion between the assignee's personal interests and the interests of the other persons involved since it is clear that an underlying obligation does not (or no longer) exist and the assignee is aware of its defective title, then restitution must be claimed from the assignee as the new creditor (OGH 23 May 2005, ÖBA 2005, 902, 905 sub no. 5 b). These rules correspond to those that apply when no assignment has taken place (cf. national notes on IV.G.–3:105 no. 7).

III. Assignment of the right to performance of the secured obligation

14. For the more frequent case of an assignment of the right to performance of the secured obligation the majority of authorities in ENGLAND, FINLAND, FRANCE, GERMANY and ITALY state that such an assignment does not automatically extend to an independent security. The same seems true as to SPANISH law, although the dictum of the TS 28 May 2004, RAJ 2004/3553 is to be taken with caution, because the court eventually held that the guarantee in question was not a true independent guarantee on demand. The numerous national provisions and rules under which an assignment extends to accessory rights do not apply to an independent security. In the present rules, III.–5:115 (Rights transferred to assignee) adopts the same approach. See also III.–5:112 (Undertakings by assignor) paragraph (6). (FINLAND: LDepGuar

§ 9, RP 189/1998 rd 41; FRANCE: CC new art. 2321 para. 4 of 2006; earlier: Simler no. 887; contra Malaurie and Aynès/Aynès and Crocq, Les sûretés no. 347 : the transfer of the independent security occurs automatically with the transfer of the underlying obligation; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 227 preceding §§ 765 ss.; Hadding, Häuser and Welter 717; but the interpretation of an assignment may show that the transfer is intended to comprise also the rights arising from the independent security (BGH 22 April 1985, BGHZ 94, 167, 169); GREECE: Gouskou 91; Demetriades 54; ITALY: Laudisa 17; in ENGLAND this rule applies both to dependent and independent securities, cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 10-178).

IV. Combined assignment of security right and right to performance of secured obligation

15. Both AUSTRIAN courts and writers allow a combined transfer of both rights, since this does not aggravate the situation under the independent security with respect to the corresponding obligations, as agreed by the parties (OGH 29 January 1997, ÖBA 1997, 826; Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/111). FRENCH law allows a combined assignment only if the parties so agree (CC new art. 2321 para. 4 of 2006 "Sauf convention contraire, cette sûreté ne suit pas l´obligation garantie"). In the NETHERLANDS, prevailing opinion also allows a combined assignment (CFI Utrecht 10 September 1997, JOR no. 34; Mijnssen 69-73; contra Pabbruwe, Bankgaranties 66, although with a reservation at 67).

IV.G.–3:109: Security provider's rights after performance

IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) applies with appropriate adaptations to the rights which the security provider may exercise after performance.

COMMENTS

A. General

Chapter 3 does not establish explicit rules on the rights which the provider of an independent personal security may exercise after having performed on the creditor's demand. Instead, the present Article refers to IV.G.–2:113 (Security provider's rights after performance) which deals with the rights which the provider of a dependent personal security may exercise after performance to the creditor. However, in view of the differences between dependent and independent securities, the rules of IV.G.–2:113 are to apply only "with appropriate adaptations".

The general justification for this rather novel approach is that the true differences between dependent and independent personal securities reside in the prerequisites for demanding performance from the security provider. However, after the security provider has performed to the creditor, the security provider's position towards the debtor and towards other security providers is very akin to that of the provider of a dependent security. In order to simplify and to achieve internal consistency it is appropriate to apply essentially the same rules to the after-performance stage of both instruments of personal security.

B. Security provider's claim for reimbursement

The first sentence of IV.G.–2:113 paragraph (1) lays down the security provider's right to be reimbursed by the debtor. Obviously, the same right pertains to the provider of independent security who had assumed on the debtor's instruction the security and has performed it.

Exceptionally the security provider may have waived the right to reimbursement; then, of course, there is no recourse against the debtor, cf. Comment D on IV.G.–2:113.

Another equally peculiar and rare situation is present if the debtor is incapable or, as a purported legal entity, in truth non-existent, cf. Comment G on IV.G.–2:113.

The debtor may be able to set off counterclaims against the claim of the provider of an independent security for reimbursement.

In addition, cf. Comments B to D to IV.G.–2:113.

C. Subrogation to the creditor's rights against the debtor

In order to strengthen the position of the provider of a dependent security, the second sentence of IV.G.–2:113 paragraph (1) subrogates the provider of a dependent security to the creditor's rights against the debtor. In conformity with the laws of some member states, this subrogation is extended by the present Article to the provider of an independent security.

Of course, this subrogation is subject to the same exclusions that affected the creditor's original rights against the debtor. On exclusions, cf. Comment D on IV.G.–2:113.

See also the following Comment.

D. Subrogation to the creditor's personal and proprietary security rights

The security provider's subrogation to the creditor's rights against the debtor also extends to the personal and proprietary security rights which the creditor holds against the debtor or a third person. This subrogation comprises both the "dependent and independent personal and proprietary security rights", as IV.G.–2:113 paragraph (3) expressly confirms. On the justification for not limiting this rule to dependent security rights, but extending it to independent security rights and further details, cf. Comment F to IV.G.–2:113. The present Article has the specific effect of extending such subrogation to providers of an independent security.

E. Creditor's priority in case of part performance

The rule laid down in IV.G.–2:113 paragraph (2) applies with appropriate adaptations also to the case of partial performance of an independent security. Cf. Comment E on IV.G.–2:113.

NOTES

I. Introduction

1. The provider of an independent security may acquire two sets of rights by reason of performance under the security: there may be rights to reimbursement against the debtor (nos. 2 ss. below); and, in addition, the security provider may be subrogated to the creditor's secured right against the debtor (below nos. 8 ss.) and to the security rights securing this right (nos. 13 s. below).

II. Reimbursement

(a) Legal bases for reimbursement

2. The different jurisdictions use four different bases for the right to reimbursement.

(b) Mandate

3. In AUSTRIA, GERMANY, GREECE, ITALY, the NETHERLANDS and PORTUGAL the basis is mandate. In GREEK law the provisions on mandate (CC art. 722) are applied by analogy to the relationship between provider of independent security and debtor (Georgiades § 6 no. 125). The same is true according to the majority of ITALIAN scholars who base the reimbursement of the provider of independent security on an action mandati contraria (Giusti 346; for a summary of other views, which mainly apply by analogy the rules on dependent personal security, see De Nictolis 95; against this view Calderale, Fideiussione 265). In AUSTRIAN, DUTCH, GERMAN and PORTUGUESE law the relevant provisions on the principal's obligation to reimburse the agent's outlays (AUSTRIAN CC § 1042; DUTCH CC art. 7:406 para. 1; GERMAN CC § 670; PORTUGUESE CC art. 1167 lit. c) are directly applicable. Therefore the debtor as principal is obliged to reimburse the expenses incurred by the provider of independent security in performing the obligation to the creditor. However, only such expenses are covered as the provider of independent security reasonably could regard as necessary, so that the security provider is not entitled to reimbursement if the security provider did not act as directed by the debtor as principal (Staudinger/Horn no. 329 preceding §§ 765 ss.). In AUSTRIA, it has been held that the claim for reimbursement comes into existence, under a suspensive condition, already when the independent security is granted and can therefore be secured as of that time (OGH 6 April 2005, ÖBA 2005, 649, 650).

(c) Analogy to dependent security

4. In FINLAND and SPAIN the right to reimbursement is based upon an analogy to the relevant specific provisions on dependent securities (FINNISH LDepGuar §§ 28 ss.; SPANISH CC art. 1838; Sanchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 401). Cf. national notes on IV.G.– 2:113 nos. 1 ss.

(d) Relationship between debtor and provider of independent security

5. In BELGIUM, ENGLAND and FRANCE the right to reimbursement is not based on mandate. In BELGIAN and FRENCH law the right is said to arise from the agreement between the debtor and the provider of independent security; the latter performs the latter's own obligation (BELGIUM: RPDB, Les garanties bancaires autonomes no. 173 at 605; Vliegen nos. 206, 220-221; Wymeersch, Garanties 98; FRANCE: Simler no. 995). In ENGLISH law reimbursement is granted because the provider of independent security has acted at the request and for the benefit of the debtor (Duncan Fox & Co. v. North & South Wales Bank (1880-81) 6 App. Cas. 1; Sheffield Corp. v. Barclay [1905] AC 392; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-21; Chitty/Whittaker no. 44-114).

(e) Operation of law

6. In DENMARK and SWEDEN the right to reimbursement arises by operation of law without a specific legal justification being named (DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 70; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 198).

(f) Differences between dependent and independent personal securities

7. Although the right to reimbursement in the case of an independent security is rather similar to the respective right in the case of a dependent security, there are situations where the solutions may differ in some member states: Firstly, if an independent personal security secures the debt of a minor, the latter will not be under any obligation to indemnify the provider of independent security (ENGLAND: Chitty/Whittaker no. 44-114; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 12-21; for the position in the case of a dependent personal security cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:113 no. 36). Secondly, if the obligation of the provider of an independent security surpasses that of the debtor, the security provider has nevertheless a right to full reimbursement (ENGLAND: Chitty/Whittaker no. 44-114; O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 12-21 s.; FRANCE: Simler no. 1001).

III. Subrogation to creditor's personal rights against the debtor

8. The provider of an independent personal security is not in all member states subrogated to the creditor's personal rights against the debtor, if any; moreover, even where such a subrogation takes place, it is based upon various grounds.

(a) No subrogation unless stipulated for by the parties

9. In BELGIUM, GERMANY, the NETHERLANDS, PORTUGAL and SPAIN, according to prevailing opinion there is no subrogation by operation of law. The relevant provisions for dependent personal securities (BELGIAN CC art. 2029; DUTCH CC art. 6:142; GERMAN CC § 774; PORTUGUESE CC art. 644; SPANISH CC art. 1839) are said to be inapplicable to independent personal securities (BELGIUM: RPDB, Les garanties bancaires autonomes no. 173 at 605; Wymeersch, Garanties 97; contra CFI Gand 12 February 1999, RDC 1999 727, note Buyle and Delierneux in a controversial case where an independent security was assumed by a consumer acting outside of any professional activity and intended to grant a dependent security; GERMANY: Staudinger/Horn no. 228 preceding §§ 765 ss.; MünchKomm/Habersack no. 19 preceding § 765; contra: Canaris no. 1112; NETHERLANDS: CA Amsterdam 18 August 2000, JOR 2000 no. 205; Dutch Business Law § 6.05 [4] [c]; PORTUGAL: STJ 13 November 1990, CJ XV, V-187; SPAIN: Sanchez-Calero, El contrato autónomo 401). In BELGIUM it is not possible either to base subrogation on the general rules on subrogation laid down in CC art. 1251 (RPDB, Les garanties bancaires autonomes no. 174). In GERMANY, however, in most cases the parties will have – impliedly – stipulated for the transfer of the right to performance of the secured obligation; in the absence of such a stipulation the beneficiary may in view of the security purpose be obliged to assign the right to performance of the secured obligation (Staudinger/Horn no. 228 preceding §§ 765 ss.).

(b) Subrogation by analogy to dependent personal security

10. In AUSTRIA, FRANCE, GREECE and ITALY prevailing opinion bases subrogation on the analogous application of the relevant provisions for dependent personal securities. These provisions may be of a general nature (AUSTRIAN CC § 1358; OGH 9 December 1997, SZ 60 no. 266, p. 694, 698-700; Avancini/Iro/Koziol no. 3/64; FRENCH CC art. 1251 no. 3; pro Simler no. 1001; contra Gavalda and Stoufflet no. 29) or may be specific for dependent personal securities (GREEK CC art. 858; ITALIAN CC art. 1949; but sometimes the subrogation is thought to be based upon the more general provision of CC art. 1203 no. 3: Portale, Fideiussione 1071; Calderale, Fideiussione 265, 267 s.). In GREEK law, however, there is a subrogation only if the provider of independent security has a right of reimbursement against the debtor or can prove justified benevolent intervention (CC art. 736; Georgiades § 6 no. 126 no. 19; CA Athens 3573/1970, EEN 38, 655-656).

11. Also in DANISH and SWEDISH law the provider of independent security is subrogated to the creditor's rights against the debtor (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 86; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 183 ss., 198 ss.), since especially in SWEDEN (as well as in FINLAND) the independent personal security is more or less identified with the dependent personal security.

(c) Subrogation by nature of the independent personal security

12. In ENGLISH law subrogation results from the nature of the contract of independent personal security and is founded on equitable principles (Morris v. Ford Motor Co. Ltd. [1973] QB 792). Subrogation in this context does not amount to an assignment of the (legal) right of action to the security provider (Morris v. Ford Motor Co. Ltd., above; John Edwards & Co. v. Motor Union Insurance Co. Ltd. [1922] 2 KB 249, 253). In the absence of an agreed assignment proper, rights against the debtor can only be pursued in the creditor's name (Morris v. Ford Motor Co. Ltd., above; Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd v. Hall Russell & Co. Ltd. [1989] AC 643). The security provider may upon tender of a proper indemnity as to costs compel the creditor to allow the use of the creditor's name (John Edwards & Co. v. Motor Union Insurance Co., above; Yorkshire Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Nisbet Shipping Co. Ltd. [1962] 2 QB 330, 339; see generally O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 12-357 ss.), either in separate proceedings or by joining the creditor as defendant in the action against the debtor (cf. Mitchell 37).

IV. Subrogation to security rights held by the creditor

13. In addition to subrogation to the creditor's personal rights against the debtor, in AUSTRIA, DENMARK, FINLAND and FRANCE the provider of independent security is equally subrogated to the personal and proprietary security rights held by the creditor, as a surety is (AUSTRIA: CC § 1358 sentence 2; DENMARK: Pedersen, Bankgarantier 83 ss.; FINLAND: LDepGuar § 30; FRANCE: Malaurie and Aynès, Les obligations no. 1213). In ENGLAND, the provider of independent security is thought to be in a similar situation (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 12-357 ss.); however, here the provider of independent security cannot enforce the creditor's rights in the security provider's own name, but is merely entitled to sue in the name of the creditor, cf. preceding note.

14. According to GREEK CC art. 458 and GERMAN CC §§ 412, 401 – if the secured obligation is transferred according to the preceding rules (above nos. 9 ss.) – the provider of independent security is ex lege subrogated only to the accessory security rights held by the creditor (Georgiades § 6 no. 126). Independent security rights have to be transferred by agreement of the parties.

V. Part performance: Priority of creditor's remaining rights

15. In case of part performance FRANCE and DENMARK attribute priority to the creditor's remaining rights over the rights of the provider of independent security (FRENCH CC art. 1252; cf. Simler nos. 592 and 1001; DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 87).

16. In GERMANY, opinions on the corresponding application of the relevant provision for dependent security are divided (cf. Staudinger/Horn no. 228 preceding §§ 765 ss.), but a majority refuses it. Therefore, in case of partial payment, the relevant rule in CC § 774 paragraph 1 sentence 2 does not apply (Staudinger/Horn § 774 no. 61)

17. There is no equivalent to the above-mentioned FRENCH or DANISH rule in ENGLISH law, since it is the prevailing view that subrogation only occurs if the creditor is paid in full (cf. more fully national notes on IV.G.–2:113 no. 31).

VI. Application to documentary credits

18. The issuing bank's right to reimbursement in (stand-by) letter of credit transactions is evident (BELGIUM: De Vuyst nos. 96–97 at 53-54; ENGLAND: Goode, Commercial Law 954; FRANCE: Ripert and Roblot no. 2428; GERMAN CC § 670; Schütze no. 116; Canaris no. 968; GREEK CC art. 722; Georgiades § 11 no. 85; PORTUGAL: Vaz Serra, Note on acordão de 16. 6. 1970, at 173).

19. It is less clear whether an additional right of subrogation exists. In ENGLISH and GREEK law this question is not discussed since the paying bank acquires a legal pledge on the goods represented by the bill of lading (ENGLAND: Sale Continuation Ltd. v. Austin Taylor & Co. Ltd. [1968] 2 QB 849; Jack, Malek and Quest nos. 11.3 s.; GREECE: DL 17 July/18 August 1923 art. 25 § 2). Similarly, in GERMANY subrogation is denied because the bank is regarded as sufficiently secured by the principal's advance (CC § 669) and the security rights agreed upon in the bank's standard terms (Schütze no. 118; Canaris nos. 968, 970).

CHAPTER 4: SPECIAL RULES FOR PERSONAL SECURITY OF CONSUMERS

IV.G.–4:101: Scope of application

(1) Subject to paragraph (2), this Chapter applies when a security is provided by a consumer.

(2) This Chapter is not applicable if:

(a) the creditor is also a consumer; or

(b) the consumer security provider is able to exercise substantial influence upon the debtor where the debtor is not a natural person.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article delimits the personal scope of application of the special rules established in Chapter 4 for the protection of consumer providers of personal security.

The key term "consumer" is defined in Annex 1 and need not therefore be explained here.

B. Assumption of personal security

The assumption of a personal security by the security provider usually – except in certain commercial relations – merely contains obligations of the security provider in favour of the creditor; the latter's acceptance of the terms offered by the security provider often is not explicit and therefore requires special regulation, cf. IV.G.– 1:103 (Creditor's acceptance). As far as the contents of the security contract is concerned, this is governed by the general principle of freedom of contract. Such freedom, however, is strongly limited by the rules in this Chapter for security obligations assumed by consumers.

C. Restrictions of the personal scope of application

Paragraph (2) of the Article restricts the application of Chapter 4 in two ways: the Chapter does not apply if either the creditor is also a consumer; or if the security provider can exercise substantial influence upon the debtor, provided the latter is not a natural person.

The creditor is also a consumer. If not only the security provider, but also the creditor is a consumer, typically there is no necessity of protecting the security provider. The creditor as consumer typically is on the same level of sophistication as the security provider; usually both are weak parties. Therefore, the ordinary contract rules should apply.

It would be inadequate to require a typical consumer in the position of the creditor to comply with the special rules of care, duties of information and formality established by IV.G.–4:103 and 4:105. Due to ignorance of these requirements, many otherwise impeccable contracts of personal security would be void or at least avoidable by the security provider. That risk is unacceptable.

Of course, sometimes the creditor, although a consumer, may be more shrewd than the security provider and may therefore "drive a hard bargain" by imposing inequitable terms on the security provider. In such cases, the security provider may invoke the general protective rules on unfair contract terms in Book II, Chapter 9, Section 4.

The consumer security provider with substantial influence upon the debtor who is not a natural person. The exclusion in paragraph (2)(b) is inspired by legislation and court practice in some member states. Natural persons who are closely affiliated – whether by legal bonds or by factual influence – with a company, whether or not a legal entity, do not deserve the normal protection afforded to a consumer. Of course, in many cases such persons, in providing a personal security for company obligations, are acting in a commercial capacity, e.g. as managers or directors of a company which has taken credit. However, in practice sometimes major non-commercial shareholders of such a company assume a personal security for financial obligations of the company.

Paragraph (2)(b) uses the terms "able to exercise". It is not required that the person has in fact exercised substantial influence since it would be difficult for an outsider to determine and prove the exercise of such influence in the case at hand. What is decisive is the ability of the security provider to exercise such influence. This ability may rest upon legal grounds, e.g. as a holder of the majority of the shares. But it may also be based upon factual circumstances, e.g. as the younger and energetic wife of a majority shareholder. Obviously, this is a factual issue which has to be decided in the light of all the relevant facts.

On the application of the provision to a case of co-debtorship for security purposes, see Comments on IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes).

D. Mandatory provision

This Article is a mandatory provision in favour of the consumer security provider. See paragraph (2) of the following Article.

NOTES

I. Scope of consumer protection provisions in the Member States

1. The scope of the consumer protection provisions in the area of personal security differs between the individual member states in at least two ways. Firstly, there are different concepts of "consumer" (cf. national notes on IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) nos. 49 ss.). Not only do the member states apply different criteria as to when a person qualifies as a consumer but there is also no unanimity in general as to whether the security provider or the debtor has to be a consumer in order for specific consumer protection provisions to apply (cf. especially national notes on IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) nos. 63-66). While within the context of these Rules it is the person of the security provider who is decisive, there is also national consumer protection legislation focussing on the person of the debtor. Such legislation is covered in so far as it indirectly provides protection also for the security provider specifically in relation to consumer matters. Secondly, not all member states embrace the general idea of these Rules, i.e. to apply the consumer protection provisions to all types of personal securities (on the different levels of protection of consumer security providers in the member states, as well as on future perspectives of European regulation in that subject matter, see the research project by the Centre of European Law and Politics at the University of Bremen – ZERP – in co-operation with the University of Oxford, cf. Colombi Ciacchi, Unfair suretyships 281 ss.; Colombi Ciacchi (ed.), Protection of Non-Professional Sureties in Europe: Formal and Substantive Disparity, Baden-Baden, forthcoming 2007).

2. The AUSTRIAN consumer protection provisions apply to several types of personal security, especially dependent and independent personal securities (ConsProtA §§ 25b para. 2, 25c and 25d) as well as assumptions of debt or co-debtorship (§§ 25a para. 1, 25c, 25d). These provisions do not apply to contracts between an employee and an employer (§ 1 para. 4); any form of security assumed by an employee securing a monetary obligation of the employer towards creditors is forbidden and void (KautSchG §§ 1 and 4). However, the courts also apply the exception corresponding to paragraph (2) (b) of this Article (cf. no. 32 below) in the present context: OGH 20 February 2003, ÖBA 2003, 957. For GERMAN parallels, cf. no. 22 below.

3. Also in BELGIUM, the main rules applicable to consumer personal securities (ConsCredA arts. 34-37) apply to all personal securities granted in order to secure debts arising from a consumer-credit agreement (not only dependent but also independent personal securities, Forges 331 no. 195; Lettany 221 no. 253 at 221).

4. Besides the general rules designed to protect the consumer, the most relevant ENGLISH and SCOTTISH legislation, the ConsCredA and the Consumer Credit (Guarantees and Indemnities) Regulations 1983 (cf. reg. 2), apply to both dependent and independent (i.e. indemnities) personal securities. Further, it seems that the assumption of debt for security purposes is equally covered, since "security" is given a very wide meaning in ConsCredA sec. 189. The UnfContTA 1977 contains a specific consumer protection provision in s. 3, according to which a contractual term which would exclude or reduce one party's liability cannot be relied upon against a consumer (or any other person where the other party deals on written standard terms of business). However, since the ENGLISH law of personal security typically does not protect the security provider by imposing liabilities on the creditor, but by discharging the security provider, this provision is of limited assistance against typical standard terms used by professional creditors to the disadvantage of the consumer security provider: these terms purport to preserve the liability of the security provider despite the occurrence of certain events which would in the absence of any agreement to the contrary lead to a release of the security provider, but these terms normally do not aim at the restriction or reduction of the liability of the creditor (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 4-160 s.). Whether also the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 are applicable to security transactions is open to some doubt (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 4-163 ss.; Andrews and Millett, nos. 3-036 ss.). Even if these provisions were applicable it is argued that "all monies" terms, i.e. terms extending the security provider's obligation to all sums due by the debtor to the creditor – if written in a plain intelligible language – should not be subject to assessment under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, since they are said to fall within the ambit of reg. 6 paragraph 2 (a) by defining part of the main subject matter of the contract (Hapgood 719; for the contrary view see O´Donovan and Phillips no. 4-173). The banks, however, have bound themselves in no. 13.4 of the Banking Code (version March 2008) not to take unlimited personal securities by personal customers.

5. In FINLAND the Law on Consumer Protection chap. 4 §§ 1-4 regulates the protection of consumers. According to chap. 1 § 2a the provisions in chap. 4 apply to the Finnish

Law on Dependent Personal Securities. The type of a personal security is irrelevant in this context as the Law on Dependent Personal Securities also applies to independent personal securities – but not to those on first demand – (RP 189/1998 rd 17).

6. In FRANCE the consumer legislation, first on Consumer Credit (Loi Neiertz 1989) and later on all types of credit (Loi Dutreuil 2003) applies to dependent personal securities only (cf. respectively ConsC arts. L. 313-7 ss. – in particular art. L. 313-10-1 – and L. 341-1 ss.).

7. The GERMAN ConsCredA that has been integrated with some modifications into CC §§ 491 ss. as of 1 January 2002 is not applicable to dependent personal securities (BGH 21 April 1998, BGHZ 138, 321; Erman/Saenger § 491 no. 21; approvingly: Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht no. 476), but by analogy to assumptions of debt for security purposes (BGH 8 November 2005, WM 2006, 81; BGH 5 June 1996, BGHZ 133, 71, 77 ss.). The applicability to independent personal securities is uncertain. The GERMAN Law on the Revocation of Doorstep Transactions, that has now been integrated into CC §§ 312 ff, is according to common opinion of courts and writers generally applicable to dependent personal securities (cf. only Erman/Saenger § 312 nos. 28 s. with further references). The applicability to other instruments of personal security is still uncertain (cf. Erman/Saenger § 312 no. 30). The Law on Standard terms that was especially intended to protect from surprising or unfair terms and has been integrated with some modifications into CC §§ 305 ff applies to all types of contracts including contracts granting security.

8. It is assumed that the GREEK ConsProtA is to apply to every form of onerous contract (Georgiades § 3 no. 85). The personal security is regarded as an onerous contract since the security provider undertakes a burdensome obligation vis-à-vis the creditor (Georgiades § 3 no. 102). Hence, the security provider is always considered to be a consumer as defined in ConsProtA art. 1 para. 4 lit. a) (except if assuming the security as part of a profession) and for this reason is deemed to be an amateur and inexperienced, despite the fact that technically the debtor and not the security provider is the "final receiver" of goods or services (Georgiades § 3 no. 86). In addition, this wide meaning of the purpose of the ConsProtA speaks for the application of the consumer protective provisions to every form of security.

9. The IRISH ConsCredA covers only "contracts of guarantee" (cf. s. 2); it seems that this term is to be understood as being restricted to dependent personal securities. Concerning the applicability of the European Communities (Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts) Regulations 1995, it seems that this must be subject to the same doubts as in ENGLISH law (cf. no. 4 above), since the relevant provisions on the scope of application in the IRISH regulations (reg. 3 para. 1) resemble the ENGLISH provisions (reg. 4 para. 1).

10. ITALIAN ConsC arts. 33-38 on abusive terms are applicable to every contract concluded between a consumer and a professional (Calvo 69 ss. with reference to the previous CC arts. 1469*bis*-1469*sexies*, which have been replaced by DLgs no. 206 of 6 September 2005, ConsC); therefore they apply to both dependent as well as independent personal securities (Falcone 86 ss.). According to the interpretation developed by the Supreme Court, even if the security provider is not a consumer, consumer protection rules should nevertheless apply if the debtor of the secured obligation is a consumer (Cass. 11 January 2001 no. 314, Foro it. 2001 I 1589; Cass. 13 May 2005 no. 10107, Foro it. Mass. 2005, 1203).

11. In the NETHERLANDS, the CC contains in Book 7 both general rules on personal security (arts. 7:850-7:870) and, embedded into these, some specific rules on dependent personal security assumed by consumers (arts. 7:857-7:864).

12. The PORTUGUESE Law on General Contractual Terms (DL no. 446/85 of 25 October 1985) also applies to contracts granting security (STJ 28 May 2002, 1506/02 www.dgsi.pt for contracts of dependent personal security). As to the application of other consumer legislation to security providers there is neither case law nor specific literature. The Law on the Banks´ Duty of Information (DL 220/94 from 23 Aug. 1994), however, expressly excludes in art. 2 lit. a) contracts granting security from its scope.

13. In the SCANDINAVIAN member states other than FINLAND the protection of consumer security providers is hardly regulated (very critical on this Andersen and Møgelvang-Hansen 39 ss., 78 ss.). However, the DANISH ContrA §§ 36 and 38a ss. and the SWEDISH ContrA § 36 read with Law on Terms of Contracts in Consumer Relationships § 11 apply to both types of personal securities.

14. Although personal securities are very frequently provided by private persons in SPAIN there are no cases on the application of consumer legislation to personal securities, so that the legal situation is uncertain on this point. Literally, the new General Consumer Protection Act 2007 covers in its scope the consumer giving security, i.e. the security provider who, although not acting as an acquirer of a product or service, does not act as a professional or business actor. On the other hand, a contract of personal security does not fall under the scope of Law no. 7/1995 (ConsCredA) art. 1, the content of which corresponds to the one of Directive 87/102 on Consumer Credit (Carrasco a.o. 92).

15. For references on exceptional situations, in which at least some member states do not apply their relevant consumer protection provisions on contracts of personal security although the security provider is a consumer, see nos. 29 ss. Below.

II. Application of general rules and principles of law

16. In most member states, protection for typically weak parties is apart from specific consumer protection provisions also derived from the application of general rules and principles of law. For protection of typically weak parties through information requirements and similar institutions based upon rules of general application see the national notes to IV.G.–4:103 (Creditor's precontractual duty of information) nos. 27 ss.

17. The AUSTRIAN Supreme Court has developed three main criteria for determining whether the assumption of a dependent personal security is void as infringing good morals (CC § 879 para. 2 no. 4): (1) an obvious discrepancy between the amount of the security and the economic capacity of the security provider; (2) the circumstances of the assumption of the security, including the "thinning" of the free will of the security provider due to family solidarity; and (3) the knowledge or negligent ignorance of these factors on the part of the creditor (leading case: OGH 30 June 1998, SZ 71 no. 117 at p. 125 s.; further OGH 28 June 2000, JBl. 2000, 794, 795). In 1997 the legislator enacted a specific rule for personal securities of consumers which has similar, although less stringent prerequisites, but provides for a judicial right to mitigate the obligation of the security provider (ConsProtA § 25d). On the co-existence of this provision and the former case law, cf. OGH 28 June 2000, above.

18. In BELGIUM the creditor should see to it that the contract of personal security is drafted precisely, since any inaccuracy is interpreted in favour of the security provider, whereas the creditor may also be liable for it (Van Quickenborne no. 423). Specifically BELGIAN ConsCredA art. 38 § 3 protects the security provider for a consumer credit whose financial situation has aggravated at the time of the creditor's demand: the security provider can apply to a judge for respites of payment in the same way as a consumer debtor could.

19. Under DANISH law, weak security providers enjoy statutory protection under the general provisions of ContrA §§ 36 and 38a ff.

20. In ENGLISH law, there have been attempts to introduce a broad concept of inequality of bargaining power which was intended to give protection amongst others to security providers in situations where the parties had not met on equal terms (cf. Lloyds Bank v. Bundy [1975] QB 326). The House of Lords, however, later rejected this general principle (National Westminster Bank Plc. v. Morgan [1985] AC 686). It has been argued, however, that in ENGLISH law situations in which such a principle could be relevant are to a great extent solved on the basis of the principle of undue influence (cf. national notes on IV.G.–4:103 no. 30). Sometimes also the application of the principle of unconscionability has been suggested, but no decision has been based in relation to securities on this concept yet (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 4-155 ss.).

21. In FRANCE the creditor must ascertain whether the engagement of the provider of dependent security is proportionate to the provider's financial capacity, otherwise damages for contractual liability may fall due (principle of proportionality: Cass.civ. 6 April 2004, Bull.civ. 2004 I no. 110 p. 90). According to FRENCH consumer legislation, the consumer security provider's obligations are not enforceable if the latter's engagement was at the time of contracting obviously disproportional in respect of his or her financial possibilities unless the assets are sufficient at the time of performance. This protective rule on proportionality applies not only to consumers (ConsC art. L. 313-10 for consumer credit), but since the "Loi Dutreuil" of August 2003 even if the debtor is a professional (ConsC art. L. 341-4 for all credit types). Prior to this Law which extends consumer protection to all debts irrespective of their nature, the creditor could be also liable in the case of excessive engagement, but the provider of dependent security was only partially discharged under CC art. 1382 ("Macron decision" Cass.com. 17 June 1997, JCP E 1997, II no. 1007, note Legeais; Cass.civ. 9 July 2003, JCP 2003, II no. 1590, note Casey). The damage suffered was the difference between the amount of the security and the financing capacity of the debtor. The Grimaldi Commission proposed to restrict this protective rule to consumers (CC proposed new art. 2305, excluding securities assumed by entrepreneurs cf. "Nahoum decision" Cass.com. 8 October 2002, RTD civ 2003, 125 ss.; Cass.com. 25 March 2003, RD banc 2003, 207, note Legeais). According to this proposal the liability of the security provider was to be reduced instead of the unenforceability of the security contract or the liability of the creditor. However, this proposal was not enacted by the legislator of 2006.

22. After two interventions of the GERMAN Federal Constitutional Court (BVerfG 19 October 1993, BVerfGE 89, 214 = NJW 1994, 36; BVerfG 5 August 1994, NJW 1994, 2749; for former court practice cf. only Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht nos. 174–180) the GERMAN Supreme Court has developed on the basis of the rule on immoral transactions (CC § 138) a specific practice to protect security providers who assume dependent personal securities that by far exceed their financial possibilities because of their personal relationship to the debtor. Unfortunately, the two divisions of the Supreme Court that were until December 2000 competent for personal security cases were in agreement on this target but not on the extent nor on the methods to achieve it.

23. According to the practice of the now exclusively competent division XI (for the extremely differential practice of division IX see the summaries of Reinicke and Tiedtke, Bürgschaftsrecht nos. 182–209; Erman/Palm § 138 nos. 90 ss.) dependent personal securities as well as assumptions of debt for security purpose that have been assumed vis-à-vis banks or other commercial or professional credit grantors (BGH 13 November 2001, NJW 2002, 746) are presumed to be immoral if (1) the security provider assumes a personal security to an extent that extremely overcharges the provider's actual and expected future financial situation and (2) if there is a relationship of proximity (Näheverhältnis) between debtor and security provider, as e.g. parents to children or between spouses (summary in BGH 29 June 1999, NJW 1999, 2584; BGH 4 December 2001, NJW 2002, 744 – with reaction to criticism). It is presumed that under these circumstances the security provider assumed the personal security only on the basis of emotional closeness to the debtor and that the creditor took advantage of these circumstances fraudulently (BGH 4 December 2001 above). In one case these rules were also applied to a dependent personal security assumed by an employee with a modest salary for a bank credit granted to the employer; the employee provided the security in the hope of protecting the workplace, a hope which quickly failed (BGH 14 October 2003, ZIP 2003, 2193). It is an indication of an extreme overcharge if the security provider will probably not even be able to cover at least the agreed interest for the secured credit (BGH 29 June 1999, NJW 1999, 2588). However, the transaction is not immoral if the security provider receives a direct monetary advantage from the secured credit (BGH 29 June 1999, NJW 1999, 2584, 2588; for details reference is made to Fischer, WM 2001, 1056–1059; Erman/Palm § 138 nos. 90 ss.) or if it serves as a counter-performance for an employer's legitimate claim for damages caused by an employee in a somewhat elevated position (LAG Köln 12 December 2002, EWiR 2003, 1129). Cf. also no. 2 above.

24. In GREECE, protection for weak providers of personal security is based upon the principle of bona fides laid down in GREEK CC arts. 281, 178–179, 371–372 and 288 which can also be applied for the protection of consumers (GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 80).

25. In ITALY, the principle of good faith (CC art. 1375) has been broadly applied to global securities (fideiussioni omnibus) by the courts in order to determine the secured obligation before Law of 17 February 1992 no. 154, art. 10 introduced in CC art. 1938 the requirement that a maximum amount for the security must be fixed (Cass. 15 March 1991 no. 2790, Foro it. 1991 I 2060; Cass. 25 August 1992 no. 9839, Foro it. 1993 I 2172; Cass. 7 October 1993 no. 9936, Giust.civ.Mass. 1993, 1449; Cass. 28 March 1994 no. 3003, Giust.civ.Mass. 1994, 405; Cass. 14 June 1999 no. 5872, Giust.civ.Mass. 1999, 1367; De Nictolis 222 ss.; 322 ss. with references).

26. In PORTUGAL the principle of good faith laid down in CC arts. 334, 227, 272, 475 etc. is applied also for the protection of consumers (cf. STJ 25 November 1992, 81181 www.dgsi.pt; STJ 22 February 2000, 995/99 www.dgsi.pt).

27. Also the SPANISH CC art. 7 which contains the principle of good faith is applied for the protection of consumers. However, there are no special legal or court rules applicable to consumers as security providers; as a security provider, the consumer who grants a guarantee is not protected beyond the general protection afforded to every guarantor. The protection granted to a consumer as a consumer flows only from the general law on consumer contracts (ConsProtA arts. 59-91), not from the security law.

28. In SWEDEN the general rules in ContrA § 36 read with Act on Terms of Contracts in Consumer Relationships § 11 are available for the protection of weak providers of security as well.

III. Non-applicability of consumer protection provisions in specific circumstances

29. In certain situations some member states expressly declare – even if the security provider is a consumer – that their relevant consumer protection regimes (cf. nos. 2 ss. above) are not to be applicable.

(a) Non-applicability if creditor is also a consumer

30. The most important AUSTRIAN consumer protection provisions apply only if the creditor is an entrepreneur (§ 3 para. 1 ConsProtA for doorstep transactions and §§ 25a-25d ConsProtA for consumer security providers). The special legislation generally prohibiting dependent security to be furnished by an employee in favour of the employer applies even if the employer is a consumer (§ 1 para. 1 KautSchG). The GERMAN special protective rules for doorstep transactions of consumers and for consumer credit debtors apply only if the creditor is an entrepreneur (CC § 312 para. 1 and § 491 para. 1, respectively). Under ENGLISH and ITALIAN law, however, the applicability of consumer protection provisions to personal security transactions does not depend upon whether the creditor is not also a consumer (for the relevant criteria see national notes to IV.G.–1:101 no. 67 for ENGLISH law; no. 66 for ITALIAN law). The same is true in FRANCE for some provisions related to secured consumer credit (ConsC arts. L. 313-7 to 313-8). But in other cases consumer provisions do not apply if the creditor is also a consumer (for all credit types: ConsC arts. L. 341-1 to 341-6 requiring a "créancier professionnel"; for consumer credit: ConsC arts. L. 313-9 and L. 313-10).

(b) Non-applicability if security provider has special relationship to debtor company

31. In a few countries it is expressly provided that officers of a company who assume a security covering an obligation owed by the company may not be regarded as consumers. This is so in the NETHERLANDS, provided the officer alone or together with colleagues holds the majority of the shares and provided further the officer was acting in the normal exercise of the business of the company (DUTCH CC art. 7:857). While there do not seem to be any cases on this provision, some decisions on CC art. 1:88 para. 5 are relevant since the latter has the same wording as the second part of art. 7:857. In one case the Supreme Court extended the scope of CC art. 1:88 para. 5 to a situation where the officer held all the shares of intermediate holding companies and was also the director of them (HR 11 July 2003, NJ 2004 no. 173 at p. 1459 s. with an express reference to the corresponding provision of CC art. 7:857). In another case the Court held that there is no "normal" exercise of business if a security is granted in the context of an inter-company financial transaction between several companies "owned" by three brothers; the only effect was to redistribute debts between these companies, but it did not secure fresh capital (HR 14 April 2000, NJ 2000 no. 689 at p. 4755). The FINNISH definition of this exception is even broader since it covers, without reference to activity, not only officers but also direct or indirect holders of at least one third of the shares of the debtor company or of a parent company (LDepGuar § 2 no. 6).

32. The AUSTRIAN Supreme Court has held in two cases that the sole shareholder of a company who acts as manager for "its" company in assuming a personal security for an obligation of the company does not have the status of a consumer (OGH 11 February 2002, SZ 2002 no. 18 at p. 133; OGH 25 June 2003, ÖBA 2004, 143, 145). In one case, even a manager who held 25% of the shares was denied that status as well (OGH 20 February 2003, ÖBA 2003, 957). By contrast, "according to settled case law" the manager of a company who does not hold shares in it is in such cases regarded as a consumer (OGH 24 November 2005, JBl. 2006, 384, 387 with references; OGH 26 September 1991, ÖBA 1992, 578).

33. The GERMAN courts distinguish, in fact, between the assumption of co-debtorships and other ordinary personal security. It is now settled case law of the Federal Supreme Court that the co-debtorship even of a sole shareholder and director for the obligations of the company is subject to the rules on consumer protection (BGH 8 November 2005, WM 2006, 81, 82 ss.; 28 June 2000, BGHZ 144, 370, 380 ss.; 5 June 1996, BGHZ 133, 71, 77 s.). On the other hand, the Court excludes shareholders, directors and other persons who exercise considerable influence on the debtor company from its specific protective practice concerning global guarantees. Furthermore, the protective practice in favour of close relatives (cf. nos. 22 s. above) generally does not apply to shareholders either since the creditor has a justified interest in involving them in securing a credit granted to the company; only small shareholders – the limit appears to be 10% – are excepted (BGH 10 December 2002, ZIP 2003, 288 at 289 with numerous references).

34. It may be added that ITALIAN courts have developed another specific consequence of the existence of a special relationship between a (consumer) security provider and the non-consumer debtor: in certain cases where a spouse provides personal security for a business credit of the other spouse and this financial support is proved to be indispensable to the business activity, the courts assume that a de facto company between the two spouses exists, i.e. the security provider is regarded as a partner (with or even without limitation of personal liability, as the case might be) in the enterprise of the other spouse (Cass. 14 February 2003 no. 2200, Giust.civ. 2003 I 1220); however, additional indications for an implied intention of the parties to create such a de facto company must be present, such as the sharing of the profits (Cass. 23 December 1982 no. 7119, Giur.comm. 1983 II 847; CFI Napoli 25 March 1996, Riv.Notar. 1996, 1240; CFI Catania 15 July 1992, Dir.fall. 1993 II 167; Galgano 66; Bronzini 167). In such cases, insolvency proceedings can be opened also against this de facto company, which extend even to the consumer security provider as a partner in this company; in these proceedings, the consumer security provider can be held solidarily liable with all assets to all the creditors of the enterprise (not only the creditor of the obligation under the security), typically not even limited to the maximum amount of the security. This is particularly true if the security provider did not act for remuneration and the right of recourse against the principal debtor is excluded (CFI Napoli 12 December 1996, BBTC 1998 II 84 ss.).

IV.G.–4:102: Applicable rules

(1) A personal security subject to this Chapter is governed by the rules of Chapters 1 and 2, except as otherwise provided in this Chapter.

(2) The parties may not, to the detriment of a security provider, exclude the application of the rules of this Chapter or derogate from or vary their effects.

COMMENTS

A. Introduction

Paragraph (1) provides that the general rules of Chapters 1 and 2 apply to personal security provided by consumers, subject to the provisions of the present Chapter, while paragraph (2) fixes and specifies the mandatory character of the applicable rules.

B. Applicable rules

The applicability of Chapter 1 means that the general rules on personal security contained in that Chapter also apply – subject to any special rules established in Chapter 4 – to personal security assumed by a consumer.

In particular, the present Chapter also applies to a co-debtorship for security purposes. If one of the co-debtors is a consumer, the present Chapter 4 is applicable to that security provider; this is already spelt out in IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes). In addition to the present Chapter – and subject to its special provisions – also the regime for the protection of the security provider in Chapter 2 applies to a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes by virtue of the reference to that Chapter which is contained in paragraph (1). The application of Chapter 2 is justified by the fact that the rules on dependent security make it the mildest form of security; and this is reinforced by the fact that, when applied to a consumer, those rules may not be derogated from to the disadvantage of the consumer, cf. paragraph (2) of the present Article. By contrast, a general co-debtorship without security purpose is only subject to Book III, Chapter 4, Section 1.

Also the set of rules on the rights and obligations of several security providers (IV.G.– 1:105–1:107) apply to consumer security providers.

The applicability of Chapter 2 means that the general rules on dependent personal security also apply to personal security assumed by consumers. Since Chapter 3 on independent personal security is not mentioned in paragraph (2), personal security by consumers can only be granted as a dependent personal security. This conclusion is explicitly confirmed by IV.G.–4:105 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c).

While, generally speaking, Chapter 2 applies to a consumer's personal security, that general principle is subject to many exceptions. In fact, all the substantive rules of Chapter 4 derogate from, or supplement, the rules of Chapter 2 on dependent personal security. These supplements and derogations will be set out and explained in the Comments to the relevant rules.

C. Mandatory character of Chapter 4

As is usual for provisions serving the protection of consumers (or other weak parties), paragraph (2) provides that the parties to a personal security may not deviate to the disadvantage of a consumer security provider from the rules of this Part.

It is to be noted first, that this prohibition covers not only Chapter 4, but all the rules on personal security in this Part. Only by extending the protection of the consumer security provider beyond Chapter 4 to all the other Chapters is full protection assured. Also the negative implication of paragraph (1), namely the non-access of consumers to furnishing independent personal security is covered.

The consumer provider of personal security is protected against any deviation "to the disadvantage of a consumer security provider" from the rules of this Part. Deviations that are favourable for the consumer security provider are allowed. It is impossible to give an abstract definition of a disadvantageous deviation and neither is it possible to give a complete catalogue. Two general criteria must in each case be fulfilled. First, the specific instrument or contract or term must deviate from the specific rules in Chapters 1 to 4. And secondly, this deviation must be to the disadvantage of the consumer security provider. Out of dozens of possibly disadvantageous deviations, two specific cases may be offered for purposes of Illustration:

> Illustration 1
> According to a very frequently used term the creditor maintains all rights against the security provider until the debtor of the secured obligation has completely performed any outstanding obligation. This term deviates in case of partial repayment of the credit from IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (1) and is therefore void.
>
> Illustration 2
> Another term used in practice provides that the security provider remains liable, even if the creditor, for whatever reasons, fails to exercise all available rights against the debtor or another security provider. This term deviates from IV.G.–2:110 and is therefore void.

Each disadvantageous deviation as such is relevant. It is not possible to "compensate" one negative deviation by another positive deviation in favour of a consumer, since it would be difficult, if not impossible to attach relative weights to the one and the other factor.

The consequence of any disadvantageous deviation from the rules of this Part is not spelt out expressly. However, the clear implication of paragraph (2) is that a prohibited deviation is void. This nullity primarily affects the prohibited term of the contract. In general, the remaining part of the contract continues in effect; however, if the balance of the remaining rights and obligations of the parties would be fundamentally affected in favour of one of the parties and it would be unreasonable to uphold the remaining part of the contract, then the entire contract may become void. See II.–1:108 (Partial invalidity or ineffectiveness). An abstract formula for the decision whether or not to uphold the remaining part of the contract cannot be offered. Obviously, everything depends upon the circumstances, such as the importance of the prohibited term and the extent and weight of the remaining rights and obligations of the parties to the contract.

NOTES

I. Mandatory character of consumer protection legislation

(a) Deviation to the disadvantage of consumer security providers

1. Where specific rules on personal securities provided by consumers have been enacted, they are mandatory. All provisions of the relevant AUSTRIAN legislation on consumer protection, including the rules on the protection of consumer security providers (§§ 29a-29d) are mandatory in favour of the consumer; contractual deviations therefore have no effect (ConsProtA § 2 para. 2). According to FINNISH LDepGuar § 1 para. 3 the provisions of this Law on the rights and duties of private security providers may not be deviated from to the disadvantage of those security providers. BELGIAN ConsCredA arts. 34-37 on the protection of security providers for credits granted to consumers are mandatory (Forges no. 193 at p. 330; Van der Wielen and Wallemacq 23). One author makes a distinction between professional and non-professional security providers and considers the rules in ConsCredA arts. 34-37 as non-mandatory if the security provider is a professional (Lettany no. 252*bis* at p. 221). In FRENCH consumer law no deviations are admitted, even to the advantage of a consumer security provider (cf. for all credit types: ConsC arts. L 341-1 to 341-6, for consumer credit only: ConsC arts. L 313-7 to 313-10). In DUTCH law there may be no deviations to the detriment of the security provider from CC art. 7:852 to art. 7:856 (general provisions on dependent personal securities) and 7:858 to 7:861 (on dependent personal securities by consumers) and from the obligations which pursuant to art. 6:154 the creditor has toward the security provider in view of a possible subrogation (CC art. 7:862).

(b) Deviations to the disadvantage of consumers in general

2. In other countries such restrictions concerning the dispositive rules which aim to protect the security provider do not exist. However, according to the underlying EU-Directives, in most member states general legislation on consumer protection is mandatory in favour of the consumer so that contracts may not deviate from these rules to the disadvantage of the consumer. This is true e.g. for legislation on consumer credit (DUTCH CC art. 3:40 read with art. 7:862; Hartlief 224; Blomkwist 52-53; GERMAN CC § 506; ITALIAN Banking Law art. 127; SWEDISH Law on Terms of Contracts in Consumer Relationships § 11), on doorstep transactions (GERMAN CC § 312f; ITALY: ConsC art. 143, former DLgs 15 January 1992 no. 50 art. 10 para. 2) and also for the general laws on consumer protection (AUSTRIAN ConsProtA §§ 2(2), 25c; DANISH Law on Certain Consumer Contracts § 28; Andersen, Madsen and Nørgaard 96; PORTUGAL: ConsProtA art. 16(1); SPANISH ConsProtA art. 10).

3. Especially the rules on abusive terms or, more generally, on standard terms may become relevant for a personal security contract whenever they are considered applicable to those contracts (on this specific point see national notes on preceding Article sub I). According to the underlying EU-Directive, they provide that abusive terms are void (ENGLAND and SCOTLAND: Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 reg. 8 para. 1; for the discussion on the applicability of these rules to personal securities cf. national notes to IV.G.–4:101 no. 4; FRENCH ConsC art. L. 132-1 para. 6; GERMAN CC § 307; PORTUGAL: Law on General Contract Terms art. 15; for consumers cf. also section III arts. 20, 21 and 22; for the applicability of this Law to dependent personal security see STJ 12 January 2006, 3756/05 www.dgsi.pt).

4. Also ITALIAN ConsC art. 36 (former CC art. 1469*quinquies*) establishes that abusive terms have no effect. However, it must be noted that the terms listed in ConsC art. 33 (former CC art. 1469*bis*) are not automatically void, but only subject to a rebuttable presumption of abusiveness. Moreover, ConsC art. 34 para. 4 (former CC art. 1469*ter* para. 4) states that terms that have been agreed by individual negotiation with the consumer are valid. Only a few terms listed in ConsC art. 36 para. 2 (former CC art. 1469*quinquies* para. 2) are void notwithstanding individual negotiation (for an application of the control of abusive terms to the model contract of dependent personal security drafted by the Association of Italian Banks see Petti 361 ss.; however, in the field of personal security that kind of control has been of very little relevance in court practice until now, for decisions on the issue are scarce: Cass. 11 January 2001 no. 314, Foro it. 2001 I 1589; Cass. 13 May 2005 no. 10107, Foro it. Mass. 2005, 1203). The model contract provided by the Italian Bank Association contained some terms derogating from the ordinary rules of the civil code for dependent personal securities. The most important one is the term on 'first demand' on the basis of which the security provider has to pay immediately on the creditor's request, but still maintains the right to raise against the creditor any exception the security provider had against the debtor after payment on the security (solve et repete). According to the Bank of Italy – which supervises the application of antitrust law in the banking sector – this term of the model contract does not violate antitrust law (Law no. 287 of 10 October 1990 art. 2). Other terms, however, have to be deleted from the model contract: e.g. the term extending the liability of the security provider to any other obligation of reimbursement arising from the invalidity of any payment on the secured obligation made to the bank; the term extending the security provider's liability to the reimbursement obligation of the debtor arising in case of invalidity of the secured obligation; the term derogating from CC art. 1957 on time limits for the security (Bank of Italy, decision no. 55 of 2 May 2005, www.agcm.it, Bollettino no. 17 of 16 May 2005 p. 97 ss.). Yet, according to ITALIAN case law, this decision does not prohibit such terms from being individually contracted between banks and consumer security providers (CA Torino 27 October 1998, BBTC 2001 II 87; CFI Milano 25 May 2000, BBTC 2001 II 88; CFI Torino 16 October 1997, BBTC 2001 II 87; CFI Alba 12 January 1995, Dir.b.merc.fin. 1996 I 501).

5. The SPANISH law on consumer protection establishes the nullity of general terms contravening this law to the prejudice of the weaker party (adherent) (Consumer Protection Act art. 82). Of special relevance for consumer security contracts is art. 88.1. It states that terms imposing upon the consumer security provider a disproportionate liability are abusive. However, since the rule adds that financing or security contracts negotiated by financial institutions according to their governing laws are presumed not to be disproportionate, the provision is doomed to have no practical relevance (Carrasco a.o. 131).

(c) Consumer's waiver of rights

6. In ENGLAND, FRANCE and ITALY the special laws on consumers´ rights contain rules on the waiver of the rights. In ENGLAND, ConsCredA s. 173 expressly forbids "contracting-out", resulting in the nullity of that particular term. The FRENCH rule on doorstep transactions (ConsC art. L. 121-25 para. 2) provides for the nullity of any waiver of the consumer's right to withdraw. According to ITALIAN ConsC art. 143 para. 1 a waiver of the rights conferred on consumers by the ConsC is void.

7. GERMAN CC § 312f and § 506 prohibit the previous waiver by a consumer of the rights granted by the relevant rules on the revocation of doorstep transactions and on consumer credits, respectively (cf. Palandt/Grüneberg § 312f no. 1 and Palandt/Putzo § 506 nos. 2 s.).

8. Although GREEK ConsProtA does not contain an explicit general provision on the mandatory character of the provisions of this Law, it sanctions with nullity the previous waiver of the right to withdraw from contracts negotiated outside business premises (art. 3 para. 4) and from distance contracts (art. 4 para. 10). Former GREEK ConsProtA (Law no. 1961/1991) art. 3 para. 3 nullified the consumer's waiver of the rights arising from the Law. The lack of such an explicit provision in the new ConsProtA gave rise to doubts regarding the protection of the consumer when he or she was unaware of the existence of general terms waiving all rights arising from the ConsProtA: in this case, the consumer will have already renounced also the right arising from ConsProtA art. 2 para. 1, according to which the terms of which the consumer was unaware do not bind him or her (Alexandridou 290). These doubts are dispelled by accepting, as is commonly done in the legal literature, that rules aiming to preserve the interests of the weaker contracting party like those contained in the ConsProtA are mandatory (Georgiades, General Principles § 5 no. 19).

9. Also in PORTUGAL similar rules prohibiting the waiver of rights conferred by protective consumer legislation exist (cf. ConsProtA art. 16(1) and ConsCredA art. 18(1)).

10. SPANISH CC art. 6(2) allows a voluntary exclusion of applicable law only when this does not contravene public interest or public order and does not prejudice third parties. More specifically, SPANISH ConsProtA art. 10 states that any previous waiver of the consumer's rights contained in the Law is void, whereas sentence 2 of the same provision establishes the nullity of acts in "fraud of the law" and refers to CC art. 6 para. 4, according to which acts realised under the protection of the text of a norm that seek a result prohibited by the legal order or that is contrary thereto are considered in fraud of the law and do not prevent the appropriate application of the law sought to be evaded. Art. 86.7 declares void any term not individually contracted with the consumer whereby the latter waives or limits his or her rights. It has been noticed that this means in effect that the legal regime of dependent personal security – normally non-mandatory – becomes mandatory if the security provider is a consumer. However, the rule is interpreted narrowly so as to limit the nullity of consumers' waivers only to those protective rights which are granted them by the law (Carrasco a.o. 131).

II. Sanctions in case of deviation to the disadvantage of the consumer security provider or consumer in general

11. In most member states deviations to the disadvantage of consumer security providers or consumers in general do not result in the nullity of the whole contract. However, consequences of the breach of the prohibition vary according to national practices.

(a) Partial nullity

12. In DANISH, DUTCH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN and SPANISH law partial nullity does not, as a rule, entail nullity of the whole contract of personal security (DENMARK: Andersen, Madsen and Nørgaard 96; DUTCH CC art. 7:862 (read with art. 3:41); Hartlief 224; Blomkwist 52 s.; FRENCH rules on unfair contract terms integrated into FRENCH ConsC art. L. 132-1 para. 6, FRENCH rules on all credit types (ConsC art. L. 341-3 read with art. L. 341-5) and on Consumer Credit (impliedly ConsC art. L. 311-18), which stipulate a partial nullity for terms imposing solidary liability; ITALIAN ConsC art. 36 para. 1, former CC art. 1469*quinquies* para. 1; Calvo 230 ss.; CA Milano 31 December 1999, Giur.milanese 2000, 222 for the partial nullity of the abusive terms only, in a dependent personal security; SPAIN: Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Instituciones 462). The GERMAN Federal Supreme Court also admits partial nullity of a consumer's co-debtorship for security purposes, provided the void part of the transaction can clearly be separated from the valid remaining part (BGH 14 November 2000, BGHZ 146, 37, 47 ss.). The position is similar in cases of violation of GERMAN CC §§ 305c(1), 307 and GREEK ConsProtA art. 2 para. 1, 6 and 7 (as amended in 1999), i.e. when terms in standard terms are surprising or abusive, these terms do not become part of the contract or are invalid, respectively (GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 97). According to GERMAN CC § 139 and GREEK CC art. 181 partial nullity of a legal transaction provokes in general its complete nullity, unless it may be assumed that the legal transaction would have been entered into even without the void part. But in GERMANY the invalidity of one or more terms in standard terms does not in general affect the validity of the whole contract (CC § 306). By contrast, according to GREEK ConsProtA art. 2 para. 8, only the consumer and not the provider of goods or services may, in this case, invoke the nullity of the whole contract (according to Karakostas 68, GREEK CC art. 181 on the consequences of partial nullity is not applied in this case). According to PORTUGUESE ConsProtA art. 16(3) and DL on General Contract Terms art. 13 the consumer may choose to keep the contract, when some of the terms are void, the general rules or the rules on the integration of contracts being then applicable. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, standard terms which are "unfair" under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 are not "binding on the consumer" (reg. 8(1)); the remaining contract continues to bind the parties, if possible without the unfair term (reg. 8 para. 2).

(b) Reduction and interpretation by the court

13. In AUSTRIA the security provider's obligations may be reduced if the latter's assets were obviously insufficient for performing the personal security (ConsProtA § 25d). In FRANCE the same solution had been suggested by the Grimaldi Commission for the application of the so-called principle of proportionality (CC proposed new 2305): the engagement of the provider of dependent security acting for a private purpose may be reduced if the engagement was manifestly disproportionate to the provider's financial capacity and income, unless at the time of the requested performance the provider is able to perform the obligation; however, this proposal, like most others for a reform of the rules on personal security, was not adopted by the legislator in 2006. According to SPANISH Law 26/1984 (ConsProtA) art. 10*bis* para. 2, abusive terms are considered as not included in the contract. The remaining terms will be integrated and interpreted by the judge, who should modify the rights and obligations of the parties in case of subsistence of the contract and also the consequences of its eventual invalidity in case of considerable prejudice to the consumer. Law 7/1998 on General Contract Terms art. 9 para. 2 makes also reference to the partial nullity (only of the terms or conditions declared invalid according to the Law) and establishes the duty of the court to clarify the validity of the contract in these cases or to declare the nullity of the whole contract if one of its essential elements (according to SPANISH CC art. 1261 consent, object and cause) is affected by this nullity.

(c) Unenforceability

14. In FRANCE the professional creditor cannot enforce the security contract if the engagement of the provider of dependent security was manifestly disproportionate to financial capacity and income, unless at the time of the requested performance the latter is able to perform the obligation (for consumer credit: ConsC art. L. 313-10, even if the debtor is a professional: ConsC art. L. 341-4).

III. Deviations to the benefit of the consumer security provider or consumer in general

15. Deviations to the benefit of the consumer security provider are allowed in DANISH and SPANISH law (DENMARK: Karnov/Kristoffersen 5486 fn. 160; SPANISH CC art. 6(2)). In GERMANY and GREECE, although there is no special provision to that effect, it follows from the general notion of freedom of contract, that deviations which are favourable for the consumer are always possible. In PORTUGAL the same is true (cf. ConsProtA art. 16(1); for a specific example see art. 4(2)). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, the provisions of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 apply only to contractual terms that are detrimental to the consumer (reg. 5 para. 1) (but cf. national notes to IV.G–4:101 no. 4).

16. Exceptionally the FRENCH rules relating to all credit types (ConsC arts. L. 341-1 ff), to consumer credit (ConsC arts. L. 313-7 ff) and to doorstep transactions (ConsC arts. L. 121-23 ff) exclude any deviations even if they are favourable for the consumer.

IV.G.–4:103: Creditor's pre-contractual duties

(1) Before a security is granted, the creditor has a duty to explain to the intending security provider:

(a) the general effect of the intended security; and

(b) the special risks to which the security provider may according to the information accessible to the creditor be exposed in view of the financial situation of the debtor.

(2) If the creditor knows or has reason to know that due to a relationship of trust and confidence between the debtor and the security provider there is a significant risk that the security provider is not acting freely or with adequate information, the creditor has a duty to ascertain that the security provider has received independent advice.

(3) If the information or independent advice required by the preceding paragraphs is not given at least five days before the security provider signs the offer of security or the contract creating the security, the offer can be revoked or the contract avoided by the security provider within a reasonable time after receipt of the information or the independent advice. For this purpose five days is regarded as a reasonable time unless the circumstances suggest otherwise.

(4) If contrary to paragraph (1) or (2) no information or independent advice is given, the offer can be revoked or the contract avoided by the security provider at any time.

(5) If the security provider revokes the offer or avoids the contract according to the preceding paragraphs, the return of benefits received by the parties is governed by Book VII (Unjustified Enrichment).

COMMENTS

A. Need for protection

In view of the risk which any security provider incurs by assuming a personal security of whatever kind, the interest in self-protection should inspire the security provider to obtain as much information as possible from the debtor about the debtor's economic situation. Private persons and even more so business partners often know or at least often will or should be able to find out such information.

Experience in virtually all member states shows, however, that there are many private individuals who either close their eyes to the potential risks or who are unable to obtain relevant information. A few legislators and courts in some countries have obliged the creditor in certain circumstances to reveal to the intending security provider the debtor's financial situation. This should make the security provider aware of the risk which may be incurred by assuming the personal security. This, again, is a protective rule for consumer security providers, especially close relatives of the debtor who often are ignorant of, or blind to, the debtor's economic situation because they are moved by the desire to help and sentiments of kinship and benevolence. It is therefore necessary to establish specific rules aiming at protecting the security provider by making additional information available so that the security provider can better evaluate the risk incurred by assuming a personal security.

Such assistance is the more necessary since relatives or friends of a private debtor (who very often also is a consumer) usually assume a personal security without remuneration. In effect, they "donate" their credit and risk losing major portions of, or even all, their assets.

B. Information and advice for the security provider

Creditor's information. Paragraph (1) specifies the information that has to be disclosed by the creditor to the security provider.

Paragraph (1)(a) does not deal with the subjective risks inherent in the debtor, but with the general objective legal and economic risks that are connected with a dependent personal security. The creditor must start from the assumption that consumer security providers are not familiar with the far-reaching effects of assuming any personal security. In particular, intending security providers must be made aware that they will assume a potential debt for which they may be liable with all their assets. The practical effects of this abstract rule must clearly be impressed upon the mind of the intending security provider. This must be done in such a way that the latter becomes clearly and fully aware of the very real risk incurred by assuming the personal security.

Paragraph (1)(b) deals with the special personal risks which are inherent in the financial position of the debtor. Professional creditors usually will be able, either on the basis of earlier dealings with the debtor or else by virtue of investigations, to evaluate the economic capacity of their debtor. All presently available information on the economic potential of the debtor, especially present assets (whether encumbered or not) and earning capacity, must be utilised. These data are already relevant for the creditor's decision whether or not to grant a credit to the debtor. On this basis the creditor can and must provide a complete picture of the financial situation of the debtor to the intending security provider.

In the case of middle-term or even long-term credits, the investigations of the debtor and consequently the information given to the intending security provider must be even more extensive and careful. Of course, nobody is expected to make prophecies. However, those potential developments which can relatively clearly be foreshadowed must also be disclosed. This refers to data like the age and health situation of the debtor and consequences which these may have for the debtor's future economic situation.

The creditor's duty of disclosure is qualified by the words "information accessible to the creditor". The qualifying term "accessible" must be understood subjectively as meaning all the relevant information about the debtor of which the creditor disposes at the time of contracting the security. According to the drafting history accessibility does not prejudice the issue whether the relevant information must also be accessible to the security provider. If the creditor due to binding rules of professional secrecy, especially bank secrecy, is prevented from divulging all relevant information to which the creditor has access to the security provider, the creditor must attempt to obtain the debtor's consent for passing the information to the security provider or must bear the consequences of this subjective inability which are spelt out in paragraphs (3) –(5). Such a disability must be disclosed to the intending security provider so that he or she can look for other sources or for independent advice. An omission of such a disclosure may expose the creditor to the obligation to compensate any damage caused to the security provider.

Independent advice. Paragraph (2) deals with a special situation in which the creditor has a duty to ascertain that the intending security provider receives independent advice from a third person.

Such recourse to a source of independent advice is required if the creditor "knows or has reason to know" that the security provider "is not acting freely or with adequate information" in assuming the security. If the creditor's knowledge is alleged, this will require adequate proof. If it is alleged that the creditor had "reason to know", the interested party must prove the knowledge by the creditor of such facts as will allow the inference to be drawn that the creditor ought to have known of a relationship of trust and confidence between the debtor and the security provider.

A relationship of trust and confidence between security provider and debtor as such does not meet the requirement of paragraph (2). There are millions of such relationships, especially in well-functioning families. The members of such a family may have acquired or preserved personal independence and experience with respect to financial matters, especially by the independent administration of their financial affairs. However, there are probably more families where not all members have experience of this kind to a significant extent. Children, even if they have reached the age of majority, do not always appreciate financial risks of greater dimension. The same may also be true of sick or old people, depending upon the individual circumstances. If both the security provider and the debtor are members of a relationship of the latter type, then there is obviously a significant risk that the security provider is not acting freely or is acting without adequate information.

If the requirements mentioned in the preceding two paragraphs are fulfilled, then the creditor must ascertain that the security provider has received "independent advice" with respect to the assumption of the security required by the creditor. In practice this means that the creditor must request the intending security provider to obtain advice from an independent third party. The creditor's legal advisor obviously would not qualify for this purpose. Independent advice may be rendered by consumer organisations or bodies providing legal assistance. In important or complicated cases, advice by independent lawyers may be necessary. The costs will have to be borne by the security provider or the debtor.

C. Sanctions

Paragraphs (3) to (5) provide the sanctions if the information required by paragraph (1) or the independent advice required by paragraph (2) have been furnished late or have not been furnished at all. In these circumstances the consumer security provider is regarded as having assumed the security improvidently. These sanctions apply whether or not the consumer security provider in fact suffered a disadvantage.

Paragraphs (3) and (4) deal with two different, although related fact patterns: paragraph (3) applies if the information or independent advice is given, but is not given within the required time limit; by contrast, paragraph (4) applies if no information or independent advice at all is furnished.

According to paragraph (3) the information or independent advice required by paragraphs (1) and (2) must be furnished to the security provider "at least five days" before signing the offer of security or the contract creating the security. Five days should suffice to review the required information or independent advice; in the case of contracts for larger amounts, usually negotiations take more time so that in fact a longer period of time may be available to the security provider. References in this Article to a contract creating the security apply also to unilateral promises or undertakings creating a security (see IV.G.–1:102 (Scope) paragraph (4).

If the required time span of five days is not observed, the consumer security provider can revoke the offer of security or avoid the contract or other juridical act creating the security within a "reasonable" period after having received the information or independent advice. This span of reasonable time is under normal circumstances five working days; however, the circumstances may suggest a shorter or longer period (sentence 2). This period is more flexible than the corresponding time span fixed by the first sentence, since the intending security provider cannot foresee when he or she will receive the draft of the offer or contract of security.

If no information or independent advice is given, the intending security provider can at any time revoke the offer or can avoid the contract or other juridical act (paragraph (4)). This rule must be understood in a broad sense: it must also apply if information is given, but turns out to be obviously insufficient so that it is not helpful for the intending security provider or even misleads as to the circumstances that have been relevant to the decision to assume the security.

Paragraph (5) will in practice be of limited relevance. In the early stage it is unlikely that any performances will have been rendered by any of the parties. However, in the cases addressed by paragraph (4), where no information or advice at all has been given and therefore the contract can be avoided at any time, performances may well have been rendered. The return of benefits received as a result of such performances is governed by the rules on unjustified enrichment in Book VII.

D. Mandatory provision

According to paragraph (2) of the preceding Article, the present Article is a mandatory provision in favour of the consumer security provider.

NOTES

I. Different bases of creditor's precontractual duties of information

1. Precontractual duties of information of creditors towards consumer providers of security are based upon different legal concepts in the various member states. Some member states have enacted specific consumer protection provisions in order to regulate such information duties. Very often such information requirements are also derived from the application of general principles of law, while sometimes also the rules on error are applied in order to deal with situations in which no precontractual information had been provided by the creditor. In a number of member states, several of these concepts are applied simultaneously; for instance, precontractual information requirements may follow both from special consumer protection provisions and from more general principles.
2. In AUSTRIA, precontractual information duties follow from special consumer protection provisions (ConsProtA §§ 25a ff).
3. Precontractual information duties in BELGIAN law are laid down in special consumer protection provisions (ConsCredA art. 34) and can be derived from general principles of law.

4. In DENMARK, precontractual information duties are based upon the principle of good faith (ContrA § 36).

5. Under ENGLISH law, there are both precontractual information requirements laid down in special consumer protection provisions (esp. ConsCredA s. 105 para. 5) and precontractual duties of the creditor derived from the principles of undue influence and constructive notice.

6. In FINLAND, precontractual information requirements follow from special consumer protection provisions (LDepGuar § 12) and from the operation of general principles of law.

7. In FRANCE, there are special consumer protection provisions concerning precontractual information requirements (ConsC art. L. 313-7 ff), but also duties of the creditor based upon the principle of good faith.

8. GERMAN law bases precontractual information requirements of the creditor primarily upon the principle of good faith, but also upon the rules on mistake.

9. In GREECE, the principle of good faith is regarded as the single basis of precontractual information requirements.

10. In IRELAND, precontractual information requirements follow both from special consumer protection provisions (ConsCredA s. 30) and from the application of general rules of law.

11. In ITALY, some precontractual information requirements are contained in special consumer protection provisions (ConsC arts. 2), while others follow from legislation applicable for all kinds of security providers and other general rules of law.

12. In LUXEMBOURG, precontractual information requirements can become relevant in limited circumstances for the rules on mistake.

13. In the NETHERLANDS, precontractual information requirements typically are dealt with in connection with the rules on mistake; additionally, some precontractual information requirements based upon general rules of law are suggested.

14. In SCOTLAND, there are both precontractual information requirements which are laid down in special consumer protection provisions (esp. ConsCredA s. 105 para. 5) and precontractual information requirements of the creditor based upon the principle of good faith.

15. Under SPANISH law, pre-contractual information requirements follow from the principle of good faith and are subject to the requirements and extension mandatorily laid down in arts. 61 and 62 of the Consumer Protection Act. There are no special security related information duties.

16. In SWEDEN, some special consumer protection provisions contain precontractual information requirements (ConsCredA §§ 6, 7), while in other cases such duties of the creditor are based upon general principles (ContrA § 36).

II. Specific rules on creditor's precontractual duties of information towards consumer security providers

17. Most member states agree that special protection especially by way of information duties of the creditor must be given to the consumer security provider who more often than not lacks business experience; the degree of protection provided under specific consumer protection rules under the different legal systems, however, varies considerably. For the sanctions in case of a non-compliance with these duties, see generally notes 44 et seq. below

18. AUSTRIA enacted in 1997 a series of interconnected provisions on information duties: § 25a ConsProtA obliges professional credit providers to hand to spouses as co-debtors or one acting as surety a document informing them about the risks of solidary liability; according to § 25b para. 2 the provider of a personal security, whether dependent or independent, has to be informed by the creditor about the spouse's default; non-observance of this duty implies that the security provider is not liable for interest and costs that arise after the debtor's default; the most important provision in practice is § 25c: the creditor has to inform a consumer who becomes a co-debtor or a (dependent or independent) security provider about the economic position of the debtor if the creditor is, or should be, aware that the debtor probably will be unable (or only partly able) to perform the obligation (sentence 1). If the creditor omits this information the security provider will only be liable if the security obligation would have been assumed in spite of this information (sentence 2). The Supreme Court has held: if the creditor urges assumption of a personal security this indicates the creditor's doubts as to the solvency of the debtor (OGH 22 Dec 2003, JBl. 2004, 522 at p. 524; OGH 25 July 2000, SZ 73 no. 121 at p. 68); individual information is required, whereas a general form does not suffice (OGH 26 January 2006, ÖJZ 2006, 454, 455); the practice of the court is not quite uniform as to whether information by the creditor is required even if the security provider is already informed; prevailing practice supports repetition since this more strongly impresses the security provider (OGH 22 December 2003, JBl. 2004, 522 at 525; OGH 25 July 2000, above at p. 68; discussion and less strict view in OGH 21 July 2005, ÖBA 2006, 206 at 208); no information is necessary if the security provider had offered to assume the security, participated in the intensive negotiation of the credit and had earlier business experience (OGH 20 October 1999, ÖBA 2000, 527 at p. 531; OGH 22 October 2001, ÖBA 2002, 499 at p. 501); beyond the letter of § 25c, the Supreme Court allows a mere reduction of the security provider's obligation (OGH 25 July 2000, above at p. 69 s.)

19. In BELGIUM, ConsCredA art. 34 lays down a precontractual duty of information in favour of security providers for a credit granted to a consumer, without distinguishing between consumer and other security providers or between different types of personal security. The creditor must furnish gratuitously in advance to the security provider a copy of the security agreement (and then give notice of the conclusion of the credit agreement). The creditor must also inform the security provider in advance about any modification of the credit agreement (ConsCredA art. 34 para. 2).

20. In ENGLAND there are special consumer protective laws introducing a precontractual duty of information of the creditor in favour of consumer security providers (in ENGLAND: persons giving security in relation to a transaction falling under the consumer protection legislation, cf. national notes to IV.G.–1:101 no. 67) only (ConsCredA s. 105 para. 5; Consumer Credit (Guarantees and Indemnities) Regulations 1983 reg. 3). The information to be given must be in writing and it must also contain a warning "YOU MAY HAVE TO PAY INSTEAD" in capital letters (Part IV of the Schedule to the Consumer Credit (Guarantees and Indemnities) Regulations 1983), whereas the creditor has to supply the security provider with a copy of the security instrument and a copy of the underlying regulated agreement and any documents therein referred to within 12 working days (Consumer Credit (Prescribed Periods for Giving Information) Regulations 1983 reg. 2). Moreover, the creditor has to give additional information about creditor and debtor as well as a statement of the security provider's rights and duties under the security (ConsCredA s. 105 para. 5; Consumer Credit (Guarantees and Indemnities) Regulations 1983 reg. 3; cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 3-176 s.).

21. In FINLAND LDepGuar § 12 provides a precontractual duty of information in favour of consumer security providers concerning four points: the obligations and specific costs of the dependent personal security assumed; the preconditions for demanding performance from the security provider; and of any other factors that may be of essential importance for the security provider; further, the creditor must inform the consumer security provider about the debtor's obligations and financial circumstances (§ 12 paras 1–2; RP 189/1998 rd 44 ss.). The written form is optional for this information; if the information is given in writing, this must take place at the latest on the day before the personal security is assumed (LDepGuar § 12 para. 1 sentence 2; RP 189/1998 rd 46).

22. In FRANCE an obligation of information in favour of the consumer security provider is implied: both the nature of the security provider's engagement and the maximum amount of the secured debt must be indicated in the contract of security (for all credit types: ConsC arts. L. 341-2 ff; for consumer credit only: ConsC arts. L. 313-7 ff).

23. In IRELAND, the security provider is entitled under ConsCredA s. 30 (1)(b) to a copy of the document on the agreement from which the secured obligations arise.

24. In ITALY the general rules of consumer protection enacted by Law 30 July 1998 no. 281, now integrated into ConsC, establish the rights of consumers to adequate information and publicity concerning services provided by professionals (art. 2 para. 2 lit. c)) and to fairness and equity in contractual relationships (art. 2 para. 2 lit. e)); these rules are considered as applicable to consumer security providers (Petti 484). Among other rules, ConsC art. 5 para. 3 states that information for the consumer should be adequate to the chosen technique of communication; it has to be expressed clearly and intelligibly, also taking into account the modalities of the conclusion of the contract or the characteristics of the area in which the service operates so as to ensure the consumer's awareness.

25. The situation in SCOTLAND is identical to ENGLISH law.

26. In SWEDEN there are special provisions introducing a precontractual duty of information of the creditor in favour of consumer security providers: The information to be disclosed must be given in writing before the assumption of the personal security (ConsCredA §§ 6, 7). According to the general guidelines of the Swedish Financial Supervisory Authority about securities in consumer relationships (FFFS 2005:3) the creditor has a precontractual duty to furnish information in writing to consumer security providers. The creditor may be obliged to inform the security provider about all circumstances that the latter may truly expect to know, e.g. extra costs connected with the personal security (ConsCredA §§ 6, 7). According to the general guidelines about securities in consumer relationships (FFFS 2005:3) the creditor is obliged to inform the security provider about the debtor's economic situation, if this is deteriorating over a lengthy period.

III. Creditor's precontractual duties of information based upon general principles

27. In addition to the specific protective rules for consumer security providers, there is typically also some protection through creditors´ precontractual duties of information which are based upon general principles of law, especially on the principle of good faith or similar concepts. As a general rule, these information duties, however, will be less strict and only available in limited circumstances. For the sanctions in case of a non-compliance with these duties, see generally nos. 44 ss. below

28. In BELGIUM, the creditor may be obliged to inform the security provider about all circumstances that the latter may truly expect to know, e.g. extra costs contained in the personal security (Cornelis 63; Van Quickenborne no. 423).

29. In DENMARK, a duty to disclose any sort of information about the financial situation of the debtor or the risk to be assumed has been acknowledged in literature and in court practice as arising from the principle of good faith (Pedersen, Kaution 23 ss.). Thus, a security in favour of a savings bank assumed by a disordered lady for old and future debts of her stepson was found not to be binding on the basis of ContrA § 36 for a lack of information by the bank (CA Vestre Landsret 30 August 1993, UfR 1993 A 949). The intensity of the duty of information depends upon whether the creditor or the debtor has approached the security provider, the creditor's duty being higher in the former situation than in the latter (Pedersen, Kaution 23 ss.). Pedersen, ibid. also points out that where undue influence is exercised against a security provider who is not properly informed a security might be invalid on the basis of ContrA §§ 30, 31 or 33 (fraud).

30. In ENGLISH law, wide-ranging supplementary pre-contractual duties are imposed upon the creditor, especially in cases of a relationship of trust and confidence or an emotional bond between the security provider and the debtor. In ENGLISH and SCOTTISH law the existence and exact scope of such duties has been the object of an intense discussion in the past years. While at first it was thought that the legal situation in both jurisdictions followed similar rules (cf. Smith v. Bank of Scotland 1997 SC 111), it has now become clear that substantial differences exist (cf. Royal Bank of Scotland v. Wilson 2004 SC 153; Thomson v. Royal Bank of Scotland 2003 SCLR 964). In ENGLISH law, the starting point is that while in certain cases such as the parent/child or solicitor/client relationship there is even an irrefutable presumption of undue influence between the parties (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 4-130), in other non-commercial cases where a security provider can show that trust and confidence was reposed in the debtor and that the assumption of security is not readily explicable by the relationships between the parties and calls for an explanation, there is an evidentiary presumption of undue influence between debtor and security provider (Royal Bank of Scotland Plc. v. Etridge (No. 2) [2001] UKHL 44, [2002] 2 AC 773). This evidentiary presumption, which will however not apply merely because of the existence of a marital relationship (same decision at p. 822), will, if not rebutted, give the security provider a valid defence also against the creditor if the latter is found to have actual or constructive notice of this undue influence (Barclays Bank plc. v. O´Brien [1994] 1 AC 180; Royal Bank of Scotland Plc. v. Etridge (No. 2) [2001] UKHL 44, [2002] 2 AC 773, 798). At least in relation to securities provided by one spouse to the other, the courts have developed detailed rules which have to be complied with by creditors in order to rebut a presumption of constructive notice. In all cases where a security is provided by one spouse to the other, the other's business or a company in which they both had some shareholding the creditor "is put on inquiry" (cf. Royal Bank of Scotland Plc. v. Etridge (No. 2) [2001] UKHL 44, [2002] 2 AC 773, 803) and has to take steps to bring home to the security provider the risk run by standing as surety and advise the taking of independent advice (Barclays Bank plc. v. O´Brien [1994] 1 AC 180). Moreover there are detailed additional duties, for example requiring the creditor, even if the security provider has received legal advice, to inform the security provider that the creditor requires written confirmation from a solicitor acting for the security provider that the solicitor has fully explained to the security provider the nature of the documents of the security transaction and the practical implications; the creditor also has to advise the security provider of the possibility of appointing a solicitor different from the advisor acting also for both spouses and the creditor has to give information about the other spouse's financial affairs either directly to the spouse granting security or to the solicitor acting for that spouse (Royal Bank of Scotland v. Etridge (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 773, 803; cf. also First National Bank v. Achampong [2003] EWCA Civ 487, [2004] 1 FCR 18; Yorkshire Bank plc. v. Tinsley [2004] EWCA Civ 816, [2004] 1 WLR 2380).

31. In FINLAND – as in DENMARK and SWEDEN – a security may be regarded as invalid by reason of undue influence if it has been assumed by a security provider without proper precontractual information on the basis of the general principles of ContrA §§ 30, 31 or 33 (fraud) (see also HD 18 December 1996, KKO 1996:149). At least in this regard, the different Nordic Contract Acts are in all SCANDINAVIAN countries more or less uniform since the early 20th century.

32. In FRANCE, it has been held that a duty to disclose any sort of information about the financial situation of the debtor or the risk to be assumed can arise from the principle of good faith (CA Versailles 9 November 1995, D. 1996, I.R. 17). A banker has to inform the security provider about essential facts which may influence consent, e.g. the very strained situation of the debtor, otherwise the contract of personal security can be avoided on the basis of deceit (Cass.civ. 26 November 1991, JCP G 1992, IV no. 369; Cass.civ. 8 July 2003 and Cass.civ. 13 May 2003, in D. 2003, 2308 ss., note Avena-Robardet) or damages for contractual liability may be claimed (Cass.com. 24 June 2003, D. 2003, 2309 ss., note Avena-Robardet). Moreover, the creditor may be obliged to inform the security provider about all circumstances that the latter may expect to know, e.g. extra costs connected with the personal security (impliedly ConsC art. L. 341-2 ff for all kinds of credit).

33. In GERMANY, the creditor is generally not thought to be obliged to disclose any sort of information about the financial situation of the debtor or the risk to be assumed since these risks are well known and generally to be known by all security providers (BGH 15 April 1997, NJW 1997, 3230, 3231; BGH 18 January 1996, NJW 1996, 1274, 1275; BGH 22 October 1987, NJW 1988, 3205, 3206; for further references cf. MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 87). Both literature and court practice accept, however, that in appropriate circumstances a duty of information arises from the principle of good faith (only BGH 15 April 1997, NJW 1997, 3230, 3231). Such duty of information is exceptionally assumed by court practice on the basis of good faith if the creditor caused an error of the security provider, which the former could have discovered, concerning the increased risk of the personal security (cf. only BGH 15 April 1997, NJW 1997, 3230, 3231; BGH 17 October 1985, WM 1986, 11, 12; see also CA Oldenburg 22 July 1997, WM 1997, 2076: the creditor knows that the security provider will have to pay; BGH 27 May 2003, ZIP 2003, 1596, 1599: creditor, a bank, asserts to security provider that the security is required only "pro forma"). This has recently been extended to cases in which the creditor recognises or ought to recognise that the security provider has fundamentally erroneous ideas about the consequences of the declaration, for whatever reason (cf. BGH 1 July 1999, NJW 1999, 2814; see also BGH 11 February 1999, NJW 1999, 2032). But there is no duty of information if the creditor can assume that the security provider received all important information from the debtor (CA Koblenz 14 March 1996, WM 1997, 719). It has to be noticed that the courts – in accordance with most writers – have continued to extend the duty of information and that this development still continues (cf. CA Bamberg 13 December 1999, WM 2000, 1582, 1585; Staudinger/Horn § 765 nos. 184–188).

34. In GREECE, it is thought that the security provider is normally entitled towards the creditor to information about the risk to be assumed (Georgiades § 3 no. 72; Markou, DEE 8, 363). In some situations it is assumed that such a duty of information might be based upon the principle of good faith (Georgiades § 3 no. 72). The creditor has this duty, if and in so far as the security provider declares that the assumption of the personal security depends on the facts made available to the security provider or if that assumption takes place by signing a document containing pre-written standard terms (Georgiades § 3 no. 72). According to the GREEK Banker's Code of Conduct art. 42 para. 2 (cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:107 no. 3), the bank must explicitly mention to the security provider the nature and extent of the obligations or risks which are assumed. Furthermore, the bank is obliged to give the security provider all the information made available to the debtor (art. 42 para. 1).

35. In IRELAND, information requirements for the creditor can be derived – as in ENGLISH law – from the operation of the principle of constructive notice in the area of undue influence, i.e. a personal security can become unenforceable if it is assumed that the creditor did have constructive notice of an actual undue influence by the principal debtor on the security provider and if the creditor in such a situation did not undertake special steps to ensure that the security provider obtained independent legal advice (cf. Ulster Bank Ireland Ltd. v. Fitzgerald [2001] IEHC 159; Bank of Bank of Nova Scotia v. Hogan [1996] 3 IR 239). However, the relationship of husband and wife does not in itself give rise to a presumption of undue influence and also constructive notice on the part of the creditor of any such undue influence depended upon the knowledge of at least some factors indicating such undue influence (cf. Ulster Bank Ireland Ltd v. Fitzgerald and Bank of Nova Scotia v. Hogan, above).

36. In ITALY, the principle of good faith is regarded as a basis for the creditor's duty of information in personal security contracts (di Majo, Clausola "omnibus" 45 ss., 52 ss.). The rules on transparency of contractual conditions in the banking sector also apply to consumer security providers when contracting with banks or financial institutions (Banking Law arts. 115-120; Petti 484). According to art. 116 at each office open to the public the following must be displayed to clients: interest rates, prices, expenses for notices, and every other financial condition regarding transactions and services offered, including overdue interests and values used for the imputation of interest. Reference to usage is not permitted. The contract must indicate the interest rate and every other price and condition in practice, including, for credit contracts, any increased fees in the case of late payment; also the possibility of a change of the interest rate and any other price and condition to the disadvantage of the client must be expressly indicated in the contract with a term that the client must individually sign (art. 117). Besides, annual notifications to clients are imposed by art. 119, in order to provide the client with complete and clear written information regarding the development of the relationship. In addition, some ITALIAN legal writers (Benedetti 208 ss.; Petti 98) point out that undue influence on the security provider without a proper information could be dealt with by recourse to the general remedies protecting the freedom of the individual will in the formation of the contract (CC arts. 1427 ff, mistake; 1434-1436, threat; 1439, fraud) or to the rules on non-contractual liability for damage (CC arts. 2043 ff).

37. In the NETHERLANDS, precontractual information requirements of the creditor outside specific consumer protection provisions are typically derived from the rules on mistake. In addition to this, however, according to one opinion, if a professional creditor knew or should have known that the security provider is being induced to enter into the contract of personal security as the result of special circumstances, such as a state of necessity, dependency, wantonness, abnormal mental condition or inexperience (Tjittes, WPNR 2001, 353), or that the security provider is about to incur a liability for debts that exceed present and expected financial capacity, then the creditor should prevent the security provider from agreeing to the contract of personal security and encourage the taking of independent legal advice (Tjittes, WPNR 2001, 353, 356).

38. In SCOTLAND, there is as in ENGLISH law a discussion about the imposition of some supplementary pre-contractual duties upon the creditor, especially in cases of a relationship of trust and confidence or an emotional bond between the security provider and the debtor. In SCOTLAND, however, the principle of good faith imposes additional duties on a creditor taking security from a third party security provider only where the circumstances of the case are such as to lead a reasonable person to believe that the security provider did not act freely or in a fully informed way (Smith v. Bank of Scotland 1997 SC 111; Royal Bank of Scotland v. Wilson 2004 SC 153). Moreover, the security provider has to show that there actually was undue influence or a misrepresentation if the security provider wishes to challenge the validity of the security on these grounds (Royal Royal Bank of Scotland v. Wilson [2003] ScotCS 196, 2003 SCLR 716; Braithwaite v. Bank of Scotland 1999 SLT 25). The courts do not prescribe any specific steps for the creditor; it is sufficient that the creditor warns the potential security provider of the consequences of entering into the security and advises the taking of independent advice (Smith v. Bank of Scotland 1997 SC 111; Royal Bank of Scotland v. Wilson 2004 SC 153). Once the creditor has been informed that the prospective security provider has received legal advice, the creditor does not normally have to take any further measures, e.g. to question whether the advice given was of the requisite quality (Royal Bank of Scotland v. Wilson 2004 SC 153).

39. While it is generally thought in SPAIN that the creditor is not obliged to disclose any sort of information about the financial situation of the debtor or the risk to be assumed, such a duty is in appropriate circumstances said to arise from the principle of good faith (Reyes López 232 s.). This will especially be the case if the personal security is declared by the security provider to depend upon the facts made available or if the personal security is contained in a document with pre-written standard terms (Reyes López 232 s.).

40. In SWEDEN, it has been held that on the basis of the general principle of ContrA § 36 a security provider, especially when acting as a non-professional, can be partially freed from liability if and in so far as not informed by the creditor about special grave financial risks contained in the underlying obligation (HD 20 August 1997, NJA 1997, 524). Moreover, a lack of precontractual information by the creditor might free the security provider from obligations if this amounts to fraud (ContrA §§ 30, 31 or 33). In HD 5 February 1996, NJA 1996, 19, however, it has been held that a security provider might still be liable despite the creditor's failure to inform the security provider about the disproportionality between the debtor's income and the secured debt if the creditor had given information about the implications and consequences of the security in previous dealings with the creditor concerning the assumption of securities for the same debtor.

IV. Lack of precontractual information by creditor causing error of security provider

41. Some member states use a third method in order to regulate precontractual information requirements for the creditor by allowing the security provider to have recourse to the rules on error if the security provider concluded the contract of personal security without prior information by the creditor. For the consequences of a lack of information in these member states, see also no. 45 below.

42. In LUXEMBOURG the dependent security contract can only be avoided for mistake if the solvency of the debtor was a condition for assuming the security (CA Luxembourg 20 March 2002, BankFin 2003, 296).

43. In the NETHERLANDS, since the CC provisions do not deal with the precontractual protection of security providers, the courts continue to have recourse to the general rules on mistake. In 1990, the Supreme Court had held that a consumer security provider may avoid a security for mistake if he or she had erred in assuming that there was only a small risk of being called upon to honour the security (HR 1 June 1990, NJ 1991 no. 759 at p. 3302). Later, this view seems to have been affirmed in an obiter dictum (HR 3 June 1994, NJ 1997 no. 287 at p. 1544). However, an annotator ("CJHB") to the latter case has disagreed on this point and insists that avoidance for mistake is now only admissible if one of the new statutory requirements in CC art. 6:228 is met; in particular, under para. 1 lit. b) a contract may be avoided for mistake if the other party (i.e. the creditor) knew or ought to have known of the security provider's mistake as to the debtor's solvency but did not enlighten it.

V. Sanctions

44. In a few member states, protective statutes also provide for sanctions if statutory rules are violated. In AUSTRIA, a security provider is not bound by the personal security if the required information about the debtor's financial situation has not been given, unless the security provider would have assumed the personal security in spite of such information (ConsProtA § 25c sentence 2). In BELGIUM the obligations of the security provider are discharged if the creditor does not hand over to the (prospective) security provider a copy of the credit contract (ConsCredA art. 97, as amended in 2003). In FRANCE, if the nature of the engagement of the consumer security provider and the maximum amount of the secured claim are not indicated in the contract of personal security, the personal security is void (for all credit types: ConsC arts. L. 341-2 ff, for consumer credit only: ConsC arts. L. 313-7 ff).

45. In member states which lack special provisions on the duty of information, courts and writers rely on general rules sanctioning the lack of sufficient information or the furnishing of wrong information. The first case may provoke a mistake on the part of the security provider and thus entitle the latter to avoid the security (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 23; FRANCE: cf. Simler no. 146; GREECE: A.P. 456/1971, NoB 19, 1245; LUXEMBOURG: CA Luxembourg 20 March 2002, BankFin 2003, 296; NETHERLANDS: HR 1 June 1990, NJ 1991 no. 759 at p. 3302; indirectly confirmed by HR 3 June 1994, NJ 1997 no. 287 at p. 1544; SPAIN: Reyes López 232). Also the furnishing of wrong or incomplete information by the creditor may induce a mistake on the part of the security provider (NETHERLANDS: HR 3 June 1994, NJ 1997 no. 287 (professional security provider); Tjittes, Bezwaarde Verwanten 59–62 and WPNR 2001, 353). Those general remedies are available also in ITALY, according to general rules; however, there seems to be no case law specifically concerning personal security (see no. 36 above). In case of a violation of the special rules in the DANISH agreement between the Consumer Council and the Financial Council concerning precontractual information to be provided by a financial institution, the sanctions are said to depend on the circumstances of the case (Pedersen, Kaution 24 s.).

46. In other countries the security provider has a claim for damages resulting from the creditor's culpa in contrahendo so that the security provider can not be called upon to make payment (BELGIUM: Lebon, Vorlagebeschluss 275; FINNISH LDepGuar § 12 para. 3; FRANCE: Cass.civ. 10 May 2005, Bull.civ. 2005 I no. 200 p. 169 on the ground that the creditor had not ascertained the security provider's financial ability to secure payment of a high debt; GERMANY: BGH 10 January 2006, BGHZ 165, 363, 371 invoking culpa in contrahendo resulting in a claim for damages and now based upon CC §§ 280 para. 1, 311 para. 2 no. 1, 249; BGH 15 April 1997, NJW 1997, 3230, 3231; BGH 1 July 1999, NJW 1999, 2814; ITALY: on the basis of CC art. 1337 and 2043; e multis cf. Cass. 29 September 2005 no. 19024, Foro it. 2006, 1105; Cass. 5 August 2004 no. 15040, Giust.civ. 2005 I 669; Cass. 16 July 2001 no. 9645, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 1404; for an application to dependent personal security Cass. 11 October 1994 no. 8295, Foro it. 1995 I 1903; Roppo 177 ss.; Sacco and De Nova II 260 s.).

47. In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, if the creditor does not provide the security provider with a copy of the secured agreement according to ConsCredA s. 105 para. 5, the security is enforceable against the security provider on an order of the court only (ConsCredA s. 105 para. 7; cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 3-177; Andrews and Millett no. 17-005). For the specific sanctions in relation to non-compliance with additional precontractual requirements for the creditor in the situation of relationships of trust and confidence between debtor and security provider see nos. 30 and 38 above. Under IRISH law, a security given in relation to a consumer credit agreement is not enforceable if no copy of the credit agreement has been handed over to the security provider (ConsCredA s. 38).

IV.G.–4:104: Form

The contract of security must be in textual form on a durable medium and must be signed by the security provider. A contract of security which does not comply with the requirements of the preceding sentence is void.

COMMENTS

A. General rule and exception

The general rule, to which this Article creates a restricted exception, is stated in II.–1:106 (Form) – "A contract or other juridical act need not be concluded, made or evidenced in writing nor is it subject to any other requirement as to form."

The reasons for the exception are the same as those which justify corresponding requirements for assuming a personal security, especially a dependent personal security, enacted in the member states: i.e., warning and protecting the providers of personal security generally and consumer providers of such security in particular.

B. Kinds of personal security

As to the instruments covered, all types of personal security are covered because otherwise no complete and effective protection of consumers can be achieved. In effect, since independent security as such is not accessible for consumers (see IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)), primarily the dependent personal security covered by Chapter 2 is affected. In addition, a co-debtorship for security purposes assumed by a consumer is subject to the rules of Chapter 4, as is expressly spelt out in IV.G.–1:104 (Co-debtorship for security purposes).

C. All terms to be in textual form on a durable medium

If it is to fulfil its function of clarification and warning, all terms of the contract of security must be in textual form on a durable medium. Terms which do not comply with this requirement are void (cf. sentence 2). Such partial nullity may not affect the validity of the written portions of the contract (cf. II.–1:108 (Partial invalidity or ineffectiveness)).

By virtue of I.–1:106 ("In writing" and similar expressions) "textual form" means a text which is expressed in alphabetical or other intelligible characters by means of any support which permits reading, recording of the information contained in the text and its reproduction in tangible form. "Durable medium" means any material on which information is stored so that it is accessible for future reference for a period of time adequate to the purposes of the information, and which allows the unchanged reproduction of this information.

An electronic version of the security instrument on a disc or similar device suffices for these purposes. See also the EC Directive on Electronic Commerce 2000/31/EC of 8 June 2000, Article 9 (1).

Article 9 (2) of the Directive on E-Commerce allows member states to deviate from the Directive by requiring for a limited number of transactions a conventional writing, lit. (c) of Article 9 (2) allows such an exception for contracts of suretyship and collateral securities furnished by consumers. A few major member states have made use of this particular exception. It has been considered whether the present rules should provide such an exception. After extensive discussion it was decided that this option should not be used. At present, only few consumers will possess the necessary technical equipment so that, in fact, recourse to the electronic form will be relatively rare. Of course, this may change in future as more and more people may dispose of the equipment and increasing use may be made of it. However, a problem of abuse will barely arise since the assumption of a personal security is an obvious "disadvantage" to the security provider.

D. Signature

The contract document or other instrument must be duly signed by the security provider since this makes the instrument binding upon it. By virtue of I.–1:107 ("Signature" and similar expressions) a reference to a person's signature includes a reference to that person's handwritten signature, electronic signature or advanced electronic signature, and references to anything being signed by a person are to be construed accordingly. See also the EC Directive on Electronic Signatures 1999/93/EC of 13 December 1999, Articles 1 (2) and 5 (1) (a).

As far as the consumer security provider's protection is concerned, the reasons given above apply equally. The electronic signature which is required is no less "complicated" than an ordinary hand-written signature so that the general warning effect is equally strong.

E. Mandatory provision

According to IV.G.–4:102 ((Applicable rules) paragraph (2), this Article is a mandatory provision in favour of the consumer security provider.

NOTES

I. Dependent securities

(a) Form in general required

General and specific rules

1. In AUSTRIA, GERMANY and GREECE contracts of dependent security by non-merchants must comply with a formal requirement established to warn the security provider (AUSTRIAN OGH 14 May 1985, SZ 58 no. 85 p. 400; GERMAN BGH 17 February 2000, NJW 2000, 1569, 1570 with further references; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 60). As of 2007, AUSTRIA will require the written form even for the dependent security of an entrepreneur (Law amending commercial law of 27 October 2005 art. I no. 153 abrogates Ccom § 350; but for bank transactions an equivalent exception has been inserted into Law on banking § 1 para. 6). The security provider's declaration must be in writing (AUSTRIAN CC § 1346 para. 2; GERMAN CC § 766 and GREEK CC art. 849) which means that the written text of the contract must at the end be signed by the security provider (GERMANY: BGH 20 November 1990, BGHZ 113, 48, 51; less severe BGH 13 October 1994, NJW 1995, 43, 45; GREECE: Simantiras 13); the indication of a maximum amount is not necessary. Consequently, dependent securities may be assumed by use of general conditions and terms of contracts. However, the original of the signed document has to be handed to the creditor since a telefax is not considered as sufficient (GERMANY: BGH 28 January 1993, BGHZ 121, 224; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 59, contra Simantiras 14 and 20). Furthermore in GERMANY an electronic signature is not accepted for dependent securities (cf. CC § 766 sentence 2, as of 13 July 2001). If these requirements are not met, the declaration is void (expressly GREEK CC art. 849; in the result also AUSTRIA and GERMANY since the provisions cited above declare the required form to be a condition of validity). However, in all three countries the formal defect can be validated by the security provider's performance of the security (AUSTRIA: Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1346 no. 11; GERMAN CC § 766 sentence 3; GREEK CC art. 849 sentence 2).

2. Similarly, the ENGLISH Statute of Frauds 1677 s. 4 requires that dependent securities, but not independent securities, generally are in writing and signed by the security provider or by another person who is authorised to do so. The fact that the creditor relied upon an oral security in extending credit to the debtor does not prevent the security provider from invoking the lack of form (Actionstrength Ltd. (t/a Vital Resourses) v. International Glass Engineering [2003] 2 AC 541). It is sufficient, however, that the offer of a dependent security by the security provider containing the essential terms of the security is made in written form; the acceptance might then be made orally (J. Pereira Fernandes SA v. Mehta [2006] EWHC 813 (Ch), [2006] 1 WLR 1543). Moreover, for the purposes of the Statute of Frauds, an e-mail can suffice as written form; the automatic insertion of the sender's e-mail address in the e-mail by the internet service provider can, however, not be regarded as a signature (cf. J Pereira Fernandes SA v. Mehta, above). In ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, additional formal requirements follow from the ConsCredA 1974: according to s. 105 para. 1 "any security provided in relation to a regulated agreement shall be expressed in writing" and s. 105 para. 5 prescribes that a copy of the document has to be handed over to the consumer security provider. The Consumer Credit (Guarantees and Indemnities) Regulations 1983 contain further detailed provisions regarding the prescribed form and content of security instruments. Thus, the consumer's signature has to be placed in a "signature box" at the end of the document, containing a prescribed warning and clearly distinguishable from the rest of the document (Consumer Credit (Guarantees and Indemnities) Regulations 1983 reg. 3 para. 1 lit. d read with Schedule Part IV). Further, the terms of the security have to be easily legible and of a colour which is readily distinguishable from the colour of the paper (Consumer Credit (Guarantees and Indemnities) Regulations 1983 reg. 4 para. 1). By virtue of ConsCredA s. 105 para. 7 lit. b a security granted in contravention of the formal requirements is not enforceable against the security provider except if a court order to enforce it is granted (ConsCredA s. 127). If such an order is dismissed, ConsCredA s. 105 para. 8 prescribes the application of s. 106, and thus the security is "treated as never having effect".

3. The situation is similar in IRELAND: also here the Statute of Frauds (Ireland) 1695 s. 2 contains the general requirement for dependent securities, but not independent securities, to be in writing and signed (cf. Johnston 9.06 and 9.17); modern consumer protection legislation contains further formal requirements for securities in relation to consumer transactions (ConsCredA 1995 s. 30).

4. According to the general rule on proof in FRENCH CC art. 1326 the secured amount must be indicated both in letters and in figures by the security provider as well as the type of liability – whether subsidiary or solidary. For unlimited securities, a maximum amount must be mentioned by the security provider (cf. Cass.civ. 22 February 1984, JCP 1985, II no. 20442). These requirements were first considered by the Civil Chambers of the French Supreme Court as a condition of validity of the security by combining the general rule on proof in CC art. 1326 with art. 2015 (since 2006: CC art. 2292) which stipulates that a security cannot be presumed (Cass.civ. 30 June 1987, D. 1987, Somm.Comm. 442, note Aynès). But since 1989 (Cass.civ. 15 November 1989, D. 1990, 177; Cass.civ. 25 May 2005, Bull.civ. 2005 I no. 228 p.193), the courts regard these writing requirements as a mere condition of proof; if it is not met, the security contract is considered as a mere beginning of proof (Cass.civ. 15 October 1991, JCP G 1992 II 21923, note Simler) and other means of evidence such as witnesses are then admitted (Ferid and Sonnenberger 512). After adoption of rules on electronic communications and signatures of 13 March 2000, these indications are to be made in electronic form (cf. new version of CC art. 1326).

5. In addition to these general rules, there is specific legislation in FRANCE for securities assumed by consumers. According to the FRENCH ConsC (for all credit types: ConsC arts. L. 341-2 to L. 341-3, for consumer credit and home owner credit: ConsC arts. L. 313-7 to L. 313-8), the consumer security provider must write by hand an obligatory formula about the nature and the extent of the obligation, the name of the debtor as well as the type of liability – subsidiary or solidary. The validity of consumer securities depends upon the observance of this qualified written form. No confirmation of the irregular contract seems to be possible (CA Limoges 20 May 1997, CCC 1998 no. 12; contra Cass.civ. 28 November 1995, JCP G 1997, I no. 3991, JCP G 1997 I no. 3991, note Simler and Delebecque). The admission of electronic signatures by the amended version of CC art. 1326 in 2000 has not changed the situation. Of course, these formal requirements do not apply where a more qualified form, especially a notarial instrument is used (expressly in case of subsidiary liability: ConsC arts. L. 313-7 and L. 341-2, a fortiori in case of solidary liability: cf. Cass.civ. 24 February 2004, Bull.civ. 2004 I no. 60 p. 47). The Grimaldi Commission had proposed that protective rules on the form of the consumer security contract were not to be considered as conditions of validity but as mere conditions of proof (CC proposed new art. 2300). In fact, this is based upon the general rules on proof of the amended version of CC art. 1326 (cf. no. 4 above) and denies any special protection with respect to form; however, this proposal was not adopted by the legislator of 2006.

6. Under BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN law contracts of security may only be proved if the requirements of CC art. 1326 are met. Otherwise the security contract may serve as a beginning of proof, as now in FRANCE (cf. no. 4 above; BELGIUM: Van Quickenborne nos. 292-311; LUXEMBOURG: Cass. Luxembourg 23 March 1989, Pas luxemb XXVII (1987-1989) Jur. 323). In addition, in BELGIUM specific protective legislation exists for providers of personal security securing a consumer credit – without distinguishing between consumer and other security providers: BELGIAN ConsCredA art. 34 para. 1 requires to indicate in the security contract the secured amount, which may, however, be increased to cover default interest, but does not cover any penalty or damages caused by non-performance (ConsCredA art. 34 para. 1, as amended in 2003). In order to facilitate this, the creditor must hand gratuitously a copy of the credit contract to the potential security provider.

7. Similarly according to DUTCH CC art. 7:859 the dependent security of a consumer can in general only be proved against the security provider by a writing signed by the latter. But the dependent security can be proved by all means of evidence if it has been established that the security provider has performed it at least in part. In addition, DUTCH CC art. 7:859 (3) extends the preceding two rules to the form of a consumer's agreement to assume a dependent personal security.

8. According to PORTUGUESE CC art. 628 para. 1 the dependent security must be assumed in the form required for the secured obligation. If there is no formal requirement for the latter, the same is true for the security, the principle of the freedom from form applying. Even if the parties decide to adopt a stricter form than is legally prescribed, the security provider is not obliged to do the same (STJ 14 June 1972, BolMinJus no. 218, 222; Vaz Serra, note STJ 14. 6. 1972). In SPAIN, as a rule, every consumer contract must be in writing. The consumer is entitled to a copy, in which the particular and general terms ought to be included (ConsProtA art. 63).

(b) Exceptions

9. In some exceptional cases the security provider may be precluded from invoking a lack of form if that would infringe the principle of good faith (AUSTRIA: Schwimann/Mader and Faber § 1346 no. 11; GERMANY: BGH 28 January 1993, BGHZ 121, 224; GREECE: Georgiades § 3 no. 66).

10. AUSTRIAN and GERMAN Ccom § 350 state that dependent securities assumed by merchants are valid without observing the form of AUSTRIAN CC § 1346 para. 2 or GERMAN CC § 766, respectively; however, as of 2007, the AUSTRIAN exception for merchants will be abrogated (Law amending commercial law of 27 October 2005 art. I no. 133; however, by a subsequent amendment of the Banking Law the exceptional freedom from form in CC § 1346 (2) has been reintroduced for "liabilities assumed by banks in their course of business" cf. Banking Law § 1 para. 6). The GREEK Draft of a Commercial Code contains a similar provision in art. 274. It has to be noticed that GERMAN courts do not apply Ccom § 350 to dependent securities assumed by managers, managing directors or shareholders for obligations of their company (BGH 29 February 1996, BGHZ 132, 119, 122; BGH 16 December 1999, NJW 1999, 1179, 1180; critical MünchKomm/K. Schmidt HGB § 1 no. 66 with further references).

11. Similarly in LUXEMBOURG the general rule on proof of CC art. 1326 (cf. no. 6 above) does not apply to dependent securities granted by merchants (LUXEMBOURG: CA Luxembourg 6 October 1993, Pas luxemb XXIX (1993-1995) Jur. 279). The dependent security has a commercial character if the security provider has a personal interest in the assumption of the security, even if the security provider is not a merchant (CA Luxembourg 26 June 1985, Pas luxemb XXVI (1984-86) Jur. 352). Such personal interest exists when the manager or the shareholder may by virtue of their shareholding exercise major influence upon the debtor company (CA Luxembourg 20 June 2002, BankFin 2003, 297). A direct or indirect participation in the management of the debtor's affairs is not necessary if any other patrimonial interest of the security provider can be found (CA Luxembourg 22 April 1992 no. 13246 unpublished).

12. In FRANCE, formerly special provisions (Ccom art. L 110-3) and the courts (Cass.com. 2 October 1985, Bull.civ. 1985 IV no. 227 p. 190 for managers and CA Paris 20 January 1999, JCP E 1999 Pan. no. 394 for major shareholders) had carved out exceptions from the general rule of CC art. 1326. However, a Law of 1 August 2003 has narrowed these exceptions by subjecting small and family enterprises which assume a dependent security to the rules for consumer security providers (cf. ConsC arts. L. 341-2 and L. 341-3; Tricot-Chamard JCP G 2004 I, no. 112, p. 334). The Grimaldi Commission had proposed to return to the solution prevailing before that Law (CC proposed new art. 2300), i.e. no form requirement and freedom of proof for security with a commercial character; however, this proposal was not adopted by the legislator of 2006.

(c) No form required

13. In DENMARK, FINLAND and SWEDEN no particular form is required under the general rule for contracts of dependent securities. According to DANISH and SWEDISH literature a security can even arise by silence and inactivity (DENMARK: Ekström 32; Andersen, Termn, Edlund a.o./Pedersen 435 s.; Pedersen, Kaution 18; Bryde Andersen 425; Højrup 16 s.; Jespersen 21; SWEDEN: Walin, Borgen 36 ss.). According to the SWEDISH Supreme Court case HD 6 May 1961, NJA 1961, 315 silence can create an obligation of a security provider only where the inactivity shows a clear indication of the intention to be bound as security provider. However, in DENMARK and FINLAND contracts on dependent securities are normally made in writing (DENMARK: Pedersen, Kaution 18; Andersen, Termn, Edlund a.o./Pedersen 435; FINLAND: Ekström 32). The DANISH Law on Financial Business § 48 para. 5 requires the written form for a contract on dependent security when the security provider assumes a dependent security in favour of a financial institution as creditor (Pedersen, Kaution 19).

14. The general provision of ITALIAN CC art. 1937 requires only the express will of the security provider for the valid creation of a personal security. No form is required, but the will of the security provider must be clearly established. The meaning of "express" will is not always certain. Gestures and other kinds of traditional communication have been understood as ways of express manifestation. Since CC art. 1937 does not require a specific means of proof for the contract of security, any legal means of proof are admitted (Cass. 26 June 1979 no. 4961, Giur.it. 1980 I 1545; Giusti 93) and even the presumption (Cass. 14 July 1936 no. 2485, Foro it. 1937 I 38; Cass. 17 October 1992 no. 11413, Giur.it. 1994 I 1649 ss.; Giusti 93). However, the general provision of the Civil Code must be read in connection with the special rules on banking contracts, which do apply to personal security and require a written document as well as the handing out of a copy to the client (DLgs no. 385/1993, art. 117) for the valid formation of a contract (art. 117 para. 3). Moreover, specific contract terms favouring the party who supplied them require a specific approval in writing by the other party, according to CC arts. 1341-1342. Besides that, whenever consumer protection law applies (cf. national notes to IV.G.–4:101 no. 10) provisions on abusive terms apply (ConsC arts. 33-38) requiring that some terms listed in the law and producing a disadvantageous effect for the consumer are valid only if individually negotiated; of course, this rule may in the end result in a requirement of written form for that term or even in an individual approval of them in writing by the consumer.

15. SPANISH CC art. 1827 para. 1 only requires the express constitution of the contract of security; it does not require a special form. The contract does not have to be in writing or in any other prescribed form, only the will of the dependent security provider must be clearly established (Guilarte Zapatero, Comentarios 123 ss.). Nevertheless, business practice requires a writing for reasons of proof and security. Since SPANISH CC art. 1827 does not establish a specific way of proof for the contract of security, any legal means of proof are admitted. However, nowadays, the written form is mandatory for every consumer contract (Consumer Protection Act art. 63).

16. Exceptionally and amazingly, in SPAIN a written form is required for commercial securities (Ccom art. 440). A simple letter of the security provider is enough to fulfil this requirement. This provision has been considered as unjustified (Carrasco a.o. 77). However, the provision lacks practical importance, since securities are normally created in writing anyway. Only one decision of the SPANISH Supreme Court (TS 17 December 1996, RAJ 1996/9002) has declared void a commercial security because of lack of form. However, no writing is required for extensions of the time limit of a security (TS 8 October 1986, RAJ 1986/5333) and this might be extended to any declaration of the security provider except the creation of the security (Carrasco a.o. 77).

II. Independent securities

17. In AUSTRIA for independent securities of non-merchants the same form as for dependent guarantees (cf. no. 1 above) is required. In 1992, the Supreme Court extended that statutory rule to independent securities since these are even more risky for the security provider than a dependent security (OGH 14 July 1992, SZ 65 no. 109 p. 69-73); this is now standing practice of the courts (OGH 14 July 1994, SZ 67 no. 128 p. 56).

18. In FRANCE, no special form is required for independent securities but the rules on proof (CC art. 1326 ff, cf. no. 4 above) apply if the security provider is not a merchant but a consumer (Simler nos. 931 ss.). Therefore in FRENCH banking practice the contract of independent security is in writing. The same applies to BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG (cf. no. 6 above). It has to be noticed though that what was said about the BELGIAN ConsCredA (cf. no. 6 above) also applies to independent securities (ConsCredA art. 34 para. 1). Also in the NETHERLANDS, the general rules on dependent securities of consumers apply to independent securities assumed by consumers (CC art. 7:863 read with art. 7:859).

19. The GERMAN and GREEK Civil Codes do not contain any formal requirement for independent securities and, although the matter is disputed, courts do not apply the above mentioned rules of GERMAN CC § 766, GREEK art. 849, respectively, by analogy (Staudinger/Horn no. 223 preceding §§ 765 ss.; Georgiades § 6 no. 48). Under ENGLISH law the general rule under the Statute of Frauds 1677 s. 4 that a security is only enforceable if it is in writing is not applicable to indemnities because they are primary undertakings by the security provider (Andrews and Millett no. 1-013). However, the formal requirements under modern consumer protection legislation as described above (no. 2) also apply to independent securities. Also in DENMARK independent securities are mostly drawn up as written documents. However, it is also possible to hand over an independent security by telex or electronic data transfer (Pedersen, Bankgarantier 77).

III. Co-debtorship for security purposes

20. The AUSTRIAN, GERMAN and GREEK Civil Codes do not contain any formal requirement for assuming a co-debtorship in general or a co-debtorship for security purposes in particular and the courts do not apply the above mentioned rules of AUSTRIAN, GERMAN and GREEK law (no. 1 above) by analogy (AUSTRIA: OGH 4 February 1992, JBl 1993, 657, 658; OGH 4 October 1989, SZ 62 II no. 160 p. 159; OGH 19 July 1988, SZ 61 II no. 174 p. 42; GERMANY: Palandt/Heinrichs no. 3 preceding § 414 with further references; GREECE: A.P. 934/1992, EEN 60, 656; Georgiades § 7 no. 13). However, among writers the latter issue is quite controversial (cf. especially in AUSTRIA Bydlinski 27, 29, 30 with references; for GERMANY: MünchKomm/Möschel no. 13 preceding § 414; Harke, ZBB 2004, 147 ss.).

21. In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG, if the debtor is a consumer the assumption of debt is an obligation to pay and the general rules on proof (CC art. 1326) apply (cf. nos. 4 and 6 above). Since it is a primary undertaking, an assumption of debt for security purposes under ENGLISH law does not require written form (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 3-16). For the purposes of the ConsCredA, however, the above mentioned formalities (no. 2 above) have to be observed.

IV. Binding comfort letters

22. Binding comfort letters are not subject to any formal requirement. However, in so far as the binding comfort letter contains an obligation to pay and the issuer of the letter is a consumer, in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG the general rules on proof (CC art. 1326) apply; FRANCE: Simler no. 1019).

IV.G.–4:105: Nature of security provider's liability

Where this Chapter applies:

(a) an agreement purporting to create a security without a maximum amount, whether a global security or not, is considered as creating a dependent security with a fixed amount to be determined according to IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (3);

(b) the liability of a provider of dependent security is subsidiary within the meaning of IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider), unless expressly agreed otherwise; and

(c) in an agreement purporting to create an independent security, the declaration that it does not depend upon another person's obligation owed to the creditor is disregarded, and accordingly a dependent security is considered as having been created, provided the other requirements of such a security are met.

COMMENTS

A. General

This Article specifically addresses three terms often utilised in personal securities and adapts these in the interest of protecting the consumer security provider. The remedy of adaptation is used in order to balance the opposite interests of the parties: that of the creditor in maintaining a security agreed upon and the security provider's interest in being protected against harsh contract terms.

The Article is mandatory in favour of the consumer with the exception indicated in sub-paragraph (b).

B. Security without a maximum amount

Sub-paragraph (a) affects a security which does not contain a maximum amount. It is obvious that such a security is particularly risky for the security provider since the upper limit of the future obligation is not known.

The Article does not nullify such agreements but maintains them, although with a limitation. The unlimited security is converted into a limited security with a fixed amount. This amount is to be determined according to IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (3). This rule provides, in essence, that, unless a maximum amount can be determined from the agreement of the parties, the amount of the security is limited to the amount of the secured obligation at the time the security became effective. For details, cf. IV.G.–2:102 (3) and the Comments on it.

C. Subsidiary liability

Sub-paragraph (b) reverses the normal rule that a provider of dependent security is solidarily liable with the debtor of the secured claim, unless subsidiary liability had been agreed upon (IV.G.–2:105 (Solidary liability of security provider)). A consumer security provider is better protected by the contrary rule: liability is subsidiary, unless solidary liability has been agreed. The consequences and limits of this subsidiary liability are laid down in IV.G.–2:106 (Subsidiary liability of security provider) and need not be repeated here.

A higher degree of protection for the consumer security provider could, of course, be achieved if any contractual derogation from the basic subsidiary liability were to be prohibited. That, however, would go clearly beyond the state of the law in most member states. Nor does there seem to be any practical need or demand for change. In practice, creditors usually turn first against the debtor in any event before considering steps against a security provider.

D. No independent security

According to sub-paragraph (c), an agreement for an independent personal security is converted to a dependent security. The reason for this automatic conversion is the increased risk which an independent security implies: independence means that the accessority of the dependent security is excluded so that the security provider's obligation may exceed the amount and other terms of the secured obligation, if any, and the security provider may not invoke defences of the debtor.

In order to avoid complete nullity of a consumer's independent security, sub-paragraph (c) provides for the conversion of the independent into a dependent security, provided the requirements of the latter (other than the absence of a declaration that the security is independent) are met. The "requirements" of a dependent security are , in particular, the substantive and formal requirements laid down in Chapters 1, 2 and 4. For instance, since according to the definition of a dependent security in IV.G.– 1:101 (Definitions), a dependent security must purport to serve as security for an obligation of the debtor owed to the creditor, a pure payment guarantee without any underlying obligation to be secured could not be converted to a dependent security. This is confirmed by the contents of Chapter 2 on dependent personal security: the application of this Chapter presupposes that there is an obligation to be secured since this is the basis upon which the security "depends".

It goes without saying, that, once the requirements are met, the effects of the converted independent security are subject to Chapters 2 and 4.

E. Application to co-debtorship for security purposes

Only sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of the Article are applicable to co-debtorships for security purpose. By contrast, sub-paragraph (c) deals specifically with independent personal security and therefore does not apply to co-debtorship for security purposes.

Sub-paragraph (a) deals with a case which will rarely occur with a co-debtorship for security purposes, namely one without a maximum amount. In this rare case, the policy expressed in IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (3) must be adopted and slightly adapted: the security co-debtor's obligation must be limited to the amount for which the primary full co-debtor was liable at the time when the secondary co-debtorship has been assumed.

According to sub-paragraph (b), a consumer security provider's liability is subsidiary, unless the parties expressly had agreed otherwise. This provision will affect almost all cases of co-debtorship for security purposes, since normally these result in solidary liability. In order to prosecute the policy of sub-paragraph (b), it will be necessary to distinguish between two situations. On the one hand, if the co-debtors had simply agreed on creating a co-debtorship (which merely implies solidary liability), there is no "express" agreement on solidarity, as required by the closing words of sub-paragraph (b); consequently, the co-debtor for security purposes will then have only subsidiary liability. On the other hand, if they had expressly agreed upon solidary liability, this complies with the requirement of the closing words of sub-paragraph (b).

NOTES

I. Limitation of security without maximum amount

1. See national notes on IV.G.–1:101 (Definitions) nos. 42-46.

2. In BELGIUM generally, in contracts of personal security that secure consumer credits, the extent of the liability of the security provider – whether being a consumer or not – has to be limited to a specific amount, which may, however, be increased to cover default interest, but does not cover any penalty or damages caused by non-performance (ConsCredA art. 34 para. 1, as amended in 2003). Also in the NETHERLANDS, a personal security provided by a consumer is only valid if a maximum amount has been fixed (CC art. 7:858 para. 1); however, interest for the debtor's delay in payment and the creditor's costs of action against the debtor may under certain circumstances be added to that maximum (CC art. 7:858 para. 2). These provisions are mandatory in favour of a consumer security provider (CC art. 7:862 lit. (a)). According to the FRENCH ConsC (for all credit types: ConsC arts. L. 341-2 to L. 341-3, for consumer credit and home owner credit: ConsC arts. L. 313-7 to L. 313-8), the consumer security provider must write by hand the maximum amount (including interest, penalties and – according to case law (Cass.civ. 30 March 1994, Bull.civ. 1994 I no. 230 p. 163; RTD civ 1994, 903) – the percentage rate of charge); otherwise the security contract is void. In SPAIN it is held that the normal protection given to every global security provider suffices where the grantor acts as consumer. Furthermore, as the global security is normally a continuous relationship, Consumer Protection Act art. 62.3 applies, thereby prohibiting any clause that could make the right of free termination upon notice difficult or expensive to exercise.

II. Subsidiary liability of the consumer security provider

(a) Subsidiary liability is mandatory

3. In the NETHERLANDS the general rule that the consumer security provider's liability is only subsidiary is mandatory (CC art. 7:855 para. 1 read with art. 7:862 lit. a). The situation is similar in BELGIUM, but there is no distinction between consumer and other security providers. In addition the preconditions for the debtor's default are increased: the creditor may sue the security provider for a consumer credit only if the debtor has defaulted at least on two payments or twenty percent of the total sum due or on the last due payment and if the debtor has not performed within one month after the creditor's demand sent by registered letter (ConsCredA art. 36).

(b) Subsidiary liability as the non-mandatory general rule

4. In all other member states there are no special rules on the character of a consumer security provider's liability. This means that the ordinary rules on a security provider's liability apply, but these rules are not mandatory. A non-mandatory subsidiary liability of all providers of dependent security is the rule in almost all member countries (See national notes to IV.G.–2:106.).

5. In ENGLAND, IRELAND and SCOTLAND the security provider's liability is solidary unless otherwise agreed (cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:105 no. 1). The situation is the same in ITALY (CC art. 1944 no. 1). Moreover, terms establishing the beneficum excussionis (see national notes on IV.G.–2:106 nos. 9-10) in favour of the security provider – whether or not a consumer – are hardly ever negotiated in banking practice (Petti 297 ss.).

III. Independent securities or co-debtorship assumed by consumers

6. Only in the NETHERLANDS is there a clear solution for the treatment of an independent security assumed by a consumer. All mandatory special provisions for a consumer's dependent security also apply to a consumer's independent personal security (CC art. 7:863). However, in practice such security instruments by consumers do not seem to be used (Ensink 552).

7. In BELGIUM the Consumer Credit Act applies to dependent security and other personal security (ConsCredA arts. 34 ff), including independent security. However, opinion among BELGIAN writers is split on whether an independent security may be assumed by consumers (pro: Vliegen no. 181; contra: T´ Kint 419 and Geortay 858, 862).

8. In FRANCE the recent Decree-Law no. 2006-346 of 23 March 2006 prohibits the assumption of an independent security for consumer debts (ConsC new art. L 313-10-1, irrespective of whether the security provider is a consumer or not). It remains open whether professional debts can be secured by an independent security of a consumer. According to writers (Simler no. 920; Malaurie and Aynès/Aynès and Crocq no. 339) independent securities granted by a consumer are generally valid, based upon the freedom of contract. But the courts are very restrictive in admitting the validity of such a security and on the ground of consumer protection often annul it (mostly for deceit: CA Paris 16 April 1996, JCP G 1997, I no. 3991 (10) or for error: CA Paris 27 June 1990, JCP E 1991, I no. 119, note Hassler). Sometimes the courts convert a consumer's independent security into a dependent security (CA Paris 26 January 1993, D. 1993, I.R. 93) regardless of the intention of the parties. Similarly in a case of co-debtorship where a housewife assumed a loan with which her husband as mere co-debtor financed a business, a first-instance court requalified the loan as a dependent personal security (CFI Lons-le-Saulnier 18 November 1997, CCC April 1998 no. 64, note Raymond), to prevent the circumvention of the mandatory rules of the Consumer Code (Simler no. 28).

9. In ENGLAND, the question whether a personal security is a dependent or an independent security is to be decided on the basis of the general rules on interpretation (cf. Andrews and Millett no. 1-013); there is no general principle that an independent security can be assumed by non-consumers only (but cf. national notes on IV.G.–3:101 no. 3). The consumer protection legislation in the ConsCredA covers independent securities as well (cf. Andrews and Millett no. 17-003), see however national notes on IV.G.–1:101 no. 67).

10. In GERMANY first demand securities may be assumed by consumers if two restrictions are respected. First, securities on first demand provided in standard conditions are binding only upon persons who are familiar with this kind of security so that consumers are excluded (cf. BGH 5 July 1990, NJW-RR 1990, 1265; BGH 2 April 1998, NJW 1998, 2280, 2281; BGH 8 March 2001, BGHZ 147, 99 for dependent and Staudinger/Horn nos. 232 and 25 preceding §§ 765 ss. for independent securities). Second, if a first demand security is individually negotiated, the creditor is obliged to inform the provider of security about the special risks linked to this type of security if the security provider is obviously without experience in this matter. If these restrictions are not respected, the security provider is only liable as if a dependent security had been assumed (for dependent securities cf. BGH 2 April 1998, NJW 1998, 2280, 2281; MünchKomm/Habersack § 765 no. 100; Palandt/Sprau no. 14 preceding § 765).

11. In GREECE so-called "guarantee letters", which are independent securities, are usually issued by credit and financing institutions. However, it is generally possible for anyone to issue an independent security (Georgiades § 5 nos. 7 ss., § 6 no. 2 fn. 2, 3).

12. In ITALY, in the absence of a specific prohibition, it is thought to be possible to create independent securities between private persons (De Nictolis 34 and 37). Since the ITALIAN Civil Code covers both civil and commercial law, there is no clear differentiating element between both kinds of contracts. The most important authors, however, underline the commercial character of the independent securities, as opposed to the civil character of the dependent security (Portale, Le garanzie bancarie 15).

13. In SPAIN the granting of independent security by consumers could only be banned by considering that an independent guarantee entails a waiver of rights conferred by the suretyship law (cfr. Consumer Protection Act arts. 10 and 86.7). The situation would change if it were considered that the two types of guarantee are different in nature; in this case the lack of accesority would not mean any waiver as such. There is still no relevant decision on this point.

IV.G.–4:106: Creditor's obligations of annual information

(1) Subject to the debtor's consent, the creditor has to inform the security provider annually about the secured amounts of the principal obligation, interest and other ancillary obligations owed by the debtor on the date of the information. The debtor's consent, once given, is irrevocable.

(2) IV.G.–2:107 (Requirement of notification by creditor) paragraphs (3) and (4) apply with appropriate adaptations.

COMMENTS

A. Basic idea

For ordinary dependent security, IV.G.–2:107 (Requirement of notification by creditor) requires the creditor to notify the security provider of certain important changes that affect the secured obligation. Apart from instances of non-performance or inability to pay, the required information refers to major events affecting the extent of the secured obligation, such as an extension of maturity (IV.G.–2:107(1)) and major increases of the secured obligations under a global security (IV.G.–2:107(2)).

For personal security assumed by consumers it seems appropriate to extend the basic idea underlying IV.G.–2:107 and to require annual information to be furnished to the consumer. Such annual information is apt to remind the consumer periodically of the potential risk assumed which otherwise, especially in the case of long-term credits, might be forgotten. The requirement of annual information does not impose a major burden upon the creditor since business people usually strike such a balance for each account, often at the end of the calendar year or else at the end of the respective business year.

B. Debtor's consent

Contrary to IV.G.–2:107, the annual information under the present Article requires the debtor's consent (paragraph (1)). This difference between the two rules is justified by the fact that the two most important items to be communicated under IV.G.–2:107, i.e. the debtor's non-performance or inability to pay, concern vital events with respect to the secured obligation; they may trigger the security provider's duty to make payment to the creditor. Because of this importance for the security provider, these notifications must be communicated to the security provider even without the debtor's agreement. By contrast, the annual information required of the security provider under the present Article refers to the amounts of principal obligation, interest and other ancillary obligations and therefore affects very sensitive data. This justifies the requirement of the debtor's consent.

The second sentence of paragraph (1) supplements the preceding sentence by providing that the debtor's consent, once given, cannot be revoked by the debtor.

C. Scope of items to be disclosed

The text enumerates the principal obligation, interest and other ancillary obligations that have to be disclosed. It is the amount of each of these items that must be contained in the annual information. It is the sum total of these items that is relevant for the security provider in order to demonstrate the total potential indebtedness.

In order to be realistic, the figures to be given by the creditor must be as of the date of the information.

D. Exception

By referring to IV.G.–2:107(3), an exception made by that provision is adopted and incorporated into the present Article. The annual information required by paragraph (1) need not be given if and in so far as the security provider already knows that information. The exception also applies if the security provider can reasonably be expected to know that information. Both actual and constructive knowledge may, e.g., be held by a security provider who is the spouse of a director of the indebted company.

E. Sanction

Likewise, the cross-reference to IV.G.–2:107(4) incorporates into the present Article the sanction which that provision establishes. For further details, cf. the Comments to IV.G.–2:107.

F. Mandatory rule

This Article may not be deviated from to the disadvantage of a security provider who is a consumer (IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (2)).

G. Application to co-debtorship for security purposes

The requirement to report annually on the amount of the debtor's outstanding obligations applies correspondingly to a co-debtorship for security purposes. The creditor must inform the "security debtor" about the obligations of the "real debtor" to the creditor.

NOTES

I. General

1. In the member states, the legal basis for the security provider to obtain information about the secured obligation in the absence of any default of the debtor is sometimes not framed as a duty of the creditor to inform but rather as a duty of the creditor to answer questions (see no. 2 below). Throughout the following national notes – as regards the duty of information dealt with in this Article as opposed to the creditor's duty of information in the case of a default by the debtor (cf. notes to IV.G.–2:107) – such a duty to answer questions is considered as being to a large degree functionally equivalent. The only difference is whether or not the security provider has to ask the creditor before the latter is bound to give information in regular intervals.

II. Duty to inform the security provider without default by debtor

(a) Legal systems with such a duty

2. In BELGIUM, the creditor has to inform the provider of security for a consumer credit – whether or not a consumer security provider – about respites of payment granted by the creditor as well as of any amendment of the credit agreement (ConsCredA art. 35 sentence 2). In ENGLAND, the creditor is bound to answer questions of the security provider about the amount for which the security provider is liable under the security (O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 4-28, 11-06). The situation is similar in SCOTLAND (Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenshields 1914 SC 259; Stair/Eden no. 898). Under ENGLISH law, the information to be given includes the amount of the secured debt (up to the maximum amount of the security) and any interest charged (O´Donovan and Phillips ibid.). In both ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, even more far-reaching information rights exist under the ConsCredA 1974 (ss. 107–109): here the creditor has to provide inter alia copies of the credit agreement and statements showing the total sums already paid by the debtor, payable at the time of the information or becoming payable under the credit agreement (Halsbury/Worsley, Rosenthal, Bourne and Riley-Smith para. 1210, Vol 49, 5th ed, (2008)). In FINLAND the security provider under a global guarantee must be informed by the creditor every six months about the amount of the debtor's secured obligation (LDepGuar § 13 para. 1). According to § 13 para. 2 the liability of the security provider of a global guarantee can be reduced if the creditor neglects the duty of information (RP 189/1998 rd 49).

3. In FRANCE three distinct provisions exist, which provide for a duty of information towards the consumer security provider. Firstly, CC art. 2016 para. 2 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 2) stipulates that information on the changes in the amount (any increase or decrease) of the secured debt including ancillary obligations should be given to a consumer provider of dependent security at least once every year. Although the provision applies according to its wording only to indefinite dependent securities, the courts have extended it also to definite dependent securities (Cass.civ. 16 March 1999, D. 1999 I.R. 99). Secondly, according to the Consumer Code the provider of dependent security has to be given exact information about the amounts of principal and interest and not only about the changes in the amount of the debt (ConsC art. L. 341-6 sentence 1 for all credit types). Finally the Madelin Act of 1994 requires the same information but only where a dependent security without a time limit is assumed by a natural person for the professional purposes of an individual entrepreneur (art. 47 II para. 2 of Madelin Act read with MonC art. L 313-22). All these three information duties should have been replaced according to the Grimaldi Commission´s proposal by one provision to be located in the Civil Code (CC proposed new art. 2307 para. 1), which would have been very similar to the present ConsC art. L. 341-6; however, this proposal was not adopted by the legislator of 2006. In ITALY, the bank's duty of annual notification to the client to provide complete and clear written information regarding the development of the relationship is applicable also to consumer security providers (DLgs no. 385 of 1 September 1993 on Banking Law art. 119; Petti 484).

(b) Whether duty depends upon security provider being a consumer

4. In ENGLAND, the general duty to answer questions as to the amount of the secured debt does not depend upon whether the security provider is a consumer; rather, this duty derives from a general duty of creditors to answer direct questions of security providers and, in answering these questions, to give information honestly and to the best of their ability (Hamilton v. Watson (1845) 12 Cl & Fin 109, 8 ER 1339; O´Donovan and Phillips no. 4-27). The more far-reaching information duties of the ConsCredA 1974 ss. 107–109 apply only if the security is given in relation to a regulated agreement under this Act (cf. national notes IV.G.–1:101 no. 67) and if the security itself is also a non-commercial agreement (ConsCredA 1974 ss. 107 para. 5, 108 para. 5, 109 para. 4). In FRANCE it is irrelevant whether the secured debt is owed by a consumer or a professional, as long as the provider of dependent security is a consumer (cf. CC art. 2016 para. 2 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 2) and ConsC art. L. 341-6 sentence 1). Equally, the Grimaldi Commission had proposed to require regular information to every natural person, whether acting for private or for professional purposes (CC proposed new art. 2307 para. 1); however, this proposal was not adopted by the legislator of 2006. In ITALY the bank's duty of annual information to the client (above no. 3) does not depend upon the qualification of the client as a consumer, for it is a general duty imposed upon banks in their relationship with all kinds of clients (Petti 484).

(c) Periodicity of duty to inform

5. For ENGLISH law it is said that there is a general right to inquire periodically as to the amount of the secured debt (O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 4-28); however, there does not seem to be any case law as to the precise duration of the interval between such inquiries of the security provider. Requests for information according to the ConsCredA 1974 ss. 107-109 can only be made after one month has passed since the last information was given in relation to the same credit agreement (ConsCredA 1974 ss. 107 para. 3, 108 para. 3, 109 para. 2). According to FINNISH LDepGuar § 13 para. 1 the security provider under a global guarantee must be informed every six months. In FRANCE this information has to be given every year (cf. CC art. 2016 para. 2 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 2; ConsC art. L. 341-6 sentence 1, art. 47 II para. 2 of the Madelin Act read with MonC art. L 313-22) and in ITALY at least once a year (Banking Law art. 119).

(d) Consent of debtor

6. It seems that under ENGLISH law the creditor is bound to answer questions of the security provider as to the amount of the secured debt only if the debtor has given permission to do so (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 4-28; Andrews and Millett no. 5-026; Hapgood 712). The debtor's consent implies the permission for the creditor to answer specific questions of the security provider; thus, the scope of the consent being limited in this way, it seems that the question of revocability of the debtor's consent in relation to information to be given to the security provider does not arise.

(e) Sanctions

7. In ENGLAND, a specific sanction exists for the failure to comply with the information requirements under the ConsCredA 1974: according to ss. 107 para. 4, 108 para. 4 and 109 para. 3, the creditor is not entitled to enforce the security while the default continues (cf. O´Donovan and Phillips nos. 3-179; Andrews and Millett no. 17-008). Similarly in FRANCE, if the creditor does not give the required information, the consumer provider of dependent security is discharged from certain ancillary obligations, e.g. penalties or default interest, until the creditor makes the notification (ConsC art. L. 341-6 sentence 3 and MonC art. L 313-22 para. 2). By contrast, in case of a global security, if the creditor omits or delays the required information, the consumer provider of dependent security is definitely released from any liability in relation to ancillary obligations (FRENCH CC art. 2016 para. 2 (since 2006: CC art. 2293 para. 2)). ITALIAN Banking Law art. 127 entrusts the Ufficio italiano cambi, a special body of the Bank of Italy, and the Minister of the Economy with the task of controlling banks´ compliance with those rules. Repeated violations of these rules may lead to suspension of the bank's activities for no more than thirty days (art. 127 para. 5).

III. No duty to inform the security provider without default by debtor

8. In some member states, however, there is no such duty of annual information as provided for in this Article or a corresponding duty to answer questions, cf. the national notes on IV.G.–2:107 concerning member states that do not impose any information duties on the creditor. In SPANISH consumer law, none of the items listed in ConsProtA art. 60 (duty to inform in consumer contracts) relates to the amount or increase of risk taken by a consumer as guarantor.

IV.G.–4:107: Limiting security with time limit

(1) A security provider who has provided a security whose scope is limited to obligations arising, or obligations performance of which falls due, within an agreed time limit may three years after the security became effective limit its effects by giving notice of at least three months to the creditor. The preceding sentence does not apply if the security is restricted to cover specific obligations or obligations arising from specific contracts. The creditor has to inform the debtor immediately on receipt of a notice of limitation of the security by the security provider.

(2) By virtue of the notice, the scope of the security is limited according to IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit) paragraph (2).

COMMENTS

A. General

For providers of dependent or independent security – whether consumers or not – these Rules provide protection by requiring that such securities, subject to certain exceptions, must have either an agreed time limit or be subject to the possibility of a time limit being set by any party. For the consumer security provider, however, even securities with an agreed time limit can be regarded as creating an intolerable level of risk: consumer security providers will typically lack business experience; if they assume a security which is agreed to cover unspecified future obligations of the debtor over a period of several years they might not be able to foresee the extent of obligations of the debtor which over the course of time could fall under this security. This Article accordingly provides additional protection for consumer security providers by allowing them to limit the duration of securities with an agreed time limit if these securities run over a period of three years or more.

B. Scope of application

Securities with a time limit. The Article applies to securities with an agreed time limit only. This limitation may seem surprising since the need to limit a security obviously is more pressing if the parties had not agreed upon a time limit. However, this gap is easily explained by the fact that securities without an agreed time limit may be limited under IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit) read with IV.G.– 4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1) and IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c)).

Applicability to all types of security. The Article is applicable regardless of the type of personal security assumed by the consumer security provider. The fact that the Article refers to IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit) in the Chapter on dependent security, does not give rise to any difficulties since the provisions of that Chapter are applicable to consumer providers of an independent security and consumer security providers in a co-debtorship for security purposes by virtue of IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (c) and IV.G.–4:102 (Applicable rules) paragraph (1) respectively.

Excluded cases. According to paragraph (1) sentence 2, the right to limit a security on the basis of this Article does not apply where the security is restricted to cover specific obligations or obligations arising from specific contracts. This exception is intended to protect the creditor who may have concluded the contract from which the secured obligations arise only on the strength of the security provided in relation to these obligations. Moreover, the risk of an unforeseeable extent of the consumer security provider's liability appears to be less pressing in these situations as the reference to a specific obligation or a specific contract should make the potential scope of the security more easily determinable even for the consumer security provider.

Scope of application limited. The scope of application of the Article is further in effect limited as a result of IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a) to securities with an agreed maximum amount. The right to limit the scope of a security is of interest especially in cases where the security is agreed to cover not only existing but also future obligations. Should a security lack an agreed maximum amount, such a fixed amount will be determined on the basis of IV.G.–2:102 (Dependence of security provider's obligation) paragraph (3) read with IV.G.–4:106 (Nature of security provider's liability) sub-paragraph (a). Often in cases of securities covering future obligations the amount of the secured obligations at the time the security becomes effective, i.e. normally at the time the security is assumed, will be very low or nil, so that a future limitation on the basis of the present Article will not be of much interest for the security provider in these situations.

C. Limitation of security by consumer security provider

Limitation by security provider giving notice. The security may be limited by a simple notice; contrary to IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit), only the security provider is entitled to limit the effects of the security.

Limitation after minimum period of three years. A security with an agreed time limit may only be limited by the security provider if at least three years have passed since the security became effective. It is assumed that even the consumer security provider should be able to foresee the risks to be incurred over such a period of limited time, so that the additional protection provided by this Article does not appear to be necessary in these cases.

Period of notice. As in IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit), the limitation of the security can become effective only after a period of notice of at least three months has expired. See Comments on that Article.

D. Effects of limitation

Limitation of the scope of the security. For the limitation of the scope of the security, paragraph (2) refers to IV.G.–2:109 (Limiting security without time limit) paragraph (2). For the effects of the limitation under this provision see the Comments on that Article.

Creditor's duty to inform the debtor. According to paragraph (1) sentence 3, the creditor has to inform the debtor on receiving a notice of limitation of the security by the security provider. This provision is necessary because often not only the creditor, but also the debtor will have relied on the security running until its agreed time limit.

Limitation according to this Article and agreed time limit for resort to security. The limitation of the security by the security provider according to this Article does not in itself create a time limit for resort to the security within the meaning of IV.G.– 2:108 (Time limit for resort to security). However, should the parties have agreed on such a time limit for resort to the security, it will not be affected if the security provider limits the security according to the present Article. While the scope of the security will be limited, the creditor will still be able to resort to this security until expiration of the original time limit agreed by the parties.

NOTES

I. Member States with specific rules on limitation of securities by consumer security providers

1. The DUTCH regulation of time limits for consumer providers of security is quite elaborate. It is limited, though, to personal security for future obligations of the debtor (CC art. 7:861(1)). Such a dependent security can be terminated at any time if no time limit had been agreed for it (lit. a); and after five years, if it had been agreed for a limited period (lit. b). In both cases, the security remains valid for obligations that had already arisen at the time of termination (CC art. 7:861(2)). These rules are mandatory in favour of consumers (CC art. 7:862 lit. a).
2. Under BELGIAN law personal securities for a credit without an agreed time limit assumed by security providers – without distinguishing between consumer and other security providers – are automatically limited to five years. This period of five years can be prolonged at the end of the period for another five years with the express consent of the consumer security provider (ConsCredA art. 34(3), as amended in 2003).
3. In FRANCE consumer security providers are not allowed to assume indefinite dependent personal securities; these must have a time limit but no maximum period has been fixed (for all credit types: ConsC art. L. 341-7 and for consumer credit only: ConsC art. L. 313-7).

II. Member States without specific rules on limitation of securities by consumer security providers

4. Under ENGLISH, FINNISH and GERMAN law, the possibilities for security providers to limit the scope of personal securities as described in the national notes to IV.G.–2:109 follow from general principles (England: general equitable rules, cf. O´Donovan and Phillips no. 9-43; Finland: LDepGuar § 19(2); RP 189/1998 rd 57; Germany: cf. national notes to IV.G.–2:109 nos. 6 s.). No special provisions do exist for the limitation of securities by consumer security providers. The same is true in SPAIN In Italy, in the absence of an agreement of the parties to the contrary, as a general rule a security provider may limit the security at any time only if the latter was without time limit (Cass. 6 August 1992 no. 9349, Giur.it 1993 I 1, 1255; Petti 154; see national notes to IV.G.–2:109 no. 3), but also this is a general rule which applies independently from the qualification of the security provider as a consumer.

PART H. DONATION

CHAPTER 1: SCOPE OF APPLICATION AND GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 1: Scope of application and definitions

IV.H.–1:101: Contracts covered

(1) This Part of Book IV applies to contracts for the donation of goods.

(2) A contract for the donation of goods is a contract under which one party, the donor, gratuitously undertakes to transfer the ownership of goods to another party, the donee, and does so with an intention to benefit the donee.

IV.H.–1:102: Future goods and goods to be manufactured or produced

(1) In this Part of Book IV the word "goods" includes goods which at the time of the conclusion of the contract do not yet exist or are to be acquired by the donor.

(2) A contract under which one party undertakes gratuitously, and with an intention to benefit the other party, to manufacture or produce goods for the other party and to transfer their ownership to the other party is to be regarded as primarily a contract for the donation of the goods.

IV.H.–1:103: Application to other assets

(1) This Part applies with appropriate adaptations to:

- (a) contracts for the donation of money;
- (b) contracts for the donation of electricity;
- (c) contracts for the donation of stocks, shares, investment securities and negotiable instruments;
- (d) contracts for the donation of other forms of incorporeal property, including rights to the performance of obligations, industrial and intellectual property rights and other transferable rights;
- (e) contracts gratuitously conferring rights in information or data, including software and databases.

(2) This Part does not apply to contracts for the donation of immovable property or rights in immovable property.

IV.H.–1:104: Application to unilateral undertakings and immediate donations

This Part applies with appropriate adaptations where the donor gratuitously, with an intention to benefit the donee:

- (a) unilaterally undertakes to transfer the ownership of goods to the donee; or
- (b) immediately transfers the ownership of goods to the donee.

IV.H.–1:105: Donations due or conditional on death

(1) This Part does not apply where:

(a) performance of the obligation to transfer is due only on the donor's death;

(b) the transfer or obligation to transfer is subject to the suspensive condition of the donor's death; or

(c) the transfer or obligation to transfer is made subject to the resolutive condition of the donee predeceasing the donor.

(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply if the donor renders performance or waives the condition before the donor's death.

Section 2: Gratuitousness and intention to benefit

IV.H.–1:201: Gratuitousness

An undertaking to transfer is gratuitous if it is done without reward

IV.H.–1:202: Transactions which are not entirely gratuitous

(1) If the party undertaking to transfer receives or is entitled to some reward and the transaction is thereby not entirely gratuitous the contract is regarded primarily as a contract for the donation of goods if:

(a) this party undertakes to transfer with an intention inter alia to benefit the other party; and

(b) the values to be conferred by the performances are regarded by both parties as not substantially equivalent.

(2) If the contract coming under paragraph (1) is void or avoided under these rules but would not be under general rules, III.–1:110 (Variation or termination by court on a change of circumstances) applies with appropriate adaptations.

(3) If in a case within paragraph (1) a party exercises a right to revoke under this Part, IV.H.–4:103 (Consequences of revocation) applies to the whole contractual relationship. The other party may prevent the effects of revocation by offering a reasonable reward within a reasonable time after revocation.

IV.H.–1:203: Intention to benefit

A donor may be regarded as intending to benefit the donee notwithstanding that the donor:

(a) is under a moral obligation to transfer; or

(b) has a promotional purpose.

CHAPTER 2: FORMATION AND VALIDITY

IV.H.–2:101: Form requirements

A contract for the donation of goods is not valid unless the undertaking of the donor is in textual form on a durable medium signed by the donor. An electronic signature which is not an advanced signature in the sense of I.–1:107 ("Signature" and similar expressions) paragraph 4, does not suffice in this regard.

IV.H.–2:102: Exceptions to the form requirements

The preceding Article does not apply:

(a) in the case of an immediate delivery of the goods to the donee or an equivalent to such delivery, regardless of whether ownership is transferred;

(b) if the donation is made by a business;

(c) if the undertaking of the donor is declared in a public statement broadcast in the radio or television or published in print and is not excessive in the circumstances.

IV.H.–2:103: Mistake

A donor may avoid the contract if it was concluded because of a mistake of fact or law although the requirements of II.–7:201 (Mistake) paragraph (1)(b) are not satisfied.

IV.H.–2:104: Unfair exploitation

A donor, who was dependent on, or was the more vulnerable party in a relationship of trust with the donee, may avoid the contract under II.–7:207 (Unfair exploitation) unless the donee proves that the donee did not exploit the donor's situation by taking an excessive benefit or grossly unfair advantage.

CHAPTER 3: OBLIGATIONS AND REMEDIES

Section 1: Obligations of the donor

IV.H.–3:101: Obligations in general

(1) The donor must:

(a) deliver goods which conform with the contract; and

(b) transfer the ownership in the goods as required by the contract.

(2) This Section applies with appropriate adaptations to fruits acquired from the time when the obligation to deliver is due.

IV.H.–3:102: Conformity of the goods

(1) The goods do not conform with the contract if they do not possess the qualities which the donee could reasonably expect unless the donee knew of the lack of quality or could reasonably be expected to have known of it when the contract was concluded.

(2) In determining what qualities the donee could reasonably expect, regard is to be had, among other things, to:

- (a) the gratuitous nature of the contract;
- (b) the purpose of the contract of donation known by, or obvious to, the donee;
- (c) whether the transfer or delivery of the goods was immediate;
- (d) the value of the goods; and
- (e) whether the donor was a business.

(3) The goods do not conform to the contract if they are not of a quantity, quality or description provided for by the terms of the contract.

IV.H.–3:103: Third party rights or claims

The goods do not conform with the contract if they are not free from any right or reasonably well founded claim of a third party unless the donee knew or could reasonably expected to have known of the third party's right or claim.

Section 2: Remedies of the donee

IV.H.–3:201: Application of general rules

If the donor fails to perform any of the donor's obligations under the contract, the donee has the remedies provided for in Book III, Chapter 3 (Remedies for non-performance) unless otherwise provided in this Section.

IV.H.–3:202: Restricted right to enforce performance

(1) If the goods do not conform with the contract, the donee may not require replacement or repair under III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations).

(2) The donee may not enforce performance under III.–3:302 (Enforcement of non-monetary obligations) in the case of goods which are to be acquired by the donor.

IV.H.–3:203: Restitution in case of termination

If the donee terminates the contract under Book III, Chapter 3, Section 5 (Termination), III.–3:511 (When restitution not required) paragraph (3) does not apply.

IV.H.–3:204: Exclusion of the right to damages in case of impediment

(1) A donee's right to damages is excluded if the donor's non-performance is due to an impediment and if the donor could not reasonably be expected to have avoided or overcome the impediment or its consequences.

(2) III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) paragraphs (3) and (5) apply correspondingly.

(3) In determining what impediment or consequences the donor could reasonably be expected to have avoided or overcome regard is to be had to the gratuitous nature of the contract.

(4) This Article does not affect liability under Book VI (Non-Contractual Liability Arising Out of Damage Caused to Another).

IV.H.–3:205: Measure of damages

(1) Damages cover loss suffered by the donee acting in the reasonable belief that the donor would fulfil the obligations.

(2) A supplementary sum of damages may be awarded by the court if it is seen as just and reasonable in the circumstances.

(3) In determining what is just and reasonable under paragraph (2), regard is to be had, among other things and apart from the gratuitous nature of the contract:

(a) the declarations and acts of the parties;
(b) the donor's purpose in making donation; and
(c) the reasonable expectations of the donee.

(4) The total amount of damages under this Article may not exceed such a sum as will put the aggrieved party as nearly as possible into the position in which it would have been if the donor's obligations under the contract had been duly performed.

(5) This Article does not affect liability under Book VI (Non-Contractual Liability Arising Out of Damage Caused to Another).

IV.H.–3:206: Delay in payment of money

If payment of a sum of money is delayed, the donee is entitled to interest under III.–3:708 (Interest on late payments) unless the non-performance is excused under III.–3:104 (Excuse due to an impediment) or the donee's right to damages is excluded under IV.H.–3:204 (Exclusion of the right to damages in case of impediment).

Section 3: Obligations of the donee

IV.H.–3:301: Obligations to take delivery and accept transfer

(1) The donee must take delivery and accept the transfer of ownership.

(2) The donee performs the obligation to take delivery and accept transfer by carrying out all the acts which could reasonably be expected of the donee in order to enable the donor to perform the obligations to deliver and transfer.

Section 4: Remedies of the Donor

IV.H.–3:401: Application of general rules

If the donee fails to perform any of the donee's obligations under the contract, the donor has the remedies provided for in III.–2:111 (Property not accepted), III.–2:112 (Money not accepted) and Book III, Chapter 3 (Remedies for non-performance).

CHAPTER 4: REVOCATION BY THE DONOR

Section 1: Revocation in General

IV.H.–4:101: Irrevocability and its exceptions

Contracts for donation of goods are revocable only if a right to revoke is

(a) conferred by the terms of the contract; or

(b) provided for under the rules in this Chapter.

IV.H.–4:102: Exercise and scope of the right to revoke

(1) The donor's right to revoke is to be exercised by giving notice to the donee.

(2) A declaration of partial revocation is to be understood as a revocation of the whole contract for the donation of goods, if, giving due consideration to all the circumstances of the case, it is unreasonable to uphold the remaining parts.

IV.H.–4:103: Consequences of revocation

(1) On revocation under this Chapter, the outstanding obligations of the parties under the contract come to an end. In the case of a partial revocation, the relevant part of the outstanding obligations comes to an end.

(2) On revocation under this Chapter, the donee is obliged to return the goods. Chapters 5 and 6 of Book VII (Unjustified Enrichment) apply with appropriate adaptations, unless otherwise provided in this Chapter.

IV.H.–4:104: Time limits

The right to revoke under this Chapter expires if notice of revocation is not given within a reasonable time, with due regard to the circumstances, after the donor knew or could reasonably be expected to have known of the relevant facts.

Section 2: Rights of the donor to revoke

IV.H.–4:201: Ingratitude of the donee

(1) A contract for the donation of goods may be revoked if the donee is guilty of gross ingratitude by intentionally committing a serious wrong against the donor.

(2) Revocation under this Article is excluded if the donor knowing the relevant facts forgives the donee.

(3) For the purpose of paragraph (1) a reasonable time under IV.H–4:104 (Time limits) is at least one year. If the donor dies before the reasonable time has expired, the running of the period is suspended until the person entitled to revoke knows or can reasonably be expected to know of the relevant facts.

(4) For the purpose of paragraph (1) the defence of disenrichment under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment) does not apply.

IV.H.–4:202: Impoverishment of the donor

(1) A contract for the donation of goods may be revoked if the donor is not in a position to maintain himself or herself out of his or her own patrimony or income.

(2) The donor is not in a position to maintain himself or herself if:

(a) he or she would be entitled to maintenance from another if that other were in a position to provide the maintenance; or
(b) he or she is entitled to social assistance.

(3) The right to revoke is suspended if the donee maintains the donor to the extent that the latter is or would be entitled to under paragraph (2).

(4) A donor who is not in a position to maintain himself or herself in the sense of paragraph (1) or who will imminently be in that situation may withhold performance of any obligations under the contract which have not yet been performed. Paragraph (3) applies correspondingly to the right to withhold performance. If the donor withholds performance, the donee may terminate the contractual relationship.

(5) This Article applies also when the donor's ability to meet maintenance obligations established by rule of law or by court order, or the existence of those obligations, is dependent on effective revocation of a donation.

(6) The right to revoke under this Article may not be restricted or excluded by the parties.

IV.H.–4:203: Residual right to revoke

(1) A contract for the donation of goods may also be revoked to the extent that other essential circumstances upon which it was based have materially changed after the conclusion of the contract, provided that as a result of that change:

(a) the benefit to the donee is manifestly inappropriate or excessive; or
(b) it is manifestly unjust to hold the donor to the donation.

(2) Paragraph (1) applies only if:

(a) the change of circumstances was not so foreseeable at the time of the conclusion of the contract that the donor could reasonably have been expected to provide for it; and
(b) the risk of that change of circumstances was not assumed by the donor.

BOOK V

BENEVOLENT INTERVENTION IN ANOTHER'S AFFAIRS

CHAPTER 1: SCOPE OF APPLICATION

V.–1:101: Intervention to benefit another

(1) This Book applies where a person, the intervener, acts with the predominant intention of benefiting another, the principal, and:

(a) the intervener has a reasonable ground for acting; or
(b) the principal approves the act without such undue delay as would adversely affect the intervener.

(2) The intervener does not have a reasonable ground for acting if the intervener:

(a) has a reasonable opportunity to discover the principal's wishes but does not do so; or
(b) knows or can reasonably be expected to know that the intervention is against the principal's wishes.

COMMENTS

A. General

Terminology. The provisions of this Chapter contain rules regulating the legal relationship between two persons where one party, either for good reasons or with the subsequent approval of the other, has chosen to intervene in the other's affairs for the furtherance of the latter's interests. This law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs (or negotiorum gestio) thus governs the rights and duties of the party acting (in the various laws of the Member States presently termed, inter alia, dioikitis allotrion, forretningsfører, gérant, Geschäftsführer, gestor, gestore, megbízás nélküli ügyvivoő, zaakwaarnemer) and the party to be benefited (the belanghebbende, dominus, dono do negócio, dueño, forretningsherre, géré, Geschäftsherr, huvudman, interesado, interessato, kyrios, maître de l´affaire, ügy ura). In the English version of these Articles, the dominus is referred to as the "principal". The active party is referred to as the "intervener".

Requirements of benevolent intervention. According to paragraph (1) of the present Article and V.–1:103 (Exclusions), benevolent intervention has two positive requirements and three negative requirements. There must be (i) an act which is undertaken with the predominant intention of benefiting another (the principal) and (ii) a reasonable ground for this intervention. Additionally the party acting must not be either (iii) obliged or (iv) otherwise authorised under other rules of the legal system (that is to say, rules outside the law of benevolent intervention) to act in relation to the benefited party, or (v) under an obligation to act in relation to a third party. In addition sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph (1) of the present Article makes it clear that the provisions of this Chapter also apply if the intervener intervenes without reasonable ground in the affairs of the principal, but the activity is approved by the latter without such undue delay as would adversely affect the intervener. The approval by the principal takes the place of the (missing) reasonable ground for acting in the principal's sphere of interest. There is no further requirement in that the intervener must manage an affair which from an objective perspective is the affair of another (that is to say, an extraneous affair in relation to the intervener); the single decisive element is that the intervener acts with the predominant intention to benefit the other. It is the intention to benefit another, acted upon on the basis of a reasonable ground, which attributes the act to the principal.

Illustration 1
G is the owner of a very ugly factory site. In order to save his neighbour the awful sight of the buildings, G, acting on his own initiative, plants a row of trees along the property boundaries. G may have acted with the predominant intention to benefit his neighbour, but he is not an intervener because he has not acted upon his intention to benefit another on the basis of a reasonable ground. He has imposed an enrichment on his neighbour.

Illustration 2
In order to apply an emergency bandage on a badly injured pedestrian, P, a passer-by G uses dressing material. G will qualify as an intervener in relation to P irrespective of whether she uses her own dressing material or if she smashes the window of a car belonging to a third party in order to get hold of dressing material lying on the back seat. In relation to the third party, this act qualifies as a justified act of emergency within the meaning of VI.–5:202 (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity) paragraph (2) for which G is liable to provide reasonable compensation.

Protection of the principal against officious intermeddling. In order to protect the principal from officious intermeddling by others, paragraph (2) makes the clear demand that the intervener must be directed as far as possible in the circumstances by the wishes of the principal, so far as the intervener is in a position to identify them. Paragraph (2) is an ancillary norm serving as a particularisation of paragraph (1)(a).

Special forms of the law of benevolent intervention are not within this regime. The provisions of this Chapter have as their subject matter only the so-called justified management of another's affairs and the rights and duties of the intervener and the principal which arise out of that. If someone interferes in the affairs of another without reasonable ground and that other is not moved to approve the intervention, then the rights and obligations of the parties remain subject to other areas of the law – in particular the law on non-contractual liability for damage and the law on unjustified enrichment – and not the law on benevolent intervention. The same correspondingly holds true where a person intermeddles in the affairs of another in order to pursue that person's own interests, and that is so irrespective of whether this happens intentionally or by mistake (for example, because that person meant to advance his or her own interests, but has actually furthered another's interests). Contrastingly, the provisions of this Chapter are applicable where the intervention is justified, but the intervener infringes a duty which arises out of the justified management of another's affairs. See for more detail Chapter 2 (Duties of intervener).

Benevolent intervention as a defence within the framework of the law on non-contractual liability for damage. Justified benevolent intervention in advancement of another's interests constitutes a ground of defence in respect of a non-contractual liability in damages which would otherwise be imposed. That is expressly set out in VI.–5:202) (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity) paragraph (2).

Illustration 3
As a result of a traffic accident P is rendered unconscious and locked in a car. G smashes a car window in order to be able to unlock the door from the inside and pull P out of the car. G is not liable to P under the law on non-contractual liability for the damage caused to the car.

Burden of proof. These rules regard the question of burden of proof as belonging to substantive law. Rules on burden of proof are applicable when it is not possible to clearly establish the circumstances of the case. Within the law of benevolent intervention the general principle applies whereby each party must make out the circumstances favourable to that party's case and in case of dispute prove them. When a given party is not able to do that, the decision in the case must be adverse to that party.

Illustration 4
The facts are the same as in Illustration 3, save that in smashing in the window G is injured. Both parties claim compensation – P under the law on non-contractual liability on account of property damage and G under the law on benevolent intervention (V.–3:103 (Right to reparation)) on account of the personal injury suffered in acting as intervener. If it is disputed and cannot be established whether G really acted for the purpose of rescuing P, then P's claim to compensation will succeed, while G's claim will fail.

Proof. By contrast, all questions which are related to the problem whether a given fact is to be regarded as proven are part of the law of procedure. They are therefore not the subject matter of these rules.

Illustration 5
The facts are again the same as in illustration 3. However, P later maintains that G smashed the window only (or at least primarily) for opportunistic reasons, meaning to steal the camera lying on the passenger seat of P's car. (National) procedural law determines under what conditions and to what extent G's case is supported by presumptions triggered by a prima facie case. (For example, G might prove that P was in fact subsequently liberated from the car by G, from which it may prima facie follow that when breaking the glass beforehand G was acting predominantly with the intention of rescuing P.) The same goes for the question as to what concrete circumstances place upon P an onus of introducing evidence to rebut a prima facie case. (For example, P might seek to show that G was later found with the camera and unable to offer a convincing explanation for having it and that G had made no serious attempt to free P.)

B. The activities covered

'Acting' for another. Paragraph (1) of the Article states that the provisions of this Book apply where a person 'acts' for another. The type of act required is not further qualified. It follows that every type of act may be considered a benevolent intervention – services as much as making things (or money) available for use or paying another's debt. This wide scope of application embraces acts having legal effects as well as acts merely changing the physical state of affairs. A benevolent intervention may consist in the conclusion of a contract or giving notice to terminate a legal relationship just as much as it may consist in effecting repairs, making a telephone call, keeping property safe, giving a warning, removing a vehicle, cutting back trees overhanging the public thoroughfare, feeding (or, in a case of emergency, killing) animals, and so forth. All of these are 'acts' within the meaning of that term in the present Article. That of course does not exclude the possibility that certain of the following provisions of this Book may be entirely or at any rate predominantly directed towards one form of acting rather than another, be it acts having legal effects or acts of a merely physical import. A case in point where it is the former rather than the latter which is in focus is V.–3:106(Authority of intervener to act as representative of the principal) and which thus necessarily concerns only juridical acts. By contrast, V.–3:103 (Right to reparation) concerning reparation will as a rule only come into play in respect of acts of a merely physical significance.

Acts to protect another's person are included. Furthermore, it is clear that the concept of benevolent intervention in another's affairs as understood in these rules is in no way limited to acts for the protection of another's patrimonial interests. Instead it includes within its compass acts for the protection of another's person and hence such acts as bandaging the wounded, bringing the injured to hospital and saving someone from a dangerous situation (as in Illustration 3 above).

One-off activities and long-term undertakings. The 'act' can consist in an isolated, one-off act as much as an enduring matrix of activities such as the administration of a bank deposit or the management of another's farm or business. To cater in particular for such longer term activities the provision in V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (c) (concerning the on-going duty of the intervener to provide information) has been devised; for activities which start and finish in a momentary act that provision will not come into play.

Omissions. It is theoretically conceivable that a benevolent intervention might even consist in an omission. Practically speaking, however, that can rarely be the case, not least because the commonest situations in which the outward appearance of a person's conduct would lend itself to a benevolent intervention will often be absorbed by the law of contract and in such circumstances, in accordance with V.–1:103 (Exclusions) sub-paragraph (a), the rules of contract law will claim priority over the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs.

> Illustration 6
> A notary, acting contrary to instructions, does not forward a client's money to the tax authority because the notary has learned in the meantime of a change to the taxing statutes whereby tax is no longer payable. A garage, acting in the interest of a customer, does not repair the car brought in to be repaired in order to save it from the grasp of an occupying power. Conduct of this kind would normally be construed as performing a contractual obligation and therefore as being outside the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs from the very outset.

Actions contrary to law or public policy. Acts of an intervener which are unlawful or contrary to public policy are not per se excluded by the Articles from their scope of application. Such a rule does not appear necessary and, moreover, it would be dangerous to introduce one because in defined circumstances it could be the cause of misunderstanding. Certainly, under normal circumstances the act of the intervener must not be either prohibited by law or contrary to public policy. However, that follows from the fact that in both of those cases the reasonable ground for intervention would usually be missing.

Illustration 7
P, a member of a band of thieves, is ill. Disproving the adage that there is no honour among thieves, P's friend G undertakes P's "workload" on P's behalf. Under the law of benevolent intervention P can have no claim against G to the money stolen from third parties by G on P's behalf (and correspondingly G has no claims against P).

Emergency situations. However, it is conceivable that in situations of emergency even otherwise illegal conduct might, in special circumstances, be reasonable. The emergency might compel an intervener to act in a way which is prohibited by law or which, under normal circumstances, would be regarded as contrary to public policy.

Illustration 8
A person is only able to obtain the release of a travelling companion, who is being wrongfully held in custody in a corrupt foreign state, by paying bribes. Although bribery is prohibited and although the legal system to which the intervener and the principal are subject (be it by reason of common nationality or habitual residence) would also usually disapprove of the bribery of foreign officials, in such extreme conditions the act of bribery might still be reasonable in relation to the principal. The intervener can consequently demand reimbursement of the expenditure incurred in making the bribes: see V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement).

Disallowed interventions. It may nonetheless be the case that even after considering the situation of emergency, a given conduct is regarded by a legal system as prohibited for reasons of overriding significance. In that event it is unreasonable for the purposes of the law of benevolent intervention to disregard the prohibition.

Illustration 9
Under the law of a Member State it is prohibited on the basis of a particular statutory provision to pay a ransom to a kidnapper. A son who ransoms his father from the clutches of his captors has no claim against his father for reimbursement on the basis of benevolent intervention. The son has no reasonable ground to intervene in this manner.

Acts of an inherently personal nature excluded. Acts which are of such an inherently personal nature that they can only be done by an individual in person are by their very nature excluded. That is not expressly stated in the Article, but should be understood as inherent and can be inferred from V.–3:106 (Authority of intervener to act as representative of the principal) which under certain conditions confers on the intervener the authority to act in a way which binds and favours the principal directly in relation to third parties (i.e. to act as the principal's representative). Acts which cannot permissibly form the subject-matter of a representation relationship cannot permissibly be made the subject-matter of a benevolent intervention in another's affairs. In so far as the law of succession does not allow a person to execute a will for another, it will not be possible for an intervener to undertake such an act as benevolent intervener for the testator. A similar point can be made in relation to a juridical act which purports to change another's marital status or parental responsibility or to alter an individual's name. However, a person is also precluded from putting forward a particular philosophical or political viewpoint on behalf of another – for example election publicity as benevolent intervener for a political party.

Conducting litigation as a benevolent intervener. An act within the meaning of the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs can also consist in conducting litigation. In that case, however, one must distinguish between two fundamentally different situations, namely conducting litigation in one's own name and conducting litigation in the name of the principal. The first situation, in which the intervener litigates against a third party in the principal's interest but in the intervener's own name (for example, in pursuing through the courts a claim to the purchase price where in a case of necessity the intervener has sold goods belonging to the principal), does not throw up any special issues. The intervener may even be obliged to take such action in defence of the principal's interests (in consequence of prior acts) as part of the duty to continue the intervention within the bounds set out in V.–2:101(Duties during intervention) paragraph (2). More difficult, by contrast, is the problem of whether and under what conditions an intervener may litigate in the name of the principal if the latter is hindered personally from attending to affairs. A case in point would be, for example, an attempt by an intervener to commence legal proceedings in order to prevent a statutory limitation of the principal's claim to an unpaid purchase price which threatens to become time-barred. Whether such a form of undertaking the affairs of another is possible or whether the matter remains reserved to the principal as something which can only be carried out personally is not determined by these rules. Rather they presuppose, in keeping with most jurisdictions of the EU, that one is concerned here with a question of procedural law which must be resolved by the applicable law of procedure. The position adopted in the majority of national procedural laws appears to be that an intervener will be permitted by a court to conduct litigation on a provisional basis up to a certain point in time, determined by the court, when a mandate or power of attorney must be filed, in default of which the action will be dismissed.

C. The intention predominantly to benefit another (paragraph (1))

Meaning of 'benefiting'. As regards the positive requirements of benevolent intervention in another's affairs, as stated already the text operates with one subjective element (intention to benefit) and one objective element (reasonable ground). As a first essential, the intervener must act with the intention of benefiting another. The word 'benefiting' is to be understood in this context as having a wide significance; in particular it does not relate merely to benefits of a type falling within patrimonial law in the sense of an enrichment. That follows already from the explanation in nos. 8-9 above of the concept of an 'act'. See also Illustration 3 above.

The success of the venture is not essential. Furthermore, it is important to recognise that it is the intention of benefiting another that matters, not an actual benefit as such. This intention turns only on the prospective utility which, at the time of acting, might be anticipated and not the resultant usefulness which may or may not have emerged after the act has been completed or stopped. The intervener must therefore have acted with the intention of managing another's affairs for that other's benefit, assessed at the time the intervener is active, but as a fundamental principle this good intention is sufficient. Whether or not the act was ultimately successful (the resultant benefit) is not a criterion and is immaterial. In this way the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs is distinguishable from the law of unjustified enrichment.

Illustration 10
P suddenly loses consciousness behind the wheel of her car. Her car comes to rest over a sheer drop; she is rescued and taken to hospital. P's car threatens to run down the slope. G, who operates a breakdown service and has been informed of the situation by a third party, resolves to tow the car back on to the road using a winch and bring it to P's house. Due to a latent defect in the material, the steel cable snaps; the car tumbles down into the void. G acted with the intention of benefiting P. That this intervention ultimately resulted in more harm than good does not alter the matter.

Benefiting another, not intending to pursue one's own interests. The intervener must have acted with the intention of benefiting another. A person who pursues their own interests is not a benevolent intervener. Moreover, merely having in fact undertaken another's affairs will also not suffice if that was done inadvertently or unwittingly. Someone who assumes they are discharging their own obligation and acts accordingly, in reality discharging another's obligation, is not acting as a benevolent intervener. A case in point would be a married man who maintains a child of his wife in the assumption that he is the father, though in reality another man is the biological father of the child. In the absence of a special statutory regime (in this case, in family law), such cases remain to be dealt with within the law of unjustified enrichment.

Illustration 11
From a vague report provided by children it appears that G's son has broken a neighbour's window pane with a ball. On that basis G pays for the damage. Later it emerges that a different boy was responsible. G does not act as intervener for either the boy responsible or (so far as they would be vicariously liable for the property damage caused by their son) the boy's parents. Any claim for reimbursement of the payment made can be made only in accordance with the law of unjustified enrichment. It will be for the law of unjustified enrichment to determine whether G has a claim against the other boy, or the parents of the other boy, or can instead demand a repayment from the neighbour.

Illustration 12
A music publishing company continues to make use of publishing rights, assigned to the company for its use for a limited time only, after the death of the composer in the erroneous supposition that the rights had fallen into the public domain. The publishing company cannot set off against the claim of the composer's successors for surrender of the proceeds a claim based in benevolent intervention for remuneration for its commercial activity in marketing the music. The company had not intended to benefit the composer's successors.

No possibility of approval for acts undertaken for own benefit. In contrast to the element of reasonable ground (paragraph (1) sub-paragraph (a) in conjunction with paragraph (2)), the subjective requirement of an intention to benefit another cannot be replaced by a timeous approval of the act by way of ratification. The justification for the possibility of an approval of an intermeddler's act is based on the assumption that the intermeddler was acting for the person subsequently giving their approval for what has been done, so that there is, as it were, in retrospect a meeting of minds between the parties. According to the rules of benevolent intervention in another's affairs an approval by the principal is not therefore an option if the intervener has been acting mainly in the intervener's own interest and just happened to have a secondary aim of benefiting the principal. That, however, does not preclude the possible application of the rules on representation. Under II.–6:111 (Ratification) paragraphs (1) and (2) a principal can ratify a transaction which a person purporting to be the principal's representative, but acting without authority, has concluded with a third party. In this context it does not matter whether the false representative acted with the intention of benefiting the principal or for his or her own benefit.

Predominant' intention of benefiting another. In order to evade the problem arising where an intervener acts with a mixture of interests in mind – that is, the problem that hardly anybody ever acts exclusively in another's interest – paragraph (1) requires that the intervener must intend predominantly to benefit the principal. Where the pursuit of another's interest and the pursuit of one's own interest have been combined together, it is sufficient that the former is, at the margin, uppermost. This excludes all argument that an intervener will have a right to reimbursement when in substance acting for his or her own advantage merely because some lesser part of the intention was to benefit the principal.

Illustration 13
A genealogist (G) makes his living by, among other things, responding to public announcements of apparently 'heirless' estates. Such publications arise where a person dies leaving an estate and the court responsible for matters relating to intestate succession to the estate is compelled according to the tenor of the documentation before the court to assume that the deceased died without relatives entitled to succeed to the estate. If such relatives do not identify themselves within a given time limit, the estate will pass to the public exchequer. G is successful in seeking out such relatives. He offers, in exchange for a reward amounting to 20% of the estate, to provide them with requisite details and to conduct the process of winding up the estate. To demonstrate his seriousness, he reveals to them preliminary information of a rudimentary kind. However, that information turns out to be sufficient for the relatives to locate the court with responsibility for the succession and to press their claims to the inheritance. G has only collaterally sought to advance the interests of the relatives. His main concern was the conclusion of a contract into which, however, the relatives did not in fact enter. G has no claim against the relatives and in particular none arising out of V.–3:102 (Right to remuneration). A second reason to deny such a claim for remuneration would be that under Art. 9 of the Directive 97/7 on protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts no consumer is compelled to pay for unsolicited services. This provision does not, however, mean that European Community law has completely abolished claims for expenditure in respect of unsolicited services (see II.–3:401(No obligation arising from failure to respond) paragraph (2)(a)), but it does mean that its value judgments must be reflected by the law of benevolent intervention.

Illustration 14
Farmer F notices that following a storm a tree in the highway has fallen down and is lying across the street. Being a weekend, nobody can be contacted at the local authority, which is responsible for the tree and the safety of the street, who will be able to react promptly. If F pulls the tree trunk off the road with a tractor, F acts as intervener for the local authority (V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty)). That remains the case irrespective of the fact that a collateral benefit of the activity is to enable F to reach part of F's farm which could otherwise only be reached by making a detour.

Illustration 15
Grown up children discharge their father's unpaid tax liability in order to prevent the Revenue from impounding some valuable pictures belonging to their father. It is no objection to recognising the existence of a benevolent intervention that the children in making the payment also had in mind their prospective inheritance of the pictures on their father's eventual death.

Illustration 16
The majority of the owners of land on an industrial estate make a request to the responsible local authority for the construction of a spur to connect with a nearby dual carriageway. The local authority consents on the basis that the owners make a substantial contribution to the costs of construction. Owners A and B are agreeable. C agrees too in principle, but makes it clear from the outset that he is not prepared under any circumstances to pay more than € 100,000. A and B (but not C) subsequently conclude a contract with the authority to make a contribution to the construction costs; the authority undertakes to construct the road. The resultant costs amount to €770,000. Quite independent of the fact that C expressly ruled out a greater contribution to the costs of construction, A and B have no claim against C in benevolent intervention because they did not act "predominantly" with the purpose of benefiting C.

Acting in pursuance of a void contract. A special case (which is not the subject of an explicit rule) in which an intention predominantly to benefit another is missing is when a person undertakes an act in the erroneous assumption that they are performing a contractual obligation which they believe they have incurred to the principal. Typical cases concern performances rendered on the basis of contracts which are void for illegality, want of required form, or because the parties are not truly ad idem. These rules proceed on the basis that claims in respect of such performances rendered fall within the domain of the law of unjustified enrichment and not within the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs. Illustrative cases involve the repair of another's car pursuant to a void contract for services, or the acquisition of property in one's own name in supposed discharge of a void mandate. A few of the higher courts in Europe admittedly judge these latter cases differently at present, but within those countries their solution is anything but undisputed. Speaking in favour of the solution chosen here is the fact that those who act on the basis of a void contract are certainly, from a technical point of view, acting 'without authority' (see V.–1:103 (Exclusions) sub-paragraph (a)), but they also act without the "predominant" intention of benefiting another, seeking rather to advance their own interest by executing the concluded bargain.

Similar cases. The position is no different when a person discharges a debt as a result of a misapprehension as to the legal situation – for example, where a person mistakenly assumes that they are obliged on account of a supposed unjustified enrichment or non-contractual liability for damage to make a monetary payment. Here too an intention predominantly to benefit another is missing and consequently there is no benevolent intervention. Distinguishable, however, is the case of discharge of a duty to render assistance arising under criminal law (on which see further Comment B under V.–1:103 (Exclusions)). Moreover, one who erroneously supposes that a person in need has a right to assistance nonetheless acts predominantly with the intention of benefiting that person. The (unfounded) concern of the rescuer that they may otherwise be subject to a claim for damages blends into the background in a real life situation.

Collateral advancement of a subordinate personal interest can affect the quantum of the intervener's claim. It not uncommonly transpires that an intervener is predominantly acting to advance the interests of the principal, but at the same time has the advancement of his or her own objectives at the back of the mind. As stated above, that will not exclude the application of the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs. The (subordinate) collateral advancement of one's own purposes may call for consideration, however, in determining the legal consequences of the intervention – in particular in assessing the quantum of damages or reimbursement of expenditure to which the intervener is entitled. That is the case primarily where the intervener and principal were exposed to a common danger (see V.–3:104 (Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights)).

Illustration 17
Adjacent plots of land belonging to G and P respectively are situated on a slope in the hills, G's land lying immediately below that of P. After heavy rainfall and especially when settled snow melts, the stream which flows down the hill and along both plots of land overflows and floods the land. G knows from experience that when the water has reached P's house it will flood into P's kitchen if nothing is done. When the water levels upstream from P's land once more rise ominously high, G commissions a contractor to deal with the problem, P being away from the scene and not reachable by telephone. G has a claim against P for reimbursement in respect of the costs arising from commissioning the contractor. That claim will be reduced under V.–3:104 (Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights) paragraph (2), however, if and so far as G's house would similarly have been flooded had G not commissioned the contractor to prevent the flooding of P's house.

Intervener and principal: general observations. Fundamentally anybody can be an intervener or a principal. That applies to legal persons as much as to natural ones. In many cases it will be not-for-profit organisations, formed as legal persons, which act as benevolent interveners (though this does not exclude the possibility that in the circumstances of the case they may often fall to be regarded for the purposes of V.–3:104 (Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights) paragraph (1) as having manifested an intention at the time of their intervention not to assert their rights as interveners). Equally children may act as interveners or be principals (but see also the rules for their protection in V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty) paragraph (3), V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention) paragraph (2), and V.–3:104) (Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights)). Whether mentally disabled persons are capable of acting as benevolent interveners depends essentially on whether they are capable of mustering sufficient powers of comprehension as to be able to resolve to intervene predominantly with the intention of benefiting another. It is even conceivable that a benevolent intervener may act for a person not yet in existence (e. g. a foetus); though here the general rule must be observed that only a person can be subject to legal obligations.

Multiple interveners. Where multiple interveners act, it will depend on the circumstances of the individual case whether or not they are to be regarded as solidary debtors. According to general rules, they will usually be solidary debtors if (but only if) they carry out one and the same undertaking. They will be independent debtors however if they are pursuing different tasks.

Illustration 18
For lack of expertise, A is not in a position to put right certain damage to water pipes in the home of a neighbour N. A calls a plumber and (not acting as a representative of N) commissions the plumber to undertake the repairs. If the repairs are carried out unprofessionally, A will not be vicariously liable to N. However, under V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention) paragraph (1) A is obliged to assign to N the right to damages under the contract made with the plumber which will entitle N to claim damages from the plumber.

Illustration 19
The facts are as in illustration 18 except that, instead of engaging the plumber, A merely alerts the plumber to the burst pipe and leaves to the plumber the decision whether or not to intervene. If the plumber does intervene, then both A (because of alerting the plumber) and the plumber constitute benevolent interveners. As regards the defective execution of the repairs, however, they do not constitute solidary debtors; in relation to that activity, A was not a benevolent intervener at all.

Book III. Chapter 4. Where interveners are liable as solidary debtors, their obligations towards the creditor principal to settle their liabilities will follow, by means of analogy, the rules of Book III. Chapter 4.

Identifying the principal. The intervener is the person who has acted for another; the principal is generally the person whose interests the intervener sought to look after. There can only be one principal or class of co-principals whom the benevolent intervener intends to benefit predominantly – i.e. to benefit above all others. The approach by which the principal is defined is thus a subjective one. It depends according to the basic rule on the intentions of the intervener. In the circumstances circumscribed by V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty) however, there is an exceptional case in which an "objective" approach supplements the core "subjective" one.

Illustration 20
In the immediate aftermath of a railway disaster which has resulted in a large number of victims, some private individuals in the vicinity of the accident rush to give assistance. Two of the helpers injure themselves when breaking the window of an overturned carriage, supposing there are survivors inside. There are in fact five survivors whom it is possible to rescue. Those five survivors, as well as the railway company (see: V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty)), are principals in relation to the rescuers. As between the railway company and the rescued victims, however, the railway company alone will be accountable if it is liable vis-à-vis its passengers: V.–3:105 (Obligation of third party to indemnify or reimburse the principal).

The determinability of the principal at the moment of intervention. The intention of the intervener to benefit another must relate to the principal. That does not mean that the intervener must have known the principal personally or by name; nor does it even mean that the intervener must have had a specific person in mind to benefit. It does mean, however, that at the moment of intervention the principal must at least have been ascertainable. Unless that requirement is satisfied there can be no benevolent intervention "for another".

Illustration 21
A company which runs a bus passenger service and as a precaution in case of accident keeps one or two vehicles in reserve in its depot does not act on behalf of someone who is responsible for a subsequent accident and causes damage to its fleet when it keeps those maintained vehicles on stand-by. Consequently, the company cannot under the rules of benevolent intervention in another's affairs demand from the person causing the accident a proportion of the costs of keeping the vehicles in reserve. That person was not identifiable at the time the decision was taken to establish a reserve fleet. (Quite aside from this the company may have acted predominantly to pursue its own interests. That is because such vehicles are not primarily held in reserve in anticipation of an accident. Rather they are maintained first and foremost in order to provide undisrupted service to customers whenever a vehicle has to be taken out of service due to a breakdown).

Illustration 22
A water leakage occurs in a coal mine. The responsible authority prohibits the owner of the mine from pumping out the water, because it fears damage to the water table in summer. The costs of pumping out the mine later are considerably higher than if the measure had been undertaken immediately; in addition the mine owner suffers loss of earnings as a result of this delay. The mine owner is not a benevolent intervener, however, in delaying the draining of the mine because an indeterminate number of people benefits from the omission: a spa, hotels and bed and breakfast accommodation, retailers, other residents of the town and even traders in the towns through which the guests of the health resort, who would otherwise have stayed away, have to travel.

Where the principal is unknown to the intervener. As already indicated, it is not necessary that the benevolent intervener should know the principal personally. It is quite possible for an intervener to act to benefit an unknown person. Someone who is on the point of rescuing a stranger's property does not need to know who the owner is or which other persons, if any, have proprietary entitlements in respect of the property in order to be able to act as intervener in relation to them. The general intention to aid those who have some patrimonial interest in the property suffices. To that extent the 'subjective' method of identifying the principal also subsumes certain 'objective' elements within it. Moreover, in situations of emergency which require a rapid response it is quite unrealistic to expect the intervener to entertain precise thoughts about who exactly will benefit. In such cases the principal is that person whom the intervener would reasonably have contemplated as the object of the assistance had the intervener been able to give the matter full consideration at leisure. In this context it is also possible to bring into focus considerations of what is customarily the case. Someone who protects a small child from the dangers of road traffic, for example, might intend in a case of doubt to act also for the child's parents.

Mistake about the person benefited. It is correspondingly not fatal to the existence of a benevolent intervention in another's affairs that the intervener is mistaken as to the person who is in fact benefited by the intervention. In the case of a change in the supposed benefited persons, identification of the legally relevant parties turns on the material rather than the personal intentions of the intervener.

Illustration 23
Someone who pulls a car out of a ditch, thinking that the car belongs to X, but who later learns that the car is in fact owned by Y, acts with the intention of furthering the interests of Y: the intervener acts with the intention of benefiting the owner of the car, albeit that this is coupled with a mistaken assumption as to the identity of the owner. The same applies even if it later turns out that the car actually belongs to the person who has pulled it out. However, in this situation the congruence of the person acting and the person benefited takes the case outside the scope of benevolent intervention.

Indirect beneficiaries are not principals within the sense of the Article. On the other hand, the boundary is reached when the intervener obviously intended to benefit a particular person and it subsequently emerges that third parties have also profited from the intervention

(or would have profited, had the intervention been successful). Third parties of that type, in the ordinary course of life, are not within the intervener's contemplated class of beneficiaries. Such third party beneficiaries come into consideration as principals at most in the special circumstances of V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty) (on which see the comments to that Article).

Illustration 24
A person who protects a neighbour's house from a fire does not generally act for the purpose of benefiting the insurance company with which the neighbour has a fire insurance policy and which would otherwise incur a financial liability. Someone who is injured while endeavouring to free a person from a glass window frame which has fallen on that person's head during the person's course of employment would not have a claim to compensation under this Article, in conjunction with V.–3:103 (Right to reparation), against the employee's insurer against industrial accidents. Someone who intends to save another person's life does not act for the benefit of that person's life insurance company or employer, etc.

Illustration 25
At one o'clock in the morning G hears a woman's cry for help from a derelict site. He hurries over to it, but before he is able to reach the injured woman within he is struck on the back of the head with a hammer by a maniac. When he comes to, G manages to drag himself out into the street and alert passers-by to the plight of the injured woman (who has likewise been attacked by the maniac with the hammer); the injured woman is then immediately brought to a hospital. G will only have a claim against the woman's health insurer for compensation for the loss of income suffered as a result of his injury (V.–3:103 (Right to reparation)) if the insurer is to be regarded as the principal in accordance with V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty). It would not follow from the present Article that the insurer is a principal.

Multiple principals. It is, however, possible to act for multiple principals simultaneously. Someone who takes care of another's young child (for example by driving the child to hospital) may act on behalf of both parents; someone who takes care of a house belonging to various co-owners will act for all of them, etc. In their relation to the intervener multiple principals are liable according to the general rules governing solidary liabilities.

D. A reasonable ground (paragraph (1)(a))

General. In the absence of an approval by the principal (cf. paragraph (1) sub-paragraph (b)), the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs are applicable only if the intervener has a reasonable ground for taking care of the principal's affairs (paragraph (1)(a)). Whether a party intervening in the affairs of another acts with reasonable grounds must be assessed objectively – from the point of view of a reasonable intervener; a reasonable belief in the existence of a justification for intervention can itself constitute a reasonable ground. What is decisive is whether a reasonable person in the actual situation of the intervener would consider that there was cause for intervening by means of a measure of the type undertaken. Hence a person who takes measures to rescue the principal's property will act with reasonable ground if a reasonable person, placed in the circumstances confronting the intervener, would consider the property to be endangered and that intervention to protect it was necessary, even if (for reasons which the intervener could not know) the property was not in fact at risk.

Defective and deficient performance of the intervention. However, a justified intervention in another's affairs is excluded, if the person intervening makes an irrational assessment as to the existence of a sound reason for acting. On the other hand, someone who does have a reasonable ground for intervention, but merely makes a mistake in carrying out the measures taken, remains a (justified) benevolent intervener. In such a case the intervener has simply breached a duty of care and is answerable for that in accordance with the rules in V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty) but does not forego the status of a benevolent intervener.

Illustration 26
Someone notices that a water pipe in a neighbour's house has burst and (without acting in such a way as to bind the principal directly) engages a plumber to make temporary repairs. If a bad choice of plumber is made, this may constitute a breach of the duty of care, but that does not alter the fact that there was a reasonable ground for intervention. Only in the unlikely event that the commission for the job went to a plumber to whom the neighbour would never have entrusted the repairs, even at the price of considerable water damage in the house, and the intervener knew or ought to have known this, would the required reasonable ground for the intervention fall away because, to the intervener's knowledge, the act of commissioning the objectionable plumber contradicts the wishes of the principal (paragraph (2)(b)). The situation is also different if the water damage threatens to spread to other buildings. In that case the contrary wishes of the principal do not stand in the way of acting as a justified benevolent intervener (V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty)).

No requirement of pre-existing legal relationship. Since it is one purpose of the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs to provide an incentive towards socially desirable intervention, there is no call for setting down strict standards to be satisfied when posing the question why this particular intervener undertook the measure (instead of leaving the matter to another). It is not necessary that the intervener and the principal should stand in any close pre-existing legal or personal relationship to one another. In fact, if the latter is the case, the intervener may have had an intention to donate the services and V.–3:104 (Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights) paragraph (1) may come into play. Equally conceivable are cases in which a reasonable ground for intervention is excluded from the outset because in the circumstances there was no reasonable solution for the difficulty which the intervener sought to eradicate. In that case one is concerned not with a mere defective mode of conducting the intervention, but with the absence of reasonable ground for the intervention. The distinction between the two (which is occasionally difficult and in the last resort must be drawn by the courts in the particular circumstances of the case) will depend on whether a reasonable person would have considered that there was cause for intervention of the sort undertaken by the intervener.

Illustration 27
A stranger in an unfamiliar town sees a window in a building blown in by a strong wind. The building appears to be empty and it looks as if it would be easy to force entry by the front door and temporarily secure the window. The stranger has no reasonable ground for intervening: but should take into account in particular the fact that the owner of the dwelling will not want to have a complete stranger enter the house and damage the door just because such a comparatively minor problem has arisen.

Illustration 28
A fire breaks out in a chemical factory. If a private individual notifies the fire service, that would be to act with reasonable grounds. If, on the other hand, the individual attempts to extinguish the fire personally after the fire brigade has arrived on the scene, that would not be to act with reasonable grounds. If the individual makes an attempt to extinguish the fire before the fire service arrives, it will depend on the circumstances of the case whether there were reasonable grounds. If an enormous blaze has already developed it would be perfectly senseless for a private individual to make any attempt to extinguish the fire. Were the fire to be a small one, however, it could possibly be sensible to tackle it oneself.

A 'reasonable' ground. A definition of the concept of "reasonable" can be found in Annex 1. What is "reasonable" is to be objectively ascertained, having regard to the nature and purpose of what is being done, to the circumstances of the case and to any relevant usages and practices.

Some guidance in the following rules. Beyond this general rule, and unaffected by the rule in paragraph (2), the following provisions offer some additional particularised guidance as to when a person acts as an intervener with reasonable ground. In particular, rendering assistance in a case of emergency is (as a rule) regarded as a justified intervention. That emerges automatically from V.–3:103 (Right to reparation), the provisions of which are of direct application only to the right to reparation, but can also be enlisted for another purpose as a concrete illustration of the concept of "reasonable ground". The Article envisages that the intervener may be "acting to protect the principal, or the principal's property or interests, against danger". Equally, it may be, for example, that a reasonable ground for stepping in arises only when the acting party has learned on inquiry that the principal, although obliged to act due to some overriding public interest, nonetheless intends to remain passive: see V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty).

E. Want of respect for the principal's wishes (paragraph (2))

Reasonable ground to act absent. Putting to one side the exceptional situations designated in paragraph (1)(b) of the Article (approval of act by principal) and V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty), a person does not act as a justified intervener by rashly meddling in the affairs of another. Such is the case when it has been made known to the intermeddler that the interference is against the wishes of the person assisted or the intermeddler could reasonably be expected to know this. This last possibility arises when the intervener could have asked the principal whether the principal was agreeable to the intervention, but failed to pose that question. In such a situation the intermeddler, according to the rules in paragraph (2)(a), acts without a reasonable ground. Should the intermeddler cause legally relevant damage to the other party as a result of the intervention, there may be a non-contractual liability for the damage under Book VI. The same applies if the intervener could not ask the principal but for other reasons knew or should have known that the principal was not inclined to allow such intervention in the matter at hand (paragraph (2) sub-paragraph (b)).

Where the wishes of the principal are not binding. There are, however, exceptional situations in which the intervener acts with reasonable ground, although the principal has made manifest a lack of agreement to an intervention. Leaving to one side those cases in which the principal behaves in bad faith in a way which contradicts what is said (so that the latter does not truly represent the principal's wishes), one is concerned here as a rule with situations in which the intervener is acting for the benefit of a principal whose wishes an intervener acting responsibly and with due care would not heed. This is not to be regarded as a case of giving insufficient respect to another's right to free determination of their will. Rather the wishes of persons who by reason of mental disability, the influence of drugs or alcohol, or their minority are unable to express themselves in a way which would carry any weight with a reasonable intervener are not fundamentally opposed to a justified management of another's affairs. That goes for sub-paragraph (a) as much as for sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph (2). The wishes of someone intent on committing suicide are also as a general rule not binding on an intervener – at any rate not when the suicidal intent is the consequence of a psychiatric condition or mental imbalance or some other disturbance of the capacity for self-determination. Where devotees of a particular religious community are fundamentally opposed to blood transfusion on religious grounds, that wish should be respected as a matter of principle. The matter is different, however, as regards their wish as parents to allow their child to die in preference to undergoing a medically warranted blood transfusion. This wish is one which is not to be heeded if the circumstances are such that there is not enough time for taking blood from the child for later use when needed. That is because the wishes of parents to deny their children, for religious reasons, a medical treatment involving a comparatively slim risk to health do not generate an obligation to respect them.

Overriding public interest. A further special situation in which the wishes of the principal are not opposed to a justified benevolent intervention is the subject matter of V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty). In such a case (as a matter of law) the third party is to be regarded as principal, whether or not the recipient is also principal. See as to this special situation the comments to V.–1:102 and to V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (1)(b).

Priority of the principal's free determination of will. In all legal systems of the EU the intervener is subject to the duty (regarded as self-evident) to indicate to the principal the business being managed (which business the latter may then take over). This is likewise the fundamental position adopted in these Articles (V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (1)(c)). In contrast to that provision (which is focused on enduring measures undertaken by the intervener), and also in contrast to V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention) paragraph (1) (which concerns the information provided by the intervener at the conclusion of the intervention Paragraph (2) sub-paragraph (a). Paragraph (2)(a) expresses the rule that a person who in the circumstances of the case has a reasonable opportunity of asking the principal whether help is wanted and fails to use it only acts as a justified intervener if the principal later approves the act (paragraph (1) sub-paragraph (b)). For these purposes a reasonable opportunity of contacting the principal suffices. One can imagine a multitude of situations in which the principal would be pleased about the assistance rendered by an intermeddler, but (quite rightly) filled with indignation at not having been contacted despite the fact that it had been possible to do so. In such cases the rights of independence and self-determination deserve priority over the protection provided by a well-meaning, but rashly intermeddling fellow citizen. The requirement for and the possibility of a subsequent approval give due expression to those basic values. Only the approval of the act done creates in such cases the relationship of intervener and principal with its preferential legal position for the intervener and a legal position for the principal which differs clearly from that of an enriched party under the law of unjustified enrichment.

Illustration 29
One Saturday afternoon, G trims her garden hedge. Out of pure neighbourliness she goes on to cut the hedge belonging to her absent next door neighbour without bothering to ask him for permission. G is not a benevolent intervener.

The intervener is unable to contact the principal. However, it would be wrong to infer from sub-paragraph (a) the converse conclusion that a reasonable ground for intervention will always exist when the intervener is not able to contact the principal. In this instance too it remains of course the case that there must be reasonable cause for intervention by the intervener having regard to all the other circumstances of the case.

Illustration 30
A knows from his friend B that B has always longed to acquire a particular rare (and correspondingly expensive) stamp to augment his collection. While on holiday A suddenly notices that this stamp is on sale and, on the spur of the moment, buys it then and there. A has entered into this transaction at his own risk, even if he had no opportunity to reach B by telephone before deciding whether to buy. That is because an action of this type could have been postponed, or in other words it was unreasonable to act without a mandate. Should B have changed his mind in the meantime and accordingly chooses not to approve the purchase (V.–1:101(1)(b)), he is not obliged either to take the stamp off A's hands or to reimburse A for the sum he expended in purchase.

Illustration 31
A's neighbour, N, has failed to pay a telephone bill with due punctuality. That in itself is not a reasonable ground for A to pay the bill in N's stead. However, the matter might be different if the telephone company threatened to disconnect and A knew that N is dependent on maintaining a telephone connection intact. Only in this latter situation does the matter turn on the additional requirement in paragraph (2)(a).

Positive steps required. The benevolent intervener must go so far as to undertake positive steps to discover what the wishes of the principal are or would be if this is something which, according to the wording of the Article, there was "a reasonable opportunity to discover". In view of the modern possibilities of communication (not least, nowadays, the ever increasing availability of mobile telecommunication and electronic mail), the field of application for the law of benevolent intervention has come to occupy a considerably shrunken domain. The easier it is to get in contact with the principal, the lower the probability that a justified benevolent intervention will occur if no attempt to communicate is made.

Reasonable opportunity to discover the principal's wishes. The effort which must be expended in order to ascertain the actual wishes of the principal depends on the circumstances of the particular case. There must be a reasonable relationship between the significance and urgency of the measure on the one hand and the time and cost expended in seeking out the principal on the other hand. Everything turns on a sense of proportion. There are cases in which the measure called for by the situation is so pressing that no time remains even to pose the question; there are also cases in which it would be unreasonable to waste an hour telephoning the other side of the world in order to obtain permission for effecting provisional repairs; and there are contrasting cases in which one can simply wait.

Contacting the principal can in itself amount to a justified benevolent intervention. The attempt to reach the principal and to solicit a decision (an endeavour which in some circumstances might be very cost intensive in itself) will as a general rule amount to an act capable of constituting benevolent intervention in another's affairs. If it was reasonable in the circumstances to search for the principal and if the expenditure sustained in making the attempt is incurred reasonably within the meaning of V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement), then a claim to reimbursement arises, irrespective of whether in the end it proved possible to reach the principal (or, if reached, to get approval). That demonstrates, on the other hand, that as a rule, in the absence of special circumstances, one may not proceed to undertake the substantive act of assistance before making that attempt to obtain the principal's instructions where such an attempt is sensible in the circumstances. Of course an attempt to solicit information which, on a reasonable estimation, would appear at the outset to be pointless need not be commenced (or, as the case may turn out, repeated). That is because the costs of such an attempt would not be incurred reasonably within the meaning of V.–3:101 and no liability on the part of the principal to reimburse would arise.

Benevolent intervention or contract? Whether a contract comes into being between intervener and principal if the principal requests the intervener, in response to the latter's inquiry, to commence (or continue) the undertaking is to be determined in accordance with Book II; it does not need to be decided here. Should a contract be concluded, the rules of benevolent intervention in another's affairs will not of course apply from this point in time because the intervener will be contractually obliged to provide the service (V.–1:103 (Exclusions) sub-paragraph (a)). It is also possible that the terms of the contract might extend to the act carried out (as a benevolent intervention) before the contract was concluded – thus substituting, for example, a contractual right to reimbursement of expenditure for that contained in V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement) in respect of the intervention preceding the conclusion of the contract. Presumably, unless such an agreement can be inferred from the context, something more than a mere request to continue the act would be required in order that the contractual agreement should have such an extensive effect.

Paragraph (2) sub-paragraph (b). Even if the intervener had no reasonable opportunity in the circumstances to contact the principal, the intervener must do what is possible to satisfy the known wishes or probable wishes of the principal. This is the rule contained in paragraph (2) sub-paragraph (b).

Actual knowledge of the contrary wishes of the principal. It follows as a fundamental principle that a person does not act as a justified intervener if the person disregards the known contrary wishes of the principal. Whether or not those wishes are reasonable plays no role. Every person is entitled to live life as they choose within the bounds of what is allowed. One is not obliged to yield to judgements volunteered by others – even if one's own viewpoint is highly eccentric.

> Illustration 32
> The industrial injuries insurer and the liability insurer fall into a dispute over who will bear responsibility to indemnify in respect of the damage resulting from an accident. There is much in favour of the view that it is a case for a claim under the liability insurance. The industrial injuries insurer therefore demands that payment be made to the entitled injured party. The liability insurer issues a written refusal to do so, insisting (albeit, from the point of view of a neutral observer, somewhat obstinately) that there must be a further scrutiny of the facts of the case. The industrial injuries insurer thereupon pays the injured person. That insurer cannot turn to the liabilities insurer for payment with a claim founded on the notion that they have managed the affairs of the liability insurer. The problem here is one of settlement of liabilities which falls under the law of unjustified enrichment and not the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs.

Negligent failure to appreciate the principal's wishes. A justified intervention is excluded not only when the intervener positively knows that acting would contradict the wishes of the principal. The benevolent intervener must also contemplate ("can reasonably be expected to know") what might represent the presumed wishes of the principal. The significance of this rule, when set against the background of sub-paragraph (a) (i.e. the obligation to take positive steps to discover the principal's wishes), is perhaps not especially great, but as part of the overall picture is not to be overlooked. When the principal cannot be contacted, the intervener must (still) consider what a reasonable person in the situation would undertake in order to do justice to the principal's wishes.

Standard of care. The standard of care is an objective one (as in the law of non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI). There may admittedly be circumstances, of course, in which a quiet consideration of the matter in hand is made decidedly difficult. The same problem arises when it comes to determining whether an intervener has acted with care (V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (a)) which assumes that there is a benevolent intervention in another's affairs and resolves the subordinate question whether the intervener is in breach of duty in the manner of performing. The degree of care required depends on the circumstances; in particular, in emergency cases account must be taken of the fact that the intervener will most likely have had hardly any time for reflection before making a decision. On the other hand, an individual's personal ignorance of matters of general knowledge (which it is legitimate to expect a would-be intervener to know) will not provide an excuse.

Illustration 33
An armed robbery takes place in the foyer of a bank. A customer leaps into action and attempts to disarm the bank robber. In the struggle a shot is fired and the bullet lodges in the customer's knee. The customer has not acted as a justified intervener for the benefit of the bank, because the customer could reasonably be expected to know that the bank would have instructed its employees not to defend its stock of cash at the risk of life and limb.

Acting in ignorance of the principal's wishes, but without negligent failure to heed them. The benevolent intervener does not act without reasonable grounds merely because there is no real consent of the principal to the act. Paragraph (1) proceeds essentially on the basis that a reasonable ground to act is unaffected by the absence of actual consent as such and, indeed, is to be assessed given an absence of actual consent. The purpose of paragraph (2) is to preclude the existence of a reasonable ground where the wishes of the principal are disregarded, not properly considered or knowingly contradicted. What is decisive is whether the intervener knew, should have known or in the circumstances should have ascertained the principal's contrary wishes. Where the intervener had no reasonable opportunity to inquire as to the principal's wishes, however, and neither knew nor ought to have known that the principal did not want the intervention, the intervener nevertheless acts lawfully if according to the standard of paragraph (1) there was a reasonable ground for intervening. In those (infrequent) cases the principal's wishes, though they are in fact contrary to the act undertaken, do not preclude a justified benevolent intervention. If the principal subsequently disapproves of the intervention, which according to the information obtainable for the intervener at the material time was adequate and reasonable, this retrospective disapproval does not alter the fact that the benevolent intervention is justified. If this were otherwise almost every principal could escape from an obligation to compensate which has already arisen.

F. Approval by the principal (paragraph (1)(b))

Significance and consequences of an approval by the principal. Sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph (1) has the effect that an approval by the principal transforms an originally unreasonable (and therefore unjustified) intervention into a justified benevolent intervention in another's affairs. An approval can be effected by any express or implied unilateral manifestation of an intention on the part of the principal that legal relations with the intervener in respect of the act be governed by the rules of benevolent intervention – in other words, that the legal rights and duties between the parties should be those which would have existed had there been at the outset a reasonable ground for acting. All that is required, therefore, is an indication by the principal of an intention to be bound by the act. The requirement remains, however, that the intervener acted with a view predominantly to benefit another. If this condition is missing the rights and duties of the participants fall to be determined by the law on non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI and the law of unjustified enrichment.

Legal nature of the approval. The approval by the principal is a statement of intention. The rules of Book II apply correspondingly to this manifestation of intention. That is the case in particular in relation to I.–1:109 (Notice).

An important case. An important case, perhaps even the most frequent one, in which the rule on approval applies is the situation in which, before acting, the intervener could have asked the principal and therefore ought to have done so. If the intervener in such a case has in fact acted in a way that accords with the principal's wishes, approval under paragraph (1)(b) at the principal's election is only possible if the intervener has acted with the predominant intention to benefit the principal. The circumstance that the intervener intended to act for the principal's benefit must assume some external manifestation susceptible to proof.

Approval without such undue delay as would adversely affect the intervener. As a matter of principle, approval is not restricted to a precise period of time. It is important only that the principal approves the act without such undue delay as would adversely affect the intervener. The person whom the intervener intended to benefit has the opportunity of deciding whether the intervener had a good ground for intervening. However, that right can only subsist for an indefinite period of time if (i) the principal was satisfied with the act, and (ii) approval at the time when it is given would still be to the benefit of the intervener. If the latter is not the case, the right to give approval has expired. It should have been exercised (if at all) promptly, that is to say, without what in the circumstances of the case would amount to an unreasonable delay. The underlying policy of the rule, in other words, is to protect the intervener from legal uncertainty. The is entitled to know what the position is.

Illustration 34
The facts are the same as in illustration 30. When A offers B the stamp and B refuses to reimburse the purchase price, A is free to sell the stamp to a third party. He is equally free to add it to his own stamp collection, if he has one. B no longer has the (inchoate) right to demand the stamp from A. From this point on, if B changes his mind, B can procure the stamp only on the same basis as any third party – by negotiating for purchase of the stamp a contractual price agreeable to both parties.

Approval and contract. The provisions of this Book are not concerned with whether the approval has contractual effect as between intervener and principal. It might be possible to construe the act of the intervener as an offer (in performance) made to the principal which the principal accepts by approval. Whether that analysis is apt must be determined in the context of particular facts. The question is the same as that which arises in the context of paragraph (2)(a) when an intervener asks the principal what the principal wants. The general rule always applies that if a contract comes into existence between the parties, the rules of the law of benevolent intervention are ousted so far as the contract extends. See V.–1:103 (Exclusions) sub-paragraph (a).

Approval does not, as a rule, create a contract. It is clear at least that in many cases an approval could not create a valid contract. That might be because the intervener, while intending to benefit the principal, lacked the requisite intention to be legally bound when performing the act, and the principal when giving approval may mean to be legally bound but not by way of contract (cf. II.–4:102 (How intention is determined)). Equally the intervener may lack the requisite legal capacity to conclude a binding contract. For these reasons some provision within the rules of benevolent intervention itself is necessary as a rule of general application. It does not preclude the possibility that the parties might regulate their relationship by contract and thus displace the default rule that approval effects a retrospective creation of an intervener-principal relationship.

All other requirements of paragraph (1) remain unaffected. All other requirements of paragraph (1) must of course be satisfied in order for approval to create an intervener-principal relationship (see Comment F above). Actions carried out for one's own benefit are only susceptible to approval within the law of representation and not within the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs. Someone who has acted for another, on the other hand, must accept the risk of being held to that altruistic intention. It follows, therefore, that such a person has to surrender to the benefited party everything acquired due to the benevolent intervention if the principal ratifies the undertaking. If the principal chooses to ratify it, the principal must of course bear the associated burdens.

NOTES

I. Prevalence and notion of the law of benevolent intervention (negotiorum gestio) in general

1. The Common Law in ENGLAND and IRELAND has never developed a discrete concept of a legal relationship arising from benevolent intervention in another's affairs (For details, and articulate criticism of this situation, see Birks, 24 (1971) CurrLegProbl 110-132). The social potential for conflict, which the Codes of continental Europe address by means of the concept of negotiorum gestio, is resolved by a variety of completely different legal instruments in the Common Law. This in turn is due to the fact that the general rule is shaped differently: whereas the systems of continental Europe in general accept that expenses incurred in another's interest are due compensation even though there was no duty to perform and try to keep this general rule within reasonable limits, the Common Law has chosen the opposite starting point. As a general rule expenses incurred in the interest of a third party, but where there is no underlying duty to perform, do not give rise to a claim to compensation (Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co. (1886) 34 Ch. D 234*; In re Cleadon Trust Ltd., Re* [1939] Ch 286; approved by Crantrave Ltd. v. Lloyds Bank plc. [2000] QB 917. For details see v. Bar, FS Werner Lorenz (2001), 441-461). Accordingly the main focus is on the exceptions to this rule. The absence of a free-standing and cohesive law of negotiorum gestio or necessitous intervention in the Common Law has not passed without criticism (see, e. g., Diamond, Contract and Tort, 70) and there is not yet a clear consensus about the extent to which the law provides comparable legal redress for the intervener, although the trend seems to favour a more expansive restitutionary liability than the case law has hitherto acknowledged (see Allen, 40 (1931) Yale LJ 331, 374 (no equivalent); Williston, 22 (1944) Can. Bar Rev. 492, 508 (English law has not adopted negotiorum gestio in its entirety, but is not hostile to it in principle); Marasinghe, 8 (1976) Ottawa L Rev 573, 574 and 587 (English law has always recognised the doctrine under one heading or another; there is a right to restitution in cases where civilians would grant actio negotiorum gestorum contraria); McCamus, 11 (1979) Ottawa L Rev 297, 297 ("it seems to have been accepted as a general principle that one who, being an appropriate person to do so, responds to another's emergency by supplying (or by arranging at his own expense for the supply of) needed goods, services, or money, is entitled to restitution for the value of these benefits, provided that their conferral was not intended as a gift"); Goff and Jones, Restitution[6], para. 17-026, regretting that a general doctrine of necessitous intervention has not yet developed). Moreover, even where the Common Law does not recognise rights to reimbursement or remuneration, a reasonable ground for action (typically formulated enigmatically in terms of 'necessity') does at least render what is done lawful in relation to the affected party: cf. Sorrell v. Paget [1950] 1 KB 252 (farmer taking in a neighbouring farmer's heifer, which had strayed on to an adjacent railway line, did not commit a tort in taking possession as he acted in the interest of the owner and the railway company), and Children Act 1989, s. 3(5), which provides that a person without parental responsibility, but having care of a child may do what is reasonable to safeguard or promote the child's welfare.

2. Those jurisdictions which recognise a distinct legal relationship arising from the justified management of another's affairs formulate the requirements for its existence by and large in similar fashion. The most recent definition may be found in the ESTONIAN LOA § 1018 (Definition of negotiorum gestio). It reads: "(1) If a person (negotiorum gestor) acts for the benefit of another person (principal) without being granted the right or obligated by the principal to perform the act, the negotiorum gestor has the rights and obligations provided in §§ 1019-1023 of this Act if: (i) the principal approves of the act; (ii) the act corresponds to the interests and actual or presumed wishes of the principal; (iii) in the case of failure to act, the principal's obligation arising from law to maintain a third party would not be performed in a timely manner or the act is essential in the public interests for another reason. (2) A case where a person has no desire to act for the benefit of another person is not deemed to be negotiorum gestio." (This definition is unusual in requiring that the intervention has in fact resulted in benefit to the principal). DUTCH CC art. 6:198 defines negotiorum gestio (zaakwaarneming) as "the intentional undertaking of an interest of another, with knowledge and on reasonable grounds, without authority derived under a transaction or under a legal relationship provided for elsewhere in the law" (translation by Haanappel et al., Netherlands Business Legislation).

PORTUGUESE CC art. 464 reads: "There is a gestão de negócios when, without being authorised to do so, a person assumes the direction of another's business in the interest and for the account of the principal concerned". Here too gestão de negócios is recognised as a source of a legal relationship (fontes das obrigações).

3. Closely related to Portuguese law is Italian law. According to ITALIAN CC art. 1173 ("Sources of Obligations") obligations may arise from contracts, unlawful acts or any other conduct or fact which according to law is apt to give rise to an obligation. This includes benevolent intervention (CC art. 2028 et seq.). The provisions are applicable subject to two requirements: (i) the absence of a pre-existing obligation (so-called spontaneità) and (ii) the link to another's sphere of interest (so-called alienità dell´affare). Further requirements are absentia et inscientia domini, utiliter coeptum and an animus aliena negotia gerendi (Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 857-860).

4. GREEK law defines benevolent intervention as the management of another's affairs without an authority or duty on the part of the intervener. As a general rule, such acts constitute undesired interference with the rights and interests of another (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou] Pref. to Artt. 730-740, no. 1). Exceptionally, however, they may be the emanation of an altruistic commitment for a fellow human being. In this case they fall within the scope of application of Greek CC arts. 730-740 on benevolent intervention. This is an ex lege legal relationship: it arises by operation of law and not from a contract. Attempts to construe the law of benevolent intervention as 'quasi-contractual' (see, for example, Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I/2, 192) have been rejected in the main as unnecessary, because interveners lacking legal capacity or restricted in their legal capacity are already sufficiently protected by Greek CC art. 735. The location of the law of benevolent intervention, as a matter of systematics, within contract law is justified by reference to substantive similarity with the law of mandate – in particular as regards the legal consequences (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Pref. to Artt. 730-740, no. 12).

5. The GERMAN CC sets out the law of benevolent intervention in its second book in §§ 677-687. As expressed in CC § 677 an act qualifies as benevolent intervention in another's affairs if a person (the intervener) takes care of some matter for another (the principal) without having been authorised by him or being otherwise entitled to do so in relation to him. An unauthorised management of another's affair is in general determined by the fact that a person attends to another's interest without request, whereby the expenses are incurred by the intervener and the benefit obtained by the principal. A balancing of interests seems to dictate protection for the principal against officious intermeddling or acts serving an intermeddler's own interests (CC §§ 677-681), but equally to grant an intervener whose act constitutes an emanation of community spirit legal security (CC §§ 683-686).

6. The relevant rules of the SPANISH CC which originates from almost the same time, may be found in arts. 1888 ff. In addition provisions on the law of benevolent intervention are comprised in the provincial law of the Foral Community of Navarra (Fuero Nuevo de Navarra, Ley 560 and 561 [Act 1/1973 of 1 March, which has adopted the Compilación del Derecho Civil Foral de Navarra]). There is no concise definition as there is in Estonian, Dutch and Portuguese law. The introductory phrase of SPANISH CC art. 1888 reads: "A person who consciously undertakes to manage or administer the affairs of another without being authorised by this other person, is obliged …" and ley 560 of the Fuero Nuevo de Navarra states: "If a person undertakes the management of another's affairs in the interest of that other without being authorised, it is obliged…". The Tribunal Supremo in its case law relies on a very narrow concept of benevolent intervention. Benevolent intervention is held to require "that the acts, which aim at the management of another's neglected affairs must be undertaken spontaneously, without authorisation or knowledge of the principal and therefore without either explicit or tacit approval and without his objection, with an intention free of interest but without the aim of conferring a pure gift and without the intention to profit" (TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 322 p. 198). Spanish legal writing has voiced the criticism that the case law only very reluctantly resorts to the law of benevolent intervention (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 297). It is therefore of very limited practical importance. The Tribunal Supremo prefers the application of other concepts (Pasquau Liaño, loc.cit. 301). It is important to state in this context that the ratification of an unauthorised benevolent intervention results in the application of the law of mandate (CC art. 1892). Since the courts are comparatively eager to accept that an intervention has been approved, the law of mandate remains a focal point.

7. The BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG CC regulate the concept of benevolent intervention in arts. 1372–1375. The Code Napoléon does not provide for a comprehensive definition of gestion d´affaires. An extensive range of similar definitions may be found in legal commentaries. For BELGIAN law, for example, it is maintained that 'zaakwaarnemin' is a voluntary act – which is not intended to be a benefaction and is not self-interested – in taking care of the interests of another without being under a statutory duty, a duty arising by operation of law, or a contractual duty to do so; it may be with or without the knowledge of the other provided the zaakwaarnemer might reasonably assume that the other would have acted in a similar way (Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 214). According to de Page, Droit Civil Belge II[3], no. 1069 p. 1129, it is an act of gestion d´affaires if a person who, without being under a contractual, statutory or other duty, intervenes in the affairs of another and acts, or effects a juridical act, on that other's behalf and in that other's interest so as to confer benefit. The intervention at its outset must be carried out without the prior knowledge of the principal. For FRENCH law a similar definition is put forward: a benevolent intervention takes place where a person spontaneously and in a reasonable way intervenes in the affairs of another in order to manage them in the interest of that other (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10 no. 1). The MALTESE CC follows the French model (CC art. 1013).

8. Like all other early European codifications the AUSTRIAN CC does not contain any statutory definition. According to Klang (-Stanzl), ABGB IV/1[2], 890 the prerequisites of a benevolent intervention are as follows: (i) it must concern another's affairs, (ii) there must be an absence of authority to intervene and (iii) there must be an intention to act on another's behalf. In more recent literature the following definition is offered: benevolent intervention is an act at one's own instigation whereby the intervener undertakes to manage another's affair with the intention to advance that other's interests (Schwimann [-Apathy] ABGB V[2], § 1035 no. 1; Koziol and Welser, Grundriss II[12], 364). HUNGARIAN CC § 484 expresses the same concept in these words: "A person proceeding in a matter on behalf of another person without being authorised thereto by agency or otherwise shall be obliged to handle the matter as required by the interest and probable intent of the person in whose favour he has intervened". SLOVENIAN Code of Obligations art. 199 states that the unsolicited intervention in the affairs of another is only permissible if it could not be postponed without the other suffering serious damage or foregoing an obvious advantage. Thus necessity or usefulness belong to the prerequisites for a justified benevolent intervention.

9. This in turn comes close to the classical definitions of negotiorum gestio in SCOTTISH law: "The management of the affairs of one who is absent or incapacitated from attending his affairs, spontaneously undertaken without his knowledge, and on the presumption that he would, if aware of the circumstances, have given a mandate for such interference" (Bell, Rule 540). Erskine 323 in 1816 wrote: "Negotiorum gestio forms those obligations which arise from the management of a person's affairs in his absence, by another without a mandate." And Stair (Book I Title 8 § 3) wrote in 1693: "Likewise the obligation betwixt negotiators and these, to whose behalf they negotiate, ties to recompense what others (without our command, knowledge, or presence), have necessarily or profitably done for carrying on of our affairs, l. 2.ff neg. gest." [D. 3. 5. 2]).

10. The NORDIC COUNTRIES not only lack a general statutory regime for the law of benevolent intervention; the concept hardly plays any role in their contemporary court practice. The starting point for SWEDEN and FINLAND is Ccom chap. 18 § 10. In DANISH law not even such provisions exist. The (mainly) older Danish literature therefore as a rule bases itself on the Roman law concept of negotiorum gestio (Lassen, Handlinger paa fremmed formueretsomraade i romersk og dansk ret, 1880, 279-319; idem, Haandbog i obligationsretten, Speciel del, 1897, 851-872; idem, Lærebog i obligationsrettens specielle del, 1912, 422-439; cf. Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 36 et seq.). In older Swedish literature too the view is maintained on a number of occasions that a self-standing concept of benevolent intervention exists in addition to the specific rules, mentioned earlier, which are to be found in the Commercial Code (for references see Håstad, loc.cit. 40 et seq.). In contemporary scholarship Håstad's influential monograph is of major importance. It demonstrates that the law of benevolent intervention could be inferred from general principles of law by means of analogy. Essentially three groups of cases fall to be distinguished in which the principal is not in a position to attend to his or her own affairs, namely – as Håstad labels them – 'joint interest cases', 'trust cases' and 'possession cases'.

II. The activities covered

11. In the continental European legal systems it has been stressed time and again that the law of benevolent intervention covers a broad field of activities. Fundamentally it is only strictly personal acts which are excluded. The subject-matter of benevolent intervention under PORTUGUESE law can accordingly be either juridical acts or physical acts. It is not a necessary requirement that the act serves to protect the principal's assets; the interest in question may also be of a 'moral or spiritual nature' (as it is expressed) such as, for example, health, reputation or life and limb (Antunes Varela, Obrigações[10], 452). Juridical acts include juridical acts in a strict sense (negócios jurídicos em sentido estrito) and unilateral juridical acts which are not legal transactions (actos jurídicos não negociais), such as acceptance of payment or collection and discharge of debts (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 433; Antunes Varela, loc.cit. 451).

12. The field of application of the law of benevolent intervention under GERMAN law is equally broad. The concept of Geschäftsbesorgung (CC § 677) covers all acts, whether of a juridical or physical nature and whether economic or non-economic in nature (Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], Pref. to §§ 677 ff, no. 20), which do not merely consist of an omission. The intervener need not undertake the act personally, but may instruct employees or third parties (BGH 25 November 1976, BGHZ 67, 368; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 677, no. 2). Acts of a very short duration may also be considered (Kropholler, Studienkommentar BGB[6], § 677, no. 4). Examples are turning a steering wheel to effect a swerve (BGH 27 November 1962, BGHZ 38, 270, 275), giving medical assistance to an unconscious accident victim or making efforts to procure necessary medical assistance for the injured person (BGH 7 November 1960, BGHZ 33, 251), halting a motor vehicle in order to draw the driver's attention to the dangerous condition of the vehicle (BGH 16 March 1965, BGHZ 43, 188), and hindering unlawful interference with another's property (BGH 22 March 1966, NJW 1966, 1360). According to the case law of the BGH it is even the case that 'where a legal transaction is void due to infringement of a statutory prohibition or because it is contrary to bonos mores resort may be had to the law of benevolent intervention' (BGH 20 October 1996, NJW 1997, 47 with numerous further references). The intervener in this case, however, is not entitled to reimbursement of expenses (BGH loc.cit.).

13. In GREEK law too it is generally considered that the concept of undertaking (another's) business is to be understood in a wide sense (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 2; ErmAK [-Sakketas], Art. 730, no. 14). It covers all types of activities and therefore, besides juridical acts, includes rendering services and other acts (Papanikolaou and Sakketas loc.cit.), such as for instance transporting an injured person to hospital (Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochikon Dikaion II/2, 7). Undertaking (another's business) may take the form of an intervener (who is not himself at fault) placing himself in peril in road traffic to prevent an impending accident (Papanikolaou loc.cit. Art. 736 nos. 2 and 11). On the other hand, mere omissions are excluded (Papanikolaou loc.cit. no. 3; Sakketas loc.cit. no. 15), as are acts which are contrary to law or bonos mores (Papanikolaou loc.cit. no. 12; Bosdas, NoB 18/1970, 769, 772; Sakketas loc.cit. no. 24; Kavkas and Kavkas loc.cit. 8) and strictly personal acts, i. e. those which do not allow for representation (Kavkas and Kavkas loc.cit.). The latter includes acts relating to proceedings (instituting legal proceedings and replying to a statement of claim in another's name) (CA Thessaloniki 2823/1990 EllDik 33/1992, p. 1226; CA Athens 1210/1987 EllDik 29/1988, p. 1606; CA Athens 202/1975 NoB 23/1975, p. 504; CA Thessaloniki 258/1977 Arm 31/1977, p. 385; however, the contrary was held in Areopag 28/1977, NoB 25/1977, p. 959 and as to outcome likewise Areopag 981/1973 NoB 22/1974, p. 509).

14. As regards AUSTRIAN law it is undisputed that both juridical acts and physical acts can be the subject-matter of benevolent intervention (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, § 1035 no. 4; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I^3, § 1035 no. 2, Meissel, GoA, 58). Case law supplies a variety of examples (conclusion of a sale contract: OGH 17 May 1950, SZ 23/159; giving a guarantee: OGH 5 March 1963, EvBl 1963/309; OGH 19 October 1976, SZ 49/121; conduct of litigation by a solidary debtor: OGH 24 November 1997, SZ 70/241 [see for details on this problem Pochmarski/Strauss, JBl 2002, 353-374]; self-help remedy of sale of perishable goods: OGH 12 April 1950, SZ 23/95; snow clearance: OGH 9 December 1971, JBl 1972, 324; killing an injured dog: OGH 4 November 1981, EvBl 1982/83). According to Klang (-Stanzl), ABGB IV/1^2, 890, however, the act must be lawful. The discharge of debts of the principal may also be an act of benevolent intervention. If the intervener pays in his or her own name, the provisions of benevolent intervention supplement the rules on both assignment by operation of law (CC § 1358) and the discharge of another's debt (CC § 1422) (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I^3 § 1035 no. 3). Acts to protect the principal's person were regarded by the drafters of the ABGB as naturally falling within the scope of benevolent intervention (v. Zeiller III § 1036 no. 2 p. 318).

15. In FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG similar basic principles are accepted. The intervention here may consist either of juridical acts (actes juridiques) or physical acts (actes matériels) (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique^{10}, no. 8 p. 10-11; de Page, Droit Civil Belge II^3, no. 1076 p. 1143). However, mere omissions (abstentions) are excluded from the scope of application (le Tourneau, RépDrCiv, VI, v° Gestion d´affaires [2002], no. 50) as are acts which require the principal personally to act or make an evaluation (Marty and Raynaud, Obligations I[2], no. 381 p. 394-395 and respectively Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 34 p. 33-34 [with the common example of marriage]). The discharge of another's debts too is considered to be within the category of actes juridiques (cf. for FRANCE Cass.civ. 11 February 1986, Bull.civ. 1986, I, no. 23 and for BELGIUM Cass. 2 July 1948, Pas. 1948, I, p. 422), and actes matériels include acts for the protection of the principal's person (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, loc.cit. no. 8 p. 11; CA Liège 26 October 1992, JLMB 1993, 798).

16. The SPANISH CC does not explicitly set out which activities are covered by the law of benevolent intervention. Although the law of mandate, which is often applied by analogy, in SPANISH CC art. 1713 is confined to administrative acts, the Tribunal Supremo has not extended this restriction to the law of benevolent intervention. The latter has been held to have a wider scope of application (TS 16 October 1978, RAJ 1978 (2) no. 3076 p. 2606), since it covers not only juridical acts (such as the collection of debts), but also activities of a purely economic nature and even simple physical activities (TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 322 p. 198). The matter of discharge of another's debt is elaborately provided for in SPANISH CC arts. 1158 et seq. The provision in CC art. 1158 reads: "A person who discharges a debt for another may claim from the debtor what he has rendered, provided he has not done so against the express will of the debtor. In that case he may only claim from the debtor to the extent the performance has been useful for the debtor." The person who discharges the debt with an animus solvendi must have neither a contractual nor a personal close relationship to the debtor (TS 8 May 1992, RAJ 1992 (2) no. 3892 p. 5113). An overlap with the law of benevolent intervention is therefore conceivable, but this is by no means always clearly analysed in the case law (contrast TS 8 May 1992 loc.cit. [where only CC art. 1158 was applied] with TS 25 June 1992, RAJ 1992 (3) no. 5474 p. 7160 [where it is expressly stated that a third party, who pays a debt for another in his own name and for his own account, is a benevolent intervener, but not under a duty to continue his intervention]). Although the CC only refers to 'dealings' and 'assets' of the principal, there appears to be unanimity both in academic writing (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 106; Paz-Ares/Diez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Lasarte], Código Civil I[2], 1953; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Díez-Picazo], Código Civil II, 1944) and case law (TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 322 p. 198) that the activities covered by benevolent intervention may also include acts for the personal protection of the principal. Case law on such activities is extremely rare. However, strictly personal acts (in other words, those for which representation is not possible) are excluded under Spanish law from the scope of application of negotiorum gestio (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 249; Puig Brutau, Compendio II, 599; Lete del Río, Obligaciones II[3], 160; Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 117).

17. Under ITALIAN law it is undisputed that benevolent intervention may also take the form of a juridical act. Examples are the discharge of another's duty to provide maintenance (Cass. 9 August 1988, no. 4883, Rep.Giur.it. 1988, voce Alimenti, no. 2), the placing of a professional order (Cass. 13 March 1964, no. 550, Foro it. 1965, I, 866), the conclusion of a tenancy agreement (Cass. 23 May 1984, no. 3143, Rep.Giur.it. 1984, voce Gestione d´affari, no. 1), services rendered by a lawyer without instruction (Cass. 13 February 1996, no. 1085, Rep.Giur.it. 1996, voce Avv. e proc., no. 131) and the payment of a share of a several liability which another is due to discharge (Cass. 9 August 1988, no. 4883, in Rep.Giur.it. 1988, voce Alimenti no. 2).

The act must be permissible and of a patrimonial character (Cass. 29 May 1952, no. 1555, Foro it. 1953, I, 33). This includes dispositions and extraordinary administrative measures (Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 876-877; Cass. 23 July 1960, no. 2122, Giur. it. 1962, I, 1, 92; Cass. 3 March 1954, no. 607, Giur. it. 1954, I, 1, 596; CA Firenze 16 August 1955, Foro it. 1956, I, 93). Conducting litigation in another's name is excluded (Cass. 30 July 1973, no. 2229, Giur. it. 1974, I, 1, 1212) as are other strictly personal acts (such as for example conferring generous benefits from the property of the principal [Breccia, loc.cit. 874] or the acceptance of an inheritance [Cass. 10 June 1954, no. 1933, Rep. Giur. it. 1954, voce Successione no. 25]). According to case law, physical acts are also eligible for consideration, including, for example, the pursuit of a stolen motor vehicle in the intervener's own car in order to assist the owner to regain possession (Cass. 23 October 1956, no. 3843, Rep.Giur.it. 1956, voce Gestione d´affari no. 1). It has also been held that a woman who paid the medical expenses and funeral expenses for the man with whom she cohabited has acted as gestor for the heirs (Cass. 28 June 1975, no. 2557, Rep.Giur.it. 1975, voce Gestione d´affari no. 2). However, there do not appear to be any reported decisions in which rescue from imminent danger of personal injury has been characterised as a benevolent intervention.

18. As regards the determination of the scope of application of zaakwaarneming under DUTCH Law the distinction between juridical acts and physical acts is likewise of no consequence. Examples of physical acts drawn from Dutch case law include preventing a ship from sinking (CFI Rotterdam 7 March 1939, NedJur 1940 no. 1017 p. 1515), towing a car away (CA s´-Hertogenbosch 8 November 1966, NedJur 1967 no. 368 p. 974 and President Rechtbank Amsterdam 19 December 1991, KG 1992, 50), maintenance of another's animal (HR 20 November 1924, NedJur 1925 p. 153) and maintaining the child of an acquaintance (HR 27 March 1924, NedJur 1924 p. 656). The right to discharge another's debts is the subject matter of a separate provision: CC art. 6:30. As is the case elsewhere, Dutch law follows the principle that strictly personal acts do not come within the law of benevolent intervention. The rule is explained on the basis that in such cases a reasonable ground to act is missing. The travaux préparatoires of the CC give the example of conclusion of a contract of employment; that is normally a strictly personal act. Only in the exceptional case where the intervener has actual knowledge of the principal's wishes might a reasonable ground exist (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis Book 6, p. 791). HR 20 September 2002, RvdW 2002 no. 142 concerned the question under which conditions the claim for damages for pain and suffering of the deceased will pass to the heirs. According to Dutch CC art. 6:106 (2) this requires that the deceased informed the other party in his lifetime that he intended to assert the claim for damages. In contrast to the courts of lower instance and the Advocate-General, the Hoge Raad did not discuss the question whether or not that communication might also be undertaken as a benevolent intervention (by the relatives). Instead it was inferred from the circumstances of the case that the patient had the 'presumed intention' to assert his claim for non-economic loss and for that reason the claim devolved on the heirs. The fact that as a consequence of serious injuries the deceased has not been conscious of his condition was held not to be relevant.

19. In SCOTLAND it is similarly understood that the law of negotiorum gestio relates to both juridical acts and physical acts (Stair [-Whitty], Vol. 15, para 96). However Scottish law has not yet extended the doctrine of negotiorum gestio to cases where the principal's life or personal safety is endangered. It is argued that the rescuer typically has no intent to charge for expenses and outlays. Such an extension would impose strict liability on rescued persons, undermining the general rule of the law of delict that a rescuer can only obtain damages for personal injuries sustained in rescuing a person from danger if the defender had negligently created the danger. Finally, it is argued that the compensation of rescuers for their injuries would be more appropriately achieved by other means, such as social insurance or discretionary payments out of public funds (Whitty loc.cit., para 102; Stoljar, IECL X 17, 141, 149, 150).

20. In the light of the different starting point it is far more difficult to summarise the situation in the NORDIC COUNTRIES. According to SWEDISH and FINNISH Ccom chap. 18 § 10 the intervener may 'speak and answer' for the principal. The question what is to be understood by this phrase 'speak and answer' has in the past found three different answers: some have argued that the subject matter is an authorisation to conduct legal proceedings for another, others consider that it includes in addition juridical acts of all types, and the third view contends that besides the authority to conduct litigation the terms only cover (unilateral) juridical acts which are binding on the recipient of the declaration (such as termination of a contract or the interruption of a limitation period) (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 34 with fn 2-4). The scope of application has likewise not yet been properly resolved. It may be assumed that the question of authority to conduct litigation in another's name is solved by specific provisions of other statutes (SWEDISH Code of Judicial Procedure [rättegångsbalk (1942:740)] chap. 12 §§ 9, 20 and 23 and FINNISH Code on Judicial Procedure [rättegångsbalk] of 31 December 1734 chap. 15 § 4) and therefore Ccom chap. 18 § 10 according to current understanding at most covers the unilateral juridical acts just mentioned, whereas the conclusion of contracts in the name of another and more especially purely physical acts in the interest of another are excluded. The latter are subject to the general rules (see below note 22). As far as DANISH law is concerned it has been held in HD 19 January 1912, UfR 1912 p. 239 that the conclusion of a compromise settlement between a life insurance company and the surviving dependants of the insured whose cause of death, it seems, was probably suicide can constitute a justified benevolent intervention with respect to the reinsurance company.

21. There are special statutory regimes dealing with a number of particular problems. One of these provides that a bank may accept gifts for the donee without the donee's authorisation (SWEDISH Gifts Act [lag (1936:83) angående vissa utfästelser om gåva] § 4; cf. further Walin, Lagen om skuldebrev m. m.[2], 241; Håstad loc.cit. 225). The provision was restricted to banks as these are subject to special supervision and therefore seem suited to attend as gestor to the interests of the donee (Walin, loc.cit. 242). Notwithstanding this reasoning, Håstad loc.cit. 225-226 considers the provision can be extended by analogy. Case law, however, is largely silent on the issue. SWEDISH HD 28 December 1961, NJA 1961 p. 673 and HD 2 July 1962, NJA 1962 p. 428 held that in principle a private individual's acceptance of a gift for another is possible, although in the first of these two cases the intention to act for another (a child) was absent. FINNISH law has a rule similar to that in the Swedish statute in the Act no. 625 on promises to make a gift (lag om gåvoutfästelser) of 31 July 1947 (§ 4). By contrast there is no comparable provision under Danish law.

22. Both the DANISH and the SWEDISH case law contain examples of physical acts of benevolent intervention for another (see in particular DANISH HD 28 November 1976, UfR 1977, 183 [reimbursement of the costs of a fire brigade under the rules of the law of negotiorum gestio; a defective pump in a factory pumped oil into the soil and a river; an immediate intervention was necessary, because the defendant had neither sufficient professional competence nor a sufficient number of employees at his disposal] and SWEDISH HD 9 March 1972, NJA 1972, 88 [a fire brigade eliminated the danger created by roof sheeting which had been almost stripped away by a strong wind; however, the firemen did not contact the owner of the house, who was at home; for this reason, and also because the repair had been effected unskilfully, the owner was not held to be obliged to compensate]; see also SWEDISH Hovrätten 24 June 1991, RH 1991:56 [where custody of another's goods is dealt with under the keyword "negotiorum gestio"; HD 8 February 1993, NJA 1993, 13, however, seems to prefer a solution invoking the rules of unjustified enrichment law and HD 6 October 1999, NJA 1999, 617 even resorts to landlord and tenant law]). Compensation for expenses incurred in intervention of a physical nature is also the subject matter of some more specific statutes, such as the SWEDISH Act on Proceeding with Abandoned Property and Lost Property etc [Lag (1974:1066) om förfarande med förverkad egendom och hittegods m. m.]. The Act on Certain Stolen Goods etc [Lag (1974:1065) om visst stöldgods m. m.] obliges the owner who claims recovery of the asset from the person with custody of it to compensate for costs incurred for its improvement and repair (§ 7): see further Lennander, Återvinning i konkurs[2], 356; Hellner, Om obehörig vinst, 374; Håstad, loc.cit. 80. Besides this, negotiorum gestio is dealt with in particular in DANISH legal literature in the context of tort law (and treated as a defence) (von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 51; Jørgensen, Kontraktsret, Bind 2, 152; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 48). A similar analysis can be made in SWEDISH and FINNISH law. At the same time, it is maintained that as a matter of principle an intervener without authority cannot be granted more rights than a custodian appointed by a court would enjoy (Håstad, loc.cit. 53).

23. The discharge of debts of the principal in general only gives rise to a claim against the principal if he has consented to this beforehand (Håstad loc.cit. 109; Hellner loc.cit. 378; SWEDISH HD 23 November 1910, NJA 1910 p. 622 [where the payment was made against the debtor's wishes]; HD 28 April 1920, NJA 1920 p. 234; HD 29 December 1945, NJA 1945 p. 728; HD 21 May 1973, NJA 1973 p. 286; see, drawing the dividing line, HD 12 January 1979, NJA 1979 p. 51 [a haulage contractor, importing goods for another business and obliged by statute in such circumstances to discharge that business' debts in respect of custom duties and taxes, performed that duty]). In other words a claim for reimbursement of expenses incurred is not recognised if the payment is made in the knowledge there is neither an authority nor a duty to do so (Håstad loc.cit. 133), unless specific rules providing otherwise apply.

24. Within the COMMON LAW the rules on agency of necessity are particularly close to the idea of negotiorum gestio. (As to the requirement of necessity (not necessarily: emergency) and the similarities with the law of benevolent intervention see the striking statement of Lord Goff in In re F. (Mental Patient: Sterilisation) [1990] 2 AC 1, 74-75). Agency of necessity does not require a contractual basis (Petrinovic & Co. Ltd. v. Mission Francaise des Transports des Maritimes (1941) 71 Lloyd's L. Rep 208, 223 (Atkinson J)). As a rule an agent of necessity who acts reasonably has a claim for compensation of expenses and in addition as a security for this compensation is granted a possessory lien with respect to his principal's property in his possession (Loc.cit. 222 (Atkinson J)). The first essential requirement of an agency of necessity is that it is virtually impossible for the agent to contact the client and to communicate with him (Australasian Steam Navigation Co. v. Morse (1871-73) LR 4 PC 222; Gwilliam v. Twist [1895] 2 QB 84, 87 (Lord Esher MR); Prager v. Blatspiel, Stamp & Heacock Ltd. [1924] 1 KB 566, 571 (McCardie J). See further Springer v. Great Western Railway Co. [1921] 1 KB 257: the defendant was transporting the plaintiff's tomatoes from Jersey to London. Bad weather and a strike at the harbour delayed carriage. The tomatoes were threatening to spoil and the defendant therefore sold them directly at the port. The court considered this to be a breach of duty, because the defendant could have obtained instructions from the plaintiff and he was accordingly obliged to do so). For precisely this reason the agency of necessity has been pushed to the back shelves in our modern information society. An agent who under present circumstances cannot expect to receive an answer in time does not even have to try to venture his inquiry (Australasian Steam Navigation Co. v. Morse loc.cit. 232 (Sir Montague Smith); Tetley & Co. v. British Trade Corp. (1922) 10 Lloyd's L. Rep. 678; Petrinovic & Co. Ltd. v. Mission Francaise des Transports des Maritimes (1941) 71 Lloyd's L. Rep 208); by contrast, an agent who is only temporarily unable to reach a contact person has to try again, or if he acts for a company must try to contact someone else (John Koch Ltd. v. C. & H. Products Ltd. [1956] 2 Lloyd's Rep 59). A further requirement is that the intervention is necessary, according to a standard of reasonableness, in the interests of the principal. An example may be to call at a harbour of refuge and subsequently steer the damaged ship to a port, where it can be repaired for a reasonable price (Phelps, James & Co. v. Hill [1891] 1 QB 605 (where it was impossible to communicate with the owner of the ship)). A sale of perishable goods (Cf. Springer v. Great Western Railway Co. loc.cit.) or goods which are likely to be stolen (Sachs v. Miklos [1948] 2 KB 23, 34-36 (Goddard LJ)) is necessary, whereas to sell commodities suitable for storage in general is not (Prager v. Blatspiel, Stamp & Heacock Ltd. loc.cit. (this concerned furs, which could have been stored in a cold-house)). An intervention may also not be necessary because in the circumstances it would have been more appropriate to inform the relevant public authority and to leave to their judgment the decision as to what has to be done (Flannery v. Dean [1995] 2 ILRM 393 (Castello P) (the defendant had brought a stallion into his possession, which the claimant had neglected, and looked after it; he should have informed the local authority, which would have taken care of the animal).). All depends on whether or not the agent "adopts the course which, to the judgment of a wise and prudent man, is apparently the best for the interest of the persons for whom he acts in a given emergency." Then and only then "may [it] properly be said of the course so taken, that it was, in a mercantile sense, necessary to take it." (Australasian Steam Navigation Co. v. Morse (1871-73) LR 4 PC 222, 230 (Sir Montague Smith)) If these requirements are met then the principal will have to bear the risk of an economic failure of the intervention, not the agent (Tetley & Co. v. British Trade Corporation loc.cit.). It goes without saying that the agent has to act in the interests of the principal (Sachs v. Miklos [1948 2 KB 23, 29 (Goddard LJ)), a requirement that may be absent for instance where someone acts or pretends to act in fulfilment of a contractual duty, whether this duty actually exists or is merely supposed to exist (Jebara v. Ottoman Bank [1927] 2 KB 254, 264 (Bankes LJ)).). As in other jurisdictions a general restriction to juridical acts does not seem to exist: there may be agency of necessity, for example, in conduct – including omitting to do something: see, for instance, The San Roman (1869-72) LR 3 A & E 583, 593 (Sir Robert Phillimore: ship's captain has authority in the interests of the owners of the ship and the cargo to interrupt a journey, delay its continuation and remain in port until danger [here: seizure by foreign naval forces] passed). However, the scope of application of agency of necessity is arguably restricted to specific narrow categories of cases. According to a traditional view an agency of necessity can only arise out of a pre-existing agency: Hanbury, Agency[2], 42. More modern judicial decisions (albeit only at County Court level) have not adopted this restriction: see Palmer v. Stear (1963) 113 LJ 420; White J. D. v. Troups Transport [1976] CLY 33. Moreover, even in the older cases there are indications that a stranger may have authority implied by law to act for another in a case of emergency: see, for instance, the dictum in Beard v. London General Omnibus Co. [1900] 2 QB 530, 532 (Smith LJ). The remaining gaps typically have to be bridged by falling back on bailment law. According to the general rule – though manifold questions are still a matter of dispute – a bailment-relationship (from French bailler to hand over) arises where a bailee voluntarily takes another's (the bailor's) goods into custody. Such a consensual taking of possession establishes a bundle of rights and duties between bailor and bailee and may or may not be based on a contract (Morris v. C.W. Martin & Sons Ltd. [1966] 1 QB 716, 731 E-G (Diplock LJ)). In exceptional cases the bailor need not even have agreed to the transfer of possession. This may be the case if the bailor believes that the relationship of bailment would improve his position and therefore subsequently authorises the taking of custody and thereby retroactively makes the custodian a bailee - with the result that even if the bailee has changed his mind in the meantime this does not affect either the existence or the continuation of the bailment relationship (Bell, Personal Property, 90; Johnson Matthey & Co. Ltd. v. Constantine Terminals Ltd. [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep 215, 222 (Donaldson J)). On the other hand in a number of cases a person is authorised by law to take possession of another's properties. In such cases the possessor will also become a bailee by law - with all its consequences (The question whether the duty of care of the gratuitous bailee in comparison to a bailee for reward is a reduced one (to this effect: Morris v. C.W. Martin & Sons Ltd. [1966] 1 QB 716, 725 E-F [Lord Denning MR] and 737 B-C [Diplock LJ]), or whether it is to be judged according to the general standards of tort law (so held by the majority of judges in Houghland v. R.R. Low (Luxury Coaches) Ltd. [1962] 1 QB 694, and further Salmon LJ in Morris, loc. cit., p. 738 A-B) is a matter of dispute. Whether or not this question is of practical relevance is difficult to decide, in particular because the determination of the standard of care depends on the circumstances of each separate case and may take into account the fact that the act was conducted gratuitous and for another's benefit.). This group includes the finder of lost property (v. Bar (-Middleton), Sachenrecht in Europa, England, 111) and, most notably, all persons who (according to continental-European terminology) take custody of property of another after they have saved it from damage of loss by justified intervention (Examples given by Bell, Personal Property, 91: A person takes a thing away from a drunken person in order to keep it safe; for like reasons the jewellery of an unconscious or mentally disabled person is locked away by the hospital; a person saves things from his neighbour's house which has caught fire and stores them in his house). The legal position of a (gratuitous) bailee in all important features resembles the position of a gestor in relation to his principal (Whether the legal positions of gestor and bailee are similar also with respect to third parties is a matter of property law and needs not be dealt with in the present context. It depends not on the characterisation of the gestor under the law of obligations, but on the fact that the latter is considered to be a possessor within the meaning of property law). The bailee is under a primary obligation to treat the goods carefully and to hand them over to the bailor, as soon as the latter requests restitution (Mitchell v. Ealing London Borough Council [1979] QB 1, 6C (O'Connor J) (concerning gratuitous bailment)). The bailee is therefore under no duty to bring about a guaranteed outcome (Houghland v. R.R. Low (Luxury Coaches) Ltd. [1962] 1 QB 694, 699 (Omerod LJ) (no liability for the theft of goods by a third party which occurred without negligence on the part of the bailee)); moreover, a breach of the duty of care must be causative of the loss of or damage to the goods (Besides Houghland et al see also Lilley v. Doubleday (1880-81) 7 QBD 510 and Mitchell v. Ealing LBC loc.cit. (in this case the bailee had not handed over the goods to the bailor when due and for this reason was liable for the theft, for which in normal circumstances he would not have been held liable as he did not himself act negligently)). The counterpart of these duties is that the bailee is granted a claim against the bailor for reimbursement of expenses. The bailor must cover the costs the bailee has incurred in the course of fulfilment of his duties (China Pacific SA v. Food Corp. of India (The Winson) [1982] AC 939, 960 F-G (Lord Diplock) (concerning warehouse charges of the salvor)). From the point of view of an agent of necessity, who at the same time is a bailee, it may be more favourable to rely on the latter position. As mentioned above he would have to show and, should the situation arise, prove that it would have been impossible or unacceptable to contact the principal in advance. By contrast there is no such requirement in bailment (China Pacific SA v. Food Corp. of India (The Winson) [1979] 2 All ER 35 (the intervener had undertaken to take care of the preservation of a quantity of wheat, which had been saved from a stranded ship. The House of Lords upheld a claim for expenses incurred, as it was obviously impossible to find out whom the batch belonged to and therefore to contact the owner)); it is sufficient that the act constitutes an emergency measure to prevent damage (Tettenborn, Restitution[2], 182 (§ 9-07)).

25. Of course an agent cannot undertake a strictly personal act. However, the demarcation of acts falling within the category of strictly personal acts may differ significantly between Civil Law and Common Law. The most important example may be the execution of a will. Under ENGLISH law (Wills Act 1837, s. 9) and IRISH law (Succession Act 1965, s. 78 rule 1) it is possible for someone other than the testator to sign a testamentary instrument on the testator's behalf, provided this is done at the testator's direction and in his presence. If the signature is not rendered by the testator's nominee under a contractual duty to the testator (e. g. as legal adviser to the testator), this act will remain within the scope of this Book. A mere authorisation to act (without a contractual or non-contractual duty to do so) is not excluded by V.-1:103(a).

III. Act on 'another's behalf' and the intention to benefit another

26. Many European jurisdictions have a double requirement in their law on benevolent intervention, namely that the gestor intervenes (i) in the affairs of 'another' and that he does so (ii) 'on another's behalf'. The second requirement (the intention to act on another's behalf) is universally undisputed, whereas the question whether or not the first requirement (that the intervention must concern the affairs of another – extraneous affairs) is necessary and expedient is the subject matter of a controversial debate in many jurisdictions. Nowhere does there appear to be any marked practical relevance in the sense that the requirement of furtherance of another's affairs actually excludes from the scope of benevolent intervention some precisely identifiable category of cases. As set out above in Comment A V.–1:101 therefore proceeds on the basis that, as a matter of principle, it is only the intention of the gestor which converts the matter being taken care of into an 'extraneous affair'.

27. This corresponds to the wording of GERMAN CC § 677. The terms of that provision likewise do not set out an additional requirement that the affair taken care of 'on behalf of another' must also qualify as an extraneous affair with respect to the gestor – that is to say, an affair which from an objective perspective would be considered to be the principal's. It is nonetheless often asserted in Germany that an act 'for another' must also be objectively extraneous and that the intervener must know it is extraneous. For example it is not an objectively extraneous affair for a hirer of goods to hire them out to another unlawfully (BGH 13 December 1995, BGHZ 131, 297). The intervener must have both the intention and knowledge of taking care of (or at least also taking care of) another's affairs. The intervener must thus recognise that the matter attended to is not the intervener's own (awareness of the extraneous nature of the business as a cognitive element) and must act with the intention of serving the interest of another (intention to further another's affairs in a narrow sense, as a purpose-orientated voluntary element) (see to this effect: Soergel [-Mühl], BGB[11], § 677, no. 3; MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 677, no. 5; Larenz/Canaris, Schuldrecht BT II/1[13], p. 438; for further references see also Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], Introduction §§ 677 ff, no. 21). A strong movement within legal writing, however, regards this separate test of 'extraneous nature' as dispensable (as the present Article does); an 'extraneous' affair is always present when an intervener acts with the intention to benefit another (Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 677 no. 3; Gursky, AcP 185 [1985] 13-45; Wittmann, Begriff und Funktionen der Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag [1981], passim). Moreover, the requirement of an intention to act for another arises not just from CC § 677 ("für einen anderen"), but also from CC § 687 (1) and (2): if a person takes care of another's affair in the mistaken belief it is his own (subsection 1: putative management of one's own affairs [vermeintliche Eigengeschäftsführung]), the legal consequences of benevolent intervention do not apply; if a person takes care of another's affair as if it were his own, but knowing it is not (subsection 2: arrogated management of one's own affairs [angemaßte Eigengeschäftsführung]), they will not apply without further conditions being satisfied. The prevailing opinion which sticks to the requirement of an 'extraneous affair' defines these 'objectively' extraneous affairs as those affairs which a neutral observer would readily identify as belonging to the legal sphere of someone other than the intervener. According to case law, the mere fact that the objectively extraneous affair has been taken care of creates a (rebuttable) presumption that there was an intention to act on another's behalf; an outward manifestation of the intention is not necessary. In contrast 'neutral' affairs (where an objective observer cannot identify whether they were managed 'for another') qualify as extraneous affairs only if the intervener's intention to act for another becomes discernable for third parties (BGH 20 June 1963, BGHZ 40, 28, 31; MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 677, no. 5). The textbook example for a 'neutral' affair is the acquisition of an asset or the conclusion of a contract for services to be rendered in the intervener's own name but for the account of the principal. By contrast, where a health insurer provides benefits in kind to an injured person it is not to be supposed that the insurer is attending to the affairs of a tortfeasor who is liable to compensate the injured person (BGH 8 July 2003, NJW 2003, 3193). ESTONIAN LOA § 1018 (1) similarly dispenses with the requirement of an extraneous affair. The intention to benefit another is decisive. § 1018 (2) accordingly provides the clarification that "a case where a person has no intention to act for the benefit of another is not deemed to be negotiorum gestio".

28. GREEK law requires both the awareness of the intervener that he or she is managing an extraneous affair and the intention to manage it as another's affair. That emerges from a juxtaposition of CC arts. 730, 736 (which do not expressly mention the requirement to act with the intention of benefiting another) with CC arts. 739, 740 (which exclude from the scope of application of justified benevolent intervention acts which are not managed with the intention of benefiting another) (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 13). The intention to manage another's affairs does not presuppose legal capacity; in fact this intention need not be declared expressly provided it is manifest (Papanikolaou loc.cit. no. 14-15). Besides this, CC art. 730 explicitly requires that the matter taken care of be an 'extraneous affair'. The prevailing opinion is that an affair is extraneous if it concerns another's sphere of interest. A distinction is drawn between affairs objectively extraneous and affairs subjectively extraneous. An affair is objectively extraneous if its apparent substance is such that it belongs to another's legal sphere, because it is the exercise of another's right or the discharge of another's duty. By contrast a subjectively extraneous affair appears neutral from an objective perspective, but by means of the intervener's intention to manage another's affair takes on an extraneous nature. The prime example in Greece too is the acquisition of an asset for another (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 4).

29. Likewise PORTUGUESE law contains an animus aliena negotia gerendi as a requirement for the application of the rules on justified benevolent intervention: only a person acting with "intenção de gerir para outrem" – that is to say, a person who intends to act in the interest of and for the account of another (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 66 [1957] 95) – will qualify as a gestor (CC art. 464). Portuguese law has also held on to the traditional requirement of negotium alienum. Vaz Serra, on whose draft (see art. 1, no. 4 of the draft) the wording of the law is based, did not further expound on the problem of this criterion; he considered it would not accord with the rationale of the law of benevolent intervention to restrict the application to the management of extraneous affairs (loc.cit. 69).

30. AUSTRIAN law similarly requires a Fremdgeschäftsführungswillen (i. e. the intention to act on another's behalf) on the part of the intervener (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, § 1035 no. 6; Koziol and Welser, Grundriss II^{12}, 364; Meissel, GoA, 79 et seq.; OGH 19 November 1974, SZ 47/130; OGH 11 July 2001, RIS-Justiz RS 0085741 [no benevolent intervention if a pretender to the inheritance operates a kiosk against the express wishes of the actual heir]; but see for a critical discussion Fötschl, ERPL 2002, 550, 570). Austrian CC § 1036 (intervention in order to prevent impending damage) does not expressly set out the requirement of an intention to act on another's behalf, but it will usually be a feature of such cases (Meissel, GoA, 79). Emergency actions undertaken in the face of a common danger are dealt with by the law of unjustified enrichment (CC § 1043). Intervention other than in a situation of emergency must be beneficial for the principal (CC § 1037). Besides the requirement of an intention to act on another's behalf, CC §§ 1036 and 1037 expressly require that the intervener manages an "extraneous affair". OGH 11 November 1987, SZ 60/235, for instance, dismissed a claim in a case where a person eradicated damage to the ground water on his own property which had been caused by an oil supplier because it was not another's affair. Austrian CC regards "intermeddling with the affairs of another" (CC § 1035) as a rule as constituting an infringement of rights. However, the boundary between an 'extraneous' affair and an intervener's 'own' affair is bedevilled with numerous problems of demarcation; it is also acknowledged that the 'extraneous' nature of an affair may be derived from the intention of the intervener alone (Meissel, GoA, 65). SLOVENIAN law produces the same outcome (Cigoj, Teorija obligacij, 245).

31. In both FRANCE and BELGIUM scholarly writing unanimously takes the view that a gestion d´affaires requires an intention to act on another's behalf (see, for France, Mazeaud and Chabas, Leçons de droit civil II,1^9, no. 675 p. 808-809; for Belgium, Stijns/Van Gerven/Wéry, JT 1996, no. 17 p. 696). Where a person manages the affairs of another in the firm belief that they are his own, the conduct does not constitute benevolent intervention (French Cass.civ. 25 June 1919, D. 1923, I, 223; S. 1921, I, 12). (See also for MALTA CC art. 1019: "Where the agent was under the impression that he was managing his own affairs, he shall not be entitled to any indemnity beyond the benefit which the party interested may have actually derived"). BELGIAN and FRENCH CC art. 1372 ("lorsque volontairement on gère l´affaire d´autrui") combines the requirements of an extraneous affair and the intervener's intention to act on another's behalf in a more or less inseparable fashion. Both elements likewise coalesce in scholarly treatment of the subject (see, for example, for Belgium Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 33 p. 33 and B. H.Verb. [-Roodhooft] Hdst. V, De quasi-contracten, no. 2239; for France Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations^9, no. 675 p. 808). Some French authors even set out the intention de gérer les affaires d´autrui and the utilité of the intervention as the sole requirements of benevolent intervention (e. g. JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence (1996), Fasc. 10, no. 19 et seq.). The intention to act on another's behalf may be missing, for example, where two persons who have provided negotiable instruments as security obtain a release of the instruments from a creditor of the bankrupt borrower by repaying the outstanding loan; this act has been held to be undertaken in the sole interest of those who provided the security, even though it may lead to a third provider of security regaining his negotiable instruments (CFI Hasselt 25 June 1990, RW 1991-92, 925). A further example of lack of intention to act on another's behalf is where a son-in-law equips and furnishes a flat in a part of his father-in-law's house (CA Rouen 15 January 1992, Juris Data 1992-040373). Recent French legal writing introduces a further distinction, namely between benevolent intervention with an altruistic intention (so-called gestion d´affaires désintéressée) and benevolent intervention without an altruistic intention of the intervener (so-called gestion d´affaires intéressée); in the latter case the objective characterisation of an intervention as being undertaken 'on another's behalf' merges into the requirement of utilité, which is assessed from an objective perspective. As regards gestion d´affaires désintéressée, this appears to turn solely on the altruistic intention of the intervener; there is no scrutiny of whether the affair managed is objectively extraneous (see, in particular, Cass.civ. 16 November 1955, J. C. P. 1956 II no. 9087, note Esmein; RTD civ 1956, p. 356, obs. Mazeaud: the rescue of an unconscious driver by a passenger, who himself sustained bad injuries as a result of the rescue, was considered a benevolent intervention on behalf of the insurance company with whom the car was insured, although the driver as a member of the policy holder's family was not himself insured).

32. By contrast SPANISH CC art. 1888 only refers to an extraneous act (alieneidad), in other words interference with the legal sphere of the principal (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 110) as a requirement for the application of the law of benevolent intervention. Yet under Spanish law too it is undisputed that the animus aliena negotia gerendi represents an indispensable requirement of a benevolent intervention in another's affairs. Only a person acting with an altruistic intention will qualify as a gestor (Pasquau Liaño, loc.cit. 61), or, as the Supreme Court has put it, acts "with a disinterested intention, but without the purpose of making a donation, and without the intention to make a profit" (TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 322 p. 198). Essential elements are the intervener's actual knowledge that the interest concerned is extraneous and the intervener's disinterested wish to protect it (Puig Brutau, Compendio II, 599; Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 151). Consequently, the management of another's affairs in the mistaken belief they are one's own is exclusively governed by unjustified enrichment law or, depending on the facts, the law on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 253).

33. ITALIAN law likewise has a requirement that the affair managed be extraneous ("alienità" dell´affare). This can be inferred from CC art. 2028 (gestione di un affare "altrui"). The prevailing view is that whether an act relates to another's affair is to be assessed in line with an objective standard (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 8; Pane, Solidarietà sociale e gestione di affari altrui, 78; Cass. 5 April 1971, no. 976, Rep.Giur.it. 1971, voce Gestione d´affari, c. 1537). It is said to be a prerequisite that the management concerns another's legal sphere (Breccia, La gestione di affari[2], 858-859) or property (Cercone, Codice civile a cura di Rescigno, sub. Art. 2028 CC). However, it is accepted that if there is no inherent objective connection to another's sphere, the issue will depend on the intention of the intervener; Italian law thus also recognises the category of acts which are extraneous merely from a subjective point of view (negozi soggettivamente altrui). The details are a matter of dispute. Legal writing resolves the issue in disparate fashion. A growing body of opinion now equates an 'extraneous affair' with the pursuit of another's interest (Pane, loc.cit. 77-80), which effectively reconciles the objective and the subjective perspective (Sirena, Gestione di affari, 236-237). It is undisputed that from the onset of his action the intervener must act with the intention to act on behalf of the principal (Aru loc.cit. 13). This intention need not necessarily be explicitly stated; it may also be inferred form the circumstances (Cass. 13 March 1964, no. 550, Foro it. 1965, I, 866). The intention to benefit another was affirmed, for example, in a case where an heir incurred expenses in administering the deceased's estate, which administration benefited co-heirs (Cass. 30 January 2002, Foro it. Mass. 1222). By contrast the intention to benefit another was held to be absent where a seller of real estate sold the property to a second purchaser after it had already been sold under a written contract (Cass. 4 November 1995, no. 11519, Giur.it. 1996, I, 1, 902).

34. A zaakwaarneming under DUTCH CC art. 6:198 requires that a person voluntarily, knowingly and with a reasonable ground attends to the interest of another (eens anders belang). Activities covered by benevolent intervention may be acts which aim at the protection, preservation or the augmentation of legal interests (rechtsgoederen) of another (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 291). Surprisingly few particulars can be found neither in case law nor legal writing as to when a person is to be regarded as attending to "een anders belang". Instead the focus is on the existence of an intention to act on another's behalf, which is understood to be the crucial prerequisite of zaakwaarneming (see for instance HR 10 April 1953, NedJur 1953, 630; CFI Almelo 24 November 1954, NedJur 1955, 753 and CFI Maastricht 7 April 2004, LJN-number AP4483, www.rechtspraak.nl).

35. SCOTTISH law likewise relies on the category of an extraneous affair: see above note no. 9.

36. Within the SCANDINAVIAN legal systems there appears to be no discussion in detail of the concept of an 'extraneous' affair or the intention to act on another's behalf. However, it may nonetheless be inferred from HD 28 December 1961, NJA 1961 p. 673 that according to SWEDISH law a benevolent intervention may only be recognised if the gestor acts with the intention of interfering in another's legal sphere. As regards DANISH case law, one might point to HD 18 May 1995, UfR 1995 p. 691, a case where it may be doubted whether the gestor acted with the intention to act on another's behalf. The case concerned a contract for the sale of land which ostensibly had been concluded. The putative purchaser had made an advance payment to the estate agent, but could not claim it back from the estate agent because of the latter's bankruptcy. According to trade practice, the broker's commission would be met by the seller. The court therefore granted the buyer a claim for compensation against the seller, as he (the seller) was 'closer' to bearing the risk of repayment. However, a further claim of the putative buyer to recover the wasted costs of enforcement which was likewise founded on the law of benevolent intervention was dismissed.

37. For agency of necessity the COMMON LAW requires that the agent acts in the interest of his principal. Of necessity this excludes acts which are a collusion with or otherwise manifestly intended to benefit third parties, rather than the principal. So, for example, there can be no question of a ship's captain having authority to create a security interest in his principal's property (the ship) if the purpose of the transaction is merely to benefit an existing creditor: Empire of Peace, The (1869) 39 LJ Adm (N.S.) 12 (Sir R. J. Phillimore) (bottomry bond, which was intended simply to enhance the security of a pre-existing debt owed by the principal without advantage procured for the principal was ineffective as debt already secured). The same applies where a captain enters into a contract of salvage with the aim of benefiting the salvor rather than in good faith in the interests of the principal whose property is to be salvaged: The Theodore (1858) Swab 351, 166 ER 1163 (Dr Lushington). (See also Prager v. Blatspiel, Stamp & Heacock Ltd. [1924] 1 KB 566, 572-573 where McCardie J indicates as one ground of his decision (albeit without elaborating the point) that the agent must act in good faith.) A professed intention to act on behalf of another may render a person a self-appointed agent and liable to account for benefits obtained: see Chapter 2, Art. 2:103, Notes I, 22. Where the intervener has caused loss to the putative principal, however, an agency will be denied if the intervener has acted exclusively or predominantly in their own interest: cf. Sachs v. Miklos [1948] 2 KB 23, 29 (Lord Goddard CJ), where the defendant had sold the plaintiff's furniture solely in order to use the room which the furniture occupied, followed in Anderson & Anderson v. Earlanger [1980] CLY 133 (Fay J) (defence of sale through agency of necessity unavailable), and see also Beaman v. A. R. T. S. Ltd. [1948] 2 All ER 89, 94E (Denning J), holding that a person who stores things for an absent friend who cannot be contacted and then gives them away because they have decayed or have little value and the storage takes up space or costs money commits the tort of conversion – but see now also the statutory power of sale in the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, s. 12, which protects an involuntary bailee. Equally, one reason for the common law's unwillingness to recognise a right to a reward for the finder of another's property may be that preservation of property by a finder is deemed to be in one's own (finder's) interest – a preserving for oneself rather than the 'true' owner – because in the event that the owner does not or cannot claim it, title being relative, the finder is an owner subject only to the claims of one who is better entitled (i.e., the finder's title becomes impregnable when the true owner's claim in tort is time-barred): cf. Sutton v. Buck (1810) 2 Taunt 302, 129 ER 1094 at 1098 (Lord Mansfield CJ: salvaging, so far from being a duty to benefit the owner, is a mode of entitling oneself to the property in case the owner does not claim it), which case, however, only lays down the principle that there is no duty on a stranger to intervene to salvage wreck from navigable river.

IV. The preponderance of the intention to benefit another; simultaneous pursuit of one's own interests

38. None of the European concepts of the law of benevolent intervention requires that a person acts exclusively for altruistic reasons. This, as is generally accepted, would be unrealistic, because the intervener will often also be pursuing his or her own interests at the same time. Consequently, benevolent intervention is only held to be inapplicable if the relationship between the intention to benefit another and the intention to serve one's own interests is reversed, the intervener predominantly attending to his own interests and only secondarily attending to another's interests. However, no national legal system contains a clear provision which states with clarity that the intervener must act with the 'predominant' intention to benefit another (as paragraph (1) of the present Article does).

39. GERMAN case law has always emphasized that an intention to benefit another is not excluded by the fact the intervener has also acted in pursuit of own interests (BGH 24 October 1974, BGHZ 63, 167; BGH 8 March 1990, BGHZ 110, 313). Such cases are referred to as cases involving 'affairs which are also another's' (auch fremde Geschäfte). The (rebuttable) presumption of intention to benefit another also applies to these cases (BGH 18 September 1986, BGHZ 98, 235, 240; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[632], § 677, no. 6; see, however, Medicus, Schuldrecht II BT[12], nos. 620, 630).

40. Under GREEK law it is similarly universally accepted that benevolent intervention is not excluded by the intervener serving his own interests as well as those of another. However, such coexistence of interests may make it more difficult to fulfil the requirement of the intention to act on another's behalf (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 10; CA Athens 2896/1977, NoB 26/1978 p. 223 [where in a case of discharge of another's debt the court took the view that there was no animus aliena negotia gerendi] and ErmAK [-Sakketas], Art. 730, no. 22 [if an affair is partly another's interest and partly the intervener's own, benevolent intervention can apply, but if the intervener acts solely to further his own interests benevolent intervention will not apply even if the act is also beneficial for other persons]).

41. This accords with the position under PORTUGUESE law. The application of the provisions on benevolent interventions remains possible where the intervener acts on behalf of another and on his own behalf at the same time, as long as he acts with the intention to benefit another in regard to the extraneous affair (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 66 [1957], 97). Typical cases of coexistence of interests concern interveners who act in the course of their profession or trade (as, for instance, in STJ 22 April 1986, BolMinJus 356 [1986], 352).

42. Likewise in AUSTRIA the law on benevolent intervention in general remains applicable even if the intervention for another also serves the gestor's own interests at the same time. Both case law (OGH 7 December 1972, SZ 45/137; OGH 8 November 1984, JBl 1985, 421, 423; OGH 3 October 1996 RdW 1997, 275) and academic writing (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1035 no. 5, Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, § 1035 no. 5, Meissel, GoA, 66 et seq.) recognise the concept which in Austria too is termed 'affairs which are also another's' (auch fremde Geschäfte). Older case law had required an intervention for another free of self-interest (for references see Rummel and Meissel loc.cit), and phrases which point in this direction reappear in some more recent judgments (e. g. OGH 28 January 1997,WBl 1997, 214 [full text in RIS-Justiz RS 0085741] and OGH 27 November 2001, RIS-Justiz RS 0023484). However, this does not seem to indicate a general change of the established practice of the courts as set out in the leading case OGH 7 December 1972, SZ 45/137. The terms of V.-1:101 seem to be in line with the current state of Austrian law.

43. Under BELGIAN law the question whether and, if so, to what extent an intervener may also pursue his own interests without loosing his status of benevolent intervener is still a matter of dispute (for details see Stijns/Van Gerven/Wéry, JT 1996, no. 17 p. 697). As far as FRENCH law is concerned, it is accepted that the law of benevolent intervention may apply although the intervener does not act solely with the intention to further another's interests, acting partly in his own interest (Mazeaud and Chabas, Leçons de droit civil II,1^9 no. 675 p. 808-809). Some authors even consider that a tendency can be discerned in recent case law to the effect that benevolent intervention will be recognised even if the intervener lacks any altruistic intention. This is explained by the development of a distinction between 'classic' benevolent intervention (acting with an altruistic motive – gestion d´affaires désintéressée –) and benevolent intervention without an altruistic motive (the so-called gestion d´affaires intéressée). As a result, a dualistic system of the law of benevolent intervention has emerged. A gestion d´affaires désintéressée only requires that from the subjective perspective of the intervener the act appeared at the outset to be beneficial, whereas the gestion d´affaires intéressée requires that from an objective perspective the act must ultimately prove to be beneficial (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10, no. 19 et seq.). In at least one instance French case law has adopted this terminological distinction (CA Orléons 14 September 1993, Juris Data 1993-045124).

44. SPANISH legal writing unanimously maintains that a benevolent intervention will only be precluded if the intervener places the principal's interest second to his own interests (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 257; Sánchez Jordán, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 151; Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II, 567). Although there is no elaborate doctrine on 'affairs which are also another's', the approach taken is in substance quite similar to that of German law (Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 156). One justification may be an argument e contrario from CC art. 1891, according to which the intervener is liable for accidental risks if he has put the interest of the principal second. In case law it has been held that a co-owner who, acting in his own name, had a second elevator built into an apartment house and in so doing (also) pursued his own interests might act with animus aliena negotia gerendi (CA Las Palmas 6 November 1985, La Ley 86 [1] no. 6091 p. 540); similarly this was also held to apply where one of several joint heirs fed animals forming part of the deceased's estate before the estate was distributed (TS 3 January 1962, RAJ 1962 [1] no. 265 p. 165; for details see Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 237).

45. The rule contained in V.–1:101 also states the position of ITALIAN law. The gestor need not act exclusively in the interests of the principal, but he or she must act predominantly in the principal's interests (judged from an objective perspective) (Cass. 13 March 1964, no. 550, Foro it. 1965, I, 866). Where a part of the activity which concerns the intervener's own interests can clearly be distinguished from those parts of the activity which serve another's interests, the rules on benevolent intervention apply only to those activities which serve the interest of another (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 8). Benevolent intervention comes into play where one parent provides maintenances also on behalf of the other parent (Cass. 5 December 1996, no. 10849, Rep.Giur.it. 1997, voce Filiazione, no. 38) or where a gestor attends to the interests of multiple owners or heirs when he himself is one of them (Cass. 11 July 1978, no. 3479, Giur. it. 1979, I, 1,820; Cass. 4 May 1985, no. 2795, Rep.Giur.it. 1985, voce Responsabilità no. 154).

46. DUTCH law recognises the principle that a gestor may attend to own interests alongside the interests of the principal. The son who arranges for the provisional administration of his father's estate after the latter's death is gestor for his siblings even though he acts on his own behalf at the same time. An intervener may attend to the interests of another and at the same time pursue his personal interests. The concept of an affair which is 'also another's' is thus recognised (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 790; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 293, p. 308; Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, note 11; see also HR 24 January 1902, W 7714 and HR 26 June 1959, NedJur 1959 no. 586, p. 1284).

47. Under SCOTTISH law too the pursuit of one's own interests alongside an intention to advance another's interest does not fundamentally preclude the existence of a relationship of negotiorum gestio (Kolbin & Sons v. Kinnear & Co. 1931 SC (HL) 128; SMT Sales & Services Co. Ltd. v. Motor and General Finance Co. Ltd. 1954 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 107). However, it is not yet completely resolved what the balance must be between one's own interest and the interest of another. The boundary line seems to be drawn where a person acts selfishly, that is to say, with the predominant intention of advancing his own interests. In such instances the case is one for the law of unjustified enrichment or tort law (Stair [-Whitty], vol. 15, no. 138; see, however, Gretton, SLT 1978, 145). As a general rule compensation under the law of benevolent intervention is available only for expenses which have not been incurred to advance one's own interest (Leslie, SLT 1981, 259, 260; idem, Jur.Rev. 1983, 32, 33).

48. Within SCANDINAVIAN case law too there are cases in which the intervener has pursued his own interest as well as another's. In DANISH HD 3 December 1936, UfR 1937, 357, the Danish Ministry of Foreign Affairs arranged at the expense of the Danish charterer for the return of Danish seamen who had missed the departure of their vessel from a Columbian port and could not remain in Columbia for want of visa. The shipping company had been informed in advance, but although obliged to do so had refused to come to the seamen's assistance. The charterer was granted a claim against the shipping company for reimbursement of expenses incurred, although in effecting return carriage the chraterer had also acted in his own interest. Danish HD 19 January 1912, UfR 1912, 239 concerned compensation between several reinsurance companies as a result of a compromise settlement concluded by one of the reinsurance companies on behalf of them all. SWEDISH HD 28 December 1961, NJA 1961, 673 dismissed a claim alleged to have arisen out of negotiorum gestio for the reason that the defendant had not accepted the gift in dispute either for herself or for the claimant child.

49. The COMMON LAW on this point aspires to ensure the principal is fully protected. Agency by ratification is not precluded by the fact that the agent is (subjectively) also acting in furtherance of his own interests provided the agent is (objectively) demonstrably acting on behalf of the principal: RE Tiedemann & Ledermann Frères Arbitration [1899] 2 QB 66. Moreover, where the agent is only ostensibly acting on the principal's behalf the principal is nonetheless able to obtain from the agent the fruits of an unauthorised venture (so precluding the agent from profiting from his breach of duty). On the other hand, if the agent acts exclusively in their own interest, though in the principal's name, there will be no agency of necessity to the detriment of the principal (i. e. by recognising a burdensome transaction of the agent with a third party and holding the principal bound by it, or where the 'agency' would be at the principal's expense): cf. The Alexander (1842) 1 W Rob 346 at 355-356, 166 ER 602 at 606 (Dr Lushington). Notwithstanding this there is some doubtful indication in more modern case law that the performance of a 'duty' which is no more than a matter of self-interest (i. e., its non-performance does not entitle the other party to any redress, but merely excludes or restricts a possible claim of the 'obliged' party) does not preclude the party performing the 'duty' from also acting as an agent of necessity for the other party. It has been held (though only at County Court level) that a buyer of 'eating' strawberries to whom the seller delivers a proportion which are unfit for eating (but who apparently cannot or does not reject and return them, but instead claims a diminution in price) acts as agent of necessity in selling them to a jam-maker: see (1932) 76 SJ 663. (Until 1995, when the Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s. 3(1), inserted a new s. 35A into the Sale of Goods Act 1979 – which replaced the Sale of Goods Act 1893 – the buyer had no right to reject part only of the goods supplied under an inseverable contract of sale since partial acceptance precluded repudiation for breach of condition: see ss. 11(4) and 53(1) of the 1979 Act; the former section and thus also indirectly the latter are now subject to s. 35A.) The proposition seems doubtful, however, because it is difficult to see how in such circumstances the agent is acting on behalf of anyone but himself. Where the breach of contract relates to the quality of the goods, the reduction in the price for the accepted goods which the buyer may set up against the purchaser for breach of warranty is prima facie determined by the difference between the value the goods would have had if they had fulfilled the warranty and the market value of the actual goods supplied: Sale of Goods Act 1979, s. 53(3). Moreover, where the buyer resells the goods at a time proximate to delivery and to a purchaser with knowledge of the (inferior) quality, that resale price provides strong evidence of their actual value: see Benjamin (-Harris), Sale of Goods[6], § 17-

052. Thus on a claim for the contract price by the unpaid seller, the buyer was liable to pay that price less the difference between the market value of 'eating' strawberries and the price that could have been obtained (and in this case was obtained) by a sub-sale to a jam-maker. Assuming (as the judge did) that the contract price reflected the market value of 'eating' strawberries, the defendant buyer was in all events liable under the Sale of Goods Act to pay the realisable value of the strawberries supplied. Sale to the jam maker did not affect the seller's position, but merely ensured that the buyer obtained the value of the inferior strawberries which he would in any case have to pay to the seller. The application of "agency of necessity" principles was entirely unnecessary to achieve the judgment outcome. Indeed, so far as it implied that the buyer was acting in the seller's interest and would be liable to account to the seller for the sub-sale, the application of the doctrine seems profoundly misleading. Academic literature supports the view that an individual who acts predominantly in their own interests is not conducting a "necessitous intervention": see McCamus, 11 (1979) Ottawa L Rev 297, 253 n 12, explaining Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co. (1886) 34 Ch. D 234 on the basis that the benefit of another was merely incidental to the pursuit of one's own interests. See also Re Leslie (1883) 23 Ch D 552, where the husband, who paid premiums on an insurance policy taken out by his wife, had himself an interest in the policy, and the claim of his personal representatives for a lien on the policy failed. Any redress for expenditure made to safeguard one's own interest and benefiting another will be referable to other principles such as those governing contribution or subrogation. That the intervener has some interest in the matter, however, does not of itself preclude a restitutionary claim and the case law is not entirely clear on the exact boundary line: cf. Williams v. Wentworth (1842) 5 Beav 325, 49 ER 603 (Lord Langdale MR) (where a creditor could obtain reimbursement of the costs of litigation for the protection of his debtor).

V. In particular: performance on the basis of a void contract for services

50. A problem much discussed in many legal systems is whether services rendered under a void contract for services can constitute a benevolent intervention, or whether this question must be answered in the negative because the requirement to act with the intention to benefit another is absent. GERMAN law in such cases applies the law of benevolent intervention (see for instance BGH 31 January 1963, BGHZ 39, 87, 90; BGH 24 September 1987, BGHZ 101, 393, 399; BGH 30 September 1993, NJW 1993, 3196; BGH 10 October 1996, NJW 1997, 47, 48; BGH 20 October 1996, NJW 1997, 47 and (where the contract was void because administrative consent was withheld) BGH 4 December 2003, BGHZ 157, 168; see also BGH 4 November 2004, RIW 2005, 144 where the contract was void for want of the required formality). The justification given is that an erroneous belief in an obligation to perform does not preclude benevolent intervention. However, a growing body of opinion holds this approach to be wrong because by this means provisions which specifically address such situations are circumvented. This relates in particular to the statutory provisions on reversal of transactions in CC §§ 812 ff (unjustified enrichment law) and in particular CC §§ 814, 817 sentence 2 and 818 (3) (so, inter alia, Medicus, Schuldrecht II BT[12], no. 622; MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 677, no. 41).

51. GREEK case law has held the law of benevolent intervention applicable to cases of void contracts of mandate for the purchase of land. (At the time those cases were decided it was assumed that the contract of mandate – like the main contract itself – was subject to the requirement of a notarised deed. However, the line of authority to that effect was abandoned in 1975; since then it has been held that the mandate does not require any specific form: Areopag 104/1975 NoB 23/1975, p. 653; affirmed by Areopag 1489/1982 NoB 31/1983, p. 1353). The acquisition of the land which was effected in accordance with the void contract of mandate was categorised as a subjectively extraneous affair if the agent implicitly indicated the intention to acquire the land for another. In such instances the courts have in consequence applied the law of benevolent intervention (Areopag 161/1974 NoB 22/1974 p. 1048). However, in the case of a void bilateral contract, the application of the rules on benevolent intervention seems doubtful. Greek legal writing assumes that if the contract is void there is no mandate in the sense of CC art. 730 (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 21; ErmAK [-Sakettas], Art. 730, no. 31), but the additional requirement of an intention to benefit another is considered to be missing (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 23).

52. PORTUGUESE legal writing (case law on this point seems to be non-existent) likewise argues in favour of the application of the law on benevolent intervention where services are rendered on the basis of a void contract – at any rate if the person acting did not know that the contract was void. The absence of an 'authority' is accordingly to be assessed objectively (Vieira Gomes, Gestão de negócios, 66 and Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 66 [1957], 104-105).

53. The starting point for AUSTRIAN law is different. Here (in agreement with the solution adopted by this draft) the view is taken that a service rendered under a contract which (unknown to the parties) is void is rendered without the intention to benefit another (OGH 19 November 1974, SZ 47/130; OGH 17 January 1979, SZ 52/9; for further case law see RIS-Justiz RS 0019735). Legal writing endorses that view (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, § 1035 no. 6; Meissel, GoA, 82 f; 215 ff; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB, I^3 § 1035 no. 6 [though differing in respect of gratuitous mandates]). Exceptions from this principle are occasionally made in cases where the grant of a power of representation was more apparent than real (Meissel loc.cit. 216 and OGH 26 January 1995, SZ 68/21 [concerning a tax adviser]).

54. Despite pointers to the contrary in FRENCH legal writing (in particular JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10 no. 78), there appears to be no cases in which the courts have treated a party rendering services as agreed under a void contract to be an intervener in relation to the other contracting party. In BELGIUM this question has not even be addressed in the legal literature; equally there is no case law in which the law of benevolent intervention has been applied to the reversal of void contracts. The same holds true for ITALY.

55. SPANISH legal writing clearly identifies the animus aliena negotia gerendi as the crux of the issue (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 95, Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 253). Older case law assumed that if the intervener at the time of performance believed he was obliged to perform, an intention to manage another's affairs was absent (TS 26 November 1926, reported by Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 253 and Lacruz Berdejo, loc.cit.). The current position of the Tribunal Supremo is contradictory. The Fourth Division of the court (then competent in matters of administrative law) has repeatedly applied the law of benevolent intervention to void contracts between private individuals and local authorities (TS 11 October 1979, RAJ 1979 [2] no. 3448 p. 2814; TS 29 October 1980, RAJ 1980 [2] no. 3964 p. 3213; TS 8 March 1984, RAJ 1984 [1] no. 1384 p. 1052 [Third Division, competent for contentious administrative proceedings]; TS 22 January 1975, RAJ 1975 [1] no. 8 p. 20). However, the First Division (competent in private law) has declined to apply the law of benevolent intervention to reverse void contracts (TS 9 April 1980, RAJ 1980 [1] no. 1373 p. 1045; TS 28 September 1960, RAJ 1960 no. 3149 p. 2031). The more recent academic view seems rather to tend towards the approach of the administrative division, which for its part accords with the approach taken by the German BGH (Lacruz Berdejo, loc.cit.; idem, Elementos II [2] 418).

56. DUTCH case law has apparently not yet had opportunity since the coming into force of the new CC to consider the application of the law of benevolent intervention to cases of performance under a void contract assumed to be valid. The question is disputed in the literature (favouring the application of the law of benevolent intervention see in particular Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, no. 14 with reference to Rb Dordrecht 30 December 1953, NedJur 1954 no 618 p. 1148; for a contrary opinion, see Schoordijk, Zaakwaarneming een onderbelichte bron van verbintenis, 12-13). As a matter of principle, however, the reversal of contracts which are void or avoided (on the latter see also CC art. 3:53 (2)) is a natural subject for the rules on prestations conferred without obligation (CC art. 6:203).

57. Unambiguous authority on the application of the law of benevolent intervention to reverse void contracts is also missing from SCOTTISH law. However it may be assumed that this question is to be answered in the negative. Use is made of the law of benevolent intervention only very restrictively (Schneiderhan, Der Quasi-Contract im schottischen und englischen Recht, 135-136; Stair [-Whitty], vol. 15, paras 106, 108; Leslie, Jur.Rev. 1983, 13, 16, 18). Furthermore, the formative altruistic element is lacking in a case of performance in accordance with an obligation assumed to be valid. In addition the principal will have knowledge of the activity of the intervener. Scholarly treatment of the reversal of contracts which are void or avoided features only under the heading of the law of unjustified enrichment (e. g. McBryde, The Law of Contract in Scotland, 353; Laura J Macgregor, Edinburgh LRev 2000, 19; MacQueen, JuridRev 1994, 137; Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[12], ch. 25).

58. As far as SCANDINAVIAN legal systems are concerned it seems that the application of the law of negotiorum gestio to reverse transactions is considered out of the question. Such a construction would be perceived as unnatural. Neither case law nor academic writing show any inclination for such a solution.

59. Since agency in the COMMON LAW is not dependent on the existence of a contract, there is nothing which intrinsically excludes the operation of agency principles between the parties once an agreement is reached, even though, for some reason, that agreement is not (as the parties intended) valid as a contract. While an agent cannot be obliged to carry through the agreement (in the absence of a contractually binding obligation), an agent will be obliged to surrender any profits obtained if the agent nonetheless performs: cf. Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co. v. Farnham [1957] 1 WLR 1051 (Harman J) (where reasons of illegality prevented agency by ratification, but the self-appointed agent was nonetheless liable to surrender the profits made on the principal's behalf). However, there can be no agency where the principal lacks capacity and in such cases (as in other cases of intervention by strangers) it is the law of restitution which applies based on the principal's unjustified enrichment. The provision or financing the provision of food, clothing, accommodation and other necessaries to a person lacking capacity to conclude a contract so as to maintain and protect that person has long been recognised as entitling the provider to payment for the (necessary) goods or services rendered: see Wentworth v. Tubb (1841) 1 Y & C CC 171, 62 ER 840 (Knight Bruce VC)); Re Gibson (1871-72) LR 7 Ch. App. 52 (claim in respect of maintenance of mentally ill sister in a private institution for recoupment out of her estate); Re Rhodes (1890) 44 Ch. D 94, 102 (Kay J), 105 (Cotton LJ), 107

(Lindley LJ) and 108 (Lopes LJ), where the requirements of the claim were not satisfied; Re Clabdon [1904] 2 Ch 465 (Farwell J) (minor); Re [1909] 1 Ch 574, 576 (Cozens-Hardy MR); Guardians of the Poor of St. Mary Islington v. Biggenden [1910] 1 KB 105, 111 (Bray J: minors). The principle extends to the payment of or provision of legal services for the protection of the individual concerned, independently of the success of the litigation, provided it was necessary: see Ex parte Price (1751) 2 Ves Sen 407, 28 ER 260 (Lord Hardwicke LC); Sherwood v. Sanderson (1815) 19 Ves Jun 280, 34 ER 521 (Lord Eldon LC); Williams v. Wentworth (1842) 5 Beav 325, 49 ER 603 (Lord Langdale MR); Wentworth v. Tubb (1843) 2 Y & C CC 537, 63 ER 241 (Knight Bruce VC); Nelson v. Duncombe (1846) 9 Beav 211, 50 ER 323 (Lord Langdale MR); Tayler v. Tayler (1851) 3 Mac & G 426, 42 ER 325 (Lord Truro LC); Chester v. Rolfe (1853) 4 De G.M. & G 798, 43 ER 720 (CA in Chancery); Re Meares (1878-79) 10 Ch. D 552. The claim in respect of necessaries provided is a personal one – historically based on the notion of a contract implied by law and now more properly recognised simply as one of restitution: see Wentworth v. Tubb loc. cit. at 173-174 (842) (Knight Bruce VC); Williams v. Wentworth loc. cit. at 329 (605) (Lord Langdale MR); Re Gibson loc. cit., 53 (Mellish LJ); Re Rhodes loc. cit., 97 (Kay J); Re J loc. cit. 577 (Fletcher Moulton LJ) – though the point was left open by Cozens-Hardy MR (loc. cit., 576) and see also Re Weaver (1882) 21 Ch. D 615, 619 (Jessel MR: possibly a discretionary claim in Equity) and 620 (Cotton LJ: open question where claim arises at common law. Brett LJ: reserving the question whether an implied contract). The concept of an implied contract was particularly unsuitable in a context where the enriched person could never have concluded an express contract: Re Rhodes loc. cit., 105 (Cotton LJ: for that reason an erroneous and very unfortunate expression), 107 (Lindley LJ, pointing to "the unfortunate terminology of our law, owing to which the expression 'implied contract' has been used to denote not only a genuine contract established by inference, but also an obligation which does not arise from any real contract, but which can be enforced as if it had a contractual origin [i. e.] quasi ex contractu"). The principle has been given statutory effect: see the Mental Capacity Act 2005, s. 7, which, when it comes into effect, will supersede (except as to supplies of goods sold and delivered to minors and drunks) the Sale of Goods Act 1979, s. 3. The restitutionary claim does not give rise to a proprietary security in the form of a charge over that person's assets: Re (1878) 8 Ch. D 256, 259 (James LJ).

VI. The principal

60. The question who is to be considered the principal is decided under GERMAN law, according to the prevailing opinion, in line with the (unwritten) requirement that the intervention must concern the affair of 'another'. An affair is considered to be that of another if it concerns the legal sphere or sphere of interest of another. However, this definition only relates to 'objectively extraneous affairs' (those affairs which according to their nature, content or outward appearance belong to another's sphere of interest) whereas in the case of a subjectively extraneous affair (where the outward appearance does not permit a clear-cut attribution) the existence of a principal and determination of the principal's identity is inferred by reference to the intention of the intervener. Examples are BGH 16 March 1965, BGHZ 43, 188 (where a car was stopped on a dark road in order to draw the driver's attention to a defective rear light and the danger of a collision from behind; this was held to constitute an intervention for the driver and the road users behind who were at risk of an accident); BGH 7 November 1960, BGHZ 33, 251 (a person who procures necessary medical assistance for an injured person acts on behalf of the health insurer with whom the injured person is insured); BGH 20 June 1968, BB 1969, 194 (a person who discharges another's debt is held as a general rule to act on behalf of the debtor); BGH 20 June 1963, BGHZ 40, 28 (a fire brigade extinguishing a fire intervenes on behalf of both the arsonist and the owner of the property on fire). Any natural or legal person may be a principal; according to BGH 25 June 2003, NJW 2003, 3268 this extends to a community of heirs.

61. According to the prevailing opinion in GREECE the principal is whose affair is managed. Again this falls back on the distinction between an objectively extraneous affair and a subjectively extraneous affair (see above note 28). The 'extraneous' quality of an affair where the affair is subjectively extraneous is inferred from the intervener's intention to benefit another. That intention pinpoints the principal (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 4). It is not a requirement that the intervener should know exactly who the principal is. Where the intervener is mistaken as to his identity, it will be the principal who is actually affected by the intervention who will obtain the rights and incur the duties arising from the benevolent intervention (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 17; ErmAK [-Sakketas], Art. 730, no. 12). An act of benevolent intervention may concern multiple principals. Problems may arise where other persons besides the directly affected principal have an (indirect) interest in the intervention. For instance, where assistance is rendered to an unconscious accident victim, the injured person's health insurance will have an indirect interest. The question whether or not persons who only benefit indirectly from the intervention are also to be regarded as principals is usually answered in the negative in Greek legal literature. It is argued that the scope of application of benevolent intervention would otherwise become too broad (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 9; see, however, Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I/2, 194, who in this case considers the health insurance to be a principal). Both natural and legal persons may be principals (ErmAK [-Sakketas], Art. 730, no. 10); the same applies to an unborn child and a legal person which has not yet been established (Sakketas loc.cit.).

62. PORTUGUESE academic treatment of the subject likewise emphasises that both natural and legal persons as well as persons not yet in existence (such as an unborn child or a legal person not yet established) can be a principal. It is not required that the intervener should personally know the principal. It is of no consequence if the intervener is mistaken about the true identity of the principal; only the 'true' principal will be relevant. It is of importance that the intervener acts for another, but it is irrelevant who this other person is (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 66 [1957] 99).

63. As far as AUSTRIAN law is concerned it is undisputed that the principal need not have legal capacity (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, § 1035 no. 7), unless (as in the case of ratification) some statement of intention is essential (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I^3, § 1035 no. 7). It is possible to act on behalf of a (legal) person which is not yet in existence (Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1^2, 892; Ehrenzweig, System II/1^2, 715). The principal is the person with whose legal sphere the intervener interferes and for whom he intends to act (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, § 1035 no. 7; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I^3, § 1035 no. 3; Meissel, GoA, 59 ff). A determination of the principal's identity may depend on the intention of the intervener (Meissel, loc.cit. 65). However, an error of the intervener concerning the identity of the principal is without consequence (Ehrenzweig, System II/1^2, 715; Klang [-Stanzl], loc.cit. 892; Schwimann [-Apathy], loc.cit. no. 6). Instead an objective determination as to whose affair is concerned will be decisive (Meissel, GoA, 82). If the intervener believes that there is a principal when in fact there is none, there can be no benevolent intervention (Meissel, loc.cit. 109 giving the example of a search following an avalanche without the certain knowledge whether or not any person had been buried by the avalanche). The intervener need not know the principal personally (Koziol and Welser, Grundriss II^{12}, 364). It must merely be possible to ascertain the principal at the material time, that is to say at the onset of the intervention (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], § 1035 no. 6; Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1[2], 892). Case law from time to time adopts a rather generous approach to this requirement of 'ascertainability' (e. g. OGH 23 February 1995, ZVR 1995/129; OGH 27 June 1996, ecolex 1997, 81 and OGH 6 December 2001, RIS-Justiz RS 0019810, all relating to compensation for costs incurred in maintaining vehicles held in reserve in case a third party causes an accident to those in operation). A person who merely draws indirect benefit from an intervention is not considered a principal (Meissel, GoA, 60). However, it is possible for more than one person to be a principal (OGH 8 November 1984, JBl 1985, 421: several co-owners of a house held to be principals).

64. Similarly, both natural and legal persons can be principals under FRENCH law (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10, no. 27). The Cour de Cassation has even held a legal person under public law to be the principal in a case of benevolent intervention (Cass.civ. 8 July 1918, S. 1921, I, 5, note Achille Mestre), although it has never referred to this decision since. Whether or not a benevolent intervention is possible in favour of a legal person in the course of incorporation cannot be clearly stated. The Cour de Cassation has held (though without precise reference to the law of benevolent intervention) that a company cannot incur obligations by virtue of acts performed before its establishment (Cass.civ. 1 July 1971, D. 1972, 436, note Larroumet). However, academic treatment of such cases usually considers benevolent intervention to be applicable (for references see Bout loc.cit. no. 27). Moreover, persons who lack legal capacity may be principals (le Tourneau, RépDrCiv, VI, v° Gestion d´affaires [2002] no. 30). In general the legal position in BELGIUM is the same. It is, however, a matter of dispute both in case law and legal literature whether a private citizen can intervene benevolently for the benefit of a public authority (see for further details Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, nos. 27-28 p. 29-30; this has been affirmed by CA Liège 2 March 1967, JT 1967, 632 and CFI Zinnik 10 June 1992, TAgrR 1993, 202; but rejected in Cass. 13 October 1898, Pas. 1898, I, 301, concl. Mesdach de ter Kiele). It is clear at any rate that the law of benevolent intervention may apply where one legal person constituted under public law acts in favour of another legal person constituted under public law (CA Brussel 7 February 1964, Pas. 1965, II, 70: where the fire brigade of town A extinguished a fire within a district coming under the responsibility of the neighbouring local authority B).

65. By contrast, the problem how to determine the principal has only rarely been considered in FRENCH and BELGIAN law. The principal is the person in whose affairs the intervener spontaneously and beneficially interferes (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10 no. 1) or whose affairs are attended to (de Page, Droit Civil Belge II[3], no. 1069 p. 1130). Apparently objective criteria (the sphere of interests concerned) are decisive. However, in respect of gestion d´affaires désintéressée some French case law has held a person to be the principal even though – from an objective perspective – his affairs were not concerned at all (Cass.civ. 16 November 1955, JCP 1956 II no. 9087, note Esmein; Rev.trim.dr.civ. 1956, 356, obs. Mazeaud: in this case of benevolent intervention by a rescuer who pulled an unconscious driver from a burning car, the insurer of the car owner was held to be the principal although the insurance cover did not extend to the driver). If the intervener is mistaken about the identity of the principal all depends on the actual person whose interests are concerned (Bout loc.cit. no. 24-25). The same approach is taken in Belgium (Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 33 p. 33). Where several persons qualify as principal, there is no solidary liability – either in France or in Belgium – notwithstanding that the contrary solution is adopted in the law of mandate (CC art. 2002): JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – effets, Fasc. 20 no. 86 and Paulus loc.cit. no. 92 p. 53.

66. SPANISH law refers to the principal as dueño de los negocios, dueño or propietario. However, the principal may not only be the owner of property; he or she may be any person who has an interest in having the matter addressed (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 86). The principal may be either a natural or a legal person (and in the latter case constituted under either private or public law). Spanish legal writing in general accepts that an unborn child or a legal person not yet established may be the principal in a benevolent intervention (Pasquau Liaño, loc.cit. 87). Likewise a benevolent intervention for the benefit of an unknown principal is accepted (TS 18 January 1908, cited according to Pasquau Liaño, loc.cit. 225). The principal need not have legal capacity (TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 322 p. 198); legal capacity is only required with respect to ratification (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 262). The question who is a principal is usually decided by reference to the notion of the extraneous affair. The concept of a subjectively extraneous affair, however, is treated with great reservation (Sánchez Jordán, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 80). It is possible for an act of benevolent intervention to serve the interest of several principals, but if so they are not subject to the rules on joint liability under CC art. 1731, only the general rules (Lacruz Berdejo, loc.cit. 268). There are no statutory provisions on resolving the problem of an intervener's mistake as to the identity of the principal, nor is there any case law on the point.

67. Under ITALIAN law any person who can benefit from the acts of the intervener can be a principal. Thus under Italian law too it is not necessary that the principal has a proprietary right affected by the intervention (Pane, Solidarietà sociale e gestione d´affari altrui, 84). A mistake concerning the identity of the principal is without consequence (Cass. 23 July 1960, no. 2122, Giur. it. 1962, I, 1, 92; Aru, Gestione d´affari, 15). However, the person of the principal must be ascertainable (Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 871). Accordingly, acts in the interest of a person not yet in existence are in principle excluded; as soon as the affected person obtains legal capacity, however, he or she may ratify the act (Cass. 27 February 1971, no. 495, Foro it. 1971, I, 1945). Legal capacity on the part of the principal is not required (Corte dei Conti, Sez. giur. Sardegna, 3 November 1986, no. 384, Inf. prev. 1987, 469; Bianca, Diritto civile, 3, Il contratto[2], 143); in a case of complete lack of legal capacity, however, the legal representative may be regarded as the principal (Aru, loc.cit. 53). The co-existence of several principals is possible; they will be liable as joint debtors (CC art. 1294), but enjoy their rights as creditors on a several basis (Sirena, Gestione di affari, 296). The co-owners of common property may serve as an example (Cass. 15 October 1963, no. 2757, Foro it. 1964, I, 580 and Cass. 11 July 1978, no. 3479, Giur. it. 1979, I, 1, 820).

68. For DUTCH law too it is not necessary for the intervener to know the identity of the principal; it is precisely in those cases where it is most in the interest of another that someone takes action that the intervener will more often than not lack that knowledge (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10] no. 298 p. 312; Verburg, De vrijwillige zaakwaarneming, no. 39 p. 67-68). Intervention on behalf of several principals is possible: for example, the admission of a child to hospital is an intervention both on behalf of the child and on behalf of the parents (CA Amsterdam 16 November 1984, NedJur 1985 no. 778 p. 2542; Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], no. 11. 1; Verburg, loc.cit. no. 40, p. 68-69). Intervention in favour of a dominus negotii not yet existing (such as a foundation yet to be constituted [HR 20 November 1981, NedJur 1982

no. 568 p. 1974], an association yet to be incorporated [HR 8 January 1982, NedJur 1982 no. 333 p. 1227], or a foetus) has been held to be possible.

69. Under SCOTTISH law the principal is determined by reference to the intention of the intervener. An error concerning the identity of the principal is of no consequence; it will only preclude a benevolent intervention if the would-be gestor acts in the mistaken belief that the affair attended to is his own, or if he erroneously assumes he is acting for another, but is in reality taking care of his own affair (Stair [-Whitty], vol. 15, paras 103, 110 and 140; Leslie, JuridRev 1983, 14).

70. SCANDINAVIAN legal literature does not explain in detail how the principal is to be ascertained. The SWEDISH Parental Code [Föräldrabalk (1949:381; republished in SFS 1995:974)] chap. 11 § 3 contains a provision on caring for strangers; FINNISH Debt Enforcement Act [utsökningslag] of 3 December 1895 chap. 4 § 25 touches upon the risk that the debtor's land might be wasted or buildings destroyed. In such a case the court may authorise an 'agent' who will attend to the property at the expense of the creditors, which may not (yet) necessarily be known. Of course, technically speaking this agent is not a benevolent intervener since he is authorised by the court.

71. Under ENGLISH LAW, agency by ratification presupposes that the agent's intention to act on behalf of the principal was made manifest. Ratification is not possible if the agent has acted in his own name: the prospective agent must have acted in the name of the prospective principal; there can be no ratification of the acts of an unauthorised agent by an undisclosed principal: Brook v. Hook (1871) LR 6 Ex. 89, 91 (Kelly CB); Keighley, Maxsted & Co. v. Durant & Co. [1901] AC 240 (third party unable to obtain damages from principal for breach of contract concluded by agent, despite ratification, as the agent had acted beyond his authority with the undisclosed intention to act on behalf of the principal). However, while the agent must disclose that he is acting on behalf of another, it is not necessary for the principal to be personally identified, at any rate if the identity of the principal is ascertainable at the time of the agent's intervention. An agent is thus able to act on behalf of a deceased's successors 'whoever they might be', since they are legally ascertainable at the time of death: Lyell v. Kennedy (No. 4) (1889) 14 App. Cas. 437, 456 per Lord Selborne. The question of for whom an agent of necessity acts has been disputed in the case where, due to necessity, a ship's captain pledges, disposes or otherwise deals with the cargo. A strong line of authority holds that the captain, who is ordinarily the agent of the ship owner who engaged him, acts in such a case as the agent of necessity of the owners of the cargo: The Gratitudine (1801) 3 C. Rob 240 at 257-258 and 260, 165 ER 450 at 456 and 457 (Sir W. Scott) approved by Dr Lushington in The James Seddon v. Jeffares (1865-67) LR 1 A & E 62, 65, and Sir Robert Phillimore in The Lizzie (1867-69) LR 2 A & E 254, 258-259; Freeman v. East India Co. (1822) 5 B & Ald 617, 106 ER 1316 at 1318 (Bayley J) (where, however, necessity was not proven); The Hamburg (1863) 2 Moore PC (N. S.) 289, 321 (Lord Kingsdown: "The master is invested by presumption of law with authority to give directions on this ground – that the owners have no means of expressing their wishes.) See also The Lizzie, loc. cit., 259 (Sir Robert Phillimore: "If there be an opportunity for the owners to express their will . . . with respect to their cargo, the master, who is the agent of necessity and not of their choice, has no right to deprive them of this opportunity, and therefore must communicate with them if it be reasonably within his power to do so"); The Karnak (1867-69) LR 2 A & E 289, 299 and 309 (Sir Robert Phillimore); The Onward (1872-75) LR 4 A & E 38, 51 (Sir Robert Phillimore); Metcalfe v. Britannia Ironworks Co. (1876) 1 QBD 613, 626 (Cockburn CJ); and Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co. v. Huth (1880-81) 16 Ch. D 474, 481 (Cotton LJ). It may be, however, that this is in substance a short of hand for a chain of relationships. According to Parke B in Vlierboom v.

Chapman (1844) 13 M & W 230 at 239-240, 153 ER 96 at 99-100, a captain who sells the cargo in a case of necessity acts in the interests of the ship owner and exercises the ship owner's powers vis-à-vis the owners of the cargo and does not act as an agent of the owners of the cargo (though in that case Parke B also considered that, even if a direct agency were accepted, it would not have generated the right to remuneration contended for). See also The Gaetano and Maria (1882) 7 PD 1, 4 (Brett LJ), where English law was not applicable, but it was doubted by way of obiter dicta that a captain is ever an agent for the owner of cargo.

VII. The concept of reasonable ground and its equivalents

72. As far as the concept of a reasonable ground is concerned, V.-1:101 has largely drawn on the DUTCH CC art. 6:198 as its source of inspiration. The Dutch legislator intended the requirement of a reasonable ground to exclude improper and unlawful intermeddling with another's affairs (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 299 p. 313). This criterion thus marks off justified intervention from an unlawful act in the sense of tort law. The existence of a reasonable ground does not depend on the result of the intervention, but rather from the circumstances which provide the incentive for the gestor to intervene in another's legal sphere. The court thus has to balance various factors. Within that framework the questions whether or to what extent the principal himself was capable of acting and whether the intervention accorded with the actual or presumed wishes of the principal are of particular importance (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 791; Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW no. 12-12. 3; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 299-302 p. 312-315; T & C [-Hijma], Art. 6:198, no. 2). If the intervener takes action without prior consultation of the principal despite the fact that he could have easily contacted him, there is no reasonable ground for the intervention (so held by HR 31 October 1952, NedJur 1953 no 477 p. 756; CFI Zwolle 24 April 1957, NedJur 1957 no. 569 p. 1137). Exceptionally the intention to save time, effort and costs may serve as a sufficient justification (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis loc.cit.; Asser [-Hartkamp] loc.cit. no. 300, p. 314; Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, no. 12. 1). A reasonable ground will also be absent if the intervener acts contrary to the intention of the person concerned unless the latter is unable to state his mind in a manner which binds him (Parlementaire Geschiedenis loc.cit.; HR 8 January 1982, NedJur 1982 no. 333 p. 1227). Otherwise contrary wishes may only be disregarded in extraordinary circumstances (HR 19 April 1996, NedJur 1997 no. 24 p. 101 [Delta Lloyd/Interlloyd]). The prime example for such cases is the prevention of suicide by someone professedly weary of life (Asser [-Hartkamp] loc.cit. no. 295 p. 310; Schoordijk, Zaakwaarneming een onderbelichte bron van verbintenis, 34; HR 23 February 1996, NedJur 1997 no. 276 p. 1465).

73. The formula 'the intervener must have a reasonable ground for intervening' is largely unfamiliar to other jurisdictions of the European Union, but this only relates to the phrase itself, not to its substance. Similar considerations are reflected in all the jurisdictions. According to GERMAN CC § 677 the act is to be undertaken in accordance with the interests of the principal and with regard to his actual or presumed intention. Whereas in CC § 677 both these criteria (interest and intention) relate to the manner of carrying out the intervention, CC § 683 takes up these requirements in relation to the fact of intervention as such. A corresponding distinction is drawn between justified and unjustified benevolent intervention. Taking the principle of private autonomy into account, the question of justification is to be answered first and foremost in accordance with the actual wishes of the principal – even if that intention might run contrary to his objective interests. In the absence of actual wishes, reference must be had to the principal's presumed intention. Only at this stage does the objective interest of the principal come into play where it may be an important indicator of the principal's presumed intention; the details are a matter of dispute (for further details see Medicus, Schuldrecht II BT[12], no. 624, 627; MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 677, no. 45; § 683, no. 13; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 677, no. 13; § 683, no. 6). Under CC § 679 contrary wishes of the principal are irrelevant if a duty of the principal whose discharge is required as a matter of public interest (for example, removal of dangerous obstruction from traffic road: BGH 4 December 1975, BGHZ 65, 354), or a duty to furnish maintenance, would not be performed in time without intervention. In setting out this requirement of a reasonable ground ESTONIAN LOA § 1018 (1) uses the classic phrase that the "intervention has to correspond to the interests and actual or presumed intention of the principal".

74. Under GREEK law it is one of the requirements of a justified legitimate benevolent intervention that intervention accords with the interest and the wishes of the principal (CC art. 736). Only if this requirement is satisfied does a legal relationship comparable to mandate arise. The actual wishes of the principal have to be heeded so far as this is discernable, that is to say, so far as expressed or implicit. Where an actual intention is established, this will be the sole criterion for assessing whether it was correct to intervene. There is no control of reasonableness; actual intention will prevail over objective interest, unless the further requirements of CC art. 730 (2) (principal's wishes contrary to statute or morality) apply, cf. Bosdas, NoB 18/1970, 769, 774 and CA Thessaloniki 693/1993, EllDik 34/1993 p. 1507). If the actual wishes of the principal cannot be ascertained, the presumed intention will be decisive instead. In determining what was the principal's presumed intention all the circumstances of the case are taken into account, including the principal's subjective considerations. The presumed intention does not necessarily correspond with the principal's objective interest (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 34). An intervention will be in the objective interest of the principal if it is beneficial; a non-economic interest will suffice.

75. PORTUGUESE CC art. 464 likewise adheres to the principle that the intervener must act in the interest of the principal and in accordance with his or her wishes. CC art. 340 (3) confirms this general rule (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 189). The Portuguese CC does not distinguish between useful and urgent interventions. Neither is it required that the intervention is necessary. Apparent utility at the time of intervention will suffice.

76. The equivalent concept of 'reasonable ground' under AUSTRIAN law may be found in CC § 1036 (intervention in order to prevent an impending damage; benevolent intervention in a case of emergency). Where intervention serves to eliminate a common danger, regard must also be had to CC § 1043 (which contains elements of unjustified enrichment law) (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1043 no. 1 and no. 7). As far as an emergency is concerned, the intervener will only have a claim if the activity proves to be useful from the subjective perspective of the principal, CC § 1037. Thus in such cases the presence of a reasonable ground for the intervention is determined by the success of the intervention.

77. A similar approach is taken by SPANISH CC art. 1893. The wording requires the intervention to be successful: the principle must have appropriated the fruits of the intervention, even though a profit in the sense of an economic advantage is not a prerequisite (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Sistema II, 569). The criterion of usefulness assessed from an ex ante perspective is a point of discussion within legal literature; the intervention must have been undertaken in order to achieve an advantageous result for the principal (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 197; Puig Brutau, Compendio II, 559-560; Lete del Río, Obligaciones II, 126). The case law of the Tribunal Supremo has sent mixed messages (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 75). TS 27 April 1945, RAJ 1945 no. 685 p. 417, for instance, held that an assessment of utility at the material time of action is decisive, not the utility which results from it. TS 3 February 1965, RAJ 1965 (1) no. 525 p. 326, however, seems to proceed on the basis of some sort of ratification in the case where intervention has proved to be ultimately successful. Little clarity is provided by the proposition that while some advantage for the principal must arise from the intervention, that advantage may be present at any time and that it is therefore not necessary to examine the consequences of the intervention in more depth (TS 26 June 1946, RAJ 1946 no. 839 p. 549). CC art. 1893 (2) dispenses with the requirement of a resultant usefulness where the intervention is undertaken to prevent 'impending damage of an obvious nature'. In other words, in this case it exceptionally suffices according to the literal terms of the provisions that at the time of action it appears the intervention will be useful (Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 234). The provincial law of the Foral Community of Navarra, by contrast, relies generally only on the concept of an apparent usefulness at the time of intervention (Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. p. 234, fn. 67; Pasquau Liaño, loc.cit. 75). Ley 560 of the Compilación Navarra only requires that the intervention was reasonably 'undertaken and continued' (razonablemente asumida y realisada).

78. The ITALIAN law of benevolent intervention builds on the concept of solidarity. CC art. 2031 therefore requires that it was useful for the intervention to be commenced (qualora la gestione sia stata utilmente iniziata). The material time is that of the first act of intervention (Cass. 4 July 1964, no. 1750, Giur. it. 1964, I, 1, 1129). By contrast, it is irrelevant whether or not the outcome of the intervention is beneficial for the principal (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 44-45). The usefulness of the intervention will be assessed according to the presumed wishes of the principal, which are inferred from objective factors (Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 878; Cass. 13 October 1951, no. 2634, Foro it. 1952, I, 201). Regard is also had to how a bonus pater familias would have acted in the circumstances (Cass. 13 March 1964, no. 550, Foro it. 1965, I, 866). The usefulness of the intervention is presumed if the intervener undertakes something which the principal was under a duty to do (Cass. 15 October 1963, no. 2757, Foro it. 1964, I, 580) or if the principal's omission to act threatens to have a detrimental impact on inalienable rights of a third party. In that case, moreover, a prohibitio domini is to be disregarded (CC art. 2031 (2); Cass. 17 July 1969, no. 2636, Foro it. 1971, I, 713).

79. Although in older FRENCH legal literature some authors have argued that the intervention must be necessary (see, for instance, Vasseur, Urgence en droit civil, Rev. trim. dr. civ. 1954, no. 8-9 p. 415-420), recent legal literature prefers a test of usefulness of the intervention (utilité de la gestion) to one of necessity (Mazeaud and Chabas, Leçons de droit civil II (1)[9] no. 683 p. 811). According to French case law (as it is interpreted in French legal literature, at least), how that usefulness is to be assessed depends on whether or not the intervener acted with an altruistic intention (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10 nos. 98 et seq.). In a case of gestion d´affaires désintéressée the matter turns on whether in the circumstances the intervener might permissibly assume that the intervention would be beneficial to the principal. Thus in a case of gestion d´affaires désintéressée it suffices if the intervention appears promising at the outset; whether or not the principal has been ultimately enriched is not critical. Where assistance is rendered in an emergency situation, but to no avail, the usefulness will be assessed according to the expected outcome, not the actual outcome. By contrast, in a case of gestion d´affaires intéressée the usefulness of a benevolent intervention is determined by whether or not the principal has actually profited as a result. However, according to the prevailing legal opinion in BELGIUM, benevolent intervention only arises if the intervention by the gestor was necessary (d*e Page*, Droit Civil Belge II[3], no. 1074 p. 1138-1139). Moreover, the intervention must be beneficial for the principal, although usefulness at the outset of the intervention will suffice (Cass. 12 November 1998, De Verz 1999, 208). Belgian law does not follow the distinction between gestion d´affaires désintéressée and gestion d´affaires intéressée.

80. The SCOTTISH Institutional Writers echo the distinction set out above in the context of Austrian law and Spanish law, namely between an intervention in a case of emergency and a useful intervention. Stair states that "a negotiater cannot begin any new business, but only carry on that which is begun, and they must be necessarily or profitably done, otherwise he hath his labour for his pains" (The Institutions of the Law of Scotland, Book I/Title 8 § 3). Erskine elaborates on 'necessity' mainly in the context of the intervener's liability (Institutes of the Law of Scotland Book III § 53: "Where the gestor, from friendship, and the necessity of the case, takes upon him the direction of an affair which requires immediate execution, he is accountable only for gross omissions"). Modern legal literature likewise demands a certain urgency and necessity for the intervention (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law, II[4], 513-514). The predominant view is that an initial utility at the outset of the intervention – determined in the context of the presumed wishes of the principal – is decisive. An acute emergency is not required (Leslie, Jur.Rev. 1983, 28, 29; Stair [-Whitty], vol. 15, paras 117, 120; Marshall, General Principles of Scots Law[5], para 12-11). The same approach is taken in the case law: Fernie v. Robertson (1871) 9 M 437; Dunbar v. Wilson and Dunlop's Trustee (1887) 15 R 210.

81. Similarly, in the SCANDINAVIAN countries the basic idea that a claim may only arise in favour of the intervener if he has acted with 'reasonable grounds' is widely received, though the phrase itself is not contained in any of the statutory provisions. Since an overarching concept of benevolent intervention is largely unknown, resort must be had as far as possible to specific statutory provisions (e.g. chap. 18 § 10 Commercial Code 1736; Swedish konsumenttjänstlagen 1985:716 (Consumer Services Act) § 8; chap. 8 § 6 Finish Consumer Protection Law [Konsumentskyddslag] of 20 January 1978/38).

82. ENGLISH law draws on a notion of reasonable necessity for the measure undertaken as a fundamental requirement for agency of necessity: there must be a necessity that the agent act without instructions in order to safeguard the property or interests of the principal which are in danger. The notion of what is necessary is recognised to be question-begging (cf. Gunn v. Roberts (1873-74) LR 9 CP 331, 332 (Brett J)), but the requirement is of long-standing and seemingly entrenched: see East India Co. v. Ekines (1718) 2 Bro PC 382, 1 ER 1011, affirming Ekines v. East India Co (1717) 1 P Wms 395, 24 ER 441 (Lord Cowper LC); The Alexander (1842) 1 W Rob 346, 166 ER 602 (Dr Lushington); Lindsay v. Leathley (1863) 3 F & F 902 at 937, 176 ER 410 at 427 (Cockburn CJ); The Pontida (1884) 9 PD 102, 104 (Butt J). The necessity must relate both to the situation and the means adopted to remedy it. (As to the latter, see also Chapter 3, Art. 3:106, Notes, 11.) There can be no necessity to act if the principal is himself on the scene and capable of acting: see Arthur v. Barton (1840) 6 M & W 138 at 142 (Alderson B) and 143 (Lord Abinger CB), 151 ER 355 Beldon v. Campbell (1851) 6 Exch 886, 890-891 (Parke B); Gunn v. Roberts loc. cit., 331, 332 and 337 (Brett J) and 338 (Denman J) – all confirming the absence of necessity for conclusion of a loan contract by a ship's captain in his principal's name at a port where the principal or his representatives are themselves able to procure required finance – and see also Nelson v. Duncombe (1846) 9 Beav 211 at 233, 50 ER 323 at 332 (Lord Langdale MR) (a restitutionary claim in respect of provision of necessaries to a person lacking capacity presupposes that that person is not able to cater for themselves) and, from the same context, Pontypridd Union v. Drew [1927] 1 KB 214, 218 (Bankes LJ: "there is no pretence for applying principles or doctrines of agency of necessity to relief given to a person of full age and capacity to contract"). Moreover, an intervener has no authority to act (e.g by selling property of the principal) merely because this would be of benefit to the principal: Cammell v. Sewell (1858) 3 H & N 617 at 635, 157 ER 615 at 623 (Martin B). Nor does it suffice that an agent considers the measure would be beneficial if the measure was not manifestly necessary: Robertson v. Clarke (1824) 1 Bing 445, 450 (Lord Gifford CJ), 130 ER 179; Ewbank v. Nutting (1849) 7 CB 797, 137 ER 316; Tronson v. Dent (1853) 8 Moore PC 419, 452 (Sir John Patteson for the PC); The Segredo (1853) 1 Sp Ecc & Ad 36 at 48, 164 ER 22 at 28 (Dr Lushington); The Australia (1859) 13 Moore PC 132, 144 (Dr Lushington for the PC), 15 ER 50; Lindsay v. Leathley, loc. cit. 938 (427) (Cockburn CJ), and see also Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co. v. Huth (1880-81) 16 Ch. D 474, 481 (Cotton LJ). The intervention must be a response which is called for in the circumstances and proportionate to the problem, cf. Wilson v. Millar (1816) 2 Stark 1 at 4, 171 ER 553 at 554 (Lord Ellenborough CJ: sale of entire cargo unauthorised as a mere pledge would have sufficed). A touchstone is whether a prudent person with clear knowledge of the circumstances of the case would have no doubt as to how he should proceed: Somes v. Sugrue (1830) 4 Car & P 276 at 282, 172 ER 703 at 706 (Tindal CJ). What is done or obtained must be necessary and it must be necessary that it be done or procured at the time it is done or supplied: cf. Pocahontas Fuel Co. Inc. v. Ambatielos (1922) 10 Lloyd's L. Rep 188, 190 (McCardie J), where, however, there was a "course of dealings" between the parties from which, besides considerations of necessity, authority for the transaction could be inferred, and in the same sense The Sophie (1842) 1 W Rob 368, 369, 166 ER 610 at 611 (Dr Lushington). In particular the problem must be so pressing that the agent is entitled to act without (fresh) instructions from the principal: see Freeman v. East India Co (1822) 5 B & Ald 617 at 624, 106 ER 1316 at 1319 (Best J: captain should have awaited owner's instructions because the cargo was not threatening to deteriorate); Cammell v. Sewell, loc. cit., 635 (623) and 644 (626) (Martin B), where the sale of cargo was unnecessary because it was not perishable, and consider also Harris v. Fiat Motors Ltd (1906) 22 TLR 556 (defendant's employee, whom the defendants had instructed to drive the plaintiff's car personally, had no power to delegate the driving to a non-employee passenger (whose driving damaged the car) in order to investigate noise at the back of the car – so as to make the defendants vicariously liable for the driver's negligence – because there was no necessity to keep the vehicle moving). The necessity is to be assessed objectively, based on what a reasonable and prudent person would contemplate in the circumstances; the fact that the intervener considered intervention justified is not sufficient. An interference with another's property may be justified, for example, where there is a risk of its loss or damage because it is exposed to bad weather or theives: Sachs v. Miklos [1948] 2 KB 23, 34-36 (Lord Goddard CJ). Although there is authority for the view that the reasonable necessity must amount to a real emergency (Sachs v. Miklos, loc. cit., 34-36 (Lord Goddard CJ), approved in John Koch Ltd. v. C. & H. Products Ltd. [1956] 2 Lloyd's Rep 59, 60 and similarly at 65 (Singleton LJ), other formulations of the requirement are broader and more flexible, requiring only that the circumstances determine the course which a person ought to take: Australasian Steam Navigation Co. v. Morse (1871-73) LR 4 PC 222, 230 per Sir Montague Smith ("[W]hen by the force of circumstances a man has the duty cast upon him of taking some action for another, and under that obligation, adopts the course which, to the judgment of a wise and prudent man, is apparently the best for the interest of the persons for whom he acts in a given emergency, it may properly be said of the course so taken, that it was, in a mercantile sense, necessary to take it"). Possibly the correct test turns on whether the intervener is a stranger or a person who is already an agent to the principal and merely acting outside the scope of his authority, the requirement of "emergency" being confined to the former case: in Palmer v. Stear (1963) 113 LJ 420, which was a case of intervention by a stranger, it was successfully argued for the vet that in a case of emergency one person might discharge another's legal duty; and in Langan v. GWR Co. (1873) 30 LT (N.S.) 173, 176 Cleasby B considered that an employee of the rail company would be authorised to procure medical and other necessary assistance for persons injured in a rail accident, but (short of ratification) a stranger would not – a distinction presumably based on the assumption that if there are employees of the rail company on the scene there is no need for a stranger to usurp their responsibility. The measure ventured need not be ultimately successful, but the intervention must have been necessary as a prospective solution to the difficulty: see The Lizzie (1867-69) LR 2 A & E 254, 256 (Sir Robert Phillimore) (secured lending by a ship's captain valid because concluded by the agent honestly and with due care, notwithstanding that it resulted in no benefit to the principal); Re Meares (1878-79) 10 Ch. D 552, upholding a right to reimbursement of legal costs incurred in maintaining an action to procure the appointment of administrators for the estate of a person without full mental capacity, in order to protect that person's property, despite the fact that the individual concerned died before administrators were appointed, and see similarly in respect of litigation which was reasonable, though unsuccessful, Sherwood v. Sanderson (1815) 19 Ves Jun 280, 34 ER 521 (Lord Eldon LC), Nelson v. Duncombe, loc. cit. (Lord Langdale MR) and; Phelps, James & Co v. Hill [1891] 1 QB 605 (CA), where a ship transporting goods from Swansea to New York was damaged due to bad weather and put into Queenstown as a safe harbour and the defendant's decision to deviate from his instructions and make for Bristol, where the ship could be repaired the most economically, was "reasonably necessary" (ibid, 610-611 (Lindley LJ), 614 (Lopes LJ), 617 (Kay LJ)), although the ship subsequently sank; Tetley & Co. v. British Trade Corp. (1922) 10 Lloyd's L. Rep. 678, where the principal's goods were transported in order to safeguard them from probable serious public disturbances and then sold, but the cost of transportation exceeded the proceeds of sale.

VIII. In particular: the duty to ascertain the principal's wishes

83. The draft deviates by a nuance from some of the national legal systems with its rule that an intervention is not justified if the intervener could have consulted the principal and failed to do so. Under GERMAN CC § 681 sentence 1, the intervener is obliged to notify the principal as soon as practicable of his intervention to manage the principal's affair and, unless delay would cause damage, to await the decision of the principal. In setting out these duties the legislator wanted to achieve clarity as regards the actual wishes of the principal (MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 681, no. 5; Prot II, 727). According to the case law of the BGH (BGH 4 December 1975, BGHZ 65, 354, 356) the duties arising from CC § 681 sentence 1 are only secondary obligations, which as a general rule presuppose the intervention (RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], § 681, no. 3). A violation of the duty of notification merely leads to a duty of the intervener to compensate for damage sustained by the principal as a result of the absence of or delay in notification (RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], § 681, no. 11; Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], § 681, no. 8; Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 681, no. 4 and Erman [-Ehmann], BGB I[10], § 681, no. 4). The fact that the intervener has omitted to notify the principal does not of itself automatically preclude an intervener from claiming compensation for expenses incurred (CC § 683). As the duty to notify serves first and foremost to enable the actual wishes of the principal to be ascertained, it is only of minor importance in the context of CC § 679 (discharge of a duty of the principal which is of public interest) (Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], § 681, no. 3), though an intervener is not liberated from the duty even then since notification may induce the principal to change his mind (RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], § 681, no. 8). Furthermore, breach of the duty to notify does not imply that the intervener intended to serve his own interests rather than act on behalf of another (BGH 4 December 1975, loc.cit.). Notification is 'feasible' if, looking at the circumstances objectively, it is required in the interest of all persons concerned and the intervener can be expected to do it. This is to be assessed according to the circumstances of the individual case, whereby both the possibility to contact the principal and the significance of the intervention are of particular importance (RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], § 681, no. 4; MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 681, no. 5; Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], § 681, no. 3; CFI Stuttgart 7 January 1972, VersR 1973, 517). If it is easy to contact the principal, the intervener has to notify him at once (MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 681, no. 5). The intervener will then have to await the principal's decision, unless any delay would lead to (further) damage.

84. GREEK law to a large extent resembles German law in this respect, as it also extends the main duty of the intervener to act in accordance with the interest and wishes of the principal by absorbing secondary obligations drawn from the law of mandate, inter alia the duty of the intervener to notify the principal of the fact of intervention (CC art. 733). The intervener should be compelled to ascertain the wishes of the principal (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 733 no. 1). A violation of this duty to notify the principal gives rise to a liability for damages on the part of the intervener (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 4); the lawfulness of intervention, however, remains unaffected (CA Patras 92/1955, NoB 4/1956, 96).

85. POLISH CC art. 753 (1) provides for a duty of the intervener to notify the principal as soon as possible. CZECH and SLOVAK CC art. 743 (1) require that the intervener notifies the principal of his intention to act and awaits the principal's decision, unless the intervention serves to prevent impending damage. By contrast PORTUGUESE CC does not explicitly provide for a duty to ascertain the principal's wishes. CC art. 465 limb (b) confines itself to imposing a duty on the intervener to inform the principal as soon as possible.

86. The AUSTRIAN OGH (21 April 1982, JBl 1984, 256) has held that the intervener must act in accordance with the interests of the principal, having regard to the principal's actual or presumed wishes. Consideration must be given to the probable wishes of the principal – in particular where the intervention involves expense where it cannot be taken for granted that the principal will be willing to bear the costs. A gestor intervening in case of emergency (CC § 1036) will not only lose his right to compensation if he acts contrary to the presumed wishes of the principal; he will also be held to have acted unlawfully (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], §§ 1036-1040 no. 11; Meissel, GoA, 118 et seq.). If the intervener does not make use of an opportunity to contact the principal, his acts will not constitute benevolent intervention under CC § 1036; they will (at most) amount to intervention under CC § 1037 (OGH 22 November 1984, SZ 57/167; OGH 26 November 1981, SZ 54/176). That is because it is not a case of emergency if there is sufficient time to contact the principal and ask for his consent (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], §§ 1036-1040 no. 1, Meissel, GoA, 30). There may also be an element of fault in not contacting the principal where the case falls under CC § 1037 (Ehrenzweig, System II/1[2], 714 fn. 5), which in turn may render the intervention unlawful (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I[3], § 1037 no. 2). If the intervener acts contrary to the express and legally binding wishes of the principal, a claim for compensation of expenses incurred is barred by CC § 1040 (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], §§ 1036-1040 no. 5). An exception is contained in CC § 1042 which allows for the discharge of debts contrary to the intention of the debtor (CC § 1042); in this case no overriding public interest is required (Meissel, GoA, 47 et seq.).

87. The intervener's duty to ascertain the wishes of the principal is hardly ever explicitly referred to in France or Belgium. As regards BELGIAN law, Paulus, Zaakwaarneming no. 48 p. 39, points out that only with great reservation could it be accepted that there was a 'necessity' for intervention if the intervener could have contacted the principal but failed to do so. In FRANCE it is said that the 'presence' of the party benefited is an indicator that the intervention was not necessary. The easier it was for the principal to act himself, the stronger the presumption that the intervener should not have acted (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10 no. 105 ; see also le Tourneau, RépDrCiv, VI, v° Gestion d´affaires [2002], no. 60: if the measure was not urgent and the issue is open to doubt, it cannot have been appropriate to intervene without first contacting the principal). The opportunity to contact the principal prior to taking any measures does not, however, seem to preclude a justified intervention on another's behalf under all circumstances (cf. CA Paris 3 May 1989, Juris Data 1989-022252). It is generally assumed that as a rule a measure taken is regarded as unlawful if the principal disapproves it (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 5 p. 7). The only exception is if the principal's opposition is manifestly unlawful (Cass.civ. 11 February 1986, Bull.civ. 1986 I, no. 23).

88. Under SPANISH CC art. 1888 the intervener is 'obliged to continue measures undertaken until completion of the measures or ancillary matters or to request the person concerned to take over from the intervener when he [the principal] is in a position to undertake them on his own'. The duty arising under CC art. 1888 to contact the principal is not aiming at eliciting his intention; it is concerned instead with calling upon the principal to continue a measure already underway. A duty of the intervener to make enquiries as to the principal's wishes is not set out. The existence of such a duty is nonetheless recognised and may either be inferred from the requirement of absentia domini (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 93) or from CC art. 1189 which codifies the general standard of care of an intervener (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 498-501). If, when the intervener makes inquiry, the principal consents to the measure, this may constitute a contract of mandate (Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 502).

89. Similarly under ITALIAN law the view is maintained that a person who interferes with another's legal sphere is obliged to ascertain the wishes of the principal and to await his directions, at least as far as this is possible in the circumstances (Sirena, Gestione di affari, 320). If the principal gives his consent, this will constitute a contract of mandate under Italian law too (Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 879-880; with some reservation Aru, Gestione d´affari, 23). If the principal disapproves, the provisions on benevolent intervention will not apply (CC art. 2031 (2); Cass. 23 May 1984, no. 3143, Rep.Giur.it. 1984, voce Gestione d´affari, no. 1, c. 1299). Disapproval may also be inferred from consistent conduct of the principal (Aru loc.cit. 47). Of deciding importance is whether the intervener knew of the contrary wishes of the principal or would have known of them if he had exercised reasonable care (Breccia loc.cit. 878).

90. According to DUTCH law only a person who acts in accordance with the actual wishes – and in particular the expressed wishes – of the principal acts with reasonable grounds (see above note 72). Acts which do not correspond with the presumed (unexpressed) wishes of the principal may constitute a justified intervention in another's affair if the intervener has tried in vain to contact the principal (Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, comment 12. 2; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 300 p. 314; HR 23 February 1996, NedJur 1997 no. 276 p. 1465). As a general rule a benevolent intervention contrary to the wishes of the dominus negotii is not permissible. However, exceptions are conceivable – for example, in preventing a suicide or overriding the wishes of a mentally disabled person (CA s´Gravenhage 28 November 1984, NedJur 1985 no. 863 p. 2831).

91. The legal position under SCOTTISH law is not quite clear. A justified benevolent intervener must abide by the presumed wishes of the principal. The main distinction between the law of negotiorum gestio on the one hand and mandate and implied mandate on the other is precisely that the principal has no knowledge of the action taken and has therefore not authorised it (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[10], p. 373 no. 22. 31; Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law, Volume II, Book 4: Obligations[4], 218). The Institutional Writers merely point out that an action contrary to the (express) wishes of the principal will in principle not found claims in negotiorum gestio; in this case it is at most claims on the basis of 'recompense' which can be considered (e. g. Erskine § 53). Stair (-Whitty), vol. 15 para 122 holds that the requirement to act in accordance with the 'assumed wishes' of the principal is a necessary and appropriate corrective to protect the principal against unwelcome interference.

92. SWEDISH law puts great emphasis on the intervener's duty to make inquiries about the principal's wishes. A breach of this duty in principle excludes claims on the basis of negotiorum gestio (Bengtsson/Victorin, Hyra och annan nyttjanderätt till fast egendom[6], 198; see also HD 9 March 1972, NJA 1972, 88, summarised above in note 22). Exceptions to this general rule are in part set out in statute. The duty to preserve goods and keep them in safe custody arising in the context of sales law may serve as an example (Sale of Goods Act §§ 72-78; see for further details Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 79; Hellner, Speciell Avtalsrätt II (2)[3], ch. 29).

93. As the COMMON LAW largely integrates its cases of benevolent intervention into agency of necessity, it too emphasises the requirement that the intervener seek out and heed the principal's instructions, which is fundamental to agency in general. An agent may not act in contradiction of the principal's expressed or implicit wishes (if his instructions foresee the case at hand): see, for example, Johns v. Simons (1842) 2 QB 425, 114 ER 168, where the owner had instructed the captain to obtain necessary money only by selling cargo, but the captain obtained it by a loan from the claimant instead; Acatos v. Burns (1878) 3 Ex D 282, 290-291 (Brett LJ). Where the principal's wishes are unknown, there will be no agency of necessity as a rule unless it is impossible or practically impossible for the agent to contact the principal (and so obtain his authority to act): Australasian Steam Navigation Co. v. Morse (1871-73) LR 4 PC 222; Gwilliam v. Twist [1895] 2 QB 84, 87; Pontypridd Union v. Drew [1927] 1 KB 214, 220 (Scrutton LJ); Prager v. Blatspiel, Stamp & Heacock Ltd [1924] 1 KB 566, 571. (Consider also Palmer v. Stear (1963) 113 LJ 420, where there was no means for the vet to identify the owner of the dog). As the extensive authorities relating to the powers of a ship's captain solidly demonstrate, if the principal can be contacted, then as a rule there is no scope for agency of necessity; the agent must obtain instructions and abide by them: see Hayman v. Molton, loc. cit. at 68 (740) (Lord Ellenborough CJ; La Ysabel (1812) 1 Dods 273 at 274, 165 ER 1308 at 1309 (Sir W. Scott); Wilson v. Millar (1816) 2 Stark 1 at 4, 171 ER 553 at 554 (Lord Ellenborough CJ: captain should have sought instructions before selling the cargo);

Freeman v. East India Co (1822) 5 B & Ald 617 at 624, 106 ER 1316 at 1319 (Best J); Stonehouse v. Gent (1841) 2 QB 431n, 114 ER 170; Jones v. Simons, loc. cit. at 430 (170) (Lord Denman CJ); The Lochiel (1843) 2 W Rob 34 at 48, 166 ER 668 at 673 (Dr Lushington); Beldon v. Campbell (1851) 6 Ex. 886, 889 (Parke B: no necessity for the ship's captain to create security rights in the ship because it had already reached a port from which the owner could be contacted), 155 ER 805; The Segredo (1853) 1 Sp Ecc & Ad 36 at 62, 164 ER 22 at 36 (Dr Lushington); The Royal Arch (1857) Swab 269 at 282, 166 ER 1131 at 1139) (Dr Lushington); Cammell v. Sewell (1858) 3 H & N 617 at 635 and 644, 157 ER 615 at 623 and 626 (Martin B); The Olivier (1862) Lush 484 at 492, 167 ER 219 at 223-224 (Dr Lushington); The Hamburg (1863) 2 Moore PC (N. S.) 289 at 299 (Dr Lushington) and 321-322 (Lord Kingsdown, for the PC); The Karnak (1867-69) LR 2 PC 505, 300 and 309 (Sir Robert Phillimore); The Onward (1873) LR 4 A & E 38, 51 (Sir Robert Phillimore: "[W]hen the circumstances permit the master must communicate with the owner before he does any acts which seriously affect the value of the ship … or of the cargo."); Kleinwort, Cohen & Co. v. The Cassa Marittima of Genoa (1876-77) 2 App. Cas. 156, 157 (Sir Montague Smith, for the PC); Acatos v. Burns loc. cit. at 286 and 290 (Brett LJ, implicitly) and 288 (Bramwell LJ); Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co. v. Huth (1880-81) 16 Ch. D 474, 481 (Cotton LJ); The Gaetano and Maria (1881) 7 PD 1, 4 (Sir Robert Phillimore) and, on appeal (where it was held, reversing the court below on the point, that English law was not applicable), (1882) 7 PD 137 at 143-144 (Brett LJ) and 148 (Cotton LJ). The mere fact that the owner of the property affected is insolvent does not provide an excuse for failing to contact the principal if that was practicable: The Panama (1869-71) LR 3 PC 203. The fact that the conduct is otherwise reasonable will not protect the agent if he had a reasonable opportunity to contact the principal and failed to do so: see Springer v. Great Western Railway Co. [1921] 1 KB 257 (where tomatoes being transported from St. Helier to Covent Garden were held up by bad weather and a port strike and were sold before arrival because of their deterioration, but the court held the agent should have sought instructions). Whether there is a practical impossibility – a matter of time and opportunity – depends on the circumstances: Australasian Steam Navigation Co. v. Morse, loc. cit., 231 (Sir Montague Smith). Communication may be practically impossible where there is a multitude of principals who would have to be addressed: see, e. g., Phelps, James & Co. v. Hill [1891] 1 QB 605 (where there were numerous owners of cargo being carried by the distressed ship). A further case of impracticality of communication is where the matter is of such urgency that, weighed up against the chances of a successful and prompt correspondence, the principal's interests are at risk if the agent delays until he can ascertain the principal's wishes: The Hamburg., loc. cit., 299-300 (Dr Lushington), and for a clear application of this principle see The Olivier, loc. cit., 478-488 (221) and 492-493 (224) (Dr Lushington) and further confirmation of the principle in The Lizzie (1867-69) LR 2 A & E 254, 256 (Sir Robert Phillimore). Thus even if communication with the principal is possible, a person nonetheless acts as an agent of necessity if that communication would involve such delay that it would be detrimental to the principal's interests to await the principal's instruction: see Johns v. Simons, loc. cit., 430 (170) (Patteson J); Edwards v. Havill (1853) 14 CB 107, 139 ER 45 (ship confined to harbour due to bad weather; captain borrowed a small sum – without communicating with the owner, because if he had to await a reply (by post) first the ship would have been held up for two further days until a reply arrived, whereas the weather might have improved in the meantime); Cargo Ex "Sultan" (1859) Swab 504 at 511-512, 166 ER 1235 at 1239) (Dr Lushington); The Victor (1865) 13 L. T. (N. S.) 21 (Dr Lushington) (where a master's sale of the ship was within the scope of his agency of necessity because communication to the principal would have involved a three month delay – during which time the ship might have been taken by creditors or, in view of its deterioration, lost to the elements); Acatos v. Burns (1878) 3 Ex D 282, 290 (Brett LJ) (to store goods while awaiting instructions would exceed their value and thus be uneconomical); and the IRISH case The Staffordshire (1871) 25 LT (N.S.) 137, 140 (Townsend J), affirmed sub. nom. Smith v. Bank of New South Wales (1871-73) LR 4 PC 194, 203 (Mellish LJ for the PC), where it would have been two or three months before a reply would have been received. Thus an attempt at communication can be dispensed with if the agent cannot receive or expect a reply 'in time': Australasian Steam Navigation Co. v. Morse, loc. cit., 232.

IX. Ratification by the principal

94. As regards interventions which are commenced without a sufficient ground, four distinct questions arise: (i) is ratification possible, (ii) what conditions must ratification satisfy, (iii) when does the time period during which the principal may ratify the intervention expire, and (iv) what effects does ratification have? These questions are not addressed in all jurisdictions with equal thoroughness.

95. Under GERMAN CC § 684 sentence 2, the principal may ratify an unjustified intervention and thereby bring about the legal consequences of a justified benevolent intervention. The ratification must be declared vis-à-vis the intervener, either expressly or by implication. An implicit ratification may be inferred if the principal demands a surrender of proceeds under CC § 681 sentence 2 (in conjunction with § 667) (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 684 no. 2). A ratification substitutes for the requirements set out in CC § 683, according to which the intervention must be in the interest of the principal and in keeping with the actual or presumed wishes of the principal (BGH 16 December 1994, BGHZ 128, 210, 213). It does not, however, supersede the requirements of CC § 677, i. e. the condition that the intervention must have been undertaken on another's behalf (MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 684 no. 14). Consequently a ratification is not possible in the case of management of another's affairs by mistake (CC § 687 (1)) or arrogated management of another's affairs (CC § 687 (2)) (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 684 no. 2). The effect of ratification is that the intervention is justified inter partes, i. e. between principal and intervener, with retrospective effect. However, ratification alone does not give rise to a contract of mandate (CC § 662) (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 684 no. 2). A ratification under CC § 684 is subject to the rules of CC §§ 182 et seq. (BGH 14 February 1989, NJW 1989, 1672), but no specific time limit is stipulated (CA Stuttgart 25 June 1953, NJW 1954, 36). However, it is conceivable that the underlying ethos of CC §§ 108 and 177 may be applicable by analogy with the result that a ratification is deemed to be refused if, after a request for ratification, the principal does not ratify within a reasonable time.

96. GREEK law likewise enables a principal to ratify an unjustified intervention. The ratification may be declared expressly or tacitly. An implied ratification is inferred, for example, if the principal discharges an obligation which the intervener incurred in relation to a third party. As in Germany, the main effect of a ratification is that the unjustified intervention will be transformed into a justified intervention with retroactive effect. This is justified by means of an analogous application of CC art. 238 (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 738, no. 7). Ratification alone does not conclude a contract of mandate; Greek law does not follow the Roman law principle ratihabitio mandato aequiparatur (Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochikon Dikaion II/2, 28). A management of another's affairs in the mistaken belief they are one's own cannot be the subject of ratification (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 5).

97. PORTUGUESE law draws a distinction between aprovação and ratificação. An aprovação (CC art. 469) is a general approval by the principal of the unauthorised intervention. An aprovação is only effective inter partes, that is to say between principal and intervener; if such an approval is given a justified gestão de negócios is created. By contrast a ratificação (CC art. 268) concerns juridical acts which the intervener has undertaken in relation to third parties; as a result of a ratification these transactions become valid retrospectively (for details see CA Evora 1 June 1999, CJ XXIV [1999-3] 270). An aprovação may be made manifest either expressly or implicitly (CC art. 217); it is not subject to any specific formal requirements or a time limit (CC art. 219). By contrast a ratificação must comply with the same formality requirements as are required for the grant of an authority (CC art. 268 (2)) to conclude the relevant transaction (CC art. 262 (2)); an implicit ratification will not suffice (STJ 17 February 1998, CJ(ST) VI [1998-1] 68). Moreover, for ratificação CC art. 268 (3) grants the third party who has contracted with the intervener the right to set a time limit in which to ratify; if ratification is not granted within the time limit it is deemed that the principal has refused to ratify. CC art. 469, read in conjunction with art. 468, sets out the legal consequences of an aprovação namely (i) the principal's waiver of any claim for damage negligently caused by the intervener and (ii) acceptance of the intervener's claims for compensation of expenses incurred and damage suffered. A ratificação pursuant to CC art. 268 (2) has retroactive effect and renders all contracts concluded by the intervener in the name of the principal effective (eficácia retroactiva). The limitation period, however, will only start to run ex nunc from the time of ratificação (CA Coimbra 2 March 1999, CJ XXIV [1999-2] 11). Special regulations on ratificação apply where a lawyer manages affairs relating to legal proceedings without authorisation: for details see CCP art. 41 and CA Coimbra 4 January 1989, BolMinJus 383 (1989) 620 and STJ 15 February 1966, BolMinJus 154 (1966) 286.

98. Under AUSTRIAN law a ratification may be declared expressly or by implication (v. Zeiller III § 1039 no. 2 p. 324); an implied ratification is typically inferred in the case of CC § 1016 (conferring benefit) (Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1^2, 895; Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, §§ 1035 no. 3). The question of a time limit for ratification does not seem to have been a topic of discussion. The effect of a ratification is a matter of dispute. Formerly the view was held that ratification transforms the relationship between principal and intervener into one of Bevollmächtigung (agency) authorised from the outset (v. Zeiller III § 1039 no. 2 p. 324; Ehrenzweig, System II/1^2, 714; similarly Gschnitzer Schuldrecht BT^2, 283 and Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1^2, 895 [where the intervener has concluded legal transactions, this would point towards the law on contracts of mandate; where the intervention consists of physical acts, it points towards a contract for services]). The current view is that ratification transforms the unjustified intervention into a justified benevolent intervention (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I^3, § 1037 no. 2). What precisely a ratification covers is a matter of interpretation (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I^3, § 1037 no. 2; Schwimann [-Apathy] ABGB V^2 § 1035 no. 3). However, an intervention may only be ratified as a whole; the principal may not pick and choose particular component acts to ratify (OGH 4 December 1968, JBl 1969, 272). The intervener is bound by a ratification even if this is contrary to his wishes (Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1^2, 895). Under SLOVENIAN law too the principal may ratify an unjustified intervention. The ratification results in the retroactive conclusion of a contract between the intervener and the principal (Cigoj, Komentar II, 878). ESTONIAN LOA § 1018 (1) (i) provides three alternative criteria for a justification of a benevolent intervention and puts the ratification by the principal at the top of the list

(the other options are agreement with the presumed and actual wishes of the principal and intervention required as a matter of overriding public interest).

99. FRENCH and BELGIAN authors point out that only a principal capable of acting may validly ratify (ratifier) a benevolent intervention (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Effets, Fasc. 20 no. 76; Paulus, Zaakwaarneming no. 106 p. 60). The ratification does not require any specific formalities (Bout loc.cit. no. 72; d*e Page*, Droit Civil Belge II[3], no. 1088*bis* p. 1153). It may be either express or tacit (tacite), provided that the wishes of the principal are free from doubt (Cass.com. 13 May 1980, Bull.civ. 1980 IV, no. 199 p. 159; Paulus, loc.cit. no. 106 p. 60); in particular the principal must have knowledge of all relevant circumstances (Bout loc.cit. no. 73). No time limits seem to apply to ratification (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 13 p. 15). The effect of ratification is usually expressed as ratihabitio mandato aequiparatur: the relationship between intervener and principal is transformed into a contractual mandate with retroactive effect (Mazeaud and Chabas, Leçons de droit civil II, 1[9] no. 691 p. 815; Paulus, loc.cit. no. 103 p. 59).

100. The corresponding POLISH provision may be found in CC art. 756 ('If the principal ratifies the intervention the legal consequences of a mandate arise'). SPANISH CC art. 1892, which is quite similar, reads: "the ratification of the intervention by the principal brings about the effects of an express mandate." Unless the parties agree otherwise, the ratification of an intervention (which has been started or completed) results in the application of the law of mandate with retroactive effect and the exclusion of the law of benevolent intervention. In this way the intervener is freed from liability for damages caused without fault (Paz-Ares/Diez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Lasarte], Código Civil II, 1949). Ratification may be express or implicit (Albaladejo, Derecho civil II (2) 497; Lasarte loc.cit. 1950; Puig Brutau, Compendio II, 602; Lete del Río, Obligaciones II, 127); the formality requirements mirror those required for the legal transaction to be ratified. A tacit ratification may be inferred, for example, where the principal does not take over the management of affairs from the intervener despite a request by the intervener to do so (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 427; Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 265). Substantial problems of interpretation however arise in the context of CC art. 1893 (1), which reads: "even if he has not expressly ratified the intervention, the owner of goods or principal who takes advantage of the benefits of the intervention will be liable for the obligations . . .". The meaning of the phrase 'not expressly ratified' is a matter of dispute, but of great importance for determining the scope of the law of benevolent intervention. A recent decision of the Tribunal Supremo construes this provision as meaning only that a tacit ratification may be inferred if the principal takes advantage of the benefits of the intervention. Thus CC art. 1892 relates to express ratification, while CC art. 1893 concerns tacit ratification, and a tacit ratification does not bring about the legal consequences of CC art. 1892 (TS 14 May 1991, RAJ 1991 [3] no. 3672 p. 4945). TS 21 October 1958, RAJ 1958 (2) no. 3109 p. 2055 (a case concerning remuneration for services provided by an architect) took a different approach and held the law of contracts of mandate and contracts for services applicable also to cases covered by CC art. 1893. This interpretation radically limits (or limited) the scope of application of the law of benevolent intervention (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 208), since it confines (or confined) benevolent intervention to the cases which do not call for ratification contained in CC art. 1893 (2) (prevention of an impending damage). Legal literature has thoroughly criticised both judgments of the Tribunal Supremo (e. g. Lasarte loc. cit. 1952; Puig Brutau, loc. cit. 602; Albaladejo, loc.cit. 497 and Lete del Río loc. cit. 127). The authors cited consider CC art. 1892 to be applicable both to express ratification and tacit ratification; both cases result in the conclusion of a contract of mandate. In contrast to the Tribunal Supremo, they maintain that there is no tacit ratification in the mere fact of the principal taking advantage of the benefits provided by the intervention. Whether or not a ratification is subject to a specific time limit is not a topic of discussion. Finally, Ley 561 of the Fuero Nuevo de NAVARRA should be mentioned. It reads: "If a person in whose interest an intervention is undertaken ratifies such intervention, that person is bound like a mandator."

101. In ITALY CC art. 2032 provides that the principal may ratify an act undertaken by the intervener even if the latter has not acted with an animus aliena negotia gerendi. The ratification gives rise to the same effects which a mandate contract would have had. The Italian case law has taken the line that a ratification may replace every single prerequisite of a relationship of benevolent intervention (Cass. 23 July 1960, no. 2122, Giur. it. 1962, I, 1, 92; Cass. 3 March 1954, no. 607, Giur. it. 1954, I, 1, 596). However, legal writing has in part adopted a more narrow approach. The minimum requirement is that the affair is that of another and that it has been managed without any obligation to do so (Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 901-902; even more restrictive is Aru, Gestione d´affari, 56). Ratification in respect of a legal transaction must be declared vis-à-vis the affected third party (Cass. 24 January 1959, no. 193, Foro it. 1959, I, 979). A tacit ratification is possible. An example is enforcing rights arising from a contract concluded by the intervener (Cass. 23 July 1960, no. 2122, Giur. it. 1962, I, 1, 92). The formal requirements of the ratification depend on the requirements of the legal transaction which the intervener has concluded (Breccia, loc. cit. 903; contra Aru, loc. cit. 59). The law does not provide for a specific time limit for the ratification. The prevailing (but not undisputed) view is that ratification is subject to the general limitation period of ten years (Aru, loc.cit. 60). However, some authors have argued that the time limit under CC art. 1712 (2) (ratification without delay) should be applied (for details see Breccia, loc.cit. 904). Both the third party and the intervener may request the principal to ratify the intervention within a reasonable time. If there is no ratification in response, it will be presumed to have been withheld (Cass. 3 March 1954, no. 607, Giur. it. 1954, I, 1, 596). In that case the intervener is personally liable on all legal transactions which he has concluded in the name of the principal (Cass. 18 March 1957, no. 931, Rep.Giur.it. 1957, voce Gestione d´affari, no. 1; 6). A ratification has retroactive effect (Cass. 23 November 1954, no. 4297, Rep.Giur.it. 1954, voce Gestione d´affari no. 5; 12), but any rights acquired by third parties are not affected. If the intervener has acted in the name of the principal, the latter assumes the rights and duties arising. If the intervener has acted in his own name, the ratification only has effect for the internal relationship between principal and intervener (Cass. 11 July 1978, no. 3479, Giur. it. 1979, I, 1, 820; Cass. 25 January 1974, no. 199, Giur. it. 1975, I, 1, 1373, note Stolfi).

102. DUTCH CC art. 6:202 reads: "Where a person who has acted with a view to looking after the interest of another had done so without good reason or has not properly done so, the interested party may, by approving the acts, surrender the right to invoke the defect against the manager of his affairs (. . .)" (translation by Haanappel et al., Netherlands Business Legislation). The ratification is categorised as a juridical act. It replaces the reasonable ground to act and cures the intervener's breach of a duty of care within the meaning of CC art. 6:200. Where both a reasonable ground is absent and the intervener has breached his duty of care, the principal can choose which of these elements he wishes to eliminate by ratification. In case of doubt, his ratification will be regarded as remedying both defects (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 801-802; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 306 p. 317-318; T & C Vermogensrecht [-Hijma], Art. 6:202 BW, no. 1). Furthermore, CC art. 6:202 provides that the principal may set a reasonable time limit (redelijke termijn) for a ratification. After expiry of this time limit ratification is no longer possible; claims may only arise under the provisions of unjustified enrichment law and tort law (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 802; Hartkamp loc.cit. no. 306 p. 317-318; Hijma loc.cit. no. 3). If the intervener has acted without reasonable grounds for intervening, a ratification has the effect that the law of benevolent intervention remains applicable nonetheless (Hartkamp, loc.cit. no. 306 p. 318). A ratification restricted to the conduct of the intervention (breach of the duty of care) will only lead to a waiver by the principal of a claim for compensation. The principal himself remains liable to compensate the intervener under CC art. 6:200 (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 801; Hartkamp loc.cit. no. 306 p. 318; Hijma loc.cit. no. 2).

103. Again the legal situation under SCOTTISH law is not quite clear. It seems that a ratification is considered the retroactive acceptance of an offer to conclude a contract, such as a contract of mandate or of agency; a tacit ratification is possible (for details see Leslie, JuridRev 1983, 34 and Stair [-Whitty], vol. 15, para 109).

104. According to SCANDINAVIAN law the rules on ratification under the statutes on contract law in general seem to be applied also in the context of benevolent intervention. A ratification may also be inferred from conduct, such as the use of the benefits obtained from the benevolent intervention. A principal may also be bound if in the circumstances he ought to have realised that the gestor was acting in his interest and expected a remuneration (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 57; see also Grönfors, Avtalslagen[3], 158), or if (as in HD 15 July 1941, NJA 1941, 459) a principal pays a fine which has become due as a result of an act of the intervener conducted in the interest of the principal. A ratification leads to the application of the law of mandate (Håstad loc.cit. 57). In the context of the SWEDISH and FINNISH CCom chap. 18 § 3 in fine (principal bound as a consequence of his making use of the benefit of a contract concluded in excess of authority) it is a matter of discussion whether or not the third party has a direct contractual claim against the principal. This is arguably answered in the affirmative in Finland (Chydenius and Hakulinen, cited according to Zackariasson, Direktkrav, 100), but in the negative in Sweden. In Sweden only a claim of the third party against the principal arising from unjustified enrichment (vinstanspråk) is recognised (Grönfors, Ställningsfullmakt och bulvanskap, 115; Hellner, Om obehörig vinst, 324, 336; Karlgren. TfR 1951, 180; Zackariasson, Direktkrav, 103).

105. Agency by ratification in the COMMON LAW requires (a) an act on the part of the prospective agent demonstrably undertaken in the name of or on behalf of the prospective principal, (b) capacity of the principal at the time of the agent's act to ratify, and (c) a subsequent effective ratification of the act by the principal based either on complete knowledge of the act or an unqualified (i. e. unconditional) approval: see Marsh v. Joseph [1897] 1 Ch 213, 246-247 (Lord Russell CJ, for the CA); Firth v. Staines [1897] 2 QB 70, 75 (Wright J), approved in Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co. v. Farnham [1957] 1 WLR 1051, 1057 (Harman J). As to (a), see further Chapter 1, Art. 1:101, Notes, VI, 71. As regards (b), the principal must have had been in existence and have had capacity to undertake the agent's act personally both at the time of the act and at the time of ratification. Consequently a corporation is not able to ratify an act undertaken before the corporation was created or (subject to statutory exceptions) if it was outside the corporation's own powers for the corporation itself to undertake that act. If a person acting ostensibly as agent for a not yet existent corporation concludes a contract in the name of that corporation, the corporation cannot take over the rights and obligations arising out of that contract by ratifying its conclusion by the agent: Kelner v. Baxter (1866-67) 2 CP 174, 183 (Erle CJ), 184 (Willes J), 185-186 (Byles J). (In such cases the agent may be regarded – contrary to the wording of the contract – as himself a party to the contract and liable on it accordingly.) Subject to developments in the law of unjustified enrichment, a corporation may in principle retain the benefit of such work done on its behalf by its putative agent before its creation without liability. A bare promise by the corporation to reward the agent will not give rise to contractual liability because the agent's act is only past consideration for the corporation's promise, while the absence of an anterior request by the corporation for the service rendered precludes a quasi-contractual claim: see Re English & Colonial Produce Co. [1906] 2 Ch 435; Re Rotherham Alum & Chemical Co. (1883) 25 Ch D 103. (Equally a corporation is not liable for unsolicited services rendered on its behalf after its dissolution: see Re Banque des Marchands de Moscou [1952] 1 All ER 1269 (Vaisey J).) Furthermore, the principal cannot ratify in respect of acts which the principal could not have authorised or undertaken at the time the agent acted: see Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co. v. Farnham, loc. cit. (French company could not ratify act of English company carrying on a fishing business in its name during world war two because, due to German occupation, the company had enemy status at the time of the agent's acts: it could not itself have lawfully conducted the fishing business at that time and the English company would have committed a criminal offence in accepting any mandate from the French company). However, where a self-appointed agency remains unauthorised, the agent will nonetheless remain liable to surrender any profit obtained: see Chapter 2, Art. 2.102, Notes II, 22. As regards (c), "ratification is the act of giving sanction and validity to something done by another.": Brook v. Hook (1871) LR 6 Ex. 89, 95 (Martin B, giving a dissenting minority view in that case, but not affecting this point). This requires that the principal recognises and accepts the agent's act or in some other manner treats the act as authorised. Ratification may be either express or implied. The latter may take the form of acquiescence on the principal's part if that is unambiguous and expliciable only by reference to the agent's act (i.e., where there is an 'obligation' on the principal to make a different view manifest): Phillips v. Homfray (No. 1) (1870-71) LR 6 Ch. App. 770, 778 (Lord Hatherley LC) and consider in this context Hunter v. Parker (1840) 7 M & W 322, 151 ER 789 (ratification of unauthorised sale by receipt of the purchase price). If the client knows the essential details of the agent's act, he may recognise it by making use of the rights resulting from that act in order to raise an action against a third party or to defend such an action: Verschures Creameries Ltd. v. Hull & Netherlands Steamship Co. Ltd. [1921] 2 KB 608, and see similarly The Australia (1859) 13 Moore PC 132, 158 (Dr Lushington), 15 ER 50,. A prerequisite of any ratification is knowledge of the circumstances of the agent's act at the time of the act or omission alleged to constitute the ratification: Gunn v. Roberts (1873-74) LR 9 CP 331, 335 (Brett J). For IRISH law (in connection with a gratuitous agency) see, for example, O'Beirne v. Cornwall (1852) 3 Ir Ch Rep 130, 138 (Blackburne LC). (iii) An unnecessary delay in contesting the agent's act may in suitable circumstances constitute a ratification: The Australia, loc. cit., 158 (Dr Lushington) (where, however, necessity sufficed to justify the captain's sale of the ship). A factor limiting the time period for ratification is the requirement that in order to be effective the principal must ratify at a time when he himself might have undertaken the agent's act (e. g. exercised the right vis-à-vis some third party or concluded the contract with the third party): see Dibbins v. Dibbins [1896] 2 Ch 348, where the principal had an option to buy the share of a partner exercisable by notifying the personal representatives of the partner within three months of the partner's death of an intention to buy, but the act of an unauthorised agent within that period signifying to the executors the principal's intention was not effectively ratified by the principal (who at the time was mentally unfit and lacked capacity) where the purported ratification took place after the three months period had expired. Ratification has retrospective effect so that the act of the agent is to be regarded from the outset as authorised: Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co. v. Farnham, loc. cit., 1057 (Harman J); Danish Mercantile Co. Ltd. v. Beaumont [1951] Ch 680, 686 (Jenkins LJ). As a result, where a person acts without authority, but in the name of the potential principal, in order to conclude a contract between that principal and a third party, a withdrawal from the agreement by the third party before the principal has ratified the agent's act is ineffective, even though, assessed at the time the third party purported to withdraw, there was no contract binding the third party. The contract between the principal and the third party comes into being at the time of the principal's ratification, but with effect from the time the agreement was made by the agent. See Bolton Partners v. Lambert (1888) 41 Ch. D 295, 301 (Kekewich J), and on appeal (where the decision was affirmed), 306 (Cotton LJ), 309 (Lindley LJ) and 309-310 (Lopes LJ). (However, the PC in Fleming v. Bank of New Zealand [1900] AC 577, 587 (Lord Lindley) expressly reserved the right to reconsider the proposition decided in Bolton Partners.) On the other hand, a third party may withdraw from the contract before ratification by the principal if that ratification is an express condition of the contract: Watson v. Davies [1931] 1 Ch 455. As a further exception to the principle of retrospective effect, the ratification by the principal does not set aside any cancellation of the agreement which the agent and third party have undertaken before the principal ratified: Walter v. James (1870-71) LR 6 Ex. 124. Ratification retrospectively alters the legal position of agent and principal (their rights and obligations) as between them. As a result of the retrospective authorisation conferred by ratification, the agent is generally not liable to the principal in respect of his intervention: Verschures Creameries Ltd. v. Hull & Netherlands Steamship Co. Ltd., loc. cit. (the legal action of the principal against a third party, wrongly supplied by the agent with goods, for payment of the purchase price operated to ratify the agent's supply so as to preclude the principal from suing the agent for damages in respect of the goods lost by the wrongful supply); United Australia Ltd. v. Barclays Bank Ltd. [1941] AC 1, 31 (Lord Atkin, for the PC). Moreover, the agent will have a claim for reimbursement of his expenditure: see Bristow v. Whitmore (1861) 9 HLC 391, 11 ER 781, especially Lord Campbell LC at pp. 400-402 (784) (where, however, the claim to a proprietary security in the form of a lien for the benefit of the agent was rejected). Ratification may likewise provide the agent with a claim to remuneration: if ratification was contractually agreed between the parties for the agent's performances under the contract, ratification of an act outside the terms of the contract may operate to bring the act within the terms of the remuneration clause. See Keay v. Fenwick (1876) 1 CPD 745; Hartas v. Ribbons (1889) 22 QBD 254.

X. Burden of proof

106. Under GERMAN law the general rules on the allocation of the burden of proof apply: each party has to allege those circumstances which are favourable to its case and prove them if they are disputed. Consequently the party (whether principal or intervener) who asserts a claim arising from benevolent intervention will have to prove the requirements of that claim. Proof of an intention to act on another's behalf will as a general rule require objective indications. Otherwise a person intermeddling could render themselves an intervener in the sense of CC § 677 retrospectively. However, according to settled German case law the intention to act on another's behalf is rebuttably presumed in the case of an 'objectively extraneous affair' or an affair which is ‘objectively also another’s’. This presumption applies independently of whether it is the intervener or the principal who is asserting a claim: see above notes 27 and 39.

107. Under GREEK law the intervener has to prove that he has conducted an affair of the principal and that this was in line with the interests of the principal. A principal seeking to set up a defence against claims arising from benevolent intervention must prove either that there was a mandate in the sense of CC art. 730, that the intervener did not act with the intention to act on the principal’s behalf, or that the conduct of the intervention was irreconcilable with his wishes (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 736, no. 15 and Art. 730, no. 16). As in Germany, it is said that the intention to act on another’s behalf will be presumed in the case of an objectively extraneous affair, whereas the intervener will have to assert and prove that he acted on another’s behalf in the case of a merely subjectively extraneous affair (Papanikolaou loc.cit. Art. 730, no. 5). However, the concept of a subjectively extraneous affair is nowadays severely criticised.

108. Under PORTUGUESE law too the general rule on the burden of proof applies to the law of benevolent intervention. Facts establishing a right fall to be proved by the person who invokes the right. As in Germany and Greece, the intention to act on another’s behalf is presumed (but open to rebuttal) if the intervener knew that the affair managed was objectively extraneous (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 66 [1957] 95-97). It is a matter of dispute who bears the burden of proving fault in the context of CC art. 466 (2), which provides that the intervener is at fault if his intervention does not accord with the interest or the actual or presumed wishes of the principal. The Supreme Court has placed the burden of proof on the person sustaining damage in line with CC art. 487 (1) and so applied the rules of tort law by analogy (STJ 22 April 1986, RLJ 121 [1988] 59 with a critical note by Baptista Machado; BolMinJus 356 [1986] 352). However, a growing body of academic opinion advocates application of the contract law rule in CC art. 799 (1), which contains a reversal of the burden or proof (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 292-297).

109. The AUSTRIAN OGH (12 December 1962, SZ 35/130), in a case concerning exceeding an authority, indicated that it does not favour a reversal of the burden of (dis)proving the intervener’s fault (as an application of CC § 1298 by analogy). However, the impact of this decision is a matter of controversy within Austrian legal literature. It is doubted whether it has general relevance for the law of benevolent intervention and whether it would not be more appropriate to distinguish between the different types of benevolent intervention recognised by Austrian law. That would imply that the burden of proof as regards fault would remain with the principal within the context of CC § 1036, but in all other cases it would be shifted to the intervener (for details see inter alia Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1036 no. 3 and § 1040 no. 4; Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, §§ 1036-1040, no. 18-19; Meissel, GoA, 147-148 and Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1^2, 896). The debate does not yet seem to be over as far as the details of the various modes of explanation are concerned. In contrast to Germany, the question whether or not the intention to act on another’s behalf may be presumed in respect of specific measures taken by the intervener has hardly been discussed in Austria. It would seem the burden of proof remains with the party who asserts that the intervener intended to manage another’s affair (Meissel, loc.cit. 149).

110. In accordance with the principle actori incumbit probatio under BELGIAN law the intervener has to prove all the requirements of the claims arising from justified benevolent intervention which he asserts. This includes the negative requirements (lack of a contractual or other legal obligation to act; absence of contrary wishes of the principal; action without animus donandi). As regards the latter requirement, the judge may exercise discretion and reallocate the burden of proof (B. H.Verb. [-Roodhooft] Hdst. V, De quasi-contracten, no. 2260). Under FRENCH law too faits juridiques must be proven by the claimant, that is to say the party who relies on un fait, un acte or un moyen quelconque (Malinvaud, Droit des obligations[7], no. 197 p. 135). No more specific rules apply for the proof of 'mental elements' such as the intention to manage another's affair.

111. No indications can be found in SPANISH legal writing of specific rules on the allocation of the burden of proof in relation to the law of benevolent intervention. It is assumed that the general rules contained in CCP art. 217 apply. Of course the defendant will have to assert and corroborate any defence. Thus, for example, it will be for the principal to prove that the intervener acted with animus donandi (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 321; Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 67). However, the Tribunal Supremo has ruled that animus donandi will be presumed (unless rebutted) if the intervener is related to the principal and provides the latter with maintenance (cf. CC art. 1894), (TS 25 September 1968, RAJ 1968 [2] no. 3959 p. 2657).

112. ITALIAN law too applies the principle (contained in CC art. 2697) that the party who asserts a right in judicial proceedings has to prove the facts on which the right is based, while one who controverts those facts or asserts they are not effective to establish the right, or claims the right has been altered or extinguished, must prove the facts on which the defence is based. It would seem that no exceptions from this general rule are discussed in the context of benevolent intervention.

113. Under DUTCH law it is assumed that the intention to manage another's affairs – the intention to attend to the affairs of another in the interests of that other – must be made manifest to third parties (Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, no. 11. 2; Verburg, De vrijwillige zaakwaarneming, no. 35 p. 63-64). The case law as a rule infers an intention to act on another's behalf from the nature of the act undertaken and from the circumstances of the case (inter alia CA Amsterdam 29 October 1936, NedJur 1937, no. 1035 p. 1455; CA Amsterdam 17 December 1947, NedJur 1948, no. 318 p. 545; CFI Almelo 24 November 1954, NedJur 1955, no. 753 p. 1347). If the intention to act on another's behalf is not convincingly evident, the burden of proof remains with the intervener (HR 24 April 1992, NedJur 1992, no. 688 p. 2955).

114. The legal position of SCOTTISH law seems to accord with that of SPAIN. Explicit discussion of the matter, however, is confined to the defence of acting with animus donandi: "The gestor may be able to rely on the presumption against donation to prove that he did not intend to donate his outlays. Where the gestor is a near relative of the dominus, this presumption may be displaced by a contrary presumption that the benefits are conferred out of a sense of family duty" (Stair [-Whitty], vol. 15, para 116).

115. A discussion bearing particular rules of allocation of the burden of proof with respect of the law of benevolent intervention are not apparent in the SCANDINAVIAN legal systems.

116. The ordinary rules of burden approach for private law claims apply in the COMMON LAW to claims arising out of benevolent intervention, whereby the legal burden of proof rests with the party seeking to establish the propositions on which their claim to legal redress or the defence rests. Hence if a third party asserts a personal or proprietary claim against the principal on the strength of a contract concluded by an agent of necessity on behalf of the principal, it will be for the third party to prove the necessity which provided the agent with authority to conclude the transaction: see The Alexander (1842) 1 W Rob 346, 166 ER 602, where the plaintiffs failed to discharge the burden.

Illustration 1 is taken from the conclusions of Advocaat-Generaal Hartkamp to HR 21 December 2001, no. R00/032HR (http:www.rechtspraak.nl) (published in part also in RvdW 2002 no. 5); illustration 3 from Cass.civ. 16 November 1955, JCP 1956 II no. 9087, note Esmein; RTD civ 1956, 356, obs. Mazeaud; illustration 6 (two examples) from CA Rome 3 May 1983, Temi rom. 1983, 327 and from HR 10 December 1948, NedJur 1949 no. 122 p. 225; illustration 9 from CFI Torino 1 December 1986, Riv.Dir.Comm. 1987, 541; illustration 10 from STJ 22 April 1986, BolMinJus 356 (1986) 352; RLJ 121 (1988) 59; illustration 12 from Cass.civ. 25 June 1919, D. 1923, I, 223; S. 1921, I, 12; illustration 13 from OGH 3 October 1996, RdW 1997, 275; NZ 1997, 290; EFSlg. 81.427; RIS-Justiz RS 0019782; illustration 14 from CFI Zinnik 10 June 1992, TAgrR 1993, 202; illustration 16 from BGH 8 November 2001, MDR 2002, 270; illustration 21 from OGH 7 December 1972, SZ 45/137; JBl 1973, 476 note Koziol; illustration 22 from OGH 11 September 1885, GlU10.689 and OGH 6 February 1894, GlU15.008 (same facts; two different defendants); illustration 24 (glass window frame) from CA Liège 3 April 1979, Pas. belge 1979, II, 88; RGAR 1980 no. 10195, obs. Glansdorf; illustration 25 from BGH 7 November 1960, BGHZ 33, 251; illustration 32 from HR 19 April 1996, NedJur 1997 no. 24 p. 101; illustration 33 from Cass.civ. 26 January 1988, Bull.civ. 1988, I, no. 25, p. 16; JCP 1989 éd. G., no. 21217, obs. Dagorne-Labbe; RTD civ 1988, 539, obs. Mestre; D. 1989 Jur. 405, note Martin, and CA Karlsruhe 23 March 1977, VersR 1977, 936.

V.–1:102: Intervention to perform another's duty

Where an intervener acts to perform another person's duty, the performance of which is due and urgently required as a matter of overriding public interest, and the intervener acts with the predominant intention of benefiting the recipient of the performance, the person whose duty the intervener acts to perform is a principal to whom this Book applies.

COMMENTS

A. General

Scope and purpose. V.–1:102 governs a special situation within the law of benevolent intervention. It concerns the discharge of duties owed by another who has neglected them despite the fact that their performance is urgently required as a matter of overriding public interest. "Duty" means something which a person is bound to do: it may or may not be owed to a specific creditor (Annex 1). The term "duty" covers private law obligations but is much wider than that. The provision in V.–1:102 states that, without prejudice to other possible principals (primarily the recipient beneficiaries) the person whose duty is discharged is to be regarded as a principal to whom this Book applies. If the intervener, when acting, intended primarily to promote the interests of the party who owes the duty, the latter's status as principal may be deduced from the application of V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another); V.–1:102 is neither applicable nor necessary in this situation. The matter rests with the general requirements in V.–1:101. If, by contrast, the intervener acts primarily with the intention of benefiting the immediate recipient of the money paid or services rendered, the person primarily obliged to perform would not be considered a principal under V.–1:101. It is the aim of V.–1:102 to prevent this outcome. The provision to the effect that the third party "is a principal to whom this Book applies" at the same time clarifies that the subsequent rules, i.e. V.–1:103 (Exclusions) and Chapters 2 and 3 apply independently of whether the requirements of V.–1:101 are met. There is therefore no need to determine if the intervener has acted with reasonable ground (V.–1:101(1)(a) in conjunction with (2)). In other words, if the requirements of V.–1:102 are fulfilled, that in itself constitutes a reasonable ground to intervene. It follows that a justified benevolent intervention in relation to such a principal is not excluded merely because that principal (whose default has given rise to the situation) has forbidden intervention.

Duties during intervention. Furthermore, it follows from V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (1)(b) and (c) (Duties during intervention) that only to a very limited extent must the intervener have regard to the wishes of the principal in the course of the intervention. The benevolent intervener is not constrained by the contrary wishes of the principal – either within the context of whether the benevolent intervener may intervene or in the matter of how the undertaking should be carried out. The constraint of the principal's wishes is ousted to the extent that an overriding public interest displaces it.

Need for a rule within the framework of benevolent intervention. One question which can be posed is whether the special situations, which form the subject matter for V.–1:102, should not be taken out of the law of benevolent intervention and addressed in the law of unjustified enrichment instead. The answer is certainly not merely a matter of the aesthetics of codification. Quite apart from the consideration that the approach adopted here corresponds to the traditions of the civil law systems, this approach is supported by the notion that in this situation too the intervener ought to benefit from the privileges granted by the law of benevolent intervention. Numbering among those in particular is the point that (in contrast with the law of unjustified enrichment) the intervener's claim turns only on the prospective usefulness assessed at the time the act was commenced; it is not decisive that as a result of the intervener's act the principal was actually saved expenditure and consequently enriched. Moreover, with the assistance of the approach chosen here, it is clear from the outset that the intervener acts lawfully within the meaning of the law on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another. The situations covered will not infrequently involve acts of intervention for which V.–3:103 (Right to reparation) is material.

B. Intervention Urgently Required in Overriding Public Interest

Overriding public interest. The contrary wishes of the principal need not be heeded if the principal is not discharging a duty, the performance of which is due and urgently required as a matter of overriding public interest. This rule requires not merely that the intervener acts to discharge a duty of the principal, but also that the discharge of the duty is of overriding public interest. It relates to the discharge of duties which are founded in a private law context, but are of such importance that their fulfilment is at the same time a matter of public interest. The question as to which circumstances generate an overriding public interest cannot be answered once and for all and perhaps the answer may not even be the same for all European jurisdictions. (The public attitude towards suicide, which differs from country to country, may serve as an example.) A minimum requirement for a public interest, however, is that the discharge of the duty is not merely in the interest of a single person. The typical cases concern duties, based in the law on non-contractual liability for damage, to secure safety at large, whereas the performance of contractual obligations will hardly ever be a matter of public interest.

Performing another's maintenance obligations. The performance of obligations to maintain persons who are not being maintained by the relevant maintenance debtor also falls under V.–1:102. For present purposes, such obligations of maintenance are not to be understood as confined to furtherance of a private interest only, at any rate so long and in so far as the social policy of the state follows the principle of subsidiarity. That is because an elementary public interest is contained within the advancement of a privately maintained community and the contingent relief of the public purse which that entails. A comparable case since time immemorial is the arrangement of a burial.

Performance must be due. Performance of the neglected duty must of course be due. It will not suffice that a duty whose performance will become due at some future point of time will most likely not be discharged. An imminently dangerous situation must already subsist at the moment of intervention. The requirement that performance of the duty is due is otherwise not of particular importance since the discharge of a duty where performance is not yet due will hardly ever be a matter of overriding public interest.

Performance must be urgently required. Not every duty that satisfies the requirement that its discharge is of overriding public interest may be enforced by a third party against the contrary wishes of the debtor. Performance must be urgently required. There must be a need for immediate action, which will as a rule consist of a provisional measure to ensure safety. Examples would be measures taken to safeguard dangerous spots for other road users, or to extinguish a fire or remove the risk of water damage which threatens to encroach on to neighbouring premises. Further examples would be taking measures (which cannot be postponed) to prevent an environmental damage which is immediately threatening to occur.

Illustration 1
P has parked a car in front of the emergency access for the fire service at a student halls of residence. I notices that the halls of residence have caught fire. I may remove the car despite the protest of P, if the removal is necessary in order not to delay the efforts of the fire brigade which is already on its way. If, by contrast, there are no signs that the building has caught fire and the obstruction of the emergency access by P's car presents a merely notional danger for the building and its residents, then the removal of the car, although in the public interest, does not require I to intervene personally. It would be sufficient to call the police

Illustration 2
A society for the prevention of cruelty to animals attends to a maltreated and injured pet lying in agony in the street. The owner may not counter a claim for compensation for the costs incurred by the society with the objection that she had informed the association that she did not consent to the emergency treatment. That would entail cruelty to the animal of a criminal nature.

Illustration 3
A warehouse, which P has rented from I in order to store large quantities of milk powder, catches fires. The warehouse is destroyed. Some of the milk powder has burned; the rest of it has mixed with the water from the fire fighting and threatens to pollute the ground water. The competent public authority instructs I to clean up the ground and remove the remains of the milk powder. I does not have to heed the contrary wishes of P, whose lease has terminated. I can claim compensation in respect of the costs incurred for the sum which P would in any case have had to bear in the case of a normal termination of the lease. The removal of the remaining milk powder was a matter of overriding public interest. The claim for compensation is not blocked by V.–1:103 (Exclusions), sub-paragraph (c), since the "obligation to a third party to act" referred to in that Article only extends to an obligation arising from a private law legal relationship (whereas I's duty to follow the instructions of the public authority is a duty under public law).

C. Third party to be regarded as principal

An exception to V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) paragraph (1). The rule in V.–1:102 specifies that the third party who has not fulfilled the duty is to be regarded as a principal. This clarification is necessary because V.–1:101(1) looks to the direction in which the subjective aspiration of the intervener points and often (though, of course, not necessarily) the intervener will have the individual whose body or property is in fact being protected from danger exclusively or at any rate predominantly in mind. However, the person who is responsible in law for the situation of danger should not be relieved from that responsibility. It follows, therefore, that in such a case that person too is to be regarded as a principal and that must be so even though the person that the benevolent intervener predominantly intended to benefit was the beneficiary of the performance of the principal's duty. In other words, it must be decided from case to case on the basis of V.–1:101(1) whether the beneficiary is to be recognised as a principal too. V.–1:102, on the other hand, stipulates the general rule that in any case the person under the duty to act is "a" principal (albeit not necessarily "the", i.e. the sole, principal). This applies even if the benevolent intervener never even thought of seeking to protect that person from possible liability. On the other hand, it remains the case in situations of this type that the benevolent intervener must have intended to benefit another (as recipient of the performance). Just as with the basic situation covered by V.–1:101, there can be no benevolent intervention in these circumstances if the intervener discharges a duty of the principal which was owed to the intervener, intending thereby to benefit himself or herself.

Illustration 4
The facts are the same as in Illustration 25 to V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another). The woman's health insurer established under public law is also regarded as a principal. The duty of such a health insurer to provide medical treatment is a matter of public interest.

Illustration 5
A woman, who is separated from her husband but dependent on maintenance payments received from him, has an adipoma removed from her back by a doctor. Prior to the operation her husband states that he will not cover the costs of the operation. If the woman cannot obtain her husband's financial support for the operation under the applicable provisions of family law, she will not be able to do so by virtue of the rules on benevolent intervention either, since the surgery performed is not of urgent necessity. The doctor therefore only has a claim against the woman, who is exclusively liable.

D. V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) paragraph (2) inapplicable

Public interest overriding the contrary wishes of the principal. For cases which satisfy V.–1:102, V.–1:101(2) can have no application. We are concerned here with situations in which an overriding public interest has priority over the otherwise constraining wishes of the principal. Often the situation will amount to precisely the opposite of a conventional benevolent intervention; if the benevolent intervener has learned that the principal intends to default on the relevant duties, the benevolent intervener has a reasonable ground for intervention.

Illustration 6
A toddler is badly injured by a car accident and is taken to a hospital in a state of unconsciousness. The doctor in charge is able to contact the parents by telephone, but the parents object to the emergency operation for religious reasons. There is no time to apply to a court. The emergency operation may be conducted despite the contrary wishes of the parents.

NOTES

I. General requirements of a lawful management of another's affairs contrary to the principal's wishes

1. GERMAN CC § 679 provides that the contrary wishes of the principal may be disregarded, if without the management of the affair, a duty of the principal whose fulfilment is of public interest, or a statutory duty to provide maintenance, owed by the principal would not be fulfilled in due time. An example for the first alternative is a duty to ensure public safety by removing an obstacle which jeopardises traffic on a public road (BGH 4 December 1975, BGHZ 65, 354). It is a matter of dispute whether CC § 679 can be applied to cases in which a person prevents the suicide of another. Some authors answer this question in the negative on the basis that objections to suicide are merely a matter of ethics (Soergel [-Mühl], BGB[12], § 679 no. 5). However, the prevailing opinion is that the contrary wishes of the person intending to commit suicide are to be disregarded; mere immorality suffices, as the duty to render aid under criminal law (on this point see further the notes under V.–1:103 [Exclusions]) according to case law (BGH 10 March 1954, BGHSt 6, 147) is effective also as against the person intent on suicide (Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], § 679 no. 10). Other authors have argued that the wishes of the suicide are insignificant because a person who intends to commit suicide lacks legal capacity (MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 679 no. 13; and with different emphasis also Erman [-Ehmann], BGB I[10], § 679 no. 4).

2. According to GREEK CC art. 730 (2) the contrary wishes of the principal are to be disregarded if these are either contrary to law or infringe principles of morality. A violation of law requires the infringement of a provision within the scope of CC art. 174 and hence a breach of the public order. This restrictive construction of the requirement of a provision within the meaning of CC art 174 is said to be necessary for the protection of the principal against interference with his affairs (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 31). It is of no concern, for example, if the principal refuses to comply with a statutory duty to furnish maintenance (infringement of CC art. 1476) or an obligation to repair a building which threatens to collapse (infringement of CC art. 925) (Papanikolaou, loc.cit.). The term 'principles of morality' conforms with the term contained in CC art. 178. A violation of bonos mores is made out for example where a person is intent on committing suicide (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 32). POLISH CC art. 754 corresponds with Greek CC art. 730 (2). Under this provision the opposed wishes of the principal may be disregarded, if they are "contrary to law or the fundamental principles of social coexistence". HUNGARIAN CC § 485 (2) formulates the matter in these terms: "Intervention is fitting and proper in order to avert life threatening situations even against the will of the person whose life is endangered, prevent or avert extensive potential hazards even against the will of the owner or another duly authorised person, or fulfil the obligation to provide support even against the will of a person who is obliged to provide support" (Official Translation, Hungarian Legal Norms in Force in three Languages, CompLex CD HMJ, 2004). ESTONIAN LOA § 1018 (1) (iii) goes beyond V.–1:102 in so far as any act performed for another is deemed justified if it is essential and in the public interest.

3. In the PORTUGESE law of benevolent intervention an intervention contrary to the principal's wishes is lawful if the wishes are contrary to law, public order or bonos mores (CC art. 465 (a)). Such wishes need not be and should not be heeded by the intervener. Examples are a suicide who is saved against his will (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 194; Vieira Gomes, Gestão de negócios, 199) and assistance to a child abandoned by its parents (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 438; Pires de Lima/Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], Art. 465 no. 2).

4. AUSTRIAN CC § 1040 denies the intervener a claim under CC § 1037 for compensation of costs incurred, if he has knowingly acted contrary to the legally effective explicit or implicit wishes of the principal (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], §§ 1036-1040 no. 5). CC § 1040 similarly excludes claims on the basis of unjustified enrichment (OGH 23 October 1973, RIS-Justiz RS 0019806; Rummel [-Rummel] ABGB I³, § 1040 no. 1). However, by virtue of CC § 1040 the intervener is granted the right to take back an outlay in specie (Meissel, GoA, 46). Monies paid are considered always recoverable (OGH 30 August 2000, RIS-Justiz RS 0114088). A prohibition uttered by the principal is without significance, however, if it is contrary to law or good morals within the meaning of CC § 879 (OGH 26 November 1963, ÖJZ 1964, 429), if it adversely affects the rights of third parties in an impermissible manner or if the principal lacked legal capacity at the time of his statement (Meissel, GoA, 46). Older legal writing also maintains that a prohibition is ineffective if it is contrary to general safety or public order (Ehrenzweig, System II/1[2], 719-720 [prohibition by home owner against extinguishing a fire; prohibition against bury a deceased person or providing maintenance to a child]) or if it is contrary to a duty owed to the community (Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1[2], 907; v. Zeiller II § 549 p. 408). According to CC § 1042 the discharge of a valid debt or other obligation which has fallen due is permissible despite the contrary wishes of the principal (the debtor); there is no further requirement of a particular public interest in the discharge (Meissel, GoA, 47). However, it has been argued that a debtor in his capacity as principal must have the opportunity of recourse against the intervener, who has discharged the debt, if the principal has suffered any disadvantages from the payment (such as the loss of a right of retention or set-off: Meissel, loc.cit, 51).

5. FRENCH case law proceeds from the principle that someone who intermeddles in the affairs of the principal against the principal's wishes commits a faute, which in a case of damage establishes tortious liability (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 5 p. 7). The case law indicates, however, that the relationship of benevolent intervention can also arise where the opposition of the principal to the intervention was manifestly unjustified (manifestement injustifiée). This may be the case, for example, if the principal does not discharge a statutory duty and the intervener does nothing more than fulfil that duty (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc.cit.). The cases of most practical relevance for this exception concern the discharge by a third party of one spouse's duty to provide maintenance and render assistance to the other spouse (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10 no. 112). Similarly in BELGIAN legal literature the view has been voiced that the principal's opposition to intervention may be unlawful or socially unreasonable and in consequence may be disregarded (Paulus, Zaakwaarneming no. 53 p. 41).

6. The SPANISH CC does not contain any rule according to which, as an exception, a benevolent intervention may arise notwithstanding explicit contrary wishes of the principal; on the contrary, the case law has emphasised that the intervener has to respect the wishes of the principal (TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 322 p. 198). Note should be taken of CC art. 1158 according to which a person who "settles an account of a third party may claim from the debtor what he has contributed unless he has not acted against the express will of the debtor. In the latter case he may only claim compensation in so far as the performance was of benefit for the debtor." CC art. 1158 however is not considered as laying down a rule on benevolent intervention, but rather as a provision on unjustified enrichment (Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 488). Despite this statutory starting point, Spanish legal literature considers that in some cases the rules on benevolent intervention may apply, even though the intervener has acted contrary to the wishes of the principal. These are situations in which the principal's wishes run contrary to statute or to a duty whose discharge is of public or social interest (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 290; Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 456). According to Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 261 the principal's wishes may even be disregarded if they conflict with bonos mores. It is not evident how CC art. 1894 (1) is to be reconciled with this analysis. The provision contains the rule that if a stranger provides maintenance "without the knowledge" of the person obliged to provide it, the stranger has a right to demand the sum paid from the person obliged unless it is established that he provided maintenance "for charitable reasons and without the intention to claim compensation". CC art. 1894 is problematic on account of the opening phrase ('without the knowledge' of the person obliged) (Puig Brutau, Compendio II, 604). The phraseology has been criticised because it places the person who pays the maintenance in a worse position than any third party who discharges a debt of another under CC art. 1158. A more logical legal policy would lead to the opposite result (Lacruz Berdejo loc.cit. 270; Sánchez Jordán loc.cit. 292). Finally, the Collection of Civil Laws of the Assembly of NAVARRA Ley 561 reads: "If he [the principal] has previously forbidden intervention, he is not under a duty to compensate."

7. Under ITALIAN law too acting contrary to a prohibition of the principal generally cannot not constitute a benevolent intervention. Such conduct is not held to be 'beneficial'. However, a prohibition of the principal is nugatory if it is contrary to statute or fundamental principles of the legal system or bonos mores (CC art. 2031 (2); CA Genova 10 April 1954, Foro Pad. 1955, I, 76). In cases of this type there is no requirement that the principal could not attend to his affairs himself. For example, the prohibition of the principal against intervention may be disregarded if, without intervention, inalienable rights of third parties would be infringed or adversely affected (Cass. 17 July 1969, no. 2636, Foro it. 1971, I, 713: a third party provides maintenance to an estranged wife in lieu of the defaulting husband). Acts by which a duty of the principal is discharged are in general held to be useful (Cass. 15 October 1963, no. 2757, Foro it. 1964, I, 580).

8. It is likewise the case under DUTCH law that benevolent intervention contrary to the wishes of the principal is generally not possible. In such a case a reasonable ground for intervening is missing. However, regard need only be given to the 'fully effective' wishes of the principal. Acts contrary to the wishes of a person who is mentally disabled are not necessarily wrongful and may even be necessary (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 791; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 301 p. 315; Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, no. 12. 2; Schrage, Verbintenissen uit andere bron, no. 16 p. 12-13). An intervention contrary to the wishes of the principal will otherwise only be recognised in extraordinary circumstances (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis loc.cit.; HR 19 April 1996, NedJur 1997 no. 24, p. 101). The rescue of a person intending to commit suicide may serve as an example (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 301 pp. 314-315; Verburg, De vrijwillige zaakwaarneming, no. 55 p. 84-85). There is no statutory counterpart to German CC § 679. However, it has been accepted that as a matter of public interest the public authority might clean up land as an intervener against the contrary wishes of the person responsible (Frenk/Messer, NJB 1993, 48-49; Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, no. 12. 5).

9. The legal situation in SCOTLAND appears not to be resolved. Among the institutional writers only Stair, Institutions, Book I, title 8, 3 and Erskine (1828), Book III, Volume II, 53 address the issue and discuss a claim of the intervener for reimbursement of expenditures limited to the surviving enrichment of the principal. Stair (-Whitty) vol. 15 para. 139 (1996), in reference to this, ventures the opinion that in extremely exceptional circumstances public interest may override the contrary wishes of the principal – at any rate where the latter is opposed to the discharge of his duty to provide maintenance. Whether the claim for reimbursement in this exceptional case is a matter of unjustified enrichment law or the law of benevolent intervention remains unclear.

10. In a case in which the fire brigade removed loose roof sheeting which a storm threatened to cast on to the street, the SWEDISH Supreme Court has held that the owner in general must suffer such an intervention (of the fire brigade or any third party) (HD 9 March 1972, NJA 1972, 88). HD 20 February 1952, NJA 1952, 63 has held the same in a case of maintenance of animals where the principal would otherwise render himself criminally liable for cruelty to animals.

11. In a case of emergency – at any rate where human or animal welfare is concerned – a person may have authority in ENGLAND AND WALES as an agent of necessity to act contrary to the wishes of the principal: cf. Palmer v. Stear (1963) 113 LJ 420 (Kingsbridge County Court), where a vet employed by the defendants destroyed a seriously injured dog belonging to the plaintiff in view of its condition and an action for damages for trespass failed because it would have caused suffering to the semi-conscious and dying dog not to have done so, the owner being under a legal duty to destroy or procure the destruction of the dog to prevent cruelty, and the vet had authority as agent of necessity to put the dog down. There is no requirement that an act in connection with the care or treatment of a person lacking capacity under sec. 5 of the Mental Capacity Act 2005 (which, when it comes into force, also provides for rights under s. 8 for indemnification, to pledge that person's credit or to dispose of money in their possession) correspond with that person's wishes, but it must be done in the reasonable belief it is in that person's best interests and (under sec. 6) there are further restrictions if the act is intended to restrain that person's liberty. In extreme cases a duty to act may arise. Where a husband acquiesces in the request of his gravely-ill wife not to summon a doctor to attend to her and the wife dies as a result, the husband may commit the crime of manslaughter based on the fatal consequences of the omission to discharge a spouse's duty to care for the other spouse's health; the capacity of the wife to make rational decisions is a matter to be considered in determining whether there has been a "reckless disregard" of the duty to act: R v. Smith [1979] Crim LR 251. However, a person will not have authority to act contrary to the principal's wishes so as to interfere with the principal's right of self-determination if the principal is competent to act and makes his informed and free choice known: cf. Clerk and Lindsell (-Jones), Torts[18], para. 3-106. Nor will there be authority to act against the principal's wishes if the intervener can pass the matter to the public authorities who will have the necessary powers to intervene: cf. the IRISH case of Flannery v. Dean [1995] 2 ILRM 393, 397 (Costello J) (no right to retain possession of the owners horses against her consent, despite her neglect of them, because the defendant could have referred the matter to the local authority which had power to keep the animals in a local pound), and see to similar effect Carter v. Thomas [1893] 1 QB 673 (no right for volunteer to force his assistance where adequate fire brigade attending to fire). Where the claimant acts at the request of the public authorities in order to discharge a public duty for the defendant, performance of the duty being required urgently and the defendant being out of contact, the claimant will act as an agent of necessity: cf. White J. D. v. Troups Transport [1976] CLY 33 (Stockton-on-Tees County Court), where a business hiring out equipment acted as the defendant's agent of necessity when, at police request, it removed the defendant's vehicle which was stuck under a bridge on blocking a busy road before the rush hour.

II. Specific cases subject to particular rules (maintenance, funeral costs)

12. ESTONIA, GERMANY and SPAIN have explicit rules on rights in respect of maintenance provided and funeral costs incurred. Estonian LOA § 1018 (1) (iii) stipulates that an intervention contrary to the wishes of the principal is lawful if the principal does not discharge his statutory duty to pay maintenance when due. Similarly the German CC in § 679 declares the contrary wishes of the principal to be immaterial if these would lead to the principal's duty to pay maintenance not being discharged when due. Spanish CC art. 1894 (1) provides that a third party who discharges the duty of the party obliged 'without the knowledge' of the latter, may claim compensation unless he did not have any intention to claim compensation at the time he provided the benefit. CC art. 1894 (2) grants a claim for compensation of reasonable funeral costs incurred against the deceased's estate and, as a subsidiary claim, against the persons who were under a duty to maintain the deceased while he was alive. The notion of funeral costs is given a wide meaning (Paz-Ares/Diez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Lasarte], Código Civil II, 1955). The duty to reimburse funeral costs contained in AUSTRIAN CC § 549 was originally also regarded as part of the law on benevolent intervention (v. Zeiller II, § 549 p. 409), but is now characterised as a claim in unjustified enrichment law. (Rummel [-Welser], ABGB I[3], § 549 no. 5). CC § 1042 (for whose application the provision of maintenance by a third party has always constituted a prime example) is likewise now seen as a provision of unjustified enrichment law. If a third party pays maintenance (provided for by statute) in the expectation of receiving compensation from the debtor under the maintenance obligation (and thus in absence of an animus donandi), that person has a claim for compensation under CC § 1042 (OGH [strengthened Division] 9 June 1988, SZ 61/143).

13. The GREEK Civil Code allows an intervention against the wishes of the principal if those wishes infringe statute or bonos mores (CC art. 730 (2)). Failure to pay maintenance (see above note 2) is an example of this. Apart from this rule CC art. 738 (2) only provides that in case of doubt a person is regarded as acting with animus donandi when they provide maintenance to a blood relation in the direct line or the second degree (by civil law reckoning) in the collateral line (i.e. brother and sister). PORTUGUESE law has no provision which explicitly provides for maintenance or funeral costs. Such cases will fall within the scope of CC art. 465 limb (a), a provision which has been drafted in wider terms than (for instance) German CC § 679 because (among other reasons) according to this provision an act may permissibly be undertaken in contravention of the principal's wishes if those wishes infringe bonos mores (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 194 (fn. 3)). As mentioned above (see note 5) FRENCH academic writing regards the discharge of an obligation d´assistance et de sécours entre époux as the textbook example of a legitimate intervention contrary to the wishes of the debtor of the maintenance obligation. On the claim for reimbursement of funeral costs under the rules on benevolent intervention see also CA Paris 3 May 1989, Juris Data 1989-022252. ITALIAN case law has repeatedly held that unless it is provided with an animus donandi payment of maintenance despite the contrary wishes of the defaulting principal can constitute benevolent intervention (Cass. 20 May 1961, no. 1196, Foro it. 1962, I, 1, 756; Cass. 17 July 1969, no. 2636, Foro it. 1971, I, 713; Cass. 9 August 1988, no. 4883, Rep.Giur.it. 1988, voce Alimenti, no. 2). The same holds true for meeting funeral expenses for the benefit of the heirs (Cass. 28 June 1975, no. 2557, Rep. Foro it. 1975, voce Gestione d´affari, no. 2; Trib. Milano, 13 July 1987, no. 6615 cited by Rescigno, Codice Civile, art. 2028 § 4). Under DUTCH law payment of maintenance for the benefit of neglected children likewise constitutes a recognised case of benevolent intervention which is justified despite the parents' contrary wishes (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 791). It has also been held that necessary medical attendance provided by a hospital to a child who has fallen ill will be a legitimate benevolent intervention although the child's parents are opposed to treatment (CFI Rotterdam 20 August 1993, NedJur 1995 no. 18 p. 73).

14. In SCOTLAND it is argued that where a family member steps into the breach on behalf of another family member it may be assumed if there is nothing more to go on that that person has acted out of a sense of family loyalty and therefore with an animus donandi. A benevolent intervention or claims for 'recompense' will thus only be considered in exceptional circumstances (Stair [-Whitty], Vol. 15, paras 98, 116).

15. There appear to be no decisions yet in SWEDISH case law on claims for compensation in respect of maintenance provided not merely in place of the person liable to provide it, but also contrary to that person's wishes. The decided cases all concern claims for contribution between siblings where one of the siblings has carried the sole or disproportionate burden of providing for their parents (HD 19 November 1909, NJA 1909, 551; HD 13 November 1937, NJA 1937, 524; HD 16 September 1944, NJA 1944, 429), or claims where the reputed father has raised a child in the belief he is the biological parent (HD 29 April 1968, NJA 1968, 183; HD 5 June 1975, NJA 1975, 330; HD 29 March 1978, NJA 1978, 144). However, changes to family law have rendered this line of case law irrelevant. The claims of the Swedish state for compensation against parents whose duty to maintain the children has been discharged by the state are specifically regulated by statute in §§ 21-31 of the Maintenance Support Act.

16. ENGLISH law recognises a right to intervene at another's expense in order to discharge a duty of that other which is due and a matter of overriding public interest where a person arranges for the funeral of a deceased person, although that person may not themselves be under an obligation to do so. An intervener (whether an undertaker or a third party who pays the undertaker: Ambrose v. Kerrison (1851) 10 CB 776 at 779 138 ER 307 at 308 (Jervis CJ)) has a claim to reimbursement of their expenses, provided these are reasonably incurred, i.e. that "no unnecessary expense is incurred" (Rogers v. Price (1829) 3 Y & J 28 at 37, 148 ER 1080 at 1083 (Vaughan B)). (As a rule, however, the reasonableness of the sum expended seems not to have been challenged: see, for instance, Tugwell v. Heyman (1812) 3 Camp 298, 170 ER 1389 and Ambrose v. Kerrison, loc. cit.) There is no requirement that the intervener act at the request of a person obliged to dispose of the body: Jenkins v. Tucker (1788) 1 H Bl 90 at 93, 126 ER 55 at 57 (Lord Loughborough CJ) (action supportable "though there was neither request nor assent on the part of the defendant"); Rees v. Hughes [1946] KB 517, 523 (Scott LJ), 527-528 (Tucker LJ, invoking the then commonplace legal fiction of a request implied by law) and for illustrations see Tugwell v. Heyman, loc. cit., (executor liable, though did not request burial). The basis for the exceptional rights of an intervener in this type of case (whose origins, if they lie in the case law of the ecclesiastical courts, may have been influenced by the Roman actio funeria through the channels of civil and canon law learning) is the public interest in discharge of the obligation to dispose of the body: see Jenkins v. Tucker, loc. cit., 93 (57) (Lord Loughborough CJ: "a duty which the defendant was under a strict legal necessity of [...] performing, and which common decency required"); Shallcross v. Wright (1850) 12 Beav 558 at 561, 50 ER 1174 at 1175 per Lord Langdale MR ("reasons of an important nature that the dead body should be buried without delay"), and similarly Rogers v. Price, loc. cit., 34 (1082) (Garrow B) and Tugwell v. Heyman, loc. cit., (where Lord Ellenborough CJ emphasises the necessity for intervention by a stranger). Traditionally the claim has been regarded as "quasi-contractual" (Shallcross v. Wright, loc. cit., 561 (1175) (Lord Langdale MR: "if this [burial] had been done by a stranger, there would have been a sufficient consideration, from which a contract to pay would have been implied") on the basis that in discharging the defendant's obligation the claimant has 'paid to the defendant's use' (Jenkins v. Tucker, loc. cit., 93 (57) (Lord Loughborough CJ)). In modern terminology it may be restated as a restitutionary claim based on unjustified enrichment arising from the discharge of another's liability, necessity providing the requisite unjust factor. The principle is obscured somewhat by unclarity in the law as to who or, rather, when a given person is obliged to bury the deceased, though the following statement of the law may be extracted from the authorities. (1) Since the expense will be met by the deceased's estate (see the Administration of Estates Act 1925, ss. 33(2) and 34(3)), the duty to arrange the funeral is placed in the first instance on the person lawfully entitled to its administration. The persons primarily responsible for arranging a funeral are thus the personal representatives: see Williams v. Williams (1881-82) 20 Ch. D 659, 664 (Kay J: executors responsible for burial); Holtham v. Arnold (1986) 2 BMLR 123, 124-125 (Hoffman J) (the legal position of an administrator is no different from that of an executor and has the right and duty to arrange the funeral): Grandison v. Nembhard (1989) 4 BMLR 140 (Vinelott J) (executors); and see also Dobson v. North Tyneside Health Authority [1997] 1 WLR 596, 600 (Peter Gibson LJ). (2) Where there are no personal representatives in a position to do so (e.g. because there is no will, or no appointment of an executor under a will, and no administrator has been appointed, or the deceased's estate is insufficient for the purposes), the duty of interring the body devolves on the parent, if the deceased is an infant child and the parent has the means: see R. v. Vann (1851) 2 Den 325 at 326 and 300, 169 ER 523 at 524 and 525-526 (Lord Campbell CJ) (where, however, a criminal nuisance in failure to bury was not established because the impoverished parent was not obliged to take out a loan to finance burial), confirmed by Bramwell B in Osborn v. Gillett (1872-73) LR 8 Ex. 88, 99, and applied by Stephen J in R. v. Price (1883-84) 12 QBD 247, 254; Bedwell v. Golding & Sons (1902) 18 TLR 436 (Phillimore J); and Clark v. London General Omnibus Co. Ltd. [1906] 2 KB 648, 652, 655 and 659 (Lord Alverstone CJ) (but cf. 663, where Farwell LJ assumed the point without being satisfied of it), cited to this effect with approval in Dobson v. N. Tyneside Health Authority loc. cit., 478f (Peter Gibson LJ); R. v. Gwynedd County Council ex parte B [1992] 3 All ER 317, 319j (Balcombe LJ); Hume, 2 (1956) Sydney L Rev 109, 112. If the deceased was married, the surviving spouse is under a like contingent liability to bury the deceased: see Clark v. London General Omnibus Co. Ltd. loc. cit., 663-664 (where Farwell LJ assumed this) as well as the cases cited below; Hume, 2 (1956) Sydney L Rev 109, 110-112. For the view that a child of the deceased, if of full age, is correspondingly bound to bury their parent, see Hume, loc. cit., 113. However, there appears to be no authority for a wider proposition that the next of kin as such are under a duty to bury the deceased: see Dobson v. N. Tyneside Health Authority loc. cit., 478f (Peter Gibson LJ). (3) Failing someone responsible within the above categories, burial becomes the responsibility of the occupier in whose premises the deceased died (unless the householder does not have the requisite means): R. v. Stewart (1840) 12 Ad & E 773 at 778, 113 ER 1007 (Lord Denman CJ) (deceased dying in hospital; husband of the deceased, who was in receipt of social assistance, was too poor to effect burial). (4) If no suitable arrangements are apparently being made for burial or cremation, the local authority for the area where the person has died or been found dead has a statutory obligation to bury or cremate the body: Public Health (Control of Diseases) Act 1984, s. 46(1) (replacing the National Assistance Act 1948, s. 50). (At common law there was no such duty on the authority: R. v. Stewart, loc. cit. (disbursement for such purposes ultra vires; application for mandamus failed); Woolwich Overseers v. Robertson (1880-81) 6 QBD 654, 658 (Lindley LJ).) (On the rights and duties of local authorities in this matter, see further Chapter 1, Art. 1:103, Notes, IV, 30.) These rules sets out a hierarchy of liabilities; a person liable to arrange burial has no right of contribution or indemnification from a person whose contingent liability is of lower degree: see Rees v. Hughes, loc. cit., where the claim of an executor against the husband of the deceased failed because of the primacy of the executor's liability. (R. v. Stewart, loc. cit., where the application against the local authority was made on behalf of the hospital in which the pauper died, could also now be regarded as a decision to the same effect.) The claim of an intervener is in the first instance for reimbursement out of the deceased's estate, since the personal presentatives are primarily obliged to dispose of the body (and have a right of recourse to the deceased's estate for that purpose): Tugwell v. Heyman, loc. cit.; Arlot v. Churchland (1828) unreported (Court of Common Pleas) cited 3 Y & J 32-33, 148 ER 1081; Rogers v. Price, loc. cit.; Ambrose v. Kerrison, loc. cit., 777 and 779 (308) (Jervis CJ: "There can be no question that an undertaker who performs a funeral may recover from the executor of the deceased (having assets) the reasonable and necessary expenses of such funeral, without any specific contract."); Sharp v. Lush (1878-79) 10 Ch D 468, 472 (Jessel MR: an executor is liable even though he has not arranged the funeral); Rees v. Hughes, loc. cit., 524-525 (Scott LJ), 528 (Tucker LJ). Alternatively the intervener may himself apply part of the deceased's estate to effect the funeral and does not become an executor de son tort in doing so: Rees v. Hughes, loc. cit., 524 (Scott LJ). (Prior to reform of the law of succession, the intervener's claim against the personal representatives or right to use the deceased's assets could only touch upon the deceased's personal property; an heir or devisee to whom the deceased's real property passed was unaffected: Carter v. Beard (1839) 10 Sim 7, 59 ER 514.) Only when the deceased's estate is insufficient to satisfy the expenses incurred does the intervener have a claim against the relatives of the deceased or third parties who are (in the circumstances, by virtue of their contingent obligation) liable to effect the funeral. The legal position in such a case was left open in Rees v. Hughes, loc. cit., 527 (Morton LJ), but the proposition is supported by and explains earlier case law. Where the deceased was a married woman who by virtue of that status (prior to reforms in the late nineteenth century) largely lacked an independent personal estate, an action for reimbursement of funeral costs could be brought against the husband: Jenkins v. Tucker, loc. cit. (deceased's father arranging the funeral, the husband being abroad); Ambrose v. Kerrison, loc. cit., and Bradshaw v. Beard (1862) 12 CB (N.S.) 344, 142 ER 1175 (where in both cases the deceased and her husband were separated). It has been asserted that there is no requirement that the intervener first contact the person who is obliged to effect the funeral and will be liable to make reimbursement: see to this effect Bradshaw v. Beard, loc. cit., 348 (1177) (Erle CJ). Arguably, however, that this is confined to cases where the intervener is himself (contingently) obliged to effect a funeral and is merely seeking reimbursement from one who is primarily liable: in Bradshaw v. Beard itself the brother was obliged at common law to arrange burial because the deceased had died in his house (loc. cit., 348 per Willes J). There is no clear authority that the same rule applies where a stranger who is not under any obligation intervenes; in a number of cases communication was either impossible or impractical in the circumstances – see Ambrose v. Kerrison, .loc. cit (claimant did not know where the husband resided); Jenkins v. Tucker, loc. cit. (husband abroad); Rogers v. Price, loc. cit. (executor residing too far away for advance notification). In any case there is no claim to reimbursement if the intervener (e.g. by concealment) impedes the person primarily liable to arrange the funeral from doing so: Bradshaw v. Beard, loc. cit., 349 (Willes J). Moreover, an intervener may not act in contravention of the known wishes of the person (primarily) obliged if the latter (lawfully) refuses to bury the body at that point in time: Rogers v. Price, loc. cit., 36 (1083) (Hullock B). Statutory provisions enable public authorities providing social assistance or maintenance to recover expenses incurred from persons who were liable to provide maintenance to the person assisted: see National Assistance Act 1948, s. 43; Children Act 1989, s. 29 and Schedule 2, Part 3; Child Support Act 1991 (as amended by Part 1 of the Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Act 2000 and supplemented by the Child Support Act 1995)

Illustration 2 is taken from CFI Groningen 2 September 1999, Prg. 2000, 5375; illustration 3 from BGH 8 March 1990, BGHZ 110, 313; illustration 4 from BGH 7 November 1960, BGHZ 33, 251; illustration 5 from CFI Toulouse 26 October 1932, D. 1933, 2, 107; illustration 6 from CFI Rotterdam 20 August 1993, NedJur 1995 no. 18 p. 73.

V.–1:103: Exclusions

This Book does not apply where the intervener:

(a) is authorised to act under a contractual or other obligation to the principal;

(b) is authorised, other than under this Book, to act independently of the principal's consent or

(c) is under an obligation to a third party to act.

COMMENTS

A. The negative requirements for the applicability of the law of benevolent intervention

Fundamentals. The provisions of V.–1:103 concern cases in which the law of benevolent intervention is not applicable, despite the fact that the conditions of V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) or V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty) are satisfied. V.–1:103 therefore touches upon the 'negative' requirements of a benevolent intervention, namely (a) the absence of an authorisation (and obligation) to act arising out of some contract or other legal ground, (b) the absence of a power to intervene which is independent of the wishes of the principal, and (c) the absence of an obligation to act owed to a third party.

Priority of special statutory regimes. The Article does not expressly state that the law of benevolent intervention also yields priority to special statutory regimes which aim to provide a complete set of rules for the cases covered. That does not seem necessary because it is merely an instance of the general principle whereby in case of conflict more specialised statutory provisions oust the application of general provisions. Consequently, where the law provides for special and exhaustive rules governing the relationship between the intervener and the principal, those special rules have precedence over the rules in this text. Examples are to be found in statutes on the provision of emergency aid by doctors.

B. Authority and obligation (sub-paragraph (a))

The principle. A person who is obliged to the principal to undertake the act in question does not act as an intervener without authority. This is a defining feature of this area of law, whose purpose is precisely to bridge the gap which may arise from the absence of a pre-existent obligation under private law – in particular the absence of a contractual obligation to act. Moreover, someone who is obliged to the benefited party to undertake the act in question is necessarily at the same time also authorised to act. That is the point of departure for the formulation adopted for sub-paragraph (a) and is true both for contractual obligations and obligations imposed by law on the active party in favour of the benefited party. The authority to act derives its foundation from the particular obligation whose performance falls for consideration. Someone who is obliged to the principal to act is always also authorised to act (though conversely not everyone who is authorised to act is also obliged to act: see sub-paragraph (b)).

Precise identification of the obligation. It is important, however, to identify the relevant obligation precisely in the context of the particular case.

Illustration 1
A plumber who has been summoned by a home owner to repair the plumbing, but is not greeted by the owner on arrival at the house proceeds to repair the plumbing anyway. The plumber was obliged to make the repairs, but not authorised to enter the house without consent (unless the parties had agreed this). The apparent contradiction is resolved when it is accepted that the plumber was not obliged to convert the promise into action in this way. So considered it remains the case that one who is obliged to do an act is always also authorised to do it, while one who is authorised to do it is not thereby automatically obliged to do it.

Acting under a contractual obligation towards the principal. A benevolent intervention can only be made out if the parties do not stand in a legal relationship which confers on the intervener a right to conduct the affairs of the principal which are in fact managed. In particular, there is no benevolent intervention, therefore, if the party acting was contractually obliged to the entitled party to undertake the act in question. Whether a contract between the parties has come into existence and, if so, what rights and obligations it establishes between them are questions which are exclusively for determination in the law of contract. Contract law thus has complete priority to this extent in relation to the law of benevolent intervention. The latter comes into play only if the necessary contractual authority to act and a corresponding contractual obligation cannot be found. In that case there remains room for the law of benevolent intervention to operate between the parties.

Illustration 2
Where a party to a long-term contract suffers a heart attack during a business negotiation about termination of the contractual relationship and is brought to hospital by the other party, the latter acts as a benevolent intervener in doing so. Ferrying the contractual partner to the hospital has nothing to do with the contractual relationship between the parties.

Existence of a contract. The Article leaves to the law of contract all questions as to the existence of a contract and the rights and obligations which arise out of it. It is for contract law to decide whether and in what circumstances a contract has come into existence between an intervener and a principal by which the former obtains the consent of the principal to intervene or, as the case may be, continue the intervention. The Article equally leaves it to contract law to decide whether an approval of an intervention (V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) paragraph (1)(b)) leads in any given case to the conclusion of a contract (see Comment F to V.–1:101). Moreover, under the rules on benevolent intervention in another's affairs it is for the law of contract to determine whether and in what cases a contract comes into existence where someone intervenes at the request of another or in response to another's cry for help. V.–1:103(a) is accordingly silent on the particular issue of what conditions are necessary for a contractual obligation to provide aid or the assumption of a contractual obligation to pay damages in favour of a rescuer (a convention d´assistance). Presumably, under Book II, as a rule, no contract to provide assistance or to pay damages comes into being between the injured party and the rescuer, since neither the rescuer nor the party calling for help will normally have the intention to bind themselves legally. Thus in such cases room is left for the application of the law of benevolent intervention. The same goes for courtesies and favours which do not involve a legal obligation. However in case of such arrangements (such as for example being given a lift in another's car) it will often be assumed that the active party acts with an intention of conferring a gratuitous benefit V.–3:104 (Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights) paragraph (1). A contractual relationship does come into existence, however, if someone promises another a reward for doing something specific; it is concluded at the moment that the promisee commences performance of that activity. Finally, so long as there is no European regime to determine under what circumstances a (valid and enforceable) contract is concluded with a person who lacks full legal capacity (e.g. a minor) this area too remains to be governed exclusively by the applicable law of contract or law of persons, as the case may be. In this context it may be that by virtue of a special statutory regime the relationship between doctor or hospital on the one hand and an unconscious patient on the other is configured on a contractual basis.

Acting in pursuance of a void contract. V.–1:103 does not touch upon the question whether a person who performs under a contract for services, supposing there is an obligation to do so, may qualify as an intervener if the contract turns out to be void. This question falls to be decided instead under V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) and must be answered in the negative due to the absence of an intention to benefit another (see Comment C under V.–1:101).

Acting in breach of contract. There is equally no intervention without authority where a party to a contract acts in that capacity but not in conformity with the contract. The fact that a party to the contract performs the obligations under the contract poorly does not alter the fact that there was authority to intervene.

The priority of functionally similar contract law rules. The law of contract contains various rules which from a functional point of view show certain similarities to the law of benevolent intervention. These rules too, of course, have priority and thus correspondingly exclude the law of benevolent intervention. A case is provided by the obligation of a debtor whose creditor is in delay in accepting performance to safeguard or accept the subject matter of the performance (e. g. goods sold) in the interests of (but also at the expense of) the creditor (cf. III.–2:111 (Property not accepted). Another example can be found in the extended rule of the law of mandate whereby in a case of unforeseen events the agent may depart from the instructions which have been given and, after a vain attempt to contact the principal, may make a decision in the principal's interest. Where such a power arises out of contract law rules governing the relationship between the parties, the agent does not act as intervener. That is the case independently of whether the agent is also bound to deviate from the original instructions (i.e. to do what a reasonable agent would do to safeguard the principal's interest) (in which case V.–1:103(a) would apply); even if the applicable contract law regime merely authorises the agent to deviate from the principal's declared wishes, the intervener is entitled to act despite the absence of the principal's consent (V.–1:103(b)). Where, on the other hand, under the applicable contractual regime such a power founded on the law of contract is absent, then that very same act without more may constitute a benevolent intervention. A conceivable case in point would be an agent who feels compelled by a sudden and exceptional course of events in attending to the interests of the principal to exceed a price limit set by the principal for good reason. If the applicable contract law does not contain its own rule for this situation, then the law of benevolent intervention applies (and the converse is also true). As regards the substantive result in cases of this type, however, it will not make any difference whether they are resolved on the basis of the law of contract or the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs.

Acting under another obligation towards the principal. The performance of a contractual obligation is only one case among many (albeit a particularly important one) in which there is no benevolent intervention because vis-à-vis the principal the party acting must do so as a matter of private law, is correspondingly authorised to act and consequently is not dependent on the law of benevolent intervention for a justification for his acting. The Article does not employ the criterion of the "voluntariness" of the act, which can be found in Romance legal systems. That has been done, however, primarily for technical reasons and not on account of any legal policy consideration. The criterion of "voluntariness" appears both on the one hand too imprecise and on the other hand too narrow. What should be decisive instead is whether the party acting was under an obligation towards the principal. However, the matter does not turn on the source (statutory or contractual) of the obligation. Those who perform their statutory obligation to maintain their children, their spouse or their parents do not act as benevolent interveners any more than those who perform the obligation under the law of unjustified enrichment to return something in their possession or ownership. The performance of an obligation arising, for example, from the initiation of expectations of a concluded contract ("culpa in contrahendo"), cf. II.–3:302 (Breach of confidentiality) or in consequence of causing legally relevant damage to another is likewise not an incidence of benevolent intervention.

Illustration 3
A person does not act as a benevolent intervener when remedying damage for which that person is responsible, such as damage to ground water caused by trying to refill an underground oil tank which in fact no longer exists.

Moral obligations. Only legal obligations are relevant here; the discharge of a moral obligation will not suffice to exclude the application of the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs.

The duty to render assistance under criminal law. Many European legal systems contain a rule which renders a person liable to criminal sanctions when he or she sees a fellow human being in substantial peril to life or limb and fails to render assistance despite the fact that it would have been possible to do so without having to subordinate any significant interests (a criminal omission to render assistance). In some cases particular professional groups (especially doctors, but in given circumstances also vets too, for example) are subject to wide-ranging duties to help and must reckon with the possibility of criminal punishment should they fail to fulfil them. Those who act under the threat of punishment if they do not help may well not act "voluntarily", but there should be no doubt that such persons are afforded the (privileged) legal position of benevolent interveners. The threat of punishment is meant to provide only a further 'incentive' for taking action; it should not have the counter-productive effect that interveners are stripped of legal protection available under private law. In these rules, therefore, it matters only whether the intervener is authorised to act under a private law obligation owed to the person assisted. It is precisely that requirement which is not in fact satisfied in the case of acts taken under the impulse provided by a threat of punishment by criminal law. That is because in the first place such duties exist for the general public interest; they do not provide even a theoretical platform for a claim based in private law and, according to the overwhelmingly predominant European legal viewpoint, their breach does not found a claim for compensation for the person who was not assisted. Even if one were to take a different view (i.e. regard a claim to reparation as well-founded), the circumstance that (at least theoretically) the assisted person could at any time refuse assistance as an unwanted interference shows that the person giving assistance is in fact a benevolent intervener. The duty to render assistance imposed by the criminal law does not provide the helper with authority to intervene which is independent of the principal's will. Correspondingly the duty to act does not exist, or ceases to exist, when the principal rejects assistance as unwanted.

C. Acting under another authority (sub-paragraph (b))

General. The second of the "negative" conditions for a justified benevolent intervention in another's affairs is the requirement that the acting party must not be authorised in relation to the benefited party to do the act in question independently of the latter's consent. This is the case where the authority to act stems from rules outside the law of benevolent intervention. Where there are such special grounds justifying intervention, there will also be as a rule an independent – and in a case of doubt exhaustive – legal regime for the regulation of the rights of the participants. That in itself, however, is not the decisive consideration; what matters is whether either the person acting is entitled to act against the wishes of the person affected or, as the case may be, the person acting is the one who generates the affected person's legally binding will. In either case one is concerned with an authorisation for a person to interfere in the legal position of another; that circumstance precludes a benevolent intervention relationship from arising between them.

Examples in private law. Examples include a guardian in relation to a ward, parents in relation to their children, or the governing organs within a legal person in relation to the legal person itself. In relation to particular acts undertaken these persons will often also fall under the rule in sub-paragraph (a); that is the case when they are fulfilling their existing (statutory) obligations in relation to the other person. However, even when that is not the case, by virtue of sub-paragraph (b) they still do not act in relation to that person as interveners. Furthermore, a neighbour who is granted power by property law rules to lop overhanging branches encroaching from neighbouring land or to clean shared drains against the wishes of a co-owner does not act as a benevolent intervener. The same holds where a tenant exercises a power under the tenancy agreement to carry out necessary repairs at the landlord's expense and without the landlord's consent in the particularly pressing circumstances envisaged by the contract.

Authority to act under public law. The situation is similar where someone is entitled to intervene under public law (a public fire service, the police etc.). The intervention of such services for the maintenance of public safety and order is referable to a special legal basis; it does not constitute a benevolent intervention in another's affairs. As a general point and for the avoidance of misunderstanding, it should be reiterated here that the draft only engages with questions of private law and does not address problems of reimbursement of costs or any other similar issue arising from the exercise of powers under public law. The power of an authority to intervene is of course an essential feature in the make up of a state or public prerogative.

Illustration 4
Other road users are obliged to stop when instructed to do so by a school crossing patrol; the patrol does not act as a benevolent intervener in relation to the children or the other road users.

Illustration 5
While a cattle truck is being unloaded a bull breaks free and escapes on to a dual carriageway, where it is shot by a police officer. The officer suffers trauma as a result of the blast. This does not confer a right to compensation from the cattle dealer under V.–3:103 (Right to reparation) in conjunction with V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty); the officer was authorised under public law – independently of the cattle-dealer's consent – to shoot the animal in order to protect road users from the danger.

Illustration 6
On the other hand, someone who at the invitation of the revenue service informs on tax dodgers in return for a 'bounty' acts without special authority in making investigations and passing on details to the tax authorities. The informer acts outside the field of public law and is not a benevolent intervener (and thus cannot recover costs from the tax authorities) only because acting predominantly in pursuit of his or her own interests – namely for the purpose of earning the reward on offer.

"Independently of the principal's consent". As already mentioned, there is no benevolent intervention if the party acting does not depend on the consent of the principal for intervention in the principal's affairs and instead acts by virtue of his or her own authority. An express consent of the principal, on the other hand, excludes the application of the rules on benevolent intervention only if as a result a contract is concluded between the intervener and the principal (see Comment B above). Taken by itself, the consent of the principal does not constitute an authorisation because it can be revoked at any time prior to carrying out the measure in question. Moreover, no other outcome would be possible here because the whole idea of benevolent intervention is to protect the active party who is entitled to set forth to comply with the assumed wishes of the other party. If those wishes are in fact complied with, that is obviously no reason to deny a benevolent intervention in that other's affairs.

Illustration 7
Following a road accident abroad, the holder of a third party insurance policy is arrested. At the insured person's pressing request the insurance company puts up the bail, although both parties know that according to the contract of insurance it is not obliged to do so. It is also clear to both sides that the insurance company has provided this additional service as a goodwill gesture. The insurance company acts as a benevolent intervener. It would not be correct to seek to deny the company that status on the basis that it had been "authorised to act". The insurance company's authority depends solely on the principal's consent.

D. Performing an obligation towards a third party (sub-paragraph (c))

Significance. Someone who by intervening performs an obligation imposed under private law does not act as intervener even if the other requirements of paragraph (1) are satisfied. In practice, however, it will seldom be the case that an intervention fails to qualify as a benevolent intervention for this reason alone. The intervention will often be excluded from the law of benevolent intervention due to the basic requirements of V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another), e. g. because performances which are rendered for the purpose of performing a (real or imagined) obligation are normally not undertaken with the intention predominantly of benefiting another. In particular, it follows from this that those who mistakenly assume that in acting they are performing a contractual obligation do not come under the regime of benevolent intervention in another's affairs; they must seek recompense instead within the law of unjustified enrichment.

Scope of application. Even if the requirements of V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) are met as between the intervener and the benefited party, where the intervener is obliged to a third party to undertake the act done (the typical case involving a contractual obligation) the intervener is not to be regarded as a benevolent intervener in relation to the party benefited. In such cases there is neither need nor sufficient ground for the creation of an intervener-principal relationship: the party acting (the 'intervener') is entitled only to look to the relationship with the contractual partner. A frequent case is where someone is commissioned to undertake repairs for the benefited party. (It is immaterial in that respect whether or not the person commissioning the repairs acts as a benevolent intervener in relation to the party benefited). In such situations it is occasionally the case that the person commissioned acts in relation to the party benefited with the intention of furthering the latter's interests – when (among other things) the contract is not the motive for intervening. It is the purpose of sub-paragraph (c) to clarify that in those instances too there is no benevolent intervention.

Illustration 8
R is commissioned by a landlord L to carry out repairs in the apartment let to the tenant T and carries these out. L is not a benevolent intervener in relation to T because L acts in relation to T in discharge of L's obligations as landlord and is thus authorised to act. R in turn is also not a benevolent intervener, either in relation to L because of the priority of the law of contract or in relation to T because of sub-paragraph (c). The latter provision is necessary for the case where R acts under contract to L, but would have been willing to intervene even if not commissioned by L (e. g. because R and T are neighbours on very good terms) and thus acted all along with a predominant intention to benefit T. (If, depending on the application of the rules on stipulations in favour of third parties (see II.–9:301 (Basic rules) paragraph 1), L and R concluded a contract for T's benefit, then R is no benevolent intervener in relation to T because of V.–1:103(b)). If R carries out the repairs badly, R is liable under the contract to L (and, as the case may be, to T); but there is no liability to either L or T under the law of benevolent intervention.

Illustration 9
A charitable organisation concludes a contract with a public authority whereby the charity is obliged to carry out certain rescue services for which the public authority, for its part, carries the cost. The charitable organisation in performing these services does not act as a benevolent intervener in relation to the persons rescued.

Demarcation. One should not confuse with this situation cases in which a benevolent intervener performs obligations incurred as a representative acting for the principal in benevolent intervention.

Illustration 10
The facts are the same as in Illustration 8, except that L is not the landlord of T but rather another friend of T who commissions R to deal with a broken pipe in T's apartment. L's act of commissioning R is in this case a benevolent intervention by L in T's affairs. The payment of R's bill by L remains a benevolent intervention in relation to T, unaffected by the circumstance that L is contractually under an obligation to R to pay: that obligation is merely the consequence of the intervention undertaken by L. It is not merely that L has a claim against T for reimbursement of expenditure. It is also the case that (so far as this is reasonable in the circumstances) L must inform T that the debt to R will become due and give T the chance to pay R directly.

Precise analysis of the contractual obligation. What matters is whether the person acting is contractually obliged to a third party in regard to the activity undertaken. Such cases may call for close scrutiny of the contract between the person acting and the third party in order to determine whether the actor is or is not actually under an obligation to perform the act which benefits another.

Illustration 11
A ship's doctor attends to a suffering passenger who has lost consciousness. If the doctor has undertaken to the shipping company to provide medical services to passengers (most probably in return for a fee), then it is not the doctor but rather the shipping company, with its employment of or arrangement with the doctor, which acts as benevolent intervener in relation to the patient. (This is assuming that the situation ought not rather to be analysed on the basis that the company for its part is merely discharging a contractual obligation to the passenger – in which case, there would be no benevolent intervener at all.) On the other hand, if the doctor has merely agreed to be "on call" (e. g. because the shipping company merely wished to preclude any potential non-contractual liability to a passenger which might result if the passenger fell ill and no medical assistance was available on board ship), the doctor performs his or her contractual obligation by being on the ship and accessible to those in medical need. Actual provision of medical treatment to any particular passenger who needs the doctor's assistance will exceed the doctor's contractual obligation to the shipping company.

No limitation to contractual obligations. The provision in sub-paragraph (c), however, is not limited to the discharge of contractual obligations incurred to third parties. It will also cover the performance of subsisting obligations to third parties arising under statute or by operation of law. V.–1:103(c), however, does not touch upon acts which are conducted in discharge of a duty under public law.

Illustration 12
A married person who complies with a subsisting statutory obligation owed to the other spouse to contribute to the maintenance of stepchildren (i.e. to the spouse's children living in the same household) is not a benevolent intervener in relation to the children in making that contribution.

Illustration 13
I and P are co-owners of a joint gable wall which is in danger of collapsing. A supervisory authority for buildings orders I to pull down the wall on grounds of public safety. I may claim from P a proportionate contribution in respect of the costs: P cannot veto the demolition of the wall due to V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty), and I does not act in compliance with an obligation to a third party arising under private law.

NOTES

I. The precedence of contract law

1. The precedence of contract law over the law of benevolent intervention is recognised in all legal systems of the Member States of the European Union. Under GERMAN law the intervener must not have been entrusted with authority by the principal nor otherwise be entitled to act (CC § 677); from this point of view the rules on benevolent intervention are subsidiary (Medicus, Schuldrecht II BT[12], no. 622). The only point of dispute in this respect is the situation of an intervener acting under a void contract for services (cf. on this point Note V under V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another)) or where an authority conferred by contract is exceeded (for details see inter alia MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 677 no. 42; Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 677 no. 17; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 677, no. 11 and § 713 no. 11). Recent case law has dealt with such cases exclusively on the basis of a breach of contractual duty (see for example BGH 11 January 1988, DB 1988, 1377: the managing director of a company does not act without authority if he exceeds his competence; in this case no room remains for the application of the law of benevolent intervention; for the former approach to the contrary see RG 22 October 1938, RGZ 158, 302, 312 and BGH 7 January 1963, BGHZ 39, 1).

2. It is inferred from the requirement of 'without mandate' in GREEK CC art. 730 that managements of another's affair which find their basis in an already existing legal relationship do not come within the scope of application of the law of benevolent intervention. As in German law the term 'mandate' is not to be understood here in its technical meaning. Rather it indicates that there is no justification for or duty of the intervener to manage another's affair (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 20). The same holds true for ESTONIAN LOA § 1018 (1) ("without being granted the right or obligated by the principal"), POLISH CC art. 752 ("without mandate") and HUNGARIAN CC § 484 ("without being authorised by mandate or otherwise"). According to Hungarian case law an intervention without authority may therefore only arise where the intervener provides more than he was contractually obliged to or continues to act on another's behalf after discharging his contractual duties (Legf.Bir. no. 564/1999, Bírósági Határozatok [Court Decisions] no. 12/1999). Under PORTUGUESE law the precedence of contract law is derived from CC art. 464: the intervention must have taken place without 'authorisation'. Should the intervention be founded on a contract, it will be left to contract law alone to decide on the rights and obligations of the participants (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 66 [1957] 102-103). The concept of 'convention d´assistance' is as foreign to Portuguese law as it is to German law.

3. Under AUSTRIAN CC § 1035 only an 'act without authority' can give rise to a benevolent intervention. 'Authority' may be conferred by a contract, a court order or by statute (for details see Meissel, GoA, 72 et seq. and Fötschl, ERPL 2002, 550, 562 (fn. 67)). A contractual agreement between principal and intervener consequently precludes the application of the law of benevolent intervention; contract law has priority. The scope of the contractual duties is to be determined by construction of the contractual agreement (OGH 25 April 1963, SZ 36/68; Gschnitzer, Schuldrecht BT[2], 279). For instance, the operator of an Austrian hospital had no claim for reimbursement in a case where, because of its own shortage of resources to deal with the case itself, it flew a newly born child to a clinic in Zürich for treatment there: under Austrian social insurance law the parents had concluded a contract with the hospital and according to the terms of that contract no counter-performance was due as quid pro quo for the hospital's services (OGH 29 March 2001, ZVR 2002/36 p. 154). In some rare cases, however, the provisions of the law of benevolent intervention may have an impact on contract law. For example, the OGH applies the provisions of benevolent intervention in the context of determining the amount of compensation of a person who has contractually agreed to keep property in safe custody (OGH 12 November 1997, JBl 1998, 303). If the intervener acts in response to another's request for help, a contract may be concluded, though the emergency situation of the person requesting help calls for particular attention (OGH 13 July 1994, SZ 67/123), both with respect of a possible lack of an intention to be legally bound in the case of non-professional assistance and in the case of professional assistance under the aspect of usury (Rummel [-Krejci], ABGB I³, § 879 no. 218). However, under Austrian law a benevolent intervention may be precluded not only by the existence of a contract but also in the case of a courtesy arrangement which is not legally binding. This follows from CC § 1036 and its requirement of an emergency situation, which may be held to be missing if the intervener had the possibility to obtain the principal's prior consent (OGH 22 November 1984, SZ 57/167; Meissel, GoA, 31). But it is also linked to the converse requirement of CC § 1037 that the intervener has not obtained the consent of the principal. If he has that consent, there is a 'courtesy-relationship' interposing between contract and benevolent intervention. Its legal consequences are yet to be determined and are a matter of academic debate.

4. In SPAIN too the law of benevolent intervention is considered a subsidiary instrument. From CC art. 1888 ("voluntary, without being mandated") or Fuero Nuevo de NAVARRA ley 560, as the case may be, it is inferred that the intervener must neither be obliged to act nor be entitled to do so by reason of some special legal basis (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 101); otherwise the rights and duties of the parties will be determined exclusively by that special legal relationship (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 93). The term 'mandate' in CC art. 1888 is not to be understood as a technical term (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Díez-Picazo], Código Civil II, 1944; Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 252). The demarcation between contractual and extra-contractual rights and obligations is regarded as difficult. An agent may exceed the limitations of the mandate pursuant to CC art. 1715 if he can thereby obtain advantages for the principal beyond those he would have by conduct in conformity with the contract. However, the principal will only be bound by such an act in excess of contractual duty if he ratifies it (CC art. 1727). In this case the rules of benevolent intervention are superseded. Moreover, according to the case law of the Supreme Court they remain inapplicable if ratification is withheld (TS 8 January 1980, RAJ 1980 (1) no. 79 p. 64; TS 19 October 1993, RAJ 1993 (4) no. 7744 p. 9863). The French concept of a convention d´assistance is also completely unknown in Spain.

5. ITALIAN CC art. 2028 only counts subject of the law of benevolent intervention those acts which the intervener is not obliged to conduct, which (as it is often put) the intervener renders 'voluntarily' (Cass. 30 November 1988, no. 6499, Rep. Foro it. 1988, voce "Gestione d´affari", no. 1; Breccia, La gestione di affari[2], 857). If the intervention finds a legal basis in either a contract or by operation of law itself this will render the law of benevolent intervention inapplicable. Even acts which are conducted in excess of a mandate (cf. CC art. 1711) do not constitute a benevolent intervention (Cass. 23 January 1953, no. 202, Rep.Giur.it. 1953, voce Appelo civile, no. 128; Cass. 14 July 1954, no. 2471, Rep.Giur.it. 1954, voce Mandato, no. 48-56, voce Obbligazioni e contratti, no. 262). Only where the intervention does not have any connection to the contract concluded by the parties will there be room for the application of benevolent intervention.

6. FRENCH and BELGIAN law as well as MALTESE law (CC art. 1013) require that the intervener has acted 'spontaneously' or as the case may be 'voluntarily'. Accordingly the law of benevolent intervention will not come into consideration if the intervener is obliged to act under a contract or statute (Cass. soc. 11 October 1984, Bull.civ. 1984, V, no. 369 p. 276; Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 218-219). In case of performance beyond the contractual obligations, however, it is held possible to resort to the law of benevolent intervention (le Tourneau, RépDrCiv, VI, v° Gestion d´affaires (2002) no. 37; Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 39 p. 35). French case law, moreover, has held that an act may be characterised as 'spontaneous' or, as the case may be, 'voluntary' with respect to the relationship between intervener and principal, even though the intervener vis-à-vis a third party is under a contractual duty to act (Cass.civ. 24 May 1989, Bull.civ. 1989, I, no. 211 p. 141). A further distinctive feature of French law is the case law on so-called 'contracts for emergency assistance'. These concern the situation where a person has rendered emergency assistance to another without being obliged to do so and has been injured in the course of acting. French courts have granted these rescuers a contractual claim for damages independent of fault against the person who has received the emergency assistance. A contract between the party rendering assistance and the party receiving assistance is held to arise with the term that the party receiving assistance is obliged to compensate the party rendering assistance for any personal injury suffered (leading decision Cass.civ. 27 May 1959, JCP 1959 no. 11187). This concept of a convention d´assistance has had a hostile reception from commentators (Viney, JCP 1998 éd. G, I. 144, no. 7, p. 1096), but the case law adheres to the concept. In Belgium the French example has not been followed, while LUXEMBOURG has adopted the concept of convention d´assistance (CA Luxembourg 27 June 2001, Pas. lux. 2002, 154).

7. DUTCH CC art. 6:198 excludes the relationship of zaakwaarneming if a contractual or statutory relationship already exists between the parties from which the authority to undertake the management of affairs may be derived. Typical examples are the employment contract, contract for services, and contract for work. Medical treatment rendered to unconscious patients in a case of emergency is regulated by CC arts. 7:465 and 466 on contracts governing medical treatment. If someone acts upon the express or implied request of another, it will depend on the circumstances of each case whether or not a contract is held to be concluded. More often than not it will be a spontaneous attendance to another's interests which, as the reaction to a cry for help of a drowning person, will fall under the law of benevolent intervention (for details see Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, note 12. 3).

8. As everywhere else the precedence of contract law over negotiorum gestio is also acknowledged in SCOTLAND. As soon as it is established that the principal was not unaware of the management of the affairs or that the intervener has acted upon a prior expression of intent on the part of the principal then as a first step it will be ascertained whether or not this relationship is governed by a mandate (or an implied mandate, as the case may be) or whether (where the transaction is not gratuitous) a relationship of agency has been established (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law, II[4], Ch. 4. 14, p. 213-218; Marshall, Scots Mercantile Law[3], 31-41).

9. One reason why the law of benevolent intervention lacks a clear-cut concept under SCANDINAVIAN law is that numerous situations are governed by specific regulations, which in turn thrust a general concept aside. Furthermore, the law of contract is granted a broad scope of application with respect to cases on the boundary between contract law and the law of negotiorum gestio discussed here. This in part is achieved by the concept of a 'tacit promise' (see further on such stiltiende løfte under DANISH Law HD 23 October 2000, UfR 2001, 100) and also a consequence of the fact that even mere passivity may lead to the conclusion of a contract pursuant to Scandinavian Contracts Act §§ 4 (2) and 6 (2). A further example for this approach giving precedence to contract law may be found in the SWEDISH Act on Consumer Service Contracts [Konsumenttjänstlagen (1985:716)] § 8 and the FINNISH Consumer Protection Act [Konsumentskyddslag] of 20 January 1978 no. 38 chap. 8 § 6. Both provisions deal with remuneration for additional services rendered which had not been ordered and do so in a way which strongly resembles the general principles of the law of benevolent intervention. The underlying values of benevolent intervention may even be discerned in arbitral awards: these concern remuneration due for preparatory work which had not been ordered, but was necessary for the paintwork which was the subject matter of the service contract, as was pointed out to the principal, although he made no comment on the issue (Andersson/Söderlund, JT 2002-03, 14).

10. In ENGLISH law agency of necessity, like any other form of agency, may or may not be contractual: Petrinovic & Co. Ltd. v. Mission Francaise des Transports des Maritimes (1941) 71 Lloyd's L. Rep 208, 223 (Atkinson J). It is thus no requirement of a valid agency of necessity that the agent act without contractual authority from the principal. Indeed the normal if not invariable case for the application of agency of necessity is where the necessity operates to enlarge or override pre-existing instructions from the principal (i.e. as a buttress to agency of agreement). For this reason an agent of necessity is often regarded as being both authorised and bound to act by reason of the emergency in order to protect the principal's interest: see further Chapter 2, Art. 2:101, Notes IV, 41. However, something of the same distinction arises through the requirement that in his dealings with third parties an agent of necessity must base his authority on the necessity and not on his (superseded) instructions or a purported mandate or another legal relationship altogether: see Jebara v. Ottoman Bank [1927] 2 KB 254, 264 (Bankes LJ), where the bank purported to act in accordance with the terms of the contract, rather than because of necessity not envisaged by the contract, and this was regarded as an additional ground (besides the absence of necessity) for dismissing the claim. Where the claim to recompense of an intervener is based on restitution, that will be excluded if the benefit is provided by the claimant to the defendant on the basis of a subsisting contract: cf. Wentworth v. Tubb (1841) 1 Y & C CC 171, 62 ER 840 at 841-842 (Knight Bruce VC) (in the context of provision of necessaries to a person without contractual capacity); The Solway Prince [1896] P 120, 128 (Jeune P, indicating that were the contract with a the owner instead of a third party there would likewise be no claim on the basis of salvage for the same reason that the matter rested in contract).

II. Contributions between joint debtors

11. A question not easily answered is the impact of the law of benevolent intervention on contributions between joint debtors (for instance joint debtors liable under a contract or liable under tort law) in favour of a joint debtor who has paid the creditor. By discharging the common debt he has also discharged the other joint debtors vis-à-vis the creditor. The prevailing opinion holds the rules on contribution between joint debtors (cf. III.–4:107 (Recourse between solidary debtors) to be an exhaustive special regime which has precedence over benevolent intervention law. The reasons given in favour of this opinion vary, however, and from time to time even the rationale of this approach has been questioned.

12. Under GERMAN Law CC § 426 on contribution between joint debtors not only precludes the application of the law of justified enrichment, but also renders the law of benevolent intervention inapplicable. The justification for this approach is to be found either in the principle that the provisions are leges specialis and thus claim precedence (BGH 4 July 1963, NJW 1963, 2067; Erman [-Ehmann], BGB I[10], § 426, no. 15; Esser and Weyers, Schuldrecht II(2)[8], § 46 V), or in the argument that a joint debtor who renders performance beyond the amount he is obliged to pay according to the relationship inter partes between the joint debtors does not attend to another's affair. From the point of view of the other debtors, the effect is no more than a subrogation of creditors (Medicus, Bürgerliches Recht[19], no. 415).

13. So far as is apparent GREEK legal literature does not discuss the interaction between a joint debtor's right to contribution (CC arts. 487 and 488) and the law of benevolent intervention. However a claim arising from negotiorum gestio seems to be precluded because in such cases the requirement of an animus aliena negotia gerendi is not satisfied. The case law has even held that a person does not attend to another's affair if he discharged the debts of another on the basis of a settlement (CA Athens 2896/1977, NoB 26 [1978] 223).

14. The PORTUGUESE CC provides rules for joint debtors (obrigações solidárias) in arts. 512 et seq. The discharge of the entire debt by one of the joint debtors will satisfy the debts also for all other debtors (CC art. 523). A party who effects payment in excess of the amount he is obliged to bear according to the internal relationship of the joint debtors thereby acquires a direito de regresso vis-à-vis the co-debtors (CC art. 524). This right of recourse has no additional basis in the law of benevolent intervention: it may be doubted at the outset whether the joint debtor who effects payment attends to another's affair with the intention to benefit that other. In any case he acts, so it is said, with autorização (CC art. 464), which will render the law of benevolent intervention inapplicable (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 446). The sole point of discussion in legal literature therefore concerns the question whether or not CC arts. 490 and 497, which contain specific provisions on the contributions inter partes of joint tortfeasors, shall be applied to the particular case of liability of multiple interveners (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 299).

15. Earlier AUSTRIAN case law and doctrine have in part held that the legal basis of the claim for contribution by joint debtors (CC § 896) is to be found in CC § 1041 or in CC §§ 1042 et seq. (Rummel [-Gamerith], ABGB I[3], § 896 no. 1a). However recent case law and legal literature no longer follow this approach; the prevailing view is that the claim for contribution inter partes by the joint debtor who has effected payment to the creditor is an independent right which is exhaustively regulated in CC § 896 (OGH 23 March 1987, SZ 60/55; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I[3], § 1042 no. 8). The law of benevolent intervention cannot apply because the requirement in CC § 1042 of 'expenses incurred for another' is not met: the joint debtor effecting payment is liable for the complete amount. However, CC § 1037 may be considered as far as reimbursement of litigation costs is concerned which one party has incurred as defendant after it has in vain requested the other joint debtor to intervene as a co-defendant in the dispute (OGH 24 November 1997, SZ 70/241); a number of other points of law in the context of the compensable nature of litigation costs as between several joint debtors are yet to be resolved (cf. OGH 26 February 2002, JBl 2002, 658; OGH 18 July 2002, RIS-Justiz RS 0109200 and more generally Pochmarski/Strauss, JBl 2002, 353 and Fötschl, ÖJZ 2004, 781).

16. FRENCH law draws a distinction between a solidarité passive of several debtors and their liability in solidum. A solidarité passive of multiple contract debtors according to CC art. 1202 as a general rule must form part of the agreement with the creditor; it is presumed only in relation to commercial transactions (Flour and Aubert, Le rapport d´obligation[3], no. 313 p. 195). Inter partes the debtors are liable according to their respective share. The debtor who has effected performance can rely on either an action subrogatoire pursuant to CC art. 1251 (3) or an action personnelle for his right of recourse. The latter may find its legal basis either in a mandat (in the case of a contractual solidarité passive) or in the law of gestions d´affaires (in the case the solidarité passive arises by statute: Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations[9], no. 1068 p. 1114-1115; Flour and Aubert, loc.cit. no. 325 p. 218-219). In any case the debtor can only claim payment of the relevant share in relation to each co-debtor (CC art. 1214). Because of CC art. 1202 and the fact that only in rare cases does statute provide for joint liability, legal literature and case law have developed the concept of an obligation in solidum. It plays an important role in the context of tort law. A debtor in solidum is similarly liable for the total amount in damages (Flour and Aubert, loc.cit. nos. 327-328 p. 219-220). A debtor who discharges the full amount may claim reimbursement from the other debtor or debtors, a claim which is usually held to arise under CC art. 1251 (3) (action subrogatoire), though case law has often granted the debtor who has performed an action personnelle which appears to find its legal basis in CC art. 1214 (Flour and Aubert, loc.cit. no 329 p. 221; Cass. civ. 7 June 1977, Bull. civ. 1977, I, no. 266 p. 210). In legal literature, however, the view has also been advanced that an action personnelle of a debtor in solidum against the other co-debtors finds its legal basis, like a solidarité passive, in gestion d´affaires (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[8], no. 1263 p. 1173, with fn. 2). The legal position in BELGIUM is the same. The legal basis for the claim for reimbursement is barely elaborated in more detail. De Page assumes that the joint debtor rendering performance to the creditor may invoke an action de mandat, an action de gestion d´affaires and a claim arising from a subrogation légale pursuant to CC art. 1251 (3) (de Page, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge, Tome 3: Les obligations[3], no. 367 p. 350). Besides the solidarité passive (passieve hoofdelijkheid) the obligation in solidum (verbintenis in solidum) is also recognised in Belgium. A claim for contribution likewise exists between the joint debtors, which is assumed to find its legal basis either in CC arts. 1382-1383 (tort law) or a subrogation légale (wettelijke subrogatie) under CC art. 1251 (3) (Cornelis, Algemene theorie van de verbintenis, no. 135 p. 171-172).

17. It would appear that the relationship between derecho de regreso pursuant to CC art. 1145 (2) and the law of benevolent intervention under SPANISH law is only discussed by Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[4], 215. He considers that the law of benevolent intervention is inapplicable for the reason that the joint debtor who discharges the entire debt acts in his own interest, namely to free himself from a liability. Thus the condition of an animus aliena negotia gerendi is not met. The right of contribution finds its underlying justification in a specific emanation of principles relating to unjustified enrichment, an interpretation which unsurprisingly is a matter of dispute (for further details see Puig Brutau, Compendio II[2], 43; Albaladejo, Derecho Civil II (1)[10], 97; Lacruz Berdejo, Elementos II (1), 45). As regards joint creditors, as a gestión del crédito under CC art. 1141 a joint creditor may undertake acts which are advantageous for all creditors but none that result in detriment to the other creditors. The statute (it is construed) presumes a tacit mandate between the joint creditors (Lacruz Berdejo, loc.cit. 46).

18. A joint debtor who discharges the entire debt will also not be considered as a benevolent intervener acting in the interest of the other debtors under ITALIAN law. This is explained on the basis that the joint debtor does not act voluntarily (Rescigno, Codice civile, sub art. 2028). Similarly DUTCH case law does not rely on the law of benevolent intervention for the claim for contribution of one joint debtor against the other debtors. The matter rests with a claim for compensation under CC art. 6:8 ascribed to the principle of good faith. The application of the law of negotiorum gestio is likewise excluded in SCOTLAND; it would appear this issue is not even a matter for discussion.

19. In contrast to the legal situation under Belgian and French law, multiple debtors in SCANDINAVIA will as a general rule be jointly and severally liable. This principle is derived inter alia from the Promissory Notes Act (which on this point is held to be a suitable basis for generalisation) (cf. for SWEDEN the Promissory Notes Act § 2 and Mellqvist and Persson, Fordran och skuld[6], 51 and 60). The joint debtor effecting payment has a claim for contribution in the amount of the relevant share against each joint debtor (para (2); for details see Håstad, Tjänster utan updrag, 110). No room is left for an independent claim for compensation arising from the law of benevolent intervention; it is not even discussed in extraordinary cases concerning contribution (compare for instance HD 29 December 2000, NJA 2000, 773).

20. Contribution as between co-debtors in the COMMON LAW, though forming part of the law of restitution, is not regarded as a matter of necessitous intervention. For details of the governing common law, equitable and statutory rules, see Goff and Jones, Restitution[6], Ch. 14.

III. Statutory duties to provide help

21. In many Member States of the European Union it is a punishable offence not to render assistance to someone whose life or physical integrity is endangered, if such assistance could be rendered without suffering any significant disadvantage. The question arises whether or not the person who discharges this duty to provide help will still come within the scope of benevolent intervention. This draft as a general rule answers this question (see above comment B11) in the affirmative. This accords with the legal position in GERMANY (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 677, no. 11), GREECE (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I/2, 197), PORTUGAL (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 201; Vieira Gomes, Gestão de negócios, 82), AUSTRIA (OGH 24 August 1995, SZ 68/142; cf. on the duty of a vet to provide aid arising out of the professional code of conduct OGH 18 June 1997, SZ 70/113) and THE NETHERLANDS (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 792; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 297, p. 311-312; Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, no. 13; T & C Vermogensrecht [-Hijma], Art. 6:198, no. 2).

22. By contrast in SPAIN it is assumed that acts which are undertaken to fulfil a duty to provide aid arising under criminal law (Spanish CP art. 195) are not performed 'voluntarily' and are therefore outside the scope of benevolent intervention. However, it is acknowledged that this outcome may contradict the rationale of the regime since the prerequisite of CP art. 195 is a 'manifest and serious danger' (peligro manifiesto y grave) while CC art. 1893 confers a claim for compensation of costs incurred and damages suffered on a person who renders assistance in a case of 'impending obvious danger' (perjuicio inminente y manifiesto). The latter is granted even if the action undertaken does not result in any benefit to the person threatened by danger. The problem is assumed to be resolved on the basis that if a saviour has suffered damage, that fact of damage indicates that he could not have acted without accepting a risk (which in turn is a requirement of the duty under CP art. 195); hence the rescuer remains within the scope of benevolent intervention (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 104). The prevailing view in ITALY likewise seems to hold that acts which fulfil a duty to provide help arising under criminal law (Italian CP art. 593) are not undertaken 'voluntarily' and therefore do not constitute an act of benevolent intervention without authority (Sirena, Gestione di affari, 162-163). Only if a person exerts himself beyond the extent demanded by criminal law will a benevolent intervention according to private law rules be constituted (Bianca, Diritto civile, V, La responsabilità, 669). To date there appears to be no case law on this question.

23. A line of argument similar to that in Spain may also be found in FRANCE. French legal literature points towards the fact that so far no claim arising from benevolent intervention has failed because the action was underpinned by a duty to provide help arising from criminal law. This may be explained by the fact that the duty to provide help under criminal law never obliges a person to put himself at risk of bodily injury, while it is exactly such cases which have been adjudicated upon by the courts (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10 no. 57). By contrast BELGIAN legal literature does distinguish between a statutory obligation générale and a statutory obligation spécifique. The duty to provide help arising under criminal law (Belgian CP art. 422) merely represents an obligation générale which concerns all citizens and whose main feature is precisely that it does not preclude the application of benevolent intervention (Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 219-220). The opposite is true of an obligation spécifique – for instance where a fire brigade in discharge of its statutory duty extinguishes a fire (CFI (commercial matters) Antwerp 30 June 1998, JPA 1998, 342).

24. In ENGLAND AND WALES this issue is of limited magnitude. That is because a failure to render aid to someone in peril is only exceptionally subject to sanctions under the criminal law: Stone, Offences against the Person, p. 16 (reciting the example of a passer-by not assisting a drowning man). Where a by-stander is not himself the cause of the danger, an omission to act can form the actus reus of a criminal offence only if there is a specific duty to intervene; there are no general duties imposed on citizens to act: see Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law[3], 48. Where there is neither a contractual duty to act nor a duty to act implied by law, non-feasance will not give rise to criminal liability: see R. v. Smith (1826) 2 Car & P 449 at 457, 172 ER 203 at 207 (Burrough J) (where the accused failed to provide their mentally handicapped brother with adequate warmth, food, and other necessaries, but an indictment was unsupportable because the siblings were not obliged to care for their brother); R. v. Shepherd (1862) Le & Ca 147, 169 ER 1340 (where the accused failed to call a midwife to attend her eighteen year old daughter, who died in labour, but conviction for manslaughter was quashed) – which cases, however, would be decided differently now precisely on the ground that an implied duty to act existed. Duties to intervene are often imposed by law for the furtherance of public law functions. An example is the criminal law duty of a citizen to comply with a constable's reasonable request to assist him in the execution of his duties in quelling a breach of the peace (R. v. Brown (1841) Car & M 314, 174 ER 522 (Alderson B); R. v. Sherlock (1865-72) LR 1 CCR 20), the discharge of which might operate to the benefit of a victim of physical attack or threats, but the ambit of this "uncertain" common law criminal liability does not as such extend to a duty to assist the police in rescuing those in peril (see Nicholdson, Crim LR 1992, 611, 612). A further case is the duty of a water undertaker under the Water Industry Act 1991, s. 57(1), to allow water to be taken for extinguishing fires. Criminal law duties to act also arise in relation to children: a parent has a duty to act for the welfare of his child and may be criminally liable at common law if the child suffers harm because of a failure to act: R. v. Bubb (1850) 4 Cox CC 455, 460 (where the father was acquitted); R. v. Gibbins & Proctor (1918) 13 Cr App Rep 134 (father's conviction for murder by neglect in starving his daughter to death upheld). At common law, any other person who fails to discharge a duty (contractual or otherwise) to provide necessaries such as food, clothing and lodging to a child of tender years (i.e., under sixteen years of age: R. v. Sloane (1851) 15 JP 22) who is under that person's control and unable to fend for himself or herself, so as to injure that child, commits an offence: see R. v. Ridley (1811) 2 Camp 650 at 652-653, 170 ER 1282 at 1283 (Lawrence J) (concerning a child servant, but where the indictment was defective); R. v. Friend (1802) Russ & Ry 20, 168 ER 662 (failure to provide apprentice with necessaries); R. v. Bubb, loc. cit., 459 (where the duty of the cohabitee of the child's father was self-imposed) and see also R. v. Lee & Parkes (1917) 13 Cr App Rep 39 (where the conviction for manslaughter of a midwife, engaged to nurse an infant for whom she neglected to summon medical aid, was upheld). The common law principles in relation to children are given statutory effect in provisions stipulating that any person who has the custody, charge or care of a person under sixteen may commit an offence if the child is neglected or abandoned: see the Children and Young Person's Act 1933, s. 1, and see also the Offences against the Person Act 1861, s. 27 (for children under two). A general duty to act for the welfare of a person unable to fend for himself is imposed on a stranger under the criminal law only where that stranger has already assumed responsibility for the welfare of that other (whether expressly or impliedly, contractually or otherwise): see R. v. Marriott (1838) 8 Car & P 425 at 433, 173 ER 559 at 563 (Patteson J); R. v. Bubb, loc. cit., 459 (Williams J) (cohabitee convicted of manslaughter by neglect of partner's child); R. v. Instan [1893] 1 QB 450 (where the accused neglected to feed and procure medical assistance for an aunt who was immobilised by gangrene and with whom she resided); R. v. Gibbins and Proctor, loc. cit., 139 (Darling J, giving the opinion of the CCA) (where a cohabitee's conviction for murder in deliberately withholding food and medical care from her partner's daughter was upheld); Stone, Offences against the Person, p. 18. See also the National Assistance Act 1948, s. 51 (failure to maintain a person who is provided as a result with accommodation by a local authority). All such offences presuppose a pre-existing relationship or involvement with the vulnerable person. In SCOTLAND a failure to render aid is likewise not as a rule punishable under criminal law; an offence will only be committed if there is a particularly close relationship between the victim and the person who fails to act (such as a family tie) (cf. Stair [-Christie], Vol. 7, Criminal Law, para 40); therefore the problem treated above does not arise. This corresponds with the legal position under SWEDISH law (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 60 and 138). In DENMARK (CP § 253 [Straffelov], promulgation of 6. September 2000 Nr. 849) and in FINLAND (CP chap. 21 § 15 [Strafflag] of 19. December 1889) the failure to provide aid is punishable, but discussions on the relationship between this offence and the law of negotiorum gestio are nowhere to be found.

IV. Other powers of intervention

25. For most legal systems of the European Union a matter is outwith the scope of benevolent intervention if the active party is entitled by some other legal authority (i.e., other than under a contract) to interfere with the affairs of another. Statutory powers to intervene recognised in GERMANY include, for instance, guardianship, curatorship, parental authority, administration in bankruptcy, position as executive of a legal person, and sovereign powers (MünchKomm [-Seiler]^{3}, § 677 BGB no. 36). It is similarly held in GREECE that a justification displacing the law of negotiorum gestio may arise from statute law. Guardianship, parenthood and administration in bankruptcy are mentioned as examples (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolau], Art. 730, no. 20; ErmAK [-Sakketas], Art. 730, no. 25). In PORTUGAL reference is made to the existence of a power of representation (CC arts. 262 et seq.), parental authority (poder paternal – CC arts. 1877 et seq.) and guardianship (tutela – CC arts. 1927 et seq.). In addition, according to STJ 8 July 1997, CJ(ST) V. (1997-2) 144 explicit consent of the person whose affairs are interfered constitutes an autorização and thus displaces the law of benevolent intervention; in such cases only unjustified enrichment law is held to be applicable. For DUTCH Law the standard examples or parental authority, guardianship and administration in bankruptcy are again taken as illustrations of statutory powers which render the law of benevolent intervention inapplicable (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 791-792; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III^{10}, no. 296-297, p. 310-312).

26. As mentioned above, a 'power' to interfere with the affairs of another precluding benevolent intervention under AUSTRIAN law may arise not only from contract but also from a statutory provision or a court decision (CC § 1034). The appointment of a curator by the court (CC § 273) or parental authority by operation of law (CC § 144) may serve as examples (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^{2}, §§ 1035 no. 4). Likewise the law of benevolent intervention will not apply if a public authority acts within its competences (OGH 11 February 1953, SZ 26/35); this does of course not exclude public law from adopting some of the underlying thinking contained in the law of benevolent intervention (OGH 21 March 1999, SZ 72/47).

27. By contrast under FRENCH Law it is not the existence of a power to interfere but only the existence of a duty to interfere which will be decisive. However, this different nuance will only rarely lead to a different outcome. The execution of a power (fonction) in accordance with the statutory provisions is said not to preclude benevolent intervention. If the active party exceeds the duty imposed on him by law, that is if he renders performance in excess of the obligation légale then this leaves room for benevolent intervention (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, V° Quasi-Contrats. Gestion d´affaires – Conditions d´existence, Fasc. 10 no. 58-60). The same holds true for BELGIUM, where again it is not the existence of a power but the existence or non-existence of a duty to act which will be decisive: see for instance CFI (in commercial matters) Antwerp 30 June 1998, JPA 1998, 342 and CA Brussels 7 February 1964, Pas. belge 1965, II, 70). For both countries it is therefore true that the existence of the active party's power to intervene will only preclude the application of benevolent intervention if this right coincides with a contractual or statutory duty to intervene. The mere fact that the principal was present during the intervention and has agreed to its execution does not necessarily preclude the existence of benevolent intervention (CA Paris 14 October 1997, Juris Data 1997-023144).

28. Under SPANISH law the rules of benevolent intervention are displaced if the active party is entitled to representation (TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 322 p. 198); the phrase 'without authority' also includes 'without authority to represent' (Albaladejo, Derecho civil II (2), 495). Any kind of entitlement, whether derived from the wishes of the principal or from operation of law is assumed to exclude the law of benevolent intervention (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 252). Similarly a benevolent intervention cannot come into existence under ITALIAN Law if a (non-contractual) legal relationship between the parties already subsists (Cass. 30 November 1988, no. 6499, Rep.Giur.it. 1988, voce Gestione d´affari, no. 1). Hence, for example, a father who manages the assets of his son will not qualify as an intervener without authority (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 4).

29. As regards SWEDISH law Håstad, Tjänster utan updrag, 53, indicates that as a general rule a gestor may not be granted more power than a custodian appointed by court would obtain. Departing from the former legal position, recent amendments ensure a custodian can be granted authority with respect to personal (i.e. non-economic) interests of the person under curatorship, cf. HD 4 November 1999, NJA 1999, 691. The custodian himself, however, is not an intervener without authority. The same applies, for example, for the administrator which may be appointed by the court pursuant to FINNISH Debt Enforcement Act [utsökningslag] of 3 December 1895 chap. 4 § 25 in order to prevent dilapidation of the debtor's immovable property.

30. In ENGLISH LAW countless statutory regimes confer on a public authority a power or duty to intervene for necessary reasons and a right to recoup the expenses incurred from the beneficiary of that conduct or a person who was obliged to act. So, for example, a local authority in whose area a person has died or a dead body is found is under a statutory duty to make arrangements for disposal of the body if it appears to the authority that no such suitable arrangements are being made (see Chapter 1, Art. 1:102, Notes, II, 16) and a local authority has a statutory power to bury or cremate a deceased person whom that authority was providing with accommodation under social assistance legislation (Public Health (Control of Disease) Act 1984, s. 46(2)) or if the deceased is a child whom the authority was looking after (Children Act 1989, Schedule 2, para. 20, replacing the Child Care Act 1980, s. 25). However, the latter power by contrast is exercisable only with the consent "so far as it is reasonably practicable to obtain it" of every person who has personal responsibility for the child (para. 20(1)(c)). The duty and power to intervene under the 1984 Act are additional to those arising at common law (set out in Chapter 1, Art. 1:102, Notes, II, 16): see s. 72 of that Act. Where an authority discharges the statutory duty or makes use of the statutory power under the 1984 Act, it may recover the expenses incurred as a civil debt from the deceased person's estate or from any person whom the relevant legislation regards as having been liable to maintain to the deceased (ibid, s. 46(5),(6)), namely a spouse or (if the deceased is under 16) parent of the deceased (National Assistance Act 1948, s. 42 (read in conjunction with s. 64(1)). An authority may similarly recover as a civil debt from a parent of a deceased child who died aged under sixteen and was buried or cremated by the authority the expenses it has incurred in exercising its power: para. 20(4) of Sch. 2 of the 1989 Act. Subject to exceptions, a local authority is under a statutory duty to provide accommodation for a person who refuses or neglects to maintain himself and as a result needs care and attention not otherwise available to them (National Assistance Act 1948, s. 21) and to recover some or all of the cost (s. 22). Where, in that person's own interests or in order to prevent injury to health or a serious nuisance to others, a court orders a person to be detained in accommodation (other than a NHS hospital) because of that person's disease, infirmity, or the like, coupled with their inability to devote to themselves the proper care and attention which they are not receiving from others, the local authority (who in such circumstances is primarily liable to maintain the person: s. 47(8)) may recover costs from that person, or someone liable under social assistance legislation to maintain that person: ibid, s. 47(9). Equally, where a person is admitted to hospital, or moved into local authority accommodation (or other accommodation under the power in s. 47), the council may recover from that person, or someone liable under social assistance legislation to maintain that person, the cost of any reasonable expenses incurred in discharging its duty to take reasonable steps to prevent or mitigate loss or damage to movable property of that person as a result of their inability to protect or deal with it: ibid, s. 48. A local authority has power to cleanse and disinfect premises in order to prevent the spread of infectious disease if the occupier fails to take required steps and to recover from the occupier as a "simple contract debt" expenses reasonably incurred: Public Health (Control of Disease) Act 1984, s. 31. Where there is an authority to act, a restitutionary claim is as a rule not envisaged – not least because it may be assumed that in conferring power to intervene the legislature or a court will also address issues of compensation and costs: cf. Wentworth v. Tubb (1841) 1 Y & C CC 171 at 173-174, 62 ER 840 at 841-842 (Knight Bruce VC) (provider of necessaries to a person without contractual capacity must not be acting under a court order); Pontypridd Union v. Drew [1927] 1 KB 214, 219 (Scrutton LJ) (no right to repayment could be implied by law where the guardians acted under a statutory duty to afford relief, which prima facie negatives any condition for repayment). Conversely, the fact that the intervener is a public body is not precluded from relying on a common law claim to restitution if there is no statutory authority: cf. West Ham Union v. Pearson (1890) 62 LT (N. S.) 638 (reimbursement of cost of accommodation and supervision of a violent and dangerous alcoholic suffering from delirium tremens and incapable of protecting himself – though not, under menthol health legislation in force at the time, regarded as suffering from a mental illness so as to come within statutory rules). Powers to manage the property and affairs of a person suffering from mental incapacity, or to make arrangements affecting that person's welfare, may be granted in advance of mental decline under a 'lasting power of attorney' or are conferred by court order under a statutory regime: see the Mental Capacity Act 2005, which, when it comes into force, will supersede the Enduring Powers of Attorney Act 1985 and the statutory regime under the Mental Health Act 1983, Part VII. Under the Animals Act 1971, s. 7(2), the occupier of land on to which livestock strays has a circumscribed right to detain it. The Act further provides for (i) a right to reimbursement of expenses reasonably incurred in keeping the livestock while it cannot be restored to its owner (s. 4(1)(b)), (ii) if the livestock is unclaimed after 14 days, a right of sale at a market or public auction (s. 7(4)), and (iii) a liability for damage caused by failure to treat the detained livestock with reasonable care or to supply it with adequate food and water (s. 7(6)). In SCOTLAND there is likewise a statutory right to detain an animal which has strayed on to any land: see the Animals (Scotland) Act 1987, s. 3(1). In such a case (other than in relation to stray dogs) the rules on rewards and disposal of the property set out in Part VI of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 on lost and abandoned property apply. Under the Roads (Scotland) Act 1984, the roads authority or police may detain an animal straying on the road: s. 98(1). Payment of the authority's reasonable expenses in acting is a condition of the owner's right of recovery unless the owner took all reasonable care to ensure the animal did not stray onto the road: s. 98(2). The authority may sell or dispose of the animal to recoup its expenses if they are not paid within three days: s. 98(3).

V. Acts done to discharge an obligation to a third party

31. A further issue is whether a benevolent intervention without authority is possible where the active party has done what that party was obliged to do under a contractual or statutory duty toward a third party. According to the prevailing view in GERMANY the application of the rules on benevolent intervention remains possible where it can be discerned that the intervener also intends to act for the principal (MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 677, no. 9). However recent case law notably inclines towards the basic position of the present rules. On that view a claim arising from benevolent intervention will be excluded if the issue of remuneration is comprehensively provided for in the contract concluded with the third party (BGH 21 October 2003, NJW-RR 2004, 81). BGH 15 April 2004, NJW-RR 2004, 956 asserts that "a claim against the 'principal' … will be outside the scope of consideration if the duty the 'intervener' has discharged arises under a contract validly concluded which lays down the rights and obligations of the 'intervener' and in particular includes the issue of remuneration".

32. In GREEK law it is emphasised that in general only authority or duty vis-à-vis the principal will render the rules on benevolent intervention inapplicable. A duty of the intervener owed to a third party does not constitute a mandate within the meaning of CC art. 730 (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 24), though in such cases as a rule the basic requirement that the act is undertaken with the intention to benefit another will not be satisfied (Papanikolaou, loc.cit.). As a result the legal situation in Greece is also along the lines of these Principles.

33. As regards PORTUGUESE law it may again be assumed that acts which are undertaken in order to discharge an existing duty owed to a third party will not qualify as benevolent intervention (Vieira Gomes, Gestão de negócios, 73-79). The legal relationship between the parties is governed by the provisions on contracts in favour of a third party (contrato a favor de terceiro; CC arts. 443-451). The existence of a contractual relationship between the intervener and a third party under AUSTRIAN Law likewise excludes the application of benevolent intervention in relation to the act performed. One and the same act cannot qualify both as the discharge of a contractual duty to a third party and as a benevolent intervention for the benefit of the principal (Meissel, GoA, 75; OGH 15 December 1954, EvBl 1955/134, RIS-Justiz RS 0019765).

34. By contrast the FRENCH Cour de cassation has held that an act may be 'spontaneous' and 'voluntary' as regards the relationship between intervener and principal although the intervener was under a contractual duty to a third party to do the act undertaken (Cass.civ. 24 May 1989, Bull.civ. 1989, I, no. 211 p. 141). By contrast, in BELGIUM scholarly commentators seem to incline towards the view that benevolent intervention cannot apply if the active party has committed itself to that act vis-à-vis a third party. Thus, for example, a company operating a breakdown service which moves a vehicle on instruction by the police cannot rely on the rules of benevolent intervention as against the owner of the vehicle (B. H.Verb. [-Roodhooft] Hdst. V, De quasi-contracten, no. 2231). However, acts in compliance with a statutory duty (vis-à-vis the state) will exclude a benevolent intervention under French law (Cass.civ. 17 July 1996, Bull.Civ. 1996, I, no. 323 p. 225), whereas Belgium, as noted above in note 23, distinguishes between an obligation légale spécifique and an obligation légale générale.

35. This question has hardly even been discussed within SPANISH law. One author expresses the opinion that the application of benevolent intervention is possible where the active party acts in discharge of a contractual obligation vis-à-vis a third party and at the same time acts in the interest of the principal (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 90). TS 23 July 1999, RAJ 1999 (4) no. 6355 p. 9958 has not elaborated further on this point, as the principal in casu had not obtained any benefit from the intervention. According to ITALIAN law a benevolent intervention is in general excluded if the active party is under a duty towards a third party to undertake the acts performed. CA Rome 22 May 2002 (cited by Baralis, Riv.dir.comm. 2004, 211, 223, fn. 17) may well be understood as an affirmation of this traditional approach in the legal literature (which has only rarely been disputed). Certainly benevolent intervention is excluded if the intervener acts on the basis of a contract in favour of the 'principal' (CC art. 1411 (2)) (Sirena, Gestione di affari, 169-170). For DUTCH Law, by contrast, it is again maintained that benevolent intervention will only be excluded where the intervener is obliged vis-à-vis the principal, whether that obligation arises from a contract or a statutory provision, but not merely because he discharges a duty to a third party. A person, for example, who is obliged to his employer under an employment contract to attend to the interests of a third party may 'under certain conditions' be considered a benevolent intervener vis-à-vis the principal (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 792; Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, no. 13. 1).

36. Where two parties contractually agree that one is to attend to the affairs of a third party the view is maintained by some in SCOTLAND that the party obliged also has a direct claim against the benefited party on the basis of negotiorum gestio. This is supposedly the case in particular if someone instructs another to attend to the affairs of the principal. This is on the basis that the person acting is subrogated to the legal position of the original gestor (giving the instruction). In this way the principal retains the defences which he would have had in relation to the original or 'true' gestor (SMT Sales & Services Co. Ltd. v. Motor and General Finance Co. Ltd. 1954 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 107; Stair [-Whitty], vol. 15, para 142; Whitty, JuridRev 1994, 278, 279; see, however, Leslie, SLT 1981, 260, 261).

37. From all the SCANDINAVIAN jurisdictions only two DANISH judgments can be found which deal with a case where a gestor has acted in compliance with a duty arising under public law. That subsisting duty did not exclude a claim against the benefited party for compensation in respect of the expenditure incurred (HD 24 May 1937, UfR 1937, 697 and HD 3 December 1936, UfR 1937, 357).

38. In those exceptional types of case where ENGLISH law is prepared to recognise restitutionary liability towards a stranger who has intervened, it too refuses to sanction a claim for reimbursement or recompense if the expenditure was incurred or service provided on the basis of a contract with a third party: cf. Barnesley v. Powell (1750) Amb 102, 27 ER 63 (Lord Hardwicke LC) (solicitor commissioned by third party to act in respect of person without full capacity must claim remuneration from third party); Wentworth v. Tubb (1841) 1 Y & C CC 171 at 173-174, 62 ER 840 at 841-842 (Knight Bruce VC) (in the context of provision of necessaries to a person without contractual capacity). Thus while a person may have a claim against the deceased's estate for reimbursement of expenditure in arranging the funeral where those obliged to do so have failed to act, a person paying funeral expenses is not automatically a creditor of the estate; if the payment is made at another's order, it is the person who gave the order who is responsible for reimbursement. A claim to reimbursement is not excluded by the mere fact the intervener acted at the request of a third party: Arlot v. Churchland (1828) unreported, cited 3 Y & J 32-33, 148 ER 1081 (action of undertaker acting at request of deceased's solicitor); Rogers v. Price (1829) 3 Y & J 28, 148 ER 1080 (action of undertaker acting at request of testator's brother); Ambrose v. Kerrison (1851) 10 CB 776, 138 ER 307 (request of a friend of the deceased), and consider also Palmer v. Stear (1963) 113 LJ 420 (vet alerted by a third party). If the acceptance of the request amounts to the conclusion of a contract, however, a restitutionary claim against the estate or relatives is apparently excluded: see Rogers v. Price, loc. cit., 35 and 37, where Hullock B emphasises that the claimant was not acting as agent of the deceased's brother, who was merely drawing his attention to the situation, and Vaughan B indicates that if the case were otherwise the claimant would have had no claim against the executor. Whether administration of the estate (entailing the right to payment out of the deceased's estate) will be granted to an undertaker on the basis he is a creditor of the estate will thus depend on whether another authorised the expense; if he has acted on another's order, the undertaker is simply an unsecured creditor of the person ordering the funeral: see In the Goods of Fowler (1852) 16 Jur 894 (Sir J Dodson), considered in Newcombe v. Beloe (1865-69) LR 1 P & D 314, 315 (Sir J P Wilde). The decision in Re Leslie (1883) 23 Ch D 552, where a husband paid the premiums on an insurance policy taken out by his wife, is also explicable on the narrow basis that the husband acted under an obligation to a third party (though the judgment itself only alludes to this point in its conclusion and is largely expressed in broader terms) because the husband had covenanted with trustees of a settlement to pay the premiums. Cf. also Castellain v. Thompson (1862) 13 CB (N.S.) 105, 143 ER 41 (as the claimant had concluded a contract with an insurer to retrieve cargo from the river bed, there could be no salvage type claim against the owner of the cargo), as explained in the similar case The Solway Prince [1896] P 120, 128 (Jeune P), where redress was sought from the owner because the insurer was insolvent. However, where the third party instigating another's intervention is regarded as themselves being an agent of the person benefited, the intervener may have a direct claim against the principal on the basis that the intermediary has exercised their power of representation so as to bind the principal to the intervener: see Chester v. Rolfe (1853) 4 De G.M. & G 798, 43 ER 720 (solicitor able to claim from the estate of the person whom he represented at the instigation of the latter's wife) – and the same reasoning might explain the decision in Brockwell v. Bullock (1889) 22 QBD 567 that the claim for remuneration of a doctor instructed by a solicitor to examine the mental state of his client was wrongly stopped at first instance.

Illustration 3 is taken from OGH 11 November 1987, SZ 60/235; illustration 5 from BGH 13 November 2003, BGHReport 2004, 305; illustration 6 from OGH 4 April 1906, GlUNF 3374; illustration 7 from STJ 8 July 1997, CJ(ST) v (1997-2) 144; illustration 8 (with slightly changed facts) from OGH 15 December 1954, EvBl 1955/134 and from BGH 21 October 2003, NJW-RR 2004, 81; illustration 9 from OGH 10 May 1989, SZ 62/87; and illustration 13 from BGH 15 December 1954, BGHZ 16, 12.

CHAPTER 2: DUTIES OF INTERVENER

V.–2:101: Duties during intervention

(1) During the intervention, the intervener must:

(a) act with reasonable care;

(b) except in relation to a principal within V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty), act in a manner which the intervener knows or can reasonably be expected to assume accords with the principal's wishes; and

(c) so far as possible and reasonable, inform the principal about the intervention and seek the principal's consent to further acts.

(2) The intervention may not be discontinued without good reason.

COMMENTS

A. The duties of the intervener in overview

Duties and obligations. The provisions of the second Chapter of these rules relate to the duties of the intervener to the principal. The subsequent Articles differentiate between the actual phase of intervention (V.–2:101 and V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty) and the period after the conclusion of the intervention (V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention). The word "Duties" in the Chapter heading covers both sets of duties. However, there is a distinction between them. In the first phase the duties are only duties and not obligations. In the second phase the duties are not only duties but also obligations. The difference in the present context lies in the remedies for breach. Remedies for breach of the duties during interventions do not arise unless damage occurs; they are then regulated by V.–2:102. The reason for this is that it would be harsh to impose, for example, an obligation of care on a benevolent intervener and to thereby attract all the remedies for non-performance of an obligation, such as the remedy of enforcing specific performance. A person who has been good enough to intervene in the interests of another but who has not come up to the required standard of care, or who has not done the job as the principal would have wished it to be done, should not, for example, be liable to be forced to do the job again and to do it better the second time. In this situation a mere duty to take care and to act in accordance with the principal's known or assumed wishes, coupled with a carefully tailored liability to make reparation if breach of the duty causes damage, is quite sufficient. On the other hand, once a benevolent intervention has taken place, it is not unreasonable to impose an enforceable obligation on the intervener to account and to hand over any benefits obtained, particularly if the remedies for non-performance are slightly modified to take account of the benevolent nature of the intervention (as is done by V.–2:103 paragraph (3).

Duties during intervention. During the intervention a benevolent intervener (i) is subject to a general duty to act with reasonable care; (ii) must orientate the intervention according to the actual or presumed wishes of the principal; and (iii) is subject to a parallel duty to inform the principal of the intervention and seek the principal's consent to further acts (paragraph (1) (a), (b) and (c) respectively). The last of these duties implies that as soon as the intervener has succeeded in contacting the principal the intervention may be continued only if the principal consents. On the other hand the intervener may not (iv) discontinue the intervention without a reasonable ground. The intervener, in other words, may not discontinue at an inopportune time an intervention which has already begun (paragraph (2)). If breach of one of these duties causes damage then, in certain circumstances, the intervener is liable for reparation but the benevolent nature of the intervention is taken into account in the rules on the assessment of this liability. The intervener may not be burdened with the entire risk of erroneous conduct during the intervention (V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty)).

Obligations after intervention. After conclusion of the act undertaken the benevolent intervener is subject to an obligation (v) to report, (vi) to account and (vii) to deliver up any proceeds (V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention) paragraph (1)). The normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation apply but the fact that the intervener has acted for reasons of human solidarity will have to be taken into account (V.–2:103(2) and (3)).

The second Chapter's scope of application. The second Chapter concerns the duties of the acting party in the phase of carrying out the intervention. It regulates the matter of 'how' another's affairs may be managed without their authority and how this management must be brought to an end, as opposed to 'whether' they may be conducted, which is addressed in V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) and V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty). The application of V.–2:101–V.–2:103 thus presupposes that the requirements of V.–1:101–V.–1:102 are satisfied and that none of the exclusions of V.–1:103 (Exclusions) applies. If one of these requirements is absent or an exclusion applies, then the rights and duties of the parties will be governed exclusively by other areas of the law – in particular, the laws of contract, non-contractual liability for damage and unjustified enrichment.

> Illustration 1
> The facts are the same as in Illustration 9 of V.–1:103 (Exclusions). A staff member of a charitable organisation giving emergency aid to an injured person makes a clinical error. Any liability of the organisation will be under the provisions of the law on non-contractual liability for damage in Book VI. There is no scope for the application of V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty) paragraph (2).

B. The general duty to act with reasonable care (paragraph (1)(a)) General. Interventions for the benefit of another are only useful as a rule if the intervener acts with reasonable care. A person who instructs a joiner to effect an emergency repair in a neighbour's house will have to choose a qualified joiner; a person who attends to a person injured in a traffic accident will have to secure the scene of the accident and in bringing the person to hospital will have to comply with the traffic regulations, etc. The requirements which reasonable care dictates are as manifold as life itself and thus cannot be elaborated in detail. As regards the management of affairs which interfere with interests protected by the law on non-contractual liability for damage recourse may be had to the definition of negligence in VI.–3:102 (Negligence). In accordance with that a definition an intervener may breach the duty of care by omitting to take a precautionary measure. This may occur for instance if the intervener takes valuable goods into custody but fails to take out insurance cover.

Standard of care of professionals. Conduct of a benevolent intervener who is acting in the course of a profession or trade is to be assessed against the standards of care expected of persons in that skilled group. That is in a way merely the flip side of the coin under V.–3:102 (Right to remuneration), which entitles a professional to remuneration. Compare in this context also the Comments to II.–9:108 (Quality), which deals with the quality to be expected under a contract in general in the absence of contractual regulation, and IV.C.–2:105 (Obligation of skill and care) paragraph (3), which deals with the standard of care of professionals in service contracts.

Emergency measures. These rules do not set out a specific standard of care applicable to emergency measures. For one thing, it did not seem necessary to do so. The general principles of the law of negligence lead to the result that, in determining whether the intervener is in breach of the duty to act with reasonable care in the course of acting, regard is to be had to the difficulty in judging a situation of danger and in endeavouring to eliminate it. The text of this Article refrains from spelling out this principle only because it is assumed to be self-evident. Moreover, the situations concerned also require a distinction with regard to the applicable standard of care – for instance, between a professional rescuer and a private individual. Emergency (para)medics, sea rescue services and other comparable professional groups and organisations should be capable, even in serious cases, of exercising a greater degree of composure in decision-making in the stress of an emergency, as is expected of their profession and acquired through training. On the other hand the drafting of a specific standard of care for emergency situations also appeared to be dispensable in view of the reduction clause in V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention) paragraph (2). Under the latter the intervener's liability is reduced or excluded in so far as this is fair and reasonable, having regard to, among other things, the intervener's reasons for acting. This rule will be of great relevance in particular in cases of measures taken in an emergency.

C. Compliance with the principal's wishes (sub-paragraph (b))

Specification of the general duty of care. The law of benevolent intervention has on the one hand the task of protecting the activities of persons who are active for another's benefit, but on the other hand it must check rash acts of intervention. Someone who voluntarily undertakes to look after the interests of other people must do so with care; a person who is not prepared to do so ought to stay out of the matter altogether. However, paragraph (1) does not merely contain the general duty of care (sub-paragraph (a)); it also specifies that duty from the point of view of benevolent intervention. As part of the benevolent intervener's duties of care, the intervener must comply so far as possible with the wishes of the principal in the carrying out of the duties (just as much as in determining under V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) paragraph (2) (Intervention to benefit another) whether there is at the outset a reasonable ground to act as a benevolent intervener at all). Only if those wishes are neither known nor ascertainable must the benevolent intervener take for orientation what, objectively understood, the principal could reasonably be assumed to wish.

Special information available to the intervener. The touchstone for the duty of care in such cases is therefore the wishes of a principal who takes reasonable care of his or her rights and interests. That is because the wishes of the principal can take priority only in so far as they were known by the intervener or, if such care as was reasonable in the circumstances had been exercised, would have been known by the intervener. Should the intervener have special information available which sheds light on the wishes of the principal, then the intervener must make use of that information.

The exception in V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty). Compliance with the contrary wishes of the principal is not obligatory if the principal is opposed to the performance of a duty owed to a third party when performance is due and urgently required as a matter of overriding public interest (V.–1:102). The same consideration which applies in relation to taking on the intervention applies also to its actual carrying out. This is expressed in the introductory phrase of sub-paragraph (b). In this case too, though, all other duties continue to exist. This includes in particular the duty to inform in sub-paragraph (c).

Illustration 2
On a rainy autumnal day, B's fleet of construction vehicles have left residues of earth and building materials on the road. There is a great danger of an accident occurring. A, a neighbour, instructs a firm to clean the street without first telephoning B because due to the weather conditions A could not decipher the name of B's firm displayed on the vehicles. A's intervention was with reasonable ground. However, this does not free A of the duty to contact B if in the meantime A has learned about B's identity and telephone number – for instance, from an employee of the cleaning company instructed to clean the road. If A fails to contact B, B can set off against A's claim to reimbursement of expenditure the fact that B would have been able to dispose of the material on premises available to it much more cheaply than the road cleaning firm, which deposited the material (in the absence of contrary instructions) on a public authority site. The difference between the actual expense expended by A and this hypothetical cost which B would have incurred is a loss which A must carry.

D. The duty to inform (sub-paragraph (c))

A continual duty. Whereas V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) paragraph (2) gives effect to the rule that someone who attends to others must first find out whether they in fact want that, V.–2:101(1)(c) clarifies that the duty to inform (and abide by the principal's decision to disallow any further interference) is a continual one: the intervener has a duty to keep the principal informed, so far as this is practicable and appropriate. This applies in particular when the intervener was unable to contact the principal before commencing the intervention, but it is not confined to that situation alone. As circumstances change, it may be necessary for the intervener to return to the principal to report on developments which might materially affect the principal's instruction.

"During the intervention". All duties specified in this Article relate to the executory phase of a benevolent intervention. Clearly the nature of the continual duty to inform – or more precisely, the duty, so far as possible and reasonable, continually to make fresh attempts to reach the principal – is such that it can apply only in the case of benevolent interventions which endure for any length of time; it cannot apply to measures which consist only of an instantaneous act.

An indicator of the intention to act for another. The performance of the duty to inform does not merely serve the interests of the principal. Informing the principal (or, depending on the circumstances, the attempt to contact the principal) also helps to reveal the intervener's intention to conduct another's affairs (required by V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) paragraph (1)). Moreover, it points to the person for whom the intervener intends to act and helps identify the principal.

Providing the information itself amounts to a benevolent intervention. As stated before, the provision of information is in itself a benevolent intervention and consequently, if it necessitates expenditure, it can give rise to a claim for reimbursement where the conditions in V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) and V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement) are satisfied.

Content of the information required. When the intervener must make a fresh attempt to inform the principal and what the intervener must tell the principal once contacted are matters which turn on the circumstances of individual cases and cannot be answered in a statutory provision of general application. As a rule the intervener must inform the principal of the situation of danger which has arisen, the measures which have been attempted in order to eliminate it and what has happened in between. Above all it is essential that the intervener gives the principal the chance to forbid any further intervention.

Consent and contract. However, the intervener is not bound by the wishes of the principal if the principal desires the continuation of an act of benevolent intervention after its commencement. That is because no contract exists between the parties and there is consequently nothing from which a claim to performance could be derived. The duty to continue the act arises only under this Book and it exists only under the conditions envisaged in paragraph (2). Should the intervener, however, accept a request from the principal to continue an intervention or undertake a new one, then as a rule the matter will be governed from this point in time onwards by the contract arising between them. Moreover, one will mostly be able to proceed on the basis that such positive conduct of the principal denotes a conclusive statement of approval of the measures already undertaken.

E. The duty not to discontinue an act after commencement without good reason (paragraph (2))

General. Whereas paragraph (1) is concerned with the actual phase of acting in management of another's affairs, paragraph (2) addresses the question when the intervener may discontinue an intervention once it has been started. The basic rule is that everyone is free to decide whether to intervene in the affairs of another, but having once resolved to do so, must in principle bring the matter to a conclusion. The purpose of the duty to continue consists in the protection of the principal from the impetuous intermeddling of others. Potential interveners ought to appreciate that they will be assuming responsibility with their intervention. On the other hand, the duty to continue the intervention ought not to extend so far that an activity embarked upon as a non-contractual management of another's affairs ceases to be distinguishable from a specifically enforceable duty to perform an agreed contractual obligation. The law of benevolent intervention should give well-meaning persons an incentive to look after their fellow citizens. For that reason it must remain possible for an intervener to venture the attempt to render assistance and to be able to give it up later if there is a good reason.

Good reasons to discontinue the intervention. Paragraph (2) deliberately does not list the "good reasons" for ending an activity in benevolent intervention; the matrix of possibilities in everyday life is too extensive. Without making claim to completeness, however, it is possible to compile the following list of four groups of cases: (i) achievement of the desired object, (ii) restoration of the principal's capacity to act independently, (iii) the wish of the principal that the intervener desist from further measures, and (iv) reasons attributable either to the intervener's circumstances (e. g. continuance would require unreasonable exertion) or the circumstances generally (e. g. uselessness of further exertion).

Achievement of the desired object. As soon as the intervention has achieved its purpose, that is to say, when the problem giving rise to the intervention has been solved, the intervener is not merely allowed to bring the intervention to an end. As a rule the intervener will also be obliged to refrain from other activity on behalf of the principal. (Whether further intervention would be justified or not has to be decided afresh in accordance with V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another.)) What remains at this stage are merely the obligation to report, account and surrender anything acquired by reason of the intervention. These are regarded by V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention) as independent obligations consequential on the intervention and not as a mere part of a duty to continue an intervention.

The principal can reasonably be expected to take over. The intervener also has a reasonable ground to end the intervention if the principal can legitimately be expected to take over or resume the management of the matter. This will more often than not be the case as soon as the intervener draws the principal's attention to the existence of the dangerous situation.

Actual or presumed contrary wishes of the principal. The intervener must discontinue the undertaking on becoming aware that the principal does not want it to be continued and the principal's wish is not (by way of exception to the general rule) non-binding. Moreover, the intervener is also obliged by paragraph (1)(b) to act according to what may reasonably be supposed to be the wishes of the principal. Consequently the intervener must also desist from continuing the intervention if the circumstances are such that it would be reasonable to suppose that the principal would not want further measures to be undertaken. This is often the reason why a benevolent intervention is complete when it merely achieves a provisional 'shoring up' of the principal's affairs. The decision as to the manner and timing of any permanent securing of the principal's interest must as a rule remain reserved to the principal.

Unreasonableness. The intervener also has a good ground for ending the management of the principal's affairs if it has become unreasonable to continue the intervention in the manner in which it was begun. What passes for reasonable or unreasonable depends on the particular circumstances and can hardly be expressed in an abstract formula. The personal circumstances of the intervener (dangers faced, pressure of time in regard to the discharge of other legal or social duties, the intensity of effort and time which has already been invested in the services rendered and would have to be invested in their continuation, etc) and the extent of the danger which cessation of the benevolent intervention would pose for the principal must be weighed up against one another. Within the boundaries of what is appropriate and reasonable the intervener is invested with a degree of discretion. As part of the balancing of interests, moreover, one must ascertain whether and (if so) in what way the intervener has adversely affected the interests of the principal by the intervention up to that point in time and whether the intervener had the opportunity to secure the assistance of third parties. The test question in such cases is: would a careful person, placed in the intervener's situation and conscious of having voluntarily assumed responsibility for some affair of the principal, have done more?

> Illustration 3
> A person who helps someone and by doing so causes others, who would equally have helped, to go home, may not give up the assistance all of a sudden, since the injured party would now be completely helpless, whereas in the situation at the outset it might have been possible to count on the (enduring) intervention of others. The person helping must at the very least see to it that the emergency medical services or the police are notified.

Uselessness. Finally, a benevolent intervention may be ended if it emerges after a first attempt that it will not meet with success. Here too, however, it is conceivable that the duty to continue an intervention may take on the form of a duty to secure the help of third parties, should it transpire that the intervention has in fact made the situation worse.

Illustration 4
A has embarked on repair of the roof on the house of a neighbour, B, and, in order to be able to penetrate through to the damaged part, removes further tiles and roof battens. At this point it becomes clear to A that it will not be possible to carry out the repairs unaided and that it will be necessary to call in a professional roofer. Were it the case that A ought to have recognised this at the outset, then A would have been in breach of the duty of care under paragraph (1) and thus become liable for any additional damage to the building the intervention has caused.

Termination of the benevolent intervention without good reason. It does not suffice, however, as a reason for abandoning the matter in hand that the intervener has simply lost interest. Moreover, that is so irrespective of whether the interim intervention has increased the risk of damage to the principal in some shape or form.

Illustration 5
Of his own free will, A looks after the farm belonging to his brother, who is lying in a coma in hospital. After one year has passed, A decides to move into the city. He does nothing towards the administration of the farm and does not undertake or arrange for the tilling of the fields that should be carried out at this time of the year. A is of course not obliged to look after the farm permanently. However, he has not brought his benevolent intervention to a conclusion because he has failed to arrange what in the given circumstances was a reasonable solution for the future care of the farm (which could have consisted of a lease of the farm or, if there were no other relatives, its sale). A is liable to B for the damage suffered by the growth of weeds.

NOTES

I. The general duty to take reasonable care

1. The general duty to exercise reasonable care in the conduct of another's affair is essentially universal. That it has not been explicitly set out by the GERMAN CC may be explained by the fact that the intervener (both at the point of time he takes up the management of the affair as well as in the executory phase) is required to orientate his conduct by the principal's wishes or the principal's interests. No principal will have an interest that another attends to his affairs without the required caution and attention. AUSTRIAN CC § 1036 grants the intervener in an emergency a claim for reimbursement of expenditures even if his "efforts without his fault have remained unsuccessful". BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1372 subject an intervener without authority to all duties which would arise in a case of a mandat exprès. By this means CC art. 1992 (1), which provides for the liability of the agent for fault (i. e. wilful and negligent wrongdoing), also applies to the law of benevolent intervention. CC art. 1374 (1) confirms that the intervener will have to come up to the standard of care of a bonus paterfamilias. MALTESE CC art. 1015 subjects the "voluntary agent" to the high standard of care of a bonus paterfamilias. CC art. 1016 adds that this provision is to be applied "with the greatest strictness" if the intervener (a) acted in contravention of a prohibition by the principal, (b) the intervener by his intervention prevented a more skilled person from attending to the affair or (c) the "agent himself did not possess the requisite skill".

2. Similarly GREEK CC art. 731 sentence 1 makes it clear that the intervener will be liable "for any fault". POLISH CC art. 752 and ESTONIAN LOA § 1022 demand from an intervener that he acts with requisite care. PORTUGUESE CC art. 466 sets out the rule that the intervener is liable to the principal for "damages, which he has caused by his fault during the intervention". Both formulas encompass a general duty of care. Portuguese CC art. 466 (2) adds that the intervener's management renders him liable if he does not act in accordance with the interest and the true or presumed wishes of the intervener. In contrast to tort law (CC art. 487 (2)) and contract law (CC art. 799 (2) in conjunction with art. 487 (2)) the law of benevolent intervention does not contain an explicit statement that fault will be determined according to the "standard of care a bonus paterfamilias would have taken with regard to the circumstances of the particular case". As a result the arguably prevailing opinion seems to be that within the law of benevolent intervention a culpa in abstracto will not suffice to give rise to liability and that a culpa in concreto or even a breach of the diligentia quam in suis is required instead (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em Geral I[10], 460-462; STJ 22 April 1986, BolMinJus 356 (1986) 352-357; Ribeiro de Faria, Obrigações I, 355-356; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 442; but see for a distinct opinion Galvão Telles, Obrigações[7], 189-190; Vaz Serra, Gestão de negócios, 134 and 270, see also Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 288 and idem, Direito das obrigações I, 439-440).

3. SPANISH CC art. 1889 demands that the intervener manage the affair with such care as a bonus paterfamilias would take. The standard is that of 'normal care of ordinary people' (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Díez-Picazo], Código Civil II, 1946), and therefore as a general rule not such care as an expert in the field would be able to exercise, unless the intervener is such an expert (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 448). The standard is determined by comparison with the standard of care a bonus paterfamilias would exercise with respect to his own affairs. This standard of care is intended to prevent an intervener from being liable in cases of mere culpa levissima or culpa leve (i. e. a slight or lesser degree of negligence) (Díez-Picazo, loc.cit.).

4. Under ITALIAN CC art. 2030 the intervener is subject to the same duties as would arise had a contract of mandate been concluded with the principal. CC art. 2030 thus points to CC art. 1710 (1). The same degree of care expected of the bonus pater familias provided for in the latter is demanded of an intervener in another's affairs (Cass. 4 May 1985, no. 2795, Rep.Giur.it. 1985, voce Divisione, no. 12; voce Responsabilità civile, no. 154). However, the second limb of CC art. 1710 (1), which provides that liability for negligence will be judged less strictly in the case of a gratuitous mandate, is not held to be invoked by CC art. 2030 (Cass. 4 October 1956, no. 3336, Rep.Giur.it. 1956, voce Gestione d´affari, nos. 8, 9, 12 and 13; Cass. 20 May 1953, no. 1472, Rep.Giur.it. 1953, voce Gestione d´affari, no. 5).

5. The SLOVENIAN LOA § 210 requires that the intervener acts as a person exercising average care would act and that he heeds the true or presumed needs of the intervener. The same holds true for DUTCH Law. Under CC art. 6:199 the intervener has to exercise reasonable care while he manages the affair of another. The intervener has to attend to the interests of the principal with the same care which would be expected in that context from a reasonable and diligent intervener. Whether the intervener has satisfied this standard will be determined by the judge according to the circumstances of the particular case (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 793; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 307 p. 318-319; Schrage, Mon. Nieuw BW, no. 21 p. 15; T & C Vermogensrecht [-Hijma], Art. 6:199 BW, no. 2; Verbintenissenrecht [-Scheltema], Art. 6:199 BW, no. 2).

6. With regard to SCOTTISH law it was held in Kolbin & Sons v. Kinnear & Co. 1931 SC (HL) 128 that an intervener is obliged to act according to the standard of care which a reasonable person would exercise in his own affairs. Particularities of the individual case are to be taken into account (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law[4], 513-514; Leslie, Jur.Rev. 1983, 27; Stair [-Whitty], vol. 15, para 136).

7. As regards SCANDINAVIAN jurisdictions it is said or at least has been said that the standard of care the intervener has to exercise also requires that the intervener does not act beyond the scope of necessary measures and thus as a general rule restricts himself to temporary measures. The intervener should in general confine himself to measures which prevent the aggravation of the state of affairs and not try to improve it, as the latter are not necessary (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 36 with reference to earlier Danish literature as well as to Vinding Kruse, En nordisk lovbog, 6-14-1, p. 272 and 599; idem, A Nordic Draft Code, ch. 57, sec. 1437, p. 379). Of note as regards SWEDISH case law is HD 9 March 1972, NJA 1972, 88 (where the fire brigade during a storm removed roof sheeting which threatened to be swiped on the street. The claim for recompense has been dismissed on the ground that it would have been more skilful and more advantageous to pin down the roof sheeting).

8. In the COMMON LAW an agent of necessity is invariably regarded as being obliged at the very least to take ordinary (i.e reasonable) care, even where the agent acts gratuitously: cf. Grill v. General Iron Screw Colliery Co. Ltd. (1865-66) LR 1 CP 600, 612 (Willes J); Fridman, Agency[5], p. 140. Where a pre-existing agency for reward is enlarged by necessity, the obligation (so far as not otherwise agreed by the parties) is one of best endeavours in order to protect the principal's interests: cf. The Onward (1873) LR 4 A & E 38, 57 (Sir Robert Phillimore). For example, this includes a positive obligation on a ship's captain to protect cargo against further deterioration arising out of an accident for which he is not responsible and to store cargo, rather than simply leaving it, if it is not collected at the time of unloading: see Notara v. Henderson (1869-70) LR 5 QB 346, 353 (Cockburn CJ, for the Court of Queen's Bench) where the cargo (beans) became damp as a result of a collision, but the captain refused to unload it to enable it to be dried while the ship was being repaired and it deteriorated. Conversely, an agent of necessity is not burdened with strict liability (unless this is contractually agreed) and if he has discharged his obligations honestly and reasonably he will not be liable for damage resulting from his lawful management of the principal's affairs: see The Lizzie (1867-69) LR 2 A & E 254, 256 (Sir Robert Phillimore) (concerning use of a ship as security for a loan which, it transpired, exceeded the value of the assets and thus created a net indebtedness for the principal). See further Chapter 3, Art. 3:106, Notes 11.

II. The duty to orientate the exercise of care according to the principal's wishes

9. Similar to POLISH CC art. 752 and HUNGARIAN CC § 484, GERMAN CC § 677 too obliges the intervener to conduct the management of the affair in accordance with the principal's interests with regard to his actual or supposed wishes. The decisive criterion to assess the 'interests' (as opposed to the 'wishes') will be what from an objective perspective and according to a generally accepted view would be considered to benefit the principal. However, the actual wishes of the principal will always claim priority, whether or not they are reasonable ones. Thus the supposed wishes of the principal will only be decisive in a case where the actual wishes are not ascertainable or are not binding as being contrary to law or bonos mores. The question arises as to what according to an objective evaluation of all circumstances are to be regarded as the hypothetical wishes of the principal. If other pointers are lacking the supposed wishes will be ascertained according to the principal's objective interests (BGH 7 January 1971, NJW 1971, 609, 612). If in the exceptional case the principal's interests and wishes do not concur the question of an order of priority arises. Some commentary, adhering to the wording of CC § 677 ("mit Rücksicht auf" – 'having regard to'), give priority to the principal's interests and therefore to an objective standard (Jauernig [-Vollkommer], § 677, no. 9; MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 677, no. 45; Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 677, no. 12 et seq.). Others disagree, arguing that this does not accord with the rationale of the law of benevolent intervention and that it conflicts with the principal's right to self-determination to allow or even promote unauthorised interventions which are well-meant and useful but not undesired by the principal (Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 677, no. 19; Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], § 677, no. 4; Esser and Weyers, Schuldrecht BT II/2[8], § 46 II 4 b).

10. GREEK CC art. 730 determines the most important duty of the intervener: the duty to conduct the affair in accordance with the interest and the actual or presumed wishes of the principal. This duty will only arise if the requirements of a justified intervention without authority are met. An intervener acts contrary to his principal's interest if he in arranging for necessary repairs, for instance, instructs a contractor whose services are less reasonably priced than those of a competitor (Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochikon Dikaion II/2, 25). The culpable breach of the duty to act in accord with the principal's interests or, as the case may be, the wishes of the principal does not transform a justified intervention into an unjustified intervention, but it may lead to the intervener's liability for damages. As regards the relation between the two criteria (interest and wishes of the principal), legal literature refers to the corresponding rule on taking over the management of another's affair (e. g. Papanikolaou, Art. 730, no. 40). Accordingly the principal's wishes will take priority over his objective interests. The latter will only be of relevance if the actual or supposed wishes are not ascertainable (ErmAK [-Saketas], Art. 730, no. 55 f; Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 35; but in part taking a different view, Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I/2, 200).

11. From PORTUGUESE CC art. 465 lit. a arises a duty of the intervener to have regard to the interests and the actual or supposed wishes of the principal, unless the latter are contrary to law or morality. According to the wording of CC art. 465 lit. a both the (objective) interest and the (subjective) wishes share the same priority. If (in exceptional circumstances) they differ the prevailing opinion holds the (legitimate) wishes of the principal to be decisive (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em Geral I[10], 462; Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 218 ff). Others rate the objective interest to be of greater importance (Vaz Serra, Gestão de negócios, 122) and a third group considers that in such a case the gestor must abstain from acting altogether (Menezes Cordeiro, Obrigações II, 18).

12. AUSTRIAN CC § 1037 merely sets out a duty of the intervener to attempt to obtain the principal's consent. According to settled case law the intervener is nonetheless obliged to manage the affair in accordance with the principal's interest having regard to the latter's actual or supposed wishes. Regard is to be had to the probable intentions of the principal – in particular where the management involves expenses (OGH 21 April 1982, JBl 1984, 256). Observance of the supposed wishes of the principal is of great importance, as both the justification of the intervention (CC § 1036) and the claim for reparation depend on it (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], §§ 1036-1040

no. 11, Meissel, GoA, 118 et seq.). This also holds true for cases of intervention in an emergency (Meissel, loc.cit. 119).

13. The SLOVENIAN LOA § 201 demands that in the course of his management the intervener acts in accordance with the actual or supposed wishes of the intervener. Art. 204 adds that the intervener must refrain from any action if the principal forbids it.

14. BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC do not explicitly provide that the duty of care is coupled to observance of the principal's wishes. CC art. 1374 (1) merely states that the intervener must take such care as a bonus paterfamilias would exercise. Whether or not the intervener's action is culpable will accordingly be assessed in abstracto (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 14 p. 16; De Page, Droit Civil Belge II[3], no. 1082 p. 1147). Although the conclusion is only infrequently stated explicitly, the conclusion may be drawn from this obligation of careful management that the intervener has to heed the principal's wishes (Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 67 p. 45-46). The starting position of MALTESE CC is quite similar (CC art. 1015). However, CC art. 1016 tightens the standard of care if the intervener does not comply with a prohibition by the principal.

15. The starting point of SPANISH law is the basic rule that benevolent intervention cannot be undertaken contrary to the express wishes of the principal (TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954, no. 322 p. 198). An intervention undertaken contrary to the wishes of the principal does not meet the requirement of usefulness, i. e. utiliter coeptum (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Díez-Picazo], Código Civil II, 1944). Ley 561 of Fuero Nuevo de NAVARRA reads "If he (the principal) has previously forbidden the intervention, he is not obliged to pay compensation". In addition CC art. 1891 provides that the intervener will be liable for accidental loss in two cases, namely if he either undertakes a 'risky measure' which the principal does not usually engage in or if the intervener gives preference to his own interests over those of the principal. 'Risky measures' include, for instance, engaging in speculation on the stock exchange (Díez-Picazo, loc.cit. 1949).

16. In ITALY a determination whether the intervener has observed the required standard of care is likewise closely linked to the assessment of whether or not there is utiliter coeptum: the usefulness of a measure is to be assessed according to the standard whether or not it is in line with the presumed wishes of the principle or the principal's interest (Cass. 13 October 1951, no. 2634, Foro it. 1952, I, 201; Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 879). In addition the assessment follows objective criteria, i. e. regard is had to whether the intervener has acted as a bonus paterfamilias would have done in similar circumstances (Cass. 13 March 1964, no. 550, Foro it. 1965, I, 866).

17. Under DUTCH CC art. 6:200 claims of the intervener will depend on whether or not he has attended to the principal's interests properly. It is not only a pre-condition for the existence of a reasonable ground but also a requirement for satisfying the standard of care under CC art. 6:199 (1) that the management of the principal's affairs accords with the actual or presumed wishes of the principal. Thus fault in commencing an intervention in the first place and fault in its execution once begun hinge on the same criteria (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 793; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 307 p. 318-319; T & C Vermogensrecht [-Hijma], Art. 6:199 BW, no. 2; Verbintenissenrecht [-Scheltema], Art. 6:199 BW, no. 2).

18. Despite some problems which have their origin in the Roman legal sources and the paucity of useful observations among the institutional writers on this point, SCOTTISH law too seems to arrive at the same conclusion that the gestor is obliged to orientate his conduct according to the presumed wishes of the principal (Stair [-Whitty] vol. 15, para 122). A duty to ascertain the wishes of the principal can at least be indirectly inferred from the notion that a measure will only constitute a benevolent intervention if it benefits the principal in his particular circumstances (for details see Leslie, Jur.Rev. 1983, 25). Agency of necessity under the COMMON LAW requires that the agent act reasonably and in the interests of the principal and that what he does be 'necessary'; these requirements are satisfied in effect if the principal, conducting himself as prudent person, would himself have undertaken the measure in question: Gunn v. Roberts (1873-74) LR 9 CP 331, 337 (Brett J), and see further Notara v. Henderson (1870) LR 5 QB 346, 353 (Cockburn CJ, for the Court of Queen's Bench) where it is indicated that where a ship's captain is under an obligation (arising from necessity) to store unloaded cargo, he must store it at the place which, considering the matter carefully, he regards as the most convenient for the cargo owner. In similar manner a claim to restitution which is based on necessitous intervention (e. g. in maintaining a person without full legal capacity) presupposes that the benefit conferred was a necessity and that quality is to be determined by reference to the recipient's reasonable needs and circumstances: cf. Re Rhodes (1890) 44 Ch D 94, 105 (Cotton LJ) and 109 (Lopes LJ).

19. In relation to the NORDIC Countries reference can be made to a small number of provisions of commercial law which all require that the active party act in accordance with 'the interest' of the other party. Under the DANISH and SWEDISH Factors Acts § 7 the commission agent has to take account of the interests of the principal and the same also applies under the SWEDISH Maritime Code [sjölag (1994:1009)] chap. 13 § 12 to the carrier of goods with regard to the interests of the owner of the goods. These rules may well be applied to the gestor by analogy.

III. The duty to inform

20. GERMAN CC § 681 sentence 2 refers to the law of mandate (which under German law is a gratuitous contract) and by this means subjects the intervener to the same duties as a contractual agent. The latter's duties according to CC § 666 also include the duty to inform and to give an account. Strictly speaking CC § 666 contains three separate duties of information, namely the duty to inform that an intervention is being conducted, the duty to provide information and the duty to provide an account. The duty to inform on the event of an intervention must be adhered to by the intervener on his own initiative, i. e. without a prior request from the principal; by contrast, the duty to provide information and to give an account will only arise as a consequence of a request by the principal. Though no clear line can or need be drawn between them, the duty to inform the principal that an intervention has occurred primarily relates to the circumstances which rendered the undertaking necessary, while the second duty to provide information concerns the state of the management of the affair as a whole.

21. GREEK law likewise extends the main duty of the intervener to act in accordance with the interest and wishes of the principal by accessory duties, which are drawn from the law of mandate. Setting out one accessory duty CC art. 733 states that the intervener must inform the principal of the commencement of the intervention and inquire as to the principal's wishes (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 733, no. 1). Of course it must be possible to contact the principal, which in turn will depend on the circumstances of the individual case. A stricter standard is supposed to apply where intervener and principal reside at the same place or if the intervener is acquainted with the principal (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 2). After informing the principal the intervener has to await further instructions. It is a matter of controversy, however, whether the continuation of the intervention in accordance with instructions given may be characterised as a performance under a contract. A violation of the duty to inform the principal results in a liability for damages, but it does not render the intervention unjustified as such (CA Patras 92/1955, NoB 4/1956 p. 96).

22. PORTUGUESE CC art. 465 lit. b obliges the intervener to inform the principal of the commencement of the intervention as soon as possible. An infringement of this duty supposedly may not only result in a liability for damages; it will have the effect that the management of the affair from this point in time is not justified (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 438; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], Art. 465 no. 3). If the duty to inform the principal is discharged, the intervener my continue the intervention until he receives instructions to the contrary. If the principal issues instructions approving the intervention, it has to be determined whether this concludes a contract of mandate. Furthermore, CC art. 465 lit. d expressly obliges the intervener to make full disclosure to the principal as regards the intervention.

23. Similarly the SLOVENIAN LOA § 200 obliges the gestor to inform the principal about the commencement of the intervention as soon as possible. CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC art. 743 (1) contains a corresponding obligation. HUNGARIAN CC § 486 (1) even provides that "an impromptu agent shall immediately inform the person in whose favour he has intervened" (Official Translation, Hungarian Legal Norms in Force in three Languages, CompLex CD HMJ, 2004). ESTONIAN LOA provides for the duty of information in § 1020.

24. The AUSTRIAN CC does not expressly provide for a duty of information. However, the existence of such a duty is recognised in the legal literature (Koziol and Welser, Grundriss II[12], 366 et seq.). An infringement of this duty will lead to liability for damages under general rules (Rummel [-Rummel] ABGB I³ § 1039 no. 5).

25. Equally, the duty of the intervener to inform the principal about the commencement of the undertaking as soon as possible is not expressly provided for in the CODE NAPOLÉON. Even in legal literature that duty is only rarely mentioned. Only occasionally is it indicated that the duty to inform is one of the main duties of the intervener. Its main purpose is supposed to be that the intervener may receive instructions from the principal as a response and to enable the latter to resume attendance to his own affairs (le Tourneau, Rép. Dr. Civ., Bd. VI, V° Gestion d´affaires (2002), no. 68).

26. Similarly, the SPANISH CC does not explicitly set out a duty to inform, but it is acknowledged both in legal literature and in case law (TS 16 October 1978, RAJ 1978 (2) no. 3076 p. 2606). It is inferred from the general system of duties of an intervener and from the principle of good faith. So far as possible the principal must be informed both of the commencement of the intervention and of its continuation.

27. By contrast it is disputed whether under ITALIAN Law the intervener is obliged to inform the principal as soon as possible of the commencement of the intervention (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 30-31, for instance, has argued against such a duty.) Arguments in favour of the existence of such a duty are based on the general duty of fair conduct and the explicit duty in the law of mandate (CC art. 1712; see Breccias, La gestione d´affari[2], 897).

28. Under DUTCH Law the intervener must both try to contact the principal prior to the commencement of the intervention (a consequence of the requirement of a reasonable ground) and attempt to contact him as soon as possible during the executory phase of the intervention in order to enable the principal to attend himself to his affairs. This duty has not been explicitly provided for by statute for the mere reason that it is already considered as covered by the intervener's general duty of care (CC art. 6:199 (1)) (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 793; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 307 p. 319; Schrage, Mon. Nieuw BW, no. 22 p. 15-16).

29. Under SCOTTISH law a benevolent intervention without authority is only justified if the principal is unable to attend to the problem that has occurred because he is not aware of the situation. Against this background a duty to give notice of the commencement of the intervention or to inform about the intervention is considered to be irreconcilable with the concept of benevolent intervention; insofar as the principal is informed the rules on mandate will prevail over the law of benevolent intervention. However, even the effort to search out the principal may in itself be considered as a benevolent intervention. Generally it is emphasised that the law of negotiorum gestio has become less important due to the improvement in communication technology (Marshall, General Principles of Scots Law[7], para 11-11).

30. With regard to the legal systems of SCANDINAVIA one can only point towards the provisions on duties to inform to be found in neighbouring areas of the law. Strict adherence is to be inferred, so far as they apply by analogy, because the relationship in a case of a management of another's affairs without an underlying contractual agreement ordinarily lacks a voluntary entrustment of the affair to another. Compare in particular the SWEDISH Maritime Code [sjölag (1994:1009)] chap. 13 § 16 (3) in conjunction with § 12 (duty to inform of the carrier if the goods are damaged or if the carrier feels constrained to undertake extraordinary measures) and DANISH and SWEDISH Act regarding Factors § 7 (Duty of the commission agent to inform the principal).

31. The position in ENGLISH law is comparable to that of SCOTTISH law on this point: since agency of necessity presupposes that contact with the principal is impossible, or impracticable in the circumstances, acts undertaken when it is possible (without detriment to the principal's interests) to await the principal's instructions may be regarded as unnecessary and outside the scope of the authority which necessity created. It is now recognised that seeking such instructions may itself be an act entitling an agent to reimbursement: see Pocahontas Fuel Co. Inc. v. Ambatielos (1922) 10 Lloyd's L. Rep 188, 156 (McCardie J), but contrast the (implied) view of Sir Robert Phillimore in The St. Lawrence (1879-80) 5 PD 250, 253.

IV. Duty to continue the intervention

32. GERMAN Law deviates from V.–2:101(2) in so far as the intervener is not obliged as a rule to continue an intervention which has been commenced (RG 10 May 1906, RGZ 63, 280, 283; however, an intervener who puts his own interests first and neglects those of the principal will be liable according to this judgement even for loss of profits, i. e. the 'positive' (expectation) interest, loc.cit. 287). The legislature (Mot. II, 858) assumed that the intervener must conduct the intervention in a way which accords with the care of a bonus pater familias. The question whether or not the intervener may give up an intervention once begun is assessed against the same standard. If the discontinuance of the intervention would result in damage which would have not occurred if the intervener had not interfered in the principal's affairs, then the intervener is under a duty to continue the intervention. Apart from this a particular duty to continue an intervention is not recognised. An agent may similarly terminate a mandate at any time (CC § 671). In special circumstances, however, there may exceptionally be a partial duty to continue the intervention. This duty in particular cases is derived from the principle of good faith and also from the fact that the intervener by commencing the intervention takes upon himself the duty to consider the principal's interests (RG 10 May 1906, loc.cit.; cf. amongst others RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], § 677, no. 4; Erman [-Ehmann], BGB I[10], § 677, no. 5; Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], § 677, no. 5). The existence of such a duty to continue the intervention is established where continuation is possible and not difficult for the intervener, but an abandonment by the intervention would severely aggravate the situation of the principal (RG 21 November 1921, WarnRspr. 1922 no. 12: a person who takes up an object left by another has to keep it in safe custody). Furthermore, a duty to continue may also exist where the intervention has prevented a third party from acting on behalf of the principal or if the principal is likely to suffer a damage from the intervention being discontinued which would not have occurred if the intervener had taken no action at all (Mot. II, 480; see also RG 5 December 1929, RGZ 126, 287, 292: duty to maintain a loan). The infringement of such a duty will result in liability for damages, but it cannot be enforced by means of a claim for performance (Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 677, no. 20). Following the death of the intervener his rights and duties devolve to his heirs.

33. The duty to continue an intervention once commenced is also not expressly provided for in GREEK law. It is therefore presumed that the intervener is not generally obliged to continue an intervention he has begun. As in Germany, however, such a duty may arise in exceptional circumstances by virtue of the principle of good faith. This may occur in particular where the continuation would not be an unjust burden for the intervener, but discontinuation would result in damage for the principal (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 42). Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I/2, 201 argues in favour of an application of CC art. 725 (2) by analogy.

34. PORTUGUESE CC art. 466 (1) to a large extent corresponds with V.–2:101(2). Under this provision "the intervener is liable" only "for damages which he has caused by an unjustified interruption (interrupção injustificada)." In that regard there is a marked difference in comparison to French and Italian law (Menezes Cordeiro, Obrigações II, 20; Vaz Serra, Gestão de negócios, 114-115). Where a duty to continue exists, it cannot be specifically enforced under Portuguese law; the only available remedy in case of failure of performance is a claim for damages (Menezes Cordeiro, loc.cit.). The intervention may be aborted if there is a specific justification. Such justification can arise in particular from conduct of the principal.

35. Under AUSTRIAN CC § 1039 too the intervener will be obliged to continue his intervention until the task undertaken is concluded. This duty to continue – this follows from CC § 1312 – does not apply in the case of intervention in an emergency under CC § 1036 (OGH 26 November 1981, SZ 54/176; Meissel, GoA, 154). It arises only in the case of 'useful' benevolent intervention under CC § 1037. It is understood as a mere standard of care as opposed to a duty to perform which would be enforceable by a separate claim (Meissel, loc.cit. 162 et seq.; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1039 no. 2, Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], §§ 1036-1040 no. 16; but possibly a different view in OGH 20 January 1977, MietSlg. 29.128=RIS-Justiz RS 0013779). The limits of the duty to continue are reached where further action would appear to be useless (CC § 1038; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1039 no. 6).

36. BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1372 (1) obliges the intervener to continue and to complete the intervention until the principal is once more in a position to attend to his own affairs. If the principal is in that position, then the intervention may be terminated by notice that the intervener does not intend to continue the intervention (JClCiv [-Bout], arts. 1372-1375, Fasc. 20 no. 10). CC art. 1373 enhances the duty to continue by imposing the obligation that the intervener continue the intervention after the death of the principal until the heir is able to take over the management of the affair. The view is expressed, going beyond the literal wording of that article, that this rule should also be applied where the principal is either incapacitated or declared bankrupt: in such cases the intervention cannot be discontinued before the representative or administrator is capable of attending to the matter (Bout loc.cit. no. 12; Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 62 p. 45). If the principal has disappeared, the intervener may apply to the guardianship court under FRENCH CC art. 112 et seq. for the appointment of a representative to take over the management (Bout, loc.cit.). The same applies to an intervention which requires an extraordinary long attendance to the matter (Bout loc.cit. no. 14). Force majeure will constitute a reason for justified termination. In addition French legal literature has suggested the analogous application of CC art. 2007 (which forms part of the law of mandate), so that danger to the intervener or the threat of substantial disadvantage to the intervener may constitutes reasons for termination (le Tourneau, Rép.Dr.Civ., VI, v° Gestion d´affaires (2002), no. 70). The BELGIAN perception, by contrast, is that CC art. 1373 remains applicable also in the case where the principal has disappeared (De Page, Droit Civil Belge II[3], no. 1082 p. 1147). That the intervener may terminate the intervention if continuation is impossible for him is only stated in general terms (RPDB, v° Quasi-contrat, no. 58). One explanation for this strict duty to continue an intervention which has sometimes been offered is that a perfunctory or aborted intervention may prevent other more qualified persons from undertaking the necessary measures for the protection of the principal's interests (Carbonnier, Les obligations[21], no. 301 p. 501). An elaborate regulation of the duty to continue an intervention may also be found in MALTESE CC arts. 1013 and 1014.

37. According to the opinion of one SPANISH author the duty to continue the intervention pursuant to CC art. 1888 represents the main duty of the intervener because without the continuation of the intervention there would be no room for the duty of care (Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 410). Other authors hold the order of priority to be the other way round (e. g. Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Código Civil y compilaciones forales, XXIV, 445). CC art. 1888 prevents the intervener from discontinuing the intervention ad libitum because otherwise more severe damage may occur than that which the intervention was intended to prevent (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Díez-Picazo], Código Civil II, 1945). The duty to continue is said to serve two purposes: to prevent damage and to prevent the thoughtless interference with another's affairs (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 264). Pursuant to CC art. 1888 the duty to continue an intervention once begun concerns both 'the affair' and the 'auxiliary matters'. If the intervener is no longer willing or no longer in the position to continue the intervention, then CC art. 1888 permits the intervener "to call upon the principal to replace him in the conduct of the intervention provided that he is in the position to conduct that intervention on his own". In the law of mandate (CC art. 1736), by contrast, the agent may "resign by giving the principal notice thereof. If the latter suffers damage as a consequence of such resignation, the agent must make reparation for that loss, unless he can justify the termination because it has become impossible to complete the mandate without severe harm to his own interests". Thus according to the wording of the CC the contractual agent can give up his mandate under less strict conditions than an intervener without authority. This has repeatedly prompted scholars to argue in favour of an analogous application of the provision of the law of mandate to benevolent intervention (e. g. Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 428). If the intervener in accordance with CC art. 1888 calls upon the principal to replace him in the management of the affair, the mere request will not as such terminate the duty to continue the intervention. Termination will not occur before the principal attends to the affair himself; if he is not in a position to do so (for which the ability to instruct a third party would suffice) then the duty to continue persists. Fuero Nuevo de NAVARRA Ley 560 likewise obliges the intervener "to complete an intervention begun".

38. Under SLOVENIAN LOA § 200 the intervention must be continued provided this is reasonable and as long as the principal is not in a position to attend to his own affairs again. POLISH CC art. 753 (1) also obliges an intervener to continue an intervention until such time as the principal is in a position 'to attend to the business himself'. By contrast CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC do not provide for a duty to continue an intervention. The same holds true for the ESTONIAN LOA and the HUNGARIAN CC.

39. Under ITALIAN CC art 2028 the intervener is obliged to continue an intervention and to bring it to an end until the principal is in a position to attend to his own affairs. This duty to continue also exists where the principal dies before the intervener has completed the task undertaken for the principal. It will persist until the heirs can take care of the affair. The duty to continue an intervention will cease if the management has become impossible due to a reason for which the intervener is not responsible (Cass. 11 November 1958, no. 3692, Rep.Giur.it. 1958, voce Gestione d´affari, no. 6-8) or useless or even dangerous.

40. Under DUTCH CC art. 6:199 (1) the intervener must "continue the management of another's affair he has begun … to the extent that this can reasonably be required of him". From this it follows that the intervener may not discontinue at an improper time. The particulars will depend on the circumstances of the individual case – in particular whether or not the principal is in the position to act himself and the balance between the interest of the principal in the continuation of the management of his affairs and the effort and expenditure which continuation would entail for the intervener (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 793; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 308 p. 319-320).

41. In SCOTLAND the duty to continue and to complete the intervention is one of the main duties of the intervener. This was recognised by the institutional writers (Bell § 541; Stair, Institutions, Book I, 8, 5) and remains the law today (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law, II[4], 513). The duty to continue terminates only when it would result in management of a new affair; it does not end automatically with the death of the principal or the intervener (Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, vol. 15, para 130; Stair, Institutions, Book I, 8, 3; Erskine, Book III, Volume II, 53). Legal literature in the NORDIC COUNTRIES has not elaborated on the obligation to continue. In ENGLISH law a question of a duty to continue an intervention rarely poses itself in that form. Agency of necessity largely operates in the context of an existing relationship and an agent is regarded as not merely being authorised to intervene, but actually bound to take reasonable measures in order to protect the principal's interests: for authority asserting an obligation on the part of a ship's captain in a case of necessity, see The Gratitudine (1801) 3 C. Rob 240 at 259, 165 ER 450 at 457 (Sir W. Scott); Tronson v. Dent (1853) 8 Moore PC 419, 449 (Sir John Patteson); The Hamburg (1863) 2 Moore PC (N. S.) 289, 302 (Dr Lushington); Australasian Steam Navigation Co. v. Morse (1871-73) LR 4 PC 222, 228; Gaudet v. Brown (1873-74) LR 5 PC 134, 165 (Sir Montague Smith); Hingston v. Wendt (1875-76) 1 QBD 367, 372 (Blackburn J); Metcalfe v. Britannia Ironworks Co (1876) 1 QBD 613, 625 (Cockburn CJ). The question of when the agent may abandon the intervention is simply subsumed within the broader question of the scope of the duty to act in the principal's interests: intervention is required so long as the necessity requires a solution to the unforeseen problem and a response can reasonably be expected of the agent. In the case of a gratuitous agent, this will often mean there is no duty to act: cf Fridman, Agency[5], 138. However, a duty of an intervener who acts gratuitously or is not an agent of necessity to continue their intervention may arise under tort law on the basis that their interference (if now followed by an omission to improve matters) would cause damage for which he would be liable as a tortfeasor on the basis of negligence: cf. Gomer v. Pitt & Scott (1922) 12 Lloyd's L. Rep 115, 116 (Warrington LJ).

Illustration 1 is taken from BGH 4 December 1975, BGHZ 65, 354; illustration 5 from TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 322 p. 198.

V.–2:102: Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty

(1) The intervener is liable to make reparation to the principal for damage caused by breach of a duty set out in this Chapter if the damage resulted from a risk which the intervener created, increased or intentionally perpetuated.

(2) The intervener's liability is reduced or excluded in so far as this is fair and reasonable, having regard to, among other things, the intervener's reasons for acting.

(3) An intervener who at the time of intervening lacks full legal capacity is liable to make reparation only in so far as that intervener is also liable to make reparation under Book VI (Non-contractual liability arising out of damage caused to another).

COMMENTS

A. Liability to make reparation for breach of duty

The duty to make reparation under the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs. Paragraph (1) establishes the intervener's liability for damages and thus at the same time the basis for a claim of the principal. Such provision appears necessary firstly because there should not be any discussion at the outset whether the principal's claim to damages arising out of the culpable execution of a benevolent intervention is in its nature derived form the law on non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI or must be derived from an analogous application of the contract law provisions. It is neither the one nor the other. Rather it takes the form of a claim to damages under the law of benevolent intervention itself. Secondly, paragraph (1) is required to give expression in a general rule to the specific limits of this claim to reparation.

Reparation. In agreement with the legal terminology being used in the law of non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI the concept of reparation embraces every form of making good on a damage. Usually this will take the form of compensation (monetary reparation; damages), but it may also assume another form of indemnification of the damage – in particular the restoration of the previously existing position by reparation in kind.

Damage. As in the law on non-contractual liability for damage under Book VI (in the concept of "legally relevant damage") and the law of contract, the expression "damage" also encompasses here economic as well as non-economic losses. The provisions in the law on non-contractual liability for damage regarding compensation for damage suffered by close relations are applicable here too by analogy where the facts of the case call for it. The crucial point is always that the damage must be the consequence of a breach of a duty which is imposed by V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) and V.–2:102 upon an intervener whose intervention is justified in the sense prescribed by V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) and V.–1:102 (Intervention to perform another's duty. Someone who intermeddles in the affairs of another without reasonable ground is liable for any damage which results not under the law of benevolent intervention, but under other provisions – in particular those of Book VI on the law on non-contractual liability for damage.

B. General limits to liability for defective execution of a benevolent intervention (paragraph (1))

Causation. The duty to make reparation for a breach of duty imposed on the intervener as such is limited by various requirements, first and foremost from the perspective of causation.

Damage which has occurred does not generate a claim to reparation if it is attributable to a risk which gave cause for the intervener's measure or, to formulate the same proposition in positive terms, damage is reparable only if it results from the intervention. The intervener must have either created or increased the relevant danger, or else must have deliberately allowed it to continue.

Three situations. It is not enough as regards the required limitation of liability simply to point to the general instrumentality of causation. Rather what is needed is a specific connection between the breach of duty of the intervener and the damage which has occurred. That is because there is a host of cases in which the damage would not have occurred if the intervener had acted in accordance with the prescribed duties, but the damage would have occurred anyway if the intervener had not interfered at all. In situations of this type there has to be an exact examination of attributability of the damage to the intervention. Liability ought to be incurred in only three basic situations: (i) where the intervener has created the risk of damage by the intervention; (ii) where the intervener has not created that risk but has increased it; and (iii) where the intervener has terminated the intervention prematurely without reasonable ground and in the conscious assumption of the risk that damage will follow.

Liability for the realisation of a risk created by the intervener. An intervener is liable for the realisation of a risk of damage which the intervener has brought about. The mere omission to intervene to break a chain of causation which is already in progress does not generate any liability to compensate – even if a reasonable intervener would have behaved differently.

> Illustration 1
> As a result of heavy and sustained rainfall, an entire region is flooded. As the house owner is on holiday and has left no contact address, a neighbour decides to enter the house and rescue a suite of Chippendale chairs. The neighbour is not liable for negligence in failing to see that in the adjoining room there are other Chippendale chairs; nor for negligently failing to appreciate that it would have been more important to remove from the house a considerably more valuable Persian rug.

Liability for the realisation of a risk increased by the intervener. The intervener need not have created the risk; it suffices that it has been enhanced by the intervention.

> Illustration 2
> Customers in a supermarket find a handbag and hand this in at one of the tills. The cashier announces over the loudspeaker that the bag has been found and asks the owner, whose name is read from the identity card contained in the bag, to retrieve it. Since nobody comes to claim it, the cashier hands it back to the customers who found it, as they lead her to believe that they know the owner and will bring it to her. In fact they keep the bag and the money which it contained. The supermarket is liable for the loss because it increased the risk of the ultimate loss of the bag and contents in handing the bag back out, it being secure in the custody of the supermarket's employee following the benevolent intervention in taking possession. The case would be correspondingly the same in Illustration 1 if after rescuing the chairs the neighbour stores them so carelessly that they sustain damage while stored. That damage is attributable to the intervener's breach of duty.

The intervener intentionally perpetuated the risk. The third basic situation is a premature termination of the intervention in breach of duty (V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (2)). This breach of duty too ought not to lead to liability for all damage which results. In addition to the requirement of causation it must be established that the intervener has caused the perpetuation of the risk intentionally.

Illustration 3
Intervener I negligently supposes that all necessary repairs have been completed and thus leaves the scene of action. In fact the problem has not been remedied: a short time later water starts once again to pour out of the damaged pipe. I is not liable to the principal.

Illustration 4
The facts are the same as in Illustration 1, except that in this case the neighbour has carried the chairs out of the adjoining room into the hall, and has left them there, having suddenly become indifferent as to what happens to the chairs. The intervener has intentionally perpetuated the risk.

Intention. The meaning of the term "intention" follows the definition in VI.–3:101 (Intention).

C. Liability for others; multiple interveners

No general liability for other interveners. The text contains neither special rules on liability for the defaults of others nor particular provisions on situations in which several benevolent interveners become active. Liability of the intervener for a failure to choose with care a person to render assistance is already provided for by paragraph (1) in conjunction with V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (1)(a). Since there is no contract between the intervener and the principal governing the measure being undertaken and the intervener is therefore not obliged to the principal to undertake it, a genuine liability for the default of others fundamentally cannot be regarded as justified. The act of engaging another may, of course, be an act of benevolent intervention in itself, from which it follows that the intervener is obliged to surrender to the principal all the rights acquired under the contract made with the engaged third party. The risk of the third party's insolvency is thus borne by the principal and not the intervener. The situation is otherwise where the intervener engages a third party in order to perform an obligation which is already imposed on the intervener, such as the obligation to deliver up and account. In that case the intervener is liable according to general principles for the non-performance of the obligation if the performance has been delegated to a third party who fails in that undertaking.

No joint liability of multiple interveners as a general rule. For the same reasons it did not appear to be justified to include a provision according to which multiple interveners would be jointly liable. Such joint liability may generally only be considered where several interveners are under the duty to undertake the same activity – a situation, however, which will be a rare exception.

D. Reduction of liability (paragraph (2))

General. The provision in paragraph (2) is a means of protecting persons who take care of others or their interests for especially commendable reasons. Paragraph (2) will typically (but not necessarily) operate in favour of emergency rescuers. The policy consideration behind paragraph (2) is therefore tied to one very specific aspect of benevolent intervention: the existence and extent of the (required) element of intention to benefit another. The fundamental belief that helpers who render assistance to another for altruistic reasons should be privileged as regards liability is familiar to all European jurisdictions. Only the means by which this fundamental belief is implemented differ. Some legal systems reduce the applicable standard of care to gross negligence, only granting this privilege to helpers acting in an emergency, whereas other jurisdictions engage a more open reasonableness test without altering the standard of care. Paragraph (2) adheres to the latter model. The fact that in urgent situations of emergency non-professional helpers may easily misreact due to fear or precipitance is already taken into account in the context of the assessment under V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (1)(a): see the comments on that provision. Paragraph (2) therefore does not concern the basis of liability, but relates instead exclusively to the extent of the compensation. It is not confined to cases where the context to the benevolent intervention is the presence of a situation of imminent danger to another's body or health.

The fairness test. Liability may be either reduced or completely excluded under paragraph (2). Whether and to what extent such a reduction of liability (which in a suitable case may be a reduction to nil) applies will depend on a general fairness test ("fair and reasonable"). It must be determined according to the circumstances of the individual case and will depend in particular on the altruistic motive of the acting party.

Illustration 5
Mrs A looks after the estate of Mr X after he has died. She was due to inherit under a will, but has disclaimed the heritance. A dispute arises between Mrs A and Mr X's relatives concerning some animals which Mrs A has entrusted to the care of third parties. With regard to the majority of the animals Mrs A has acted in an exemplary fashion, whereas she has not timeously discharged her duty of information with respect to a goat and a sheep. The liability for damage may be reduced in the light of the altruistic motive of the intervener and the slightness of her oversight.

Illustration 6
A farmer, F, uses a tractor to tow away to the roadside a tree which had been uprooted by a storm; the removal was the responsibility of the local authority. Four months later the local authority has not taken any steps. At night an accident occurs. F has committed a fault by not completely removing the tree from the road and, together with the local authority, is liable to the road user as a joint debtor. However, inter partes F's share in the liability is to be reduced considerably below 50%.

E. Interveners without full legal capacity (paragraph (3))

General liability under the law on non-contractual liability for damage also required. The rule in paragraph (2) alone, however, does not offer the class of persons named in paragraph (3) adequate protection. Such persons ought to be liable to make reparation only if neither the law of benevolent intervention nor the general law on non-contractual liability for damage provides a protection against liability. The most important practical case is to be found in the law relating to the protection of minors and the rules on the minimum age for such liability (see VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen). Comparatively less important (but also to be considered) are the cases in which for other reasons there is liability in the law of benevolent intervention, but not in the general law on non-contractual liability for damage. That may come about because the intervener has infringed the duty imposed by V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (1)(b) to comply with the wishes of the principal, or the duty to continue an intervention (V.–2:101(2)) (which as a rule will be alien to the law of non-contractual liability for damage), or because the intervener has caused a damage which is not legally relevant within the concept of the law on non-contractual liability for damage.

NOTES

I. The basis of the claim for damages

1. The GERMAN CC does not provide for an independent claim for damages within the law of benevolent intervention. If the intervener is in breach of his duties under CC §§ 677 and 681, the principal may claim damages subject to the general requirements of CC § 280, which applies to all breaches of duty. As regards fault, CC § 280 (1) sentence 2 provides for a reversal of the burden of proof in favour of the creditor (in this case the principal). A claim for damages is excluded if an approval by the principal covers the particular mode of managing the affair (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 677, no. 15; § 681, no. 4; § 684, no. 2). The lack of success does not necessarily imply the conclusion that the intervention has been mismanaged (RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], § 677, no. 11). A breach of the duty arising under CC § 681 does not result in a loss of the intervener's claim for reimbursement of expenses incurred (BGH 4 December 1975, BGHZ 65, 354, 356) since the benevolent intervention remains a justified intervention. Although the claim for damages pursuant to CC § 280 includes the 'positive' interest and thus all direct and indirect disadvantages which are the result of the harmful conduct, the liability will only extend to such damage as results from carrying out the intervention. Disadvantages which result from a reasonable though unsuccessful management of the affair are not taken into consideration, because the unauthorised intervener is not under an obligation to achieve a successful intervention (Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 677, no. 20). The principal is to be placed in the position he would have occupied if the intervener had given notice to the principal timeously, abstained from action or informed the principal (BGH loc.cit. 357).
2. A similar legal situation may be found in GREECE. The sole matter of dispute is whether the legal basis for the claim for damages is to be found in the general provisions on non-performance (CC arts. 335 et seq.; Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I/2, 201) or may be derived directly from the provisions of CC arts. 730, 731 (in favour of this solution Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochikon Dikaion II/2, 25). Despite a breach of duty the intervener will retain his claims against the principal (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 730, no. 40).
3. PORTUGUESE CC art. 466 (1) by contrast provides for a separate basis for liability of the intervener for damages: "The intervener is liable to the principal for damage which he causes by defective execution of the management or by an unjustified interruption of the management". CC art. 466 (2) spells out that an intervener acts negligently if he does not act in accordance with the interest and the wishes of the principal. This is in line with CC art. 465 limb (a). Furthermore, the general provisions on liability for damages also apply in the context of the law of benevolent intervention (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 273 ff). The liability of a lawyer who has conducted proceedings without authority is expressly stated in CCP art. 41 (2).
4. AUSTRIAN law also distinguishes between the different types of benevolent intervention with respect to the question of the intervener's liability for damages (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 4/96, p. 185). CC § 1312 limits the intervener's liability in a case of intervention in an emergency (CC § 1036); he will not be held responsible for the want of a successful outcome to his intervention. This will only be otherwise under CC § 1312 if the intervener has "by his fault prevented another from acting who would have achieved a better result". CC § 1312 sentence 2 grants the intervener the possibility to set off the profits gained against the damage sustained. This is considered as a particular case of equalisation of benefits (Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II^2, § 1312 no. 2). The intervener in a case of emergency is also subject to a duty of care; he is liable for damage negligently caused (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, §§ 1036-1040 no. 18), though the urgency of the intervention and the extent of the impending danger will be taken into consideration (Meissel, GoA, 140). As far as 'useful benevolent intervention' is concerned (CC § 1037) CC § 1311 (sentence 2, third alternative) applies. According to this provision the intervener "who without urgency intermeddles with another's affairs" will be liable for all disadvantages which would not have occurred but for his intervention (v. Zeiller, Commentar III § 1311 no. 9 p. 739, gives the example of an intervener who stores the fruit which he has harvested on behalf of the owner at a place where the owner would not have put them and where they are subsequently destroyed by a fire). A fault in venturing the intervention will suffice and the damage need not have been foreseeable (Karollus, Schutzgesetzverletzung, 63; Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, §§ 1036-1040 no. 19). The intervener may set off against his own counterclaims. However CC § 1312 sentence 2 (see above) is not applicable. If the damage caused by the intervener exceeds the benefit brought about this will constitute a case under CC § 1038. Under that provision, in contrast to CC § 1324, the intervener will also be liable (even if only slightly negligent) for 'full satisfaction' and thus also for lost profits (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I^3, § 1038 no. 5; Meissel, GoA, 140 et seq.; the details are, however, a matter of dispute).

5. Under BELGIAN and FRENCH law the principle that the intervener who has breached his duties will be liable for the damage arising as a result is undisputed. However the wording of CC arts. 1372-1375 (apart from the reduction clause in CC art. 1374 (2)) do not further specify either the legal nature or the exact structure of liability. The majority of FRENCH authors hold the opinion that the liability of the intervener is in its nature a tortious one (Viney, Introduction à la responsabilité^2, no. 191 p. 348-349), others argue in favour of a concept of a contractual nature (Acquarone, D. 1986 chron. 21-26), while a yet third group consider it to be sui generis (Starck/Roland/Boyer, Les Obligations^6, no. 2045 p. 713). In BELGIAN legal literature, by contrast, the nearly unanimous view is that the intervener's liability is extra-contractual and thus tortious in nature (Dalcq, Traité de la responsabilité civile, I^2, no. 116 p. 131). The travaux préparatoires on the Belgian Limitation Act, however, reveal that the limitation of actions arising from quasi-contracts are subject to the general provisions on limitation of contractual claims (Parl. St., Kamer, 1997-98, no. 1087/1, p. 8 and 11).

6. Under SPANISH law the liability of the intervener for damages for the breach of duty of care is based on CC art. 1889. The duty to pay compensation will cover all damage which has been caused by the defective management without regard to its nature. CC art. 1106 (which in its wording actually only concerns liability for breach of contract and provides that lost profits are compensable) is applied correspondingly (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Díez-Picazo), Código Civil II, 1946; Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 453; see also Cavanillas Múgica and Tapia Fernández, Concurrencia de responsabilidad, 9). CC art. 1889 requires that the intervener has not acted in accordance with the care of a bonus paterfamilias. Yet his liability is not regarded as tortious, but rather as (quasi-)contractual (Díez-Picazo, loc.cit., Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 130; Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit.). It is disputed whether liability will also arise in a case of slight or the slightest negligence (culpa leve and culpa levissima) (this is answered in the negative by Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Código Civil y compilaciones forales, XXIV, 58; Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 266). As regards liability for breach of the duty to continue the intervention, it has been suggested (so far as this question is at all discussed) that the provisions of tort law apply (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 129).

7. According to the ITALIAN legal approach the liability of an intervener for the malperformance of his duties follows the principles of contract law (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, in Commentario del c. c. Scialoja Branca, IV, Delle obbligazioni, arts. 2043-2059, p. 14). As the principal has no right to claim performance by the intervener it is assumed that only the negative interest will be compensated (i. e. the interest not to suffer any damage from another's interference in one's own sphere of legal interests).

8. Under DUTCH CC the intervener's liability for a breach of his duty of care (CC art. 6:199) is derived from CC arts. 6:74 et seq., i. e. the provisions on liability for non-performance of an obligation. The extent of liability is determined according to the general rules on damages contained in CC arts. 6:95 et seq. (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 299, p. 312-313 and nos. 310-312, p. 320-321; Schrage, Verbintenissen uit andere bron, no. 23, p. 16; Verbintenissenrecht [-Scheltema], Art. 6:199 BW, no. 3).

9. In SCOTLAND the intervener's liability for damages (which is generally acknowledged) is apparently of delictual nature (Harloff, Tartan & Torts, 51; Stair [-Whitty], vol. 15, para 90). No details as to liability for breach of the duty to inform or the duty of care are to be found in the SCANDINAVIAN jurisdictions. Both the legal basis and the extent of such liability may apparently similarly arise out of tort law.

10. In the COMMON LAW liability of the intervener for breach of the duty of care will be a matter of tort law (negligence), though a (concurrent) liability in contract law is possible in those cases of agency of necessity which are based on contract where necessity has operated to impose a duty and confer an authority to act in the unforeseen circumstances. The intervener attempting a rescue (and whose interference is justified by necessity) is only liable in tort if he makes matters worse: East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board v. Kent [1941] AC 74 (no liability in negligently repairing sea will since under no duty to do so and damage no worse than if not had repaired at all), and contrast Capital & Counties plc. v. Hampshire County Council [1997] QB 1004 (where the fire service was liable because in negligently turning off a sprinkler system it enabled the fire to spread more quickly). The burden of proving that negligence has not increased the damage rests on the intervener: Capital & Counties plc. v. Hampshire County Council loc. cit. at 1034 (Stuart-Smith LJ). However, an assumption of responsibility on the part of the intervener may be regarded as creating an affirmative duty to act, in which case the intervener will be liable for the negligent discharge of that duty to assist: cf. Kent v. Griffiths (No. 3) [2001] QB 36 – where, however, there was in any case a public law duty to act.

II. Liability for others; multiple interveners

11. Under GERMAN law several interveners will be liable as joint and several debtors (CC § 427 applied correspondingly) if together they have managed the same affair for the principal (Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], Vor § 677, no. 11; Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], Introd. to §§ 677 et seq., no. 58). A person who has merely acted as an assistant of the intervener, on the other hand, will naturally not be considered as a joint debtor (RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], Vor § 677, no. 103). Interveners acting independently are debtors liable for their own share of the debts (CC § 420; Wittmann, loc.cit.). An example for joint liability of interveners as regards an unjustified intervention (CC § 687 (2)) may be found in BGH 30 January 1959, MDR 1959, 635 (liability of publisher and author for surrender of profits in the case of an infringement of a copyright).

12. Under GREEK law several interveners are jointly liable if they have undertaken common action for the principal (CC art. 926 (1); Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochiko Dikaio II, 14). Interveners who act independently will be jointly liable if (and only if) it is impossible to ascertain whose action has caused the damage (CC art. 926 (2); Kavkas and Kavkas loc.cit.). An intervener is liable for the acts of his assistant according to the rules of CC arts. 330 and 334 (Georgiades/Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 731, no. 1).

13. In contrast to the German and Greek Civil Codes the PORTUGUESE CC art. 467 expressly provides for the case where "two or more interveners have acted solidarily". If so they are jointly liable to the principal (CC arts. 512 et seq., 518 et seq.; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 449, note 1 under art. 467). Under CC art. 512 (1) "a legal relationship is a solidary relationship if every debtor is liable for the entire performance and such performance discharges the debt with respect to all debtors or if each creditor may request the entire performance and such performance discharges the debtor's duty to all creditors." CC art. 524 then provides for the usual rights of recourse in a case of joint debtors.

14. Under AUSTRIAN Law it must be ascertained as a first step whether in fact several interveners have acted or whether one of the active parties has only acted as an assistant to the true intervener. An intervener will be liable for his assistant under CC § 1313a (Meissel, GoA, 150 et seq.). By contrast in the case of several interveners CC § 1011 is thought to apply mutatis mutandis: Klang (-Stanzl), ABGB IV/1[2], 896 CC § 1011 (collective representation). In consequence only the particular intervener who is at fault will be liable.

15. For cases involving a plurality of interveners BELGIAN and FRENCH legal literature as a general rule reject the creation of a responsabilité solidaire. In France this result is reached by analogous application of CC art. 1995. However a judgment holding several interveners liable in solidum is conceivable if the activities of the various interveners cannot be distinguished and thus their exact participation cannot be ascertained (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, Fasc. 20 no. 33; RPDB, v° Quasi-contrat, no. 114).

16. Under SPANISH law (in contrast to the position under the law of mandate, cf. CC art. 1723) several interveners without authority will in general be jointly liable (CC art. 1890 (2)). This does not apply, however, if there were different activities which lack an inherent interrelationship (Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Díez-Picazo], Código Civil II, 1948; Puig Brutau, Compendio II, 602). If the intervener assigns tasks to third parties he will nonetheless remain liable for correct performance – even though the third parties will also be liable to the principal as if they themselves were interveners (CC art. 1890 (1); Díez-Picazo, loc.cit. 1946). Thus the principal may choose against whom he wishes to make his demands; both the actual intervener and the agents the latter has instructed will be liable as joint debtors.

17. The ITALIAN CC does not elaborate on the liability of multiple interveners. CC art. 1716 in para (3) in the context of the law of mandate provides for joint liability in respect of multiple agents, but it is considered not to be applicable to the law of benevolent intervention (Rescigno, Codice civile, sub Art. 2030 CC).

18. Under DUTCH law the intervener may appoint assistants both in his own name and in the name of the principal. This will be relevant in particular if the intervener does not personally possess the expertise necessary for the execution of the measure to be undertaken. Liability for culpable acts of the appointed assistants arises in the context of the duty to continue the intervention (CC art. 6:199 (1)) from CC art. 6:76, though a reduction of liability under CC art. 6:109 is conceivable (Verburg, De vrijwillige zaakwaarneming, no. 66 p. 97; no. 73 p. 109; Schoordijk, Het algemeen gedeelte van het verbintenissenrecht naar het nieuw BW, 417-418). However, it has also been held that an intervener who for good reason leaves the entire intervention to a third party will be freed from the duty to continue the intervention. In this case the intervener is only liable if he makes a poor choice of the third party; he is not liable as such for the latter's defective execution. The third party in such cases assumes the position of the actual intervener (Verbintenissenrecht [-Scheltema], Art. 6:199 BW, note 2. 1).

19. No clear-cut statement of the law could be divined for SCOTTISH law. The legal position within the SCANDINAVIAN jurisdictions is likewise not free from doubts. Several tortfeasors and several contract debtors according to the different statutes will in general be jointly liable. However there is no elaboration as to whether and, if so, in which cases this general principle may also be applied to multiple interveners. In the COMMON LAW too, where necessitous intervention is in any case fragmented into the law of agency, bailment and restitution, the matter depends on the applicable regime governing liability and is not susceptible of a precise general statement.

III. Reduction of liability

20. Most legal systems afford special measures of protection against liability to the intervener. Where such rules exist they consist of a provision which either excludes liability for slight negligence in emergency situations or corresponds to V.–2:103 (Obligations after intervention) paragraph (2). Moreover, general mechanisms for reduction of liability in a case of contributory fault on the part of the person entitled to redress of course also play a role within the law of benevolent intervention.

21. GERMAN CC § 680 provides that the intervener who has acted in order to avert an imminent danger threatening the principal will only be liable for loss caused intentionally or by gross negligence. This reduction of liability only applies inter partes between the intervener and the principal. It relates to both assumption of the intervention and its execution (BGH 30 November 1971, NJW 1972, 475; BGH 16 March 1965, BGHZ 43, 188, 193; CA Hamburg 5 January 1984, VersR 1984, 758), and it modifies the standard of fault under CC § 276 which is generally applicable to claims for damages under CC § 280 (BGH 30 November 1971, NJW 1972, 475). CC § 680 extends to the principal's claims for damages arising under tort law (BGH 20 December 1966, BGHZ 46, 313, 316; BGH 23 March 1966, BGHZ 46, 140, 145). Apart from this a reduction of the intervener's liability may only be considered under the aspect of contributory negligence (CC § 254).

22. Rules corresponding to German CC § 680 may be found in ESTONIAN LOA § 1022 (2), POLISH CC art. 757 and GREEK CC art. 732. Under these provisions the intervener who acts to avert imminent danger is likewise only liable for loss caused intentionally or by gross negligence. The precondition is an immediate danger to the person or property of the principal or one of his relatives (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 732, no. 2; ErmAK [-Sakketas], Art. 732, no. 2). Greek CC art. 732 is thought to apply if the intervener has assumed erroneously but without gross negligence that a situation of imminent danger has arisen (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 3; Sakketas, loc.cit. no. 4). CC art. 732 also has an impact on the claim arising from a tort, but it will not be applied if the intervener has acted contrary to the principal's wishes, which he knew or, had he not been grossly negligent, would have known (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. nos. 4-5).

23. The drafters of the PORTUGUESE Civil Code decided not to adopt a provision corresponding to German CC § 680 (Vieira Gomes, Gestão de negócios, 184 et seq.). They considered the French and Italian model to be preferable (Vaz Serra, Gestão de negócios, 135), but did not implement it specifically in the law of benevolent intervention, adopting instead a general tort law reduction clause in CC art. 294, which is of significance to all obligations to make reparation (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 280-281, 290). Accordingly the duty to compensate for damages in a case of mera culpa may be reduced on grounds of fairness and reasonableness. Those grounds include the economic position of the participants and the presence of a situation of imminent danger. Moreover, a reduction or exclusions of liability may arise in a case of contributory negligence on the part of the principal (CC art. 570). It is likewise possible under HUNGARIAN law to apply the tort law reduction clause (CC § 339 (2)) mutatis mutandis within the law of benevolent intervention.

24. AUSTRIAN CC law does not contain a reduction clause for the intervener's liability to the principal to make reparation. CC § 1312 merely clarifies that a person who has rendered assistance to another in a case of emergency will not be liable merely because he has not succeeded in averting the damage. The case is otherwise only if the active party has prevented a third party who was better qualified to manage the affair from acting. Finally, CC § 1299 provides that an intervener in an emergency will not be subject to an elevated standard of care even if such care was actually required for the management of the affair.

25. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1374 (2) grant the judge discretion to reduce the quantum of reparation according to the circumstances which induced the intervener to intervene – a rule which is described in France as très exceptionnelle because it deviates from the overall principle of full restitution (Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations[9], no. 687 p. 814). However, there is no explicit discussion of whether CC art. 1374 (2) relates to all types of breach of duty or whether it is restricted to the breach of the general duty of care. Only in Belgium has it been argued (Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 69 p. 46) that CC art. 1374 (2) should apply also to claims for damages arising from the infringement of specific duties (such as the duty to render an account). A reduction clause similar to that of French law may also be found in MALTESE CC art. 1017.

26. SPANISH CC art. 1889 (2) allows the courts to reduce the amount of liability according to the circumstances of the particular case or even to reduce it to nothing (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 455). A restriction to liability for intentional conduct and gross negligence (as in all Romance legal systems) is unknown. Typical reasons for a reduction of liability are the urgent character of the necessity to intervene, the intention to avert impending damage bound up with it, as well as the difficulty to correctly assess the situation (Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 456; Paz-Ares/Díez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Díez-Picazo], Código Civil II, 1947). All these aspects, however, – in contrast to the systems under Germanic influence – have no impact on the determination of the severity of fault; they are taken into consideration in the context of the assessment of the amount of damages owed (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 133; of different opinion however Díez-Picazo, loc.cit.). The legal notion underlying CC art. 1889 (2) is reiterated in CC art. 1103 with regard to all cases of contractual liability (Pasquau Liaño, loc.cit.).

27. A court under ITALIAN CC art. 2030 (2) may likewise take into account all aspects which have prompted the intervener to undertake the management of the affair and accordingly reduce the amount of damages. On the other hand, CC art. 1710 (1), under which "liability for negligence is to be judged less severely" in case of a gratuitous mandate is not applicable within the law of benevolent intervention (Cass. 4 October 1956, no. 3336, Rep. Giur. It. 1956, voce Gestione d´affari, nos. 8, 9, 12 and 13; Cass. 20 May 1953, no. 1472, Rep.Giur.it. 1953, voce Gestione d´affari, no. 5). It is, however, emphasised that the claim for damages may be reduced in a case of contributory negligence (CC art. 1227 (1)) if the principal has neglected to attend to his own affairs in an unreasonable manner (Bianca, Diritto civile III, Il contratto[2], 149-150).

28. As regards DUTCH law the rule is that malperformance or non-performance by the intervener of a duty set out in CC 6:199 will give rise to liability for damages under the general rules of CC arts. 6:74 et seq. The fact that the intervener has acted on another's behalf and not in pursuit of his own interests is, though, a factor which the court may take into account in the assessment of the quantum of damages and may thus lead to a reduction on equitable grounds (CC art. 6:109). This may be the case, for example, if an intervener seeks to save the life of another, but by an incautious measure contributes to that person's injury or death. The case is otherwise where an intervener within the meaning of CC art. 6:200 (2) acts in exercise of his profession or trade (M. v.A II, Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 449 and 793; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 496, p. 458-459; Schrage, Mon. Nieuw BW, no. 23 p. 16). The Code does not provide for a special standard of care privileging an intervener. It merely leaves a scope of appreciation to the judge with regard to the assessment of the content of the duty of care in the sense of CC art. 6:199 (1) (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 307 p. 318-319; Schrage, loc.cit.).

29. Since the decision in Kolbin & Sons v. Kinnear & Co. 1931 SC (HL) 128 the general standard of care of a reasonable person applied to his own affairs will be decisive in SCOTLAND. The particulars of the individual case are to be taken into account, which may include the fact that the intervention concerned an emergency (Walker, Principles of Scottish Private Law, II[4],513-514; Leslie, Jur.Rev. 1983, 27). The Institutional Writers intended the intervener's liability in such cases to require gross negligence (Bell, § 541; Erskine, Book III, Volume II, 53), which, judged by the practical results, hardly deviates from the current situation.

30. The solution of German CC § 680 is discussed within SWEDISH legal literature and it has been stated that a comparable solution may be reached inter alia by introducing into the determination of negligence the fact that an emergency situation exists (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 142). As regards DENMARK Vinding Kruse has included a provision similar to German CC § 680 into his draft of a common civil code for the Nordic countries (Vinding Kruse, En nordisk lovbog, 6-14-2 p. 272 et. seq. and 599; idem. A Nordic Draft Code, § 1438 p. 379).

31. ENGLISH law does not address damage caused by interveners on any special basis, the supposition being that the general tort law rules of negligence take sufficient account of the particular circumstances and the difficulties faced by a rescuer: cf. Harrison v. British Railways Board [1981] 3 All ER 679, 686 (finding of contributory negligence on the part of a rescuer rarely appropriate). The Trustee Act 1925, s. 61, enables a court to wholly or partly relieve from liability a trustee who has "acted honestly and reasonably, and ought fairly to be excused", but this anomalous provision (which, according to the case law, is seldom satisfied) is explicable as providing protection for a trustee in respect of (inadvertent) breach of those trust law duties which result in strict liability.

IV. Intervener without full legal capacity

32. GERMAN Law in CC § 682 provides that an intervener lacking full legal capacity will be responsible only under the provisions relating to compensation for torts. This provision has the character of a reference to the legal basis of a tort law claim, which in particular results in the application of CC arts. 827-829 (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 682, no. 2). The provision does not state, however, that CC §§ 677 et seq. are only applicable to interveners who have attained full age (Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 682, no. 1). A similar provision is contained in ESTONIAN LOA § 1022 (5).

33. The legal situation arising under GREEK CC art. 735 is virtually identical. Again there is a statutory reference to the legal basis of a tort law claim (Georgiades/Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 735, no. 7), which ends in CC arts. 915 et seq. (Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochiko Dikaio II, 23). Again CC art. 735 only concerns the question whether an intervener may be held liable; it does not touch upon the possibility of an underage intervener asserting rights provided for under CC art. 736 (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 6).

34. In PORTUGAL the liability of an intervener lacking full legal capacity will be determined by the specific rules on tort law contained in CC arts. 488, 489 and 491 (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 440; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 449, note 5 under Art. 466). Under CC art. 489 (1) a person lacking full legal capacity is liable on equitable grounds but only subsidiarily, i. e. in the event that the intervener is unable to obtain compensation from the person who was obliged to take charge of the person underage. CC art. 489 (2) only imposes a duty to pay such damages as that person can economically afford without putting his own reasonable livelihood at risk. CC art. 491 effects a liability for presumed defective supervision on the part of the supervisor. The person under supervision has a right of recourse against the supervisor, which may be of value if at a later point in time the latter again comes into money. CC art. 488 (1) provides that no one "who at the instant the act was undertaken for whatever reason was unable to understand or to wilfully act" will be accountable for the consequences of a damaging act "unless he has himself culpably brought about such condition of a merely temporary nature." Under CC art. 488 (2) the absence of accountability is presumed with respect to minors under the age of seven and persons which are completely incapacitated due to mental illness. A minor is a person under the age of 18 (CC art. 122); minors between the age of 7 and 18 have limited legal capacity (CC art. 123).

35. The liability for damages of an intervener lacking full legal capacity under AUSTRIAN law is likewise restricted to his liability for tortious acts (CC § 1310) (Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1[2], 893). Differing opinions are held on the issue of the intention to act on another's behalf and the duty to render an account where the intervener lacks full legal capacity and the possibility of ratification by the legal representative (see further Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I[3], § 1035 no. 7).

36. Under BELGIAN and FRENCH law the rules of benevolent intervention are applicable to the relationship between the intervener and the principal without restrictions, unless the one of the parties' lack of full legal capacity excludes the application of the law of benevolent intervention altogether (Marty and Raynaud, Les obligations. I[2]. Les sources, no. 384 p. 398-399, fn. 1; Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 76 p. 48-49). The prevailing opinion characterises liability for damage arising as a result of a breach of duty by an intervener lacking full legal capacity as tortious in nature (Viney, Introduction à la responsabilité[2], no. 191 p. 348-349; Dalcq, Traité de la responsabilité civile I[2], no. 116 p. 131). In the French legal system this leads to the result that the intervener lacking full legal capacity cannot rely on the defence of absence de discernement in order to escape (tortious) liability for an established faute (for references see Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 101 p. 98-99). By contrast, the rule under BELGIAN law is that it is impossible to assert that a person lacking full legal capacity has acted with tortious faute if at the material time that person lacked the ability to distinguish between good and evil (Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 302).

37. SPANISH legal literature (provisions on this point are lacking) is locked in a controversial discussion. Many authors arrive at the conclusion that the general rules on the capacity to conclude legal transactions should be applied (Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Código Civil y compilaciones forales, XXIV, 57), whereas others consider an intervention by a person lacking full legal capacity to be impossible (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 254).

38. Under ITALIAN CC art. 2029 the intervener must have capacity to conclude legal transactions, whereas the ability to be accountable is sufficient in the case of merely physical acts. Where there is accountability, any liability will be tortious (CC art. 2043) (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 27).

39. It appears the issue of liability of an intervener lacking full legal capacity is not discussed in DUTCH law. The solution must be derived from the general rules. Most likely only a tortious liability comes into question since the application mutatis mutandis to the law of benevolent intervention of CC art. 3:32 (which provides that legal transactions conducted by a person lacking full legal capacity are voidable) would lead to the result that liability for non-performance of an obligation (CC art. 6:74) is excluded. On the other hand, the act of a child who has not yet turned 14 pursuant to CC art. 6:174 cannot be characterised as a tort. A child's liability for his own actions is replaced by a parental strict liability (CC art. 6:169).

40. In SCOTTISH law the liability of minors and persons under a disability apparently falls to be decided by the law of delict. Illustrative case law, however, is naturally lacking, because the personal liability of minors will as a general rule be overridden by their parents' liability in respect of supervision (see further Walker, The Law of Delict in Scotland, 86).

41. In SWEDISH law both an intervener lacking full legal capacity, including infants, may be subject to tortious liability if their acts are covered by liability insurance (Damages Liability Act [skadeståndslag (1972:207)] chap. 2 § 4). Moreover (this issue is not dealt with by legal literature) the general rules seem to be applicable. Thus tortious liability is imposed on a person lacking full legal capacity with regard to physical acts (in particular for criminal offences, see HD 22 March 1901, NJA 1901, 129) whereas juridical acts will only come into consideration if the legal representative has ratified such acts. As a general rule a person under the age of 18 will lack full legal capacity and is therefore unable to dispose of his own assets or to bind himself (Parental Code [föräldrabalk (1949:381) chap. 9 § 1). As regards tortious liability under FINNISH and DANISH law see the Finnish Act on Liability for Damages (skadeståndslag) chap. 2 § 2 and the Danish Act on Liability for Damages (EAL) § 24a. Insurance solutions too are of considerable importance for these countries (von Eyben/Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], Ch. 5).

42. In ENGLISH law a minor may be an agent or a bailee, since these arrangements do not depend on the existence of a contract; his minority will not affect his liabilities in tort (arising out of the bailment or gratuitous agency): cf. Clerk and Lindsell (-Jones), Torts[18], para. 4-58. The liability of a person of unsound mind will similarly sound in tort (as to which see Clerk and Lindsell (-Jones), Torts[18], paras. 4-67- 4-68).

Illustration 2 is taken from Cass. civ. 3 January 1985, Bull. civ. 1985 I, no. 5 p. 4; Gaz. Pal. 1985 pan. 90, obs. Piedelièvre; RTD civ. 1985, 575, obs. Mestre; illustration 5 from CA Mons 27 February 1995, Rev. not. b. 1996, 33; and illustration 6 from CFI Zinnik 10 June 1992, TAgrR 1993, 202.

V.–2:103: Obligations after intervention

(1) After intervening the intervener must without undue delay report and account to the principal and hand over anything obtained as a result of the intervention.

(2) If at the time of intervening the intervener lacks full legal capacity, the obligation to hand over is subject to the defence which would be available under VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment).

(3)The remedies for non-performance in Book III, Chapter 3 apply but with the modification that any liability to pay damages or interest is subject to the qualifications in paragraphs (2) and (3) of the preceding Article.

COMMENTS

A. General

Three obligations after intervention. V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty) paragraph (1) sets out the obligations which the party acting encounters after the activity: the obligation to report, to account and to hand over anything obtained as a result of the intervention. Among these, the obligation to hand over may be the most important in the practical application of the law. The intervener's obligation to deliver up extends to everything received by managing the principal's affairs. The intervener is additionally obliged to the principal to give information and an account. The main purpose of these obligations is to support the principal's claim for surrender. The obligation to report, however, is also effective in cases where a claim for surrender is not in consideration. Its purpose is to protect the principal against loss which might occur if the principal has no knowledge of the intervention and therefore refrains from taking necessary decisions or undertakes activity which in the changed circumstances will be wrong or useless. Paragraph (2) limits the claim for surrender vis-à-vis interveners who lack full legal capacity to the enrichment which they still have in possession (see D below).

"After intervening". It will depend on the circumstances of the individual case at what point in time the management of the affair is completed. Frequently the intervention will be terminated as soon as the intervener discharges the duty to inform under V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) with the result that the principal can take charge of matters. The obligation to inform under the present Article may coincide in such cases with the duty under V.–2:101 and may be discharged by the same act. In other cases the intervention will be completed if the dangerous situation which prompted the intervener to take action has been eliminated at least temporarily. Cessation of the intervention also occurs where the intervener decides to cease the management of the affair, whether for good reason or in breach of the duty to continue under V.–2:101(2).

"Without undue delay". All three obligations arising under the present Article have to be performed by the intervener without undue delay. It will not infrequently be the case that the intervener has no knowledge of the principal's identity and reasonable inquiry has been made to no avail; those obligations cannot be discharged before the intervener learns of the principal's identity (name and address).

Obligations and rights. The principal's rights which arise under the presetn Article may be enforced independently because their counterpart on the side of the intervener does not merely represent a duty of care or similar duties (as is the case in V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention)) but are actual obligations. The normal remedies for non-performance of an obligation, including specific performance, are available. This however is subject to the qualifications in paragraphs (2) and (3).

B. The obligations to report and to account

The obligation to report. The intervener is obliged to make every reasonable effort to contact the principal and to give an account of the management of the affair – both after the intervention as well as during it. Thus the intervener is obliged to take the initiative. If the principal learns of the intervention, the intervener will have to provide information on request. If the intervener has not obtained any proceeds from the intervention, the obligations subsequent to the completion of the intervention will be limited to the obligation to provide information. The scope of this obligation will mirror its purpose of making the principal sufficiently aware of the situation as to be able to resume the management of the affair in question. The obligation to provide information is not dependent on the existence of a claim for delivery up; it may be, for example, that the intervener has to disclose the account books or files and allow inspection of them, but is not obliged to hand them over to the principal.

The obligation to account. The obligation to account in essence serves the purpose that the principal may obtain the information necessary to specify his claim for surrender of proceeds of the intervention. From a procedural perspective he may have to bring an action against the intervener by stages. The latter's obligation to account to the principal includes the obligation to provide an orderly and comprehensive overview of the separate expenses incurred and profits obtained which if needs be can be checked. To what extent and by what means this is to be carried out will depend on the circumstances of the case. Moreover the principal's request to account is also subject to the general reservation of the principle of good faith (III.–1:103 (Good faith and fair dealing) paragraph (1). In a case of spontaneous assistance, such as between persons living in the same house or neighbours, much less may be demanded than in the case of management without authority of another's substantial assets or business. Here, depending on the circumstances, the obligation to account may perhaps only be discharged by supplying accounts satisfying professional standards.

> Illustration 1
> I, the daughter-in-law of a mentally disabled elderly man who has been admitted to a psychiatric institution for that reason, takes care of her father-in-law for a period of several years. His insurance company has remitted to her account the insurance payments which were owed to him. Out of this money I has made small expenditures for her father-in-law's benefit (clean bed linen, fruit, chocolate, cigarettes, taxi fares, replacement of glasses and alarm-clocks which he regularly breaks, etc.) until the death of the latter's wife, who consented to the expenditure. On the death of the father-in-law his heirs claim surrender of the insurance payments subject to a deduction of the expenses – specified precisely. The daughter-in-law cannot provide an account for these various minor expenses which in their entirety add up to a considerable sum, the more so, as she will not have received a receipt for the majority of these purchases. It would be contrary to the principle of good faith to request an account with a detailed list of all expenses. A rough estimation will suffice.

C. The obligation to deliver up

The most important economic obligation of the intervener. The obligation to deliver up to the principal all that has been acquired as a result of the intervention is in practice the most important obligation of the intervener. It is recognised in all jurisdictions of the European Union and follows from the nature of benevolent intervention as management of another's affairs with the intention of benefiting another. It is part of its character that the intervener may neither be enriched nor suffer a disadvantage. The intervener acts on behalf of another; as a general rule the intervener's own financial situation should not be altered either positively or negatively. Thus the obligation to hand over all proceeds of the intervention finds its counterpart in the claim for compensation for expenses incurred under V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement).

Illustration 2
A person who collects the rent for the absent owner of a house must deliver up the money received.

Content and extent of the obligation to surrender. The principal's right to have what has been acquired surrendered (corresponding to the obligation of the intervener to deliver up) typically relates to the payment of monies received. More often than not it concerns the collection of receivables or the proceeds from the sales of another's goods (e. g. from the forced sale of perishable goods) or other assets (management of a bank deposit or sale of stocks). However, it may also occur that the intervener is obliged to hand over specific objects or documents. An example of the former is where the intervener has purchased a thing for the principal, but not as a representative of the principal, and the latter has subsequently ratified the intervention (cf. Illustration 30 at V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another)); the second situation may occur where the intervener has received a debtor's bond from the creditor, who in the meantime has been paid. The intervener may offset the claim for reparation against the principal's claim to deliver up proceeds or, as the case may be, withhold delivery until such time as the principal offers payment of the compensation due to the intervener.

Illustration 3
I in the course of a benevolent intervention purchases goods at a bargain price from X for P. For this transaction I has accepted a promise of a premium from X. If P pays the purchase price to I, then I must assign the right to the premium vis-à-vis X to P and transfer ownership of the goods to P.

Interest. The intervener has to deliver up "anything" obtained as a result of the intervention. Consequently this also includes interest on the monies received. If the intervener in the course of the benevolent intervention has received money and deposited it in an interest-bearing account, the claim for delivery up encompasses the interest as well as the money because the interest was received as a result of the conduct of the principal's affairs. If, however, the intervener has not deposited the money to earn interest, the question will arise whether the failure to do so was a breach of the duty of care under V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (1)(a) and (b). If there is no breach (because, for example, the intervener could not reasonably risk tying up the money for a long time in a savings account, though it later emerges that the intervener was only able to discover the principal's identity some six months later), then the principal has no claim for the interest foregone. On the other hand, if the intervener employs the money for the intervener's own purposes, this enrichment is being appropriated. The intention to benefit the intervener having at this point in time exhausted itself, the interest-earning deposit is not an act pursuant to the benevolent intervention. The basis for the principal's claim in that case is not one of damages for breach of the duty of care, but rather under the law of unjustified enrichment, or, as the case may be, under the law on non-contractual liability for damage.

D. Protection of interveners without full legal capacity

Paragraph (2). Although interventions by persons who lack full legal capacity are rare, they still occur. Children and mentally disabled adults may not be capable of binding themselves by way of contract, but they may nonetheless act as benevolent interveners if they can command sufficient capacity in fact to form the intention to look after the interests of another. They therefore enjoy the full legal protection of the law of benevolent intervention; they can look not merely to the rights conferred by V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement), but also to the protective mechanism of paragraph (2) which circumscribes their potential liability. This group of persons is only liable to the extent they are still enriched after the intervention: they are able to invoke the defence which is available in the law of unjustified enrichment based on change of position (VII.–6:101 (Disenrichment)). However, as paragraph (2) incorporates a defence from another Book by reference, the notion of good faith to be applied in this context, where the intervener can be expected to know at the moment of intervention of the prospective obligation to hand over any benefits obtained, may require a modified construction.

Lack of full legal capacity. The prerequisites for a person to enjoy full legal capacity and the different shades of less than full legal capacity do not form the subject-matter of these model rules. The only statement which can be made in this respect is that paragraph (2) applies in any event to interventions which consist of physical acts. No statement can be made as to which conditions enable a minor, either acting alone or with the consent of a legal representative, to effect or conclude juridical acts. For the time being the text assumes that every minor may rely on the defence of change of position. This includes a minor who has acted with the consent of a parent or legal representative. It may well be the case that this principle will require re-consideration if at some future date European model rules on the liability of minors and other persons lacking full legal capacity are formulated.

NOTES

I. Obligation to inform and obligation to render an account

1. The above mentioned duties are recognised in all jurisdictions of the European Union which provide for a distinct law of benevolent intervention. Where they are not already provided for in the text of the Civil Codes themselves, they have been developed by case law and supported in legal literature.

2. GERMAN CC § 681 sentence 2 refers to the law of mandate, where the same duties may be found in CC § 666. The intervener is obliged to inform the principal of the particulars of the intervention in accordance with generally acknowledged standards and to provide an overview of what he has undertaken, even where those activities do not lead to a duty to surrender under CC § 681 in conjunction with § 667 (BGH 30 November 1989, BGHZ 109, 260, 266). The duty to give an account arises as a rule after the completion of the intervention; in a case of incomplete execution it arises immediately after termination. The duty to account includes – beyond mere information – a duty to substantiate the information by providing an orderly account of receipts and expenses. The intervener has the burden of proving the accuracy of the account and in particular the whereabouts of funds received and that he has disposed of assets in accordance with the principal's instructions or in the latter's interest (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 666, nos. 2-4). HUNGARIAN CC art. 486 (1) (for details see Ujlaki, Gazdaság és Jog 10/2001, 24-25), POLISH CC art. 753 (2) as well as CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC art. 746 are based on very similar concepts.

3. Similarly, GREEK CC art. 734 imposes on the justified intervener accessory duties derived from the law of mandate. The latter provides for a duty to render an account and thereby refers impliedly to CC art. 303 (Georgiades/Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 718, no. 2). Under that provision the management of another's affair (which has since finished) must result in income or expenditure (Georgiades/Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 719, no. 2). Otherwise a duty to provide an account will not arise.

4. PORTUGUESE CC regulates the duty to provide information about the intervention undertaken in art. 465 limb d and the duty to render an account in art. 465 limb c.

5. AUSTRIAN CC § 1039 obliges the intervener to give an account just as an agent is obliged to (CC § 1012). The claim enables the principal to check the management undertaken and the expenses incurred (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1039 no. 3). The duty to render an account applies to all types of benevolent intervention (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, §§ 1036-1040 no. 17; Meissel, GoA, 164 et seq., Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1039 no. 7), including merely negligent unjustified intervention in another's affairs (OGH 11 May 1976, SZ 49/63; OGH 14 October 1986, RdW 1987, 51; see, however, OGH 22 November 1994, SZ 67/207).

6. Under BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURG law the obligation de rendre compte is conceived as one of the main duties of the intervener (Carbonnier, Les obligations^{21}, no. 299 p. 498). It is derived from CC art. 1372 (2) and the corresponding application of the rules on the contract of mandat (CC art. 1993) (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, Fasc. 20 no. 40; RPDB, v° Quasi-contrat, no. 61 p. 16). The intervener has to inform the principal comprehensively about the management of the affair (le Tourneau, Rép. Dr. Civ., Bd. VI, v° Gestion d´affaires [2002], no. 81; CA Mons 27 February 1995, Rev. not. b. 1996, 33). Furthermore, under CC art. 1993 there is an obligation on the intervener to hand over all that he has received in the course of the management (le Tourneau, loc.cit.). The only exception from this obligation de rendre compte granted to an intervener is force majeure; otherwise he will be liable in a case of non-performance for damages (Bout, loc.cit. nos. 41-42). The form in which the account is provided will be determined by the particular circumstances of the individual case; in a long-term management concerning the private affairs of another, an oral report of the separate measures taken, giving the principal the opportunity to request further particulars, may suffice (CA Mons 2 March 2004, JT 2004, 555).

7. SPANISH CC (as opposed to Ley 560 of the Nueva Compilación of the law of NAVARRA) likewise does not contain an explicit provision on the duty to render an account. Here again this duty has been repeatedly confirmed by the case law (inter alia by TS 13 June 1956, RAJ 1956 (1) no. 1948 p. 1312). The duty to provide an account applies to all persons who manage the affairs of another (whether or not on a contractual basis). The intervener has to recount the measures undertaken and to provide information in an orderly account of all receipts and expenses. Under ITALIAN law too it is undisputed that after completion of the management of the affair the intervener is subject to the duty to render an account as provided for in the law of mandate (CC art. 1713 (1)) (Breccia, La gestione d´affari^2, 897; Cass. 7 June 1993, no. 6358, Giust. Civ. Mass. 1993, 998).

8. DUTCH CC art. 6:199 (2) contains both a general duty of information and the duty to render an account. The intervener must provide information as soon as reasonably possible and if he has either received monies or incurred expenses he must also give an account of these transactions (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 793-794; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 309 p. 320).

9. The gestor's 'duty to account for intromissions' in SCOTLAND is considered to be self-evident (Bell § 541; Stair, Institutions, Book I, 8, 4; Erskine, Book III, Volume II, 52; Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, vol. 15, para 132). It corresponds to the intervener's claim for reimbursement of expenditure. Where there are multiple interveners, each intervener will only have to render an account on the share which he took in the intervention (Whitty, loc.cit.).

10. A duty to provide an account is unknown under SWEDISH law. Under the Swedish Interest Act [räntelag (1975:635)] § 3 (2) (cf. on this HD 16 September 1997, NJA 1997, 612) the duty to pay default interest begins the same day as an account would have had to be provided. Legal literature argues in favour of a corresponding application of the law of mandate to the management of another's affair without authority (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 57). This points to Ccom chap. 18 § 9, a rule which concerns the law of limitation and is itself a highly contentious rule (Lindskog, Preskription[2], 161 et seq.). According to this provision the principal's claims are subject to a one year limitation period which starts to run from the day the mandate was completed and the account rendered (for details see HD 14 September 1998, NJA 1998, 520; Lindskog, loc.cit. 163; Millqvist, JT 1998-99 p. 387-390 and Kleineman, Festskrift Walin, 207-225).

11. In ENGLISH LAW an equitable jurisdiction to order an agent to give an account to his principal is of long-standing: see Snell (-Baker/Langan), Equity[29], pp. 637-638. Even a self-appointed agent is under a duty to give an account: see, for example, Brown v. Litton (1711) 1 P Wms 140, 24 ER 329; 10 Mod 20, 88 ER 606.

II. The duty to surrender

12. The intervener's duty to surrender is of considerable importance. GERMAN CC provides for this duty in §§ 681 (sentence 2) and 667. The intervener has to deliver up all that he has received in the course of the intervention, including the entire profits realised (MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 681, no. 7; Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], § 681, no. 3; Erman [-Ehmann], BGB I[10], § 681, no. 3). By CC § 687 (2) the scope of application of the duty to deliver up is extended to the cases of disbursements out of profits in cases of arrogated management of another's affair, which are of particular practical relevance (for details see MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 687, nos. 10, 21). POLISH CC art. 753 (2) sets out in one breath both the duty to deliver up proceeds and the duty to render an account. ESTONIAN LOA § 1021(1) corresponds to the rule provided for in V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty) paragraph (1).

13. In GREECE it is also assumed that the intervener's duty to surrender also includes profits which he has made (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 734, no. 3). In the case of impure negotiorum gestio, however, the balance of interests is thought to lead to a different result: it is suggested that the intervener may keep the profit which he has brought about by his own personal expertise (Papanikolaou loc.cit. Art. 739, no. 10; Kallimopoulos, I mi gnisia dioikisi allotrion, 189).

14. Under PORTUGUESE CC art. 465 limb (e) the intervener is obliged to deliver up all that he has received from third parties in the course of the management of the gestão or the balance of the account. The intervener also has to surrender proceeds obtained by legal transactions he has conducted in his own name or the name of the principal. The intervener must return not only the lucrum ex re, but also the lucum propter negotiationem perteptum (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em Geral I[10], 464).

15. The AUSTRIAN CC does not explicitly provide for the intervener's duty to surrender. However, that duty is recognised and is derived by an analogy with the law governing the contract of mandate (CC § 1009) (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1039 no. 4). If the intervener disputes the fact that he intended to act in another's interest, the principal's claim for surrender will be derived from the intrusion into the legal sphere of the person who has suffered damage or whose rights have been infringed. The claim for surrender in that cases arises out of unjustified enrichment (Meissel, GoA, 168; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1039 nos. 4 and 7).

16. In both the FRENCH and the BELGIAN legal systems the duty to surrender is conceived as a sub-category of the duty to render an account (CC art. 1372 (2) in conjunction with art. 1993). Under this provisions the intervener is obliged to deliver up to the principal all that he has received in the course of the intervention (le Tourneau, Rép.Dr.Civ. VI, v° Gestion d´affaires (2002), no. 81; Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 74 p. 47-48).

17. The SPANISH CC only provides for a duty to surrender proceeds obtained in the context of the law of mandate and not in the rules on benevolent intervention. Under CC art. 1720 the intervener is obliged to deliver up to the principal all that he has received as a consequence of the mandate, whether or not the benefits received were due to the principal. Legal literature considers it to be self-evident that this duty to surrender also applies to the regime of benevolent intervention, but to date can only rely on case law concerning the law of mandate (amongst other cases TS 19 December 1983, RAJ 1983 (3) no. 6967 p. 5355; TS 6 October 1994, RAJ 1994 (4) no. 7459 p. 9703). The duty to surrender profits is placed in the context of the duty to render an account and in part even is deduced from it (for details see Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 267; Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 489; Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 135). A distinction is drawn between the duty to return what the intervener has obtained from the principal and the duty to deliver up what the intervener has received from third parties or has been created in the course of the intervention. Both duties, some authors maintain, are intended to prevent an unjustified enrichment of the intervener (Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 489). However, the particulars are barely explained and it is an open question whether the rules of the law on the owner-possessor-relationship are to be applied to the duty to make restitution by analogy (this is supported by Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 492). A further provision which is regarded as applicable by analogy is CC art. 1730. It provides that the agent may retain the assets, which are the object of the mandate, as a security until the principal discharges his duty to compensate (Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 1730).

18. The intervener is also obliged under ITALIAN law to deliver up to the principal all he has obtained on the occasion of the intervention. If the intervention concerned the purchase of movable goods, the intervener is obliged to hand over the profit obtained (which need not necessarily match the value of the asset): see Cass. 16 February 1949, no. 255, Rep.Giur.it. 1949, voce Gestione d´affari, no. 2- 11; voce Obbligazioni e contratti no. 110. This conforms to the rule on the law of mandate in CC art. 1713.

19. Under DUTCH law the duty to deliver up is derived from the general duty of care under CC art. 6:199 (1). If the intervener takes control of assets which belong to the principal then the intervener is obliged to take care of them and to return them to the principal at the completion of the action, including any profits realised. If the intervention was unjustified the duty to surrender is not subject to a corresponding right of retention with regard to expenses incurred (Verbintenissenrecht [-Scheltema], Art. 6:199, no. 2. 2). More generally it may be said that the legislature considered the duty to surrender to be self-evident and has therefore not provided for further rules on the matter. The scope of the duty to surrender falls to be determined in the particular circumstances of each individual case (MvA. II Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 794).

20. Similarly under SCOTTISH law the "gestor's duty to surrender all fruits and profits earned from the gestio" is beyond question (Bell, § 541; Stair, Institutions, Book I, 8, 4; Erskine, Book III, Volume II, 52). It includes the duty to surrender interest actually obtained or which according to commercial usage could have been obtained (Erskine loc.cit.; Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, vol. 15, para 133).

21. Under SWEDISH law it is stated (as in Spain) that the duty to render an account will also encompass a duty to deliver up what the intervener has in possession for the principal. In this respect an analogous application of the law of mandate is supported (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 57). As regards his counterclaim against the principal, the intervener has at most a right of retention which operates against the principal alone and not (as under the DANISH [cf. further CFI 4 March 1959, UfR 1959, 678 and CA 28 June 1973, UfR 1973, 696] and SWEDISH Commission Act § 32 in the case of the commission agent) a right of retention by operation of law effective also against third parties (HD 19 March 1985, NJA 1985, 205; cf. amongst others Håstad, Sakrätt avseende lös egendom[6], 350). The same must apply to the intervener without authority (Håstad, loc.cit.).

22. In ENGLISH law an agent, whether authorised or merely self-appointed, is liable to surrender any profit obtained if it belongs at law or in equity to the principal or is obtained by use of property of the principal or his position and opportunities as agent (unless its retention is authorised by the principal): see, for example, De Bussche v. Alt (1878) 8 Ch. D 286, 304 (Hall VC, affirmed by CA); for an older authority more closely concerned with necessitous intervention, see Brown v. Litton (1711) 1 P Wms 140, 24 ER 329; 10 Mod 20, 88 ER 606, where on the death of the ship's captain in the course of a voyage a mate took it upon himself to invest money which the captain had taken with him for that purpose (notifying the widow to that effect) and was compelled to surrender the profits, subject to an allowance for his labour and skill in managing the property, his liability not being limited as he argued to a repayment plus interest. The principle even applies where the agent has entered into transaction which the principal himself could not have entered into: Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co. v. Farnham [1957] 1 WLR 1051, 1058 (Harman J); Boardman v. Phipps [1967] 2 AC 46 (agents of a trust making investments outside the trustees' powers). This follows from (or in cases perhaps extends) the principle that a fiduciary is not entitled to make an unauthorised profit from assets belonging to or held for the person on whose behalf the fiduciary acts: the fiduciary is liable to surrender it (less appropriate deductions for his personal contribution to the profit in the form of expertise and work). See Hugh Stephenson & Sons Ltd. v. Carton Nagen Industrie AG [1918] AC 239, 250 (Lord Atkinson) (a case concerning a partnership, but see p. 256 for explicit confirmation that the principle applies to agents). However, where the agent has a right to reimbursement from the principal, the agent will have a right of retention in the form of a possessory lien to protect that claim: Petrinovic & Co. Ltd. v. Mission Francaise des Transports des Maritimes (1941) 71 Lloyd's L. Rep 208, 222 (Atkinson J) and see also Tetley & Co. v. British Trade Corp. (1922) 10 Lloyd's L. Rep. 678 (where the claim for reimbursement of the cost of transporting the principal's goods could be set off against the proceeds of sale which the agent was otherwise liable to deliver up to the principal).

III. In particular: the duty to pay interest on monies received

23. If the intervener in the course of his intervention has collected money for the principal then in the majority of the jurisdictions he will have to pay interest on the monies if and only if he has actually obtained that interest. GERMAN CC § 681 (sentence 2) in conjunction with § 668, however, places on a par with that case the situation where the intervener has used monies received for his own purposes (in particular: spent it) despite his duty to deliver it up to the principal or use it for the principal's purposes. The fact that the intervener has merely delayed his handing over of the money, or its application for the principal's purposes, does not by itself trigger a duty to pay interest. Moreover, the duty to pay interest as a rule depends on neither fault, delay nor the occurrence of any damage for the principal. The duty to pay interest arises from the date the intervener has used the monies for his own purpose and in a case of mixing the funds with his own monies from the time the combined monies were spent. The interest rate will be determined by CC § 246 (4%) and Ccom § 352 (5 %).

24. The legal situation in GREECE is similar. An intervener who has not himself obtained interest is only obliged to pay it if he has self-interestedly used the principal's monies for his own purposes (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 734, no. 1; Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I/2, 201). Only sporadically is it maintained that the intervener is also obliged to pay interest if (on the basis of general practice and the actual or presumed wishes of the principal) the omission to profitably invest the money was culpable (so ErmAK [-Saketas], Art. 734 no. 4).

25. PORTUGUESE CC art. 465 limb e sets out the duty to pay interest in express terms: "The intervener must surrender all that he has obtained from third parties as a result of the intervention or the balance of the corresponding accounts and in the case of money together with statutory interest from the time when the claim for surrender has fallen due." Statutory interest (CC art. 559 (1)) thus accrues from the time the delivery up should have taken place and not merely from the time the court determines the balance (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em Geral I^{10}, 465). A corresponding rule is provided for in POLISH CC art. 753 (2), which likewise obliges the intervener to pay statutory interest.

26. Under AUSTRIAN law the duty to surrender (which has been developed by case law to go beyond the wording of the ABGB) undisputedly also encompasses the interest actually obtained and capital gains (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, § 1009 no. 17 with further references). Although the case law mostly concerns the law of mandate (OGH 12 January 1926, SZ 8/18; OGH 11 March 1924 SZ 6/103; OGH 29 October 1952, SZ 25/286), it may arguably be inferred from OGH 26 November 1981, SZ 54/176, that the claim for surrender of proceeds in the law of benevolent intervention is limited to the surplus actually generated.

27. In FRENCH and BELGIAN law CC art. 1996 may be applied to the law of benevolent intervention by way of analogy (JClCiv (-Bout], Art. 1372-1375, Fasc. 20 no. 30; Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 75 p. 48). Under this provision the mandataire has to pay interest on the sums which he has applied for his own benefit from the day he has made use of them. For all other amounts he will only be obliged to pay interest from the day of default. Thus interest on money which he has applied for the benefit of the principal will only accrue from the time of delay in performance, whereas interest on the money he used for his own benefit will accrue immediately (Bout, loc.cit.).

28. The starting point of SPANISH law is the general principle that the principal is entitled to all benefits arising from an intervention (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 162). Thus the intervener will also have to deliver up all interest he has obtained on monies collected. Legal literature in explaining this principle refers to the rules on the owner-possessor-relationship (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 492). Under CC art. 455 a possessor in bad faith must deliver up all profits and all benefits obtained which the person entitled could have acquired. This too encompasses interest. Other authors rely for the same result on a reference to CC art. 354 (3), which provides that the owner is also entitled to the civil fruits (Pasquau Liaño, loc.cit. 163).

29. The rules of ITALIAN law are that the intervener has to deliver up interest actually obtained and must do so even if these are higher than the statutory interest rate; if the intervener has only kept the monies safe without investing it profitably, he is not obliged to pay interest on it; if, by contrast, he has disposed of the amounts in his own interest, statutory interest becomes due from that point of time onwards (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 37).

30. In DUTCH law the question of whether or not the intervener is obliged to pay interest has attracted scant attention. In the Parlamentaire Geschiedenis only the opposite situation is expressly considered, namely whether the intervener who has spent his own assets or money may also claim interest foregone (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 795). The question discussed is considered as one aspect of the intervener's general duty of care regarding the monies collected. It is held that depending on the circumstances he may be obliged to invest the money profitably (Schoordijk, Het algemeen gedeelte van het verbintenissenrecht naar het nieuw BW, 417; Verbintenissenrecht [-Scheltema], art. 6:199 BW, no. 2. 2).

31. In SCOTLAND the duty to surrender profits includes interest actually gained and interest which according to commercial usage in general are achieved (Erskine, Book III, Volume II, 52; Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, vol. 15, para 133).

32. The legal situation in the NORDIC COUNTRIES is rather difficult to ascertain. Express rules on the law of benevolent intervention are lacking. The application of the 'general principles of mandate law' which relate to the duty to render an account would lead to the result that the intervener is obliged to pay interest on the monies collected (Lindskog, Lagen om handelsbolag och enkla bolag. 418). A duty of the agent to pay interest, for instance, may be found in the SWEDISH Act on Floating of Timber [lag (1919:426) om flottning i allmän flottled] § 20 (3) and similarly in the Swedish Act regarding Factors [lag (1991:981) om värdepappersrörelse] chap. 3 § 5). It is considered part of the duty to account that, firstly, the sums may not be mixed with the assets of the agent and, secondly, that they must be placed in a manner which serves the interests of the principal (Hellner, Speciell Avtalsrätt II: Kontraktsrätt. 1. volume: Särskilda avtal[3], 209). Where the monies have been kept separate and invested with due diligence, the duty to surrender profits will be limited to the interest actually obtained. Whether or not the general principles of mandate law may be applied without restriction to benevolent intervention in another's affair has not yet been decided by case law. Arguments supporting that solution may be found in the Swedish Interest Act § 3 (2), which provides that interest is due on "a claim which is founded on the fact that an agent or another has to render an account with respect to sums he has received from the principal or from a third party" from the day that the account has been rendered or, as the case may be, ought to have been rendered. An example for this is where a person sells a thing for another and subsequently to the sale collects the purchase price for the former owner (HD 16 September 1997, NJA 1997, 612, 621, where it is expressly stated that the duty to render an account does not depend on the existence of a contract).

33. In ENGLISH LAW an agent will have to account for interest which has actually accrued if the money in his hands is regarded as belonging at law or in equity to his principal (except in so far as a right to retain interest has been agreed): see Bowstead (-Reynolds/Graziadei), Agency[1], Article 54. Moreover, an agent may also be liable for interest which, by prudent investment, he would have obtained if he in retaining the money improperly or failing to invest it he has committed a breach of an equitable duty: cf. Re Waterman's Will Trusts [1952] 2 All ER 1054 (Harman J) (breach of duty as trustee); Wallersteiner v. Moir (No. 2) [1975] QB 373 (company director misusing company funds).

IV. Intervener without full legal capacity

34. GERMAN CC § 682 contains a particular provision for the protection of an intervener who does not possess full legal capacity. It has also been the model for V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty) of these Principles. If the intervener lacks legal capacity or is restricted in his legal capacity, then under § 682 he is only held liable according to the provisions on compensation for torts and the rules on the surrender of unjustified enrichment. However, as far as unjustified enrichment law is concerned the reference made is a reference to the legal basis of a claim (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 682, no. 2). Thus the provision does not state that CC §§ 677 et seq. are only applicable to persons over the age of majority (Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 682, no. 1). However, in the legal literature (there is no case law on this point) it is disputed whether CC § 682 is also applicable to legal transactions effected by an underage person if the legal representative has granted consent (or if it should only be applied to physical acts of benevolent intervention or legal transactions which lack the consent of the statutory representative), cf. MünchKomm (-Seiler), BGB[3], § 682, no. 2 et seq.

35. Provisions corresponding to CC § 682 may be found in ESTONIAN LOA § 1021(2) and in GREEK CC art. 735. Under these provisions the person lacking legal capacity (in the former case) and a minor (in the latter) will similarly be liable only according to the provisions of unjustified enrichment law. Again the statutory reference is confined to a reference to the legal basis of the claim (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 735, no. 7). It only relates the liability of the intervener; it does not prevent a relationship of benevolent intervention involving a person lacking full legal capacity from arising in the first place (Papanikolaou loc.cit. no. 1). Where the activity undertaken takes the form of the conclusion of a legal transaction, the want of legal capacity implies no benevolent intervention can subsist (Papanikolaou loc.cit. no. 2). The scope of application of CC art. 735 is thus restricted to purely physical acts. An intervener who is a minor is not afforded the protection of this rule if his parents have ratified the legal transaction he has conducted (Papanikolaou loc.cit. no. 5).

36. A provision similar to German CC § 682 is not known in the PORTUGUESE CC. Under AUSTRIAN law an intervener lacking full legal capacity is only obliged to deliver up in accordance with the provisions of unjustified enrichment law (The only point in dispute is whether the same also applies with regard to a minor's claim for reimbursement of expenditure: cf. Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1[2], 893.) A person lacking full legal capacity is not obliged to continue an intervention once commenced (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], § 1035 no. 4). Many further details (determination of the intention to act on another's behalf, duty to render an account, possibility of ratification by a legal representative) are a matter of dispute (for details see Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I[3], § 1035 no. 7).

37. According to BELGIAN legal literature if the intervener lacks full legal capacity the benevolent intervention will be a nullité. The nullité, however, is relative: only the person lacking full legal capacity may rely on this defect. If he does so the law of benevolent intervention is rendered inapplicable with retroactive effect; it will then be supplanted by CC arts. 1310 and 1312. Thus the person lacking full legal capacity will only be liable in accordance with tort law and unjustified enrichment law. If the person lacking full legal capacity does not invoke the nullité relative the relationship between him and the principal will be governed by the rules of benevolent intervention (Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 76 p. 48-49). In FRENCH legal literature a majority opinion is that the intervener's lack of full legal capacity will only be relevant if the intervener concludes the juridical act in his own name; in the case of a mere acte matériel or an acte juridique concluded in the name of the principal the intervener's capacité juridique will be irrelevant (only in the latter case is it of importance that the principal has full legal capacity). A juridical act conducted in his own name may by contrast be declared void; in this case no benevolent intervention arises (Marty and Raynaud, Les obligations I[2]. Les sources, no. 384 p. 398-399). To the extent that intervention without authority by a person lacking full legal capacity remains possible they do not enjoy any special protection (Marty and Raynaud, loc.cit., fn. 1).

38. Nor does the SPANISH CC contain an explicit protection for underage interveners. Legal literature opts for the analogous application of the provisions on formation of contracts (Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Código Civil y compilaciones forales, XXIV, 57). Some authors even consider an intervention by a person lacking full legal capacity to be impossible; such persons, it is argued, cannot bind themselves either by a contrat or by a quasi-contractual act (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 254). An approach similar to that of V.–2:102 (Reparation for damage caused by breach of duty) paragraph (2), however, is afforded by CC art. 1304, which provides that "if the nullity (of the contract) is a result of the intervener's lack of legal capacity the person lacking legal capacity is only obliged to surrender the asset or monies he has received in so far as he is enriched." This is considered to afford sufficient protection to a person lacking full legal capacity (Lacruz Berdejo, loc.cit.).

39. Under ITALIAN CC art. 2029 (which on this point has a corresponding rule in MALTESE CC art. 1013) the intervener as a general rule must have the capacity to conclude contracts; as regards mere physical acts, however, accountability for one's actions is sufficient. Juridical acts concluded by a person lacking legal capacity are ineffective vis-à-vis the principal. Moreover, juridical acts concluded in his name cannot bind him in relation to third parties (Bianca, Diritto civile, Il contratto[2], 142). In the case of an intervention which benefits the principal, the law of unjustified enrichment applies; in the case of a detrimental intervention, tort law will apply (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 27).

40. DUTCH Law does also not have a special provision on the protection of minors or other interveners lacking full legal capacity. However, it is recognised that a person lacking full legal capacity can undertake as a benevolent intervention both physical acts and such legal acts as he effects in the name of the principal. Juridical acts which the person lacking legal capacity effects in his own name are voidable under CC art. 3:32 (2) (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 304 p. 316; Verbintenissenrecht [-Heisterkamp], Art. 6:198 BW, no. 15).

41. Under SCOTTISH law the liability of minors and mentally disabled persons arising from quasi-contract is restricted to the surrender of an unjustified enrichment, and thus also the liability incurred by benevolent intervention (Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, vol. 15, para 141). The NORDIC countries do not provide for specific rules on an intervener lacking full legal capacity. In ENGLISH law a minor and other persons without full capacity to contract on their own behalf may nonetheless act as an agent unless lacking sufficient mental capacity (cf. Bowstead (-Reynolds/Graziadei), Agency[17], article 5) and in principle may act as an agent of necessity. Even where such agency is non-contractual, an agent remains in principle subject to the duty to hand over the principal's money and to surrender any unauthorised profit. Where no agency can be established, the intervener's liability will in any case be governed by the law of restitution (unjustified enrichment).

Illustration 1 is taken from CA Mons 2 March 2004, JT 2004, 555, and illustration 3 from RG 14 November 1919, Das Recht 1920 no. 628.

CHAPTER 3: RIGHTS AND AUTHORITY OF INTERVENER

V.–3:101: Right to indemnification or reimbursement

The intervener has a right against the principal for indemnification or, as the case may be, reimbursement in respect of an obligation or expenditure (whether of money or other assets) in so far as reasonably incurred for the purposes of the intervention.

COMMENTS

A. Two core elements of benevolent intervention

Chapter 3 in overview. The subject-matter of Chapter 3 consists of the rights of the intervener and the authority to act in the name of the principal (V.–3:106). V.–3:102 concerns the right to remuneration of interveners who act in the course of their profession or trade, V.–3:103 concerns the right to reparation of an intervener who has suffered personal injury in the course of a dangerous intervention, V.–3:104 the reduction or exclusion of the intervener's rights for compensation and V.–3:105 the principal's right to indemnification against a third party, who is accountable for the causation of damage which the intervener has intended to avert. In practice the most important of the intervener's rights, however, seems to be the right to claim indemnification and reimbursement. These therefore are to be found at the head of the Chapter on the rights of the intervener. These rights in turn are the mirror image of the obligations of the principal. If the principal does not perform these obligations the normal remedies for non-performance under the general rules in Book III, Chapter 3 (Remedies for non-performance) will be available in so far as applicable to non-contractual obligations of the type in question.

Reimbursement and indemnification. V.–3:101 contains two core elements of the law of benevolent intervention – as understood at any rate in the continental European legal systems: the right of the intervener to reimbursement of expenditure and to indemnification of liabilities incurred. V.–3:101 thus distinguishes between the claim to reimbursement of outlays or other disbursements (reimbursement claims), on the one hand, and the claim for indemnification on the other. In this way the claim to reimbursement is flanked by a claim for indemnification. The intervener can also secure these rights in accordance with general rules by exercising a right to withhold performance: until the principal offers any reimbursement or indemnification which is due, the intervener may refuse to deliver up to the principal that which has been obtained in the course of the intervention. See III.–1:102 (Definitions) paragraph (4)(c); III.–2:104 (Order of performance) and III.–3:401 (Right to withhold performance of reciprocal obligations).

B. The right to indemnification

Indemnification. The right to an indemnification has as its operand the relief of the intervener from any liability properly incurred. Where possible, the intervener is to be saved from having to discharge the liability to a third party out of the intervener's own funds.

Illustration 1
If A, as a benevolent intervener, engages a service provider in A's own name to provide a service for C, then A has a right to expect C to settle A's liability to the service provider directly or at least to put A in funds in order to pay the service provider what is due.

Mode of indemnification. The claim to indemnification may be satisfied by the principal in one of two ways according to the principal's election: the principal can make a direct payment to the third party (the intervener's creditor), or can put the intervener in funds sufficient to enable the intervener in turn to pay the third party. So far as possible and reasonable, the intervener must alert the principal to the existence of the debt before the intervener discharges it. If in the circumstances the intervener had to pay before the principal could have an opportunity of doing so, then the intervener of course has a claim to reimbursement of the outlay. That claim may be asserted even in the case where the intervener discharged the debt without a compelling ground to do so before the principal's election. However, if in such a case the principal suffers damage because of that, the principal can set off against the intervener's claim a corresponding claim for damages.

C. The claim for reimbursement

Reimbursement. The second remedy is a right to reimbursement. In the context of a claim to reimbursement for burdens the latter may take the form of disbursements of money or the disposal of goods of value ("expenditure (whether of money or other assets)"). A liability incurred is also a "burden", but in that case, for the period before liability is satisfied by a monetary payment, the redress which the intervener is entitled to from the principal is indemnification.

D. General requirements applicable to both claims

The intervention must be reasonable but need not be successful. The main purpose of the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs is the protection of the intervener's performance. The intervener's rights are therefore not dependent on an "enrichment" of the principal and thus also not on whether the intervention is in the end successful. It suffices that there was a reasonable ground to attempt the venture. It may be assumed that the principal would likewise have chanced an attempt, if in a position to make a decision personally.

No restriction to situations of emergency. V.–3:101 does not differentiate between help in a case of emergency and all other manifestations of benevolent intervention. It is enough that it was reasonable to seek to advance or safeguard the principal's interests; it is not possible to draw out different degrees of lesser or greater reasonableness within this test.

Reasonable expenditure. An intervener is entitled in relation to a principal to demand the amount of a debt to a third party which the intervener incurred, otherwise than as a representative of the principal, for the purposes of the intervention. This claim to indemnification of course only touches upon the internal relationship between the intervener and the principal. Moreover, this claim is subject to the same restrictions to which the reimbursement claim is subject: the obligation incurred must have been reasonable according to its nature and extent. The claims to indemnification and reimbursement are limited to such expenditure as the acting party was entitled to consider reasonable in the situation. In this regard the matter again turns on all the circumstances of the particular case – in particular the special difficulty of forming a view and decision-making in a situation of emergency.

Illustration 2

After damage caused by a storm to the roof on the property of a neighbour Y, the benevolent intervener X, instructs a roofing contractor to repair the damage. On being asked by the roofing contractor which roof tiles are to be used, X indicates roof tiles which are considerably more expensive than those which need replacement. Even if the new roof tiles are of a better quality, the expenses incurred will be unreasonable. X may only demand the (notional) costs of roof tiles which would have matched those which were replaced. Of course it would be different if the old roof tiles are no longer obtainable on the market and X thus had no other choice than to accept the offer made by the contractor. But the expenses would also be unreasonable if under the prevailing and forecast weather conditions a provisional repair would have been possible and it had been known that the principal would soon return. In such a case the decision on a lasting solution should have been left to the principal.

Illustration 3

After a traffic accident a vehicle has to be towed away. The company instructed tows the car to a storage place which belongs to the company but is far away and where further costs are incurred. It would have been possible to bring the vehicle to the owner's place of residence. The company could have easily ascertained the address by asking the police. The costs so far as they exceed the expenses which would have been incurred had the vehicle been towed to the owner's residence are not recoverable.

Interest on expenditure. The draft does not envisage an independent claim to interest on expenditure. The reason for that is that an intervener should be entitled to receive reimbursement only for the disadvantages actually sustained by managing another's affairs and those disadvantages are already covered by the rule. The text proceeds on the footing that an intervener may obtain reimbursement of debt interest actually paid as much as for interest foregone on funds in credit in the concrete circumstances of the case, provided that the intervener can prove that this interest has actually been foregone; but the intervener is not entitled to a claim for interest foregone in the "abstract" (that is to say, by irrebutable presumption of loss). Hence also it is not necessary to lay down a rule governing the quantum of such an "abstract" claim to interest. The right to interest on expenditure from the point in time at which it is incurred is parasitic on the right to reimbursement. Hence, most obviously, the intervener is entitled to interest only on that expenditure for which there is a right to be reimbursed because it was reasonable for it to be expended; it does not apply to expenditure which was in fact incurred, but which, for the purposes of the right of reimbursement, is disallowed. However, if the principal delays in paying over the amount of any reimbursement or indemnification after payment has become due, then interest on the amount outstanding would be payable in accordance with the normal rules (III.–3:708 (Interest on late payments).

Illustration 4

The roof of X's historic mansion is severely damaged in a storm while X is on a yacht somewhere in the Atlantic ocean and Y, a helpful neighbour, cannot make contact. Emergency repairs to X's roof must be sensitive to the heritage of its construction (something which to Y's knowledge X sets great store by). There are also paintings and furniture in the endangered upper storey which must be moved to protect them from the elements. All of this is beyond Y's meagre budget. So Y obtains a loan from a bank at the going rate. Y is not merely entitled to reimbursement of the loan received from the bank which has been used to pay for the necessary repairs and removals. The interest which Y pays to the bank, discharging an obligation which was properly incurred in order to perform the act benefiting the principal, is also expenditure which must be reimbursed and which is subject to interest from the time of payment. The same principle would apply in the case of a hire-purchase. However, Y would not be entitled to any interest on expenditure if the sum owed to the contractors was rather small so that Y could pay it in cash with money which would not have been paid into an interest-bearing account anyway.

Expenditure, whether of money or other assets. If the intervener has paid out money, the claim to reimbursement is in respect of this form of "expenditure." "Expenditure of other assets" encompasses by contrast all patrimonial detriments which are voluntarily sustained, but do not take the form of an outlay of money. "Expenditure" is the umbrella term for obligations incurred, outlays and other contributions. Hence, "expenditure" for the purposes of the intervener's right of reimbursement under V.–3:101 covers not only out of pocket expenses. It extends to any form of voluntary disposition out of the intervener's own patrimony responsibly devoted to the cause of the principal's benefit. Thus it will include, for example, the intervener's loss of property when this is intentionally disposed of or when the intervener voluntarily acts to cause its destruction as part of the performance in the principal's interest. (Involuntary damage to property may fall to be compensated under V.–3:103 (Right to reparation)).

Illustration 5
A woman who, as a benevolent intervener, employs her own motor vehicle for the benefit of another may claim not only compensation for the fuel used but also compensation for the fact that she could not otherwise make use of her car during the material time.

Services. However, "expenditure" does not extend to investment of labour, for which only professional or commercial interveners may make a claim within the limits provided for in V.–3:102 (Right to remuneration). This does not mean that the non-professional intervener can never make a claim for remuneration for labour. Such an intervener will be able to do so if it can be shown that the labour has enriched the principal and the enrichment gives rise to a claim under the law of unjustified enrichment.

Loss of income. "Expenditure" likewise excludes any claim for loss of income which the intervener sustains because of being preoccupied with the interests of the principal. That is a matter of damage and not of expenditure in this sense of an outlay or contribution.

NOTES

I. The right to indemnification

1. GERMAN CC § 257 provides that a person who is entitled to claim compensation for expenses may also claim indemnification from liabilities incurred. This rule is also applicable in the law of benevolent intervention (MünchKomm [-Krüger], BGB[4], § 257, no. 2). As a rule the debtor obliged to indemnify – in this case the principal – has a right to choose by which means he wants to discharge his duty to indemnify (BGH 8 October 1964, NJW 1965, 249, 251; BGH 11 April 1984, BGHZ 91, 73, 77). He may perform as a third party (CC § 267), may conclude a contract with the creditor on cancellation of the debt in favour of the debtor, may persuade him to waive his claim or agree with him that he (the principal) will assume the obligation and that the intervener be released from the obligation (CC §§ 414, 415). The decisive factor will be that the result which the principal is bound to bring about is realised, namely the intervener's release from the obligation. This result, however, does not occur simply because the party obliged to indemnify another places the amount necessary to discharge the debt to the party claiming indemnification – in the present case the intervener – at the latter's disposal. The principal will be held not to have satisfied the claim for indemnification as long as the money paid to the intervener has not yet been used to discharge the latter's debt. This result is justified on the basis that it is not the person entitled to indemnification but rather the person obliged to indemnify who should bear the risk that the liability is not (completely) discharged, whether because other creditors seize the money or other difficulties arise. The claim for indemnification thus in general focuses exclusively on the liability incurred; the principle of restitution in kind applies (Staudinger [-Bittner], BGB[13], § 257, no. 7; Soergel [-M. Wolf], BGB[12], § 257, no. 5; Erman [-Kuckuk], BGB I[10], § 257, no. 2). As an exception a claim for payment (to him) by the person entitled to indemnification can be made if the claim by the third party is definitely forthcoming (RG 2 December 1911, RGZ 78, 26, 34; RG 12 January 1934, JW 1934, 685). Similar exceptions exist where the party entitled to indemnification has set a deadline (BGH 11 June 1986, NJW-RR 1987, 43), where the third party has assigned its claim to the party entitled to indemnification (BGH 20 March 1978, BGHZ 71, 167, 170) and where the party to be indemnified has been declared bankrupt (BGH 22 September 1971, BGHZ 57, 78, 81; BGH 16 September 1993, NJW 1994, 49). In such situations the claim for indemnification according to prevailing opinion is transformed into a claim for payment (Krüger, loc.cit. no. 4 ff; Bittner, loc.cit. no. 7 et seq.). However, BGH 8 October 1964, NJW 1965, 249, 251 has held that the claim for indemnification of a commission agent against the principal may also be discharged by the principal making "the purchase money available [to the agent] for the purpose of discharging the seller". According to CA Karlsruhe 11 February 1993, NJW-RR 1994, 1157, 1159 the party obliged to indemnify discharges that obligation by payment only if the party entitled has given consent. POLISH CC art. 753 (2) and ESTONIAN LOA § 1023 (1) similarly provide explicitly for the intervener's claim for indemnification.

2. Under GREEK Law the intervener's claim for compensation against the principal may also take the form of a claim for indemnification, if the intervener has incurred a liability to a third party (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 736, no. 9). (By contrast in the law of mandate the claim for indemnification is considered a specification of the claim for reimbursement of expenses: Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Karassis], Art. 722, no. 3.) The indemnification will be effected either by performance of the principal to the third party or by assumption of the obligation pursuant to CC art. 471 (Karassis, loc.cit.).

3. Under PORTUGUESE Law the claim for indemnification arises from a synthesis of CC arts. 471, 1182 and 595 (1). The intervener who conducts legal transactions for the principal in his own name acts as a "gestão não representative". In such a case CC art. 471 refers to the provisions of CC arts. 1180 to 1184. The intervener is obliged to assign the rights obtained to the principal (CC art. 1181 (1)) and the principal may assert the claims which the intervener has acquired (CC art. 1181 (2)). On the other hand the principal has to assume the obligations the intervener has incurred (CC art. 1182). This assumption of liability may be effected either by a contract between the old and the new debtor and the corresponding consent of the creditor (CC art. 595 (1)(a)) or by means of a contract between the new debtor and the creditor, which does not require the consent of the old debtor (CC art. 595 (1)(b)). If the principal is unable to assume the obligation then he will have to provide the intervener with the necessary funds to discharge the debt in advance or refund such costs (CC art. 1182). If the creditor refuses consent to the assumption of the obligation by the principal, then intervener and principal will be jointly liable to the creditor (CC art. 595(2)).

4. A claim for indemnification likewise arises under AUSTRIAN Law (Rummel [-Rummel] ABGB I³ § 1035 no. 2). In the commentaries – the Code is silent on this question – it is argued that an obligation incurred may constitute compensable expenditure (Klang [-Stanzl], ABGB IV/1², 898). This in turn would mean that the intervener has a claim for the amount due under the obligation he has incurred but not yet discharged. A right of the intervener to request payment in advance of his outlay, however, is apparently not accepted in the case law (OGH 4 June 1987, SZ 60/100 [which, however, concerns a case within the scope of CC § 1037]; Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V², § 1036-1040 no. 10).

5. FRENCH, BELGIAN and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1375 oblige the principal to 'compensate' the intervener for obligations incurred by the latter in his own name and which therefore only bind the intervener. Thus the principal has to refund the costs incurred by the intervener who has already discharged his obligations (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372 à 1375, Fasc. 20 no. 68). If the intervener has not yet discharged his obligations then according to French legal literature the principal has to exonerate him from his liability. To this end the principal may directly discharge the obligation or propose to the third party an assumption of obligation with the effect of releasing the intervener from his debt (which of course will only take effect if the third party agrees to the proposal) (Bout, loc.cit.). As regards Belgian academic analysis it is merely stated that the principal has to exonerate the intervener from the liabilities, compensate him in respect of them and release him from his obligations. The intervener may request the principal either present a receipt made out by the third party or prove that the third party has agreed to an assumption of liability (De Page, Droit Civil Belge II³, no. 1091 p. 1153). MALTESE CC art. 1018 provides for both the intervener's right to indemnification and his right to reparation for expenses incurred.

6. Under SPANISH CC art. 1893 (1) the principal is liable to the intervener "for obligations which have been incurred in the interest of the principal". This is a consequence of the principal's duty to compensate for damages which includes a duty to exonerate the intervener from all liabilities to third parties independent of their particular legal basis (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 154). If the intervener acts in his own name then of course the principal is only obliged vis-à-vis the intervener (Pasquau Liaño, loc.cit. 155). A third party in this case may not assert a claim directly against the principal (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 615; TS 9 February 1957, RAJ 1957 no. 701 p. 448).

7. Subject to the condition that the intervention has been commenced profitably ITALIAN CC art. 2031 imposes the duty on the principal to discharge the obligations the intervener has incurred in the principal's name and to indemnify the intervener for all liabilities incurred to which the intervener has committed himself. In the latter case the principal will have to provide such funds to the intervener as are necessary in order that all liabilities can be discharged (Bianca, Diritto civile, 3, Il contratto², 150).

8. Under DUTCH Law the intervener may likewise act in his own name or in the name of the principal (CC arts. 6:198 and 6:201). The intervener will most likely choose the first alternative, so it is said, in a case of minor outlay or if his contract partner insists on concluding the contract with the intervener and not with a principal he does not know. (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III¹⁰, no. 305, p. 317). The new CC no longer expressly provides for a right to indemnification. (By contrast CC art. 1393 in force until the end of 1991 did provide such rule, though details were disputed.) The current CC art. 6:200 (1) obliges the principal to compensate the intervener for 'damage' sustained, whereby the term 'damage' covers both expenses sustained and the outlays which he has incurred. Whether or not incurring an obligation may in itself be regarded as 'damage' for these purposes seems to be unresolved.

9. SCOTTISH law obliges the principal to discharge the intervener from all obligations which the latter has incurred in the course of the intervention (Bell, § 541; Erkine, Volume II, 52; Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, XV, para 127). In SCANDINAVIAN legal literature the question of a right to indemnification has not been discussed in the context of benevolent intervention. In the context of the law of mandate the rule is that the principal will only be obliged to make advance payment if this has been contractually agreed or is to be inferred in the circumstances (Hellner, Speciell Avtalsrätt. II (1): Kontraktsrätt. Särskilda avtal[3], 211). For some specific areas, such as insolvency law, there are particular provisions on the right to request advance payment. However, a general right to indemnification is apparently unknown in Nordic patrimonial law.

10. The COMMON LAW likewise recognises a right on the part of an agent of necessity to call upon the principal to discharge an obligation which, by virtue of the authority conferred by the necessitous situation, the agent has incurred to a third party: cf. Stoljar, Agency, 155. Where he has control of the principal's property, he may have a lien over or a right to recoup from that property: cf. Selby v. Jackson (1843) 6 Beav 192 at 202-203, 49 ER 799 at 803 (Lord Langdale MR). Of course, where the agent has concluded the contract in the principal's name, the principal is bound directly to the third party: see, for instance, Gunn v. Roberts (1873-74) LR 9 CP 331, 335 (Brett J: obligation to pay for supplies or repay money advanced). An equitable right to indemnification, even if the intervener is not formally a trustee, exists in favour of a person who with good cause takes upon himself the management of the property of a person who is incapable of making decisions for themselves: cf. Selby v. Jackson, loc. cit. at 202-203 (803) (Lord Langdale MR), affirmed (1844) unreported (Lord Lyndhurst LC). By statute (when it comes into force) an intervener acting in connection with the care or treatment of a person who is reasonably believed to lack capacity, reasonably believing it to be in that person's best interests to act, and incurring expenditure as a result will have a right under English law to reimburse himself from money in that person's possession or be otherwise indemnified: Mental Capacity Act 2005, s. 8(2).

II. Claim for reimbursement

11. The claim for reimbursement is less problematic in all jurisdictions. GERMAN CC provides for a claim in §§ 683, 677, 670, according to which the justified intervener may demand reimbursement of his expenditure like an agent. Expenditure within the meaning of CC § 670 encompasses the voluntary sacrifice of valuable assets (BGH 10 November 1988, NJW 1989, 1284, 1285; Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 670, no. 2). Expenses need not necessarily take the form of disbursement of money. They may also be of a legal nature (e. g. incurring an obligation: BGH 23 February 1981, NJW 1981, 1502, 1503) or physical (e. g. excessive overuse of a thing) (Beuthien loc.cit. 2). Only expenditure which the intervener was entitled to regard as necessary is compensable, but the matter will not depend on whether or not it was (in the end) beneficial (BGH 12 July 1993, NJW-RR 1994, 87). The principal has to bear the risk of expenditure where the outcome is not a success (Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], § 670, no. 2). Under CC §§ 256 and 246 the principal is obliged to pay 4% interest on the intervener's expenditure from the point in time the intervener incurred it; default is not a requirement.

12. Under ESTONIAN LOA § 1023 (1) and GREEK CC art. 736 too the intervener enjoys a claim, like an agent under the law of mandate, to compensation for expenditure which he properly held to be necessary; this will not depend on whether or not the intervention has turned out to be successful (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 736, no. 2). Thus expenditure without success is compensable if the intervener was entitled to regard them as reasonable in view of the aim to which he aspired. The claim encompasses statutory interest form the point in time the expenditure is incurred (CC art. 301; for details see also CA Thessaloniki 1139/1992, Arm 46/1992, 712). The claim for reimbursement is independent of whether the intervener has invested his own money or has merely managed another's funds (A. P. 580/1953, NoB 2/1954, 168).

13. PORTUGUESE CC art. 468 (1) obliges the principal to reimburse necessary expenditure which an intervener has incurred in the course of a lawful act, including interest thereon from the day the expenditure was incurred. According to the wording of the provision all expenses are compensable "which the intervener held to be necessary". It is not required that the expenses were indispensable (indispensáveis); it will suffice that for good reason the intervener considered them to be necessary (necessárias). Thus it is possible that the principal may be obliged to reimburse expenses which from an objective perspective have not had a beneficial impact (Menezes Leitão, Obrigações I[3], 497). The claim for reimbursement also arises in a case of an intervention which was originally unlawful but has subsequently been ratified by the principal (CC art. 469 in conjunction with CC art. 468 (1)).

14. Under AUSTRIAN law the intervener's claim for reimbursement of expenditure will be allowed in a case of intervention in an emergency (CC § 1036) as in a case of beneficial intervention within the meaning of CC § 1037, together with interest (OGH 5 March 1963 EvBl 1963/309). In the case of CC § 1036 necessary and purposive expenditure must be reimbursed, even if the intervention has proved unsuccessful. Whether expenditure was necessary and purposive will be determined by means of an objective test according to the presumed view of a diligent third party who is hypothetically placed in the intervener's shoes at the material time of action (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], § 1036-1040 no. 11; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I[3], § 1036 no. 3; Koziol and Welser, Grundriss II[12], 365; Meissel, GoA, 170). As regards the rescue of things, besides the reimbursement of expenditure the intervener may also claim under CC § 403 a reward in the maximum amount of 10 % of the value of the asset secured, though this claim is almost irrelevant in practice (Rummel, loc.cit. no. 5, Meissel, loc.cit. 39). In cases within the scope of CC § 1037 a claim for reimbursement of expenditure is only granted if a clear and predominant benefit of the principal was achieved. CC § 1037 resembles an unjustified enrichment claim (Meissel, loc.cit. 14, 172). The intervener bears the risk that the intervention remains unsuccessful; in addition he has to prove the benefit achieved (Apathy loc.cit. no. 12). POLISH CC arts. 754, 755 and 757 similarly draw a distinction in relation to the requirements for reimbursement of expenditure between the different emanations of benevolent intervention and in particular between prevention of damage in a case of emergency and an act which was not based on "compelling necessity" (CC art. 755).

15. BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1375 oblige the principal to reimburse to the intervener all expenses which were useful or necessary; the intervener should not have to shoulder disadvantages arising from his altruistic intervention (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372 à 1375, Fasc. 20 no. 51). Expenses are necessary if they serve the 'preservation of the affair'; they are useful if they serve its 'improvement' (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372 à 1375, Fasc. 20 no. 52); the category of useful expenses encompasses necessary expenses (Bout, loc.cit.; Paulus, Zaakwaarneming no. 83

p. 51). In FRANCE too expenses are compensable although they have proved to be useless (Cass. req. 28 February 1910, D. 1911, I, 137, note Dupuich), whereas in BELGIUM such expenses are apparently not covered (Paulus, loc.cit.; RPDB, v° Quasi-contrat, no. 74). In French legal literature it is asserted that only expenses actually incurred are compensable. An intervener who discharges a debt by transfer of negotiable instruments which at the time of transfer have a market value below their nominal value may only claim reimbursement of the market value (Bout, loc.cit. no. 55). In both countries by means of analogous application of CC art. 2001 the courts grant the intervener a claim for interest on the funds disbursed (Cass. civ. 12 June 1979, Bull. civ. 1979, I, no. 173 p. 140; D. 1979 IR 539; Defrénois 1980, art. 32421, p. 1215, obs. Aubert; CA Brussel 7 February 1964, Pas. belge 1965, II, 70). The interest rate is that of statutory interest (Malaurie/Aynès/Stoffel-Munck, Droit civil. Les obligations, no. 1033 p. 537).

16. Under SPANISH CC art. 1893 the principal is obliged to reimburse the intervener for necessary and useful expenses. There does not seem to be case law elaborating on what expenses are considered to be necessary and useful. Academic commentaries refer to the corresponding terminology to be found in the law of possession in CC arts. 453 and 454 (Paz-Ares/Diez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Lasarte], Código Civil II, 1951). From this it follows that payment for the reasonable preservation and storage of goods are compensable as are costs which have served in a suitable manner to improve or increase the value of an asset (Paz-Ares/Diez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Miquel González], Código Civil I, 452-453).

17. ITALIAN CC art. 2031 provides inter alia that the principal has to reimburse the intervener for all necessary or useful expenditure (together with statutory interest form the day the expenditure was incurred). The intervener's claim for reimbursement of expenses is secured by means of a right of retention (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 54). This claim for reimbursement goes beyond the claim arising from the law of unjustified enrichment under CC art. 2041. Usefulness and necessity of the expenditure are assessed according to the standard of a bonus paterfamilias. The principal's obligation is a 'real value' obligation because it imposes a duty to compensate (Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 898).

18. Under DUTCH CC art. 6:200 (1) the principal is obliged to compensate the intervener for any damage which the latter has sustained in managing the principal's affair if the intervener has attended to the principal's interests properly. The concept of 'damage' (which must be interpreted in a wide sense) encompasses costs and expenses as well as the value of spent goods and interest foregone. In contrast to the law of unjustified enrichment it is not a requirement that the principal has obtained any real benefit. It will suffice that the intervention has been undertaken properly, i. e. that the intervener was entitled to assume that the expenses would contribute to the principal's benefit. The extent of the damage will be assessed according to the general rules of CC arts. 6:95 et seq. (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 795; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 311, p. 320-321).

19. The justified intervener is likewise granted a claim for reimbursement of expenditure against the principal under SCOTTISH law. This claim will cover all necessary useful expenditure, which the intervener has incurred in the course of the intervention. The intervener is also entitled to interest on his outlay on a commercial basis (Bell, § 541; Erskine, Book III, Vol. II, 52; Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, XV, para 126).

20. The intervener's claim for reimbursement in general is also acknowledged in the NORDIC countries even though there is hardly any case law on this issue (for an extraordinary case see Danish HD 24 May 1937, UfR 1937, 697: reimbursement of postal charges of 70 øre). Whether the claim for reimbursement includes a claim for interest cannot be stated beyond doubt because in the cases already decided only interest payable from commencement of proceedings has apparently been claimed (interest as from service of process) (Danish HD 3 December 1936, UfR 1937, 357; 26 October 1906, UfR 1907, 54). Swedish HD 29 March 1978, NJA 1978, 144 concerned a claim for recourse in respect of child maintenance (governed by superseded family law rules) between the husband of the mother and the biological father; interest was granted from the time of service of process in respect of the claim and not from the time the judgment declaring fatherhood (out of wedlock) became res iudicata. Whether or not a general principle may be inferred from this judgment, however, has yet to be resolved.

21. In ENGLISH law too a person who acts as agent of necessity and reasonably incurs expenses has a right to reimbursement: Gaudet v. Brown (1873-74) LR 5 PC 134, 165 (Sir Montague Smith, for the PC); Petrinovic & Co. Ltd. v. Mission Francaise des Transports des Maritimes (1941) 71 Lloyd's L. Rep 208, 222 (Atkinson J); China Pacific SA v. Food Corp. of India (The Winson) [1982] AC 939, 965D-F (Lord Simon). Thus a carrier of an animal who is forced to provide it with food and shelter because it is not collected at its destination will have a claim for reimbursement of the costs: Great Northern Railway Co. v. Swaffield (1874) LR 9 Ex. 132. The right to reimbursement extends to the costs of contacting the principal in order to ascertain his instructions: see Pocahontas Fuel Co. Inc. v. Ambatielos (1922) 10 Lloyd's L. Rep 188, 156 (McCardie J), and contrast the earlier position impliedly stated by Sir Robert Phillimore in The St. Lawrence (1879-80) 5 PD 250, 253. The right to reimbursement of expenses reasonably incurred is a manifestation of a broader principle applicable to all agents acting within the scope of their authority: Leigh v. Dickeson (1884-85) 15 QBD 60, 64 (Brett MR: "If a person is employed in a business which requires an expenditure in order that it may be carried on, […] the principal must indemnify his agent for the expenditure which he incurs"), and see also Fridman, Agency[5], 47, and specifically in relation to the claim in equity of fiduciary agents Wallersteiner v. Moir (No. 2) [1975] QB 373, 391G-H (Lord Denning MR), 403F (Buckley LJ) and 407B-C (Scarman LJ). This holds even if the agent has acted in error and the intervention has not resulted in benefit to the principal, provided the measure taken was reasonable and justified in the circumstances: Tetley & Co. v. British Trade Corp. (1922) 10 Lloyd's L. Rep. 678; John Koch Ltd. v. C. & H. Products Ltd. [1956] 2 Lloyd's Rep 59). Where the agent is also liable to surrender to the principal benefits obtained as a result of the agency, the agent will have a right of retention in the form of a possessory lien to protect his claim to reimbursement: see Chapter 2, Art. 2:102, Notes I, 22. The main difficulty, however, is that a right to reimbursement or recompense in cases of necessitous intervention outside the recognised categories of agency of necessity is not wholeheartedly assured by the existing case law. According to one dictum even a person who procures medical assistance for an unconscious person found lying in the street (e.g., by driving them to hospital) has apparently no common law right to reimbursement for the expenses incurred (Schneider v. Eisovitch [1960] 2 QB 430, 438 (Paull J)), though a clearer case of supply of a necessary to a person incapable of contracting for themselves could hardly be envisaged.

Illustration 2 is taken from Paulus, Zaakwaarneming no. 83 p. 51; illustration 3 from OGH 21 April 1982, JBl 1984, 256; illustration 5 from BGH 15 December 1975, BGHZ 65, 384.

V.–3:102: Right to remuneration

(1) The intervener has a right to remuneration in so far as the intervention is reasonable and undertaken in the course of the intervener's profession or trade.

(2) The remuneration due is the amount, so far as reasonable, which is ordinarily paid at the time and place of intervention in order to obtain a performance of the kind undertaken. If there is no such amount a reasonable remuneration is due.

COMMENTS

A. Remuneration of professionals (paragraph (1))

Should there be a right to remuneration? Paragraph (1) confers on persons who intervene in the course of their profession or trade a claim to remuneration. That they should have such a claim is by no means self-evident. The substantive appropriateness of such a rule, which can be found in many, but certainly not all, legal systems of the European Union, can indeed be disputed in terms of legal policy. Is it at all possible to maintain that someone who demands remuneration for the action predominantly advances another's interests? Is it not a contradiction of the "spirit" of the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs to allow a claim to remuneration? And why should a lay person not have the same rights as someone who undertakes the intervention in the course of a trade or profession?

Underlying policy considerations of the rule. The first question can doubtless be answered affirmatively. All that the intervener has to demonstrate is that the conditions of V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) are met. A doctor helping someone who lies unconscious or a breakdown recovery service salvaging a car which has been involved in an accident and whose owner has already been admitted to hospital are capable of acting predominantly with the intention of helping the person concerned. That they ultimately submit a bill for their service does not change their state of mind at the time of acting. The matter only becomes problematic when the active party mentally inverts the relationship between the reason for and the consequences of the action – by acting predominantly for the purposes of acquiring a right to remuneration. Such persons are not interveners and consequently are assigned to the law of unjustified enrichment (including its restrictive rules on unsolicited enrichments).

> Illustration 1
> X, a genealogist, earns a considerable part of his income by professionally searching for heirs. He reacts to public announcements of estates of persons who according to the knowledge of the authority in charge do not have any relatives and thus no successors. At the expiration of the time-limit indicated in the announcement the intestate estate will devolve to the state. X succeeds in tracing a relative (Y) of a deceased person and offers to disclose to Y the necessary information for a consideration of 20% of the inheritance. In order to indicate the reliability of the offer X discloses some vague information. Y declines the contract offered. However the information provided suffices to enable Y to locate the authority concerned and to accept the inheritance. Y is not indebted to X.

The claim to remuneration under paragraph (1) is thus conceived as a claim consequential on an undertaking which was not rendered with a view to an expected counter-performance. Such a claim, however, does not in any way contradict the spirit of the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs.

Illustration 2
I, a professional shipping agent by means of a justified benevolent intervention in the course of an auction purchases three tank ships for P. P is obliged to pay to I the usual remuneration for such action.

Remuneration only for professionals. There are good reasons of legal policy for treating private individuals differently from persons who intervene in the course of their profession or trade. Firstly, a professional is likely to give a greater input than an amateur so that the former's performance from the perspective of the benefited party is as a rule simply more valuable than the latter's. In this respect the rule supports both core elements of benevolent intervention: the protection of the performance of the intervener and (albeit on a lower plane) the aspect of usefulness of the undertaking anticipated at the time of its commencement. Related to this is the further argument that remuneration is justified for provision of a professional level of performance as a correlative of the higher (professional) standard of care to which an intervener who acts as a professional will be implicitly subject under V.–2:101 (Duties during intervention) paragraph (1)(a) (see Comment B under that provision). Additionally the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs aims to establish incentives for humane action. For professional providers of services the incentives to act must be more pronounced than for private individuals.

The main policy consideration. One can of course muster against the rule the fact that it may make no difference to the aspect of the intention to benefit another, which is at the same time constitutive of benevolent intervention, whether the action falls within the intervener's professional or commercial field of activity. The argument would then run that an intervener always acts "privately". However, this objection too is not convincing: an intervener who, from lack of time, expertise or ability, is not confident of being able to do what is required may naturally commission a professional to undertake it and can then pass the bill to the principal. Assuming this starting position it makes no sense to cut off an intervener who happens to be a professional from the possibility of billing for services rendered. That is probably the strongest policy consideration in favour of the rule. Furthermore, the criterion of reasonableness ensures that the intervener as a rule is only authorised to undertake provisional measures.

"Undertaken in the course of the intervener's profession or trade". Moreover, it must always be examined whether assistance is actually rendered "in the course of the intervener's profession or trade". Falling under that rubric, for example, would be a doctor who while on holiday gives aid at the hotel to a fellow guest who has fallen unconscious beside the swimming pool, but it would not cover someone who at the time of undertaking the relevant activity no longer practises the profession or has ceased to pursue the trade (for example, a doctor who has retired).

Non-profit organisations. The formula "profession or trade" includes not-for-profit organisations. If such organisations, constituted as legal persons, intervene, they will often equate to "trade" on account of the legal form which their organisation takes, irrespective of the fact that they are not orientated towards making a (distributable) profit. Where the applicable national law does not allow for that outcome, such organisations are encompassed by the expression "profession" if and to the extent that they have been formed for the purpose of rendering assistance, they have rendered that assistance to a professional standard and the intervention in question stems from their activity in that area.

Reasonableness. The claim to remuneration – just like the claims under V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement) – requires that the measure undertaken was reasonable according to its nature and extent. More often than not it will only be reasonable to undertake provisional measures and thus all services rendered beyond this will, if at all, only confer a claim for compensation according to the rules of unjustified enrichment. In any case no claim for remuneration will arise under the law of benevolent intervention.

B. Quantum of remuneration (paragraph (2))

The usual price. With regard to the quantum of remuneration, the basic principle is that the principal must pay for that breadth of performance which the principal, if in a position to do so, would reasonably have had to commission. To make this notion more concrete the Article takes as the fundamental benchmark the usual price at the time and place of the intervention. Where tables of fees exist (e. g. for the services of self-employed persons), these are to be adopted. In the rare case where there is no such usual price, a reasonable remuneration is payable.

"So far as reasonable". The economic activities of life are, however, so multifarious that the rule as to usual price must be subject to the general test of reasonableness. It may be that the intervener must act at a multitude of different places, but it is not sensible to ascertain an individual customary price for each of them. One can contemplate cases in which an intervener was overqualified for the performance rendered, but there was nobody else available who could have rendered it. Other cases which can be imagined include those for which no bearable expenditure would yield a local market price. In such cases the judge is left with no other choice than to make a general evaluation of all the circumstances of the particular case. Where assistance is rendered to someone who lacks full legal capacity, that may likewise be a relevant factor for the purposes of paragraph (2). Had the principal been able to conclude a contract for the assistance rendered – exceptionally so, precisely because it was aid in an emergency situation – no further considerations are required. On the other hand, had the principal not been in a position legally to conclude a contract, the case in this special situation resolves according to its nature into an unjustified enrichment claim and that must be taken into consideration in calculating the quantum of the claim.

NOTES

I. The foundation of the claim to remuneration

1. The basic rule of the law of benevolent intervention more or less everywhere is that the intervener will not be remunerated for his activity. However, there are a number of exceptions from this basic rule which exactly concern the group of persons which V.–3:102 has in view. Some of them have been developed by case law and are therefore not provided for in the wording of the Codes. As regards GERMAN law the principle (i. e. no remuneration) is inferred from the reference contained in CC § 683 to mandate law, which according to CC 662 is a gratuitous contract for services. Case law (BGH 15 December 1975, BGHZ 65, 384, 390; BGH 7 March 1989, NJW-RR 1989, 970; BGH 21 October 1999, BGHZ 143, 9, 16) and legal literature (e. g. Medicus, Schuldrecht II BT[12], no. 626) maintain by contrast that a right to remuneration is appropriate if the benevolent intervention is within the scope of the intervener's profession or trade, as in the case of a doctor who renders assistance to a person lying unconscious or a breakdown recovery service which tows away a car in order to clear the road. This result is founded on an analogous application of CC § 1835 (3) under which compensable expenses of a guardian also include such services "which fall within his trade or profession", (cf. Staudinger (-Wittmann)[13], § 683 no. 3 and Medicus loc.cit.).

2. The same result is arrived at in GREECE. The intervener has a claim to remuneration if the activity undertaken as benevolent intervention belongs to his trade or profession (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 736, no. 11; Filios, Enochiko Dikaio I/2, 203; but taking a different view, Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochiko Dikaio II, 25). The travaux preperatoire to the Greek CC (Schedion Astikou Kodikos, II: Enochikon Dikaion, 232: doctor attending to an injured person) and the case law (CA Athens 6980/1987, EllDik 30/1989, 805) have confirmed this approach. ESTONIAN LOA § 1023 (2) has codified this concept; the rule corresponds in all its material parts with V.–3:102. HUNGARIAN CC § 486 (2) contains a reference to the law of mandate, which in CC § 478 (2) makes it clear that "the agent shall be entitled to demand remuneration even if his actions brought no results. The principal shall be entitled to reduce the remuneration or refuse to pay it if he is able to prove that success was not achieved in part or in whole for a reason for which the agent is responsible" (Official Translation, Hungarian Legal Regulations in Force in three Languages, CompLex CD HMJ, 2004).

3. PORTUGUESE CC art. 470 (1) in conjunction with CC art. 1158 (2) only provides for a right to remuneration where the intervention was undertaken in the course of a profession. The prime examples for such gestão mista concerns assistance rendered by lawyers (see also CCP art. 41 (1)) and doctors (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 441). Non-professional interveners are not entitled to remuneration. This is criticised in part on policy grounds; the rule is considered to be out-dated because it should be presumed now that any service is provided in return for payment. Notwithstanding its spontaneous nature a gestão de negócios constitutes a provision of services (Menezes Leitão, Obrigações I[3], 497).

4. AUSTRIAN law on the face of the CC likewise does not grant the intervener any claim to remuneration (v. Zeiller, Commentar III § 1039 no. 3 p. 324). The only exception provided for may be found in CC § 403 (salvage award in a case of a successful intervention), a provision to which CC § 1036 makes reference. According to recent settled case law a claim for compensation for the loss of time will be granted if (and only if) the intervener has undertaken the intervention in the course of his profession or trade (OGH 26 November 1981, SZ 54/176; further references in RIS-Justiz RS 0019940). As a rationale for this position it is asserted that although also in the case of professional services the claim is confined as such to reimbursement of expenditure, the professional intervener has a right to compensation for loss of earnings. A loss of earnings will be presumed, which as a result leads to a claim to remuneration (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1036 no. 4; Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], § 1036-1040 no. 10) at any rate if, as in the case law, the loss of earnings is irrefutably presumed (OGH 3 October 1996, RdW 1997, 275; see further Fötschl, ERPL 2002, 550, 553).

5. As regards FRANCE the legal situation seems to be in a state of flux. Until recently case law has adhered to the principle of CC art. 1375, whereby the intervener only has a claim for compensation and no claim for either remuneration or fees (CA Paris 7 July 1989, Juris Data 1989-023369; Cass.civ. 15 December 1992, Bull.civ. 1992, IV, no. 415 p. 293). For costs incurred even the exact amount has to be verified; a judgment for payment of a lump sum which would result in the granting of a remuneration is unlawful (Cass.civ. 19 February 2002, Juris Data 2002-013264). Cass. req. 10 January 1910, D. 1911, I, 370 (which affirmed a claim to remuneration) has thus long ceased to good law. On the hand, recent case law on the concept of gestion d´affaires intéressée must be taken into account. It is possible that Cass. civ. 18 April 2000, Bull. civ. 2000, I, no. 113 p. 76 has established that a rémunération for the intervener in the context of this sub-category of gestion d´affaires may be conceivable. The official headnote states that an undertaking which has rendered services as gérant d´affaires for the account of another undertaking may as a rule only claim compensation for expenditure "unless the undertaking has also acted in its own interest".

6. In BELGIUM the prevailing opinion is that the principal as a general rule is obliged to pay remuneration to the intervener. Such remuneration should not be regarded as real remuneration, but rather as a monetary compensation for the time, the knowledge and professional skills which the intervener has contributed. A remuneration is due in particular where the intervener has acted in the course of his profession (B. H.Verb. [-Roodhooft], December 2003, Hdst. V, De quasi-contracten, no. 2249).

7. SPANISH CC does not provide for a right to remuneration. The case law has even on one occasion stated that a person who requests remuneration may not even qualify as an intervener because they have no intention to benefit another (TS 15 June 1925, cited, inter alia, by Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 158). Thus any claims must be based on the law of unjustified enrichment; the law of benevolent intervention does not even confer a right to remuneration on interveners who act in the course of their profession. However, this solution is almost unanimously criticised (Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 269; Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 550; Lete del Río, Obligaciones II[3], 128; Pasquau Liaño, loc.cit. 411; Lasarte, Principios II[5], 309) and an effort is made to find a basis for its rectification, inter alia by means of reference to CC art. 1711 or an extension of the concept of damage under CC art. 1893 (Paz-Ares/Diez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Lasarte], Código Civil II, 1952). It may be that TS 23 July 1999, RAJ 1999 (4) no. 6355 p. 9958 has signalled a change in the case law. In its judgment the Tribunal Supremo dismissed a claim for remuneration made by an architect who had acted without authority, but it based this decision on the fact that the requirements of CC art. 1893 were not satisfied; there was no reference to the principle that a claim for remuneration is unknown in the law of benevolent intervention. (As this did not concern an emergency, it would have been a prerequisite that the intervener had made use of the plans, which was not the case.) CA Barcelona 12 February 2004, Aranzadi Civil 6/2004 no. 434 p. 832 likewise heads in this direction, as in that case the plaintiff had undertaken the bookkeeping for a condominium association without authority and a remuneration was granted for this activity.

8. Similarly the prevailing opinion in ITALY maintains that the intervener has no claim for remuneration against the principal because CC art. 1709 is not applicable in the law of benevolent intervention (Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 899). A principal who pays the intervener effects a so-called rewarding gift (CC art. 770; Aru, Gestione d´affari, 55). However, a right to remuneration has been granted in one case where the principal had ratified the intervention (CFI Firenze 31 May 1948, Mon.Trib. 1949, 90, cited by Breccia, loc.cit. 899, fn. 12).

9. Notwithstanding that a claim for damages under DUTCH CC arts. 6:95 et seq. may also include lost profits and loss of earnings (CC art. 6:96), the law of benevolent intervention only exceptionally provides for a claim to remuneration. One such exception is set out in CC art. 6:200 (2), which reads: "Where a manager of another's affair has acted in the conduct of a business or profession, he has, to the extent that this is reasonable, the further right to be paid for his activities in accordance with the prices usually charged for such activities at the time of his management of another's affairs". A second exception may be found in the law concerning lost property (CC art. 5:10 (2)).

10. In SCOTTISH law the view has become accepted that an intervener who has acted for altruistic reasons may not claim remuneration (Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, XV, para 126 with reference to the Institutional Writers, of which only Stair favours a claim for remuneration of services).

11. The legal position of the NORDIC countries is not easily ascertained. With regard to DANISH case law it may perhaps be inferred from HD 24 May 1937, UfR 1937, 697 that a claim to remuneration is rejected (see Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 70, cautiously arguing in this direction). However, it is possible that this decision was predicated by curious facts and too much may be read into it. There does not appear to be further case law in point. Within SWEDISH legal literature (again there is no case law) it is argued there is a claim to remuneration subject to the condition that the activity undertaken was not a (physical) act pure and simple or an act of friendship. Claims to remuneration may be considered in a case involving extensive measures or if the intervener acts in the course of his profession or trade (Håstad, loc.cit. 68 et seq.).

12. In the COMMON LAW systems a right to remuneration must ordinarily be based either on contractual agreement or a restitutionary claim such as quantum meruit based on unjustified enrichment. Unless provided for in a contract between them, the mere discharge of duties as an agent of necessity does not as a rule entitle the agent to remuneration from the principal. However, at any rate where the intervention has proved beneficial to the principal and the intervener is under a duty to surrender profits, Equity will make an allowance for the labour and skill which the intervener has invested if what has been done goes beyond fulfilment of basic duties: see, for instance, Brown v. Litton (1711) 1 P Wms 140, 24 ER 329; 10 Mod 20, 88 ER 606 (investment of deceased's money on behalf of executrix in trade). There is less than overwhelming authority in favour of a restitutionary claim to remuneration (e. g. for the value of pure services rendered) in a case of necessitous intervention, even though it is recognised that (in contrast to salvage) quantum meruit does not depend on the success of the venture: cf. Aitchison v. Lohre (1878-79) 4 App. Cas. 755 at 766-767 (Lord Cairns LC) and at 765 (Lord Blackburn, implicitly). There is a reluctance to recognise exceptions to the principle that a stranger cannot compel a person to pay for a benefit bestowed without his consent: China Pacific SA v. Food Corp. of India (The Winson) [1982] AC 939, 961E-F (Lord Diplock). In part this seems to be based on a deeply-rooted (though erroneous) assumption that any intervention by a stranger without request is a mere impertinence (cf. Re Leslie (1883) 23 Ch. D 552, 561 (Fry LJ)) – which disregards questions of necessity (though in Pontypridd Union v. Drew [1927] 1 KB 214 Atkin LJ went so far as to assert "[t]here is no principle of law which compels a man to repay expenses necessarily incurred for his benefit"). In addition there is a tendency to regard exceptions as justified only where this is needed as an encouragement to dangerous services involving a risk to the intervener's person (in contrast to the acts of someone who merely finds and safeguards another's property): cf. Nicholson v. Chapman (1793) 2 HBl 254 at 257, 126 ER 536 at 538 (Eyre LCJ). A further reason may be a false analogy with salvage: cf. Sorrell v. Paget [1950] 1 KB 252, 260 (Bucknill LJ: "salvage on land is not a recognised head of claim in the common law"), 265 (Asquith LJ: "slavage by land is a legal chimera"). The failure of claims raised by interveners in leading cases can, however, be explained on the basis that the claimant was averring not a mere claim to recompense, but a right in the nature of salvage or a security right (lien or charge), though it must be conceded that generally (a) the tenor of the judgments is critical in wider terms and (b) the assumption or conclusion seems to have been also that that there was no underlying claim to support proprietary rights: see in particular Binstead v. Buck (1777) 2 Black W 1117, 96 ER 660 (no defence to trover in respect of dog taken into care by the defendant that he had maintained it and retained it until the costs incurred were paid because those expenses were not capable of supporting a particular common law lien); Nicholson v. Chapman, loc. cit. (no lien and no salvage where lost timber retrieved, though the court envisaged a possible (unsecured) personal claim); Re Leslie, loc. cit. (payment by husband of premiums to keep up wife's insurance policy not establishing lien in favour of former's personal representatives, where it was also assumed there would be no personal claim unless the payment was by request); The Gas Float Whitton No. 2. [1896] P 42; sub nom. Wells v. Owners of the Gas Float Whitton No. 2 [1897] AC 337 (salvage does not extend to all constructions on the sea). Whatever the limitations of those authorities, they have repeatedly been regarded as laying down a wider general rule which precludes even a mere personal claim to recompense for the service rendered: Aitchison v. Lohre, loc. cit., 760 (Lord Blackburn: "No claim for remuneration from the owner is given by the Common Law to those who preserve goods on shore, unless they interfered at the request of the owner:"); The Gas Float Whitton No. 2, loc. cit. at 311 (Jeune P: "[F]or services rendered in preserving property astray [. . .] no payment is legally due."). Nonetheless, there is case law on claims to remuneration for funeral undertakers (see Chapter 1, Art. 1:102, Notes, II, 16) and solicitors and other professionals providing necessaries to persons without full legal capacity (see Chapter 1, Art. 1:101, Notes, V, 59 and Art. 1:103, Notes, V, 38). Moreover, in White J. D. v. Troups Transport [1976] CLY 33 (Stockton-on-Tees County Court) a business hiring out equipment had a claim for hire costs when, at the request of the police, it employed its equipment to remove the defendant's vehicle from the road under a bridge which it was blocking and so acted as the defendant's agency of necessity – though the claim was reduced because the claimant had could have employed smaller and thus cheaper equipment and the use of the excessively large and more expensive machine resulted from a failure to make precise inquiry beforehand. A claim to the value of care services may also arise where the person assisted was in need of care (which the intervener has provided) as a result of injuries for which a third party is liable in tort, conditional on the injured person making a claim against the third party in respect of those services: see Chapter 3, Art. 3:105, Notes, 1. Statutory provisions (which also apply in SCOTLAND) provide for a special regime where emergency medical treatment is given by a qualified medical practitioner or a hospital to a person injured as a result of a road traffic accident: see Road Traffic Act 1988, ss. 158-159. The claim under s. 158 falls short of being fully comparable to remuneration of an intervener along the lines of Art. 3:102 not least because (a) the remuneration is on a fixed scale without regard to the precise (extent of the) services rendered and (b) remuneration is due not from the person injured (or, where the injuries are fatal, his estate), but from the person using the vehicle causing the accident. In the case of a claim by a hospital there are further limitations confining its scope to private non-profit-making organisations: see s. 161(1). S. 157 of the Act imposes on an insurer who is liable to pay in respect of the accident a liability to pay towards expenses incurred by such a hospital (subject to maximum amounts). Though the context is undoubtedly that of compulsory insurance, this may also reflect, perhaps, an approach articulated on the bench that if there is to be a right to remuneration for services rendered in cases of this type this is best addressed by public law or arrangement with public authorities responsible for such services in the public interest: cf. Wells v. Owners of the Gas Float Whitton No. 2 [1897] AC 337, 349 (Lord Macnaghten).

II. Quantum of Remuneration

13. Provisions or case law on the quantum of remuneration are naturally only to be found in jurisdictions which provide for a claim to remuneration (under the conditions set out under I. above). As regards GERMANY remuneration is quantified as the usual remuneration (BGH 7 January 1971, NJW 1971, 609, 612; BGH 15 December 1975, BGHZ 65, 384, 390; BGH 7 March 1989, NJW-RR 1989, 970). GREEK case law refers to remuneration "which is usually owed" (CA Athens 6980/1987, EllDik 30/1989, 805). There does not appear to be reported BELGIAN (and FRENCH) case law dealing with the quantum of remuneration.

14. PORTUGUESE CC art. 470 (2) refers to the provision of mandate law in CC art. 1158 (2). According to that provision the quantum of remuneration will be determined, unless the parties have agreed otherwise, by the fees of the relevant occupational group or alternatively customs and practice, or if such benchmarks are not available then according to what is fair and reasonable.

15. The solution of V.-3:102 also corresponds with DUTCH CC art. 6:200 (2), which reads: "Where a manager of another's affair has acted in the conduct of a business or profession, he has, to the extent that this is reasonable, the further right to be paid for his activities in accordance with the prices usually charged for such activities at the time of his management of another's affairs" (translation by Haanappel et. al., Legislation).

Illustration 1 is taken from BGH 23 September 1999, NJW 2000, 72; OGH 3 October 1996, RdW 1997, 275 and from Cass.civ. 31 January 1995, Bull.civ. 1995, I, no. 59; illustration 2 from CA Athens 6980/1987, EllDik 30/1989, 805.

V.–3:103: Right to reparation

An intervener who acts to protect the principal, or the principal's property or interests, against danger has a right against the principal for reparation for loss caused as a result of personal injury or property damage suffered in acting, if:

(a) the intervention created or significantly increased the risk of such injury or damage; and

(b) that risk, so far as foreseeable, was in reasonable proportion to the risk to the principal.

COMMENTS

A. The right to reparation for concomitant damage

Policy considerations. This Article is based on a simple consideration of justice. If a person undertakes an intervention to protect another person or another person's property against damage but in the course of this act himself or herself sustains damage then a decision must be made as to who is to bear such damage: the intervener or the principal. This Article, in line with the overwhelming majority of European legal systems, has decided to choose the second alternative. Only this solution corresponds to one of the main objectives of the law of benevolent intervention: the protection of the justified intervener.

Need for regulation. The Article is indispensable because V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement) only secures that the principal will discharge the obligations the intervener has incurred and will reimburse expenditure made. Thus V.–3:101 concerns patrimonial detriments which are voluntarily sustained by the intervener. Involuntary patrimonial detriment ("damage") does not come within the scope of the regime provided for by V.–3:101. This will be dealt with by the present Article.

Consideration of the principal's interests. The decision of general principle in favour of the intervener in some respects requires further specification. V.–3:103 subjects the claim for damages to the condition that the damage in question is a typical realisation of the risk incurred. The realisation of the general risks of life will not give rise to a claim. Additional provisions in V.–3:104 (Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights) and V.–3:105 (Obligation of third person to indemnify or reimburse the principal) further alleviate the burden on the principal. If and to the extent that state insurance schemes or insurance schemes prescribed by law provide for compensation of the intervener this may, depending on the circumstances, operate to relieve the principal under V.–3:104(2). See the comments on that principle.

Relationship to the law on non-contractual liability for damage. V.–3:103 adds an independent concurrent right to those provided by the general rules on non-contractual liability for damage (Book VI). If the principal is also liable to the intervener under those general rules the intervener may rely on the compensation scheme which is more favourable.

B. The individual requirements of the right

A strict liability outside the general law on non-contractual liability for damage. V.–3:103 amounts to a strict liability (i. e. a liability without intention or negligence on the part of the principal) in damages to the intervener. If, by contrast, the principal's liability for damage depended on the principal's wrongful conduct or fault, then the rule would more often than not prove to be superfluous. For in these cases the principal's liability would already arise under the provisions of the general law on non-contractual liability for damage (Book VI).

Illustration 1
A car driver is badly injured because he steers his car into a field in order to avoid a person who has suddenly rushed out in front of his car. According to the rule in V.–3:103, liability is imposed on that person, even though he might not, for some special reason, be liable under the general law on non-contractual liability for damage. The person may for instance be a cyclist who has suffered a hornet-sting and in consequence has lost control of his cycle for an instant and thus swerved into the oncoming lane.

Reparable damage. Damage which can give rise to a claim for reparation consists of injury to the person and damage to property and the damage which arises consequential on those (extending to economic as well as non-economic consequential losses). In contrast, so-called pure economic losses (meaning, here, losses which are not the consequence of bodily injury or damage to property) do not support a claim to reparation under the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs. That is connected with the special nature of that economic damage and with the fact that fundamentally there should be no compensation for an expenditure of time (i.e. what the intervener might otherwise have earned during the time devoted to the benevolent intervention and therefore forewent in order to act). Personal injury is defined in VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss), as is damage to property in VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) paragraph (2)(b). According to the latter provision "property damage" will only cover damage to the physical integrity of a thing.

Illustration 2
If A rushes into B's burning house in order to save B, stranded in a smoke-filled bedroom, and sustains severe burns as well as ruining her clothing, B may be liable to compensate A for her personal injury, the lingering pain and discomfort associated with the damaged tissue, the loss of income while she is under treatment and recovering her health and the more trivial damage to her property. However, if A, in order to rescue B, must forego a business appointment, B will not be liable for A's economic loss consequential on the missed appointment. In order to avoid all argument about whether such items of damage are attributable to the risks generated by the benevolent intervention, pure economic losses have been removed at the outset from the protective sphere of the claim to reparation.

Damage suffered by third parties in consequence of the intervener's death. With regard to personal injury, however, liability under this provision may be as extensive as liability would have been in the law on non-contractual liability for damage in a case of liability independent of breach of duty. Hence, if the intervener has suffered a fatal injury in attempting to protect the principal, the principal will be liable to the intervener's successors and dependants in a manner analogous to the corresponding provisions in the law on non-contractual liability for damage (see VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death)).

General limits of the principal's liability. Since the liability provided for in V.–3:103 is strict (see B above), some further limitation to its scope seems to be appropriate in order to ensure that a just balance is struck between the conflicting interests of two innocent parties.

Protection against danger. Under the rule a claim to damages only comes into consideration if, firstly, it is a case of emergency which is in issue. There must be a damage which the intervener sustained by trying to protect the person, property or other interests of the principal "against danger". A danger is understood to exist where the situation will in all likelihood take a turn for the worse.

Illustration 3
After his graduation ceremony P, who is completely drunk, gets behind the wheel of his car. I takes away the key from P, who refuses to listen to reason, and himself gets behind the wheel. I acts to rescue P from danger. P's protest is irrelevant as he is in a state which renders him incapable of forming a legally relevant will.

Questions of causation. V.–3:103 also makes it clear that in order to make the principal liable for the realisation of a danger in the form of damage of the specified type, a particularly close causal connection is required between the intervention and the endangerment of the intervener. Not every damage which is causally connected to the act of the intervener will fall within the provision.

Damage suffered in acting. Firstly, damage must be suffered "in acting", and hence in the course of an undertaking to protect the person, property or other interests of the principal. The field of potential liability is opened up only from the point in time when the intervener commences the protective act – that is to say, the act which in fact provides protection or, were it not frustrated by nature or the intervention of third parties, would have rendered protection.

Illustration 4
In illustration 2, A is entitled to claim from B's estate for her damage even if A is unfortunately beaten back by the heat and B cannot be rescued. This point in time arises only when the intervener confronts and engages with the danger surrounding B or B's interests because an act of rendering protection is the process of eliminating the danger. Hence, if, in racing to reach B's burning house, A has rushed from her shop leaving it unlocked and it is looted in her absence or A has been knocked down by a passing vehicle while crossing the road then, quite apart from considerations of A's contributory want of care or the wrongful conduct of third parties in causing A's damage, A could not have a claim against B under this Article because such losses are not sustained "in acting" to render protection. They are losses sustained by A merely in placing herself in a position from which she is then able to render or attempt to render protection. The same is true where A trips on a loose flagstone in the path to B's house, breaks a bone and never reaches the burning front door. Any redress which A might have against B in such a case lies in the general rules on non-contractual liability for damage.

Illustration 5
For one evening and one morning I attends to the animals of his unmarried neighbour who is also a farmer and had to be taken to hospital suddenly due to a heart attack. An infectious animal disease has broken out. Without the fault of any party, since it could not yet be known that P's animals have been infected, I transmits the virus to his own herd. The damage is a mere consequential loss and thus does not qualify as damage which I has suffered "in acting".

Created or significantly increased risk (sub-paragraph (a)). Secondly, the risk that such damage would be incurred must be "created or significantly increased" by rendering the specific protection. By contrast, all other risks will (even in the case of an emergency) fall within the ordinary hazards to which a helper is exposed.

Illustration 6
The owner of a grocer's shop sees an accident occur in the immediate vicinity of the shop and shuts the shop in order to help. (The loss of income is not a compensatable damage.) Should the grocer drive the victim to hospital and in the course of the journey a further accident occur in which the grocer's car is damaged, this damage too is only sufficiently closely bound up with the act of rendering assistance if in the circumstances it was necessary to adopt a particularly risky approach to making the journey by car.

Reasonable proportion between the danger to the principal and the risk incurred by the intervener (sub-paragraph (b)). Secondly, the intervener's right to reparation arises only if the intervener has not incurred an unreasonable risk. Ultimately this follows simply from the general principles as it cannot be in the principal's interest that the intervener assumes an unreasonable risk. In a normal case it might be unreasonable, for example, knowingly to endanger one's own life or health in order to save the property of others. This principle of proportionality may also be conceptualised in categories of causation. If a reasonable person in the circumstances would not have felt called upon to act in the manner in which the intervention was undertaken, then the risk realised should not be qualified as a consequence of the danger threatening the principal.

Illustration 7
The intervener's risk could be defined as the product of the probability of loss occurring and the extent of probable damage. If, as an example, there is a high probability (50%), that the intervener by the intervention would incur a comparably low property damage (ruining a suit which has a value of €1000) in order to preserve another's property of high value (a valuable painting or a laptop computer containing important data of which no backup copy exists), then the intervener incurs a reasonable risk even if the danger that the painting or the computer (value €10000) would be lost were comparatively low (10%).

"So far as foreseeable". The disproportionality between the danger to be prevented and the risk incurred however must have been observable for the intervener in the circumstances of the case. The risk of a reasonable but inaccurate estimation of the actual situation will again have to be borne by the principal.

Illustration 8
This may be illustrated by the example of a person entering a building in which the principal has stored dangerous substances of which the intervener could not have any knowledge and which endanger the lungs. Had the intervener known, or could reasonably be expected to have known, of the danger it would have been unreasonable to even attempt to rescue valuables in such circumstances.

Intervener's contributory fault. The contributory fault of the intervener (for example, A runs into the neighbour's burning house in highly inflammable plastic clothing) will result – in accordance with general principles – in a commensurate reduction of the quantum of the claim to reparation. It does not, as a matter of principle, lead to elimination of the claim to reparation. A complete exclusion of the claim to reparation by reason of contributory fault only comes into play if the damage is really entirely attributable to the intervener because the intervener behaved in a way which is beyond all bounds of reasonable conduct. In assessing whether the intervener is contributorily at fault, however, all the circumstances of the particular case have to be taken into account and, in particular, the fact that in a case of emergency not much time is left for consideration. In a panic situation, it cannot be expected that someone who is not specially trained to cope with such predicaments will proceed with the same care and consider the matter with the same level-headed deliberation as would be demanded in normal circumstances.

NOTES

1. The general principle of V.–3:103 is broadly established in Europe; the result it achieves is in substance, however, reached by different methodological approaches and on the basis of legal texts with markedly different wording. According to the literal terms of GERMAN CC § 670 only 'expenditure' is compensable thus excluding 'damage'. Yet case law has gone on to treat such damage as equivalent to 'expenditure' which the intervener incurs in the course of an effort to avert damage which has generated a substantial risk for himself (inter alia BGH 7 November 1960, BGHZ 33, 251, 257; BGH 27 November 1962, BGHZ 38, 270, 277; see further MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 683, no. 18 et seq.). In order to demarcate further damage which is compensable recourse is had to the notion of concomitant damage which is a typical realisation of the risk concerned. Only damage which appears to be a realisation of the typical risk of the assumed activity will be held to be compensable (Medicus, Bürgerliches Recht[19], no. 428; BGH 4 May 1993, NJW 1993, 2234). In cases of 'self-sacrifice' on the roads (by means of a manoeuvre a driver of a motor vehicle prevents a collision with another road user, the principal, but thereby himself sustains damage) case law recognises a claim not for full compensation but rather for a reasonable reparation (BGH 27 November 1962 loc.cit.). In a case of contributory fault by the intervener CC § 254 will be applied analogously to the claim for damages which is based on CC § 670 (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[63], § 254, no. 6; BGH 27 November 1962, loc.cit.; Larenz, Schuldrecht BT II/1[13], 450). The claim for damages in a case of personal injury will also encompass non-economic losses (CC § 253). In a case of fatal injury CC §§ 844 and 845 will be applied by means of analogy (Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], § 683, no. 5; RG 7 May 1941, RGZ 167, 85, 89; Soergel [-Beuthien], BGB[12], § 683, no. 8).
2. As regards GREEK Law the starting point is more transparent as CC art. 736 explicitly provides for both a claim to compensation for expenses incurred independent of fault and a claim for damages. All damage which has been sustained during and as a result of the intervention will be compensated (ErmAK [-Sakketas], Art. 736 no. 12), though no compensation for pain and suffering is granted because the law of mandate does not provide for such a claim either (Kavkas and Kavkas, Enochikon Dikaion, 26). By contrast damage suffered by relatives will be compensated for by means of a corresponding application of CC arts. 928 and 929

(Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Karassis], note under Art. 723). In a case of intervention in an emergency (CC art. 732) slight negligence on the part of the intervener will not result in a reduction of the claim (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 7). In a case of self-sacrifice in a road traffic accident the reparation is quantified according to what is fair and reasonable (CC arts. 300 and 918) (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 10 and Art. 730 no. 11). ESTONIAN LOA § 1025 (1) too corresponds in all material points to the rule in V.-3:103.

3. PORTUGUESE CC provides for two legal bases for a claim for compensation of a rescuer. The tort law provision of CC art. 495 (2) grants any person who (whether or not he was obliged by law) renders assistance to a person injured or fatally injured and thereby has himself sustained physical injury a claim for compensation against the person who is accountable for the injury of the primary victim (for details see Vieira Gomes, Gestão de negócios, 210). Derived from general principles of justice CC art. 468 (1) in addition grants a justified intervener a claim independent of fault against the principal (the primary victim) for 'losses sustained'. Where there is contributory fault on the side of the intervener, his claim will be reduced by corresponding application of CC art. 570 (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em Geral I[10], p. 468, fn. 2). By means of an aprovação of the intervention the principal acknowledges his liability for damages (CC art. 469).

4. It has been a long-standing dispute under AUSTRIAN law whether the intervener should be granted a claim for damages against the principal (Meissel, GoA, 185 et seq.). Recent case law grants a claim for appropriate compensation in a case of damage sustained in the course of rendering emergency assistance. This claim is characterised as a liability on grounds of equity which will be determined according to the circumstances of the individual case (OGH 24 August 1995, SZ 68/142; OGH 18 June 1997, SZ 70/113; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I³, § 1036 no. 4). CC § 1014 is not applicable either directly or by analogy because it only confers a claim on a contractual agent. The principle is instead a manifestation of the underlying ethos of appropriate compensation (CC §§ 1015, 1043 and 967). That in turn allows for a corresponding application of CC §§ 1306a, 1310 (Liability for equitable reasons without culpability).

5. FRENCH CC remains similarly silent on the question whether the intervener who has suffered damage as a consequence of his intervention may claim compensation from the principal, but case law has always recognised such a claim independent of fault, both for dommages pécuniaires and for personal injury (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372 à 1375, Fasc. 20, nos. 63-64). Legal literature holds this to be founded on an analogous application of CC art. 2000 (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 15 p. 17). Fault on the part of the intervener may reduce the claim or even exclude it altogether, but the matter is dealt with in generous terms for the intervener if he has taken a wrong decision in an emergency which left little time for deliberation (Bout loc.cit. no. 65; le Tourneau, Rép. Dr. Civ., VI, v° Gestion d´affaires (2002), no. 91). Likewise BELGIAN case law on principle awards the intervener a claim for compensation of damage which he has sustained in the course of his intervention (Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 85 p. 51). No distinction is drawn between property damage and personal injury sustained by the intervener; reference is likewise made to french CC art. 2000 (RPDB, v° Quasi-contrat, no. 77). A distinctive feature of FRENCH law is the case law on the so-called contracts of assistance. French courts have recognised a contractual claim for damages in favour of persons who, without being obliged to, answered the request of others and rendered assistance to them. A contract between the rescuer and the person assisted arises which confers a duty on the person accepting assistance to compensate the rescuer for any personal injury suffered (leading case Cass.civ. 27 May 1959, JCP 1959 no. 11187). This concept of a convention (or a contrat) d´assistance has met with opposition in legal literature (e. g. Viney, JCP 1998 éd. G, I. 144, no. 7, p. 1096), but case law adheres to this concept. LUXEMBOURGIAN case law has adopted the French solution (CA Luxembourg 27 June 2001, Pas. lux. 2002, 154). In BELGIUM the French approach has not been adopted (Glansdorff and Legros, RCJB 28 [1974], 82-85). Instead the rules on benevolent intervention (by which nearly the same result may be achieved) are held to be sufficient.

6. SPANISH CC art. 1893 (1) explicitly states: "[T]he principal compensates the intervener . . . for such damage, as he has sustained during the management of his task." Consequently the intervener has a claim to compensation for all damage which he has not caused himself and for which he is not legally responsible (CC art. 1729) (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 517; Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 267). The principal's liability is independent of fault; he will be liable in a case of accidental loss (Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 518.). Interest and earnings which are foregone qualify as compensable damage (Paz-Ares/Diez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Lasarte), Código Civil II, 1952.).

7. The legal basis of an intervener's claim for damage he has sustained is unresolved under ITALIAN law. Under the old Codice civile it was undisputed that such a claim existed. Currently recourse is predominantly had to the notion that damage suffered in the course of giving assistance in an emergency may be qualified as necessary or useful expenditure (Pane, Solidarietà sociale e gestione di affari altrui, 124-125; for the analogous application of CC art. 1720 (2) (law of mandate) in favour of an executive director of a corporate entity also Cass. 14 December 1994, no. 10680, Rep. Foro it. 1994, voce Mandato, no. 27). However, it is still a matter of dispute whether this claim can really be based on CC art. 1720 (2) (Sirena, Gestione di affari, 35-37).

8. DUTCH CC art.6:200 (1) imposes a duty on the principal not only to compensate the intervener for expenditure incurred, but also to compensate for damage. The quantum of this claim for damages will be determined according to CC arts. 6:95 et seq. From these provisions it follows in turn that the principal as a rule may also be liable for personal injury or as the case may be fatal injury of the intervener (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 311 p. 320-321). The case of intervention in an emergency for the benefit of the principal may serve as an example in which compensation has been held to be appropriate (Parlamentaire Geschiedenis VI, 796). In legal literature (Hartkamp, loc.cit. no. 312, p. 321-322) it has however been indicated that a too generous application of the law of benevolent intervention may lead to a dysfunction with tort law – for instance, where an intervener is under age, cf. CC art. 6:164. Under CC art. 6:106, according to the circumstances of the particular case, the judge may grant an intervener who has sustained personal injury compensation for non-economic damage.

9. In SCOTLAND a claim of the gestor for compensation for damage sustained by him in the course of the intervention as distinct from the claim for reimbursement is not discussed.

10. As regards SWEDISH law it has been suggested that a distinction should be drawn between measures for the protection of a person and measures for the protection of property (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 215). In the last mentioned case a claim for compensation should only be conferred on the intervener if the value of the asset sacrificed is significantly below the value of the property protected. If the intervener hazards the consequences of damage to his own interests, he should similarly be granted a claim for compensation subject to the condition that the loss is proportionate, independently of whether or not the measure is successful (Håstad loc.cit. 164, 168 and 215). The legal consequences if the intervener has not accepted the possibility of injury to himself or damage to his property, however, are uncertain. If the intervener suffers damage in order to save the principal's person, the consequences are similarly uncertain. Theses cases ought at any rate to produce a different outcome, it is argued, because they do not in the main concern the preservation or improvement of the principal's solvency. A solution might be to compensate for minor damage involuntarily incurred and in a case of severe damage to operate on the basis of an equitable reduction of damages (Håstad, loc.cit. 216). Under DANISH law a separate claim for damages by the person rendering emergency assistance does not apparently exist, and a concept similar to the contrat d´assistance is unknown, cf. HD 2 May 1960, UfR 1960, 851: the plaintiff together with the defendant loaded tree trunks on to a lorry. The plaintiff had not properly secured the crane and in consequence suffered damage. In the course of the effort to come to the defendant's assistance the plaintiff was similarly injured. His claim based exclusively on tort law was dismissed for lack of causation.

11. In ENGLISH LAW, where there is no independent negotiorum gestio liability, a strict liability to compensate for loss could ordinarily only arise on the basis of contract (where the agency is contractual). Tortious liability follows ordinary principles which as a rule require negligence on the part of the principal in creating the danger tackled by the intervener in order to vest in the intervener a claim to compensation: see Clerk and Lindsell (-Dugdale), Torts[18], paras. 7-27–7-29. However, an extra-contractual strict liability to compensate for pecuniary loss may arise in the law of restitution – at any rate if old authority is to be relied on: see, for example, Shallcross v. Wright (1850) 12 Beav 558, 50 ER 1174 (Lord Langdale MR) where an ill person moved into a friend's home in order that he might obtain better medical treatment, but died shortly afterwards and, on account of the infectious nature of the fatal illness, the home had to be evacuated, fumigated and cleaned, and it was held that (on the basis of an 'implied contract') the home owner had a right to payment of the hotel costs for him and his family and compensation for loss of furniture which had to be burned (and consequently the executors of the deceased lawfully disposed of assets of the deceased when they made such payments).

Illustration 1 is taken from Carmarthenshire County Council v. Lewis [1955] AC 549 and BGH 27 November 1962, BGHZ 38, 270; illustration 3 from BGH 30 November 1971, NJW 1972, 475.

V.–3:104: Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights

(1) The intervener's rights are reduced or excluded in so far as the intervener at the time of acting did not want to demand indemnification, reimbursement, remuneration or reparation, as the case may be.

(2) These rights are also reduced or excluded in so far as this is fair and reasonable, having regard among other things to whether the intervener acted to protect the principal in a situation of joint danger, whether the liability of the principal would be excessive and whether the intervener could reasonably be expected to obtain appropriate redress from another.

COMMENTS

A. Acting with animus donandi and related cases (paragraph (1))

Legal certainty. V.–3:104(1) has been prompted by reasons of legal certainty. The provision is a clarification which is found in the same or a similar form in statutory rules on benevolent intervention and, beyond that, is a generally accepted principle. One who acts with an intention of conferring a benefit gratuitously without wishing any indemnification, reimbursement, remuneration or reparation (or with animus donandi, to use the older terminology) has no claim to compensation. In an individual instance it may of course be the case that the acting party has acted with animus donandi only with respect to particular rights and not all of them. A case in which it is particularly advisable to examine whether the intervener was looking to the principal for reimbursement of expenditure at the time of performance is where maintenance is paid to close relatives. In a case of doubt one would proceed on the footing that the intervener certainly intended to have recourse against the person obliged to provide the maintenance, but acted with a donative intent in relation to the recipients.

> Illustration 1
> A man and a woman cohabit for three years without being married. During this period the woman has improved the apartment by her good taste and style and in consequence increased its value. She is not entitled to claim monetary compensation for the services she has provided as an expression of her affection. This was done merely out of friendship.

No waiver of rights. It may also be noted, at a more general level, that we are not concerned here with a waiver of rights; instead the intervener has no right from the outset (and there is thus nothing which can be waived). Paragraph (1) does not allow for any doubt about that because it takes as the decisive point in time the moment when the intervener acts; a later change of mind is not material. Whether the intervener at the time of acting had the intention of intervening without a given recompense and, if so, which recompense that intention concerned are questions which in the absence of express statement by the intervener are to be answered by interpretation by employing the same criteria as are to be found in II.–8:101 (General rules) and II.–8:102 (Relevant matters) paragraph (1).

The other rules of the law of benevolent intervention remain applicable. V.–3:104 and in particular paragraph (1) does not alter the starting point that a person acting with animus donandi may still be a (justified) intervener within the meaning of this Book. The principle set out above merely grants the principal a defence and does not constitute a (negative) pre-condition for the application of the law of benevolent intervention. This can already be deduced from V.–1:103 (Exclusions), which does not mention animus donandi. Thus the intervener will remain under the duty to act carefully and provide information and the obligation to surrender proceeds.

The scope of paragraph (1). Paragraph (1) is not limited to the right to reimbursement of expenditure or the pre-emptive right to indemnification. It equally embraces the right to remuneration and the right to reparation. That follows from the unqualified language of the article.

Illustration 2
During a privately organised football match among friends, a player is injured. Another player who happens to be a doctor provides makeshift aid to the injured party on the spot. It is to be presumed in the circumstances that there is no scope for a claim to remuneration: the incentive for rendering first aid is predominantly friendship and the joint activity. This is irreconcilable with a claim for reimbursement.

Illustration 3
In P's apartment a quarrel between the father P and his son X turns violent. I, the other son, comes to his father's assistance but in the course of the events is injured at his wrist by a blow X delivers with a plate. I (or rather his health insurance which wants to assert a claim against the father on the basis of subrogated rights) does not have a claim against P. The assistance provided to P by I arose from family commitment and was based on the bond of affection between father and son.

B. Reduction of liability on grounds of equity (paragraph (2))

General. Paragraph (2) provides for a reduction of the intervener's rights on grounds of equity. In litigation this grants a discretionary power to the court. At the same time paragraph (2), without claiming to be exhaustive, sets out the most important reasons, which may give rise to a reduction of the right.

Scope. Paragraph (2) primarily has the right to reparation under V.–3:103 (Right to reparation) in focus, but it is not restricted to this right. In fact it also concerns the intervener's rights to indemnification, reimbursement and remuneration.

Illustration 4
An example for the reduction of the right to reimbursement of expenditure in a situation of joint danger has already been given in Illustration 17 under V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another).

Reasons to reduce or exclude the principal's liability. The liability of the principal is subject to the general restriction that it must not be inequitable in the circumstances of the particular case. Paragraph (2) specifies a number of aspects which might make it justifiable to reduce or even exclude liability. However, the reasons which the provision offers for a possible reduction of liability are not exhaustive. The provision merely makes explicit the most important cases.

Joint danger. Expressly mentioned is the situation of common danger, an aspect which originates in the law of general average. In a situation of common danger for which neither the intervener nor the principal are accountable the rule will generally be that liability must be divided.

Illustration 5
The case of a driver of a motor vehicle who avoids hitting a teenage pedestrian, who suddenly appears in front of the vehicle but is not responsible for this mishap, may serve as an example. A further example may be found in Illustration 4.

The principal's economic capacity. However, the economic capacity of the principal also calls for consideration. A measure undertaken in benevolent intervention in another's affairs can easily lead to costs and damage whose indemnification may lie beyond the financial capabilities of the principal (especially if the principal is a child). Of course it is impossible to frame a rule which will suit all cases; ultimately the decisive question will always be whether or not it is fair and reasonable to reduce liability in the particular circumstances. In general such reduction will be considered more in relation to the intervener's right to reparation than with regard to the right to reimbursement: expenditures in general result to the principal's benefit, whereas damage sustained by the intervener naturally does not afford any benefit to the principal. Thus the claim for reimbursement of expenditures which have contributed to the successful outcome should only be reduced in rare and exceptional cases, as for instance if the costs of financing a measure are concerned, which the principal, if asked, would have declined for economic reasons.

The intervener can reasonably obtain redress from another. The principal ought generally to be liable in only a subsidiary way if it is reasonable for the intervener to look to another to obtain redress. This applies in particular to compensation for damage caused wrongfully by a third party. If such a third party can be identified as a wrongdoer who clearly has assets sufficient to satisfy the intervener's claim, then the intervener must look to the third party. The risk of the third party's inability to pay, however, must be placed on the principal rather than the intervener (see V.–3:105 (Obligation of third person to indemnify or reimburse the principal)).

Illustration 6
A hotel keeper asks a guest to assist in the apprehension of a robber. The guest acts on the request, but in the course of events is wounded by a gunshot from the robber. As a rule the hotel keeper will be liable to the guest under V.–3:103 (Right to reparation). However, this liability will be reduced in so far as the guest can actually obtain compensation from the robber.

Rights against an insurer. It is fair to oblige the principal to ensure that the intervener is protected against damage when the latter must otherwise personally carry the risk of being placed in danger. However, if the intervener has a viable claim against an insurer, then the question may arise whether the insurer should be entitled to recourse against the principal. This will be relevant in particular with regard to personal injury of persons rendering assistance in an emergency. As the latter for practical reasons will turn first to their insurance the problem is ultimately whether or not the insurer should be granted a right of recourse (against the principal whose insurance cover will usually not extend to the obligation to compensate arising from the law of benevolent intervention) by means of an assignment by operation of law. This question too cannot be answered by a comprehensive rule appropriate to all cases. The decision should turn on considerations such as the basis of the insurance cover and the extent and the funding of the insurance. For example, many Member States of the European Union have established a public insurance body, which compensates persons who have injured themselves in the course of rendering assistance to another. So far as such (state-run) health insurance for the benefit of emergency rescuers is funded by public tax revenues, the principal should not be burdened with liability for the intervener's personal injury: as everyone pays, everyone should profit. This is even more so where the reason for insurance cover may also be the fact that the legislator has imposed a sanction on failure to render aid. Where the insurance cover is not funded by taxes, but instead secured by contributions of (for example) either only employees or only employers, then there is no good reason why third parties who have not made any contribution (in this case: the principal) should profit from such payments, i. e. why they should not be subject to the insurer's recourse. Of course the principal's liability will be a precondition for such recourse; without the principal's liability to the intervener there is nothing which can be subrogated to the insurance company.

Illustration 7
A is a witness of an attack on a tourist at an underground station. He comes to the tourist's aid, but is himself injured. To the extent that A benefits from statutory non-contributory insurance, his claim against the tourist is correspondingly reduced by the amount received from the insurer. The operator of the insurance scheme acquires A's right to reparation from the attackers, but not A's claim against the tourist under the law of benevolent intervention. That is because A has no claim which is capable of transfer to the insurer.

Burden of proof. The burden of proof lies with the principal. The principal must assert and in a contested case prove that the requirements of paragraph (2) are satisfied.

NOTES

I. Acting with animus donandi

1. GERMAN CC § 685 (1) denies the intervener any claim if at the time of intervention he did not intend to demand compensation. This fact constitutes an exclusionary defence (CA Karlsruhe 18 May 2004, FamRZ 2004, 1870, 1871), precluding the intervener's claim for reimbursement of expenditure (CC § 683) and surrender of enrichment (CC § 684) to which regard must be had ex officio. As the law does not provide for a claim for compensation or for remuneration these are not explicitly addressed in CC § 685 (1). While the intention to waive need not be expressly declared, it must be evident to third parties; the onus of proof lies with the principal. The intention of the intervener not to demand compensation from a particular person who is assumed to be the principal does not automatically exclude the liability of the actual principal (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 685, nos. 1-2, § 686, no. 2). CC § 685 (2) provides a presumption of law (BGH 5 November 1997, NJW 1998, 978, 979), that payments of maintenance made without a statutory obligation between persons who are related in the direct line have been made with animus donandi (unless the principal proves the contrary). However, this only concerns the relationship to the immediate payee (example: grandfather furnishes maintenance to the grandchild because the father does not pay; the possibility to take recourse against the father remains unaffected).

2. The intervener will likewise not be entitled to a claim under ESTONIAN LOA § 1023 (3) and GREEK CC art. 738 if at the time of acting the intervener did not have the intention to demand reimbursement of expenditure or compensation for damage. This rule is interpreted as an application of the prohibition of inconsistent conduct (venire contra factum proprium) (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Art. 738, no. 1). It will suffice that the intention of the principal not to demand compensation may be inferred from the circumstances – for example where the son protects the father against an attack from a third party and thereby suffers damage himself (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 2). CC art. 738 (2) adds a rule of interpretation which goes beyond the German CC § 685 (2) as it applies to benefits provided to siblings. This apart, the provisions are congruent. Under Greek law too the principal will have to prove that the intervener has acted with animus donandi; only within the scope of CC art. 738 (2) does the intervener have to prove he furnished maintenance without such intention (Papanikolaou, loc.cit. no. 6-7).

3. PORTUGUESE CC does not contain a provision similar to German CC § 685 and Estonian LOA § 1023 (3) or Greek CC art. 738; nor does a particular rule exist on maintenance furnished to relatives without an underlying obligation. A proposal to that effect (Vaz Serra, Gestão de negócios, 228, 278 et seq.) has not been adopted on to the statute book. Nor does the case law seem to accept the defence that the intervener has acted with the intention of making a transfer by way of donation (STJ 29 February 2000, CJ(ST) VIII [2000-1] 116).

4. The AUSTRIAN CC similarly does not mention the defence of animus donandi. Academic writing (in contrast to V.–3:104(1)) considers that animus donandi can only concern expenditure and thus does not apply to the other claims (Meissel, GoA, 82). The discharge of another's duty to furnish maintenance falls within the scope of CC § 1042 – a provision forming part of unjustified enrichment law (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V^2, § 1042 no. 5). It is presumed that the person rendering payment does not intend thereby to release the debtor from his obligation (Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I^3, § 1042 no. 6).

5. In FRANCE it is questionable whether an animus donandi on the part of the intervener does not inherently rule out a relationship of benevolent intervention; case law has not yet entirely resolved this question. Douchy, La notion de quasi-contrat en droit positif français, no. 46 p. 112-113 considers that a person who acts with animus donandi does not act as an intervener. However, the prevailing view tends to the approach that the intention libérale merely constitutes a particularly altruistic form of an intention de gérer and thus is not inconsistent with benevolent intervention (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372 à 1375, Fasc. 10, no. 39). However, an animus donandi implies the intervener's waiver of (all) his claims against the principal. It gives rise to an offer of a *remise de dett*e, which if the principal accepts operates to exclude benevolent intervention after all (Bout, loc.cit. Fasc. 20, no. 48). Both prior approval and subsequent acceptance (in the latter case by means of a ratification) lead to the conclusion of a contract (Bout, loc.cit., Fasc. 10 nos. 40-41). These cases apart an intention libérale will not be presumed; it must be proven (CA Paris 14 October 1997, JurisData 1997-023144). In BELGIUM it is said that an intention libérale on the part of the intervener will as a general rule exclude the formation of a legal relationship of benevolent intervention (Stijns/Van Gerven/Wéry, JT 1996, 689 no. 17). The case is considered instead as a donation. As in France, an intention libérale must be proven in Belgium (B. H.Verb. [-Roodhooft], II.5, p. 15 no. 2236-2237).

6. In SPAIN too the absence of an animus donandi is interpreted as a (negative) requirement of a benevolent intervention. An intervener is assumed to be defined by the very fact that he acts neither with the intention to gain profit nor to make a donation (Puig Brutau, Compendio II, 599). The existence of an animus donandi will prevent the formation of a claim for reimbursement of expenditures because in such cases the conduct does not qualify from the onset as benevolent intervention (TS 15 June 1925, cited by Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 158, and TS 2 February 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 322 p. 198). CC art. 1894 on benevolent intervention, however, states that an 'outsider' who without knowledge of the person liable to provide maintenance pays to those due maintenance has a claim for reimbursement unless it is certain that he acted 'out of sympathy' and without the intention to demand reimbursement. The burden of proof is reversed if a blood relationship exists between intervener and principal (TS 25 September 1968, RAJ 1968 (2) no. 3959 p. 2657). The Foral law of NAVARRA Ley 560 in fine contains an elaborate provision on the defence of animus donandi. Under that law the principal's liability requires in general (i. e. not only with respect to provision of maintenance) that "the intervener has acted without munificence". Such munificence will in turn be presumed if intervener and principal are related to each other (Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 318).

7. In ITALIAN law a subtle distinction is drawn between cases of pure munificence (in which it is assumed that the requirement of animus negotia aliena gerendi is not met, cf. Cass. 29 March 2001, no. 4623, Riv. Notariato 2001, 1423) and cases in which the intervener acts with the intention not to demand reimbursement of his expenditure and thus acts with animus donandi. The desire to receive reimbursement is not considered to be a necessary requirement of benevolent intervention (Aru, Gestione d´affari, 14-15). Against this background difficult and in part unresolved questions of demarcation arise as far as maintenance payments within a family are concerned; for details see Cass. 17 July 1969, no. 2636, Foro it. 1970, I, 260 with note Pisu, Foro it. 1971, I, 713.

8. The problem referred to in V.–3:104 has not played any role in the development of the DUTCH CC; consequently the law does not address this problem. Yet in the case law of the appellate courts the aspect of munificence has repeatedly led to the dismissal of a claim based on benevolent intervention and sometimes on the ground that the intervener must have the intention to act for the account and expense of the principal (e. g. CFI Roermond 15 April 1915, NedJur 1915, p. 992; CFI Amsterdam 4 April 1939, NedJur 1939, no. 628 p. 978; CFI Haarlem 8 January 1954, NedJur 1954, no. 615 p. 1143). This reasoning has been criticised by commentators, because the existence of munificence need not lead to the result that the intervener is released from his regular duties, such as, inter alia, his duty to continue the intervention. Rather the case actually concerns the necessity to prevent the intervener from venire contra factum proprium (Verburg, De vrijwillige zaakwaarneming, nos. 60-62, p. 90-92). In recent case law it has been stated that friendly acts done for the benefit of a person with whom the active party lives in extra-marital cohabitation may not be qualified as benevolent intervention (CFI s´Gravenhage 28 February 2001, LJN-number AB1265, www.rechtspraak.nl).

9. Similarly it holds true for SCOTTISH Law that "there can be no claim for expenses where the gestor has acted animo donandi" (Leslie, Jur.Rev. 1983, 33). If the intervener is a close relative of the principal such animus donandi will be presumed (Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, XV, paras 95 and 116).

10. In accordance with V.–3:104(1) SWEDISH academic writing has stated that a gestor who acts with the intention of making a donation is neither entitled to a claim for remuneration nor for reimbursement of expenditure (Hellner, Om obehörig vinst, 362). Such acts are mere acts of friendship (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 68).

11. Where there is a recognised legal relationship of agency in the COMMON LAW (whether by agreement, necessity or ratification) or bailment, the terms of that relationship will determine the scope of the intervener's rights. In that context, where the intervener's generous state of mind is formed too late to help fix in advance the terms of the relationship, the principles of waiver and estoppel may come into operation to control the rights of the intervener against the principal. Any other benevolent intervener acting with animus donandi will have no claim to the extent to which the service or benefits are freely provided. For authorities confirming that a person supporting someone without full legal capacity has no claim if they did not intend to be reimbursed see Wentworth v. Tubb (1841) 1 Y & C CC 171 at 174, 62 ER 840 at 842 (Knight Bruce VC); Re Rhodes (1890) 44 Ch. D 94, 102 (Kay J: absence of intention to claim reimbursement could be inferred in the circumstances from fact neither payer had made a claim before the recipient's death or bothered with book-keeping), and on appeal (where the decision was affirmed) loc. cit at 106 (Cotton LJ), 107 (Lindley LJ: "[I]n order to raise an obligation to repay, the money must have been expended with the intention on the part of that person providing it that it should be repaid."), 103-104 and 108 (Lopes LJ); see also Carter v. Beard (1839) 10 Sim 7 at 8, 59 ER 514 at 515 (Shadwell VC), which decision if correct (notwithstanding the doubts of Cotton und Lopes LJJ on that point in Re Rhodes loc. cit., 103) is explicable on the basis that there was an "act of bounty" for which the claimant did not intend to be reimbursed. This exclusion of a restitutionary claim follows from the fact that the exceptional liability to a stranger for a benefit conferred is based on necessity for the intervention providing an unjust factor establishing a restitutionary claim and the intervener's free consent to the enrichment of the principal precludes redress on that basis. Indeed the position is more restrictive than this: the intervener has no restitutionary claim for remuneration if the intervener did not intend such a claim against the recipient of the benefit because the intervener intended to obtain reimbursement or a benefit in return through other channels. See, for example, Wentworth v. Tubb, loc. cit. (no claim for reimbursement for necessaries provided to a person without full capacity if intended to be reimbursed by a third party); Shallcross v. Wright (1850) 12 Beav 558, 50 ER 1174 (Lord Langdale MR), where the doctor provided medical assistance supposedly not on the basis of a contract with the patient, but in the expectation of receiving a legacy in the latter's will, and was thus denied a claim to remuneration. The latter decision, however, is open to some doubt not least because of its association with the broader but now moribund proposition that a doctor and a barrister have no legal claim to remuneration for their professional services (Chorley v. Bolcott (1791) 4 T. R. 317, 100 ER 1040) and the recognition of claims on the footing of constructive trusts and proprietary estoppel where services are freely rendered on a non-contractual basis, but in the expectation of a reward. Where a claim is being made in respect of medical treatment provided in respect of a road traffic accident under ss. 157-158 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, that claim must be made either at the time of treatment or in writing within seven days. This may serve in effect to exclude claims where there was no intention to seek recompense contemporaneous with provision of the service, but the purpose of the rule is presumably a different one and related to liability of and settlement by a driver's or owner's insurers.

II. Reduction of liability on grounds of equity

12. GERMAN CC does not provide for a rule corresponding to V.–3:104(2). However, in a case in which the driver of a motor vehicle avoided hitting a cyclist, who suddenly appeared in his lane but was not responsible for this mishap, and thereby sustained severe personal injury, the BGH reduced the motorist's claim for compensation to 50 % and in doing so relied on an argument by analogy with the provisions on general average contained in maritime law; it was considered to be a case of common danger (BGH 27 November 1962, BGHZ 38, 270, 277). Many further details are as yet unresolved. It is predominantly emphasised that the compensation of damage is strongly influenced by considerations of equity. In this context benefits provided under a social insurance scheme to a person who has rendered assistance are to be taken into consideration as far as appropriate (Palandt [-Sprau], BGB[63], § 683, no. 9; RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], § 683, no. 11; MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], § 683, no. 20). In the case of 'affairs of one's own which are also those of another' (i.e. coincidence of management of an affair on another's behalf and in pursuit of one's own interests) the intervener will as a rule only be entitled to reimbursement of expenditure corresponding to the share of the intervention which was on another's behalf (Sprau, loc.cit. no. 8). If the proportion cannot be determined in such a way, then the importance of responsibility, interests and benefits will be decisive (BGH 15 December 1954, BGHZ 16, 12, 16; BGH 18 September 1986, BGHZ 98, 235, 242; BGH 8 March 1990, BGHZ 110, 313).

13. ESTONIAN LOA § 1025 (1) (ii) states that compensation may not be demanded from the principal if the employer, mandator of the intervener, provider of social security or health insurer of the intervener has the obligation to compensate for the loss sustained.

14. In PORTUGUESE law the question of a reduction of the intervener's claim for damages against the principal has apparently not been an issue of discussion. It only seems to be recognised (for the opposite case) that CC art. 570 (the reduction clause provided for by tort law) may be applied if the intervener has contributed by his own fault to an aggravation of the principal's damage (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em Geral I[10], p. 468, fn. 2.).

15. In AUSTRIA both case law (OGH 24 August 1995, SZ 68/142) and academic writing (Meissel, GoA, 190) emphasise that in accordance with CC § 967 sentence 2 "appropriate compensation" must be afforded. If and to what extent an intervener who has rendered emergency assistance is entitled to such appropriate compensation will depend on the circumstances of the particular case. The factors calling for consideration will be the balance between the danger impending for the principal and the risk incurred by the intervener, the type and extent of the intervener's damage, the latter's contribution to the dangerous situation (if any) and financial capacity (cf. Fitz, Risikozurechnung, 100). The proportionality of danger and damage is assessed from an ex post perspective (Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II[2], § 1306a no. 12). Existing insurance cover is in general taken into account (Reischauer, loc.cit. § 1310 no. 9). However, the social security accident insurer of an emergency helper is not supposed to release the principal from his obligation; thus the insurer may have recourse to the principal (OGH 24 August 1995, SZ 68/142). This may perhaps rely on the fact that the insurance cover draws on funds which are exclusively contributed by employers.

16. The BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN Code civil do not provide for a reduction of the principal's liability on grounds of equity. Academic writing has not advanced an opinion on this topic. The same holds true for MALTA.

17. SPANISH CC art. 1890 (2) only contains a reduction clause with regard to the intervener's liability for damages – not with regard to the principal's liability for damages. Given that the general provisions of contract law may be applied to the principal's liability, it is to be expected against this background that the general rule of CC art. 1103 is similarly applicable. Accordingly liability in a case of negligence can be reduced by the courts according to the circumstances of the particular case; this will result in a proportionate reduction of the creditor's claims (e. g. TS 18 July 1994, RAJ 1994 (4) no. 6446 p. 8274 and TS 29 November 1993, RAJ 1993 (5) no. 9145 p. 11800). Case law bearing out this assumption that the principal's liability may similarly be reduced (and the circumstances on which such reduction would depend) does not apparently exist.

18. In ITALY the situation is as in Spain. CC art. 2030 (2) only concerns the intervener's liability; the law does not provide for the opposite situation which is of interest in this context.

19. DUTCH CC art. 6:200 (1) in conjunction with art. 6:109 permits not only a reduction of liability but also the reduction of the intervener's claim for compensation. A typical example would be the altruistic effort to rescue another in the course of which the intervener harms himself (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 795; MvA II, Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 449-450; Schoordijk, Het algemeen gedeelte van het verbintenissenrecht naar het nieuw BW, 279).

20. A reduction of liability on grounds of equity is unknown under SCOTTISH law.

21. In DENMARK (Lov om arbejdskadesikring § 4 Nr. 3 and 4 [Act on Labour Insurance Employment Accidents of 20 May 1992 no. 390]; cf. on the preceding statute HD 8 February 1961, UfR 1961, 344) and in FINLAND (Lag om skadestånd för olycksfall vid räddning av människoliv § 1 [Act on Damages for Accidents by Saving Another Person's Life of 12 April 1935/158]) rescuers who render assistance after an accident are protected by state insurance cover (for details see Karnov and Hansen [-Preben/RasmussenKolbjørn], Arbejdsskadesikringsloven § 2 no. 11). The SWEDISH Act on Insurance for Accidents at Work [lag (1976:380) om arbetsskadeförsäkring] by contrast only applies to employees. The insurer (governed by public law) is not entitled to seek recourse from the tortfeasor (National Insurance Act [lag (1962:381) om allmän försäkring] chap. 20 § 7 (2); for details see Wendel, Sweden, in Magnus (ed.), The Impact of Social Security Law on Tort Law, 183), which apparently indicates that the insurer may not have take recourse against a principal either.

22. ENGLISH law does not provide for any general judicial discretionary reduction in liability in private law, though where a claimant is seeking an equitable remedy principles involving discretionary elements (including a consideration of hardship to the defendant) may apply so as in effect to diminish liability.

Illustration 1 is taken from CFI ,s-Gravenhage 28 February 2001, LJN-number AB1265, www.rechtspraak.nl; illustration 3 from BGH 6 December 1962, BGHZ 38, 302; illustration 5 from Carmarthenshire County Council v. Lewis [1955] AC 549; illustration 6 from BGH 19 May 1969, BGHZ 52, 115.

V.–3:105: Obligation of third person to indemnify or reimburse the principal

If the intervener acts to protect the principal from damage, a person who would be accountable under Book VI for the causation of such damage to the principal is obliged to indemnify or, as the case may be, reimburse the principal's liability to the intervener.

COMMENTS

Purpose of the rule. V.–3:105 concerns the situation in which the intervener prevents damage for which, had it occurred, a third party would have been liable to the principal according to the general law on non-contractual liability for damage (Book VI). In other words the intervention has prevented impending damage to the principal or the principal's interests. But it has resulted in detriment to the intervener: for instance, the incurring of expenditure or the sustaining of damage. If and in so far as the principal is liable to the intervener in respect of such detriment, the principal is entitled to recourse against the third party. The third party is not to be relieved from liability by the fact that another (the intervener) has prevented the damaging event. Thus the principal is freed from the burden of establishing that the principal's liability to the intervener constitutes in relation to the third party "legally relevant damage" and that with respect to this damage (which in fact is a pure economic loss) the other requirements of liability under Book VI (causation and accountability) are met.

Illustration 1
Miscreants untie a yacht from its moorings and it threatens to drift away. The owner of another yacht motors up alongside it, but in heading back to the quay damages his own engine. In such a case the owner of the drifting yacht can be looked upon as the benefited party (the principal). Consequently, the owner of the second yacht will have a claim for damages to the value of the costs of repairing his engine. The owner of the rescued yacht will in turn have a claim for redress against the miscreants under V.–3:105, but he will bear the risk of their ascertainment and of their ability to pay when successfully sued. However, V.–3:105 at least relieves the principal from the difficulty that a court could deem the intervention of the intervener for the purposes of liability in non-contractual liability for damage to be a novus actus interveniens or that an action for recourse based in the law on non-contractual liability for damage may fail for other reasons.

Illustration 2
For inexplicable reasons a toddler disappears from protected premises and runs on to the road. In order to avoid hitting the child, who suddenly appears in front of his vehicle, A steers away, but as a result of the consequent accident suffers injury. The child remains unharmed. A on principle has a claim against the child under V.–3:103 (Right to reparation). However, this claim will be reduced under V.–3:104 (Reduction or exclusion of intervener's rights) paragraph (2), if and to the extent that A has a claim for reparation of damages vis-à-vis the nursery. Whether A in fact has such a claim is left to the general law on non-contractual liability for damage to decide. If there is no such claim, the child will have a claim for recourse against the nursery school arising from V.–3:105, if the nursery school would have been liable vis-à-vis the child if the latter had been hit by A's vehicle.

Rights in benevolent intervention and in the law on non-contractual liability for damage. The provision proceeds therefore on the basis that the intervener has direct redress against the principal, to whom passes in turn the burden of identifying the appropriate wrongdoer. This provides the necessary protection for the intervener, commensurate with having sustained damage for altruistic reasons, because the principal rather than the intervener will carry the risk that the person who is ultimately responsible for the intervener's damage is unable to satisfy the liability to compensate.

Wrongdoer and intervener. The person responsible for the danger – the potential wrongdoer – might be the party rendering aid rather than a third party. As noted earlier, a person who has injured another and then sets about reparation of the harm caused cannot act as intervener in relation to the victim because, by the rules of the law on non-contractual liability for damage, the person causing the damage is obliged to compensate the victim for the damage wrongfully caused. His act of "healing" the damage is a performance of the private law obligation owed to the victim and is thus excluded from benevolent intervention by V.–1:103 (Exclusions) sub-paragraph (a).

NOTES

1. The subject-matter of this Article has only rarely been a point of discussion in the various legal systems. If it is considered at all, then more often than not the issue treated is restricted to the question whether or not the rescuer has a direct claim against the tortfeasor, which in turn is often answered in the affirmative, cf. for SPANISH law CCP art. 113; for DUTCH law Asser (-Hartkamp), Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 312 p. 321-322; for DANISH and SWEDISH law Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 437 et seq. (who though in this respect also points towards insurance solutions which may often render the question of recourse irrelevant); and for ENGLISH Law Carmarthenshire County Council v. Lewis [1955] AC 549, and see also the Road Traffic Act, s. 158(4), where liability of a car user to pay in respect of medical treatment given to a person injured in a road accident is damage recoverable from the person responsible in tort. Also of note as regards ENGLISH law is the possibility that one who provides gratuitous but necessary care services to a person injured as a result of the tort of a third party may recover from the injured person (on the basis of a trust of the damages) the value of those services or reimbursement of travelling expenses if the injured person sues the third party and recovers damages in respect of them: see Hunt v. Severs [1994] 2 AC 350 (where, however, the services were provided by the tortfeasor himself and the principle was inapplicable on the facts), approving Cunningham v. Harrison [1973] QB 942, 952A-C (Lord Denning MR). SCOTTISH law makes similar arrangements (expressly restricted to relatives) in the Administration of Justice Act 1982, s. 8 (injured person under an obligation to account).
2. AUSTRIAN Law apparently addresses the question whether or not the principal is entitled to recourse in the context of tort law. Compensable damage may also consist of monetary expenditure of the aggrieved party which served to prevent further damage (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 2/66 p. 53). In addition incurring an obligation to a third party may likewise qualify as damage (Koziol loc.cit.; OGH 10 October 1979, SZ 52/146). For details on the claim of the rescuer against the person who caused the dangerous situation see Koziol loc.cit. no. 8/43, p. 261.

3. The lack of discussion on the problem addressed by V.–3:105 also holds true for FRENCH and BELGIAN academic writing. However, in terms of outcome it seems to be considered as self-evident that the principal is entitled to an independent claim under tort law against the third party who would have been accountable had the damage occurred. The principal may claim the amount which he (the principal) was obliged to pay to the intervener as compensation for the latter's damage. CAA Lyon 22 September 1993, RTD civ. 1994, 101, obs. Mestre, concerned a customer who – following the armed robbery of a store – pursued the robbers. One of them dropped the spoils, but another fired at the customer and injured him. The Cour de Cassation allowed a claim for damages based on benevolent intervention of the customer against the keeper of the shop (Cass. civ. 26 January 1988, Bull. Civ. 1988, I, no. 25 p. 16; JCP 1989 éd. G, no. 21217, obs. Dagorne-Labbe; RTD civ. 1988, 539, obs. Mestre; D. 1989 Jur., 405, note Martin). Subsequently the CAA Lyon upheld the claim for recourse made by the store operator's insurer against the state. The customer was held to have acted as a collaborateur bénévole d´un service public. For damage to the latter strict liability is imposed on the state. For BELGIAN law Cass. 30 November 1977, Pas. belge 1978, I, 351 has held that the expenses incurred by a third party rendering emergency assistance on which the victim is dependent will constitute a damage of the victim compensable under tort law, even if the assistance was provided gratuitously. Furthermore, an injured gestor (who acted gratuitously) may take legal action directly against the person responsible for the accident (Cass. 6 November 2001, Pas. belge 2001, 1790, conclusions du Jardin; for details see Lindenbergh, TPR 2002, no. 27 p. 1437-1438).
4. As regards SPANISH law attention should be drawn to CC art. 1729. According to this provision the principal will have to compensate a (contractual) agent for all damage and detriment which he has sustained as a result of the performance of the mandate. If a third party is responsible for the causation of such damage the principal is entitled to recourse against that third party (Paz-Ares/Diez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador [-Górdillo Cañas], Código Civil II, 1575). It may be possible indeed to apply this provision accordingly to cases of benevolent intervention.
5. With regard to ITALIAN Law Sirena, Gestione di affari, 291-292 has argued that the rescuer may also be seen as an intervener on behalf of the tortfeasor, which in turn would lead to the result that two principals (the victim and the tortfeasor) have to be dealt with, at least in so far as the rescuer renders assistance going beyond the duties imposed by law. Inter partes the person who has received assistance is entitled to recourse against the tortfeasor. The claim will cover all payments that he (the victim) has made to the intervener.

Illustration 2 is taken from Carmarthenshire County Council v. Lewis [1955] AC 549.

V.–3:106: Authority of intervener to act as representative of the principal

(1) The intervener may conclude legal transactions or perform other juridical acts as a representative of the principal in so far as this may reasonably be expected to benefit the principal.

(2) However, a unilateral juridical act by the intervener as a representative of the principal has no effect if the person to whom it is addressed rejects the act without undue delay.

COMMENTS

A. Third party relations

Three different situations. Where third parties are engaged there are three situations which are legally distinguishable, though in terms of everyday life they are relatively proximate. Firstly, there is the situation where someone intends to be active as intervener, but – for example, because lacking the necessary expertise – leaves the actual carrying out of the work to another, such as an employee or an independent contractor. The second basic situation is where one person (A) merely alerts another (B) to the fact that the principal (C) is in danger or otherwise needs help, A leaving it up to B to decide whether or not to intervene for the benefit of C. Finally, in the third basic situation A again turns to B, but this time concludes a contract with B (or effects a unilateral juridical act vis-à-vis B), but as a representative of C (i.e. in the name of C or otherwise in such a way as to indicate an intention to affect C's legal position) but without being authorised by C to do so. V.–3:106 is concerned with only the last of these three situations.

Conclusion of a contract in the intervener's own name and not as principal's representative. In the first mentioned situation (where A concludes a contract with B in A's own name, though for the purpose of benefiting C) only A is an intervener. The party taking up the commission (in our example, the employee or independent contractor) does not satisfy the conditions of V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) (see further V.–1:103 (Exclusions) sub-paragraph (c)) and is accordingly not a benevolent intervener – not even in relation to the benefited party. In that regard the outcome is no different if the contract between A and B is so constituted that as a genuine contract for the benefit of a third party it confers rights on C against B. If the contract is so constituted as a genuine contract for the benefit of a third party, this merely furnishes a further reason for excluding B from the law of benevolent intervention, namely V.–1:103 sub-paragraph (a). However, the intervener (the party giving the commission) of course remains obliged in relation to the principal, though having made use of another in order to fulfil the obligations.

Engagement of third parties without conclusion of a contract. There is no need for further rules either for the (second) case where someone, who has become aware of a danger threatening the principal, alerts a third person (once again, as a rule an independent operator) to the situation and abdicates to that third person the decision whether or not to intervene. If the third person steps in, then we are faced with two different measures taken (the invitation to act, on the one hand, and the actual carrying out of the preventative measures, on the other) and therefore with two interveners who are completely independent of one another and two independent acts of benevolent intervention.

Conclusion of a contract as representative of the principal. Finally, the third question looks to whether an intervener may conclude a contract with a third party on behalf of the principal. This question is addressed in V.–3:106(1) and is answered here in the affirmative. The intervener may conclude contracts with third parties as a representative of the principal if in doing so the intervener is advancing the principal's interest appropriately. The intervener (A) in this situation, incidentally, is only the person who concludes the contract and not the third party (B), because B will provide the service to the principal (C) on the basis of a valid contract subsisting between B and C.

B. The intervener's power of representation

Considerations of legal policy. The European jurisdictions disagree on whether or not a power of legal representation should be conferred on the intervener. In Belgium, France and Luxembourg such a right is affirmed by CC art. 1375. The same is true for Italy, if the benevolent intervention has been "usefully" undertaken (CC art. 2031). In the Netherlands too a gestor is "authorised to carry out legal transactions in the name of the person concerned, in so far as the latter's interest is duly furthered thereby" (Dutch CC art. 6:201). In all other legal systems in continental Europe, by contrast, a justified intervener who acts in the name of the principal acts as an agent without a power of representation if there is no agreed mandate or power of attorney and the subsequent ratification (ratificação) of the principal is not forthcoming, albeit that this is only expressly set out in statute in Portugal (CC art. 471 sent. 1 in conjunction with art. 268). V.–3:106(1) proceeds from the basic idea that such a legally conferred authority does not impose an undue burden on the principal, but at the same time appropriately accommodates the interests of the intervener as well as those of third parties. The intervener who concludes a contract with a third party otherwise than as a representative of the principal is entitled to demand indemnification and reimbursement of expenditure from the principal (V.–3:101 (Right to indemnification or reimbursement)). Thus the principal will already have to bear the economic consequences: that is, will have to pay to the intervener the amount the latter is obliged to pay the third party. Thus from an economic perspective it does not make any difference whether an obligation is imposed on the principal to perform directly to the third party. The principal's position is by no means weakened. On the other hand the intervener benefits by being freed from liability under the contract with the third party provided the intervener acts within the scope of the legally conferred authority. The third party in turn must take action against the principal. This results in a reallocation of the risk of insolvency. Yet exactly this reallocation seems both appropriate and desirable since the third party knows that the intervener acts as a representative of the principal (see II.–6:105 (When representative's act affects the principal's legal position)) and is free to decide whether or not to accept the offer to conclude a contract with the principal.

Relation to the rules on representation in Book II. The rules on representation in Book II, Chapter 6 are not restricted to cases where the power of representation finds its basis in a voluntary grant of authority. "The authority of a representative may be granted by the principal or by the law" (II.–6:103 (Authorisation) paragraph (1)) (In the PECL Chapter 3 by contrast, the rules on agency did not govern an agent's authority bestowed by law (PECL art. 3:101(2)). Benevolent intervention is precisely an instance where a representative's authority is conferred by law. V.–3:106 grants authority itself and this makes up for the lack of any authority conferred by contract. The general requirement under the rules on representation that in order to affect the principal's legal position the intervener has to act in the name of the principal or otherwise in such a way as to indicate to the third party an intention to affect the legal position of the principal remains unaffected (II.–6:105 (When representative's act affects the principal's legal position)). A juridical act effected in the intervener's own name, and without indicating an intention to bind the principal, will bind only the intervener in relation to the third party (II.–6:106 (Representative acting in own name)). If the intervener acts in the principal's name, but beyond the scope of the authority conferred by V.–3:106, the position is regulated by II.–6:107 (Person purporting to act as representative but not having authority).

Transactions covered. V.–3:106 (Authority of intervener to act as representative of the principal) paragraph (1) embraces legal transactions of all types. In particular it is not limited to the conclusion of a contract by way of offer and acceptance; it also covers unilateral declarations of the principal's will (e. g. a notice to quit). However, V.–3:106(2) provides for a special rule in the case of unilateral acts. Self-evident (and therefore not mentioned as such) is the proposition that there can be no representation for strictly personal acts (see Comment B under V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another)). Whether and to what extent an intervener may undertake the conduct of litigation is, as already stressed in Comment B under V.–1:101, a matter for the law of procedure and is not decided here.

"In so far as this may reasonably be expected to benefit the principal". A valid representation of the principal by the intervener may naturally only be considered if the general requirements set out in the first Chapter of this Book are met. Moreover V.–3:106(1) requires that the course of action chosen by the intervener, namely the making of an offer or other statement of intention as a representative of the principal must have been of such a nature as could reasonably be expected to benefit the latter. As may already be inferred from the general rules, conclusion of a contract by the intervener will as a rule only be considered justified for the purpose of temporarily stabilising a critical situation. V.–3:106 in addition demands that it must have been reasonable to expect that committing the principal to the third party would benefit the principal. This also applies to cases in which a representative appointed by contract is forced in the circumstances to act in excess of the contractual authority in order to advance the interests of the principal.

Illustration
B, the principal, is a celebrated public character, who visits another city incognito. As A knows, B suffers from a cerebral disease, which B has consistently concealed from the public due to reasonable concern for his career. Furthermore, B has good reason to conceal his presence in the city from the public. B is suddenly in urgent need of a hotel room for a few hours. A books this hotel room. It would not be reasonable to expect that concluding the contract in the name of B would be of benefit to B.

C. Unilateral acts (paragraph (2))

Third party protection. With respect to unilateral acts which the intervener does as a representative of the principal a further provision is necessary in order to protect the third party. It is contained in V.–3:106(2). In contrast to a conventional offer with a view to conclusion of a contract, a third party cannot simply ignore a notice of termination of a contractual relationship, or a notice of avoidance of a contract, or a measure interrupting the period of prescription or a notice by which an option is exercised or any comparable declaration which the intervener may effect in the name of the principal. Such declarations, if they are valid, modify the legal situation by themselves. Consequently the third party must be given some certainty. Thus paragraph (2) provides for the possibility to reject unilateral legal acts which the intervener effects in the principal's name, provided the rejection is done without undue delay. It would be inequitable to impose on the third party the risk entailed in the fact that within a short space of time it may not be clarified whether the requirements of V.–1:101 (Intervention to benefit another) for a valid benevolent intervention (and consequently a power of representation under V.–3:106(1)) were actually satisfied or not.

NOTES

1. As mentioned above the European jurisdictions are divided with regard to the question whether or not the intervener's authority should also include the possibility to act in the name of the principal and thus to represent him. CZECH, ESTONIAN, GERMAN, HUNGARIAN and POLISH law answer this question in the negative. Unless particular statutory rules provide otherwise – which rules may incidentally be found in the context of emergency assistance – an intervener cannot directly bind the principal nor dispose of the latter's property in his name. If such acts occur they fall within the scope of the rules on representation without authority (BGH 4 October 1977, BGHZ 69, 323, 327; BGH 4 May 1955, BGHZ 17, 181, 188; BGH 8 July 1953, LM § 683 no. 2). However, in the exceptional case that the intervener discharges a duty of the principal the performance of which is required as a matter of overriding public interest (German CC § 679) a duty to ratify is contemplated (BGH 9 February 1951, NJW 1951, 398, obiter). This apart, the intervener has to rely on his claim for indemnification against the principal (MünchKomm [-Seiler], BGB[3], Pref. to § 677, no. 6 and § 683, no. 27; Staudinger [-Wittmann], BGB[13], Pref. to §§ 677 et seq., no. 60; RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], Pref. to § 677, no. 83; a contrary view is only advanced by Baur, JZ 1952, 328).
2. GREEK law likewise only imposes duties on the intervener inter partes, i. e. in relation to the principal; no provision is made for a power of representation. Legal transactions which the intervener effects in the name of the principal come within the rules on representation without authority. In consequence they will only be valid if the principal ratifies them according to CC arts. 229 et seq. (Georgiades/Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], Pref. to arts. 730-740, no. 13; ErmAK [-Sakketas], art. 737, no. 13).
3. PORTUGUESE CC art. 471 also excludes a representative authority for the intervener (for details see Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 210). If, despite this rule, the intervener concludes legal transactions with third parties in the name of the principal (and thus gives rise to a gestão representativa), CC art. 471 refers to CC art. 268, according to which such legal transactions will only have a binding effect on the principal if he ratifies them. The legal position of third parties is comparatively weak. The only possible means for a third party to protect himself against the invalidity of a legal transaction pursuant to CC art. 260 (1) is in general to request his contracting party to provide evidence of his representative authority (cf. CA Evora 1 June 1999, CJ XXIV [1993-3] 270). Moreover, under CC art. 268 (4) the third party is only granted a power of revocation if that party did not know that the intervener acted without authority.
4. AUSTRIAN law similarly proceeds on the basis that the intervener is not the principal's representative (Schwimann [-Apathy], ABGB V[2], § 1035 no. 4; Rummel [-Rummel], ABGB I[3], § 1035 no. 2, Meissel, GoA, 73). The law of benevolent intervention provides solely for the internal relationship between intervener and principal (OGH 17 May 1950, SZ 23/159).
5. By contrast the legal position in FRANCE, BELGIUM and LUXEMBOURG is completely different. Here the creation of representative authority is regarded as a statutory consequence of benevolent intervention (JClCiv [-Bout], Art. 1372 à 1375, Fasc. 20 no. 90; De Page, Droit Civil Belge II[3], no. 1090 p. 1153). In order to bind the principal it will be sufficient that the intervener points to the benevolent intervention and discloses that he acts in the name of the principal (Cass. civ. 14 January 1959, D. 1959 Jur. 106; RTD civ. 1959, 334, note Henri and Léon Mazeaud). The third party may of course make it a condition of the conclusion of the contract that the gestor personally binds himself too (Cass.civ. 14 January 1959 loc.cit.). In this case the result will be that the third party will have rights against both the intervener and the principal (Starck/Roland/Boyer, Droit Civil. Les Obligations, II[6], no. 2172 p. 762). Moreover the intervener may be liable to the third party under tort law – for instance if he has made a false statement with respect to the principal's solvency (Planiol/Ripert [-Esmein/Radouant/Gabolde], Droit civil français VII[2], no. 732 p. 19). The representative authority of a gestor may exceed that of a mandataire because the former can also bring about a contractual obligation of a principal who lacks full legal capacity (Bout, loc.cit. no. 93; Paulus, Zaakwaarneming, no. 100 p. 57-58).

6. Although SPANISH CC art. 1893 merely states that "the owner of property or the principal of the affairs is liable for the obligations, which have been incurred in his interest", it is accepted in academic writing that the intervener may act both in his own name and in the name of the principal. In the latter case the principal will be bound directly vis-à-vis the third party (Pasquau Liaño, La gestión de negocios ajenos, 198; Sánchez Jordán, Gestión de negocios, 603; Lacruz Berdejo, Rev.Crít.Der.Inm. 1975, 267, Albaladejo [-Santos Briz], Código Civil y compilaciones forales, XXIV, 67). Of course the general requirements of a justified intervention on another's behalf (CC arts. 1892 and 1893) have to be met. If this is not the case (for instance, because the intervention does not qualify as useful or because the principal has not ratified the intervention), then according to the view advanced by some authors the contract is not void under CC art. 1259 but instead binds the intervener (Lacruz Berdejo loc.cit.; Sánchez Jordán, loc.cit. 606). However, it is difficult to find support for this opinion in the wording of the Code. The reference to CC art. 1259 in fine seems to be important, according to which a contract which has been concluded in the name of another who was neither granted a power of representation nor in possession of a statutory power of representation will be void unless the person in whose name the contract was concluded has "ratified, prior to the other contracting party's revocation". Lacruz, Elementos II (1), 524 considers that it is for exactly those cases in which the intervener has acted in another's name that provision has been made for the possibility to revoke. Until the contract is ratified its validity will be in suspense; if the third party revokes the contract prior to a ratification, it will be a dead letter. In this case the intervener will not be liable either.

7. Under ITALIAN Law the intervener may even conclude contracts which are subject to formality requirements (Cass. 20 March 1995, no. 3225, Foro it. 1996, I, 203, note F. Loria). That a statutory representative authority is conferred on the intervener which enables the latter to act in the name and for the account of the principal is nearly undisputed (a contrary opinion has apparently only been advanced by Biondo, Foro it. 1954, I, 98). The statutory authority arises from CC art. 2031 and encompasses both agreements creating obligations and transactions disposing of rights (Breccia, La gestione d´affari[2], 893).

8. Under DUTCH Law the intervener may conduct legal transactions both in his own name and in the name of the principal (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 790; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[11], no. 295, p. 309; Schrage, Verbintenissen uit andere bron dan onrechtmatige daad of overeenkomst, no. 5, p. 5). The authority to act in another's name is explicitly provided for in CC art. 6:201. To the extent that the intervener by his acts conducted in the principal's name properly looks after the latter's interests the principal will be directly bound and entitled by such contract. CC art. 3:78 provides for the applicability of some mandate law provisions, which is set out in detail in CC arts. 3:60 et seq. (T. M. Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 797 et seq.; Hartkamp loc.cit. no. 305, p. 316-317; Vriesendorp, Verbintenissen uit de wet en schadevergoeding, no. 283, p. 269-270). See also CFI Arnhem 19 May 2004, LJN-number AP6938, www.rechtspraak.nl.

9. Whether SCOTTISH law confers representative authority on the intervener is apparently still unresolved. Although SMT Sales & Services Co. Ltd. v. Motor and General Finance Co. Ltd. 1954 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 107 (where the police as gestors appointed a breakdown recovery service which subsequently succeeded in its direct action for costs against the principal) may be taken as an indicator that such representative authority is recognised, there is no express statement to that end. The basis of this direct claim is still a matter of debate (for details see Stair [-Whitty], The Laws of Scotland, XV, paras. 101 and 143).

10. In SWEDISH law it seems to be acknowledged that a gestor may interrupt a limitation period on behalf of the principal (Håstad, Tjänster utan uppdrag, 275; Lindskog, Preskription[2], 298; cf. also HD 11 October 1966, NJA 1966, 489, where the interruption of the limitation period was denied on the facts and not on the ground of legal principle). One who acts in his own name as a rule also binds himself (exceptions arise in 'man of straw' cases). Håstad, loc.cit. 230 et seq., following an elaborate discussion on the protection of the involved parties, has advanced the opinion that a representative authority of the gestor should be endorsed if the gestor, had he acted in his own name, would have been entitled to recourse against the principal. However there is no apparent case law which adopts this approach yet. Nevertheless (and in addition to the former Commercial Code chap. 18 § 10) some recent statutory provisions have been adopted which permit a person to act in another's name, e. g. Contracts Act § 24 (although a declaration of bankruptcy generally terminates all powers of authority, an emergency representative power for the protection of the principal's assets will remain effective until the appointment of an administrator in bankruptcy: Grönfors, Avtalslagen[3], 155); Maritime Code chap. 6 § 8 [sjölag (1994:1009)] (concerning the captain's authority to conclude contracts for the preservation of the vessel, passengers and the cargo, which bind the ship-owner); Commission Act § 8 [lag (1914:45) om kommission] of 15. September 1986 no. 636 (commission agent's authority to act in excess of his mandate if the principal's interests so require); Commission Act § 48 (entitlement and duty of the commission agent to take certain protective measures prior to the expiry of the contract); Marriage Act chap. 6 § 4 [äktenskapsbalk (1987:230)] (emergency power of representation between spouses). With regard to DANISH law see also HD 12 November 1917, UfR 1918, 42 and HD 12 November 1917, UfR 1918, 45 (emergency authority of a shipping company vis-à-vis the bearer of a bill of lading).

11. As the COMMON LAW operates in this field primarily with the instrument of agency of necessity and agency in the strict sense presupposes representation so as to change the principal's legal position vis-à-vis third parties, it is unsurprising that English law recognises that in appropriate cases (i.e. where the transaction is necessary and in the best interests of the principal) an agent of necessity has a power to conclude a transaction binding the principal. See, for example, Wolff v. Horncastle (1798) 1 Bos & Pul 316 at 323, 126 ER 924 at 928 (principal sending goods by sea and instructing agents to send bill of lading to defendant so that the defendant might insure the goods; defendant refusing to accept bill; agents procured insurance and notified principal; insurance valid and principal liable to pay premiums even if the acts of the agents had not been ratified). Indeed, English law sees the necessity for such intervention equally in terms of a duty of the agent to undertake the transaction: see, for example, Metcalfe v. Britannia Ironworks Co (1876) 1 QBD 613, 626 (Cockburn CJ: if the cargo is damaged, the damage cannot be eradicated by reasonable expenditure, and the cargo will deteriorate if transport continues, he is obliged to sell it). A holder or carrier of perishable goods which are not collected may have authority from necessity to sell them: Sims v. Midland Railway Co. Ltd. [1913] 1 KB 103, and compare Springer v. Great Western Railway Co. [1921] 1 KB 257. Unsurprisingly there are voluminous authorities to the effect that in order to enable the ship's safe onward journey a ship's captain may enter into a loan in the principal's name and, if necessary, secure it in respect of the principal's ship in favour of creditors in a case of necessity (be it to finance essential repairs to a damaged ship, to pay fees and taxes at the port, or to pay the cost of repairs already incurred or pay the crew's wages or make payments to other creditors of the principal in respect of outstanding debts who are in a position to hold the ship in port or seize it): Corset v. Husely (1689) Comb 135, 90 ER 389; Watkinson v. Bernadiston (1726) 2 P Wms 367, 367-368, 24 ER 769 (Jekyll MR); Hayman v. Molton (1803) 5 Esp. 65 at 67, 170 ER 739 at 739-740 (Lord Ellenborough CJ); Hussey v. Christie (1808) 9 East 426 at 432, 103 ER 636 (Lord Ellenborough CJ); Arthur v. Barton (1840) 6 M & W 138, 143-144, 151 ER 355 (Lord Abinger CB); The Lord Cochrane (1844) 2 W Rob 320, at 166 ER 775 (Dr Lushington); Beldon v. Campbell (1851) 6 Exch 886, 889-890, 155 ER 805 (Parke B) (where, however, the court did not accept there was any necessity); The Royal Arch (1857) Swab 269 at 275, 166 ER 1131 at 1135 (Dr Lushington); The Karnak (1867-69) LR 2 A & E 289, 300 (Sir Robert Phillimore). See also the IRISH case The Staffordshire (1871) 25 LT (N. S.) 137, 140 (Townsend J), affirmed sub nom. Smith v. Bank of New South Wales (1871-73) LR 4 PC 194. The same applies in any other case where pledging the principal's credit is the best solution for the principal in the circumstances of the case: Robinson v. Lyall (1819) 7 Price 592, 146 ER 1071. Cf. Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson & Co. (1875) 3 R 105, 111 (Lord Gifford), where the comparable SCOTTISH law was expounded ("The captain of a ship at a foreign port who is without the means of communicating with his owners or employers, and where repairs or supplies to the vessel are indispensable, is entitled to get such necessary repairs executed or necessary supplies made, and to pledge therefore the credit of his owners or employers […] .") In that case it is suggested (loc. cit., 111 (Lord Gifford) and 115 (Lord Justice-Clerk Moncrieff)) that the power to create a proprietary security exists only if an unsecured loan is unavailable. See also in this regard The Gaetano and Maria (1882) 7 PD 137 (where, however, the CA held that English law was not applicable). It may be doubted whether that restriction is still good law. The assumption on which it was based (that an unsecured loan would be cheaper) may be counter-factual (a security reducing risk to the lender potentially enables a lower interest rate, though that might be off-set by higher transaction fees). The better view must be a more flexible test of whether a security is reasonably necessary in the circumstances. Similarly, in appropriately necessitous circumstances a captain has a power to conclude in the name of the principal a contract of salvage: The Renpor (1883) 8 PD 115; The Unique Mariner [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep 438. In appropriately dire circumstances the captain even has a power of sale: see, for example, The Victor (1865) 13 L. T. (N. S.) 21 (Dr Lushington), a case of sale by public auction where the master had no credit and was unable to effect even temporary repairs, and the ship was under threat of arrest from creditors and in any case deteriorating daily, and see also The Australia (1859) 13 Moore PC 132, 15 ER 50 (the cost of repair of the ship – for which the captain had no funds, for which a secured loan could not easily be obtained, but without which a continuation of the journey was impossible – would have exceeded the value of the ship). See further Read v. Bonham (1821) 3 Brod & B 147, 129 ER 1238, where the captain likewise had no funds to finance the substantial repairs needed, even on the basis of a secured loan, although in the minority view of Richardson J there was no necessity for a sale because the captain could have offered the cargo as additional security and thus had not exhausted all opportunity to obtain a loan for the repairs; Idle v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co (1819) 8 Taunt 755 at 772, 129 ER 577 at 584 (Dallas CJ); Freeman v. East India Co. (1822) 5 B & Ald 617 at 621, 106 ER 1316 at 1318 (Bayley J); Robertson v. Clarke (1824) 1 Bing 445, 450, 130 ER 179 (Lord Gifford CJ) (where the prospective cost of repairs exceeded the ship's value); Hunter v. Parker (1840) 7 M & W 322 at 342, 151 ER 789, (Parke B) (where, however, it was held there was ratification so that the question of authority by virtue of necessity did not have to be answered); The Segredo (1853) 1 Spinks Ecc & Ad 36 at 46-47, 164 ER 22 at 28 (Dr Lushington), where, however, necessity was not made out; The Glasgow (1856) Swab 145, 166 ER 1065 (Dr Lushington); The Victor, loc. cit. (Dr Lushington). As the above authorities indicate, however, the proposition has been more voiced than applied by the courts and it seems that to justify such a drastic step the circumstances must be extreme: Hayman v. Molton (1803) 5 Esp. 65 at 67-68, 170 ER 739 at 740 (Lord Ellenborough CJ: "extreme necessity" not proven); The Lord Cochrane, loc. cit., 334-335 (781) (Dr Lushington: "very extreme"). Authority denying a power of sale seems to be of no real weight. The assertion of Holt CJ in Johnson v. Shippen (1703) 2 Ld Raym 982 at 984, 92 ER 154 at 155 that a captain may pledge a ship but not sell it was dismissed in Idle v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co., loc. cit., 771 (584) by Dallas CJ on the basis that in that case a mortgage would have sufficed and so in the circumstances of the case there was no necessity and accordingly no authority for a sale. Similarly criticism may be launched at Lord Ellenborough CJ's assertion in Reid v. Darby (1808) 10 East 143 at 157, 103 ER 730 at 735, as it was based on the dictum in Johnson v. Shippen, loc. cit., while in Reid v. Darby the sale was invalid independently of the captain's authority because the transfer of title failed to comply with statutory requirements of form. Moreover, Dallas CJ in Idle v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co. (1819) 8 Taunt 755 at 773, 129 ER 577 at 584, considered that no necessity was made out in Reid v. Darby – an explanation of the decision which, however, does not have any clear point of reference in the court's judgment. Equally, a ship's captain has a power in a case of necessity to pledge all or part of the cargo so as to bind the owners of the cargo: The Gratitudine (1801) 3 C. Rob 240 at 263, 165 ER 450 at 458 (Sir W. Scott); Freeman v. East India Co., loc. cit. at 621 (1318) (Bayley J). See also Miller & Co. v. Potter, Wilson & Co., loc. cit., 111 (Lord Gifford), where the comparable SCOTTISH law is set out. Likewise, where circumstances render it appropriate, the captain has a power to sell cargo: Australasian Steam Navigation Co. v. Morse (1871-73) LR 4 PC 222, 228 (Sir Montague Smith) (wool which was in bad condition as a result of a shipping accident could not be dried out in port and stored and thus had to be sold). See also The Gratitudine, loc. cit., 259 (457) (Sir W. Scott, giving the example of cargo which threatens to deteriorate and cannot be transported further); Freeman v. East India Co, loc. cit. at 621 (1318) (Bayley J, giving the same example), at 622-623 (1318) (Holroyd J, giving the same example and the further example of sale of part in order to finance the onward transport of the remainder); Atkinson v. Stephens (1852) 7 Ex 567, 155 ER 1074 at 574 (1077) per Martin B and 576-577 (1078) per Pollock CB (sale of part of the cargo was a lawful method of borrowing money to finance necessary repairs). A captain likewise has a power in a case of necessity to commission another to salvage cargo (Hingston v. Wendt (1875-76) 1 QBD 367, 371 (Blackburn J); China Pacific SA v. Food Corp. of India (The Winson) [1982] AC 939), to bail it to another (creating a bailment between cargo owners and bailee) (China Pacific SA v. Food Corp. of India, loc. cit.), or to commission an agent (e. g. a legal adviser, where there is a dispute with a salvor) who will safeguard the cargo owners' interests (The Soblomsten (1865-67) LR 1 A & E 293, 299-300 (Dr Lushington)). In all of these cases the authority to transact and bind the principal rests on the fundamental requirement of a necessity for the transaction. Thus money borrowed or goods procured must be needed (Gunn v. Roberts (1873-74) LR 9 CP 331, 335 (Brett J: reasonably necessary according to the usual course of careful conduct) and applied to necessary ends or expenditure (The Karnak, loc. cit., 300 (Sir Robert Phillimore)). Money cannot be obtained by means of a (secured) loan if funds are already there (e. g. because provided for the purpose by the principal) or available from other (more advantageous) sources: cf. Soares v. Rahn (1838) 3 Moore PC 1 at 9, 13 ER 1 at 4 (Dr Lushington for the PC); The Hebe (1843) 2 W Rob 146 at 150-151, 166 ER 710 at 712 (possibility of obtaining payment from principal's debtor); Smith v. Bank of New South Wales (1872) LR 4 PC 194, 202 (Mellish LJ for the PC, implicitly); Gunn v. Roberts loc. cit., 333 and 337 (Brett J), and see also The Lochiel (1843) 2 W Rob 34 at 48, 166 ER 668 at 673 (Dr Lushington). Equally the transaction concluded must be proportionate to the problem. A sale of cargo by a ship's captain will not be authorised unless reasonable efforts to arrange onward transportation have been made and failed or there are no resources available to that end or it would be uneconomic because the expenditure involved would exceed the value of the goods themselves or, as a result of deterioration during transportation, they would lose further value: cf. Hunter v. Prinsep (1808) 10 East 378, 394-395 (Lord Ellenborough CJ), 103 ER 818; Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co. v. Huth (1880-81) 16 Ch. D 474, 481 (Cotton LJ), where the captain did not try to commission a salvor or obtain funds to conduct a rescue attempt. Correspondingly, a sale by a captain of a damaged ship will not be authorised if it can be economically repaired and funds are available or can be obtained on economic terms: Somes v. Sugrue (1830) 4 Car & P 276 at 283-284, 172 ER 703 at 706 (Tindal CJ); The Segredo, loc. cit., 48 (28-29) and 55 (32) (Dr Lushington). If the agent has conducted himself reasonably and properly when assessing the situation as apparent to him and concluding that in the circumstances a transaction is necessary, the matter cannot be impeached, and the agent is not accountable to the principal for the loss, if it subsequently emerges that it was not strictly necessary – for example, because, despite all the indications, a ship could in fact be repaired economically and need not have been sold: Robertson v. Caruthers (1819) 2 Stark 571 at 572, 171 ER 739 (Abbott LCJ); Lindsay v. Leathley (1863) 3 F & F 902 at 937, 176 ER 410 at 427 (Cockburn CJ). By statute (when it comes into force) an intervener acting in connection with the care or treatment of a person who is reasonably believed to lack capacity, reasonably believing it to be in that person's best interests, may pledge that person's credit or apply money of that person in that person's possession in order to meet expenditure: Mental Capacity Act 2005, s. 8(1).

BOOK VI

NON-CONTRACTUAL LIABILITY ARISING OUT OF DAMAGE CAUSED TO ANOTHER

CHAPTER 1: FUNDAMENTAL PROVISIONS

VI.–1:101: Basic rule

(1) A person who suffers legally relevant damage has a right to reparation from a person who caused the damage intentionally or negligently or is otherwise accountable for the causation of the damage.

(2) Where a person has not caused legally relevant damage intentionally or negligently that person is accountable for the causation of legally relevant damage only if Chapter 3 so provides.

COMMENTS

A. The general approach

The basic rule in overview. Paragraph (1) contains a summary of the basic elements of non-contractual liability. It gives force to all the other Articles of this Book, none of which is complete in itself. This is expressed in VI.–1:103(a) (Scope of application). The present Article relates to the reparation of damage which has already occurred, while VI.–1:102 (Prevention) is concerned with prophylactic legal protection and compensation for expenditure incurred by someone for the purpose of preventing the occurrence of impending damage. Paragraph (2) of the present Article expresses one element of the basic rule in paragraph (1). It addresses the situation where the injuring person is liable in spite of having behaved perfectly correctly. Under such circumstances it will often be only certain defined types of loss which will be regarded as legally relevant damage – in particular personal injury and property damage. In so providing, paragraph (2) points ahead to the particular rules in Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence).

Terminology: "tort" and "delict". The choice of the expression "non-contractual liability for damage caused to another" (often abbreviated in the following pages to "non-contractual liability") rather than "tort" or "delict" is easily explained. In the formulation of these model rules it was decided at an early stage to try to use descriptive language rather than technical terms from particular legal systems. Such technical terms often carry with them unwanted residues of a particular historical development and unwanted conceptual preconceptions and, partly for these reasons, can be notoriously difficult to translate. "Delict", for example, carries with it a suggestion of wrongdoing, sometimes deliberate wrongdoing or even criminality. In its origin "tort" also suggests wrongdoing. This Book, as has just been explained, is not confined to wrongdoing. Moreover, "tort" and "tortious" are inextricably bound up with English law, while "delict" or its equivalent in other languages has different meanings in different legal systems. "Tort" is short but that, sadly, is its only advantage. Brevity has had to be sacrificed, with some reluctance, for appropriateness and, in the broadest possible sense, translatability. Some other terms which were considered (like "civil responsibility") would not by themselves, and when used in a new instrument without a background of shared understanding, have distinguished adequately between this branch of the law and other branches of private law.

Other terms. Some of the other terms frequently used in this Book are defined in Annex. The term "damage" has a wide meaning. It means any type of detrimental effect: it includes loss and injury. Not all damage is legally relevant damage for the purposes of this Book. The meaning of "legally relevant damage" – a key term – is explained below. The term "injured person" means a person suffering damage of any kind: it is not confined to a person who has suffered personal injury. Similarly, the term "injuring person" means a person causing or responsible for damage of any kind: again it is not confined to a person causing personal injury. A "claim" is a demand for something based on the assertion of a right. A "claimant" is a person who makes, or who has grounds for making, a claim. The words "claim" and "claimant" do not presuppose legal proceedings. This Book is concerned with the substantive law on non-contractual liability for damage. Most reparation claims are never the subject of legal proceedings. For this reason, and also because they are or were technical terms of particular legal systems, words like "plaintiff", "pursuer", "defendant" and "defender" are not used in this Book. Some other key terms ("economic and non-economic loss", "reparation", "compensation", "person") are, like "legally relevant damage", discussed below.

The injured person's perspective. Paragraph (1) is formulated in terms of a right and thus from the perspective of the injured person. That appeared a more straightforward approach than the one adopted in most of the current laws, which are constructed from the viewpoint of the injuring person. Furthermore, in the formulation chosen here the notion that liability for damage lies at the centre of this branch of the law is given more explicit expression. Finally, the formulation underlines the basic distribution of the burden of proof: the injured person must as a rule set out and prove all the facts founding the claim.

Economic and non-economic loss. The term "legally relevant damage" encompasses losses both of an economic and of a non-economic type, and in some cases injury as such. See further VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1).

Damage and reparation. The basic rule draws a distinction between the concept of legally relevant damage and the reparation for that damage. The grounds of accountability (intention, negligence, and responsibility for a source of danger) are addressed in Chapter 3. They relate to the legally relevant damage (see in particular VI.–3:101 (Intention) and VI.–3:102 (Negligence)), which for its part may take the form of either an injury or a loss (stated in more detail in VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage)). The details on this point are to be found in Chapter 2. The form and amount of reparation and (in the case of an infringement of an interest which is allocated to multiple parties) the question of the person or persons to whom reparation should be made are governed by Chapter 6. VI.–4:101(2) (General rule [on causation]) makes it clear that in the case of personal injury and death the predisposition of the victim is to be disregarded even if this could not be foreseen by the injuring person.

Reparation and compensation. The term "reparation" encompasses generically all legal redress which serves the function of making amends for a damage which has already occurred. "Compensation" is used for reparation taking the specific form of a monetary payment. "Compensation" is therefore merely a special case of "reparation".

Grounds of accountability. The provision brings together in one norm liability for intention, liability for negligence and liability where neither intention nor negligence on the part of the responsible person are a precondition. The expression "grounds of accountability" is used here as well as later as an umbrella term embracing both the potential for liability on account of intentionally causing damage or negligence on the one hand and the potential for liability on account of responsibility for a source of danger on the other. Forms of liability derived from rebuttable presumptions of negligence systematically still belong to the regime of liability for negligence. Certainly negligence in that case need not be proved, so that de facto there may be liability when the responsible person is not at fault but cannot prove that. However, liability is so constructed by the norms of the legal system that negligence in such a case is to be regarded as made out unless the contrary is proved.

Grounds of accountability and causation. The formulation also makes it explicit that where there is not even negligence, but the responsible person is nonetheless liable, it cannot normally be said that the responsible person has caused the damage. Rather that person is accountable for the causation of the damage. An example would be where an employer is vicariously liable for damage caused by an employee, but in the absence of a breach of the duty to supervise the employee it cannot be said that the employer caused the damage; it was the employee who caused it. Strictly understood, the requirement of causation therefore emerges in two different contexts: it connects (i) intentional or negligent conduct, on the one hand, and legally relevant damage, on the other, and it connects (ii) a source of danger for which a person is accountable by law (i.e. without intention or negligence) on the one hand and the damage resulting from the realisation of that danger on the other. This is the reason for the formulation of the second alternative of paragraph (1) ("or is otherwise accountable for the causation of the damage"). In the latter context accountability for an occurrence by which damage is caused stems in particular from the conduct of a person (in the example already given, an employee) or from a thing or an animal under the responsible person's (ostensible) control. That a causal connection is required between the conduct of the person or the materialisation of the potential for danger inherent in the thing, on the one hand, and the damage sustained, on the other, is repeated in the provisions of Chapter 3, Section 2 and in Chapter 4.

Omissions. An express distinction between liability for positive acts and liability for omissions is not included because it is not required. These cases are not fundamentally distinguished either at the level of negligence or the level of causation (see further the comments to VI.–3:102 (Negligence) and VI.–4:101 (General rule [on causation]). Furthermore, omissions to act can also lead to the intentional causation of damage (on which point see the comments to VI.–3:101 (Intention)). Moreover, for liability imposed irrespective of conduct falling short of the required standard of care, any such distinction (i.e. between omissions and positive acts) as a starting point entirely misses what is at the heart of this form of liability. It operates independently of any conduct on the part of the responsible person.

Burden of proof. VI.–1:101 presupposes the basic rule that the injured person has to set out and, if need be, prove the requirements which have to be satisfied if there is to be a right to reparation. Exceptions from this basic and implicit rule on the burden of proof are specifically mentioned in the provisions which follow. By contrast, it falls to the injuring person to set out and prove the existence of a ground of defence. The basic rule consequently provides that each side must set out, and as the case requires prove, the circumstances founded on by that side. That this basic rule has not been adopted in the express wording of the Article is explained by the fact that it is not limited to the law on non-contractual liability; the principle is of general application.

Natural and legal persons. Where the text speaks of "a person" or "another" or their cognates, or invokes similar formulations, then, so far as nothing else is expressly designated (as is done in VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss), in VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third parties as a result of another's personal injury or death) and in VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy)), these terms are always to be understood as meaning both natural and legal persons. See Annex – "person" means a natural or legal person – and VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (b).

Liability under public law not covered. However, the liability of natural and legal persons subject to public law arising out of the exercise of a public function is not regulated; see VI.–7:202 (Public law functions and court proceedings). In VI.–5:201 (Authority conferred by law) in any case, however, there is a ground of defence if legally relevant damage is caused with authority conferred by law.

B. How the basic rule works

A single cause of action. According to the concept of this draft every claim to reparation under the law on non-contractual liability must satisfy the requirements of paragraph (1) of VI.–1:101(Basic rule). There are no exceptions. In every case it is necessary to assess whether (i) the claimant has suffered a legally relevant damage, (ii) there is a ground of accountability in relation to the person against whom the claim is made, and (iii) the damage has been caused by an act or omission for which that person must answer by reason of negligence or intention or responsibility for a source of danger.

VI.–1:103(a) (Scope of application). Furthermore, VI.–1:103(a) (Scope of application) makes it clear that VI.–1:101(1) must always be read in conjunction with the following Articles (The reason why this provision is not to be found in VI.–1:101 itself is purely a matter of drafting: the rule also applies to VI.–1:102 (Prevention)). Those following Articles furnish in particular an exhaustive statement of what is to be understood by the terms 'legally relevant damage' (Chapter 2), 'grounds of accountability' (Chapter 3) and 'causation' (Chapter 4). VI.–1:103(a) also helps to entrench VI.–1:101 within the exhaustive regime built up by the further Chapters of this Part. Liability under VI.–1:101(1) exists only as provided for by the following Articles - in particular, therefore, only in accordance with the provisions of Chapters 5 to 7. Thus it is settled that every one of the following provisions – and above all the provisions on grounds of defence and the consequences of liability – obtains its effectiveness only within the framework of the basic rule. The circumstance, for example, that a person has wilfully caused damage to another does not necessarily subject that person as a consequence to an obligation to make reparation. It is always open to that person to invoke one of the numerous grounds of defence, which incidentally are applicable generally to all three grounds of liability (and thus also to liability without intention or negligence).

No general clause. VI.–1:101(1) is thus on the one hand clearly a foundation for a claim. On the other hand it is not self-sufficient: rights are derived from it only with the aid of provisions beyond the confines of this rule, which is both fleshed out and limited by the following Articles. In other words, what we have here is not a general clause in the strict sense, but rather a provision whose component elements are later filled out with more precise content. That does not exclude the prospect that, alongside others with sharply drawn contours, the following Articles may contain rules which have deliberately been left open and flexible. VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) and VI.–4:101 (General Rule [on causation]) provide examples of this.

No liability beyond the boundaries of the following provisions. It is not possible to support liability on the basis of VI.–1:101 alone where this would extend beyond the boundaries pegged out by the following Articles.

Illustration 1
While parking her friend's (F's) vehicle in a car park, H damages O's parked car. In order to establish a claim against H under VI.–1:101, O must establish that (i) he has suffered a legally relevant damage, (ii) that H is accountable for it and (iii) either that H has caused the damage intentionally or negligently or that H is otherwise accountable for the causation of the damage. That follows from the wording of VI.–1:101(1). By virtue of VI.–1:103(a) (Scope of application), whether O has suffered a legally relevant damage primarily falls to be assessed under VI.–2:101(1)(a) (Meaning of legally relevant damage) in accordance with VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property) (The answer is, of course, affirmative). As regards the issue of accountability, VI.–1:103(a) points to VI.–3:101 (Intention) or VI.–3:102 (Negligence). If we suppose that H did not mean to cause the damage, accountability would nonetheless be established if H failed to exercise the care required in parking the car. The analysis then turns in accordance with VI.–1:103(a) to causation, i.e. to VI.–4:101 (General rule [on causation]). The question which claims to reparation O is able to assert (and for what amount of compensation) is answered, in accordance with VI.–1:103(a), by the provisions of Chapter 6 and more particularly Section 2 of that Chapter.

Illustration 2
The solution follows basically the same scheme if it is assumed (for whatever reason) that H has acted neither intentionally nor negligently. In this scenario, however, the question whether O has suffered a legally relevant damage must be assessed in accordance with VI.–1:101(2) by reference to VI.–3:206 (Accountability for damage caused by motor vehicles). The answer is in the affirmative because this case relates to property damage within the meaning of that provision (VI.–3:206, as compared with VI.–2:206, invokes a narrower concept of legally relevant damage). Finally, it must be established whether H is otherwise accountable for the damage (paragraph (1) of the basic rule). That question must be examined in accordance with the provisions of Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence). The answer is in the negative because H is not a "keeper" of the car (VI.–3:208 (Control and use)). The claim would however be successful if directed against F as he is accountable for the causation of the damage by the motor vehicle. Whether O's claim ought to be reduced is a matter for VI.–5:102(4) (Contributory fault and accountability).

Illustration 3
The facts are as in illustration 1, except that H parked her own car and was not attending to her own affairs, but intended instead to make purchases on behalf of the F family, for whom she works as a childminder. In issue is the liability of Mr and Mrs F, neither of whom were negligent in the supervision of H. The test for legally relevant damage is the same as in illustration 1. That follows from VI.–1:101(2) in conjunction with VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives), because this latter Article contains no particularities with regard to the presence of legally relevant damage. Mr and Mrs F have not caused the damage (that was done by H), but under VI.–1:101(1) (third limb: "or who is otherwise accountable for the damage") in conjunction with VI.–3:201 that fact does not preclude liability. Mr and Mrs F are jointly liable under VI.–1:103(a) in conjunction with VI.–6:105 (Solidary liability).

Illustration 4
While out on a day's shoot, J rests his loaded weapon, for a moment unattended, against a tree. A usurps possession of the weapon and fires off a shot. X is fatally injured and dies on the spot. Ascertaining non-contractual liability begins, as always and without exception, with VI.–1:101(1). X himself suffered no legally relevant damage (The case would have been different if he died only after some interval of time, e.g. after admission at a hospital: VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss)). The legally relevant damage suffered by those X leaves behind is determined by VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third parties as a result of another's personal injury or death). As regards accountability, J has infringed either a statutory requirement to take care in handling weapons or a general duty to take care (VI.–3:102 (Negligence)). In determining that there was negligence it is immaterial whether J's conduct is characterised as one of positive act (the placing of the loaded weapon in an unguarded location) or omission (failure to supervise the loaded weapon). However, J is not liable to those X has left behind for the damage suffered if A shot X intentionally and J had no reason to suppose that that sort of eventuality could happen (VI.–1:103(a) in conjunction with VI.–4:101 (General rule [on causation]: the murder cannot be regarded as the consequence of J's negligence). The outcome would be no different if there were a strict liability for weapons (see VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage)). In that case too the element of causation would still be missing.

Illustration 5
A is carrying out building work on her land which, on one particular occasion, results in a minor gathering of dust. A little dust settles on the car of B, a neighbour of A's. B has no claim to reparation for the costs incurred in finding a garage with a car-wash facility; the damage is trivial (VI.–1:103(a) in conjunction with VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule)). Were repetitions of this incident with more pronounced collection of dust to be envisaged over a long term, B could then demand preventative relief (VI.–1:102 (Prevention) in conjunction with VI.–6:301 (Prevention in general)), according to the circumstances conceivably even a reasonable outlay at A's own cost for the protection of the car against further soiling if another parking place is not usually available (VI.–1:102 in conjunction with VI.–1:103(a), VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) and VI.–6:302 (Liability for loss in preventing damage)).

NOTES

I. General

1. There is at present no provision which in its wording precisely corresponds to VI.–1:101. The substance of VI.–1:101 is nonetheless common property in Europe. It is the purpose of the formulation presented in VI.–1:101 to bring together this common substance in one unifying concept and wording. The basic norms on legal liability in the codifications and the Nordic statutes on damages are for the most part formulated from the perspective of the party responsible for the damage and not from the perspective of the party who suffers it. They take pains in their formulation to operate on the basis of a notion of fault. Only the newer codifications include a pointer to so-called strict liability within their basic norm. In many countries such liability developed outside the codes, partly on the basis of case law and partly on the basis of special legislation. Moreover, the Common Law developed on the basis of a multitude of particular torts and not on the foundation of a basic norm.

II. Structures and formulations of the existing basic rules

2. The Codes of the nineteenth century made do throughout with very broad principles. The Code Napoléon (the BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC) distinguishes between délits (intentional delicts) (CC art. 1382) and quasi-délits (delicts committed negligently) (CC art. 1383), but this distinction no longer fulfils any major role today. In substance there is a single legal rule consisting of the three elements faute, dommage and causalité. The same is also true for MALTA (CC arts. 1031-1033). The SPANISH CC (which, however, only applies to delicts which do not constitute crimes; see CC art. 1092) merged arts. 1382 and 1383 of the Code Napoléon in a single provision (CC art. 1902). Also resembling the Code Napoléon to a large extent is the text of AUSTRIAN CC § 1295(1) ("Every person is entitled to demand the reparation of damage from the person who with fault has inflicted it; the damage may be caused by a breach of contractual duty or without relation to a contract").

3. The tort laws of Central Eastern Europe follow without exception the approach of the Romance legal systems and thus confine themselves in principle to a general clause (CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC § 420; HUNGARIAN CC § 339(1); POLISH CC art. 415; SLOVENIAN LOA § 131(1)).

4. Western Europe's Codes of the twentieth century formulated their foundation norms more restrictively. The GERMAN BGB structured itself around infringements of "absolute" rights (CC § 823(1)), infringements of protective statutory provisions (CC § 823(2)) and intentionally caused harm upon infringements of gute Sitten (CC § 826). The PORTUGUESE Civil Code (CC art. 483(1)) also sets out in a similar manner. The provision focuses on liability for intentional or negligent infringements of rights and a corresponding rule for infringement of protective statutory provisions. The ITALIAN legislator formulated CC art. 2043 in a broad way similar to the French or Spanish, but in CC art. 2043 one finds in the concept of danno ingiusto an Italian speciality with a powerful effect on the development of the case law. The text of DUTCH CC art. 6:162 has already been reproduced: DUTCH CC art. 6:162 reads (in the translation by Haanappel/Mackaay/Warendorf/Thomas, Netherlands Business Legislation): "(1) A person who commits an unlawful act against another which is attributable to him, must repair the damage suffered by the other as a consequence thereof. (2) Except where there are grounds for justification, the following acts are deemed unlawful: the violation of a right and an act or omission breaching a duty imposed by law or a rule of unwritten law pertaining to proper social conduct. (3) A wrongdoer is responsible for the commission of an unlawful act if it is due to his fault or to a cause for which he is accountable by law or pursuant to generally accepted principles."

5. The legislative approach of the BALTIC States varies considerably: The basic norm of the Estonian LOA § 1043 ("A person (tortfeasor) who unlawfully causes damage to another person (victim) shall compensate for the damage if the tortfeasor is culpable in causing the damage or is liable for causing the damage pursuant to law") is clearly influenced by German law. This influence is more clearly evident in the Estonian LOA § 1045(1) - the provision which lists the most important forms of causing damage (causing death, personal injury or damage to health, deprivation of liberty, violation of a personality right, violation of the right of ownership or a similar right or right of possession, interference with the economic or professional activities of a person, behaviour which violates a duty arising from law, intentional behaviour contrary to good morals). The critical difference to the German system lies in the fact that this list is not exhaustive and allows room for further development. The Lithuanian Law of Obligations Act (CC) of 18 July 2000 addresses tort law in the 13th Chapter of its sixth Book. The starting point is CC art. 6.246(1), a provision which works with the notion of unlawfulness, but foregoes an express list of interests protected by tort law. CC art. 6.263(1) is formulated in the style of a general clause. The Latvian Civil Code of 1938, brought back into force on a phased basis from 1992, for its part adopts in CC art. 1635 the Romance concept of the general clause ("Every delict, i.e., every wrongful act per se, shall give the person who suffered the harm therefrom the right to claim satisfaction from the infringer, insofar as he or she may be held at fault for such act").

6. In the NORDIC systems the "culpa-rule" takes over the function of a basic tort law norm. In Denmark the rule is part of the common law (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 29). In Finland and Sweden in contrast the rule has been formulated in the statutes on damages (SWEDISH Statute on Damages of 2 June 1972 chap. 2 § 1 reads: "A person who intentionally or negligently causes damage to persons or property must compensate for this damage in so far as this statute makes no other provision"). The corresponding FINNISH text (Damages Act 1974 chap. 2 § 1(1) (skadeståndslag)) reads: "A person who intentionally or negligently causes another damage must make reparation for that damage unless statute provides otherwise." Thus here too the elements of accountability (intention or negligence), damage and causation re-surface. The limitations relate partly to the special treatment of pure economic losses but partly also (and more importantly) to the special treatment of insured risks.

7. In the modern COMMON LAW, although it has a younger ancestry, the tort of negligence is placed in the centre point of its law on liability. This too is made up from the elements of breach of duty of care, damage and causation, and one may proceed on the footing that wherever there is liability on grounds of breach of duty of care there is necessarily also liability in cases of intentionally causing damage. The demarcation of the substantive area of application of the tort of negligence in relation to other torts has become increasingly difficult. Nevertheless the English and Irish tort laws continue to the present day to be based on a large set of particular grounds of liability, rather than on a single basic rule.

8. The 'tort' of negligence is also a feature of the SCOTS law of delict. Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] AC 562, the decision which established it for the modern law, concerned a Scottish case and its aftermath contributed much to the harmonisation of the English and Scots laws on non-contractual liability for damage. Generally the differences in the modern law of torts in England and Ireland on the one side and the Scots law of delict on the other tend to be peripheral (summarised in v. Bar, Common European Law of Torts I, nos. 299-301). However, the basic systematic concept is different. The Scots law of delict stems from a basic norm of delictual liability, as it does in all Civil Law legal systems, and not from a multitude of co-existing torts which are basically independent of one another. The CYPRUS Civil Wrongs Law s. 51(1) defines negligence as consisting of causing damage by "doing some act which in the circumstances a reasonable, prudent person would not do or failing to do some act which in the circumstances such a person would do".

III. Wrongfulness as a prerequisite for liability

9. The wording of VI.–1:101 does not employ the concept of wrongfulness which is a requisite for the imposition of liability in tort law in several European jurisdictions. Above all, this notion is employed in § 823(1) and subsequent provisions of the GERMAN CC (e.g. § 831), where unlawfulness is ranked before fault or culpability, and fault is, in turn, regarded as an umbrella term for intention and negligence. Wrongfulness as a discrete requisite of liability, required to be considered prior to the examination of fault, is also expressly postulated by the PORTUGUESE CC art. 483(1) ("A person who, intentionally or negligently, unlawfully violates the rights of another person") and in DUTCH CC art. 6:162. It is not expressly mentioned in the basic norm of AUSTRIAN tort law (CC § 1295(1)). However, the ABGB does refer to "wrongful" in an array of other provisions (inter alia CC § 1294); the judiciary and prevailing legal opinion consequently concur that, in the Austrian legal system, wrongfulness is a required independent ingredient of liability.(Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], 138; see also Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II[2], § 1294 nos. 6 ff). GREEK CC art. 914 requires that the conduct must have constituted an "unlawful" act, if liability is to be imposed. "Unlawfulness" is, for the most part, equated with the more expansive concept of "wrongfulness" (Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A (1)[2], 257). HUNGARIAN CC § 339(1) states that a person is liable if that person unlawfully inflicts damage on another. This wording does not result in the scope of application of the provision being restricted to those cases in which an "absolute right" of another or a law has been violated. Under the ESTONIAN LOA § 1043 the imposition of liability essentially depends upon (i.e. in the field of liability for intention and negligence), whether the damage was "unlawfully caused". LOA § 1045 clarifies in detail, when this state of affairs is extant. LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.246 grounds liability, in general terms, on the "performance of actions that are prohibited by laws or a contract (unlawful acting)", and LATVIAN CC art. 1635 "every delict, i.e., every wrongful act per se" is deemed sufficient to establish liability, provided that "the infringer ... may be held at fault for such act".

10. According to the basic tort law norm under ITALIAN law (CC art. 2043) the imposition of liability requires the presence of "wrongful damage" (danno ingiusto). Only in the heading to the Chapter on tort law in the Codice civile and in the provisions governing the imposition of liability for the acts of another, (i.e. for children [CC art. 2048] and employees [CC art. 2049]), is mention made of a fatti illeciti .If a defence can be made out, this is referred to as an esclusione or assenza di antigiuridicità (for a comparison of Italian and German law, Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[3], 18-19, 21).

11. The concept of wrongfulness is completely alien to the COMMON LAW.

12. The concept of wrongfulness is also foreign to BELGIAN, FRENCH, LUXEMBURGIAN and MALTESE law. In a similar fashion, SPANISH CC art. 1902, POLISH CC art. 415, SLOVENIAN LOA 131(1), CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC § 420 as well as the applicable basic norms of the NORDIC countries have refrained from adopting this ingredient for the imposition of liability (see for a detailed comparative legal analysis v. Bar, Common European Law of Torts II, nos. 211-219). In POLAND, however, case law and academic analysis take the view that a person can only be at "fault" if that person has done something unlawful and consequently either the element of wrongfulness is to be read into the notion of fault in CC art. 415 or it constitutes an independent requirement for liability (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 180-181).

13. Quite what "wrongfulness" means in detail, how it is to ascertained and what significance it should bear within the system of liability are all matters, however, on which there is no consensus even within the legal systems which recognise this requirement (Koziol, Unification of Tort Law: Wrongfulness, 129; Weir, [1999] CLJ 643-645). The only common denominator is the notion that a person acts wrongfully if that person infringes a mandatory duty or a prohibition of the legal system. The further particularisation of that proposition, however, varies and is a matter of debate within the jurisdictions concerned (see, for example, for POLAND Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 184-185, on the one hand and Wierciński, Niemajątkowa ochrona czci, 145-149, on the other) as much as in comparative discussions between them. To date, in particular, no agreement has been reached on whether the adjudication of wrongfulness should predominantly derive from the fact that a negative "result" has been caused (this view is still prevails, incidentally, by the courts in GERMANY [BGH 12 July 1996, NJW 1996, 3205, 3207] and in GREECE [A.P. 417/1974, NoB 22/1974, 1391; CA Athens 3114/1977, NoB 26/1978, 235]; in HUNGARY the issue of wrongfulness relates to the damage that has been caused, it does not appertain to the violation of an absolute right.') or whether it derives from the fact that the relevant act did not satisfy the requirements pertaining to the duty of care in the applicable legal order (the latter view is prevalent in e.g. AUSTRIAN law [Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], 140]). According to the "result orientated" notion of wrongfulness which has flourished in Germany, every infringement of a right or a protected legal interest enumerated in the German CC § 823(1) by a positive act automatically entails wrongfulness; conduct that realises the elements of the statutory provision "indicates" wrongfulness (the so-called law pertaining to the establishment and operation of a commercial enterprise and the general law pertaining to the legal protection of the personality are exceptions to this rule). According to the opposing "conduct orientated" theory ,on the other hand, an unintentional violation of a right or legally protected interest is only regarded as wrongful, if the actor infringes a specific norm of conduct set out in the relevant legal provision or if the actor has failed to heed the due care required to avoid the onset of damage (cf. for schools of thought, Palandt [-Thomas], BGB[65], § 823 nos. 32 ff; instructive Larenz and Canaris, Schuldrecht II(2)[13], § 75 II 3, which embodies an attempt to combine the two opposing theories, basing their approach on a distinction between a direct violation and indirect interference of the rights or interests of another; moreover, a quite similar approach is taken in Greece Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A (1)[2], 263; Stathopoulos, in: FS Larenz 1983, 631, 641; Roussos, EllDik 35/1994, 1492, 1494). In respect of indicated or ascertained wrongfulness, invoking a ground of justification may serve to negative wrongfulness. The burden of proof lies on the defendant to make out this defence (Erman [-Schiemann], BGB I[10], § 823 no. 146).

14. Similarly, in GREECE, a debate rages over the interpretation of the element of wrongfulness anchored in the basic norm CC art. 914 (for an in - depth analysis see Eleftheriadou, Die Haftung aus Verkehrspflichtverletzung im deutschen und griechischen Deliktsrecht, 60) Relying on the paradigm of art. 1382 of the French CC, it is even contentious as to whether wrongfulness is indeed a prerequisite for the imposition of liability (on this aspect, chiefly Vavouskos, I paraleipsis os simiogono gegonos eis ta adikimata tou Astikou Dikaiou, 61 ff, 83, 88 ff; Vavouskos, in: FS Michaelides-Nouaros I, 87 ff). In contrast, the prevailing view in academic writing views CC art. 914 as a "Blankettnorm" which is fleshed out by recourse to concepts and principles elsewhere in the legal system (Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 131 ff; Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A (1)[2], 258 ff; Deliyannis, in: FS Michaelides-Nouaros I, 303, 310 ff). It is deemed sufficient that the conduct is contrary to the general spirit of the legal order (Deliyannis, AID 13/1951-52, 153, 156 ff; A.P. 81/1991 EllDik 32/1991, 1215) or violates the obligation of good faith (CA Athens 3114/1977, NoB 26/1978, 235). It is not essential that a specific statutory provision be infringed; in short, if something is not expressly prohibited, it does not automatically entail that it is permitted (Pouliadis, Culpa in Contrahendo, 215; Deliyannis, AID 13/1951-52, 153, 165).

15. Additionally, in a number of legal orders, the significance of the criterion of wrongfulness for the forms of liability unattended by either intention or negligence has yet to be clarified. Those jurisdictions abiding by the requirement of wrongfulness, also characteristically recognise related "grounds of justification". These serve to negative the finding of wrongfulness, typically made out (indicated) when an absolute right or protective law has been infringed. For the most part, these grounds of justification are construed as grounds of defence for all types of tortious conduct (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], 168). Typical grounds of defence are self-help (e.g. PORTUGUESE CC art. 336; GERMAN CC § 229; GREEK CC art. 282; ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(2)(iv)), self-defence (PORTUGUESE CC art. 337; GERMAN CC § 227; GREEK CC art. 284; POLISH CC art. 423; ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(2)(iii); HUNGARIAN CC § 343), emergency (PORTUGUESE CC art. 339; GERMAN CC §§ 228, 904; GREEK CC arts. 285 and 286; POLISH CC art. 424; ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(2)(iii), HUNGARIAN CC § 107) and the consent of the injured person (PORTUGUESE CC art. 340; ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(2)(ii); HUNGARIAN CC § 342(2)). Frequently, additional grounds of justification are put forward such as e.g. if the right to cause damage derives from the exercise of a right or the performance of a legal obligation (ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(2)(i); Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 552 ff and Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 519 ff).

16. A distinguishing feature of legal orders which have elevated the criterion of "wrongfulness" to an independent requisite for the imposition of liability, is ultimately their focus on the protection of "absolute rights" under tort law (see, with regard to GERMANY CC § 823(1); for AUSTRIA Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], 148, see for the examination of the wording of the statute and its being modelled on French CC art. 1382 also Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VII[2], § 1293 no. 2; for PORTUGAL CC art. 483(1); for ESTONIA LOA § 1045(1) and for the NETHERLANDS CC art. 6:162(2)). These rights are denoted as absolute because namely, such rights are valid against all persons. Consequently, infringing such rights is "wrongful", provided that a "ground of justification" for their violation is absent. As far as the legal orders mentioned above are concerned, the second repository from whence a judgment of wrongfulness can emanate, is in the infringement of a law intended to protect the injured party (GERMAN CC § 823(2); GREEK CC art. 914; PORTUGUESE CC art. 483(1); DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2); AUSTRIAN CC § 1311 second sentence; ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(1)(vii)). Third, a wrongful act is constituted by the (intentional) transgression of "bonus mores" (GERMAN CC § 826; GREEK CC art. 919; AUSTRIAN CC § 1295(2); ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(1)(viii); CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC § 424) or in the violation of „a rule of unwritten law pertaining to proper social conduct" (DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2)).

IV. Fault, Intention and Negligence

17. The basic norms of tort law contained in the Codes of CIVIL LAW jurisdictions and in the NORDIC countries are dominated by the concept of liability for "fault". Equally, this notion has been frequently qualified as "fundamental" by the courts (see e.g. in respect of SPAIN TS 8 April 1992, RAJ 1992, no. 3187 p. 4202, 4. recital). Conversely, in the jurisdictions of the COMMON LAW, this concept has not attained a corresponding significance. The use of the notion of "fault" is even characteristically shunned. ENGLISH and IRISH legislatures have only employed the concept of fault within the parameters of contributory negligence (see Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945 s. 1(1)).

18. Under the codified tort law of the Civil law jurisdictions, whenever a requisite of liability is to prove that the defendant has conducted himself "culpably" or that s/he was "at fault" (e.g. DUTCH CC art. 6:162(3); GERMAN CC § 823(2); AUSTRIAN CC § 1295(1); SPANISH CC art. 1902; GREEK CC art. 914; POLISH CC art. 415; ESTONIAN LOA §§ 1043 and 1050; LATVIAN CC art. 1635; SLOVENIAN LOA art. 131(1)), the choice of word employed is representative throughout as an umbrella term for intention and negligence (see inter alia AUSTRIAN CC § 1294; LATVIAN CC art. 1640; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.248(2) and SLOVENIAN LOA art. 135). This remains the case even if the particular basic norm does not expressly refer to intention (see. e.g. SPANISH CC arts. 1093 in association with 1902 [despite the failure of CC art. 1902 to refer to dolo, it is generally accepted dolo is embraced by the notion of culpa: Lacruz Berdejo, Elementos II (2)[4], 471]; for the corresponding legal position in POLAND see Czachórski, Zobowiązania[9], 212). For the most part, the Codes in Civil law jurisdictions (as in VI.–1:101(1)) employ the notions of intention and negligence concomitantly (e.g. in GERMAN CC § 823(1); ITALIAN CC art. 2043; PORTUGUESE CC art. 483(1); BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC arts. 1382 [faute] and 1383 [négligence, imprudence]; SWEDISH and FINNISH Statute on Damages chap. 2 § 1). In addition, it is a universal principle that the same legal consequences attend the varying manifestations of fault. In respect of the tortfeasor's liability, at the outset, it is of no consequence, whether the tortfeasor acted with slight or grave fault or whether he acted with intent. Uniquely, the argument has occasionally been advance in FRENCH legal writing that there exists a fundamental difference between liability on the grounds of intention and liability based on negligence, and it has been submitted that this distinction derives from the différences de régime, see. e.g. Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations[9], no. 444 p. 451). In contrast, the HUNGARIAN CC eschews the word "fault". The basic norm does not literally speak of "blameworthiness", but it is uniformly construed as if that requirement were included in the article. A person already acts in a blameworthy manner merely by failing to conduct himself as expected; moreover, blameworthiness is rebuttably presumed (CC § 339(1) second sentence).

19. The practical importance of the distinction between causing harm intentionally or negligently (in respect of substantive requirements of these concepts, see the Notes to VI.–3:101 (Intention) and VI.–3:102 (Negligence)) is clearly of less significance in private law than in criminal law. Nonetheless, its relevance in the private law context should not be underestimated. This assertion is at the very least valid in the field of remedies (see for a contrary view to many commentators Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 72 p. 83-84). A prime example can be found in PORTUGUESE CC art. 494, whereby the obligation to make reparation for the damage that has already occurred can be reduced in its extent in cases of negligence (negligência respectively mera culpa). The discretion of the courts to reduce the quantum of damages is exercised on an equitable basis. However, this option is not available where the damage is intentionally inflicted (dolo) and the tortfeasor is then obliged to compensate the full extent of the damage (see further Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 475, note 9 to art. 483). In cases where the damage has been intentionally inflicted, HUNGARIAN CC § 360(4) extends the limitation period to 5 years.

20. Moreover, the distinction between intentional and negligent infliction of damage can be of particular significance in relation to discrete injurious acts. This is due to the fact that there is an array of ad hoc statutory provisions which expressly stipulate the intent as a requisite of liability. Prime examples include the behavioural elements of the causes of action mentioned above dealing with the intentional infliction of damage contrary tot he tenets of good faith (GERMAN CC § 826; AUSTRIAN CC § 1295(2); GREEK CC art. 919; ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(1)(viii); CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC § 424) (DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2) does not have the requisite of intention: art. 6:162(3)). As far as SPANISH law is concerned, additional regard must be had to the fact that many intentional torts are also crimes and that criminal liability is regulated in the Criminal Code and not under the Civil Code (CC art. 1092).

21. Similarly, in the NORDIC countries the distinction between intention and negligence is rarely of significance (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 124; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 52). It can be ascribed importance, much in the same manner as in the other States, where the liability of joint tortfeasors is concerned (see the note under VI.–4:102 (Collaboration)) (Hellner and Johansson loc. cit. 247 ff), likewise in the field of contributory negligence in cases of personal injury sustained by the claimant (SWEDISH Damages Act chap. 1 § 1(6)). The lines of demarcation are not delineated according to whether intent of negligence is at issue, rather are construed according to, on the one hand, intention and gross negligence and on the other, between what is often called ordinary or slight negligence. The same holds true for the regulation anchored in the DANISH Damages Act (Erstatningsansvarslov, EAL) § 19(2). According to this provision, private persons are liable for the damage that they have caused to insured things of another only in the event that the damage was caused intentionally or by gross negligence. In this manner, employees are frequently safeguarded from the imposition of personal liability. Moreover, under Scandinavian law, the distinction between intention and negligence can attain importance (and incidentally also elsewhere) in the law relating to liability for pure economic loss. The point of departure is that pure economic loss is principally only recoverable if the requirement that it be caused through a crime is satisfied. This requirement connotes that mostly intention is required. There are, however, numerous exceptions to this principle. They include inter alia, the general prohibition on chicanery, which for its part, figures e.g. in respect of blockades during industrial action (Hellner and Johansson loc. cit. 72 with further particulars.). An additional example can be discovered in the law relating to the abuse of a dominant position (on this point see SWEDISH Competition Act [konkurrenslagen 1993:20] § 33). See also the DANISH case on the prohibition of chicanery HD 8 May 1952, UfR 1953, 360 and in general Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 131 and the following for further particulars.

22. The COMMON LAW recognises a whole array of “intentional torts”. Within the confines of these torts “intention” frequently merely connotes that the tortfeasor was desirous of act in that manner. It is unnecessary that the tortfeasor should also have acted in the knowledge that his conduct was tortious. It does not even always have to shown that the defendant intended to cause actual harm. Intentional torts in this sense by no means always require “fault” on the actor’s part in the sense of the terminology employed by Civil Law jurisdictions. This is only a requirement of the so-called “malicious torts”.

23. The intentional torts are divided into torts to the person and torts to the property. Trespass to the person means direct and intentional acts of interference by the defendant with the person of the plaintiff. The main examples of this are battery, assault, false imprisonment and the infliction of emotional suffering. Assault is an act by the defendant which places the plaintiff in reasonable apprehension of an immediate battery; it is neither dependant on the intentions of the defendant towards the plaintiff, nor on whether or not the defendant actually meant to carry out the threat. Assault can also include domestic violence (Street [-Brazier and Murphy], Torts[10], 34-36). Battery is the direct application of physical contact upon the person of another without his or her consent (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 618-621; Wilson v. Pringle [1987] QB 237, 252 [Croom-Johnson J.: "an intentional touching or contact in one form or another of the plaintiff by the defendant"]). The intentional or reckless inflicting of emotional suffering also amounts to a tort. The IRISH courts still apply the rationale in Wilkinson v. Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, where liability was imposed on the basis that the defendant had wilfully done an act calculated to cause physical harm to the plaintiff. In ENGLAND and WALES this is now regulated by the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, ss. 3 and 7(3). Trespass to land, on the other hand, is understood as the intentional or negligent entering on to or remaining on land in the possession of another without lawful jurisdiction (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 653-673). The intentional possession of the chattels of another party will also lead to a tort, see for ENGLAND and WALES the Tort (Interference with Goods) Act, 1977. Torts can arise in the conversion of chattels - any act to chattels of another party that continues an unjustified denial of title, the wrong delivery of chattels or in the wrongful failure of a person in possession of a chattel to deliver it to the person entitled to immediate possession (Street [-Brazier and Murphy], Torts[10], 46-67). Furthermore, the common law recognises a strand of so-called "malicious torts". The main elements of a malicious tort are that the defendant intentionally commits a wrongful act which necessarily produces harm. The defendant must know of that harm or must reasonably be aware that such conduct would lead to injury and act accordingly without just cause. Malicious torts generally arise in relation to defamation, slander, libel, invasions of privacy, disclosure and fraud. Other examples include the malicious abuse of process and malicious prosecution (see generally McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 981-990 for IRELAND and Street [-Brazier and Murphy], Torts[10], 491-500 for ENGLAND and WALES). Another category of malicious torts is that of injurious falsehood, which may be understood as the slander of title or of goods, or false statements which are aimed at injuring the trade of a person (see for ENGLAND and WALES Lord Davey in Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Wright Crossley (1901) 18 RPC 95, 99; and for IRELAND Defamation Act 1961, s. 20). Finally, malice can be of relevance where the defendant acts out of spite to cause injury or loss to the plaintiff by means of a nuisance (Christie v. Davey [1893] 1 Ch 316, 327 per North J.; Hollywood Silver Fox Farm Ltd. v. Emmett [1936] 2 KB 468, 475 per Macnaghten J.; Winfield and Jolowicz [-Rogers], Tort[14], 412-414; McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 695).

24. SCOTLAND, like other civilian law countries, recognises a definite difference between intentional and negligent delicts. The negligence requirements are considerably the same as the remainder of the British Isles, by virtue of the legacy of Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] AC 562, which originated in Scotland. The intentional causation of harm – injuria or damnum injuria datum relates to the aggression of another's legally protected assets, which can sometimes also infer criminal liability: see generally Walker, Delict[2], 164. There is little discussion in Scotland on this topic, primarily due to the fact that it is usually obvious that reparation must be made: "in the absence of privilege, a person is subject to liability if he intentionally invades the interests of personality or reputation…" (Seavey, Harv.LR 56 [1942] 72, 84). The basic Scottish law of delict requires a mental element, an injurious, fraudulent or criminal purpose. Thus, the mental element must be dolus. The main idea is that someone intends a result – the intent is not necessarily a hostile intent to do harm, rather the intent to bring about a result that interferes with the interests of another in a way the law does not allow (Gordon v. Stubbs Ltd. (1895) 3 SLT 10. No proof of intent to hurt is needed, merely a man's intent will be judged via his conduct (Walker loc. cit. 165). Not desiring to harm is not a defence. The doctrine culpa lata dolo aequiparetur will also apply – wantonness or recklessness will sometimes equate with intent, cf. Clark v. Syme (William) 1957 JC 1, 5 per LJG Clyde (concerning malicious mischief in the criminal law). Issues of remoteness of damage have been less discussed in the context of intentional wrongs – the defender will be liable for the consequences of his conduct, either intended or understood to have been intended by him (Quinn v. Leathem [1901] AC 495, 537 per Lord Lindley).

V. Strict Liability

25. As previously indicated, the majority of the basic norms of European Civil Codes have adopted the so-called "fault principle" as their point of departure. It is certainly true to state that all of the European legal orders in varying degrees have long developed forms of liability which do not depend on intention or negligence. However (see on this point Chapter III), provisions relating to strict liability either completely fall outside the parameters of the Civil Codes or are, at any rate, predominantly external to the Civil Code. The PORTUGUESE CIVIL CODE was the first in its field to deal with strict liability as part of the basic norms of tort law, albeit in a rudimentary fashion (CC art. 483(2): "Objective liability arises only where expressly provided for in law"). The DUTCH CC art. 6:162(3) appears to have advanced one step further ("A wrongful act (tort) can be imputed to a wrongdoer if s/he is at fault in causing it or from a cause for which he is answerable according to law or based on the fact that it was within his sphere of risk according to the precepts of common understanding"). The proper interpretation of this (as of the time of writing, a provision seemingly devoid of any practical significance) regulation is the subject of much controversy. According to prevailing legal opinion, this provision governs solely the liability of the actor who personally committed the wrongful act. Consequently, according to this interpretation, CC art. 6:162(3) is not understood as a reference to the provisions pertaining to strict liability for damage caused by others, by animals and for things in conjunction with CC art. 6:169, rather the stipulation must be perceived as referring, in particular to CC art. 6:165 (whereby "the fact that a positive act of a person aged of fourteen or older which occurred owing to a mental or physical disability does not preclude liability being imposed for the wrongful act") (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10] no. 86, p. 95). Inexperience leading to the commission of a tort is representative of when a wrongful act is imputed to the tortfeasor based on a contravention of generally accepted societal standards (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 618). The approach of VI.–1:101, namely incorporating strict liability directly into the basic norm is only reciprocated in more recent codifications, namely in the ESTONIAN LOA § 1043 and in SLOVENIAN LOA § 131(3).

26. For the most part, without prejudice to its mounting practical significance, strict liability (for which diffuse conceptual notions are employed; "objective" liability is utilised in part, occasionally, reference is made to "risk based liability or liability for a source of danger" is still regarded as a systematical anomaly, namely constituting an exception to the principle that liability is based on fault. Even the provisions in BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN CC arts. 1384(2) ff can be originally (and to some extent even today) traced back to the fault principle (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10] no. 67 p. 62). This is because the provisions were construed as (or they continue to be construed) (either, as the case may be refutable or irrefutable) presumptions of fault (Van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 308; Ravarani, La responsabilité civile, no. 515 p. 394-395). The reinterpretation of CC art. 1384(1) (gardien-liability) which essentially originates from the case of arrêts Jand'heur decided by the Cour de Cassation (Cass.civ. 21 February 1927, D. 1927, 1, 97; Cass.ch.réun. 13 February 1930, D. 1930, 1, 57) and completed by arrêt Blieck (Cass.ass.plén. 29 March 1991, D. 1991 Jur. 324) have, however, fundamentally realigned matters under FRENCH law. CC art. 1384(1), which was originally never intended according to the scheme of the Code to enjoy any independent significance, today stands on an equal footing with the basic liability regime under CC arts. 1382 and 1383. Nowadays, the assertion can be made that the French courts, in practise, accord considerably more weight to gardien-liability than to liability for intention or negligence. The BELGIAN Cour de Cassation has, however, only partly followed the reinterpretation of CC art. 1384(1) adopted by its French counterpart. In particular, it has refused to derive un principe général de responsabilité du fait d´autrui from a CC art. 1384(1: Cass. 19 June 1997, JT 1997, 582, concl. Avocat général Piret. MALTESE CC only recognises a number of special cases of strict liability; there is no provision which corresponds to French or Italian law. The position is the same in POLISH law. The specific instances of strict liability (CC arts. 430, 433-436, 449^{1}) are, however, in effect supplemented by the doctrine of "anonymous fault" under the general norm of liability, enabling outcomes to be achieved which are equivalent to a strict liability (see Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 190-191).

27. Simplifying matters considerably, it can be asserted that a comparable development to that which unfolded under French law as outlined above has also succeeded in taking root under SPANISH law. However, it took a different path in as much as the Spanish courts directly resorted to CC art. 1902, the basic norm of Spanish tort law, largely approximating liability for negligence to strict liability. Case law and legal scholarship expressly term this an "objectivisation" of liability (TS 8 April 1992, RAJ 1992 (2) no. 3187 p. 4202; Albaladejo (-Santos Briz), Comentarios al Código Civil y compilaciones forales, XXIV, 433). This was effected not least by reversing the burden of proof in respect of fault (see below Note VI34) and by the de facto abandonment of the express requirement of culpa in eligendo or educando stipulated by CC art 1903 (TS 26 January 1990, RAJ 1990 (1) no. 69, 2. recital, p. 115). Modern Spanish liability law may be delineated into three subgroups: liability under culpa clásica, liability under culpa cuasi-objetiva and "genuine" objective liability. The first two groups are governed by CC art. 1902; only the third is the subject of specific regulations (within and outside the parameters of the CC): (see further v. Bar, Common European Law of Torts II, nos. 360-363).

28. Likewise, ITALIAN case law originally construed CC art. 2051 (liability for damage caused by things under one's control, custodia) as constituting a rebuttable presumption (presumption juris tantum) that the defendant was negligent. Cass. 20 May 1998, no. 5031, Foro it. 1998, I, 2875 then clarified that strict liability (liability without fault) arises under this provision. HUNGARIAN CC § 345(1) introduced a broad provision with connotations of a general clause concerning strict liability for "dangerous activities". According to this provision, a person who "carries out an activity with a high risk attached, is obliged to compensate the damage that thereby arises". The same holds true for activities which are hazardous to the environment. Proof of force majeure will operate to relieve the defendant from liability.

VI. Burden of proof

29. While it is true that questions pertaining to how evidence is submitted and evaluated are matters for procedural law, questions raised concerning the burden of proof remain governed by substantive law. Despite the fact that a number of jurisdictions regulate the burden of proof within the parameters of their Civil Procedure Act (e.g. the DUTCH Code of Civil Procedure [Rv] in art. 177, BELGIAN Gerechtelijk Wetboek in art. 870 and the new SPANISCH Civil Procedure Code in art. 217: pursuant to all of these regulations, each party involved must generally plead facts in their favour and prove them if required), it is universally recognised on the European stage that the rules pertaining to the burden of proof are part of substantive law. This conclusion derives from the Rome Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations ("Rome I") art. 14. Moreover, PECL assume that all issues pertaining to the allocation of the burden of proof belong to the substantive law, cf. e.g. PECL art. 8:108(1) (Excuse Due to an Impediment).

30. In turn, the cardinal principle of the rules relating to the allocation of the burden of proof sets forth that each party must allege and prove each component of a rule that s/he is seeking to rely on. This principle has garnered acceptance in all European jurisdictions and underpins these Principles, in particular VI.–1:101(1) and the provisions of Chapter V. This principle is expressly laid down in a number of national Civil Codes. The jurisdictions that have adopted this conceptual approach have generally abstained from placing the rule in Chapters of the Code regulating tort law, rather the principle is positioned in Chapters of the Code, from whence it can be deduced that the rule is imbued with general significance for the entire civil law (e.g. GREEK CC art. 338, PORTUGUESE CC art. 342(1); ITALIAN CC art. 2697; POLISH CC art. 6). Here and there, the national legislatures have deemed it necessary to enact a further general provision confirming this rule within the parameters of liability law (AUSTRIAN CC § 1296: the onus of proof in respect of proving the defendant's fault rests on the claimant; and PORTUGUESE CC art. 487(1): "The claimant is obliged to prove that the defendant was at fault, save in cases where a presumption of fault applies") (in respect of the countries which have statutorily provided for a reversal of the onus of proof for fault – the onus then lies on the defendant- cf. forthwith nos. 32 ff).

31. The axiom that emerges from the above delineated basic rule, as far as tort law is concerned, is that the plaintiff must plead/establish and prove all of the requirements pertaining to his claim, in particular damage, grounds of liability and causation save where express regulations permit departures from this rule, whereas it is incumbent upon the defendant to show and prove certain requirements which give rise to a ground of defence, thereby displacing the claimant's assertions (cf. in respect of the latter Chapter V).

32. There are, however, manifold exceptions to the basic rules pertaining to the allocation of the burden of proof. These exceptions typically impinge either on the factual basis for the adjudged negligence or causation. In turn, the exceptions to the statutory basic rule are partly predicated on case law alone. The upshot of these exceptions is that they always entail that the defendant's liability is aggravated. The particulars concerning the stages of development in this process under the relevant national law will, therefore, fall to be examined within the parameters of the relevant substantive law issue (i.e. in respect of the treatise on accountability and the examination of causation). The onus of proof will not be reversed where the question of whether (legally relevant) damage has been sustained calls for determination. The evidential requirements may, however, be relaxed in respect of the extent of recoverable damage.

33. Attenuating liability via the device of the reversal of the burden of proof is a typical feature of CIVIL LAW jurisdictions. Today, in a number of Central and Eastern European States, it is a general tenet derived from statute that the defendant is obliged to exculpate himself, in other words that the burden of proving the defendant's fault does not lie with the plaintiff, and it is incumbent upon the defendant to prove that s/he conducted himself correctly (HUNGARIAN CC § 339(1), second sentence; ESTONIAN LOA § 1050(1); SLOVENIAN LOA § 131(1)). Since these rules are of binding effect for tort law in its entirety, they render superfluous special provisions in discrete areas of law, common to other jurisdictions (but here only in exceptional instances), the burden of proving an absence of negligence rests on the defendant.

34. To all intents and purposes, the position in the three legal orders examined above largely reflects the current legal position in SPAIN. Since the late 1950s, the jurisprudence of the Tribunal Supremo has elevated the reversal of the burden of proof in respect of fault to the status of general rule (TS 30 June 1959, RAJ 1959 no. 2944 p. 1809; cf. For submissions justifying this development inter alia Lacruz Berdejo, Elementos II (2)[4], 476). Essentially, only the liability of medical practitioners and freelancers are excluded from the ambit of this rule; here the plaintiff carries the burden of demonstrating that the defendant was at fault (De Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 203; TS 24 May 1990, RAJ 1990 [4] no. 3836 p. 5095); an exception to this state of affairs only arises in the case of absolutely disproportionate damage indicative of a gross negligence (TS 2 December 1996, RAJ 1996 [5] no. 8938 p. 12410).

35. For the most part, comparable jurisprudential developments have crystallised in GERMANY. However, in contrast to Spain, this refinement is confined to a limited number of cases. In the field of product liability, the BGH decided in the "Hühnerpest" judgment (BGH 26 November 1968, BGHZ 51, 91, corrected by BGH 17 March 1981, BGHZ 80, 186, 196) that the injured party should have the benefit of the rules pertaining to the burden of proof, given that the negligence of the manufacturer is presumed provided that it can be established that the damage was caused by a defect in the product. Similar developments can be observed in the sphere of environmental liability law (BGH 18 September 1984, BGHZ 92, 143). Where a so-called protective law is infringed (CC § 823(2)), fault is presumed until refuted provided that the claimant can surmount the twin requirements of namely, establishing an objective breach of the protective law and furthermore, provided that the protective law prescribes the required conduct in such concrete terms with the result that the realisation of the objective elements of the rule approaches an inference of subjective fault (BGH 19 November 1991, BGHZ 116, 104, 114; BGH 17 January 1984, VersR 1984, 270, 271; cf. regarding limitations BGH 19 November 1991, BGHZ 116, 104, 115).

36. According to ITALIAN Law the burden of proving fault lies principally with the injured party (CC art. 2697(1)). However, the breach of a concrete statutory duty of care must be, per se, tantamount to a so-called colpa specifica, a colpa in re ipsa, which requires no further proof (Visintini, I fatti illeciti II[2], 68). The only prerequisite is that the violated norm was designed to prevent the damage in question occurring (cf., derived from case law, in particular Cass.sez.un. 22 October 1984, no. 5361, Foro it. 1985, I, 2358; Cass. 9 June 1995, no. 6542, Giur.it. 1996, I, 1, 191; Cass. 13 May 1997, no. 4186, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, 722 and Cass. 29 July 1995, no. 8300, Giur.it. 1996, I, 1, 328).

37. According to AUSTRIAN law, the basic rule of CC § 1296 previously touched on (pursuant to which, the plaintiff must prove the defendant's lack of care) is usurped by CC § 1298, which provides that the debtor is required to prove, in the event that s/he fails to fulfil a contractual or statutory obligation, that this failure to perform was not caused by any fault on his part. Furthermore, in the context of where a violation of a protective law is at issue (CC § 1311 second sentence), the burden of proving the lack of (subjective) fault in Austria rests also on the defendant)(OGH 5 March 1970, ZVR 1970/232 (p. 296) and OGH 25 July 2000, SZ 73/118; in-depth Reischauer, JBl 1998, 473-487, 560-570).

38. In GREECE, in the field of liability for negligence, the fact that there are minimal differences between unlawfulness and fault can also occasionally lead to complexities in respect of the burden of proof (Deliyannis, in: FS Michaelides-Nouaros I, 303, 315 with reference to A.P. 854/1974 NoB 23/1975, 479 and CA Athens 2688/1969 Arm 24/1970, 313). However, the courts have only expressly facilitated relaxations in the requirements relating to the burden of proof within the parameters of product liability (CA Thessaloniki 1259/1977 Arm 32/1978, 121). This approach was enacted as an express regulation in the Consumer Protection Act (Act 2251/1994). Art. 8(4) of this Act introduced a general reversal of the burden of proof rules in services in respect of the fault of the service provider. How this provision was to be interpreted was the matter of some debate. Seemingly, the provision concerned a twofold rebuttable presumption: entailing that the service provider not only has to prove that he did not render, either intentionally or negligently, a defective service but must also prove that the performance of the service was not defective (Georgiades Ast., in: FS Kiantou-Pampouki, 143, 149; Karakostas, Prostasia tou katanaloti, 138; for an in-depth analysis [in German] Eleftheriadou, Die Haftung aus Verkehrspflichtverletzung im deutschen und griechischen Deliktsrecht, 70). Act 2251/1994 art. 8(4) was amended by Act 3587/2002 art. 10 which concerns the liability of the service provider and now provides that the latter has to prove both absence of unlawfulness and fault.

39. In CIVIL LAW jurisdictions, shifts in the onus of proof as regards proof or negligence or proof of causation are generally the subject of special provisions within the parameters of the Civil Code. The provisions set forth rebuttable legal presumptions, The object of these provisions is that, as the case may be, the defendant has to shoulder the burden of proving that s/he was not at fault or it is incumbent upon him/her to demonstrate that the fault on their part did not cause the damage that resulted (e.g. PORTUGUESE CC arts. 350(1) and 487(1); cf. Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 536). Examples for this legislative approach are to be found in many areas of the law of non-contractual liability for damage, in particular parental liability for damage caused by their children (CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC § 422(2); GERMAN CC § 832; GREEK CC art. 923; ITALIAN CC art. 2048 [which provision, however, generates in its practical effect a strict liability]; MALTESE CC art. 1034; POLISH CC art. 427; PORTUGUESE CC art. 491) and liability for buildings and structures (e.g. AUSTRIAN CC § 1319 [but liability for roads and paths under CC § 1319a is quite different and depends on proof of intention or gross negligence] and GERMAN CC §§ 836-838), but also liability for misleading advertising (DUTCH CC art. 6:195) and liability of employers in relation to their employees (DUTCH CC art. 7:658) or third parties (GERMAN CC § 831; POLISH CC art. 429). In addition, it is not uncommon for the courts to compensate the lack of a presumption fixed by statute by utilising the corrective device of prima facie proof (according to administrative law) to try and accommodate the interests of the claimant (cf. e.g. for PORTUGAL STJ 26 February 1992, BolMinJus 414 [1992] 533).

40. In a number of legal orders of the ROMAN legal tradition, one comes across so-called presumptions of liability. Here, reversal of the burden of proof in cases of negligence is no longer at issue, rather an irrebutable presumption of negligence is laid down and consequently, strict liability is engaged. The jurisprudence of the FRENCH courts, for example, reconceived the law relating the vicarious liability of parents which is based on CC art. 1384(4) along these lines. Originally, the provision was regarded as encompassing a mere présomption de faute (Cass.civ. 12 October 1955, D. 1956 Jur.

301, note Rodière). In present times, it is construed as being consonant with a présomption de responsabilité (Cass.civ. 19 February 1997, Bull.civ. 1997, II, no. 56 p. 32), which, for its part, does not leave the grounds of imputability untouched (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats, no. 2364). Similarly, the SPANISH courts did not fashion the reinterpretation of SPANISH CC art.1903 on the basis of a mere presumptions of negligence rather instead the courts harnessed genuine presumptions of liability (see e.g. TS 22 September 1984, RAJ 1984 (2) no. 4332 p. 3326).

41. In contrast to the foregoing, rules concerning reversals in the burden of proof are practically unheard of under COMMON LAW. The principal reason why the Common law is able to function without such rules is because, procedurally, the common law rules pertaining to the evaluation of evidence are at variance with most Civil Law jurisdictions. In ENGLAND and IRELAND it does not turn on whether the factual evidence presented, requires the presiding judge to be persuaded that the plaintiff has proved his case "beyond a reasonable doubt" (according to the standard test under German case, cf. BGH 17 February 1970, BGHZ 53, 245, 256), rather the standard of proof prescribed relates to the preponderance of evidence, namely, whether the presented evidence of one side is more convincing than that of the opposing side ("on the balance of probabilities"). In end effect, the balance of probability test can reach equivalent results as provisions shifting the burden of proof (a case in point cf. Fairchild v. Glenhaven Funeral Services Ltd. [2002] UKHL 22, [2003] 1 AC 32). However, it should be noted that relaxations in the burden of proof rules generally only impinge upon causation and do not have an influence on the basis for the adjudication of negligence.

42. The approach adopted by the Common Law is similar to that espoused by the Scandinavian legal orders, in particular SWEDISH law. Thus, where there are multiple causes for the damage, it suffices to prove that, once all the circumstances of the case are taken into account that it is clearly more probable that the damage originated in the manner as alleged by the claimant (rather than by the defendant) (Swedish HD 28 December 1993, NJA 1993, 764, 775; Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 200 ff, 214 ff). This rule also applies in the field of product liability (HD 21 July 1982, NJA 1982, 421, 483). Pursuant to the Environmental Code, it suffices ,in the field of environmental liability law to prove that, on the balance of probabilities, the damage was caused in this manner [Miljöbalken] chap. 32 § 3(3), cf. also HD 29 April 1981, NJA 1981, 622, 633. In DENMARK, in this area, there is a perceived correlation between fault and causation: namely, the graver the adduced fault, the less stringent the requirements pertaining to the proof of causation (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 501). The same holds true for the law pertaining to occupational accidents and medical negligence (HD 27 October 1989, UfR 1989, 1108 respectively HD 10 September 1993, UfR 1993, 908). As far as injury sustained by patients is concerned, throughout Scandinavia, anchored in statutory provisions, the standard of proof is proof on the balance of probabilities (SWEDISH Patient Injury Act [Patientskadelag] § 6; FINNISH Patient Injury Act [Patientskadelag] § 2 and DANISH Patient Insurance Act (Lovbekendtgørelse om patientforsikring) § 2.

Illustration 5 is based on Hunter v. Canary Wharf Ltd. [1996] 2 WLR 348 (at 366 per Pill, LJ). Cf. also BGH 18 September 1984, BGHZ 92, 143 (Damage to paint of car from emissions emanating from a nearby factory amounted to damage to property).

VI.–1:102: Prevention

Where legally relevant damage is impending, this Book confers on a person who would suffer the damage a right to prevent it. This right is against a person who would be accountable for the causation of the damage if it occurred.

COMMENTS

A. Prevention of impending damage

General. This Article makes it clear that preventative legal protection is also the concern of this Book. Prevention of damage is regarded as better than atonement for damage. At the same time the Article makes explicit one of the fundamental requirements of preventative protection of rights, namely the threat of damage. The second sentence pinpoints the person obliged to respect that right. All the other requirements of preventative protection of rights as well as limitations and particular forms of the right are the subject-matter of Chapter 6, Section 3 (Prevention).

Substantive law. The Article is formulated as a right based in substantive law and not as an instrument of the law of procedure. The entitlement to preventative protection of legal rights is consequently not a matter of judicial discretion. The Article furnishes a right no different in quality from the right under VI.–1:101 (Basic rule). Quite how as a matter of the law of procedure the right is to be enforced is not decided by these rules (see I.–1:101 (Intended field of application) paragraph (2)(h).

Prohibition of damage and compensation for loss averting damage. VI.–1:102 is formulated in a manner corresponding to VI.–1:101. Whereas VI.–1:101 provides for a right to reparation, the various forms of which are fleshed out in the first two Sections of Chapter 6, VI.–1:102 provides for a right to prevention whose particular forms are the subject matter of the provisions set out in the third Section of Chapter 6. It follows from those provisions that VI.–1:102 does not deal only with a right to prohibit; it deals also to rights arising from one's own voluntary endeavour to avoid damage which, were it not for the injured person's intervention, would have occurred (or would have been exacerbated) and would have entitled the injured person to reparation (see also VI.–6:302 (Liability for loss in preventing damage)). In this way it is made clear that under this Book cases of that type are absorbed within non-contractual liability law rather than the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs.

Prevention and the law on non-contractual liability. Although VI.–1:102 is contained in the Book setting out the law on non-contractual liability, this does not amount to a definitive statement about whether preventative legal protection as a whole is to be considered part of this branch of the law, an independent area of the law or a part of other areas of the law (such as the law of property or the law of persons). The draft does, however, adopt the position that preventative legal protection forms a part of the law on non-contractual liability in so far as the person responsible for the threat of damage would be liable for the damage under VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) if it occurred. Further claims to restrain activities based on other legal grounds are unaffected: see VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (d).

B. Claimant and responsible person

Claimant. The beneficiary of the right conferred by VI.–1:102 is the person who would suffer the legally damage if its incidence is not prevented. Quite what counts as a legally relevant damage is to be assessed for the purposes of VI.–1:102 using the same framework of rules as applies in relation to VI.–1:101, namely in accordance with the provisions of Chapter 2. However, the draft does not purport to answer the question whether (and if so, in which circumstances) associations (howsoever legally constituted) are also beneficiaries of rights to restrain another's activities in the furtherance of collective interests and entitled to enforce those rights through the courts. This relates in particular to organisations such as environmental groups, consumer associations, or other bodies concerned with prohibiting unfair competition or improper practices. Rights under VI.–1:102 may of course be held by persons who, had they caused damage, would not themselves be liable: a child abused by a step-father has a claim that such conduct be stopped.

Responsible person. The person liable to respect the claimant's right to prohibition is someone who, were the damage to occur, would have been liable for its causation (called here the "responsible person"). Cases of this type presuppose in the nature of things an impending damage which can only be avoided by the removal of the danger which threatens to be a cause of damage. That danger normally emanates from a person who has acted or failed to act in the manner required in the circumstances.

> Illustration 1
> Owner of a vehicle O notices that a small child is working away at the paint on his car with a metal object. It may well be that the child is entirely unaware of doing any wrong and is therefore not liable under the law on non-contractual liability for causing the damage (see VI.–3:103 (Children)). However, O can insist that the child's mother, standing nearby, exercise her influence over the child to stop the scratching of the car (cf. VI.–6:301 (Prevention in general)). The mother would act negligently if she closed her eyes to her child's conduct. As to whether (and if so, how) O might have a claim directly against the child, see below at illustration 3.

Responsible person under strict liability. The responsible person may be someone who would be accountable without intention or negligence for the causation of the damage if it occurred. A prerequisite here of course is that the relevant judicial redress would be effective from a practical point of view. A genuine claim for prevention against someone who falls into the field of legal accountability merely because of responsibility for some risk will for that reason rarely come into question. The claim to reparation for a loss averting damage, however, remains unaffected.

C. Essential elements entitling the claimant

Impending damage. A prerequisite of every claim to prevention is an impending danger to an interest whose infringement would constitute a legally relevant damage. The danger has to be specific; there must be an immediate risk of legally relevant damage. Neither an abstract potential danger nor the endangerment of another suffices. No one, for example, has a claim against the manufacturer of an automobile that a particular component of the vehicle be constructed in a particular manner or that a defectively constructed vehicle be recalled from the market. A damage ceases to be impending, of course, when it has already occurred and there is no prospect of further damage. Similarly, there will as a rule be no threat of damage if the activity which is to cease does not allow of exact description. As regards the question when a right to prevention also embraces the right to require another to undertake certain positive measures, see the comments to VI.–6:301 (Prevention in general).

Aggravation of damage. The right to protection from impending damage is concerned not only with preventing the first occurrence of damage. It includes the right to stop the aggravation of damage which the injured person has already started to suffer. The text does not state that point expressly only because (i) it appears self-evident and (ii) a longer formulation would have made it necessary to repeat the formula in all the Articles in the first two Sections of this Book.

> Illustration 2
> Without permission to do so, T heaves an extremely heavy object on to O's transport vehicle. Due to its sheer weight the object damages the vehicle when it is set down. The continued presence of the object in the vehicle threatens to cause further damage. O has a right of prevention in relation to the impending but avoidable further damage.

Protection of rights. Similarly the Articles make no express mention of the impending infringement (or threatened aggravation of an infringement) of an 'absolute' right or a legally protected interest. That was not necessary because the expression "legally relevant damage" embraces these positions worthy of legal protection: VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage).

Accountability. The claim is directed against the person who would be accountable for the causation of the damage if it occurred. From this it follows that the right contained in VI.–1:102 presupposes one of the three grounds of accountability of the responsible person set out in VI.–1:101 (Intention, negligence, or responsibility for a source of danger). That applies to VI.–6:301 (Prevention) as much as to VI.–6:302 (Liability for loss in preventing damage). From a merely factual point of view, there is as a rule no effective right of prevention in respect of aimless conduct or accidental happenings: the danger in such a case has almost always been fully realised when the damage is sustained. A conceivable exception is the impending worsening of a damage which was caused merely negligently. As regards the right of self-defence in relation to persons immune from liability see the comments below.

Restriction of the claim. The right to prevention is not unlimited; it has to be particularised and limited in many regards. Those limits are formulated in VI.–6:301 (Right to prevention) and VI.–6:302 (Liability for loss in preventing damage). VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) sub-paragraph (a) makes it clear that the Articles in Chapter 6 qualify VI.–1:102 in the same manner that they qualify VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) in the context of reparation.

D. Relationship to VI.–5:202 (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity)

General. The avoidance of an impending damage is also the concern of VI.–5:202 (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity). However, VI.–1:102 and VI.–5:202 differ from one another both in outlook and function. The effect of VI.–5:202 is that someone who causes another damage in the course of defending that person's own or another's property, person or other interests is not liable for that damage. VI.–1:102, by contrast, confers on a person who would suffer damage if it is not averted a right to prevention or, as the case may be, a right to reimbursement of the costs of protective measures. Both claims are directed against the person who would be accountable for the causation of the damage according to the provisions of this Book.

Persons incapable of being accountable for their causation of damage. It follows from this approach that VI.–1:102 is concerned with persons incapable of being accountable for their causation of damage only to the extent that one is confronted with the question whether such persons have a right against someone acting against them in taking measures to avert the damage which threatens.

Illustration 3
The facts are the same as in Illustration 1, save that in issue are rights vis-à-vis the child rather than the parent. O has neither rights under VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) nor rights under VI.–1:102 (Prevention) vis-à-vis the child. An answer to the question whether O may permissibly exercise direct control over the child (by oral command and, if need be, physical restraint) depends simply on whether the child has a right to prevent O's conduct. This is not the case because O has a ground of defence contained in VI.–5:202(1) (Self-defence, benevolent intervention and necessity). That is a sufficient response: there is no necessity from the point of view of non-contractual liability law to re-formulate this ground of defence as a general right of O's. Additionally O may have a right to prevention under property law. The latter remains unaffected by virtue of VI.–1:103 (Scope of application), sub-paragraph (d).

NOTES

I. Basis of the right to prevent impending legally relevant damage

1. By considerably simplifying matters, it is possible to assert that all legal orders of the European Union recognise the right (or rights) to demand of a person who is threatening to cause legally relevant damage that s/he desist in their dangerous conduct. However, the concrete particulars of the requisites, the bars to recovery and substantive content of this right (s) may be cast differently.(compare. on this point the notes on VI.–6:301 (Prevention in general)); furthermore many legal remedies provided for by national law oscillate between procedural and substantive law.

2. One is confronted with divergent approaches as far as the positioning within the legal system of the rules on injunctive relief and the substantive reach of this remedy are concerned. Expressly placing the right to restrain the impending danger by means of injunctive relief on a statutory footing is a typical feature of tort law codifications in Central and Eastern European countries (CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC §§ 415-419 (cf. in particular CC § 417(2); ESTONIAN LOA § 1055; HUNGARIAN CC § 341(1) (pursuant to which the "endangered person" has the right "to request the court to restrain the person imposing such (i.e. imminent) danger from continuing such conduct and/or to order such person to take sufficient preventive measures and, if necessary, to provide a guarantee"); LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.255; POLISH CC art. 439; SLOVENIAN LOA art. 133)). Amongst the Western European tort law regimes, the NETHERLANDS represents the vanguard in this regard as, on the basis of a successful claim under CC art. 6:162 ,a claim for injunctive relief (CC art. 3:296). can be raised alongside a claim for a declaratory judgment that a tort or delict is established (CC art. 3:302). The rationale behind the claim for injunctive relief is to compell the defendant to refrain from adopting a particular course of action. The assertion of this remedy is not contingent upon establishing that a tort had been committed and that there is a danger that the tortious conduct will recur. The claimant can also avail of such relief if there is a danger that the tort is about to be committed for the very first time (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 613; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 118, p. 125-126).

3. The most widespread technique of codification in the West European states, however, consists of furnishing specific absolute rights with a claim to injunctive relief which is independent of fault on the part of the defendant. To that extent most codifications fall short of the approach adopted in this draft in protecting only specific absolute rights), but exceed it in so far as those provisions generally dispense with a requirement of fault for the protection of absolute rights. Examples of this legislative technique are typically found in the law protecting ownership and possession (e.g. GERMAN CC §§ 1004, 862 and GREEK CC arts. 1108, 989 first sentence) and in the general law of persons. In the latter case they either relate to particular rights of personality (name: GERMAN CC § 12, GREEK CC art. 58, ITALIAN CC arts. 7 and 8, PORTUGUESE CC art. 72; a pseudonym: ITALIAN CC art. 9, PORTUGUESE CC art. 74; right to one's own image: ITALIAN CC art. 10, PORTUGUESE CC art. 79) or feature in rules in connection with the general protection of personality rights, see e.g. FRENCH CC art. 9 and PORTUGUESE CC art. 80 (both concerning privacy), GREEK CC art. 57 (general law of rights of personality); PORTUGUESE CC arts. 70(2) (general law of rights of personality) and 71(1) (post mortem rights of personality), and POLISH CC art. 24(1)(first sentence) (protection of rights of personality in general). SPANISH law provides for a claim for injunctive relief in Law 1/1982 of 5 May 1982 on the civil law protection of the right to reputation, privacy and one's own image (art. 9(2)).

4. In addition to foregoing, there is an array of ad hoc provisions within and outside the framework of the Codes which provide for injunctive relief in certain fields of law, in particular, in the field of the law relating to anti competitive practices, e.g. ITALIAN CC art. 2599),, Intellectual Property Law and Copyright Law (e.g. GREEK CC art. 60) as well as in Collective Labour Law. Moreover, a number of the provisions geared towards protecting absolute interests and claims to injunctive relief mentioned in the previous excursus are likewise often not directly regulated in the Codes and are the subject-matter of special laws instead. Intermittently, claims for substantive injunctive relief can be found in Civil Procedure Codes. For example, in PORTUGAL ,CCP arts. 1474 ff on interim court protection for the right to one's own personality, the right to one's own name and protection of confidential correspondence supplement the substantive legal provision contained in Portuguese CC art. 70(2).

5. Despite the fact that there is frequently a dearth of a fixed statutory basis, a number of European courts have channelled the provisions of tort law (which wording is, strictly speaking, confined to a damages claim), in order to enhance the legal protection geared towards ensuring that impending damage does come into being. This refinement derives purely from case la w and it can be discerned in, e.g. FRANCE and in BELGIUM, where it is accepted that orthodox tort law countenances the possibility that an unlawful disturbance can be brought to an end; it is said that there is a right of suppression de l´illicite (see for FRANCE le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats, no. 2441-2446 and for BELGIUM Ronse and others, Schade en schadeloosstelling I[2], nos. 302-303 p. 223-224). A thorny issue is, as previously alluded to, whether tort law provides a means of averting the impending damage. In other words, whether impending damage connotes damage pursuant to art. 1382 (for an analysis of Belgian Law on this issue which, however, lacks reference to case law, Ronse and others loc. cit. nos. 119-122 p. 93-96).

6. Other legal orders have effectively reached or propounded comparable solutions by ushering in injunctive relief via the analogous application of existing specific provisions. In GERMANY, the courts, by expanding the legal policy underpinning CC §§ 12, 862 and 1004, have extended the reach of general injunctive relief to encompass a large number of other rights and legal interests protected under tort law in addition to those governed by CC § 823(1). Fault is not a prerequisite for the availability of such a claim, however, a necessary precondition to raising the claim is establishing that there is a danger that the infringement will subsequently recur. In the case of an interlocutory injunction, a tangible threat of an (initial?) infringement is ranked the same as an infringement which has already been committed; consequently, there is no requirement to await the commission of an unlawful act (Erman [-Schiemann], BGB I[10], Pref. to § 823, no. 20). In GREECE, practically identical developments have unfolded. Similarly, today it is further recognised that every case of an infringement or where there is an immediate danger that a right or legally protected interest will be unlawfully infringed (this does not necessarily entail that it has to amount to a culpable infringement), the person affected can avail of a substantive legal remedy (Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 317; Pipsou, Anagastiki ektelesi gia paraleipsei i anochi praxis, 55 ff) either putting an end to the source of damage or availing of the remedy geared towards preventing the impending danger (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 281 no. 25 as well as in the Pref. to arts. 914-938, no. 56; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 315 ff; Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II/2, 135 ff). In PORTUGAL, the prevailing situation is identical (Vaz Serra, RLJ 113 [1980-1981] 327).

7. Furthermore, it is recognised in Austria that the awarding of an interlocutory injunction is a matter for the substantive law (OGH 9 October 1991, JBl 1992, 176 = RS0010540). Whereas fault is not a prerequisite for the availability of this type of injunctive relief, legal capacity is a prerequisite (OGH 23 July 1997, ecolex 1998, 124 = RS0108220; Hirsch, JBl 1998, 541). Further requirements pertain to the locus standi of the plaintiff and the risk that the infringement will recur (see further OGH 22 April 1964, SZ 37/62; OGH 31 August 1983, SZ 56/124 and OGH 27 September 2001, SZ 74/168). Mere threat of an infringement of a subjective right or protective law (on this point OGH 25 September 2001, ÖJZ 2002, 147) will, exceptionally, suffice provided that the party seeking the order establishes that unless the prohibitory order is granted, the claimant would suffer irreparable damage.

8. In contrast, under ITALIAN law, the legal position is as before uncertain. The courts have continued to refuse to embrace a general expansion of the express statutorily permitted canons pertaining to the grant of a prohibitory injunction (Cass. 25 July 1986, no. 4755, Rep.Giur.it. 1986, voce Concorrenza e pubblicità no. 51, in this decision, it was however stated that an analogous application of the cases fixed by law pertaining to the grant of a prohibitory injunction to cases not provided for by law could not be completely ruled out) whereas legal scholarship is divided on this issue (for further analysis see, inter alia, Bianca, Diritto civile V, 785; De Cupis, Il danno II[3], 11 and Rapisarda, Profili della tutela civile inibitoria, 241 ff; in opposition Santini, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1959, I, 136-138).

9. Statutory legislation in the NORDIC Countries does not recognise a general substantive legal claim to injunctive relief. Instead, a whole array of special rules found in ad hoc regulations regulating particular discrete areas of law as well as authorisation found under procedural law allow the courts to grant interlocutory injunctions in the case of impending danger. Compare. for SWEDEN Code of Judicial Procedure [Rättegångsbalk] chap. 15 § 3 (this provision is of particular relevance in Competition and Environmental Law: Fitger and Mellqvist, Domstolsprocessen[2], 101); for FINLAND Code of Judicial Procedure [rättegångsbalk] chap. 7 § 3; and for DENMARK Civil Procedure Act [retsplejelov, public notice of 30 September 2003 no. 815] chap. 57 §§ 641-652, in particular §§ 641-643. Amongst the numerous statutory regulations permitting private persons (and also, to some extent, administrative agencies) to avail of substantive injunctive relief, the below listed are a representative sample of provisions under SWEDISH law namely, Environmental Code [Miljöbalk (1998:808)] chap. 32 § 12; Land (Real Property) Code [jordabalk (1970:994)] chap. 3 §§ 3 and 4; Competition Act [konkurrenslag (1993:20)] §§ 23-25; Marketing Act [marknadsföringslag (1995:450)] §§ 14, 20 and 21; Copyright Act [lag (1960:729) om upphovsrätt till litterära och konstnärliga verk] § 53a; Patents Act [patentlag (1967:837)] § 57a; Design Protection Act [mönsterskyddslag (1970:485)] § 35a and Trademark Act [varumärkeslag (1960:644)] § 37a; under DANISH law Marketing Act [markedføringslov, Legal Notice of 17 July 2000 no. 699] § 21; and under FINNISH law Consumer Protection Act [konsumentskyddslag of 21 January 1978 no. 38] chap. 2 §§ 7-9; Law on Compensation for Environmental damage [lag om ersättning för miljöskador of 19 August 1994 no. 737] § 6 (a claim can only be made for the recovery of costs associated with the averting the danger, in other words no general right to claim a prohibitory injunction) as well as the Neighbour Relations Law [lag angående vissa grannelagsförhållanden of 13 February 1920/26] §§ 10-23 (DENMARK has not placed law concerning neighbour relations on a statutory footing; Injunctive relief for disturbance derives from jurisprudential developments, e.g. HD 21 August 2001, UfR 2001, 2406, compare. also Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], Kap. 18).

10. In the COMMON LAW the granting of preventative legal relief in the form of an injunction lies solely within the discretion of the courts. Where damages are the proper relief, an injunction should not be granted, see generally Patterson v. Murphy [1978] ILRM 85. In IRELAND the High Court may issue an injunction wherever it appears just or convenient to do so; see Courts (Supplemental Provisions) Act 1961 (no 39) s. 8 and Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act 1877 s. 28(8). Injunctions will be obtained in a wide array of torts, including nuisance, trespass, defamation and those which relate to industrial relations (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 1187-1202). Injunctions are exercised in accordance with well established principles. These include the notions of the inadequacy of damages, the conduct of the parties and whether or not the principle of laches will apply. When granted, injunctions are generally mandatory or prohibitory. Mandatory injunctions are those which order the defendant to do some positive act to end a wrongful state of affairs that he has created. Prohibitory injunctions restrain the defendant from doing something or repeating a wrongful act. They include interlocutory injunctions which are aimed at protecting the rights of the plaintiff and are granted prior to the trial of action. Some may be merely interim, that is to say, they will be limited to a number of hours or days (Delany, Equity and the Law of Trusts in Ireland, 370). The balance of convenience test developed in American Cyanamid Co. v. Ethicon Ltd. (No. 1) [1975] AC 396 also applies in Ireland where it can be shown that on the balance of conveniences, the status quo between the parties should be preserved and the injunction granted (Miss World Ltd. v. Miss Ireland Beauty Pageant Ltd. [2004] IEHC 13, [2004] 2 IR 394, 405). Quia timet injunctions are granted, where there is a risk of impending damage. Here it is important to consider how likely it is that injury will in fact occur and how severe the apprehended damage will be. The burden of proof is on the applicant (A-G (Boswell) v. Rathmines & Pembroke Joint Hospital Board [1904] 1 IR 161; Radford v. Wexford Corporation [1954] 89 ILTR 184) and must include a strong probability on the part of the plaintiffs. The courts have also developed a “balance of convenience” test in order for the injunction to be granted (Garrahy v. Bord na gCon [2002] 3 IR 566, 583 (Geoghegan J.)). The plaintiff must prove a substantial risk of danger as well as a strong case of probability that the apprehended mischief would arise.

11. This affirms the ENGLISH approach in Cayne v. Global Natural Resources plc. [1984] 1 All ER 225, 237 (May LJ). In Drury v. Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs [2004] EWCA Civ 200, 1 WLR 1906, 1062, Wilson J. held that even an anticipated trespass sometimes gives rise to a right of action. The English courts will adopt a threshold requirement - there must be convincing evidence of real danger of actual violation (Ministry of Agriculture, Food and Forestry v. Heyman (1989) 59 P & CR 48, 50 (Lord Saville)). Legal scholars in England, as in Ireland, have long supported the notion of a quia timet injunction (Snell's [-Baker and Langan] Equity[29], 651; Delany, Equity and the Law of Trusts in Ireland, 403).

12. The SCOTTISH law of delict recognises the prevention by interdict of either the commission of a threatened wrong, or of the repetition of a completed wrong. Like England and Ireland, the discretionary element of the remedy remains the court's power to order or refuse interdict, and the equitable element relates to the fairness of ordering interdict (or the amount of damages to be awarded). Interdict is similar to the common law quia timet injunction, it is a preventative proceeding directed against a wrong being done or an apprehended violation of a party's rights (Earl of Breadalbane v. Jamieson 1877 4 R 667; Hoyle v. Shaws Water Company 1854 17 D 83; Walker, Delict, 452. Interdict is only directed against harm, rather than wrong doing – and where there is objectionable conduct without causing harm, interdict will not apply. The terms of the interdict must be specific and precise (Shinwell v. The National Sailors' and Firemen's Union of GB and Ireland (1913) 2 SLT 83). Interdicts have been awarded in such cases as threat of or imminence of legal wrong (Martin v. Nisbett (1893) 1 SLT 293; see Walker loc. cit. 453). Interdict, like quia timet injunctions, will be allowed where the wrong is threatened but not committed (Wilson v. Shepherd 1913 SC 300). There must be evidence of reasonable cause of wrong or fear – interdict is allowed therefore to avoid common law nuisance or statutory contraventions, for example. Wrongs based on mistake do not lead to interdict being awarded (Walker loc. cit. 456). Thus the court looks at the matter from the point of view of the pursuer, concentrating more on the continuance of wrong (and the effects) rather than issues of fault (Watt v. Jamieson 1954 SC 56; see Stewart, Delict, 22). Scottish law recognises a list of wrongs restrained by interdict, including those against personality, reputation, rights to heritable property, rights to movables, economic wrongs and other miscellaneous wrongs, such as breaches of confidence or breaches of procedure: (Walker loc. cit. 457-460). The provision providing interdict as an equitable and discretionary remedy has also been given a legislative standing. Court of Session Act 1988 s. 47(1) states that "in any cause containing a conclusion or crave for interdict or liberation, the Division of the Inner House […] may […] grant interim interdict." The use of the word 'may' indicates the discretionary nature of the remedy.

II. Basis of the claim for damages in respect of expenditure incurred in averting the damage

13. Reasonable expenses incurred by the claimant in his attempt to avert the impending damage are. as a general rule, recoverable head of damages in all legal orders of the European Union. Generally, a link is established between the debtor's obligation to tend to his affairs in order to avoid a charge of contributory negligence. The further particulars of this claim, which is for the most part regarded as part of tort law, although it occasionally appears clothed in the vestments of the law of Benevolent Intervention in Another's Affairs (negotiorum gestio), see the comments and notes to VI.–6:302 (Liability for loss in preventing damage).

VI.–1:103: Scope of application

VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) and VI.–1:102 (Prevention)

(a) apply only in accordance with the following provisions of this Book;
(b) apply to both legal and natural persons, unless otherwise stated;
(c) do not apply in so far as their application would contradict the purpose of other private law rules; and
(d) do not affect remedies available on other legal grounds.

COMMENTS

A. Sub-paragraph (a)

VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) and VI.–1:102 (Prevention) not self-sufficient rules. The significance and operation of VI.–1:103(a) have already been explained in the comments to VI.–1:101 (Basic rule). This provision serves the purpose of guaranteeing that neither VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) nor VI.–1:102 (Prevention) can be read as constituting self-sufficient rules. The content and meaning of the particular elements they invoke (legally relevant damage, accountability, causation, reparation and prevention) are to be drawn exclusively from the provisions of the following Chapters 2, 3, 4 and 6. Moreover, VI.–1:103(a) makes it clear that the provisions concerning defences (Chapter 5) and the matters left unaffected by this Book (Chapter 7) retain their significance in the application of VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) and VI.–1:102 (Prevention).

B. Application to legal and natural persons (sub-paragraph (b))

Legal persons as claimants. Where the Articles in this Book speak of "a person" or "another" or their cognates, or invoke similar formulations, then, so far as nothing else is expressly designated, these terms, as was already explained, are always to be understood as meaning both natural and legal persons. As regards the few exceptions to this basic rule a distinction must be made according to whether the legal person is a prospective claimant or a responsible person. In the first case there are special rules, confined according to the nature of things to natural persons, to be found in VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss), in VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third parties as a result of another's personal injury or death) and in VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy). The question as to the extent to which the legal person may enjoy incorporeal rights of personality must consequently be decided on the basis of VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) (see the Comments to that Article and to VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy)). A further issue, moreover, is whether legal persons can suffer non-economic damage and on that account lay claim to damages. This draft leaves no doubt about the matter: the question is to be answered in the affirmative (see, for more detail, the comments to VI.–2:101 (Personal injury and consequential loss)).

Legal persons as responsible persons. It follows from VI.–1:103(b) that a legal person is accountable for the causation of legally relevant damage basically in the same manner as a natural person. A few clarifications only are required. Firstly, legal persons are liable to third parties not only for damage caused by their employees; they are also liable for damage caused by their representatives. See VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives) paragraph (2). Clarification is necessary in the second place because legal persons may be subject to special duties of care – in particular the duty to organise their activities in a way which does not expose others to hazards. These duties are "located" in VI.–

3:102 (Negligence). In other words, it follows from VI.–1:103(b) that a legal person too may act negligently or, as the case may be, intentionally within the meaning of VI.–3:101 (Intention): cf. Comment B6 below. Thus its liability may be based on (i) its own intention, (ii) its own breach of duty, (iii) a breach of duty of its own representatives, (iv) a breach of duty by its (other) employees, and (v) its responsibility for one of the sources of danger set out in Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence).

Bad organisation. The duties of correct organisation just mentioned are, purely from the nature of things, predominantly relevant to legal persons. However, in particular cases they may also come into play within the context of a sole trader's business or comparable organisation.

> Illustration 1
> A sudden emergency case in a hospital cannot be responded to early enough because the appropriate doctor is overburdened in another department of the hospital and cannot get away quickly enough. Had the hospital's activities been correctly organised, another doctor would have been present on the ward in question. The hospital is liable for the failure in its organisation. The case would not be decided differently if (as is admittedly rarely if ever the case) the hospital were operated by an individual rather than a legal person.

Legal persons under public law. These rules make no fundamental distinction between legal persons regulated by private law and legal persons regulated by public law. As a starting point the latter are subject to the same rules as legal persons regulated by private law. However, note must be taken of VI.–7:103 (Public law functions and court proceedings): this Book does not govern the liability of legal persons (or individuals) arising out of the exercise of public law functions.

Imputation of knowledge and state of mind of legal persons. A legal person has as such neither its own cognition nor its own will. On the other hand, actual and constructive knowledge, wilfulness and other aspects of state of mind provide elements for a multitude of prerequisites of liability (e.g. intention, negligence, and the definition of a keeper) and grounds of defence (e.g. contributory fault). For that reason clarification is needed that the state of mind and knowledge of persons by whom a legal person acts are imputable to the legal person. This rule is not explicitly taken up in this Book only because (i) it is also of significance well beyond the limits of non-contractual liability law and (ii) there is much to be said for characterising it as a principle of company law. The persons without whom the legal person could never engage in legal relations are its representatives (see the definition in VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives), paragraph (2)). It is immaterial whether the natural persons acting for the corporation are themselves liable or not. Furthermore, the legal person is to be regarded as if the individual knowledge of each of the representatives were bundled together and at its call. It is therefore conceivable that a legal person is liable on the basis of intentionally causing damage, although the member of the board actually taking the critical step was not even negligent.

> Illustration 2
> A, a member of the board of an incorporated company, arranges for building material from supplier L to be used in construction work for the company's customer K. Board member B, who is responsible for procurement, had arranged for these building materials to be acquired - contrary to the firm's policy - under reservation of title. A was unaware of this and B, who had no knowledge of the shortage of materials at the building site, had not envisaged that the materials would be deployed at this point in time. As a result of the incorporation in the building work, L loses ownership of the materials. The legal person has committed an intentional infringement of ownership to the detriment of L.

C. The relationship of the law on non-contractual liability to other areas of private law (sub-paragraph (c) and sub-paragraph (d)); general

The principle of free concurrence of actions. VI.–1:103(c) and (d) regulate in two provisions the relationship of the law on non-contractual liability to other areas of private law. They proceed on the basis that generally an injured person can select from among the several bases of claim which come into consideration the one which seems the most advantageous (The same holds correspondingly where, according to the applicable law of procedure and jurisdiction, the court is required to recognise the basis of claim relied on by the claimant). Where the claimant, for example, has a claim arising out of unjustified enrichment and out of the law on non-contractual liability, the former providing more extensive relief in the particular case than the latter, the law on non-contractual liability does not prevent the application of the law of unjustified enrichment (sub-paragraph (d)). The claim in respect of the unjustified enrichment, however, is not additional to the claim for reparation, but rather an alternative claim (Similarly, where the enrichment is claimed within the law on non-contractual liability (see VI.–6:101(4) (Reparation)) this constitutes an alternative measure of redress to reparation, not an additional one.) However, in the converse situation (the non-contractual liability claim being more advantageous than the other claim) it may well be that the competing system – in particular the competing system for providing reparation - is an exclusive one, that is to say, the purpose of its rules is fulfilled only be ousting the law on non-contractual liability. Account is taken of that in sub-paragraph (c).

Preconditions of a situation of concurrent actions. The significance of the problem of concurrence of actions is occasionally overestimated. The problem only emerges if one and the same conduct falls under the provisions of two or more areas of the law, as an essential element of the claim, and that conduct is judged differently by those different provisions.

Illustration 3
No problem of concurrence of actions therefore emerges when a given non-performance of a contractual obligation does not in fact give rise to non-contractual liability according to the rules of this Book. Hence, for example, the mere failure to perform a contractual obligation to deliver goods at the correct time or of the correct quality is not covered by the terms of VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage).

Illustration 4
Similarly, no problem of concurrence of actions emerges where goods on hire are worn out, in accord with the terms of the contract by the hirer of the goods. That is because the act of the hirer is not merely not a failure to perform a contractual obligation; it does not even constitute an infringement of a property right relevant to the law on non-contractual liability since the destruction is justified by the consent of the lessor. The situation is different, however, if the law governing a contract of hire provides for a shorter limitation period for claims in respect of excessive destructive use of the goods than the law on non-contractual liability provides for a claim in respect of an intentional or negligent infringement of a property right. A problem of concurrence of actions likewise emerges if it suffices for liability under the law on non-contractual liability that the destruction was caused by (mere) negligence, whereas the claim under the law of hire turns on a more qualified measure of fault on the part of the hirer. In such a case the purpose of the provisions of the law on hire is such that they claim priority of application over those of the law on non-contractual liability (sub-paragraph (c)), since they would otherwise not achieve their intended effect, namely to protect the hirer from liability in the cases excluded by the more tightly framed rules.

D. Sub-paragraph (c)

Scope of application. The provision concentrates predominantly, but by no means exclusively, on the relationship between the law of contract and the law on non-contractual liability. It plays a similar role in relation to the law on benevolent intervention in another's affairs, the law of property and even family law. Consequently it does not matter whether it is a provision of autonomous private law or a provision of these rules which in accordance with its objective claims priority of application.

Illustration 5
It may well be, for example, that family law seeks to regulate in an exclusive way the legal consequences of a breach of duties of fidelity owed by married or engaged persons. In such a case the law on non-contractual liability would not be applicable if, following the disclosure of adultery, the cuckolded spouse suffers a severe nervous collapse with physical symptoms of the sort prescribed by VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss). The situation is no different where family law provides for a less demanding standard of care between spouses or between parents and children than that applicable generally in the law on non-contractual liability. In that case VI.–1:103(c) has the effect that VI.–3:102 (Negligence) is rendered inapplicable.

Illustration 6
In the law of property too there are many provisions whose purpose is to exclude the law on non-contractual liability. For example, there are the rules on acquisition of title to property in good faith. Someone who according to the provisions of property law acquires ownership in good faith as a result of a disposition by a non-entitled party but in circumstances where a diligent person might have ascertained the absence of title in the disponer cannot be sued by the former owner to make reparation on account of a negligent infringement (destruction) of a property right. That would undermine the purpose of the provisions on acquisition of property in good faith - especially when consideration is given to a claim for reparation in kind. A right to restitution of the property on account of mere negligent infringement of the right of ownership would undermine the rule of property law whereby only (intentional or) grossly negligent disregard of the true owner's title prevents an acquisition. The point can be underlined in relation to nuisance: the basic rule on nuisance is to be found in the provision on infringement of property rights, but the details regularly arise in the law governing and assigning rights between neighbours.

The law on non-contractual liability and the law of contract. As already indicated, however, the main area of application for the provision concerns the relationship to the law of contract. At the outset it must be appreciated that not every non-performance of a contractual obligation constitutes a non-contractual liability and nor is every non-contractual liability involving damage to a contracting party necessarily a non-performance of a contractual obligation (A trivial example is where it just so happens to be the injured person's own employer who, on a Sunday afternoon, has caused damage by careless driving). A second point of note is that these rules have not merely achieved considerable approximation of the rules on prescription applying to contractual and non-contractual rights but have also increasingly approximated the legal consequences of non-performance of a contractual obligation and non-contractual liability. In particular III.–3:701 (Right to damages) provides for damages for non-economic as well as economic loss resulting from non-performance of a contractual obligation. These developments have effectively diluted the practical significance of the problem of concurrence of actions. Where the law of contract and the law on non-contractual liability do in fact overlap, they only diverge from one another at the margins.

Priority of contract law in case of conflict. Should it, however, in fact come to a conflict between the values of contract law and non-contractual liability law in any particular case, whereby contract law denies liability which would subsist according to the provisions on non-contractual liability, then it is for the rules of contract law to assert priority if that is to be claimed in accord with the objective of the contract law rules. That is again the case if an application of the law on non-contractual liability in parallel with the corresponding contract law provision would deprive the latter of its effect. The contract law rule has priority so far as contract law actually claims it, whether expressly or merely by implication from the nature of things. Where contract law makes no such demand for the subsidiarity of non-contractual liability law, sub-paragraph (c) has no application and the principle of free concurrence of actions governs.

Illustration 7
III.–3:703 (Foreseeability) reads: "The debtor in an obligation which arises from a contract or other juridical act is liable only for loss which the debtor foresaw or could reasonably be expected to have foreseen at the time when the obligation was incurred as a likely result of the non-performance, unless the non-performance was intentional, reckless or grossly negligent." In the commentary to this provision the following illustration (Illustration 2) is given: "Company S sells an animal food compound to B for feeding to pigs. B does not tell A for what breed of pigs the food is required. S negligently supplies a batch of the compound which contains a mild toxin known to cause discomfort to pigs but no serious harm. B's pigs are, however, of an unusual breed which is peculiarly sensitive to the toxin and after being fed with the compound many of the pigs die. S is not liable for the loss since it could not reasonably have foreseen it." It would effectively annul the liability limiting function of this contract law provision if the provisions of non-contractual liability for property damage were to be applicable on these facts and with a contradictory outcome. It makes no difference, moreover, whether that non-contractual liability presupposes a negligence or not.

Illustration 8
Seller S sells to buyer B a concrete mixer. As a result of a defect in the mounting, the drum falls out of its anchoring on first use. Both the drum and the surrounding structure are deformed. B fails to make use of the right to terminate the contractual relationship within a reasonable time (cf. III.–3:508 (Loss of right to terminate). B claims reparation for the damage to the machine on the ground that there has been an infringement of a property right as recognised by VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession). B would, let us suppose, be unable to recover damages for the non-conformity under contract law because of III.–3:107 (Failure to notify non-conformity). Moreover, consideration must be given to the fact that art. 9(b) of the EU product liability directive encompasses only damage which is caused to a thing other than the defective product itself. That provision only concerns liability to consumers, but it invites the conclusion that the EU legislator generally wanted to leave cases of this type too to contract law. The priority of contract law can also be supported with the argument that in cases of self-destructive damage to goods after transfer of ownership there is no workable criterion for demarcating contractual and non-contractual responsibility and the legal system therefore always runs the risk of characterising a mere deviation of quality (and thereby also a core part of the law of sales) as a matter of non-contractual liability law. Under the system of these rules it may be that the question no longer merits any great attention. However, a consideration of the rules of general contract law, those of the law of sale and art. 9(b) of the product liability directive, taken together, justifies the conclusion that the law on non-contractual liability is not applicable to a buyer's claim to damages against a seller on account of self-inflicted damage to the goods acquired.

Illustration 9
Due to a doctor's error in treating a patient, the patient dies. There are no provisions in Book III specifically relating to legally relevant damage suffered by relatives in the case of a fatal personal injury. This silence on the part of Book III, however, is not an "eloquent silence" that speaks volumes in the sense that such claims are therefore to be excluded because the case is one of non-performance of a contractual obligation. The corresponding provision of the law on non-contractual liability for damage caused to another (VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third parties as a result of another's personal injury or death)) remains applicable. Within the non-contractual liability claim regard must also be had to VI.–6:203(2) (Capitalisation and quantification), VI.–7:105 (Reduction or exclusion of liability to indemnified persons), and even, depending on the organisational form of the hospital in the circumstances, VI.–7:103 (Public law functions and court proceedings).

E. Sub-paragraph (d)

The law on non-contractual liability does not oust other bases of claim. Sub-paragraph (d) concerns the converse situation: there is no valid claim which can be asserted according to the provisions of the law on non-contractual liability because, for example, there is no legally relevant damage or negligence or because the conditions for the liability for others are not fulfilled. In that case it is open to the claimant to pursue other bases for a claim which are more advantageous. This rule applies without exception and extends to the legal remedies available.

Illustration 10
Seller S has sold to buyer B land which is contaminated with oil residues. B has not suffered any infringement of a property right because the land was already contaminated at the time of transfer of ownership. A claim for damages for B against S under the law on non-contractual liability can therefore be contemplated only in the case of an intentional deception of B on the part of S (by an omission to make facts known) (VI.–2:210 (Loss upon fraudulent misrepresentation)). That of course does not preclude B from making use of contractual remedies available on account of S's non-performance of contractual obligations – in particular a contractual claim to damages.

Illustration 11
D is driving through a built-up area at an appropriate speed when a three year old girl suddenly steps into the road in front of him. He could not have foreseen that the girl would let go of her aunt's hand because she had spotted her mother on the opposite side of the street. D tries to avoid hitting the girl and collides with a tree. If he has no claim under the law on non-contractual liability, he can still assert a claim against the girl and/or the girl's parents under the law of benevolent intervention in another's affairs (see V.–3:103 (Right to reparation)).

Illustration 12
A has registered a patent in respect of a certain industrial machine, but neither builds the machine nor undertakes any other efforts to commercialise the invention. Knowing of A's protected patent, B builds two machines of this type and sells them. A has suffered no substantial loss and therefore no legally relevant (economic) damage. However, that precludes only a claim in non-contractual liability and does not prevent a claim being made in the law of unjustified enrichment.

No limitation to the law of obligations. Sub-paragraph (d) is in no way confined to the relationship to other parts of the law of obligations. Rather the provision makes it clear that the law on non-contractual liability fundamentally does not oust any claims based on other legal grounds. This can obtain practical significance in particular in relation to the law of property and so in relation to the law governing claims for preventative legal protection. So far as the law of property recognises a claim to a prohibitory or mandatory remedy to prevent (impending or continuing) damage which is independent of fault, such a claim may be asserted independently of the requirements of VI.–1:102 (Prevention). The same is true for preventative legal protection under the rules protecting trades, as for example under the Community Trade Mark Regulation art. 98(1).

Special regimes relating to VI.–1:103(d). The following text features special regimes relevant to VI.–1:103(d) in three places, namely in VI.–2:203 (Defamation) paragraph (2), VI.–2:208 (Loss caused to a consumer as a result of unfair competition) paragraph (2) and VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage). The former two relate to exceptional situations in which national law determines whether a legally relevant damage exists beyond that provided for by the express provisions of these rules. VI.–3:207, by contrast, refers to further instances of strict liability under national law. See the commentary to those Articles.

NOTES

I. Tort law and contract law: Theories of concurrence of action

1. Problems arising from concurrence of actions, which involves an examination how different areas of private law relate to each other, are difficulties which confront every Member State of the European Union. In this area, the focus primarily centres on the relationship between contract and tort law (see generally v. Bar and Drobnig, Interaction of Contract and Tort, nos. 280-315). AUSTRIA, GERMAN and GREEK legal scholarship distinguishes between the following categories where there is a concurrence between possible heads of legal action: If a norm precludes the application of another norm, reference is made to Gesetzeskonkurrenz (concurrence of laws). The term Anspruchshäufung (cumulation of causes of action) describes the phenomenon whereby one and the same act can trigger the cumulation of parallel causes of action, e.g. a claim of damages to repair loss that has already occurred and a claim for injunctive relief directed at averting impending fresh damage. The problem of the cumulation of actions is. inter alia, in these Principles dealt with under VI.–6:301(1) (Prevention in general). The term alternative Anspruchshäufung (alternative causes of actions) is used to describe when the Plaintiff must choose between different causes of actions. An example deriving from these Principles can be discovered in VI.–6:101 (Aim and forms of reparation) paragraph (4). If there are several claims triggered by the same damage which, however, do not preclude the continued existence of the other, this situation is classed as one of Anspruchskonkurrenz (concurrence of claims) or Anspruchsnormenkonkurrenz (competing bases of a claim). The former contemplates that the plaintiff can avail of several parallel claims. These claims do not impinge upon the other. The Plaintiff is not even required to state which of these causes of action he is seeking to rely upon (subject to conflicting national rules on procedure); however, it goes without saying that it is not possible to obtain a doubling in compensation or even an increase in the extent of damages awarded, because the plaintiff (e.g.), as well as having sustained loss by virtue of breach of contract has also fallen victim to tortious action. In cases of the so-called Anspruchnormenkonkurrenz it is conclusively accepted that, from the outset, only one claim existed, although it was possible to anchor the claim to a number of bases for liability (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], nos. 17/1 ff; MünchKomm [-Kramer][4], § 241, nos. 25 ff; Medicus, Schuldrecht I[13], § 32; Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 85 (1959) 230; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 499-506; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 247, no. 29; Georgiades, Diki 6/1975, 43; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 110). In the sense of the terminology discussed above, this text postulates the concurrence of claims principle (however, it does not adopt the fine distinction between this principle and the Anspruchsnormenkonkurrenz), and makes clear in sub-paragraph (d), that tort law does not have the effect of subjugating contract law. Sub-paragraph (c) introduces a regulation, which adopts a converse approach (priority of contract law and other areas of private law over tort law) leading to, as previously alluded in the comments above, an application of the principle of Gesetzeskonkurrenz

2. The principle of Gesetzeskonkurrenz – is the point of departure for BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN law for the definition of the relationship between contract and tort law, derived from the fact that in these legal order a person's liability in damages cannot be contractual and tortious at the same time. In cases of overlap and conflict, contract law prevails (see for FRANCE Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations[9], no. 404 p. 402-403; for BELGIUM Vandenberge a.o., TPR 2000, no. 176 and for LUXEMBOURG Cour 16 June 1982, Pas. luxemb. 25, 344). However, the courts have created exceptions to the principle of non-cumul des responsabilités. These exceptions centre primarily upon the case law of the criminal courts. The jurisprudence of the Chambre criminelle of the Cour de Cassation constantly re-iterates that the criminal courts do not have the authority to apply the laws governing contractual liability. If a criminal court, in the course of a claim for damages which is annexed to the criminal proceedings, is required to determine the merits of a claim for compensation anchored in civil law, the court therefore generally applies non contractual liability law even if the act committed also amounts to a breach of contract (Viney, Introduction à la responsabilité[2], no. 223 p. 412). BELGIAN case law allows the injured party to a contract, breach of which also constitues a criminal act, to elect between claiming in contract or in tort (Vandenberge a.o. loc. cit. no. 178). In addition, the general principles of tort law may be applicable between contractual partners, if the faute of one party is not merely the breach of a specific contract but represented the violation of a general duty of care and the damage resulting from the breach had nothing to do with disappointed expectation under the contract (Cass. 4 June 1971, RW 1971-72, 371; Cass. 7 December 1973, RW 1973-74, 1597).

3. The trend under SPANISH law is somewhat unclear as a result of contradictory dicta in case law and in legal writing. The majority view in academic writing abstains from adopting a strict application of the principle of non-cumul (of a different view e.g. Paz-Ares/Diez-Picazo/Bercovitz/Salvador (-Pantaleón Prieto), Código Civil II[2], 1979, whose view is indeed backed up upon allusion to decisions of the Tribunal Supremo, e.g. TS 16 May 1985, RAJ 1985 (2) no. 2396 p. 2028). For the most part, case law tends to confine contractual liability to "rigurosa órbita de lo pactado", to the "strict sphere of the agreement" (TS 19 June 1984, RAJ 1984 (2) no. 3250 p. 2482). However, determining the exact particulars of the latter appears, as before, problematic not least because the Tribunal Supremo considers the general duty to conduct oneself according to good faith precepts to come within the remit of this "contractual sphere" (see further Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 265). The Tribunal Supremo has aslo enabled the injured party to raise both claims either in the alternative or as a subsidiary claim. It has even accepted that the courts can employ the regime of liability which is more favourable to the plaintiff, even where the plaintiff has not asserted this claim (TS 15 February 1993, RAJ 1993 (1) p. 987 no. 771).

4. In ITALY, it is generally accepted that contractual liability will not generally have the effect of displacing parallel tort liability. If a breach of contract can simultaneously amount tot he violation of an interest protected by tort law, then the injured party can elect whether s/he wants to pursue a claim under contract or tort law; The principle of concurrence of claims is engaged (Alpa and Bessone [-Rossello], La responsabilità civile I[2], 316-317 and 321-326; ders., Aggiornamento loc. cit. 1988-1996, I, 139-140; Monateri, Manuale della responsabilità civile, 19-30; Bianca, Diritto civile V, 551-555). It acquires practical significance above all in the field of carriage of persons (breach of contract leads to personal injury) (Alpa and Bessone [-Lopez de Gonzalo], La responsabilità civile IV[2], 32-37; Cass. 20 April 1989, no. 1855, Foro it. 1990, I, 1970; Cass. 28 January 1972, no. 226, Giur.it. 1972, I, 1, 1797; compare also [concerning liability for animals] Cass. 19 January 1977, no. 261, Giur.it. 1978, I, 1, 1791). Moreover, the majority consensus in case law recognizes that, parallel to the Sales Law liability for damage to other interests of the buyer, (his/her health, or property pursuant to CC art. 1474(2), liability may arise by virtue of CC art. 2043 (tort) (for citation of relevant case law, see Monateri, Cumulo di responsabilità contrattuale e extracontrattuale, 176). The principle of concurrence of claims is, in this respect, the point of departure (Cass. 5 February 1998, no. 1158, RGI 1998, voce Vendita no. 45; Cass. 28 July 1986, no. 4833, RGI 1986, voce Vendita no. 77-78; Cass. 13 March 1980, no. 1696, Giur.it. 1980, I, 1, 1460; otherwise Cass. 9 February 1965, no. 205, Rep.Foro it. 1965, voce Vendita, no. 68). Naturally, the possibility of obtaining a doubling in compensation in respect of the same damage is always ruled out. See further for complete overview: Castronovo, Europa e diritto privato 2004, 69.

5. At this point of time, HUNGARIAN CC § 318(1) envisages a uniform system for contractual and tort liability: "The rules on non contractual liability for damage are to be applied to liability for breach of contract and in the determination of the extent of compensation. A reduction in the amount of damages awarded is not permitted unless otherwise provided by law. POLISH CC art. 443, by contrast, expressly provides for a free concurrence of contractual and tortious liability. However, it is commonly recognised that a breach of contractual obligations may constitute a delict only if it infringes at the same time a generally binding rule of law or principles of community life (zasady współżycia społecznego). In that case the claimant may choose the claim which he regards as more advantageous to him. It suffices that the claimant sets out and proves the facts founding his claim since the court is under a duty to choose the legal ground of liability, which in the circumstances of the case is more favourable to the claimant (SN 14 February 2003, LEX no 78273; Safjan, Kodeks cywilny I[4], 1268-1271; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 353-354).

6. According to GERMAN law, breach of contractual obligations is not tantamount to either the breach of an (absolute) law in the sense of CC § 823(1) of the violation of a protective law in the sense of CC § 823(2). However, if, in conjunction with an existing breach of contract, one of the enumerated rights pursuant to CC § 823(1) (particularly violation of ownership or infliction of personal injury) has also been infringed, then the principle of concurrence of tort and contract law actions is postulated (reaffirmed on numerous occasions in jurisprudence, see. BGH 28 April 1953, BGHZ 9, 301, 302; BGH 24 May 1976, BGHZ 66, 315, 319; BGH 17 March 1987, BGHZ 100, 190, 201; Erman [-Schiemann], BGB I[10], Pref. to § 823, no. 25; Staudinger [-Hager], BGB[13], Pref. to §§ 823 ff, no. 38). An exception to this principle is made where applying tort law defeats the purpose of a contract law norm, e.g. because this norm provides for certain privileges from liability or shorter limitation periods. The rationale holds that then this norm would be emasculated and deprived of practical effect, if tort law were to be applied. The case law is extensive: see, for example, on CC § 521 BGH 20 November 1984, BGHZ 93, 23; on CC § 599 and CC § 690 BGH 23 March 1966, BGHZ 46, 140, 145; on CC § 708 BGH 20 December 1966, BGHZ 46, 313, 316 [all cases in which a qualified fault is required]; and on CC § 548 [=CC § 558 in its older version] BGH 31 January 1967, BGHZ 47, 53, 55; BGH 24 May 1976, BGHZ 66, 315, 320; BGH 8 January 1986, NJW 1986, 1608; BGH 23 May 2006, NJW 2006, 2399 and on CC § 606 BGH 31 January 1967, BGHZ 47, 53, 55 [shorter contract law limitation periods]). It is important to note that the reform of the German Law of Obligations in particular by CC § 280(1) second sentence (Reversal of the burden of proof for fault in contract liability) and CC § 253 (introduction of non- economic loss in the context of contractual liability) has rendered many of the issues obsolete, which had previously played a significant role in the discussions pertaining to problems of concurrence.

7. Similarly, in AUSTRIA, the principle of concurrence of tort law and contract law actions or Anspruchnormenkonkurrenz is generally applicable. In contrast to the prevailing legal position in Germany, a shorter limitation period under contract law has no bearing upon a damages claim under tort law (see further Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, nos. 17/8; Rummel [-Reischauer] ABGB II² § 1295 no. 25). In particular, the specific limitation periods listed in the Third Chapter of the Commercial Code (Ccom §§ 414, 423 and 439) do not apply to tort law damages claims unless otherwise agreed. This is even the case if the consignor is the owner of the good that is lost or damaged. The rationale holds that the tortious actor should not be unduly favoured merely because s/he has a contractual relationship with the injured party (Chr. Huber, JBl 1986, 227; OGH 9 September 1986, JBl 1986, 793; OGH 16 November 1989, JBl 1990, 528 = RS0062408).

8. In GREECE, quite similar issues are the subject of deliberation. The courts have stated that a breach of contract is concurrently a tort pursuant to CC art. 914, if the damaging conduct would also be unlawful even if no contract was in existence (A.P. 967/1973 NoB 1974, 505; A.P. 1058/1977 NoB 1978, 929; CA Athens 10288/1986 EllDik 1987, 886). In such cases, the courts adopt the approach of concurrence of actions: contractual and tort claims can be separately raised according to the rules that govern the two rubrics of law (A.P. 171/1978 NoB 1979, 238; A.P. 967/1973 NoB 1974, 505; CA Athens 10288/1987 EllDik 1987, 886; CA Athens 5653/1987 EllDik 1989, 775). At this juncture, a rider must be added given that particular provisions of contract law

(e.g. those providing for a less strict yardtick for the imposition of liability as is the case with CC arts. 811 and 823) would be rendered effectively meaningless, an exception from the principle of concurrence of actions has been established (CA Athens 951/1967 NoB 1968, 279; Balis, Genikai Archai[8], 372). Furthermore, as far as prescriptive periods are concerned, contractual and tortious liability generally abide by their own respective rules (A.P. 47/1996 NoB 1998, 206; A.P. 1993 NoB 1993, 1069; A.P. 967/1973 NoB 1974, 505). Landlord and Tenant Law (CC art. 602) connotes an exceptional case where the landlord's tort law claims are subject tot he shorter contractual limitation periods (CA Athens 6595/1994 EllDik 1995, 1288; CA Dodoni 261/1997 EllDik 1998, 185). Academic writing favours the extension of the shorter period of limitation for consequential damage under the law of service contract to (CC art. 693) to the tort law claim (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Kardaras], arts. 688-690, no. 30), whereby the shorter limitation period for consequential damage under Sales Law ought not to be embrace tort law claims (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Doris], arts. 554-558, no. 18; of a divergent view Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 260).

9. In preparing the groundwork for the enactment of the PORTUGUESE Civil Code in 1966, there was some deliberation on whether to adopt an express statutory stipulation on the relationship between contract and tort law (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 85 (1959) 238), however this provision never saw the light of day. The majority legal opinion concedes that the principle of concurrence of actions holds sway whereby the Plaintiff can freely choose the regime of liability more favorable to him/her (see, inter alia. Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 637 and STJ 22 October 1987, BolMinJus 370 (1987) 529). However, the converse view is also propounded; namely, the "princípio da consunção" which is derived from "sistema do não cúmulo" which states that contractual regime of liability should be accorded priority (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 501; STJ 9 February 1995, CJ (ST) III (1995-1) 75). There are distinctions between contractual liability and liability under tort in a multitude of areas (inter alia Prescription periods, burden of proving fault); however, the law on damages for both regimes is uniform and governed by CC arts. 562–572. In general, it is asserted that contract law covers loss arising from poor or non performance and the general principles can be found in CC arts. 798-800. Consequently, the liability of a contractor to a property developer or to a purchaser for losses resulting from a defective building is governed by contract law rules (CC art. 1225), the liability of the owner or the occupier of a building to a third party is resolved on the basis of tort law rules (CC art. 492) (Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado II[3], 827, note 5 to art. 1225).

10. According to DUTCH law, it would, in principle be conceivable that a breach of contract could connote a violation of a right in the sense of CC art. 6:162(1). However, it can be derived from the fact that given that there are separate provisions regulating the breach of contractual obligations contained in CC arts. 6:74 ff, they consequently enjoy priority over CC arts. 6:162 (Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[10], nos. 8-9 p. 9-10). Only under exceptional circumstances will non performance under a contract simultaneously amount to a tort pursuant to CC art. 6:162. This state of affairs will arise if the wrongfulness stems from elsewhere other than the (mere) breach of contract. Examples include where the debtor damages a thing owned by the creditor which is held by the debtor by virtue of contractual relations, or where the employer breaches a health and safety obligation owed tot he employee. In such cases, there is a concurrence of tort and contractual claims (see further Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 8-11 p. 9-12; Jansen, Onrechtmatige daad: algemene bepalingen[2], no. 15 p. 23-24; T&C Vermogensrecht[4] [-Lindenbergh], art. 6:162 BW no. 5; HR 9 December 1955, NedJur 1956 no. 157 p. 353; HR 6 April 1990, NedJur 1991 no. 689 p. 2961; HR 6 December 1996, NedJur 1997 no 398 p. 2176).

11. ESTONIAN LOA § 1044 is one of the very few provision which expressly deals with the relationship between contractual and tort law. This provision is on cognate lines to VI.–1:103(c) and (d) and provides: "(1) The provisions of this Chapter [= on "Unlawful Causing of Damage"] do not preclude or restrict the right of a victim to claim compensation for damage on a legal basis other than that provided in this Chapter or the right to make other claims, unless otherwise provided by law. (2) Compensation for damage arising from the violation of contractual obligations shall not be claimed on the bases provided in this Chapter, unless otherwise provided by law. Compensation for damage arising from the violation of contractual obligations may be claimed on the bases provided in this Chapter if the objective of the violated contractual obligation was other than to prevent the damage for which compensation is claimed. (3) If the death, personal injury or damage to the health of a person is caused as a result of the violation of a contractual obligation, the tortfeasor shall be liable for such damage on the basis provided in this Chapter." A comparable regulation which is couched in definitional terms can be discovered in LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.245(2)-(4) ("2. Civil liability is of two kinds: contractual liability and non-contractual (delictual) liability. 3. Contractual liability is a pecuniary obligation resulting from a failure to perform a contract or from its defective performance where one party of the obligation has the right to claim for compensation of damages or demand payment of penalty (fine, interest), and the other party is bound to make compensation for damages, or to pay penalty (fine, interest) caused by the failure to perform the contract, or by a defective performance thereof. 4. Non-contractual (delictual) liability is a pecuniary obligation which is not related with contractual relations, except in cases where it is established by laws that delictual liability shall also result from damage related with contractual relations").

12. In the NORDIC Countries the SWEDISH and FINNISH Damages Liability Act chap. 1 s. 1 state that contractual and tortious liability likewise are in principle subject to free concurrence of actions (cf. VI.–1:103(c) and (d)), but tortious liability can as a rule not be asserted if it allows further-reaching legal remedies than the competing contractual liability and if from their interpretation, it results that they wish to replace the tortious liability. This can be the case, for example, where a claim in contract has lapsed (Lindskog, Preskription[2], 555-556), or where the contractual claim does not include the entire damage (Swedish HD 25 May 1949, NJA 1949, 289; Swedish HD 28 September 1951, NJA 1951, 656; Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 90). If the tortfeasor is in possession of the object, an existing contractual relationship with the injured party can shift the burden of proof, for example in the case of safe-deposit contracts (Hellner and Johansson loc. cit. 87). If, on the other hand, contract law is more favourable to the injured party than tort law, he can rely without further ado on contract law. Examples of this are found in consumer law, for example. In particular Swedish consumer sales law § 31 and (the not totally congruent) Finnish consumer protection law (Konsumentskyddslag) (Law of 20th January 1978/38) chap. 5 §§ 20 and 21 can be more favourable to the consumer than the transplanted EC Product Liability Directive. An instructive example for the approach of the Swedish courts is found in HD 28 February 1996, NJA 1996, 104. The plaintiff, the owner of a kennel for dogs and cats, was injured by one of the animals staying there, which pulled so strongly on the lead that the plaintiff fell and sustained a broken bone. The court held the strict non-contractual liability for dogs as inapplicable, and was of the opinion that only contractual liability could come into question, and this was to be denied on the basis of a lack of fault (Hellner and Johansson loc. cit. 181). Also in DENMARK contractual and tortious liability in principle are subject to free concurrence of actions (cf. VI.–1:103(c) and (d)), but from the interpretation of the rules governing the actual contract one may in some situations say that they wish to replace the tortious liability (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 26-27; Gomard, Forholdet mellem Erstatningsregler I og uden for Kontraktsforhold, 64).

13. The distinction between contract and tort is of great importance in the COMMON LAW tradition, see generally McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 32-36. In ENGLAND/WALES when there is a contract between the defendant and claimant it does not prevent the notion of there being a duty of care, and, conversely, "if a head of claim ... were recoverable in contract, the fact that it could not be recoverable in tort should not prevent it from being recoverable in contract" (Hamilton Jones v. David & Snape (a firm) [2003] EWHC 3147 (Ch), [2004] 1 WLR 924). A case may therefore be pled cumulatively or alternatively on the basis of breach of contract or of a duty of care in delict or tort, such as to obtain the benefit of any advantage with respect to limitations of time for bringing an action (Henderson v. Merrett Syndicates Ltd. (No. 1) [1995] 2 AC 145, 182 per Lord Goff of Chieveley). The contract may be seen thus as an enabling actor, determining the range of matters which will be affected. It is not possible to disregard the contract – mutual obligations in tort are not capable of being any greater than those to be found expressly or by necessary implication in their contract (Lord Scarman in Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd. v. Liu Chong Hing Bank Ltd. (No.1) [1986] AC 80, 107). The background of contracts, depending on the context, is a factor that can support the recognition of the situation being one in which a duty of care in delict/tort is capable of arising. However, there is no duty of care to subsequent purchasers of property that is defective (Bellefield Computer Services Ltd. v. E Turner & Sons [2002] EWCA Civ 1823, [2002] Build LR (N.S.) 97), and only once have the ENGLISH courts held that the existence of a contract with a third party would indicate the possibility of a duty of care being capable of arising in tort for negligence, namely Junior Books Ltd. v. Veitchi Co. Ltd. [1983] 1 AC 520, whereby a sub-contractor was held to be negligent in tort in respect of shoddy floors in the building, despite the absence of a direct contract with the injured party. This has not been followed. It is more the case in ENGLAND/WALES that the existence of contract(s) with third party(ies) will be looked on as a factor that strongly tends to negate the possibility of a duty of care arising in delict (Norwich City Council v. Harvey [1989] 1 WLR 828, 834 per May LJ). In SCOTLAND, the trend established in Junior Books has been more sporadically adopted (see Norwich Norwich Union Life Insurance Society v. Covell Matthew Partnership 1987 SLT 452, 459 per Lord McCluskey). But later in Strathford East Kilbride Ltd. v. HLM Design Ltd. 1999 SLT 121, 127 per Lord Maclean it was held that no duty of care was capable of arising to prospective tenants where the architect contracted with the owner of the building. For IRELAND, there has been a general trend in the courts to rule that the existence of a contract between the parties does not mean that there cannot be a liability arising out of tort (e.g. Finlay v. Murtagh [1979] IR 249, 256 per Henchy J.). Despite this, modern courts tend to disfavour plaintiffs attempting to sue in the more favourable manner open to them (Madden v. Irish Turf Club [1997] 2 IR 184; Sweeney v. Duggan [1997] 2 ILRM 211). Thus perhaps one could say that the Irish courts disfavour "picking and choosing" claims in contract or tort, in order to gain the most advantage. However, in cases of an employer's obligations to his workers and those obligations of a professional to a client, the courts will not restrict the injured party to either tortious or contractual remedies – both will be available (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 35). See generally von Bar and Drobnig, Interaction of Contract and Tort, 203-206.

II. In particular liability in respect of self-contained damage in defective products and buildings?

14. A particularly problematic issue pertaining to the relationship between contractual and tortious liability and has provoked much discussion concerns the question which of the relevant regimes is applicable in the case involving the "self -destruction" of a product. This term is used to describe cases where a thing has been delivered or manufactured and at the time of acquisition the defect was confined to part of the thing and subsequently insidiously spreads to other components of the thing or takes hold throughout. For example, a complex structure (e.g. a large machine) with attendant defect (an operating switch which should automatically lead to the machine being turned off in the event of it overheating) is delivered but the machine is overall in working order. At a subsequent juncture, the machine is completely destroyed owing to the defect which was present in the machine from the beginning (there is a failure in disconnecting the supply of electricity, the machine catches fire and is completely destroyed). In similar cases to the above cited example, the GERMAN courts have affirmed that there may be a cause of action in tort law in respect of the remaining part of the object which is free from defects (the machine absent defective switch) and therefore, whilst applying the rules on concurring claims, granted a claim in tort law which entailed that the plaintiff could thus bypass contractual hurdles (such as limitation periods, exclusion clauses confined to contractual liability) (BGH 24 November 1976, BGHZ 67, 359). Conversely, a claim for damage to property (which is then as a consequence dealt exclusively within the realm of contractual liability) cannot be availed of where the damage claimed is equivalent to the "lack of value" which inhered in thing from the very beginning owing to its defectiveness (BGH 18 January 1983, BGHZ 86, 256; BGH 12 February 1992, BGHZ 117, 183). The exact particulars of where to draw the borderline, continue to vacilliate. It was held in the judgment of the BGH 12 December 2000, NJW 2001, 1346, that there is no physical damage to a building (consequently tort law is inapplicable) where the purchaser built upon land that has been filled with unsound slag and the construction works were later damaged owing to the slag expanding. At no stage did the plaintiff own a building free from defects.

15. GREECE has kept a close eye on the developments that have emerged from Germany (Pouliadis, in: FS Vavouskos II, 495, 498). Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 348 are oft he opinion that when a divisible part of a thing is defective and owing to the defect there is an extension of damage, encompassing the complete object, then there is an arguable that the provisions pertain to product liability ought to apply. Pouliadis (loc. cit. 501) is a proponent of utilising the provisions on product liability, if the damage to the product can be attributed to the effect of the defect.

16. PORTUGUESE Law provides for liability under sales law (CC arts. 913-922) and liability under service contract (CC arts. 1218-1226) for damage which is caused by latent defects in a product. Liability is of a tortious nature if the damage involved exceeds the actual defect in the product (Romano Martinez, Direito das obrigações, 130 and 441 ff). In a Supreme Court decision where a defective gas container exploded after it had been delivered to the purchaser, the court (STJ 22 April 1986, BolMinJus 356 (1986) 349) granted a contractual claim in respect of the damage to the gas container and by doing this it was able to avail of the general twenty year limitation period pursuant to CC art. 309. At the same time however, it abided by a previous decision of STJ 29 October 1974, BolMinJus 240 (1974) 209 and held that the tort law claim pursuant to CC art. 509(1) which was governed by a limitation period of three years (498 CC) also came in for consideration.

17. Similarly in SWEDEN it would appear that since the decision in HD 2 April 1918, NJA 1918 156 the problem of an "insidious spreading damage" is predominantly overcome by having resort to tort law (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 311). However, it should be noted that the Swedish and FINNISH Consumer Protection Acts provide for contractual regulations which could be more favourable to the consumer than claiming under tort law.

18. The predominant view in European legal circles is however, that contract law should solely govern the liability for "damage which spreads insidiously". The EU Product Liability Directive excludes damage to a defective product itself from its scope of application, art. 9 lit. (b). This rule only pertains to strict liability under the Directive; the regime of liability for negligence is not encompassed within the Directive, the same holds true for the regime of contractual liability (art. 13). The Consumer Protection Directive does not consider this issue directly. The latter, however, does not impinge upon existing national tort law orders (art. 8 of the Directive).

19. In BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBURG, liability of the seller against the buyer for loss arising from a latent defect in the purchased product (vices cachés) is, on the basis of the principle of non-cumul des responsabilités governed by contract law *(*e.g. Cass.civ. 13 November 1984, Bull.civ. 1984 I, no. 303 p. 258). The relevant rules regulations are found in CC arts. 1641 et seq. The damages claim pursuant to CC art. 1645 extends to damage to the product itself as well as where harm accrues to other legally protected interests of the purchaser (on this point, see re FRANCE Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier, Contrats spéciaux[14], no. 411 p. 293 and for BELGIUM CA Bruxelles 22 November 1991, RGAR 1993, 12237). If a third party sustains loss which can be ascribed to the defect, the latter is confined to a remedy in tort law (see on this point re FRANCE Malaurie/Aynès/Gautier loc. cit. no. 421 p. 299 and re BELGIUM Herbots/Pauwels/Degroote, TPR 1997 no. 111 p. 735). A prerequisite of contractual liability under CC art. 1645 is that the seller has knowledge of the defect. FRENCH jurisprudence, however, has laid down an irrebutable presumption that the professional seller acted in bad faith. On the other hand, in BELGIUM, a rebuttable presumption operates (the seller must adduce proof that it was impossible for him to ascertain the defect) (see, in this respect for FRANCE Cass.civ. 19 January 1965, Bull.civ. 1965, I, no. 52 p. 59 and for BELGIUM Herbots, infra loc. cit. no. 103 p. 729. Since 1985, LUXEMBOURGIAN CC art. 1645 expressly classes the professional seller as having acted in bad faith. In all three legal orders, the claim must be filed within a short time frame (bref délai) CC art. 1648.

20. Similarly, in SPAIN a claimant in cases of this type is limited to asserting a contractual remedy. While the German approach (tort liability) has indeed been discussed in academic literature (Cavanillas Múgica and Tapia Fernández, La concurrencia de responsabilidad contractual y extracontractual, 13). There is no corresponding case law on the subject. According to structure of the Civil Code, CC arts. 1486(2) and 1591 constitute the point of departure (liability for latent defects in products under sales and services Law). The limitation period under Sales Law is 6 months starting from the time when the good was delivered (CC art. 1490). However, the courts in Spain consider that there is concurrence of claims between this cause of action and the general damages claim based on non performance (CC arts. 1101 ff). This conception of the law has the effect of extending the limitation period to 15 years (TS 3 February 1986, RAJ 1986 (1) no. 409 p. 360, 6. recital). CC art. 1591 as well as Law 38/1999 on Building Ordinance (of 5 November 1999 de Ordenación de la Edificación) arts. 17 and 18 govern liability for damage resulting from defective construction of the building structure. Art. 17 loc cit expressly provides that the contractual liability of those involved in building the structure is not affected by its provisions. Similar to the position under sales law, it is inferred that CC arts. 1101 ff remains applicable to this part of services law (TS 9 February 1990, RAJ 1990 (1) no. 674 p. 782, 4. recital).

21. Art. 1494 of the ITALIAN CC distinguishes between loss which is directly caused by the defective product (Paragraph 1: diminution of value, costs of repair, loss of profits etc.) and the indirect damage to the purchaser's other legally protected interests caused by the product (Paragraph. 2: personal injury, property etc.). The case where the product is destroyed owing to an inherent defect may be construed as a cases falling under CC art. 1494(1) (for case law citations, see Buonocore and Luminoso, Codice della vendita[2], art. 1494 § 6). CC art. 1494(1) corresponds to CC art. 1668 which governs services contracts. However, it has not yet been authoratively decided whether the liability of contractor for the destruction of the subject matter of the contract for work and services or if that object turns out to be gravely defective pursuant to CC art. 1669 is of a contractual or tortious nature. At any rate, the courts consider that this scenario is governed by the precepts of non contractual liability. As this provision is concerned with promoting the common good (Cass. 26 May 2000, no. 6997, RGI 2000, voce Appalto privato no. 84; Cass. 7 January 2000, no. 81, Giur.it. 2000, I, 1, 977). If the requirements of CC art. 1669 are not fulfilled then, depending on the individual circumstances of the case at hand, tort law liability could arise (CC art. 2043) (Cass. 23 March 1977, no. 1136, Giur.it. 1978, I, 316; Cass. 7 April 1999 no. 3338, RGI 2000, voce Appalto privato no. 85).

22. In AUSTRIA, Weiterfresserschäden is governed by product liability law. According to Product Liability Act (PHG) § 1 the producer of a defective component only has to make good damage caused to the final product if the injured party purchased the component as an independent product. Whether or not this is the case is to be judged by the conceptions of the proper duty of care. The OGH expressly does not follow the German case law. The facts dealt with by tort law in German case law, in Austria constitute exclusively contract law (OGH 3 February 1992, SZ 67/22 and OGH 3 February 1994, SZ 67/22 [no liability imposed on the manufacturer of a water hose for damage caused to the engine of the purchaser's car])

23. HUNGARIAN Product Liability Act § 1(4) is only concerned with loss caused to other things. The general rules of contractual and tort liability remain in-situ (§ 12 loc. cit.). Aside from product liability, CC § 310 represents the point of departure for damages claims based on the defect. A contractual claim ensue to which tort law rules apply. Therefore, one is not faced with a problem of qualification (see in more detail Fuglinszky, Mangelfolgeschäden im deutschen und ungarischen Recht, passim). In POLAND on the other hand the view is taken in applying the principle of free concurrence of contractual and tortious liability that putting a defective product into circulation constitutes a wrong which can be the basis of liability in damages even for damage to the damaged thing itself (SN 6 February 1963, OSNC 1964, pos. 95; SN 19 November 1973, OSNCP 1974, pos. 169; Radwański and Panowicz-Lipska, Zobowiązania-część szczegółowa[5], 43).

24. In the event that a movable or immovable object does not conform to the sales contract, the purchaser can avail of a whole array of legal remedies pursuant to DUTCH CC art. 7:21. CC art. 7:22 provides that the purchaser is entitled to avail of these remedies irrespective of other claims that s/he may have. In addition, the purchase can have recourse to damages claim under contract for non performance (CC art. 6:74 CC) as well as asserting a claim under tort law (CC art. 6:162) (Asser [-Hijma], Bijzondere overeenkomsten I[6], no. 380 p. 339). In respect of the latter, the question arises whether the damage to the product itself ("bargain write off" (Transaktionsschaden) is encompassed within the scope of the provisions (Hijma loc. cit. no. 475 p. 407 and no. 448 p. 389). For the law of concurrence of actions, it was decided to cede priority to contract law in these particular circumstances; therefore CC arts. 6:162 et seq. (tort) are not applicable and the plaintiff must rely exclusively on CC arts. 6:74 ff. CC arts. 6:162 et seq. are only relevant if the conduct of one party, unconnected with the breach of contract, amounts to a tort (Hijma loc. cit. no. 442 p. 384-385). Damage to the defective product itself within the framework of consumer sales is governed by CC art. 7:24. Paragraph (1) of the latter refers to the general rules on non- performance in respect of the damages claim. Consequential loss for product liability is not encompassed by this provision (see further Hijma loc. cit. no. 443 p. 385; T&C Vermogensrecht[4] [-Castermans], art. 7:24 BW nos. 1-3).

25. A proposition that where there was created a "complex structure" (D. & F. Estates v. Church Commissioners for England [1989] AC 177 per Lord Bridge at 206) that was affected by the negligence of the defender in the creation of one aspect of it there could be a duty of care capable of arising in respect of that negligence resulting in an adverse effect on that other part has also been rejected in ENGLAND (Murphy v. Brentwood District Council [1991] 1 AC 398 per Lord Bridge at 479).

26. In SCOTLAND there is a conflict of authority at first with respect to the proposition. The broad approach was applied in two cases (Mcleod v. Scottish Special Housing Association 1990 SLT 749 per Lord Coulsfield at 751-752; Parkhead Housing Association Ltd. v. Phoenix Preservation Ltd. 1990 SLT 812 per Lord Prosser at 817). However, a recent case (Hughes v. Barratt Urban Construction (Scotland) Ltd [2002] Scot CS 87 per Lord Carloway) has rejected it as inconsistent with later developments in House of Lords English cases formulating the general approach to be adopted in determining whether a duty of care is capable of arising in delict/tort for negligence. Recent English decisions can be taken as being the law. These have limited the idea a much narrower one covering only situations where the negligent party was responsible for the creation of something in a distinct part of a property already in existence, in circumstances where he was not responsible also for the creation of the whole, or a larger part of that property. It has been held, for example, that, though „close to the border", this could not apply where a manufacturer of carbon dioxide negligently caused it to be contaminated with benzene supplied it to another manufacturer who mixed with a combination of water and a concentrate acquired from another supplier to produce an alcoholic drink. A duty of care was held not to be capable of arising in tort as the claim related to „the finished product" and its diminution in value and consequential losses following later upon the need to recall it from market. The argument was rejected that the contaminated carbon dioxide could be seen as having damaged the concentrate with which it was mixed (Bacardi-Martini Beverages Ltd. v. Thomas Hardy Packaging Ltd. [2002] EWCA Civ 549, [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 379 per Mance LJ at [18]).

III. Tort law and other areas of private law

27. The rules on concurrence of actions which define the parameters of the relationship between tort law and other areas of private law are complex and convoluted. The constituents of the relevant rules are not invariable and may be divergence depending on the field of law at issue. The following analysis focuses on the relationship that tort law has to other areas of the law of obligations and to important aspects of property law.

28. In BELGIUM, FRANCE and LUXEMBURG an unjustified enrichment claim (judicially created) is subsidiary to a tort law claim. Where tort law is applicable, it excludes the assertion of a claim based on enrichissement sans cause (s. for France Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations[9], nos. 706-709 and for Belgium de Page, Les obligations, II[3], nos. 33-34 p. 41-45). Conversely, action en répétition de l´indu (condictio indebiti) which is governed by CC arts. 1376-1381 can also be asserted where tort law claim is admissible (at any rate, this true for France Cass.civ. 19 October 1983, Bull.civ. 1983, I, no. 242 p. 216). As far as the gestion d´affaires which is regulated in CC arts. 1372-1375 is concerned, the exact parameters of the relationship between the latter and a cause of action under tort law are not yet fully determined. There is well nigh universal acceptance that this claim is not possessed of a mere subsidiary character in relation to tort law (at any rate as far as the Belgian legal position is concerned Fagnart, JT 1969, 255; Vael is of a different view, TPR 1999, 104, no. 28, there fn. 67). In two general reports dealing with the law on quasi-contracts, le Tourneau (RépDrCiv IX, v° Quasi-contrats, no. 28) and Jacquet (JClCiv, arts. 1370-1371, v° Quasi-contrats, no. 77) proffered the opinion that, under French law, all quasi contracts, including the gestion d'affaires in this description, are legal concepts which are of subsidiary nature. Judicial confirmation of this analysis is still pending. The Cour de Cassation expressly refuted this approach with regard to the law of répétition de l'indu (loc. cit.).

29. Conversely, it is possible in SPAIN that a damages claim on the basis of tort and unjustified enrichment may be asserted cumulatively since the decision of the Supreme Court in the 1950s (TS 12 April 1955, RAJ 1955 (2) no.1125 p. 602). This is of particular significance, when the short limitation period of one year for bringing a claim under non contractual liability has expired. A claim based on unjustified enrichment has a limitation period of 15 years. Ad hoc statutory provision may stipulate that a damages claim is to be assessed according tot he extent to which the wrongdoer was enriched (for example, Royal Decree of 1/1996 of 12 April 1996 on intellectual Property and Law of 1/1982 of 5 May 1982 on the Civil Protection of Honour, of Family and Personal Privacy and Individual's Right to One's Own Image).

30. Under ITALIAN law, as far as the relationship to the condictio indebiti (non payment of a debt) is concerned, there is a primary distinction to be drawn between cases where the recipient acts in good faith and where the conduct of recipient acts reprehensibly. A recipient who acts in good faith is liable only for the enrichment that is extant at the time of the action; claims for the deterioration or perishing of the object under tort law are excluded (Moscati, Pagamento dell'indebito, 492-506). However, if the recipient acts in bad faith, then it is permitted to also assert a claim under tort law (Moscati loc. cit. 510 fn. 9 and 515-526). The unjustified enrichment claim is subsidiary to the tort law claim; it cannot be raised in conjunction with a tort law claim (De Cupis, Il danno II[3], 234-236). The availability of the possibility of accumulating claims in rem and tort law claims is contentious. It is possibly to avail of the latter if the property owner's enjoyment of property is disturbed or interfered with of s/he is divested of their property. In such cases, the damages claim can be raised in conjunction with the claim for restoration of the property (CC art. 948) or action for the abatement of the nuisance (CC art. 949) (Cass. 26 February 1986, no. 1214, RGI 1986, voce Servitù no. 4 [considering the rights of the holder of an easement]). Tort liability is precluded when the interference with property rights only entitles one to monetary compensation under the relevant property law rules. Then, the plaintiff must frame his breach of property rights claim in terms directed at obtaining monetary recompense (Gambaro, Il diritto di proprietà, 894-896); the exact contours and the particulars of the claim are still the subject of discussion (compare on the one hand Cass. 23 May 1985, no. 3110, RGI 1985, voce Servitù no. 4 [tort liability in conjunction with protection of possessory rights with respect to disturbances, which did not impair the exercise of rights under the easement]; Cass. 11 August 2000, no. 10733, Giur.it. 2001, 898 [usufruct] and Cass 16 March 1988, no. 2472, Giur.it. 1989, I, 1, 510 [liability in tort for impairment of rights under easement] and of a different viewpoint Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[3], 614-623 [the distinction between tort liability and an action based on breach of property rights emphasised]). More recently, there has been a trend, also in jurisprudence, towards determining the relationship between tort and family law. Cass. 7 June 2000, no. 7713, Giur.it. 2000, 1352 awarded a son damages under tort law against his father for breach of maintenance obligations, Cass. 10 May 2005, no. 9801, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 5 awarded a woman damages under tort law against her husband who had failed to inform her before the marriage that he was impotent. Family law is not the only medium by which such claims can be asserted.

31. In POLAND the principle of free concurrences of actions applies also as between liability in tort and liability in unjustified enrichment (CC art. 414). However, concurrence between damages claims arising in tort and those arising out of the so-called owner-possessor relationship is much more complicated. The dominant opinion inclines towards yielding priority to the latter (CC arts. 224 and 225) within its scope of application to the exclusion of the law of tort (SN 25 March 1986, OSNCP 1987, pos. 44; Gniewek, System prawa prywatnego III, 505; Wójcik, System prawa cywilnego II, 509). HUNGARIAN CC § 118 lays down the prerequisites under which a bona fide purchaser for value can acquire property from a person not entitled or authorised to dispose of the property. The conclusion that can be derived from this provision is that the bona fide purchaser for value will not be liable to the true owner. The former is not "enriched" because he paid for the goods acquired.

32. The general tenet under GERMAN law is that, similar to the relationship of tort to contract law, the principle of concurrence of actions applies (RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], Pref. to § 823, no. 35; Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[65], § 194 no. 8). Only in exceptional circumstances will tort law have to yield to other fields of law, to cite one example the provisions governing owner- occupier relations (CC §§ 989 ff CC). These rules are special rules which are of exclusive operation (CC § 993(1) in fine. A claim, supplementing these rules, which asserts interference with property rights under tort law, will only arise in the enumerated cases stipulated in CC § 992 or where an exceptional case can be brought within a recognised category of cases (BGH 23 March 1966, BGHZ 46 140, 146) This serves to protect the possessor who is in possession of the thing in good faith albeit unlawfully, for example, the protection of a good faith purchaser who acquired a stolen good (and therefore property in the thing was not transferred); imposing tort liability even for ordinary negligence in such circumstances would contradict the spirit of CC §§ 989 ff (BGH 29 October 1959, BGHZ 31, 129, 134; BGH 31 March 1971, BGHZ 56, 73, 77; BGH 21 January 1980, NJW 1980, 2353, 2354). Identical considerations are prevalent in respect of CC § 932 which provides that the good faith acquisition of property from a person other than the owner of the property does not amount to an interference with property rights, a state of affairs which according to CC §823(1), if attended by at the very least ordinary negligence, would compel the return of the property or give rise to a damages claim (BGH 25 April 1967, NJW 1967, 1660, 1662; BGH 23 May 1956, JZ 1956, 490). A further example featuring the supplanting of tort law derives from rights conferred by marriage and under family law. According to case law, the sole infringement of a fiduciary duty imposed by virtue of marriage does not trigger liability under tort law; the consequences of the infringement are exclusively governed by provisions of family law (further particulars in RGRK (commentaries on decisions of the Supreme Court of the German Reich) [-Steffen], BGB[12], Pref. to § 823, no. 51, § 823, no. 65 ff). Unjustified enrichment claims and claims under negotiorum gestio can arise independent of any liability under tort law (RGRK [-Steffen], BGB[12], Pref. to § 823, no. 49; BGH 2 July 1971, BGHZ 56, 317, 319; CA Hamm 25 September 2000, r+s 2001, 320 [Damages claim based on negotiorum gestio in a case where a rescuer injured himself]).In so far as a tort law claim under CC §§ 823 et seq. is concerned, § 852 sentence 1 (= CC § 852(3) (old)) would also appear to lend credence to the assertion that the unjustified enrichment claim arises independent of tort law. According to the latter, the person under a duty to make reparation who acquires something from another at that other's expense as a result of the commission of a tort, even if the damages claim is out of time, is required to surrender the property in accordance with the provisions pertaining to unjustified enrichment (see further BGH 2 July 1971, BGHZ 56, 317, 319).

33. In AUSTRIA, the principle of alternative concurrence of actions applies in respect of the relationship between damages claim and the claim for return of the property (rei vindicatio) (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I[3], 532) and Anspruchsnormenkonkurrenz applies to the relationship between the damages claim and claim for restitution (Koziol loc. cit. 534). OGH 17 May 2000, ZVR 2001, 44 opines that the erroneous failure to assert a damages claim in respect of recoverable damage is not tantamount to an enrichment under the law of unjustified enrichment; therefore the tort law limitation which had expired in the interim was of no relevance.

34. The GREEK courts have thus far adhered to the principle that the claim under unjustified enrichment is a subsidiary claim (A.P. 1567/1983, NoB 32/1984, 1354; A.P. 890/1982, NoB 31/1983, 1156; A.P. 8/1968, NoB 16/1968, 385), however, the well- nigh universal view contemporary academic writing is to refute this stance (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], Pref. to arts. 904-913, no. 28; Stathopoulos, Axiosis adikaiologitou ploutismou, 236; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 16), in fact, they furthermore do not rely on the relationship to tort law. Tort law claims do not effect the exclusion of the applicability of claims based on unjustified enrichment (A.P. 72/1966, NoB 14/1966, 801; A.P. 7401/1976, NoB 25/1977, 752; CFI Patras 608/1968, NoB 16/1968, 1083; CA Athens 10119/1988, EllDik 30/1989, 1182; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], Introduction. arts. 904-913, no. 36; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 18). In general, the following principles apply: in respect of the realisation of the elements of the claim pertaining to apparent negotiorum gestio, a claim under tort law always arises in conjunction with this claim. The damages claim can therefore be based on tort law as well as on CC art. 739 (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Papanikolaou], art. 739 no. 12). A claim can only be made under the provisions on negotiorum gestio in respect of the profit made from the unauthorised management of the business (Papanikolaou loc. cit.). The contours of the relationship between tort law provisions governing owner/occupier relations are unsettled (CC arts. 1096 ff). Two different approaches may be discerned on this issue. It is submitted that CC arts. 1096 et seq. exclude the applicability of tort law altogether (Toussis, Empragmaton Dikaion[4], 478, there fn. 10a). The converse proposition is also advanced, namely that both regimes involve a concurrence of actions. Which run parallel to one another (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], Introd. arts. 914-938, no. 50; Georgiades, Empragmato Dikaio I, § 60, no. 32 f).

35. In PORTUGAL, determining the ambit of the relationship that tort law has to the law of negotiorum gestio is of particular importance when it comes to determining the burden of proof pertaining to the person performing the service absent the relevant authority. STJ 22 April 1986, RLJ 121 (1988) 59 with note from Baptista Machado in accordance with CC art. 487(1) placed the burden of proof on the injured party, consequently tort law rules were applied. It should be noted that a contrasting approach has been adopted in academic writing, namely a strong trend can be observed which advocates the application of the contractual provisions anchored CC art. 799(1) (Reversal of the burden of proof) (Menezes Leitão, Responsabilidade do gestor, 291 ff). According to CC art 474, restitution claim, also a claim based on a condictio indebiti (repetição do indevido) is subsidiary to a tort law claim. The former can only be asserted once other remedies have been exhausted. This provision is however contentious from a policy point of view (particularly critical Vieira Gomes, Conceito de enriquecimento, 415 ff and Menezes Leitão, Enriquecimento sem causa, 700 ff). The courts have also conceded a claim for return of the enrichment in cases of interference with the rights of other which doe not cause pecuniary loss (damage) (STJ 22 April 1999, CJ (ST) VII (1999-2) 58; STJ 23 March 1999, BolMinJus 485 (1999) 396 ff). In general, CC art. 498(4) based on German model CC § 852 (old) clarifies that "expiry of the period of limitation for the bringing of a damages claim does not impinge upon the period of limitation in respect of bringing a claim in rem for return of the property nor does it affect the limitation period pertaining to the return of the enrichment provided that the necessary requirements are fulfilled"

36. In the NETHERLANDS, if tort law claims and claims anchored on another private law basis collide, the starting point is, in general the principle that causes of action may be invoked cumulatively. This is not only true of the relationship to contract law but also in respect of the relationship to the undue payment provisions of the Civil Code (CC art. 6:203 et seq) and to unjustified enrichment (CC art. 6:212). Exceptions to this basic principle are made where its application would lead to internal systematic imbalances, provoking an application that would contradict the spirit of the provision or would be unworkable or illogical leading to unacceptable results. In this case, the person entitled to make a claim normally has a right of election (the principle of alternative causes of action): occasionally leading to the result that the basis of the claim precludes raising other claim (so-called principle of exclusivity), for a more in-depth analysis see Boukema, Samenloop, nos. 5-7 p. 11-14; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], nos. 122-123 p. 135-136; Jansen, Onrechtmatige daad: algemene bepalingen[2], no. 12 p. 19-21). On occasion, the varying questions of concurrence of actions are the subject of statutory provision, e.g. in CC art. 3:121 (as far as bad faith cases of possession are concerned, it is possible to invoke the causes of action relating to the return of the property and the fruits and the damages claim cumulatively), in CC art. 3:125(3) (cumulation of the claim of dispossessed possessor for re delivery of the property and the claim for damages under tort law pursuant to CC art. 6:162) and in CC art. 6:193 (Product liability which is strict does not impinge upon the validity of other claims). In other cases, the answer is discovered by perusal of parliamentary debates, e.g. Parlementaire Geschiedenis III, 212 ff (concerning the relationship between claims arising out of CC arts. 3:44(2) or (4) rescission of legal transation on account of duress] and under CC art. 6:162); Parlementaire Geschiedenis III, 216 ff (concerning the relationship between CC arts. 3:45 et seq [Actio Pauliana; voidness of legal act] to CC art. 6:162); Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 830 (concerning the relationship between claims arising out of unjustified enrichments and damages claims under tort law; renunciation of the claim that unjustified enrichment claim is subsidiary to a claim under tort law) and Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 816 (claims based on undue payments [CC art. 6:203] and claims arising under tort law are alternative causes of actions). If research of the parliamentary debates fails to produce reliable indicator foe the will of the legislature, then it falls to an appraisal of the purpose of the legal provision (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 123 p. 136).

37. In the NORDIC countries the contours of the law of negotiorum gestio and unjustified enrichment are poorly mapped out; problems of demarcation seldom arise. In cases of a selling the same good twice, it is conceded that the first purchaser has a claim in rem for restitution of the good as opposed to a tort law claim against the second purchaser who purchases the good in bad faith (Karlgren, Skadeståndsrätt[5], 194, 206).

38. SCOTTISH scholars point out that unjustified enrichment has more in common with delict than with contract, with an obligation clearly imposed by law (Stewart, Delict[4], 2). The main difference between unjustified enrichment and delict is that in the former case there is no need for the defendant to have done something wrong in order to incur an obligation to pay (Exchange Telegraph Co. Ltd. v. Giulianotti 1959 SC 19). Nonetheless there is significant discussion concerning any possible overlap between the various laws of obligations in Scotland (Hogg, Obligations, 26-31). Concurrent liability will generally apply and has been accepted in case law (Junior Books Ltd. v. Veitchi Co. Ltd. [1983] 1 AC 520).

IV. Legal persons

39. Only in BELGIUM, FRANCE and Luxembourg does the basic norm of tort law CC art. 1382 („Tout fait quelconque de l'homme, qui cause ... un dommage") refer exclusively to natural persons, However, this wording is not ascribed any practical significance. Legal persons are also subject to the tort law rules of the Code Napoléon (see for FRANCE Cass.civ. 17 July 1967, Bull.civ. 1967, II, no. 261 p. 182 and for BELGIUM Vandeputte, Het aquiliaans foutbegrip, 86-88). In art. 1902 CC, the Spanish legislature opted for a preventative corrective device to obviate making the same editorial error as the French paradigm, and deliberately widened the scope of the article to embrace legal persons (García Cantero, in: Asociación de professores de Derecho Civil [ed.], Centenario del Código Civil I, 875, 879; see an array of decisions, inter alia. TS 29 September 1964, RAJ 1964 no. 4097 p. 2522). Furthermore, the remainder of the Civil codes in Europe utilise terminology in their basic norms ("whoever violates" the person who does something; "a person" who causes damage etc.) which serves to spell out that legal persons can constitute both tortfeasors and victims of tortious action (CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC § 420; DUTCH CC art. 6:162; ESTONIAN LOA § 1043; GERMAN CC § 823(1); GREEK CC art. 914; HUNGARIAN CC § 339(1); ITALIAN CC art. 2043; LATVIAN CC art. 1635; LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.263; MALTESE CC art. 1031; POLISH CC art. 415; PORTUGUESE CC art. 483(1) in conjunction with art. 165; SLOVENIAN LOA art. 131(1)). In AUSTRIA, CC § 26 expressly prescribes that natural and legal persons are to be generally placed on an equal footing (see further Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II², 375). The same principle apples in the culpa rule of the NORDIC counties ("whoever .... causes damage", cf. e.g. for SWEDEN HD 18 December 1972, NJA 1972, 589 and HD 3 November 1983, NJA 1983, 701; for FINLAND HD 26 August 1982, HD's årsbok 1982 II 123 and for DENMARK HD 12 October 1949, UfR 1950 p. 21).

40. In the BRITISH ISLES the situation as regards legal persons can vary slightly between incorporated and unincorporated bodies, partnerships and trade unions (see generally Street [-Brazier and Murphy] on Torts[10], 584-588; Winfield and Jolowicz [-Rogers] on Tort[16], 715-719; Salmond and Heuston [-Heuston and Buckley] on the Law of Torts[21], 421-423 for ENGLAND and WALES; McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 1035-1043 for IRELAND; and Stewart, Delict[3], 175-179 for SCOTLAND). Corporations may be sued in tort since medieval times (Case of Sutton's Hospital (1613) 10 Co Rep 1a, 77 ER 937, 960 (10 Co.Rep.)). Liability for tort is usually of a vicarious nature for the acts of servants - legal entities, it is said, cannot have intention per se. However, the general rules of vicarious liability will apply with even the malice of the servant capable of being applied to the corporation (Darling J. in Cornford v. Carlton Bank Ltd. [1899] 1 QB 392, 395). Some acts of the corporation itself can be tortious where the act was authorised by the shareholders of the body (Lord Haldane in Lennard's Carrying Co. Ltd. v. Asiatic Petroleum Co. Ltd. [1915] AC 705, 713, the so-called "directing mind" idea). The notion that an incorporated legal body cannot be liable for acts done ultra vires is a topic of debate. There is no firm case law on the matter. McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 1038 seem to favour IRELAND negating the distinction. This would bring it in line with ENGLAND where Companies Act 1989 s. 108(1) will not call into question the validity of an act on the grounds of capacity. Scholars believe this to be ending the distinction between ultra and intra vires actions (Rogers loc. cit. 716). In SCOTLAND incorporated legal persons may carry liability for acts ultra vires (Houldworth v. City of Glasgow Bank (1880) 7 R 53, as quoted in Stewart, Delict[3], 178). Partnerships can sue and be sued. Members of a club, however, cannot sue their club; this is based upon the idea of the common interest that would equate to suing oneself (Murphy v. Roche (No. 2) [1987] IR 656 (Gannon J.), as quoted in McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. 1039). In SCOTLAND, unincorporated bodies cannot sue in tort unless their patrimonial interests were damaged (Highland Dancing Board v. Alloa Printing Co. 1971 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 50, 52). A trade union can both sue and be sued in its own name (Taff Vale Railway Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants [1901] AC 426; R. (IUDWC) v. Rathmines UDC [1928] IR 260, 300 per Murnaghan J.). Trade unions, however, are generally not liable in tort (ENGLISH Trade Disputes Act 1906 s. 4; IRISH Industrial Relations Act 1990 s. 13(1)). The traditional immunity of the Crown from suit was removed in the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 where the crown is an employer or occupier (see the Occupier's Liability (Scotland) Act 1960 s. 2(1)). In ENGLAND and IRELAND, certain common law torts cannot give a legal person a right to sue in tort, such as assault or battery (although these torts can, of course, give a right of action against a legal person).

41. As far as further more particulars are concerned see the Notes on VI.–3:102 (Negligence) and VI.–3:202 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives).

Illustration 1 is taken from Cass.civ. 15 December 1999, Bull.civ. 1999, I, no. 351 p. 225 = SemJur 2000, I, 241, note Viney; illustration 2 is inspired by CFI Piraeus 1914/2003, DEE 10/2004, 678 and BGH 27 May 1971, BGHZ 56, 228; illustration 11 is adapted from CA Hamm 25 September 2000, r+s 2001, 320; illustration 12 is taken from STJ 22 April 1999, CJ (ST) VII (1999-2) 58.

CHAPTER 2: LEGALLY RELEVANT DAMAGE

Section 1: General

VI.–2:101: Meaning of legally relevant damage

(1) Loss, whether economic or non-economic, or injury is legally relevant damage if:

(a) one of the following rules of this Chapter so provides;

(b) the loss or injury results from a violation of a right otherwise conferred by the law; or

(c) the loss or injury results from a violation of an interest worthy of legal protection.

(2) In any case covered only by sub-paragraphs (b) or (c) of paragraph (1) loss or injury constitutes legally relevant damage only if it would be fair and reasonable for there to be a right to reparation or prevention, as the case may be, under VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) or 1:102 (Prevention).

(3) In considering whether it would be fair and reasonable for there to be a right to reparation or prevention regard is to be had to the ground of accountability, to the nature and proximity of the damage or impending damage, to the reasonable expectations of the person who suffers or would suffer the damage, and to considerations of public policy.

(4) In this Book:

(a) economic loss includes loss of income or profit, burdens incurred and a reduction in the value of property

(b) non-economic loss includes pain and suffering and impairment of the quality of life.

COMMENTS

A. The function of the rule

Three pillars of legally relevant damage. This provision is essential in relation to the Chapters on damage (Chapter 2) and reparation for damage (Chapter 6). Its function, as the wording of paragraph (1) makes evident, is to erect a concept of "legally relevant damage" on three pillars. The first, envisaged in sub-paragraph (a), consists of all those particular forms of damage specifically provided for in the following Articles (of Chapter 2, Section 2). The other two are therefore those which are not specially mentioned in the following Articles. They relate to (i) infringements of rights and (ii) infringements of interests which are worthy of legal protection in terms of non-contractual liability. Beyond paragraph (1)(a), this provision finds application (and only finds application) when and in so far as the relevant legal question is not specifically addressed in the subsequent Articles of the Chapter.

Indications of legally relevant damage. All three 'pillars' of VI.–2:101, which together amount to the comprehensive definition of legally relevant damage, presuppose some grievance which, conceptually, is capable of being recognised as damage which is legally relevant. The function of VI.–2:101 is to indicate what forms of damage are, in given circumstances, legally relevant and so capable of establishing the rights set out in VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) and VI.–1:102 (Prevention). There must at the outset be some type of detrimental effect (see the definition of "damage" in ???Annex 1 – "any type of detrimental effect: it includes loss and injury") but there is no need to define the sub-set of all possible harms, annoyances, disturbances to existing modes of living, or other adverse effects on welfare or future aspirations which, conceptually, may constitute damage. That is because what matters is the coincidence of detriment amounting to 'damage' with the further qualification that the 'damage' be legally relevant. All the necessary work which will eliminate irritations or disruptions for which no remedy is due can be achieved by focusing on the requirement that the damage (if such it is) must also be legally relevant. At the same time, as is done in the definition of "damage" in ???Annex 1, it must be clear that as a matter of principle loss as well as injury may amount to damage. What matters is whether that damage is legally relevant and, unless specific provision is made otherwise, it will be if it satisfies the requirements of VI.–2:101.

Forms of legally relevant damage: loss and injury. Legally relevant damage may take the form of either a loss or an injury as such. The starting point must be that damage presupposes a loss, but, as emerges from the following provisions, that does not constitute an invariable rule. Whether the victim has suffered a damage per se because rights or interests have been violated is as a rule specified by the following provisions (see in particular VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss) and the Comments to that Article). With regard to its own field of application VI.–2:101 does not by itself determine whether injury as such is sufficient or whether it is only consequential losses which amount to damage. Hence a judge who, in an exceptional case, is compelled to fall back on VI.–2:101 must decide that question simply on the basis of that provision. It will only be in very rare cases that a judge will be confronted with that necessity, but it is a possibility which cannot be excluded. A situation in point would be where an athlete is wrongly disqualified from participating in an Olympic games as a result of a drugs test which was carried out incorrectly and the athlete, soon to be past peak physical condition, will never again be in a position to compete in an international event of such calibre. Whether this detriment is to be characterised as an injury and whether a monetary reparation is due must ultimately be decided by a judge by applying paragraphs (2) and (3).

Loss includes non-economic loss. A loss may be either of an economic or of a non-economic nature, see paragraph (4). As a basic rule both forms of loss are in principle compensatable. Precisely which losses constitute non-economic losses, however, is not conclusively stated by the draft – in keeping with the tradition of most of the national legal systems. The multitude of possibilities life assumes and the variety of circumstances which must necessarily be weighed up in the balance are much too numerous and diverse to be encapsulated in an exhaustive definition. Paragraph (4)(b) confines itself to declaring that "non-economic loss includes pain and suffering and impairment of the quality of life". On the other hand, the text of the Article puts beyond doubt the proposition that legal persons (and not just natural persons) are capable of sustaining non-economic loss and demanding reparation on that account.

Interests without a market value. An economic loss is characterised by the fact that the harmed interest has a market value which can be assessed according to the economic rules of the market. Damage which is not economic in nature (such as bodily pain) can only be given a monetary equivalent by judicial decision. The same holds for injuries as such (as in the case of loss of a limb).

Quantum of loss. VI.–2:101 has the sole purpose of setting out the circumstances in which damage relevant to the law on non-contractual liability can be said to be recognisably present.

On the other hand, the quantum of the loss, leaving aside for a moment the de minimis rule in VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule), is without significance for the question whether a legally relevant damage is present. It becomes relevant only in the matter of determining appropriate reparation, not least in determining what if any sum the liable person should pay by way of compensation.

B. The flexibility of the rule

Multiformity of life. The residual, flexible provision governing 'legally relevant damage' not specifically enumerated in Section 2, which constitutes the bulk of the subject-matter for VI.–2:101, is required not merely because it is impossible to capture the multiformity of life within a set of rules without employing some such open-ended clause for matters which the legislator cannot foresee. It is also indispensable for two further reasons.

Constitutional issues. The first is that there are some legal issues whose resolution and further development are best left by a European legal text to the courts, especially when regard is had to constitutional peculiarities in the individual jurisdictions (see also in this context VI.–7:101 (National constitutional laws)). An example is provided by the question whether and in what circumstances a parent's obligation to maintain a child, which both parents, or at any rate one of them, did not want, constitutes damage recognised by the law on non-contractual liability. Another is whether a child, whose predisposition to some abnormality has been overlooked by the gynaecologist, can demand reparation on the ground that he or she would have been aborted. A third example is provided by the question of so-called post-mortem protection of a right of personality which is unknown in some legal systems (e.g. no defamation after death in the Common Law) and granted in others with the justification that it follows from the constitutional basic value of protection of human dignity. A fourth example is the question whether legal persons too enjoy a right of personality derived from basic norms (i.e. whether a legal person has a "reputation" or "dignity") and, if so, how far its protection extends. In so far as an interest is recognised by the European Convention on Human Rights as a basic right in relations between state and citizen, that value judgement at any rate must be fed directly into the application of VI.–2:101 for the purposes of ascertaining legally relevant damage within the meaning of the law on non-contractual liability.

Underlying issues not yet harmonised. The second reason is that a European law on non-contractual liability can only pave a course for itself in many marginal areas step by step. An example is provided by the infringement of so-called "subjective" rights which enjoy protection against everybody and which are therefore often called "absolute" rights. That loss consequential to the infringement of such a right constitutes damage in a case where this results from negligence is generally accepted; it is thus possible for a European law on non-contractual liability to articulate this rule. By contrast, it is not possible for a European law on non-contractual liability by itself to harmonise the underlying issue (on which non-contractual liability for infringement would be parasitic) of whether or not such a subjective right exists. One thinks here, for example, of the so-called right to a name: whether there is such a right must in the end be decided by the relevant law of persons and as long as that is not harmonised there can be no harmonised law on non-contractual liability in relation to the infringement of a right to a name. It also follows that a uniform text on the law on non-contractual liability may still lead to divergent solutions in particular areas. That is neither avoidable nor unusual in European law-making, nor exactly a particularity of the element of damage in the non-contractual liability system. A comparable phenomenon also exists, for example, in relation to negligence committed by breach of a statutory duty because statutory duties may have different content not merely from country to country, but also nowadays from place to place. Another example from the sphere of infringement of rights is the so-called right to one's own image and the right to one's own voice. Reference in this context to the constitutionally based protection of rights of personality are obvious.

C. Violation of a right otherwise conferred by the law (paragraph (1)(b))

Scope of application. As is immediately apparent from paragraph (1)(a) and as we have already explained (see supra Comments B under VI.–1:101 (Basic rule)), it is only possible to have recourse to paragraph (1)(b) if there is no exhaustive regime for the case provided for in the following Articles of this Chapter.

Illustration 1
A is a member of an association of professionally active surveyors who are engaged to value land in connection with sale negotiations and applications for credit from banks. A's criticism, from a professional standpoint, of the association's board has placed him in dispute with that board. His membership is terminated as a result on a specious pretext and his name therefore ceases to appear on the publicised list of members. A suffers a substantial reduction in professional engagements. Since there is no legally relevant damage within the meaning of VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business), the judge must fall back on VI.–2:101(1)(b) to reach the result that A's membership right has been infringed and the loss of income caused in this way constitutes a legally relevant damage. Even if the judge should find that under the applicable law membership of the association does not constitute a "right" which operates erga omnes the judge will nonetheless have to decide on the basis of paragraph (1)(c) in A's favour. That is because an interest worthy of legal protection has been infringed in any event.

Illustration 2
W and H are obtaining a divorce. Custody of their child is granted to W; H has only contact rights. H is unable to accept this outcome and abducts the child. W has to engage a private detective to help find the child. The cost of doing so is a legally relevant consequential damage arising out of the infringement of a right (the right to custody or the right to provide parental care, however it may be described in the applicable family law) for which the following rules make no special provision.

Illustration 3
A damages a car which B has bought from C subject to reservation of title, the instalments of the purchase price remaining fully unpaid. VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) is relevant not merely to the liability to C, but also to the liability in relation to B. There is no cause to resort to VI.–2:101(1)(b) because B too had a property right in respect of the car either in the form of a protected right of prospective ownership (cf. Anwartschaftsrecht) or based on his right of lawful possession, depending on the applicable law of property. The situation is no different if A crashes his car into B's house which is subject to a mortgage in favour of a bank. The bank's property right is damaged. However, the questions of who in such a case may demand reparation, in what measure and to whom it must be rendered belong, from a systematic point of view, in the Chapter on remedies (Chapter 6) and not in the Chapter on damage (Chapter 2). See further VI.–6:104 (Multiple injured persons).

Rights and interests worthy of legal protection. The Article distinguishes in paragraph (1) sub-paragraphs (b) and (c) between infringement of rights and injury to interests which are worthy of legal protection. For both of these alternatives the limitations and particularisations contained in paragraphs (2) and (3) apply. For that reason the practical significance of the distinction between "rights" and "interests which are worthy of legal protection" is not especially great. It has little significance because, as indicated already, the legal penumbra of the law on non-contractual liability is not yet harmonised and therefore the European legal systems may have completely diverse perceptions of what qualifies as a "right" and what is merely an "interest worthy of legal protection". The distinction is therefore perpetuated here primarily because the concept of infringement of a right is a familiar one in many (though by no means all) European jurisdictions. A secondary consideration is that in this way a certain gradation can be reached: a judge will be relatively more cautious in affirming a legally relevant damage if only sub-paragraph (c) presents itself for that purpose. It is, however, important that the concern here is with rights and interests which enjoy protection against all comers and which therefore are generally capable of being infringed by anyone. A mere contractual interest in some performance, for example, is excluded from the scope of application of VI.–2:101 for this reason alone.

Rights otherwise conferred by the law. As regards the rights referred to in sub-paragraph (b), we are concerned here with rights which have already been assigned to the claimant by other parts of the legal system with the purpose that the claimant may resist their infringement. To the extent that a national legal system recognises the concept of "absolute" rights, all of the rights so qualified by it will constitute "rights otherwise conferred by the law" within the meaning of paragraph (1)(b). Moreover, these rights need not be rights within private law. A right to vote in an election, for example, is a "right" within the meaning of paragraph (1): it is a potential basis of non-contractual liability for one person to intentionally obstruct another from casting a vote in a public election. The same holds for the right not to be discriminated against on the grounds of sex or ethnic or racial origin by hoteliers, banks and others trading openly with the public. In cases of the latter type, though, there will often be an infringement of the right to respect for personal dignity, given specific expression in VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy). (See also II.–2:101 (Right not to be discriminated against) and II.–2:104 (Remedies).)

Purely contractual rights are, as a rule, excluded. On the other hand, purely personal "bilateral" rights, such as, for example, claims arising from a contract against the other contractual partner, are, as a rule, excluded. One exception to this is set out in VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of breach of obligation). As regards the relationship between the law on non-contractual liability and the law of contract see further VI.–1:103 (Scope of application) and the Comments on that Article.

D. Violation of an interest worthy of legal protection (paragraph (1)(c))

Significance of the provision. Paragraph (c) gives expression to the principle mentioned earlier that the law on non-contractual liability is not an ancillary area of the law in the sense that it can only grant legal protection where the claimant is adversely affected in a legal position whose worthiness for legal protection is already immediately ascertainable from the other provisions of the legal system. Rather, the law on non-contractual liability also determines autonomously what detriments in this context qualify as legally relevant damage.

Illustration 4

A, a married man, is severely ill with cancer and must contemplate his demise in the near future. The married couple would still like to have a child and A provides sperm which is deep-frozen pending a later in vitro fertilisation. A technician in the laboratory where the sperm is stored destroys it when she confuses test tubes. It would be difficult to argue that this is a case of personal injury within the meaning of VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss), nor can the matter be subsumed without force under VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy). An interest worthy of legal protection has been violated.

Responsibility of the courts for the development of the law on non-contractual liability. Sub-paragraph (c) in paragraph (1) effects the basic rule that legally relevant damage is also present where an interest is violated which is worthy of protection by the law on non-contractual liability. In view of the multifarious forms life takes, such an "open" clause is indispensable and, moreover, present in most of the European legal systems. Furthermore, the provision also consciously makes space for the further development of the law on non-contractual liability by judges. It also avoids setting down in legislated form certain developments and concepts which are presently still in a state of flux. An example of the latter is liability for the loss of a chance. The problem is not merely best addressed at various points within the system of liability law; from a contemporary perspective it can also be said that the task of finding a solution is best delegated to the courts. Paragraphs (2) and (3) provide them only with certain guidelines.

E. Paragraphs (2) and (3)

Application to rights and interests worthy of legal protection. According to paragraph (2) a legally relevant damage only exists in cases of violation of a right or an interest if it is fair and reasonable to grant the claimant a right to reparation or prevention under VI.–1:101 (Basic rule) or VI.–1:102 (Prevention). Paragraphs (2) and (3) will have their main field of application within the framework of paragraph (1)(c), but they are not restricted to that. They also apply in cases of infringement of rights. In those cases too a weighing-up of interests cannot be entirely avoided. That is evident when one looks, among others, to the case already mentioned of an infringement of a right to a name: such conduct triggers liability (if at all) only when it is perpetrated in certain ways. More particularly, it may turn out that only preventative legal protection and not a right to reparation comes into question because while a legally relevant damage is present it does not also constitute a 'reparable' damage.

Illustration 5

On a poster are a number of far-right political slogans including the assertion that the genocide of millions of Jews in the Nazi concentration camps is a Zionist conspiracy. The sole surviving descendant of a man murdered in Auschwitz may demand on the basis of his ancestor's post-mortem right of personality (so far as such a right is recognised by the applicable legal system) that the objectionable poster be taken down. A claim for reparation of non-economic loss may be dismissed by the judge on the basis of paragraph (2).

The balancing process in ascertaining an interest worthy of legal protection. The text in paragraphs (2) and (3) equips the judge who must decide whether an interest worthy of protection by the law on non-contractual liability has been infringed with several hints. An essential factor in this decision is the remedies side of the liability equation: the legal protection which is sought must be fair and reasonable (paragraph (2)) and the decision on that point depends inter alia on whether the case presented is one of intentionally inflicting damage, negligence or strict liability (paragraph (3)). Since the connection between a given form of strict liability and legally relevant damage is set out in most of the provisions of Chapter 3, Section 2 (Accountability without intention or negligence), paragraph (3) in fact only has practical significance for vicarious liability under VI.–3:201 (Accountability for damage caused by employees and representatives). Apart from VI.–3:207 (Other accountability for the causation of legally relevant damage), none of these Articles uses the term "legally relevant damage", and in the context of VI.–3:207 the term is left to be fleshed out by national law. VI.–2:101(2) and (3), however, can have a role to play in the context of VI.–3:103 (Persons under eighteen) or VI.–3:104 (Accountability for damage caused by children or supervised persons).

The ground of accountability. The question whether a defined detriment constitutes a legally relevant damage often depends on the nature of the conduct which has caused the damage – in particular whether the injuring person has acted intentionally or merely negligently. For example, there is a legally relevant damage only in cases of intentionally inducing non-performance of a contractual obligation (see VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of non-performance of obligation)); a merely negligent enticement not to perform cannot create liability for want of a corresponding obligation not to interfere in that way and therefore consequently because there is no damage. Intentionally permitting the continuation of a detriment suffered by another may also signify in given circumstances an independent damage in the legal sense. An example would be when, without any want of care, someone has communicated incorrect information about another and they intentionally and with a view to causing damage leave the affected individual 'in the lurch' instead of making an appropriate correction without undue delay, although subsequently informed of the inaccuracy and despite such correction being possible. This type of damage may assume a more specific form where it amounts to infringement of a natural person's right to respect for personal dignity (VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy)).

> Illustration 6
> Through his careless failure to maintain a safe distance between his vehicle and the car in front, A causes a traffic accident, which in turn leads to a traffic jam. A commercial agent (H) is caught up in the queue of traffic and misses a business appointment, in consequence of which she suffers a loss of income. Neither an infringement of a right of the commercial agent nor the violation of a legally protected interest comes into play. Such types of obstacles are part and parcel of the everyday risks of life. The situation would be different, however, if A had caused the accident in order to hold up his competitor H. In that case H would suffer a legally relevant damage.

Nature of the damage. Moreover, the type of detriment suffered and the considerations involved in causation play a role. (In illustration 6, for example, it would make no difference if one argued that legally relevant damage is present but A did not cause H's loss.) There is a whole series of detriments which one has to accept without reparation even where it cannot be said that they are trivial within the meaning of VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule). An example expressly catered for in the following provisions is to be found in VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss) paragraph (2)(b) ("personal injury includes injury to mental health only if it amounts to a medical condition"). Of course, the nature of the damage suffered also plays a substantial role besides this. There are interests, for example, which are in essence only assigned to the commonalty as a whole and therefore are not capable of constituting a legally relevant damage in relation to any particular individual. An example would be the loss of quality of life which is inflicted on residents in a given region because as a result of an industrial accident they are no longer able to enjoy the spectacle of particular wildlife, be it animals or plants, affected by the pollution (see VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment)).

Damage suffered in business competition. In a free market, which thrives on competition, market participants are not merely not allowed to seek to squeeze the market shares of their competitors by improper means. It would amount to a prohibited cartel to come to an agreement with competitors not to enter into competition with one another (or, to formulate it another way, not to inflict damage on one another). Loss suffered in fair competition is thus not legally relevant damage. Consequently, whether damage in the legal sense is present may depend solely on the internal viewpoint of the injuring person. For example, a person who resells goods below their purchase price is usually just making bad bargains which harm only that person's own economic interests; but someone who undertakes the same activity with the purpose of driving competitors out of the market causes them legally relevant damage. It remains a pre-condition, of course, that the competitor is not engaged in an illegal market. The 'business activity' of a pimp or a heroin dealer does not inflict legally relevant damage on rival criminals in the same sordid trade.

Proximity of damage. Also inextricably interwoven with one another on occasions are the concept of legally relevant damage and considerations of causation. That inheres in the nature of the matter and affects the entire perspective. If, for example a partner in an association of tax advisers breaches a (contractual or statutory) prohibition on competition in relation to the fellow partners and subsequently the turnover in the partnership falls off, but as part of an economic cycle and not due to the breach of the prohibition, then there is not merely a lack of causation: there is also no legally relevant damage. The situation would be no different if a doctor makes a false diagnosis, but that has no adverse effects because the progress of the illness could not have been resisted to better effect if the correct diagnosis had been made (e.g. because the treatment would have been the same, or because the treatment rendered did not exacerbate the real illness and it was in any case, at the time of the false diagnosis, too late to render an effective treatment). In cases of this type it is of course traditional for liability of the doctor to be rejected on the basis of a want of causation rather than the absence of a breach of duty or of damage and these basic rules do not alter anything in that regard. The example does, however, demonstrate how closely related these elements are since there is generally no duty to assist someone who cannot be helped and equally someone who is succumbing to such an illness is not suffering any damage which (from a liability viewpoint) is legally relevant.

> Illustration 7
> Equally, there is no legally relevant damage suffered when a person organises a concert with a particular singer about whose private life a newspaper has published incorrect information, so that the audience for the event is smaller than under normal circumstances. That is a risk which every organiser of an event must suffer; the damage is too remote and consequently not legally relevant in terms of liability. However, the singer herself suffers a legally relevant damage if her fee has been fixed by a formula based on turnover (VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another)).

Reasonable expectations on the part of the injured person. A further factor is the reasonable expectation of the injured person. The concept mentioned earlier of liability for a lost chance – in particular the lost chance of being healed (though the point is not confined to this) – demonstrates this and is related to this consideration. At the same time it reiterates the point with clarity that ascertaining the existence of damage is often inseparably linked to the remedy which would be available for its reparation. It would be just as inequitable and unjust in those 'loss of a chance' cases to award compensation for 100% as it would be to award nothing at all. It is therefore not possible merely to state that a damage tows along a claim to reparation in its wake. Rather the position is that a legally relevant damage is only present so far and to the extent that the legal system is prepared to furnish the injured person with legal redress.

Considerations of public policy. Judgments of value concerning public welfare and the internal balance of the system of private law also play a role in ascertaining whether or not one is faced with a case of legally relevant damage. The mere non-performance of a contractual obligation (delayed performance, supply of defective goods, failure to transfer a promised debt, etc.) does not amount to a non-contractual liability because the legal system contains its own preferential regime for these cases; it would be superfluous if one proceeded from the converse principle that every non-performance of a contractual obligation constitutes at the same time a non-contractual liability. However, other considerations of public policy also play a not insubstantial role. If someone is so bodily disfigured as a result of an accident that his spouse cannot endure life with him and they divorce, then ultimately only the answer to the question what stresses and strains a marriage can be expected to 'endure', according to contemporary views, is capable of resolving the question whether the economic and non-economic adverse consequences of the divorce amount to a legally relevant damage suffered by the immediate victim of the accident and his partner. It is precisely the same if the marriage breaks down because as a result of the accident the injured person has lost the capacity for sexual intercourse (that damage as such making out, of course, a legally relevant damage in accord with VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss)). If the marriage remains intact on the other hand, then the uninjured spouse suffers a legally relevant damage since he or she is adversely affected in respect of an interest worthy of legal protection. Someone who only stands in a loose relationship to the injured person, however, does not suffer a legally relevant damage. In that latter situation there is merely an insubstantial reflected damage. Considerations of public policy, however, can also play a crucial role in a multitude of other cases.

> Illustration 8
> If he had given the factual and legal position even a halfway careful examination, A would have had to accept that his legal action against B could have no realistic prospect of success. The proceedings are dismissed with costs. As a result of having to attend to the legal proceedings, B has had to sacrifice time which he would otherwise have devoted to his (thereby partially neglected) business affairs. A legally protected interest of B is not affected. Were the case otherwise, A's right to unimpeded access to the courts would not be assured.

F. Paragraph (4)

General. Paragraph (4) serves to make clear that the expression "economic loss" includes "loss of income or profit, burdens incurred and a reduction in the value of property" and that the expression "non-economic loss" "includes pain and suffering and impairment of the quality of life". (The paragraph also serves to avoid unnecessary repetitions of these propositions in the following Articles.) As the use of "includes" indicates, these are not exhaustive definitions or closed lists. Mention is made only of the most important of the forms which these types of loss may assume. The provision makes no statement about the manner in which the obligation to make reparation is to be discharged or a compensatory monetary sum is to be assessed. Those questions are the province of Chapter 6 (Remedies) and, in part, Chapter 7 (Ancillary rules).

Significance of the distinction between economic and non-economic loss. Paragraphs (1) and (4) together minimise the significance of the (occasionally less than straightforward) distinction between economic and non-economic loss. Hence, for example, it is of merely academic interest whether (and if so, to what extent) the form of damage referred to in VI.–2:206 (Deprivation of the use of property) paragraph (2)(a) is a species of economic loss or of non-economic loss. In conformity with the general approach, here as in other instances both types of damage are reparable. A basic rule of the type to be found in some legal systems in Europe to the effect that non-economic damage does not generally support an entitlement to reparation and is only (exceptionally) reparable if statute expressly so provides is not a feature of these rules. Indeed some of these rules expressly apply solely to non-economic loss. By contrast, VI.–2:209 (Burdens incurred by the state upon environmental impairment) refers only to "burdens" incurred by the State. That expression leaves no room for the contention that in such cases the State might assert a claim to recover for non-economic loss.

Economic loss. The existence of an economic loss is usually not difficult to determine. In the main this is determined by a comparison of the current economic position of the claimant (status quo) with that prevailing immediately before the allegedly damaging incident occurred (status quo ante) and ascertainment of a negative net balance. The economic loss is the difference between these two sums. This method of determining economic loss is of course particularly transparent in the case of a reduction in value of the victim's property.

Increase in debts. An economic loss is also present, however, if the victim has damaged property repaired or if, following an injury to body or health, undergoes medical treatment. The economic loss in such cases consists of the increase in debts or outgoings which the victim has sustained in incurring an obligation to pay whoever was engaged to help eradicate or ameliorate the legally relevant damage. There are thus "burdens incurred" by the victim. For the case where an inanimate thing is so severely damaged that the costs of its repair would exceed the market value it possessed before it was damaged (an economic "write-off") VI.–6:101(3) (Aim and forms of reparation) provides a special regime.

Loss of income. A genuine 'balance sheet' comparison is an inadequate or impossible mechanism as regards the loss of rights which will only arise in the future, that is to say, rights which have not arisen in the interval between the damage causing event and its evaluation by the parties, insurers or the courts and which will only arise after this point in time. In accordance with all European legal systems, this Book expressly provides that a (future) loss of income or profit constitutes a reparable damage.

Other forms of economic damage. As already stated, however, the text does not exclude reparation for other forms of economic loss.

> Illustration 9
> A wife and mother (M) is so severely injured in a road accident that for a considerable period of time she is no longer able to provide domestic services in the family home. If M engages a home help, the latter's wages, due from M, constitute for M an economic loss. Moreover, even if a home help is not engaged and the family decides to struggle through the difficult situation without outside assistance, there is still an economic loss. There is admittedly no "loss of income" because M was not remunerated for her domestic activity. Nonetheless M's housekeeping has an economic value and its cessation constitutes a loss to M for which compensation is due. This result is compatible with the rule in VI.–6:201 (Injured person's right of election) whereby the injured person can choose what to do with the compensation due.

Non-economic loss. Paragraph (4) lists in sub-paragraph (b) the most important forms of non-economic loss: pain and suffering and the impairment of the quality of life. These forms are, however, mere examples. Quite what other forms of impairment of emotional well-being constitute reparable loss must be decided by the courts. In doing so regard must be had in particular to VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule). Negative emotional responses such as annoyance, anger, disgust and repulsion which lie within the spectrum of normal, everyday feelings cannot suffice according to that provision. If the person concerned was driven to fear for his or her life, on the other hand, then a non-economic loss has been suffered for which reparation would be recoverable if all the other elements of the non-contractual claim are made out.

Pain and suffering. Bodily pain and bodily suffering constitute the most obvious forms of non-economic loss. They are capable of being ascertained and evaluated relatively easily.

Impairment of the quality of life. Injuries to body and health can of course generate more than an immediate pain; there may be significant long-term reductions in the victim's quality of life as a consequence – for example, if the injured person is confined for the rest of his or her life to a wheel chair and is thus prevented from pursuing a favourite hobby, such as football. Such reductions in the quality of life may, however, have other causes. Typical examples are provided by infringements of incorporeal rights of personality (among others, incursions into spheres of privacy; derogatory statements which have as a consequence a negative impact on the social profile of the person concerned). Moreover, infringements of the right of free movement – imprisonment as such – also constitute a non-economic loss. The same is true for a spouse who himself or herself has not sustained any direct injury, but is compelled to accept a vacuous sexual life because his or her partner is no longer capable of sexual intercourse as a result of an accident.

Bereavement. Impairment of the quality of life relates to the objective loss of real possibilities for making the most of one's life. There is, however, a host of situations in which, objectively considered, such possibilities still exist, but subjectively their availability is no longer capable of being recognised. This too can constitute a non-economic loss. Bereavement following the loss of a close relative – more precisely, suffering as a result of the sudden emptiness in the life of the person left behind – constitutes a non-economic damage, even if this is neither an impairment of the quality of life nor pain and suffering in the narrow sense expressed in the Article. Bereavement relates to the consequences of an awareness that an impairment of the quality of life has arisen. It is a matter of self-limitation in the exploitation of life's opportunities due to the condition of mourning. Although, for example, a widow may have taken part in various social events and activities independent of her husband during his life, her mourning may induce her to pass up on these opportunities for social interaction as she becomes depressed and cuts herself off from society.

Other cases. Similar in structure are cases in which a woman loses her emotional capacity to establish an intimate relationship with a man as a result of suffering a sexual assault, or where a man's self-esteem is dramatically reduced because an accident has rendered him impotent. Furthermore, people suffer a non-economic loss if, as a result of the damage-causing event, they are forced to make a fundamental change in their chosen mode of living. That remains the case irrespective of whether an impartial third party might regard the newly adopted mode of living as qualitatively better.

Overlaps. It was considered undesirable to particularise pain suffered and loss of amenity in the text of the Article more precisely. Since these are non-economic damages, their assessment (and later quantification in a compensatory monetary equivalent) is necessarily a process involving a wide range of possible value judgements. There are also many cases in which a given detriment suffered by the injured person might be categorised as either pain or loss of amenity, not least because the constant suffering of pain is in itself the loss of the amenity to enjoy a pain-free life. For such reasons it would be better to leave any necessary subordinate refinement to the courts.

NOTES

I. The notion of damage

1. To date, the notion of "legally relevant damage" does not feature in any European Civil Code. However, it would not be far off the mark to state that ITALIAN law comes relatively close. According to Italian legal conceptions, which in their exact particulars do not, of course, remain free of controversy, the concept of damage anchored in CC art. 2043 has two limbs. Danno constitutes danno ingiusto, i.e. the breach of a legally protected interest (Cass.sez.un. 22 July 1999, no. 500, Foro it. 1999, I, 2487, 3201); danno also pertains to the content of the obligation to make reparation (Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[3], 12-13). In respect of the damage that is recoverable, a distinction is drawn between pecuniary and non-pecuniary loss.

2. FRENCH law adopts a similarly wide concept of damage. Every breach of a person's material or non-material interests constitutes damage, this also includes bodily integrity as such (Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations[9], no. 409 p. 413). The concept of damage in BELGIUM has similar connotations, namely it is paraphrased as representating loss of an economic or non economic nature (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 344). The FRENCH courts require that the damage must be direct and certain (direct et certain), whereupon "certain" incorporates the element of actualité which previously was the subject of separate examination (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[9], no. 136 pp. 124-125). Furthermore, future loss can also be certain, namely in the event where cogent grounds are extant which serve to indicate that the damage will occur (for an in-depth analysis see Cass.req. 1 June 1932, S. 1933, I, 49, note H. Mazeaud). In academic teaching, the requirement of "directness" is regarded as an element of the rule on causation (Flour/Aubert/Savaux loc. cit.; Malaurie and Aynès, Responsabilité délictuelle[11], no. 241 p. 138). A contrasting approach to that prevailing under contract law is adopted, given that unforseeable damage is also recoverable (Malaurie and Aynès loc. cit.). A number of legal commentators, relying on CCP art. 31, have additionally required that the damage should exhibit a caractère légitime (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[8], no. 704-706 pp. 684-686), however this requisite appears to have been divested of any practical importance (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], nos. 271-273 pp. 59-62). The concepts of dommage and préjudice are usually regarded as synonyms (Pradel, Le préjudice dans le droit civil de la responsabilité, no. 15 pp. 10-12).

3. Similarly in BELGIUM, the damage must be "certain" whereby, once again, future loss can fulfil this prerequisite of certainty. Damage can only be recovered if the plaintiff has personally suffered damage and had a legitimate interest in the loss of chance of obtaining an advantage (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 344-350; Ronse and others, Schade en schadeloosstelling I[2], no. 225 pp. 169-170). The predominant view in legal circles is that breach of the obligation générale de prudence merely amounts to a faute if the damage was forseeable in the given circumstances (Dalcq and Schamps, RCJB 1995, no. 6 pp. 536-537). In both countries, no distinction is drawn between the notion of damage which pertains to liability for faute and the concept of damage utilised in founding liability du fait du chose or du fait d'autrui (Viney and Jourdain loc. cit. no. 246 p. 1).

4. Similarly in SPAIN, there has been no attempt to place a definition of daño on a statutory footing. Academic literature has defined it in terms of a material or non-material damage which has been suffered by someone in the course of an event for which the other party is liable. There is an ongoing dispute as to whether harm which is not caused by a tortiously relevant act can amount to damage (cf. Santos Briz, La responsabilidad civil I[7], 146 and Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 67). The binomial daños y perjuicios frequently crops up in the Código Civil (e.g. in CC arts. 1101, 1106, 1107, 1108), however these concepts are "uncoupled" in the sphere of tort law (CC arts. 1902 ff). There is a tendancy in academic writing to equate daños with direct damage and perjuicios with indirect damage i.e. the damage that does not appear in the damaged thing itself but involves damage that subsequently manifests in the injured party's patrimony. Permanent damage is also included within this rubric (Santos Briz loc. cit. 150). However, the Civil Code for the most part uses the concepts of daños and perjuicios as synonyms. Mere interferences do not amount to damage (TS 19 February 1962, RAJ 1962 (1) no. 714 p. 458), unless their intensity requires them to be thus qualifed (Santos Briz loc. cit. 151). Incidentially, it is also a requisite of Spanish law that the damage be "certain"

5. Under HUNGARIAN Law, damage is understood to encompass all personal injury and damage to property which is sustained as a result of the act of another. The three types of economic loss (Damage to property, loss of profit and costs associated with rectifying the damage) are differentiated from the fourth manifestation of damage, namely non-economic loss (Petrik [-Köles], Polgári jog Kommentár a gyakorlat számára II, 630; Gellért [-Kemenes], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata I, 1228-1229; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata I, 1327-1328; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 59-60). According to SLOVENIAN LOA art. 132 "damage comprises the diminuation of property (ordinary damage), prevention of the appreciation of property (lost profits), the infliction of physical or mental distress or fear on another person, and encroachment upon the reputation of a legal person". In POLAND damage (szkoda) is usually defined as any detriment to the legally protected interests of another (Dybowski, System prawa cywilnego III(1), 214-215; Czachórski, Zobowiązania[9], 99; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 88-89). Both the courts and the majority of academics adopt the view that the notion of damage embraces both economic and non-economic detriment (Dybowski loc. cit. 223-224; Czachórski loc. cit. 100; Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 89-90). Non-economic damage is partly subject to special rules and within the scope of these rules is designated as krzywda (CC arts. 445 § 1, 448). Some of the provisions of CC distinguish between personal injury and damage to property (arts. 417^2, 435, 444, 449^7 § 1). The former denotes non-economic as well as economic loss (e.g. lost earning capacity) resulting from an infrigement of a right of personality, the latter economic loss resulting from the infringement of a property right (Czachórski loc. cit. 100; Radwański and Olejniczak loc. cit. 90).

6. The GERMAN Civil Code differentiates between the infringement of a right or a protected legal interest and "the damage arising from therefrom [i.e. the breach]" under CC § 823(1). Pursuant to this provision, the damage results from the breach of a right or, in the event that CC § 823(2) is applicable, springs from the infringment of a legally protected interest. The notion of damage crops up frequently in the BGB, however, this concept is nowhere defined. It is generally understood to mean every involuntary interference with an interest capable of being valued in economic terms or also interference with a purely non-material interest (cf. CC § 253) (MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[4], § 249, no. 16). The particulars are, however, diffuse. The point of departure for determining the ambit of material damage is the socalled Differenzhypothese (an arithemical concept of damages, "by way of calculating the difference")(cf. CC § 249) which can be attributed to Mommsen. This theory sets forth that recoverable pecuniary damage amounts to the difference between the injured party's current financial position and the hypothetical position that which would have existed had the harmful event establishing the obligation to make reparation not occurred (Bamberger and Roth [-Grüneberg], BGB, Pref. to § 249, no. 9; Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[64], Pref. to § 249, nos. 8 f; BGH 31 May 1994, NJW 1994, 2357, 2359; BGH 10 December 1986, BGHZ 99, 182, 196). A particular manifestation of the Differenzhypothese can be seen in the principle of prohibition of enrichment (according to the judgment of the BGH 4 June 1992, BGHZ 118, 312, 338 this is understood as constituting a component of the German ordre public). Its objective is to forestall the possibility that the injured party would be placed in a better position than that which was extant prior to occurrence of the damage (MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[4], § 249, no. 20). However, in a number of categories of cases, the differential between the post tort and hypothetical "no-tort" positions is adjusted that is undergone adjusted at a normative level (Kommerzialisierungsgedanke (notion of commercialization), normative concept of damage), reflecting the idea that the pleasure or convenience of using of a thing has an independent economic value so that the loss of the pleasure or convenience of using the thing constitutes economic harm) (Heinrichs loc. cit. nos. 14, 10, 13). Occasionally, an additional lingustic distinction is drawn between "direct" and "consequential" damage. Direct damage embraces damage having a detrimental effect on an object or on a person, consequential damage concerns the other losses incurred as a result of the damaging event, especially loss of profits (CC § 252) and, as far as objects are concerned, pertains to liability for the loss of use (Heinrichs loc. cit. no. 15).

7. According to AUSTRIAN CC § 1293 first sentence damage, Schade pertains to any harm caused to a person's property, rights or person. This broad notion of damage embraces both socalled "real" damage as well as "calculable" damage. According to academic commentary, real damage connotes an actual alteration in the property, in the rights or the person of the injured party (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 2/2). The concept of real damage is primarily of significance where the wrongdoer must make restitution in kind (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 285). Whether "harm to rights" (CC § 1293 Satz 1) is ascribed a stand-alone significance is unclear (Koziol loc. cit. no. 2/3; Kramer, ÖJZ 1972, 90, 92). Pursuant to CC § 1293 2nd sentence a distinction is drawn between "real damage" and loss of profits which should result in the ordinary course of events. The latter is only recoverable where the degree of fault is substantial (CC § 1324). The notion of damage in the Austrian CC embraces every circumstance which can be conceived as a legal detriment. Every diminishment of assets and every increase of liabilities which cannot be offset (for which there is no counterbalance?) represents a loss (OGH 11 March 1993, SZ 66/31).

8. In GREECE, a distinction is drawn between the notion of damage understood in its "broad" sense and a "narrow" conception of damage. In academic literature, the broad notion of damage is conceived as involving every interference with a person's material or non- pecuniary goods, i.e. every unfavourable change in these goods (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], arts. 297-298, no. 9; Balis, Enochikon Dikaion Geniko meros, 86; Georgiades Ast., Enochiko Dikaio I, 120). The narrow definition of damage is regarded as encompassing only material damage, i.e. every loss/injury that financially impacts on the injured party (Stathopoulos loc. cit. art. 299, no. 1). Additionally, in academic teaching, a differentiation is made between the socalled direct and consequential damage. Direct damage denotes damage that is occurs to interests worthy of legal protection as a result of the injury. Frequently, this direct damage impinges upon the injured party's entire property (e.g. loss of earnings consequent upon personal injury). Consequential damage is postulated by this set of cases (Stathopoulos loc. cit. arts. 297-298, no. 44).

9. Similarly, the PORTUGUESE CC does not contain a definition of the notion of dano. Pursuant to CC art. 483(1) a distinction is drawn between the breach of a right or breach of a legal provison which is geared towards protecting third party interests and "the damage that arises out of the infringement". Only loss which the claimant would probably not have sustained but for the injury is recoverable (CC art. 563). It is stated in academic commentary that every material, spirtual or moral loss which accrues to a a legally protected interest amounts to damage (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 542; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 598); other commentators paraphrase damage in terms of frustração de uma utilidade que era objecto de tutela jurídica (the "frustration" of a legally protected "utility": Menezes Leitão, Obrigações I[3], 334). For the most part, a distinction is drawn between financial (dano patrimonial) and non economic loss (dano não-patrimonial), occassionally between, on the one hand, the dano real and on the other, the dano patrimonial or dano de cálculo. The socalled actual damage correlates with the principle of restitutio in integrum (CC art. 562: restoration of status quo ante), the calculable damage corresponds to the compensation received on the basis of a comparasion between the current financial position of the injured party with that which would have existed had the tort not been committed (CC art. 566). Pursuant to CC art. 564(1) both the danos emergentes and the loss of profits (benefícios or. lucros cessantes) are recoverable heads of damage. According to CC art. 564(2), damage includes both present loss and loss expected in the future. According to this statutory provision, a court is permitted to consider future damage in the assessement of the award of monetary compensation provided that the damage can determined according to the criterion of forseeability; if this is not the case, the estimation of the loss must be resolved at a later stage, cf. also CCP art. 661(2).

10. According to DUTCH Law 'damage' (schade) is understood as encompassing any actual detriment caused by a breach of contract or tortious act; further, according to the prevalent view in legal writing, it is submitted that, also within the framework of CC arts. 6:74 and 6:162, the notion of damage should not be ascribed a meaning which is at variance to that used in common parlance (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 409 p. 327). A scratch on the paintwork of a car merely represents the (actual) damage (beschadiging); the car's dimuntion in value as a result of the scratch signifies the schade (Hartkamp loc. cit.). There have been numerous attempts made at formulating a general definition of damage in Dutch legal literature. A number employ normative additions (e.g. Polak, Aanspraak en aansprakelijkheid uit onrechtmatige daad, 17 and Hoekema, NJB 1980, 977, 987), inter alia reasoning that the notion of damage only acquires significance when viewed in conjunction with liability law (Spier, Schade en loss occurrence-verzekeringen, 5; of a contrary view Hartkamp loc. cit. 328-329).

11. LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.249(1) declares, that "damage shall include the amount of the loss or damage of property sustained by a person and the expenses incurred (direct damages) as well as the incomes of which he has been deprived, i.e. the incomes he would have received if unlawful actions had not been committed. Damage expressed in monetary terms shall constitute damages. Where the amount of damages cannot be proved by the party with precision, it shall be assessed by a court". Further, CC art. 6.250(1) states: "Non-pecuniary damage shall be deemed to be a person's suffering, emotional experiences, inconveniences, mental shock, emotional depression, humiliation, deterioration of reputation, diminuition of possibilities to associate with others, etc., evaluated by a court in terms of money." LATVIAN CC art. 1770 stipultates "loss … to mean any depriviation which can be assessed financially." The following provisions then distinguish between the varying manifestations of "losses": loss that has already occured and loss expected in the future, (CC art. 1771), whereby loss of profits is regarded as embraced by present loss (CC art. 1772). Furthermore, a distinction is drawn between direct and consequential damage and blameworthy and "accidental losses" (CC arts. 1773 and 1774).

12. In SWEDEN, "damage" was once defined as "a certain prejudicial effect on the utilisation of property or to an interest" (Karlgren, Skadeståndsrätt[5], 194). However, little emphasis is placed on such general definitions because they are of little purport in the absence of a concrete statutory fallback provision (Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 297). A distinction is drawn between 'real' or actual damage and the sum required to compensate it which is sometimes described as 'abstract' or calculated financial damage. For the most part it is simply described as loss (Karlgren loc. cit.).Schaden and Verlust thereby form a dichotomy (Andersson loc. cit. 298). Damage is governed by SWEDISH and FINNISH Damages and Tort Liability Act chap. 2, whereas loss is governed by chap. 5. Both statutes primarily deal with "real" damage, i.e. injury to person or damage to property provoking a financial loss. Alongside these provisions, regulations pertaining to a number of non-material types of damage have been incorporated: wounded feelings, pain, infirmity as well as permanent disability and significant impairment. Moreover, case law has introduced the category of ecological damage (Swedish HD 19 April 1995, NJA 1995, 249 and 21 December 1993, NJA 1993, 753 [concerning a public cultural monument]). DANISH approach holds that the infringement of a legally protected interest (retsbeskyttet gode) is a precondition for the existence of damage; "real damage" could be defined as a "factual interference with a legally protected interest" (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 338). Both material goods (a thing, however, this expression also embraces the body if there is a subsequent reduction in earning capacity) as well as non-material goods (e.g. the reputation of the injured party) could be encompassed by this notion. With respect to economic loss, liability relates to the "loss" (tabet), as far as non-material damage is concerned, one speaks of making amends (godtgørelse) (Damages Act §§ 3, 4 and 6; Vinding Kruse loc. cit. 345; Andersson loc. cit. 298).

II. Injury as damage

13. In all of the legal orders under discussion, incurring loss is a generally a prerequisite for the existence of legal damage. If a different approach were to adopted, then the compensatory function of tort law would be rendered nugatory; in other words, a solely punitive or deterrent function would be ascribed to tort law (Viney, Introduction à la responsabilité[2], no. 67 p. 111).

14. Exceptionally, proof of injury, be it a breach of a rule prescribing a particular standard of conduct or the infringement of a right is sufficient to constitute damage. For example, under FRENCH law on unfair advertising practices, the presence of damage is presumed if a faute commerciale is established. In order to circumvent the collaspse of the claimant's action en concurrence déloyale owing to a lack of evidence, the courts have proved to be satisfied with a mere assertion that loss has been incurred (see further Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 247 p. 4). Furthermore, it is also accepted that a particular anti competitive practice necessarily imports a dommage moral (Cass.com. 9 February 1993, Bull.civ. 1993, IV, no. 53 p. 34; JCP 1994 éd. E, II, 545, note Danglehant). Furthermore, the breach of an intellectual property right can par elle-même constitute damage (Cass.civ. 11 October 1983, Bull.civ. 1983, I, no. 225 p. 201). In addition, a court decision in 1934 determined that the breach of the owner's droit de possession sufficed to justify an award of damages even when the owner did not suffer any pecuniary loss (Cass.req. 6 March 1934, D.P. 1937, I, 17, note Blaevoet). However, this set of developments has not taken root under BELGIAN law. Breach of a right is not tantamount to a necessary or sufficient precondition for the presence of damage (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, 18).

15. Pursuant to SPANISH law,as a general rule damages are only awarded if the claimant has suffered a pecuniary or non- pecuniary loss. Exceptions to this basic rule are made if a breach of a constitutionally protected personality right is concerned. Above all, violations of bodily integrity (daño a la salud, cf. De Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 698), violations of right to privacy, honour and right to one's own image are actionable per se. The aforementioned rights are expressly derived from art. 9(3) of Law 1/82 of 5 May 1982 pertaining to Civil Protection of the right to one's honour, to a personal and familial sphere of intimacy and control over the reproduction of one's image (Ley Orgánica 1/1982, de 5 de mayo, de Protección Civil de los Derechos al Honor, a la Intimidad Personal y Familiar, y a la Propia Imagen).

16. The prevailing view in ITALY regards the infringement of a legally protected interest as constituting a danno ingiusto under CC art. 2043, thereby justifying the imposition of liability. The particulars regarding the recovery of danno are governed in a variety provisions, depending on whether pecuniary damage or non-economic loss is involved. Breach of Cost. art. 32 which purport is to safeguard the individual's right to health is the subject of a special regime. With respect to violations of a person's psycho-physical integrity, namely the socalled danno biologico, the application of the concept of danno evento (event related damage) in this field was the product of judicial refinement. For a long time, the predominant view in case law was that the danno biologico should not only be conceived as the consequence of an event founding liability but should alone be conceived as the event (evento) that caused the infringment to health. The unjustness alone, which inheres in the act leading to the infringement of the psycho- physical integrity, founds the obligation to make reparation on the actionable per se danno biologico. This obligation is not dependent upon any further accrual of possible manifestations of damage which would in any event have to be proved separately. Therefore, the danno biologico was intermittantly regarded, in conjunction with pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage (danni conseguenza) as an additional discrete heading of damage (Corte Cost. 14 July 1986, no. 184, Giur.it. 1987, I, 1, 392). In more recent times, it is true to state that the courts have somewhat retreated from this conception of the danno evento (initially with Corte Cost. 27 October 1994, no. 372, Foro it. 1994, I, 3297), however, have only opted to correct its practical results only in marginal areas. According to more recent case law, the danno biologico is regarded as indeed signifying non- pecuniary loss and consequently conceived as a manifestation of the danni conseguenza. These developments have not had any impact on the fact that in the event that there is an injury to health, the consequential damage is regarded as being actionable per se (Cass. 31 May 2003, nos. 8827 and 8828, Giur.it. 2004, I, 1, 29; Corte Cost. 11 July 2003, no. 233; Resp.civ. e prev. 2003, 1036; Cass.sez.pen. 25 November 2003 and 22 January 2004, Foro it. 2004, II, 138; Cass. 12 December 2003, no. 19057, Danno e resp. 2004, 762; Cass. 20 February 2004, no. 3399, Foro it. 2004, I, 1059). In other words, proof of any interference with a person's psycho-physical intergrity (health), now understood in the sense of a result of an injury to health suffices to render the danno biologico compensatable in conjunction with and (in addition to) the injured party's claim for pecuniary and non-pecuniary loss (see further Castronovo, Danno e resp. 2004, 237-247 and Gozzi, Der Anspruch iure proprio auf Ersatz des Nichtvermögensschadens, 61).

17. Whereas AUSTRIAN CC § 1293 states that the mere infringment of a right can represent damage, however this declaration has not acquired any practical significance (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 2/3; Kramer, ÖJZ 1972, 90, 92; Mayrhofer, Schuldrecht AT³, 252). Proof of loss is required, otherwise the rules alleviating the burden of proof under CCP § 273 in respect of the extent of the damage incurred will not come into operation (Koziol [-Rummel], Haftpflichtrecht II², 302). There is no exception provided for under Competition law (Koppensteiner, Wettbewerbsrecht³, § 34 no. 53). However, it is generally accepted that non-material loss always arises from infringments of the right to liberty, it therefore does not have to proven or substantiated (OGH 24 June 1987, SZ 60/117). A uniform amount of damages is also awarded for copyright infringements if actual pecuniary loss cannot be adduced (OGH 26 May 1998, SZ 71/92). In POLAND the question whether the infringement of a right of personality, in particular an injury to body or health, constitutes damage in itself is the subject of debate (in favour: Dybowski, System prawa cywilnego III(1), 224-226; against – damage only if there is pain or a loss of earning capacity - Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 90). Compensation for infringement of rights of personality is in any case always a matter for the discretion of the court (Szpunar, Zadośćuczynienie, no. 81; Safjan, Kodeks cywilny I[4], 1284-1285). There is no doubt that an injured person has a right to compensation even though he or she is in fact incapable of suffering any pain (Szpunar loc. cit. nos. 91, 164). Statute provides in a number of special cases (innocent defamation; infringement of copyright) for compulsory compensation independent of loss.

18. In contrast the concept of damage per se is unknown in GERMANY, GREECE, PORTUGAL, The NETHERLANDS (Schadevergoeding II [-Lindenbergh], art. 6:106, no. 23; Schadevergoeding II [-Bolt], art. 6:107, nos. 9-25) and in the NORDIC Countries. However, both the GERMAN and PORTUGUESE courts, consistent with the prevailing jurisprudence of other States, have also permitted a claimant to recover non- pecuniary loss where, following an accident, the claimant sustained severe injuries leading to a permanent impairment of cognitive and sensory functions (BGH 13 October 1992, BGHZ 120, 1; STJ 5 March 1969, BolMinJus 185 (1969) 171, 178). In HUNGARY, there are indeed views in legal commentary which postulate that the injury of a personality right in itself is sufficient to render grounds for granting statisfaction (regarding these discussions, see for further analysis Boytha, Polgári jogi kodifikáció, 2003, 3-6 Petrik, Polgári jogi kodifikáció 2003, 6-8), however, the courts have thus far declined to follow this approach (Citations in Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1322 ff). The draft of the new ZGB introduces the legal concept of solatium in place of non-pecuniary loss in the law pertaining to persons. The former is not a damages concept but is a legal institution belonging to the law pertaining to individuals. A person whose perosnaility rights are infringed can thereupon claim damages for pain and suffering without having to prove that further loss or detriment was suffered. The Draft contains an irrebutable presumption that every infringement of the right of personality rights amounts to a detriment for the party who suffered injury. The extent of the damages awarded for pain and suffering fall to be assessed by the courts (http://www.parlament.hu/irom38/05949/05949.pdf; Vékás [-Székely], Szakértői Javaslat az új Polgári Törvénykönyv tervezetéhez [Expert submissions on the draft of a new Civil Code for Hungary], Budapest 2008, pp. 174-175).

III. Economic loss

19. There is no pan european universal criterion to assist in ascertaining when an economic loss is sustained and different approaches are adopted throughout Europe. According to FRENCH doctrine a dommage matériel signifies the damage that can be directly measured in money. It embraces both physical damage to goods (atteinte aux biens) as well as pecuniary loss as a result of personal injury (atteinte à la personne physique), loss of profits is embraced under this heading (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[9], no. 135 p. 124). A strong tendency exists to treat the dommage corporel in conjunction with the dommage matériel and the dommage moral as an automonous head of damages (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[8], no. 708 p. 687; Mazeaud and Chabas, Obligations[9], no. 409 p. 413). Similarly, according to views in BELGIUM material damage signifies the damage that can be measured in money (Dirix, Het begrip schade, no. 85 p. 61). It embraces the physical damage to property or financial elements as well as loss of income resulting from the infringement of a persons physical intergrity (van Gerven, Verbintenissenrecht II[7], 352). The extent of the material damage is generally described as the difference between the financial position at the date of the judgment and the hypothetical economic position pertaining had the tort not been committed (Dirix, Het begrip schade, no. 85 p. 61). In both countries, loss of profits represents recoverable damge under tort law (lucrum cessans) (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 251 p. 19; Dirix loc. cit. no. 53 p. 46). One example is provided by a case where shortfalls in production occured where a gas pipe was damaged (Cass.civ. 8 May 1970, Bull.civ. 1970, II, no. 160 p. 122), another example pertains to the proof of loss of earning capacity in respect of permanent incapacity (Viney and Jourdain, Les effets de la responsabilité[2], no. 113 p. 214; van Gerven loc. cit.).

20. Under SPANISH law daño encompasses both pecuniary loss (daño emergente) that is sustained as well as loss of profits (lucro cesante). It is true that according to the legal postiioning of the provision which expressly mentions both of these heads of damages, CC art. 1106 only pertains to contractual liability, however, this provision has also been deemed to apply to tort law.(u.a. TS 23 March 1954, RAJ 1954 no. 1299 p. 839; TS 31 May 1983, RAJ 1983 (2) no. 2956 p. 2285; TS 3 October 1991, RAJ 1991 (5) no. 6902 p. 9381). The daño emergente covers a thing's dimunition of value. Loss of profits are only recoverable, if it can be shown that there is an adequate causal nexus between the defendant's act and the loss suffered and furthermore, when measured by objective standards, there is evidence to suggest that the claimed amount lost profit would probably have been realised (TS 20 March 1978, RAJ 1978 (1) no. 850 p. 747; TS 1 October 1986, RAJ 1986 (3) no. 5230 p. 5119; TS 19 July 1989, RAJ 1989 (5) no. 5725 p. 6651). An additional requisite is that the source of the lost profit must not derive from illegal activities. Diminishment or permanent loss of earning capacity as a consequence of bodily injury or injury to health is encompassed within this head of damages. The calculation of damages is generally based on the teoría de la diferencia: namely, based on the difference between the extent of the victim's fortune following the occurence of the damaging event and the hypothetical assessement of the victim's assets had the damaging event not occured (TS 10 January 1979, RAJ 1979 (1) no. 18 p. 26; TS 14 February 1980, RAJ 1980 (1) no. 516 p. 396; TS 2 April 1997, RAJ 1997 (2) no. 2727 p. 4133).

21. Similarly, according to the Italien conception, pecuinary loss embraces the detrimental effect that a tort has in the patrimony of the injured party. The extent of the pecuniary loss is calculated according to the difference between the actual state of patrimony adjudged at the time following the accident and a hypothetical consideration of the state that that they would have been in had the loss not been sustained (see further Cendon [-Gaudino], Commentario al codice civile IV(2), arts. 1655-2059, art. 2043, § 10). Regarding the content of the particulars pertaining to the calculation of this head of damages, CC art. 2056 refers to CC arts. 1223, 1226, 1227 and hence to the rules governing the recovery of contractual damages which also recognises a claim for the recovery of lost profits. Additionally, CC art. 2056 expressly prescribes that a damages claim for the recovery of loss of profits is required to be assessed according to an equitable evaluation of the particular circumstances of the case. Recoverable damage entails daamage that arises as an immediate and direct consequence of the injury,irrespective of whether the damage was forseeable or not.

22. CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC §§ 442 et seq. contain comprehensive provisions concerning the conceptualisation of pecuniary loss. It comprises of a "real" damage limb and another which pertains to lost profit (CC § 442(1)). The amount of damages awarded for physical damage to property is ascertained according to the value at the time the damage occurred (CC § 443). There are extensive rules governing the calculation of compensation for loss of earnings consequent upon personal injury (CC §§ 445-447a). HUNGARIAN CC § 355(1) makes an express distinction between pecuniary and non-pecuniary loss. CC § 355(4) augments this provision by providing that "compensation must be made for any depreciation in value of the property of the aggrieved person and any pecuniary advantage lost due to the damage as well as the indemnity or costs necessary for the attenuation or elimination of the material and non-material losses sustained by the aggrieved person". The following definition of damage is set forth in the SLOVENIAN LOA art. 132 : "Damage comprises the diminution of property (ordinary damage), prevention of the appreciation of property (lost profits), the infliction of physical or mental distress or fear on another person, and encroachment upon the reputation of a legal person".In POLAND economic loss is understood as damage to goods whose pecuniary value is ascertainable (Dybowski, System prawa cywilnego III(1), 221). CC art. 361 §§ 1 and 2 expressly state that the reparation of damage encompasses losses (straty) and lost profits (utracone korzyści). Both straty and utracone korzyści are ascertained according to the so called differential method, which consists in establishing the difference between the actual state of assets and the hypothetical state in which they would have been had the incident not occurred (Dybowski loc. cit. 214-215; Czachórski, Zobowiązania[9], 101; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 91).

23. Please see Note I6 which examines the concept of percuniary loss under GERMAN Law

24. In AUSTRIA, pecuniary loss is regarded as encompassing every detriment that is inflicted to goods possessing a monetary value. This concept embraces both the socalled actual damage (destruction or diminution of existing patrimony; liability is imposed for ordinary negligence) as well as loss of profits (liability only incurred where the defendant acts with gross negligence). If problems of demarcation arise, the courts tend to assume the existence of actual loss (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 286). For example, depriving a businessman of the use of his vehicle amounts to actual loss (OGH 23 May 1956, SZ 29/43), likewise, future profits are also embraced by the head of actual loss provided that public opinion could regard the profit making opportunity as having an independent economic value (OGH 14 December 1979, SZ 52/187) or would have certainly materialised had the damage not taken place (OGH 17 October 1995, SZ 68/189). Furthermore, loss of earnings is generally comprehended by actual loss (OGH 18 March 1960, ZVR 1960/234, p. 161). Pecuniary loss also encompasses the incurrence of expenses or onerous obligation (OGH OGH 6 June 1987, ZVR 1987/128, p. 376; OGH 24 November 1964, SZ 37/168; Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 2/36). Austrian law also employs the socalled differential method: this involves comparing the actual position which results from the damging event from the hypothetical position that would exist if the damaging act had not occurred. The negative difference represents the damage that the plaintiff has suffered (OGH 27 August 1980, SZ 53/107; Koziol loc. cit., no. 2/19).

25. In GREECE, an identical approach is adopted: economic loss is assessed according to an assessment of the difference between the hypothetical state of the patrimony had the damaging event not occured and the actual state of patimomy (Georgiades Ast., Enochiko Dikaio I, 120). It is not enough for the courts to confine themselves to assessing the effect of the damaging event on the affected asset, it is necessary for them to consider its effect on the entire patrimony of the aggrieved party (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Stathopoulos], arts. 297-298 no. 10).

26. In a similar fashion, the PORTUGUESE Civil Code does not contain a statutory definition of the d*ano patrimonial*, likewise no distinction is drawn between damage (dano) and loss (prejuízo) (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 541, fn. 3). Dano patrimonial is conceived in academic teaching as "an injury to patrimonial assets or to legally protected interests comprising of material or economic interests involving a detimental effect on the partrimony of the aggrieved party" (Almeida Costa loc. cit. 542-543). Physical damage to tangible property or loss of use is filed under the heading of economic loss as is the impairment of earning capacity following personal injury. Economic damage, also defined as "the reflex of the actual damage (dano real) in the economic situation of the injured party, is measured, in principle, by the difference between the actual situation of the injured party and the situation in which he would be if the injury had not occurred (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 598-599).

27. DUTCH CC art. 6:95 differentiates between 'economic damage' and 'other disadvantages'; a claim for recovery of the latter can only be asserted where provided for expressly by law. Under the rubric of economic loss, a further distinction is drawn between zaakschade, persoonsschade and zuivere vermogensschade. This subdivision is above all of relevance within the framework of CC arts. 6:107 and 108. Zaakschade signifies loss resulting from damage to, destruction or loss of tangible property. Persoonsschade comprises heads of recoverable economic loss which arise from personal injury (e.g. medical expenses, loss of earnings), and zuivere vermogensschade encompasses every pecuniary loss not embraced by personal or physical damage. It is conceded in Dutch legal literature that determing the dividing line between the three categories of damage, a task which carries particular import for insurance law, can engender some difficulty (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], no. 413 p. 335 with further references).

28. The NORDIC Countries, in particular SWEDEN and FINLAND, differentiate between pure and general economic loss. Pure economic loss is defined as economic loss which arises without connection to personal or property damage (Swedish Tort Liability Act chap. 1 § 2). Indirect loss (e.g. loss of financial support arising from the death of the primary victim) constitutes a discrete category; this head of damages (treated similarly to pure economic loss) is only exceptionally recoverable and is generally confined to instances laid down by law. The calculation of damages is extensively regulated down to the last detail. As a general rule, the function of tort law is to place the injured party in the position s/he would have been in, had the damaging event not occured.

29. The COMMON LAW too distinguishes between on the one hand economic loss as a consequence of personal injury or damage to property and on the other hand "pure" economic loss. The latter are compensable only in restricted circumstances. The law remains in a state of flux. A bank which has received from a claimant a notification of an injunction freezing the account of a customer, but nonetheless (due to carelessness) carries out an instruction of its customer to transfer money from the account is not liable to the claimant for want of a duty of care owed by the bank to the claimant (Customs & Excise v. Barclays Bank [2006] UKHL 28, 1 AC 181)

IV. Normative Economic Loss

30. The European legal orders frequently, however, permit economic loss to be recovered despite the absence of a genuine (present or future) net loss as measured by way of the difference method (see further v. Bar, Essays in Honour of Lord Goff of Chieveley, 23-43). The concept of "normative" damage is employed in such cases. It appears in multifarious forms, cf. e.g. for IRELAND Hogan v. Steel & Co. Ltd. [1999] IEHC 175, [2000] 1 ILRM 330 (economic loss resulting from loss of earnings following an accident was judged recoverable, even though the employer had voluntarily continued to pay the wages) and in respect of AUSTRIA Schwimann (-Harrer), ABGB VII², § 1293 nos. 8-9 (liability for the socalled abstract annuity, i.e. compensation for possible future disadvantages that a party who has sustained permanent injury may incur in the competition with healthy persons). In SWEDEN, the difference method is merely understood as a technique representing the normal case (Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 301 fn. 43 with further references.). The courts are vested with a wide margin of discretion when it comes to the calculation of damages (Code of Judicial Procedure [rättegångsbalk (1942:740)] chap. 35 § 5), cf. HD 20 December 1973, NJA 1973, 717 (following excercise of judicial discretion, damages were awarded on the basis of an the unauthorised use of the claimant's name without proof of actual loss); HD 15 October 1981, NJA 1981, 933 and HD 27 June 2000, NJA 2000, 325 (estimation of the extent of pure economic loss in respect of illegal private copies) as well as Radetzki, Skadeståndsberäkning vid sakskada, 199). The same holds true for FINLAND (Code of Judicial Procedure [rättegångsbalk] chap. 17 § 6, cf. on this point HD 15 May 1998, HD 1998:53 and HD 31 August 1998, HD 1998:97) and DENMARK (Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 352; von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 250; see also HD 31 October 1973, UfR 1973, 950 and HD 8 August 1994, UfR 1994, 785).

31. Furthermore, it is universally recognised that the "reduced commercial value" of tangible property, in particular a car, amounts to recoverable pecuniary damage. This head of damages compensates the depreciation of value in the case of a damaged car that was correct repaired (e.g. accident-damaged car). This dimunition in value is also compensated even the loss is not incurred in the event that the owner of tangible property decides not to sell (cf. e.g. for AUSTRIA Harrer loc. cit.; for DENMARK ØLD 22 June 1981, UfR 1981, 919; VLD 19 January 1994, UfR 1994, 304 and VLD 23 April 1997, UfR 1997, 969; for FINLAND Tort liability Act chap. 5 § 5; for GERMANY BGH 3 October 1961, BGHZ 35, 396; for GREECE Stathopoulos, Geniko Enochiko Dikaio A1[2], 540; Georgiades and Stathopoulos (-Stathopoulos), arts. 297-298, no. 115 and CA Athens 737/1971, EEN 1972 75; for POLAND SN 12 October 2001, OSNC 2002, poz. 57 and for SWEDEN Tort Liability Act chap. 5 § 7 no. 1). The courts in ITALY have sometimes held that the socalled deprezzamento commerciale is recoverable even without the adduction of concrete proof of actual loss (Cass. 23 June 1972, no. 2109, Rep.Giur.it. 1972, voce Circolazione stradale, no. 363; CFI Palermo 9 October 1984, Riv.giur.circ.trasp. 1985, 394). Similarly, BELGIAN legal science views a reduction in market value of tangible property as constituting recoverable loss. It has, however, been pointed out that the courts are hestitant to allow a claim for recovery because, for the most part, they consider that the condition that the damage was "certain" has not been met (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 169 pp. 322-323). The SPANISH courts only rarely particularise the head of damages upon which they are basing the compensatory award; therefore, it cannot be stated with certainty that a special head of damages for "reduction in market value" is extant; however, the possibility of its general incorporation within an award of damages based on an equitable assessment (unassailable on appeal) cannot be discounted (cf. e.g. CA Guipúzcoa 25 October 1999, BDA Civil no. 1999/7264 and CA Pontevedra 10 October 1995, BDA Civil no. 1995/1949).

32. Furthermore, European courts have consistently held that a family member who renders gratutious services in the home, typically a housewife, is entitled to claim damages for loss of housekeeping capacity consequent upon personal injury (see, for AUSTRIA Harrer loc. cit.; for POLAND Safjan, Kodeks cywilny I[4], 1279; for BELGIUM Cass. 15 June 1959, Pas. belge 1959, 1050; for FRANCE CA Colmar 15 May 1956, D. 1956 Jur. 653; for GERMANY BGH 9 July 1968, BGHZ 50, 304; for ITALY (Cass. 11 December 2000, no. 15580, Danno e resp. 2001, 587 [the ability to recover for pecuniary loss in correlation with the danno biologico] and Cass. 6 November 1997, no. 10923, Giust.civ.Mass. 1997, 2093, Danno e resp. 1998, 230 [Award of damages extended in circumstances where the housewife had indeed employed domestic help, however nonetheless was fully focussed on structuring family life]); for SPAIN TS (3. Senat) 20 October 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 8844 p. 13069 as well as Law on Third Party Civil Liability and Insurance in the Circulation of Motor Vehicles (Texto Refundido de la Ley sobre Responsabilidad Civil y Seguro en la Circulación de Vehículos de Motor, enacted by Real Decreto Legislativo Nr. 8/2004 of 29 October 2004, Damages Table IV, Note 11) and for the COMMON Law Daly v. General Steam Navigation Ltd. [1981] 1 WLR 120. In SWEDEN (Tort Liability Act chap. 5 § 1(2) in conjunction with § 1(3) 2nd sentence) and in DENMARK (Tort Liability Act § 1(3)) the entitlement of a housewife to recover for loss of housekeeping capacity is the subject of express statutory regulation.

V. Non-economic loss

33. The underlying requisites for permitting the recovery of non-material damage in the European jurisdiction, despite recent steps taken towards convergence, still diverge greatly. As a general rule, two basic models are encountered. A number of European legal orders hold every damage recoverable. The remainder adopt a contrasting aproach and espouse the principle that non-material damage is generally only compensatble where provided for by law. In non core fields, up to now, no consensus has been reached on the question whether damage to injured feelings should be compensatable. On the other hand, there is seldom a distinction drawn between liability for faulrt and strict liability; as far as the latter is concerned, in the interim, it is common practice throughtout Europe to permit recovery for non patrimonal loss.

34. BELGIAN, FRENCH and LUXEMBOURGIAN law proceed on the basis that both material and non-material loss which can be attributed to the tortfeasor's wrongdoing, is a recoverable head of damages (see for France, at an early stage Cass.civ. 13 February 1923, D. 1923, I, 52 and for Luxemburg Cass. 10 May 1990, Pas. luxemb. 1990-92, 37). The Belgian courts consider that the function of compensation for non-material damage is to ease pain, grief or other non-material suffering (Cass. 3 February 1987, Pas. belge 1987, I, 644). The recovery of non-pecuniary loss under the three legal systems does not depend on the drawing of any distinction between fault liability and the strict liability of the gardien (CC art. 1384(1)) (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 246 p. 1). In French academic circles, it is submitted that awarding damages for a dommage moral is not cognate to réparer, but must be viewed in the light of a compenser of the irréparable (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[8], no. 712 p. 691). Accordingly ,the dommage moral is defined as a damage which does not signify detriment to the assets of the aggrieved party (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[9], no. 139 p. 128; Dirix, Het begrip schade, no. 86 p. 62). The mere intention of inflicting injury on another, in other words the abusive exercise of a right the injured party renders an entitlement to recover the dommage moral in isolated cases (e.g. CA Lyon 9 March 2006, JCP 2006, IV, 2661: refusal to issue a document of divorce required by religious ordinances).

35. SPANISH CC art. 1902 simply declares (a transplant of the Code Napoléon arts. 1382-1384) that " damage" which is caused to another is compensatable. No distinction is made between material and non-material damage. Initially, i.e until a later decision of the Tribunal Supremo of 12 December 1912 (cited by, inter alia, Santos Briz, La responsabilidad civil I[7], 165) only pecuniary loss (daño material) was recoverable. The above cited judgment fundamentally altered this prior conception of damage. Since the handing down of that judgment, Spanish jurisprudence has consistently declared that non- pecuniary loss is recoverable (e.g. TS 26 January 1972, RAJ 1972 (1) no. 120 p. 119; TS 19 December 1986, RAJ 1986 (5) no. 7682 p. 7462). Moreover, CP art. 110(3) expressly provides that non-material damage is recoverable in the event that the imposition of civil liability derives from the commisssion of a crime. Further, non-material damages are also explicitly envisaged by the Law 1/1982 (of 5 May 1982) on the Civil Protection of the Right to Honour, to a Sphere of Intimacy and the Right to Control the Reproduction of One's Own Image. art. 9(3). Spanish legal writing does not devote much attention to the distinction between economic and non economic loss. The ascertainment of the constitutents of the daño moral remains a perenniel problem. In general, it may be asserted that the daño moral comprises of all damage which does not have repercussions on the individual's wealth (Lete del Río, Derecho de obligaciones II[3], 193), further all injuries to the rights of the personality are compensatable. The latter is recoverable independent of the consideration of the effect on the injured party's patrimony (Díez-Picazo and Gullón, Instituciones de Derecho Civil I, 828). Spanish legal writing makes a distinction between non-material damage in a narrow sense (genuine non-pecuniary damage: daños propiamente morales, daños morales propios) and oblique or indirect patrimonial (daños patrimoniales indirectos, daños morales impropios). The first category embraces damage which results in injury to beliefs, feelings, dignity, reputation or physical or pschological health which do not directly impinge on the patrimony of the aggrieved party; the latter classification concerns economic loss which specifically derives from the infringment to a non-material interest.

36. Conversely, the prevailing principle in ITALY provides, (as consecrated in CC art. 2059) that non-economic loss may not be generally recovered unless expressly provided for by law Effectively, this entails that cases where a tort also amounts to a crime form the vanguard in this area (CP art. 185(2)). Further instances are provided for by supplementary statutes, e.g. Law 117/88 (Compensation for Damages caused by the exercise of judicial functions and the Civil Liability of Judges) art.2 which provides that claim for compensation for non pecuniary damage may be brought where it arises from a deprivation of liberty occasioned by judicial error art. 2; Personal Data Protection Code (Decreto Legislativo 30 June 2003, no. 196, Suppl.ord. alla Gazz. Uff. 29 July 2003, no. 174, Codice in materia di protezione dei dati personali) art. 15; and the Decree on the Prohibition of Discrimination art. 44(70). The precise scope of application of the articles CC arts. 2043 and 2059 (which have been deemed compatible with the Constitution: Corte Cost. 26 July 1979, no. 87, Foro it. 1979, I, 2543; Corte Cost. 14 July 1986, no. 184, Foro it. 1986, I, 2053; Corte Cost. 27 October 1994, no. 372, Foro it. 1994, I, 3297; Corte Cost. 22 July 1996, no. 293, Resp.civ. e prev. 1996, 909) has, as previously mentioned, absorbed both scholarly attention and that of the courts for a considerable amount of time. Fleetingly, an interpretation of CC art. 2059 took hold whereby the provision, nothwithstanding its express wording ("Non - pecuniary loss") was deemed to solely govern cases of pure moral damage arising from emotional distress (Corte Cost. 14 July 1986, no. 184, Foro it. 1986, I, 2976); the limits set forth in CC art. 2059 thereby only appertained to damage of this nature. Since the mid eighties (either directly or by way of analogy) recovery has been permitted for injury to the psycho- physical integrity of a person on the basis of CC art. 2043 in conjunction with Cost. art. 32. Thus, it was possible to remove liability for the protection of health from being fenced within the narrow parameters of CC art 2059. From a systematical viewpoint, this "trick" was facilitated by channelling the aforementioned development of the doctrine of danno evento, whose most important manifestaion was comprised of the danno biologico. Gradually, however the courts again revisited and retreated from this danno evento line of jurisprudence and proceeded to recognise the non-pecuniary nature of the danno biologico (Corte Cost. 27 October 1994, no. 372, Foro it. 1994, I, 3297). This does not lead, however, recovery being predicated on satisfying the narrowly drawn requisites of CC art. 2059. The courts have refashioned the provision with the result that its restrictive conditions apply only to claims for the recovery of damage arising from emotional trauma, i.e. moral damage in its narrow sense. Conversely, the restrictive limits of CC art. 2059 should not apply if the recovery of non-economic loss is concerned arising from the an infringement of a constitutionally protected right (for example, protection against interference to health and bodily integrity and the protection of the family). In this manner, the danno biologico is retained as a recoverable head of damage, irrepsective of whether recovery is expressly ordained by a special law (which is required by CC art. 2059) or otherwise (Cass. 31 May 2003, nos. 8827 and 8828, Giur.it. 2004, I, 1, 29; Corte Cost. 11 July 2003, no. 233 Resp.civ. e prev. 2003, 1036). It appears that a corresponding approach is adopting in respect of the recovery of the socalled danno esistenziale. This arises where there is a permanent and negative detrimental effect on a person's daily life and social interaction with others. Similarly this category is viewed as representing a discrete indemnifiable head of damages which are separately liquidated and is consequent upon the infringment of a constitutionally protected right which is exempt from to the underlying restrictions of CC art. 2059 (Cass. 31 May 2003, nos. 8827 and 8828, Giur.it. 2004, I, 1, 29; Corte Cost. 11 July 2003, no. 233, Resp.civ. e prev. 2003, 1036; Cass. Pen. 25 November 2003 - 22 January 2004, Foro it. 2004, II, 138; Cass.sez.un. 24 March 2006, no. 6572, Giur.it. 2006, I, 1359). After all that, it should be noted that Italian law recognises three different catergories of non – economic loss (danno morale, biologico and esistenziale), the recovery of which is governed by various regulations (Corte Cost. 11 July 2003, no. 233 loc. cit.; the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court displays an increased tendency to distance itself from the discrete category of danno esistenziale and instead are inclined to advert, in general terms, to the non-pecuniary consequences oft eh infringement of constitutionally protected rights). According to recent jurisprudence, the calculation of the award of damages is once again vested in the discretion of the trial judge; this entails that the latter is no longer bound to follow the prior mathematical formulae utilised for the calculation of award of damages for danno biologico (Cass. 31 May 2003, nos. 8827 and 8828 loc. cit.). This discretional assessement takes into account the gravity of injury, the intensity of the anguish, the sensitivity of the injured party as well as the respective economic position of the parties. However, the enduring principle in Italian law is to refuse to allow recovery for non-economic loss in strict liability cases. The basic tenet, i.e predicated upon the lack of any countervailing statutory provision, is that colpa of the tortfeasor must be extant in order to recover for non-pecuniary loss. A failure to rebut a refutable legal presumption in the instant case will satsify this criterion, however a legal presumption of liability (as in e.g. CC arts. 2054(4), 2051 and 2052) will not suffice. However, the courts have created an exception in the field of strict liability for infringment of constitutionally protected personal values. Here, non- econonmic loss is deemed recoverable even if the liability incurred is strict (Cass. 27 October 2004, no. 20814, Resp.civ. e prev. 2005, 98; cf. CFI La Spezia 27 October 2005, Danno e resp. 2006, 173; Foro it. 2005, I, 3500: recovery for biological damage allowed, moral damage disallowed).

37. Until 1992, the year in which this provision was deemed unconstitutional by the Constitutional Courts on grounds of its perceived arbitrariness, (Decision of the Constitutional Court [AB határozat] 34/1992. [VI.1.]), HUNGARIAN CC § 354 k incorporated the rule that a wrongdoer was obliged to compensate non-material loss in the event that the loss resulted in the irretrievable or severe impairment to the aggrieved party's ability to participate in social intercourse or ability to organise his/her affairs or where prejudice is sustained by a legal person in its commercial dealings. Since then, the law currently continues to abide by the general rule concerning the indemnification of non-material damage (CC § 355(1) and (4)); the precise constitutents are filled in by the courts.

38. Pursuant to POLISH CC art. 445(1) and (2), a claim for indemnification of non-pecuniary damage may only be asserted in cases where there is injury to body or health, of deprivation of liberty and infringements of the right to sexual self determination. CC art. 448 broadens the scope of this rule to encompass injury to incorporeal rights of personality and further, confers a right upon the injured party to even direct that the award of compensation be paid to a charitable organisation of his/her choice. The prevailing view, however, is that CC art. 448 also applies to cases of personal injury. According to that view, it is only within the framework of CC art. 448 (and not within the framework of CC art. 445) that fault is a prerequisite for a claim (Safjan, Kodeks cywilny I[4], 1311-1314; Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 243; SN 12 December 2002, OSNC 2004, poz. 53). CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC § 444 awards damages for non – pecuniary loss (in the form of a lump sum) only in cases of injury to body or to health. Damages are designed to compensate "pains and aggravation of (the victim's) social assertion". The former reluctance of Central and Eastern European jurisdiction, to permit recovery for non-pecuniary loss is abandoned by SLOVENIAN LOA art. 132, which, since 2002, sets forth: "Damage comprises the diminution of property (ordinary damage), prevention of the appreciation of property (lost profits), the infliction of physical or mental distress or fear on another person, and encroachment upon the reputation of a legal person". Further particulars are regulated in LOA arts. 178 and 179 (for further analysis Trstenjak, MfOR 2002, 90, 106-107).

39. The "Second Act on the Amendment of Provisions Pertaining to the Law of Damages" of the 18 April 2002 (BGBl. 2002 I 2674) which was commenced on the 1 of August 2002 heralded a reform of the GERMAN law on the indemnification of non-peruniary loss. The point of departure remains CC § 253(1), according to which compensation for non- pecuniary loss may only be awarded in the cases specfied by law. This provision is supplemented by the addition of a new subpara. CC § 253(2), which provides that: " if compensation is to be awarded for injury to body, health, liberty of the right to sexual self determination, a fair monetary compensation may also be claimed in respect of any non-economic loss." This rule embraces both fault based and strict liability under the Code. In addition, with a number of modifications, CC § 253(2) is referred to in all supplementary statutes regulating instancs where strict liability is imposed. The upshot of this is that in the instancs enumerated above, compensation for non-material loss may also be claimed in cases of objective liability. The right to claim damages for non-pecuniary loss for infringements of rights of personality directly derives from the provisions oft he Constitution which protect basic human rights (GG art. 2 in conjunction with art. 1) (BGH 19 September 1961, BGHZ 35, 363, 368; BGH 15 November 1994, BGHZ 120, 1, 15; BGH 5 April 2000, NJW 2000, 2195,2197).

40. Similarly, in AUSTRIA, as a general rule, non-material loss may only be recovered in cases expressly ordained by law (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 11/17; Rummel [-Reischauer] ABGB II² § 1324 no. 11; OGH 21 March 1951, JBl 1951, 377; OGH 26 April 1989, JBl 1989, 792 = RS0022551 [re compensation for loss of enjoyment on holiday]). The view has been advanced in legal literature that, CC § 1323 provides a general basis for the rule that non-material damage is recoverable if the damage sustained is caused by gross negligence (Bydlinski, JBl 1965, 173, 237, 247). At least in light of the results achieved, it can be said that there is a convergence between this conception and recent jurisprudence of the OGH (OGH 16 May 2001, ZVR 2001, 284, note Karner; Fötschl, VersRAI 2001, 60). In this decision, the court awarded non-pecuniary damages for parents' emotional suffering which was occassioned by the loss of their child. A claim for this head of damages may only be claimed in cases of intention or gross negligence. Despite strong critiscism from legal commentators, this distinction remains and thus entails that no claim can be made, in relation to this head of damages, in cases of strict liability (e.g. Schobel, RdW 2002/195, p. 206) .

41. While GREEK CC art. 299 also takes, as its point of departure, the basic rule that compensation for non-pecuniary loss can only be awarded in cases provided for by law, it does not, however, pan out in this way in the field of non contractual liability law. This is due to the fact that CC art. 932 also comprehended by the enumerated cases in CC art. 299. The former deems that an equitable compensation may be recovered for non-material damage occasioned by tortious action. This claim arises independant of thr existence of any pre-existing pecuniary loss (Paterakis, I chrimatiki ikanopoiisi logo ithikis vlavis, 244, 253; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 932, no. 4; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 291) and, further, the claim does not hinge upon whether liability is fault based (Kornilakis, I evthini apo diakindinevsi, 185; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio III, 290; Paterakis, I chrimatiki ikanopoiisi logo ithikis vlavis, 263; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 932, no. 5; A.P. 444/1964, NoB 12 (1964) 1075; CA Patras 256/1984, NoB 32 (1984) 1567). CC arts. 57 and 59 stipulate that damages may be recovered for non-material loss consequent upon an infringement of personality rights. CC art. 59 extends beyond CC art. 932, in so far as it provides for other forms of redress other than monetary compensation. Within the confines of CC art. 932 recovery is permitted for non-material loss arising out oft he commission of any tort. This is because CC art. 932 second sentence only contains indicative example of the application of the rule and has been expressly stated that an exhaustive rule is not comprehened by the provisionto an exhaustive, compare. A.P. 1589/1979, NoB 28 (1980) 1115, 1117 and CA Athens, 658/1975, NoB 23 (1975) 508 (non-material loss resulting from infringments of the right to ownership); CA Athens 3995/1970, Arm 1971, 410 (killing of a dog); CA Thessaloniki 1809/1990, Arm 1990 440 (Parental liability; daughter damaged a car); CA Thessaloniki 455/1982, Arm 1983, 212 (a brawl in pub for which the defendant was responsible; the plaintiff landlord was permitted to claim non-material damage); A.P. 175/2005, NoB 53 (2005) 2023 (Non-material damage given because another swimmer, in contravention of byelaws, took his dog to the beach and took the dog for a dip in the sea with him) The family of a person killed as a result of a tortious act may assert a claim for non-pecuniary loss for emotional distress (CC art. 933 third sentence).

42. PORTUGUESE CC art. 483(1) embraces both material and non-material damage. CC art. 483(1) is supplemented by CC art. 496, according to which non-pecunairy damages (danos não patrimoniais) may only be recoved if that loss " is deserving of legal protection on grounds of its severity" (on this point e.g. STJ 18 Novemer 1975, BolMinJus 251 (1975) 148, whereby mere inconvenience is excluded from the ambit of recovery for non- pecuniary loss). Portuguese law does not contain a rule which corresponds to the German CC § 253 or the Greek CC art. 299. It may be recalled that these provisions both provide that non-material damage may only be compensated in instances provided for by law.w

43. However, DUTCH CC art. 6:95 has adopted the latter principle and it provides : To the extent that the law confers a right to compensation thereof, the damage comprises of pecuniary loss and any other prejudice", a claim for the latter may only be asserted " insofar as a right of compensation is envisaged by the law". CC art. 6:95 expressly distinguishes patrimonial loss from other prejudice; the latter are only compensatable when the law expressly provides for their recovery. The terms "other prejudice" is understood as encompassing the socalled non-material (intangible or non patrimonial) loss (see further Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], nos. 464 ff pp. 424 ff). A claim may only be asserted once the requisites of CC art. 6:101 satisfied, essentially therefore, (a) in respect of intentional infliction of immaterial prejudice (b) in respect of injury to corporeal and incorporeal personality rights and (c) violations to the reputation of the dead.

44. ESTONIAN LOA § 128(1) makes the distinction between pecuniary and non material loss. CC § 128(5) adds that: "non-patrimonial damage involves primarily the physical and emotional distress and suffering caused to the aggrieved person". The subsequent provisions each explicitly detail which forms of injury entitle a claim for damages: CC § 130(2) (Injury to Body and to health), CC § 131 in conjunction with CC § 134(2) (grave injury to liberty, honour and personality) and CC § 134(4) (Damage to or loss of intangible property; only in circumscribed circumstances is a tortfeasor deemed liable for non-material damage). For further analysis see Tammiste, Juridica 2004, 129–141. In a similar fashion, LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.250(2) emodies the principle that "non-pecuniary damage shall be compensated only in cases provided for by laws." Once more, CC art. 6.263(2) explicitly confirms the applicability of this principle to the field of tort law . CC art. 6.250(1) defines non-pecunairy loss in the following terms : „Non-pecuniary damage shall be deemed to be a person's suffering, emotional experiences, inconveniences, mental shock, emotional depression, humiliation, deterioration of reputation, diminution of possibilities to associate with others, etc., evaluated by a court in terms of money".

45. Similarly, in the NORDIC COUNTRIES, a distinction is drawn between patrimonial and non patrimonial damages. The latter are only recoverable in cases specially ordained by law. However, there is an absence of an express statutory provision which would serve to buttress the aforementioned basis principle.(Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 371; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 346). SWEDISH law uses the Tort Liability Act chap. 5 § 1(3) as its point of departure. According to this provision, damages for personal injury encompasses compensation for pain and suffering (sveda och värk) or for other enduring impairments (lyte eller annat stadigvarande men); both heads of damages connote compensation for non material loss. The same holds true for compensation for "particular interferences" which are also enumerated in this provision, (Sandstedt, VersRAI 2002, 10, 11). The corresponding regulations under DANISH are encountered Erstatningsansvarslov § 1 in conjunction with. §§ 3-4 and, under FINNISH Law in Tort Liability Act chap. 5 § 2 and § 2c (however, there is no corresponding reference to "particular interferences"). The compensatable heads of damages for no-pecuniary loss damages comprise further damages for socalled injury caused by affront to feelings, i.e recovery is permitted for injury to liberty and honour as well as for particular manifestations of the intrusion to a person's privacy. According to SWEDISH law, the aforementioned damages to one's feelings (e.g. in respect of criminal "disturbances of the peace") may also be awarded in cases of mere damage to physical property (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 373). The legal basis for compensation for injured feelings is presently anchored in Tort Liability Act chap. 2 § 3 (fort h most recent amendment to this Act, see Sandstedt loc. cit.). Under DANISH law, damages for injured feelings is governed by Erstatningsansvarslov § 26, under FINNISH law, the claim for damages for socalled "suffering" is regulated in Tort Liability Act chap. 5 § 6. Moreover, in Scandanavia, a claim for non-material damage may be asserted for breaches of intellectual property rights and socalled right to a name (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 73, fn. 56 and 57). To conclude, SWEDISH Marketing Act (marknadsföringslag [1995:450]) § 29(2) provides: " When determing compensation to be awarded to business operators, regards may be had to circumstances which are not exclusively of an economic nature". In DENMARK, the courts have reached the same conclusion based on a statutory provision that deviates somewhat from the Swedish position (HD 30 August 1989, UfR 1989, 1146). Conversely, in FINLAND, it may be assumed that recovery of non-material damage is not permitted for infringements of competition law (Kaulamo, Probleme des finnischen Wettbewerbs- und Marketingrechts, 401).

46. In both ENGLISH and SCOTS law damages for non-pecuniary loss are available where the tort (or delict) results in physical personal injury, death, psychiatric injury, intentional invasion of a person's personal sphere, defamation, or where there is nuisance affecting the environment of immoveable property (Hunter v. Canary Wharf Ltd. [1996] 2 WLR 348). In cases of nuisance in English law this is confined to householders, on a view that the tort is aimed at protecting land (ibid.). However, recently in effect such a claim has been recognised in cases against public authorities as available to a wider range of people affected though basing the claim on a breach of Human Rights law (Marcic v. Thames Water Utilities Ltd. [2002] EWCA Civ 64, [2002] QB 929). The question whether a distinction between intention and other bases of liability has a bearing on whether non-pecuniary damages are available is in English law currently controversial. The view has been expressed judicially that in all torts involving intention damages for non-pecuniary loss are always available for distress, inconvenience or discomfort (Hunter v. Canary Wharf [1997] AC 655 per Lord Hoffmann). Non-pecuniary damages are generally available in strict liability cases on the same basis as they are in negligence cases. Consumer Protection Act 1987 s. 6(1)(a) and (c) confirm this general rule. In the law of defamation liability is strict and awards under this head can be large. In both England and Scotland defamation cases can be heard and decided by jury trial. In response to the European Court of Human Rights (Tolstoy Miloslavsky v. United Kingdom, ECHR 13 July 1995, App. no. 18139/91) holding that jury awards without any control result in this field in a potential breach of Eur.Conv.Hum.Rights art. 10 (freedom of expression), control at appellate level has now been instituted, putting maximum levels on such awards.

47. The terminology for describing awards of non-pecuniary damages differs between English and Scots law. In SCOTLAND these awards are categorised as awards of solatium as opposed to damages for "patrimonial loss". In ENGLAND they are awards made under the head of "general damages", which is the heading that comprehends all aspects of a claim that are not capable of precise assessment. In cases of physical personal injury the award in England is characterised within this as an award for „pain and suffering and loss of amenities of life". In both jurisdictions the general nature of such awards results in them also being made in cases where the claimant is permanently unconscious and shown not to be suffering any pain (H. West Ltd. v. Shephard [1964] AC 326; Dalgleish v. Glasgow Corp. 1976 SC 32). In Scotland solatium awards for personal injury are analysed into three components (while awarding one figure), namely, pain and suffering, loss of faculties and amenities, and loss of expectation of life, which roughly map onto the factors that are considered in an English award.

VI. Non-economic loss juristischer Personen

48. It is well-nigh universally accepted that legal persons can also sustain non-economic loss and entitled to compensation thereof. This is a valid proposition for e.g for FRANCE (le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2002/2003), no. 1466 pp. 387-388; compare also. Cass.ch.mixte 6 September 2002, Bull.ch.mixte 2002, no. 4 p. 9 symbolic sum of one franc awarded in facour of a consumer protection agency]) and for BELGIUM (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, 260). Typical cases pertain to injury to reputation (Schuermans/Van Oevelen/Persyn/Ernst/Schuermans, TPR 1994, no. 4.2 pp. 932-934). The criminal law division of the French Cour de cassation decided, however, in an action civile (in which a tort claim in respect of damage arising out of a criminal offence is raised and adjudicated upon within the criminal process), that the State and local authorities cannot assert a claim for compensation for non-pecuniary loss (Cass.crim. 26 February 1986, GazPal 1986 Som., 339). In addition, under the private law, legal persons are not entitled to assert a claim for damages for infringment of the right to one's own image or the breach of the right to respect for privacy (Tallon, Rép.Dr.Civ. VIII, v° Personnalité (Droits de la) (1996), no. 153; otherwise for Belgium - protection of the company's inner workings regarded as an aspect of the protection of the right to "private life" - de Page and Masson, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge II(1)[4], no. 20 pp. 29-30).

49. Despite eliciting some criticism in legal literature, (e.g. Gómez Pomar, Comentario a la sentencia del Tribunal Supremo, 4) the approach of the SPANISH courts is to also award legal persons damages for non-pecuniary loss (TS 23 March 1987, RAJ 1987 (1) no. 1716 p. 1631; TS 4 October 1997, RAJ 1997 (4) no. 7641 p. 12103; TS 20 February 2002, RAJ 2002 (2) no. 3501 p. 6117). A corresponding situatuion prevails in AUSTRIA (OGH 5 December 1989, SZ 62/192; Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 11/2, fn. 5) and for ITALY. Practical examples relate mostly to innterference with honour and reputation, (Cass. 10 July 1991, no. 7642, Giur.it. 1992, I, 1, 96), prejudicing credibility (Cass. 3 March 2000, no. 2367, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 518; Cass. 5 December 1992, no. 12951, Foro it. 1994, I, 561), injury to the right to one's name and image (for the latter see. Corte dei Conti, sez. riun. 23 April 2003, no. 10, Giur.it. 2003, 1710 re. The protection of a local authority's image; Compensation of the danno esistenziale). It is even possible to infringe a legal person's private sphere (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, arts. 2043-2059, 1204-1205). The following have been deemed to connote creditors: private law companies (Cass. 3 March 2000 loc. cit.), local authorites (Cass. 15 April 1998, no. 3807, Resp.civ. e prev. 1998, 992), a foreign State (Cass. 5 December 1992 loc. cit.) and Italian State (Cass. 10 July 1991 loc. cit.).

50. Furthermore, non pecuniary loss suffered by legal persons is also deemed recoverable in HUNGARY (where this followed already from the former CC § 354), in SLOVENIA (LOA art. 132: "encroachment upon the reputation of a legal person"), in POLAND (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 244; SN 15 December 1975, LEX no. 77/80), in THE NETHERLANDS (see. inter alia Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 380; Schadevergoeding [-Deurvorst], art. 106, no 11; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht III[10], no. 240 p. 227; Overeem, Smartegeld, 54-55; CFI Amsterdam 8 March 2006, LJN AV3959), in GREECE (A.P. 479/1968, NoB 17/1969, 597; CA Athens 4105/2004, DEE 12 [2006] 306 [The Consumer Protection Act 2251/1994 art. 10(9) and (13) (now arts. 10(15) and (16)(b) as inserted by Act no.3587/2007): award of non- material damages to Consumer Protection Agency; relayed to charitable organisation]), in PORTUGAL (Capelo de Sousa, Direito de personalidade, 599; Vaz Serra, Reparação do dano não patrimonial, BolMinJus 83 [1959], 70; Gouveia de Andrade, Da ofensa do crédito, 73; Ferreira Dias, O dano moral, 39; STJ 15 June 1994, BolMinJus [1998] 438; STJ 5 October 2003 and STJ 5 October 2003; compare, however, on the issue of the socalled danos patrimoniais indirectos of legal persons STJ 9 June 2005) and in the NORDIC COUNTRIES (. e.g. for SWEDEN Marketing Act § 29 and for DENMARK Lynge Andersen, UfR 1977, 241).

51. Conversely, in GERMANY, a legal person cannot generally claim damages for non – pecuniary loss. The fact that tort law protects the incorporeal personality rights of legal persons is indeed uncontentious, however, the courts are of the view that the function of an award of "satisfaction" cannot not be fulfilled in the case of a legal person thereby leading to the exclusion of a claim for non-material loss (BGH 8 July 1980, BGHZ 78, 24, 28; CA Munich 28 May 2003, MDR 2003, 1418). An exception is however permitted for legally incorporated religious organisations (BGH 25 September 1980, BGHZ 78, 274, 280). In contrast, the COMMON Law entitles a legal person to pursue a claim for redress of non-material harm in respect of damage to business reputation (Jameel v. Wall Street Journal Europe SPRL (No. 3) [2006] UKHL 44, [2007] 1 AC 359).

52. On 6 April 2000, the European Court of Human Rights decided in that case of Comingersoll S.A. v. Portugal, ECHR [GC] 6 April 2000, App. no. 35382/97, that a public limited company may also claim compensation for non-pecuniary loss pursuant to art. 41 ECHR, the loss originated from the undue length of civil proceeding relating to a claim arising out of bills of exchange (see further Ress, FS Ishikawa, 429).

VII. Breach of Absolute Rights

53. In Europe, one of the most controversial questions remains the question as to what what significance should be ascribed to the concept of absolute rights within the framework of tort law. It is indeed true that, in all of the European jurisdictions prejudice resulting from a breach of absolute rights is, in principle, recoverable, however, there is a lack of consensus on what hierarcharical level these rights are to be ranked (for further analysis of this issue, see VIII.), and, secondly, above all, on the determination of the issue- whether a violation of absolute rights is of paramount or merely of accidential importance for tort law. In the latter case, tort liability may arise even in the absence of an infringement of such a right; its presence merely amounts to an evaluatory parameter, one of many, to be used by the courts when it comes to fleshing out the content of the "intrinsic" requisites for establishing liability (damage, fault and causation). It should be noted that the concept of absolute rights is not one that is employed in common law jurisdictions.

54. Tort liability under BELGIAN, FRENCH, MALTESE and LUXEMBOURGIAN law does not depend on the breach of a legally protected absolute right. These legal orders only require the occurence of damage, but then are of the view that the mere infringement of a right, alone cannot justify the imposition of liability because this infringement does not necessarily entail that damage arises from the breach (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 247 p. 3; Dirix, Het begrip schade, no. 1 p. 13; Ravarani, La responsabilité civile, no. 691 p. 487; Cass. 21 June 1990, RW 1990-91, 1199). An exception to this basic rule has developed out of a number of judgments of the FRENCH Cour de cassation, which espied not only a dommage arising out of breaches of rights to ownership and intellectual property ipso iure but at the same time also perceived a delictual faute (see in particular Cass.civ. 11 October 1983, Bull.civ. 1983, I, no. 225 p. 201 [infrigment of copyright] and Cass.req. 6 March 1934, D.P. 1937, I, 17, note Blaevoet [violation of an owner's droit de possession]).

55. Similarly from a SPANISH persepective, protection of absolute rights is not the function of tort law, rather this task is assigned to other civil actions, in particular, the action for the restitution of goods (acción reivindicatoria) and a negatory action (acción negatoria) (Pantaleón Prieto, Artículo 1902, p. 1972; Díez-Picazo, Derecho de daños, 291; De Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 260). These claims merely require an encroachment of the claimant's sphere of control amounting to a violation of the holder's subjective right, conversely neither damage nor fault are required. In contrast to this position, the provisions of Spanish tort law do not require the violation of the claimant's subjective right (either absolute or relative) or breach of a legally protected interest (Pantaleón Prieto loc. cit. 1993 ff; Díez-Picazo loc. cit. 50). According to CC art. 1902 in principle, all damage is recoverable, the rider added that recovery is not permitted if the loss was sustained to an interest that was immoral or illegal.

56. Similarly ITALIAN CC art. 2043 does not employ the notion of the violation of an absolute right or legal interets. The determinitive prerequisite for the impsoition of liability is rather the (culpable) infliction of a danno ingiusto. In turn, a danno ingiusto generally arises when a legally protected interest is infringed (see Note I1 above). Detriment suffered as a result of the breach of an absolute right connotes a legally protected interest, therefore there is no doubt tort laiability can be incurred for sucgh breachs (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, arts. 2043-2059, p. 194). Of course, this does not preclude the recovery of damage under CC art. 2043 which does not arise from such a breach.

57. The codifications of Central and Eastern Europe universally follow the approach of the Romance legal orders. None of the Codes in the basic norm refer tot he infringment of a right as a prerequisite for tort liability to arise; the determining factor (and adequate in itself) everywhere is the infliction of damage (CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC § 420; HUNGARIAN CC § 339(1); POLISH CC art. 415; SLOVENIAN LOA § 131).

58. The approach of GERMAN CC § 823(1) stands in stark contradistinction to the aforementioned codifications. According to this provision, tort liability only arises if injury is caused in an unlawful and culpable manner to "life, body, health, liberty property or any other right". Only under exceptional circumstances, will tort liability arise independant of a breach of these right. This will ensue particularly in the cases appertaining to § 823(2) (violation of a protective law) and to § 826 (intentionally causing harm to another in a manner that is contra bono mores). PORTUGUESE CC art. 483(1) largely corresponds to German CC § 823(1) and (2).

59. According to the wording of AUSTRIAN CC §§ 1293 and 1295, there is no requirement that an absolute right be infringed in order for tort liability to arise (analogous position to French CC arts. 1382 and 1383). However, belying this wording, both the courts and academic teaching require the violation of an absolute right or the breach of a protective statute, in order for tort liability to be incurred. The argument advanced is that it is necessary to avoid the spectre of boundless liability for damage, which would thereby place an overwhemling burden on the economy (see for adivergent view to many Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VII^2, § 1293 no. 2 and OGH 7 March 1973, SZ 46/31). The "patrimony" as such of a person is not accorded absolute protection (OGH 12 April 1984, JBl 1985, 38).

60. DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2) expressly defines an unlawful act as comprising of a "violation of a right". A similar, however considerably more precise definition is contained in ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(1).

61. The notion of "absolute rights" is not a feature of the tort law of the NORDIC COUNTRIES; these types of dogmatic categories are incompatible with Scandanavian legal realism. Similarly, the ENGLISH and IRISH law of torts as well as that of SCOTTISH law function without the legal doctrine of absolute rights.

VIII. Particulars to certain rights

62. It is a self evident proposition that the killing of a person, injury to health or to body, deprivation of liberty and damage to physical property all give rise to a claim for damages. However, as far as the treatment of other rights under the tort law is concerned, is subjected to a variegated approach. While not claiming to be an exhaustive portrayal, the following treatise affords an overview of a number of the most practically relevant rights, which the Article in Section 2 of Chapter 2 does not paticularise.

(1) Incorporeal Rights of the Personality

63. The Civil law legal orders largely regard the protection from the arrogation by a third party of the absolute right to one's name as self evident. Preventative legal protection as well as represseive legal protection (in the case of loss) exists to combat such transgressions. see for FRANCE le Tourneau and Cadiet, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2002/2003), no. 1608 p. 419 (a family member who does not bear the same name would even have locus standi: Cass.civ. 5 February 1968, JCP 1968, II, 15670); for BELGIUM (where it is a bone of contention in the case of incorporeal patrimonal rights whether a mere infringement of rights suffices for a claim of damages or whether loss must be proved.) Guldix and Wylleman, TPR 1999, 1589, 1624-1631 and CA Brussels 8 November 1989, RGAR 1992, 11906; for SPAIN Law on the Civil Status Register of 8 June 1957 (Ley del Registro Civil) art. 53; for ITALY CC arts. 7, 8 and 9 (on which see Cass. 5 October 1994, no. 8081, Giur.it. 1996, I, 1, 842 and Cass. 7 March 1991, no. 2426, Foro it. 1991, I, 2082; on the controversarial question as to whether a claim for recovery of danno morale, Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve al codice civile[6], sub art. 8, § 3); for HUNGARY CC §§ 77 and 84; for POLAND CC art. 23; for ROMANIA CC art. 54, for GERMANY CC § 12 (on which see BGH 26 June 2003, BGHZ 155, 273 and BGH 5 October 2006, WM 2007, 35); for AUSTRIA CC § 43 (on which see OGH 7 November 1962, SZ 35/110; OGH 22 October 1986, SZ 59/182 and Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II², 9); for GREECE CC art. 58; for PORTUGAL CC arts. 72 and 74; for THE NETHERLANDS CFI Rotterdam, 4 February 1994, NedJur 1995, no. 39 p. 149; for ESTONIA LOA § 1046(1) and for SWEDEN the Act on Names and Pictures in Advertising [Lag (1978:800) om namn och bild i reklam].

64. The same holds true for the right to oppose unauthorised use and exploitaion of one's image and to assert a claim for damages in such cases. See for FRANCE CA Versailles 30 June 1994, D. 1995 jur. 645, note Ravanas; TGI Nanterre 6 April 1995, GazPal 1995 jur. 285; for BELGIUM see the references in the previous note; for SPAIN Cost. art. 18(1) and Law 1/82 of 5 May 1982 on Civil Protection for Civil Protection of the Right to Honour, to a Sphere of Intimacy and to Control over the Reproduction of one's own Image (Ley Orgánica 1/1982, de 5 de mayo, de Protección Civil de los Derechos al Honor, a la Intimidad Personal y Familiar, y a la Propia Imagen) art. 7(5) and (6) in conjunction with art. 8(2) and on this TS 26 January 1990, RAJ 1990 (1) no. 26 p. 60; for ITALY CC art. 10 (liability incurred if own picture or that of one's parents, spouse or child is reproduced without authorisation; see further Cass. 16 April 1991, no. 4031, Giur.it. 1991, I, 1, 1345 and – no compensation for danno morale – Cass. 10 november 1979, no. 5790, Resp.civ. e prev. 1980, 212); for HUNGARY CC §§ 80 and 84; for POLAND CC art. 23; for ROMANIA CC art. 54, for GERMANY KunstUrhG § 22; for AUSTRIA UrhG § 78 (see further OGH 6 December 1994, ZfRV 1995, 158, Rummel [-Aicher], ABGB I³, § 16 no. 19); for PORTUGAL CC art. 79; for THE NETHERLANDS HR 1 July 1988, NedJur 1988, 1000; for ESTONIA LOA § 1046(1), for SWEDEN the abovementioned Act on Names and Images in Advertising in the previous paragraph; for FINLAND among other decisions HD 21 November 1980, HD 1980 II 123 and for DENMARK among other decisions HD 25 January 1965, UfR 1965, 126.

65. The right to claim damages for a breach of the right to one's own voice is becoming increasedly accepted. See for FRANCE CFI Paris 3 December 1975, JCP 1978, II, 19002, note Bécourt; Tallon, Rép.Dr.Civ. VIII, v° Personnalité (Droits de la) (1996) no. 20 and no. 148 (here, allusions are made that a claim for damages only arises in the event of a pecuniary or non pecuniary loss eventuates); for SPAIN TC 25 April 1994, no. 117/1994, BOE no. 129 of 31 May 1994 and CA Barcelona 10 September 2003, TSJyAP 2004 (1) no. 289 p. 375); for ITALY Bianca, Diritto civile I[2], 187; for HUNGARY CC §§ 80 and 84; for POLAND CA Gdańsk 21 June 1991, OSA 1992, no. 8; and for AUSTRIA OGH 29 November 2001, MR 2002, 26 = RIS-Justiz RS0115837). Conversely, it remains uncertain whether the right to one's own voice as is deemed a protectable interest under DUTCH law (denying this claim CFI Utrecht 4 December 1996, NedJur 1998, no. 43 p. 237).

(2) Post-Mortal Protection of Personality Rights

66. There are varying approaches in evidence dealing with the issue as to whether and in which respect tort law protection of the personality of a person can extend beyond the grave and the purport of such rights is also contentious. We are not concerned here with cases where there there was a transgression of the deceased's personality rights while he was still alive and the assertion of such a claim befalls his successors in title

(These cases essentially fall to be resolved under the Law of Succession, compare. e.g. Cass.civ. 14 December 1999, Bull.civ. 1999, I, no. 345 p. 222: The right to resepct private and family law expires on the death of the bearer). The cases that come under consideration here concern circumstances where the deceased is "insulted".

67. It has been held in FRANCE that the deceased successors are only entitled to defend his/her memory against being portrayed in false or distorting reports, reports which are published in bad faith or where the report is excessively facetious (CA Paris 3 November 1982, D. 1983, 248, note Lindon; compare on the issue on postal-protection of image rights CA Paris 7 June 1983, GazPal 1984 jur. 528, note Lamoureux and Pochon, as well as, different view in parts, CFI Aix-en-Provence 24 November 1988, JCP 1989 éd. G., II, no. 21329, note Joël Henderycksen). In the case of an unauthorised publication of a photograph of a person's mortal remains and funeral, the widow and children are entitled to a damages claims on the grounds of interference with right to respect for family life derived from CC art. 1382 (CA Paris 26 April 1983, D. 1983 jur. 376, note Lindon). Considerable prominence is given to the fact that a criminal offence under Loi sur la liberté de la presse of 29 July 1881 art. 34(1) gives rise to a tort law action for damages (compare. Cass.civ. 22 June 1994, Bull.civ. 1994, II, no. 165 p. 95). The right to respect for private life expires eith an individual's death (Cass. 14 December 1999, Bull.civ. 1999, I, no. 345 p. 222).

68. Equally, the approach in BELGIAN equally leans towards the protection of certain rights oft he personality following the death of the bearer. This is especially true for the right to one's image, irrespective of whether it concerns the photograph of a corpse or depictions from the deceased's life which unlawfully discredit his memory (see further and also on the construction of de Page and Masson, Traité élémentaire de droit civil belge II(1)[4], no. 55 p. 69).

69. Likewise, post-mortal protection of personality rights commands general acceptance in SPANISH law. Arts. 4 and 5 of Law 1/82 of 5 May 1982 on Civil Protection for the Right to Honour, Intimate Sphere, and the Right to Control the Reproduction of one's Image defines the class of persons entitled to make a claim and also regulates an entitlement in the event that the injurious act took place during the lifetime of the deceased; art. 9(4) loc. cit. additionally clarifies the issue to whom non-pecuniary damages are due. TC 214/1991 of 11 November 1991, BOE no. 301 of 17 December 1991 conferred a right on a Jewish woman living in Spain in her capacity as a survivor of Holocaust the right to pursue civil and criminal law actions in order to defend the collective honour of the Jewish people against attacks.

70. ITALIAN law principally guarantees the protection of the deceased's dignity by vesting a right of action in the deceased relatives to vindicate this protection (Bianca, Diritto civile I[2], 154 and 187; CFI Rome 29 June 1998, Resp.civ. e prev. 1999, 477). Special copyright rules augment this protection (see in particular LA art. 23). In GERMANY, post-mortal personality rights even enjoy the status of constitutional protection (constitutively BVerfG 24 February 1971, BVerfGE 30, 173, 194; compare also BVerfG 5 April 2001, NJW 2001, 2957; for a comprehensive overview see Pabst, NJW 2002, 999-1004). An obligation to compensate for non-economic loss is not generally recognised (BGH 6 December 2005, BGHZ 165, 203 and BGH 5 October 2006, WM 2007, 35); however, at first instance, there have been deliberations as to whether an exception to this rule should be fashioned for severe violations (CA Jena 31 March 2005, NJW-RR 2005, 1566). Post-mortal protection of the right to one's image is subject of special regulation (KunstUrhG § 22). In AUSTRIA it has been emphasised that the right of free development of the personality can only be fully comprehended if it is recognised that the right endures after death, the protection of the deceased's honour and right to respect for private life merit special consideration under the heading of post-mortal protection (OGH 23 May 1984, SZ 57/98, Rummel [-Aicher], ABGB I³, no. 28). HUNGARIAN CC §§ 84 and 85(3) (1)(e), ROMANIAN Decree 31/1954 art. 56 ~~und 85(3)~~, GREEK CC art. 57(1), DUTCH CC art. 6:106(1)(c) and PORTUGUESE CC art. 71(1) adopt a similar approach. The latter provision introduces a special rule to CC art. 68(1), stipulating that an individual's personality does not endure after death. CC art. 71(2) determines the class of persons that are entitled to bring an action to vindicate an individual's posthumous interests (see further Leite de Campos, BFD, L [1974] 297 and STJ 11 December 2003). POLISH law too allows a close relative of a deceased person to recover damages if the latter's memory or reputation is injured by false statements (SN 24 February 2004, OSNC 2005, poz. 48; Radwański, Prawo cywilne[8], 167).

71. Likewise, the NORDIC COUNTRIES also recognise a right to psot motal protection of personality rights, this right is, however, only crystallised under criminal law, cf. DANISH Penal Code §§ 264c, 264d, 274; SWEDISH Penal Code chap. 5 § 4 (on this point, see HD 14 December 1966, NJA 1966, 565) and FINNISH Penal Code chap. 27 § 4.

72. The COMMON LAW of England and Irland exclude any posthumous protection for injuries to an individual's reputation; it is said that one cannot defame the dead (Clerk and Lindsell [-Brazier], Torts[16], 21-01).

(3) Further rights with personality aspects attached

73. Moroever, courts of some jurisdictions are displaying an increasing tendency to create new absolute rights which reinforce the right to personality. They include the courts of e.g. PORTUGAL (v. Bar, The Common European Law of Torts II, 88; Hörster, Parte geral, 259; STJ 2 October 2003; STJ 4 July 1978, BolMinJus, 279 [1978], 124; so-called direito ao repouso e à tranquilidade") and in SPAIN (TS 29 April 2003, RAJ 2003 (2) no. 3041 p. 5721; cf. Martín Vida, VersRAI 2004, 20-23; Martín Vida, VersRAI 2005, 57-63 and 2006, 5-8) recognised right to rest and recovery which is derived from the constitutionally protected rights to intimate sphere and inviolability of a dwelling. Claimants in other jusrisditions must rely on the law concerning the respective interests of neighbours in cases of noise nuisance because tort liability is dependent on the presence of injury to body or health. This correpsonds tot he prevailing situation in GERMANY (CC § 823(1)) and in AUSTRIA (OGH 13 July 1988, JBl 1989, 41).

74. In turn, the latter two countries recognise that membership of an association is accorded the status of a right and thus the unjustified exclusion of a member oft he association can give rise to a claim for damages (BGH 6 February 1984, NJW 1984, 1884; BGH 12 March 1990, NJW 1990, 2877; OGH 10 July 1997, RIS-Justiz RS0108196). In ROMANIA adopts a similar stance (CC art. 998; CSJ 16 March 2001, secţia civilă, decision no. 1609). In DENMARK, damages may be recovered fort he unlawful exclusion from a trade union (HD 16 December 1936, UfR 1936, 672), and the same holds true for SPAIN in respect of an unjustified withdrawal of shareholder position (TS 20 March 1998, RAJ 1998 (1) no. 1712 p. 2649).

75. In addition, under Spanish law, reference must be made to right of protection of the family's intimate sphere (intimidad familiar) which is derived from Law 1/82 (intimidad familiar), which geared towards protecting "family secrets", i.e. facts which affect the family and of which only family members have cognisance of (TC 197/1991 of 17 October, BOE no. 274 of 15 November 1991; TC 134/1999 of 15 July, BOE no. 197 of 18 August 1999 ; cf. also Igartua Arregui, La Ley 1990, I, 1066, 1071).

76. In turn, the ITALIAN court consistently express the interests which they have classified as worthy of protection rights in terms of rights, their number include e.g. the right to family serenity (diritto alla serenità familiare: CFI Milano 18 February 1988, Resp.civ. e prev. 1988, 454) and the right to the integrity of one's patrimony (diritto all'integrità del patrimonio: Cass.sez.un. 26 January 1971, no. 174, Giur.it. 1971, I, 1, 680, note Visintini; Foro it. 1971, I, 342, 1284, notes Jemolo and Busnelli).

(4) Personality rights of legal persons

77. Please see the aforementioned notes under VI for an examination of how the personality rights of legal persons are legally protected in the respective jurisdictions.Wherever a legal person is permitted recovery for non-pecuniary loss, it thereby follows that legal persons are also entitled to personality rights. The SPANISH courts have even conferred a right on legal entities under private law to inviolability of certain areas of its business premises (TC 69/1999 of 26 April 1999, BOE no. 130 of 1 June 1999). Conversely, it has been held that legal persons under public law are not holders of personality rights (TC 107/1988 of 8 June 1988, BOE no. 152 of 25 June 1988; TS 24 October 1988, RAJ 1988 (5) no. 7635 p. 7492). It is a self- evident proposition that private corporations enjoy a right to protection of their professional reputation (TC 139/1995 of 26 September, BOE no. 246 of 14 October 1995; TC 193/1995 of 11 December 1995, BOE no. 11 of 12 January 1996; TS 15 April 1992, RAJ 1992 (3) no. 4419 p. 5849; TS 14 March 1996, RAJ 1996 (2) no. 2178 p. 2936; TS 20 February 2002, RAJ 2002 (2) no. 3501 p. 6117, TS 5 October 1989, RAJ 1989 (6) no. 6889 p. 8011); they can even assert a right to their own image (TC 19/1983, of 14 March 1983, BOE no. 87 of 12 April 1983). Similarly, in ITALY, in conjunction with a right to claim damages for violations of honour and good reputation, it is conceded that legal entities enjoy a right under tort law to personal identity (CC 10.7.1991, no. 7642, Giur.it. 1992, I, 1, 96), integrity (CC 03.03.2000, no. 2367,Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 518; Cass. 5 December 1992, no. 12951, Foro it. 1994, I, 561) and to protection of its private sphere (Franzoni, Dei fatti illeciti, arts. 2043-2059, pp. 1204-1205). The position under HUNGARIAN Law is to apply the rules pertaining to protection of the personality to legal persons, unless the nature oft he rights entails that they can only be asserted by natural persons (CC § 75(2) i.V.m. § 84(1)(e)). The position is the same in POLAND (CC art. 43). Similarly, ROMANIA intends to adopt an approach along these lines (Proiectul Noului Cod civil: Draft new CC art. 196). Under AUSTRIAN Law, while it is true that the prevailing law holds that only natural persons can be insulted, this does not preclude granting an absolute right to legal persons in respect of the protection of their corporate professional reputation (OGH 11 January 1996, ecolex 1996, 361). SLOVENIAN LOA art. 183 stipulates that the court shall award a legal person just monetary compensation for the defamation of its reputation or good name, independent of the reimbursement of material damage, if it finds that the circumstances so justify, even if there is no material damage. On this provision see further Supreme Court 7 May 1993, II Ips 586/92.

78. Similarly, it is accepted under the COMMON Law, that it is possible to defame legal persons. It is not necessary to plead or adduce proof of actual economic damage in cases where the defamation affects the plaintiff's corporate reputation; general damages will also be awarded where such proof is absent (Jameel v. Wall Street Journal Europe SPRL (No. 3) [2006] UKHL 44, [2007] 1 AC 359).

IX. Violations of relative rights

79. Relative rights, in particular contractual claims, can generally only be transgressed by those who are under an obligation to perform under the contract. Liability for legal injuries of this type accordingly fall to be dealt with by that part of the legal order which regulates such claims, this especially pertains to contract law. In principle, parties who are not privy to the contract cannot acquire rights from it nor are they placed under any duty to observe the rights flowing from the contract as these rights are solely relative and effect the relations between the contractual partners. As a general rule, it is against public policy and thereby prohibited to intentionally prevail on another not to perform his contract with a third party; only in such circumstances will a tort action which can be enforced erga omnes flows from a right under a contract (see Notes under VI.–2:211 (Loss upon inducement of breach of obligation)). Naturally, many exceptions, which are not of an inconsiderable purport have been created regarding the application of this common point of departure. Developments engendered in France are particularly noteworthy in this regard.

80. FRENCH CC art. 1165 clearly articulates the basic rule that "agreements produce effect only between the contracting parties". Nonetheless (and despite drawing weighty academic criticism) it appears that the principle of opposabilité du contrat par les parties aux tiers has gained the upperhand. According to this exegesis, a third party is bound to respect the legal situation created by the contractual partners (for an in-depth analysis see v. Bar and Drobnig [-Wintgen], The Interaction of Contract Law and Tort and Property Law in Europe, nos. 625-664). The converse situation, in which a contractual infringement establishes delictual faute is called faute opposabilité du contrat par les tiers aux parties (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[8], no. 490 pp. 482-483). The Supreme Court has, on many occasions,endorsed both aspects of the new doctrine (e.g. Cass.civ. 17 October 2000, JCP 2001 éd. G., I, 338, no. 6, note Viney [faute of the editor of a magazine for publishing advance excerpts of book which was about to be published] and Cass.civ. 18 July 2000 and 13 Febraury 2001, JCP 2001 éd. G., I, 338, nos. 8-10, note Viney [a breach of contract committed by one of the parties which caused harm to a third party represented faute pursant to CC art. 1382]). Cass. 5 April 2005, RTD civ 2005, 602, observant. Jourdain, argument is however contained: a third party can only rely on the breach of contract to ground tort liability if this breach amounts to a breach of a general duty to refrain from injuring others.

81. Similarly, the BELGIAN courts have affirmed that the fact that there is a contract in existence is a fact which a third party must take account of. Consequently, collaborating to breach of contract based on a negligent omission to acquaint oneself of these circumstances can constitute a delictual faute (essentially Cass. 22 April 1983, RW 1983-84, 427, note Dirix; RCJB 1984, 359, note Merchiers). Whether the same result holds true for SPAIN on the question whether a third party is only liable vis á vis a creditor for intentionally inducing the debtor to breach its contract remains shrouded in uncertainty (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 93; Lacruz Berdejo, Elementos II(1)[4], 480; Díez-Picazo, Fundamentos II[5], 604 [who opines that intention is a necessary prerequisite]).

82. For this rubric under ITALIAN Law, it is necessary to advert to cases where the creditor suffers loss as the result of an injury or the death of his contractual debtor. This type of loss has been qualified as a danno ingiusto in the sense of CC art. 2043 vis á vis the third party who caused the harm (landmark case the socalled Meroni-Fall Cass.sez.un. 26 January 1971, no. 174, Giur.it. 1971, I, 1, 680, note Visintini; Foro it. 1971, I, 342, 1284, notes Jemolo and Busnelli [killing of an employee]; see further e.g.

Cass.sez.un. 12 November 1988, no. 6132, Giur.it. 1990, I, 1, 280; Cass. 22 September 1986, no. 5699, Giust.civ.Mass. 1986, fasc. 8-9; Cass. 27 May 1982, no. 3284, Giust.civ.Mass. 1982, fasc. 5; Cass. 1 April 1980, no. 2105, Giust.civ.Mass. 1980, fasc. 4 [all of these cases affect the injury or death of employees] as well as Cass. 24 June 1972, no. 2135, Giur.it. 1973, I, 1, 1123 [interruption in the supply of electricity; possibly in connection with violation of property rights]); cf. on this point especially Castronovo, La nuova responsabilità civile[3], 590 and Trimarchi, Riv.Dir.Civ. 1983, I, 224, 229). In cases of inducing and acting as an accomplice to a breach of contract (e.g. Cass. 20 October 1983, no. 6160, Giur.it. 1984, I, 1, 439; Cass. 9 January 1997, no. 99, Nouva giur. civ. comm. 1998, I, 17 and Cass. 15 June 1988, no. 4090, Foro it. 1989, I, 1568 [Same piece of real estate sold twice; liability of the second buyer vis á vis the first buyer]) it appears that evidence of intention was always provided (Bianca, Diritto civile V, 605-607). In POLAND academic analysis adopts the position that an infringment of relative rights by a third person gives rise to tortious liability vis-à-vis the creditor where the third person unlawfully and through his or her fault renders the fulfilment of the obligation impossible (Radwański and Olejniczak, Zobowiązania-część ogólna[5], 17; Czachórski, Zobowiązania[9], 58).

83. Under GERMAN Law, the mere negligent contribution of a third party to a breach of contract will not suffice in principle to ground the liability of the latter as against the creditor (BGH 24 February 1954, BGHZ 12, 308). However, it has been mooted that the socalled “entitlement to make a claim” amounts to “another right” pursuant to CC § 823(1). This doctrine encompasses cases where a third party who is not a creditor accepts the performance of a good faith debtor whereupon the latter is released from his obligations vis á vis the true creditor. However, the courts have ,thus far, failed to pick up on this submission (overview of the current state of the discussions i*nter alia*. in Medicus, Schuldrecht BT[13], no. 812).

84. In contrast, in AUSTRIA, the OGH 30 August 2000, JBl 2002, 182, note Dullinger and Riedler and detailed analysis by Fötschl, VersRAI 2002, 57; 2003, 9, has held that “damages claims against third parties who encroach upon third party right to recover a debt, in certain circumscribed circumstances, may be asserted in cases of merely negligent interference” (liability of a bank affirmed where the bank arranged for a borrower to pay his debts into bank account even though these debts were previously assigned to the claimant). cf. Pletzer, Doppelveräußerung und Forderungseingriff, 103. OGH 12 December 2002, RdW 2003, no. 255 these principles were refined further.

85. In GREECE, it is exceptional that tort liability arises in cases where a third party merely negligently interferes in the contractual relations of another (e.g. von Vavouskos, I paraleipsis os simiogono gegonos eis ta adikimata tou Astikou Dikaiou, 83 and CA Athens 4393/1976, NoB 25/1977, 1367). The prevailing academic opinion regards intention as a prequisite for the impsoition of liability in this case (CC art. 919) (Georgiades, FS Larenz 1983, 175, 186; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 914, no. 46). However, liability under the basic norm of tort law (CC art. 914) ought to arise, where a third party collects or assigns effectively the debt of a third party. In addition, CA Athens 3148/1982, NoB 31/1983, 519 ruled that an interruption in electricity supply caused by a third party constituted interference with the tenant’s relative right to require their landlord to surrender the use of the property the subject of the rental agreement in conformity with the contract and this interference sufficed for the imposition of liability under CC art. 914.

86. In a similar manner, the touchstone concept in PORTUGAL remains the principle that contractual obligations can only be breached by the contractual partners (CC art. 40(2); cf. Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 74 [1958] 334; dos Santos Silva, ERPL 2006, 826, 828-829 and VersRAI 2007, 24). A third party who profit from the breach are only liable tot he creditor when the prerequisites of CC art. 483 are fulfilled, i.e. where there is a coinciding breach of an absolute right or protective law (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 85 (1959) 346; Almeida Costa, Obrigações[9], 44). The principle of relativity of contract appears thus far only to have been perforated in cases involving the protection of third parties not privy to the contract, namely by utilising the conceptual technique of contracts with protective effects for third parties (contratos com eficácia de protecção de terceiros, see STJ 14 October 2004; Sinde Monteiro, RLJ 131 [1988/89] 49; Carneiro da Frada, Teoria da confiança, 109 and 135).

87. Rights deriving from a contract are not counted as "rights" in the terms of DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2). Therefore, interference with contractual relations by a third party is actionabel under tort law if it can be interpreted as amounting to a breach of an obligation pursuant to the same provision. Apart from cases involving the procurement of a breach of contract, this casuse of action is rarely successful, cf. e.g. HR 3 May 1946, NedJur 1946 no. 323 pp. 420-423 (breach of contract by supplier also led to an increase in costs to a client of the recipient; tort liability was incurred on the former) and HR 14 June 2002, RvdW 2002, 104 (vendor sold contaminated land with full knowledge of the circumstance that the purchaser intended to sell it on to a third party; liability incurred vis á vis the ultimate purchaser). The courts further recognise that exploiting another's breach of contract to the creditor's disadvantage can constitute an unlawful act (HR 23 December 1955, NedJur 1956, 54). See further du Perron, Overeenkomsten en derden, nos. 287-292 and 326-352.

88. In respect of SWEDISH law, it has recently been decided in HD 14 September 1998, NJA 1998, 520 that a bank which released stock to a depositor even though it was aware that a lien was issued on the deposit facility, was liable in damages to the holder of the lien. In addition, recent cases have awarded damages for inducement of breach of contract (HD 2 September 2005, NJA 2005, 608). It is generally recognised in the Nordic countries that intentionally procuring a breach of contract gives rise to a claim for damages cf. for DENMARK ,at an early stage, HD 16 September 1947, UfR 1947, 1005, on this case see Gomard, Obligationsret II, 146, and for FINLAND Saxén, Skadeståndsrätt, 74 ff. See further Hagstrøm and Aarbakke, Obligasjonsrett[2], 816 ff).

X. Wrongful conception, wrongful birth and wrongful life

89. The most hotly discussed and one of the most exceptionally contentious tort law issues in many of the European jurisdictions concern legal questions arising in connection with the birth of a child. These issues fall overwhemingly within the confines of VI.–2:101 of this Draft. Based on the prevailing terminolgy used in the European jurisdictions, it follows consequently that a distinction will be drawn between liability for wrongful conception (the birth of a healthy child which was not desired by its parents, liability to the parents for medical or other error in connection with recommended contraception methods), wrongful birth (birth of a disabled child which the mother would have aborted had the disability been correctly diagnosed in time, liability to the parents) and wrongful life (similarly involves the birth of a disabled child but is actionable at the suit of the child because of a failure to abort). In all three categories, liability can be tortious or contractual.

(1) Wrongful conception

90. If a child, while healthy, is born to parents who did not want it and the birth can be ascribed to a contraceptive failure, which arose due to the faute of a third party, in particular owing to erroneous information provided by the doctor, according to FRENCH law the patient is entitled to assert a claim against her contractual partner

(doctor or hospital for material or non-material loss which she has suffered (at any rate according to Castelletta, Responsabilité médicale[2], no. 71.54; there is a derth of case law on the subject). This must be distinguished from the case where a child is born as a result of rape. In these cases, according to previous case law, the child itself may maintain an action for compensation against the rapist (Cass.crim. 4 February 1998, JCP 1998, I, 185 no. 15, note Viney; CA Caen 7 November 2002, JCP 2002 éd. G., II, 10001, note Sériaux). In light of the newly in force Loi no. 2002-303 of 4 March 2002 relative aux droits des malades et à la qualité du système de santé (see the notes under 'wrongful birth' and 'wrongful life') it remains to be seen whether the courts will adhere to conventional practice).

91. According to BELGIAN law liability of a doctor for erroneous performance or the provision of erroneous information in connection with a sterilisation procedure for the father or mother is generally governed by contractual rules. It is necessary to prove the faute of the doctor (de Kezel, NjW 2004, p. 546 no. 9). The doctor is liable to compensate the financial and mental suffering that can be attributed to the pregnancy, birth and presence of an unwanted child. Factors taken into account are those that can be fairly attributed to the medical professional as a result of his (contractual) faute are the subject of examination. The courts will not take into that fact that the child's mother could have aborted the child or could have given it up for adoption (de Kezel loc. cit. no. 20; CFI Kortrijk 1 February 1994, RW 1995-96, 57; of a different view CFI Luik 10 May 2001, T. Gez. 2001-02, 247).

92. Under SPANISH Law, this type of liability, a number of exceptions apart, is generally recognised. Liability is based on a violation of the right to self determination (TS (3. Senat) 3 October 2000, RAJ 2000 (4) no. 7799 p. 12036); For the most part liability was imposed for breach of the duty to inform of risks in connection with the sterilisation (TS 25 April 1994, RAJ 1994 (2) no. 3073 p. 4169; TS 31 January 1996, RAJ 1996 (1) no. 546 p. 719; TS 11 February 1997, RAJ 1997 (1) no. 940 p. 1469; TS 11 May 2001, RAJ 2001 (3) no. 6197 p. 9524), technically incorrect performance of surgery (TS 10 October 1995, RAJ 1995 (4) no. 7403 p. 9826) or incorrectly inserted contraception (TS 24 September 1999, RAJ 1999 (4) no. 7272 p. 11439). The extent of recoverable damage remains a contentious issue. A number of courts situate the recovery of costs for the maintaining the child as economic loss (e.g. CA Barcelona 20 September 1999, AC 1999-III, no. 1973 p. 487), other courts have held only non-pecuniary loss to be recoverable stemming from a pregnancy, risk of which was thought to have been eliminated; conversely the doctor is not burdened with the actual costs of maintaining the child (TS 24 September 1999 loc. cit.; CA Alicante 9 July 1999, zitiert nach Vicente Domingo, El daño, 250, fn. 187; CA Badajoz, 22 April 1991, La Ley 1991, III, no. 11795 p. 484).

93. ITALIAN Cass. 8 July 1994, no. 6464, Giur.it. 1995, I, 1, 790 rejected a parents'claim for recovery of economic loss resulting from an unsuccessful abortion; solely the mother's danno biologico is recoverable. In cases where failure in birth control methods can be attributed to medical error, the courts of first instance have held that here the parents' economic loss was recoverable and the courts did not regard the failure to abort as contributorty negligence (CFI Venezia, 10 September 2002, Giur.mer. 2003, 468; CFI Milano 10 October 1997, Danno e resp. 1999, 82).

94. The HUNGARIAN courts have refused to acknowledge damages claims arising from the birth of a healthy child; neither maintenance costs or mental suffering associated with the upbringing of an unwanted child are recoverable (Stadt- und Komitatsgericht Veszprém [zit. nach Köles, Orvosi műhiba perek, 287-291]; BH 2000/207 and BH 2004/143 [=EBH 2003/941]). Academic writers share the same views as the courts (Dósa, Állam- és Jogtudomány 2000, 143-153; Dósa, Az orvos kártérítési felelőssége, 134-154; Jobbágyi, Jogtudományi Közlöny 2004, 1-9; Herpai, Magyar Jog 2005, 691-701). POLISH courts have decided that where pregnancy results from a rape and a doctor unlawfully prevents a legal abortion contrary to the wish of the pregnant woman, that constitutes an infringment of her general personal freedom and gives rise to liability for both economic and non-economic loss (SN 21 November 2003, OSNC 2003, poz. 104; SN 22 February 2006, OSNC 2006, poz. 123).

95. If a healthy but unwanted child is born owing to a clinical error, then under GERMAN law, the parents have an actionable loss under both tort and contract law. An unwanted pregnancy, the product of a failed sterilisation is qualified as physical injury (BGH 18 March 1980, NJW 1980, 1452, 1453). This in turn gives rise to a claim for compensation of non-material loss. This claim will also ensue if no side effects materialise during the course of the pregnancy (BGH 10 March 1981, NJW 1981, 2002, 2003; BGH 19 June 1984, NJW 1984, 2625). Together with the doctor, the pharmacist may also be liable in negligence, for example, by providing negligent advice in respect of method of birth control (BGH 27 June 1995, NJW 1995, 2407, 2408). However, an action for the loss that the parents suffer in respect of costs of maintaining the unwanted child lies solely within contract law, namely the loss is not recoverable under tort law (Staudinger [-Hager], BGB[13], § 823, no. B 14; CA Frankfurt 25 June 1992, NJW 1993, 2388, 2389; BGH 18 March 1980 loc. cit.; BGH 10 March 1981 loc. cit.; BGH 2 December 1980, NJW 1981, 630; BGH 19 June 1984 loc. cit.; BGH 27 June 1995, NJW 1995, 2407, 2409). The claim is also actionable at the suit of the father on the grounds that his loss is regarded as coming within the protective scope of the contract (BGH 18 March 1980 loc. cit.; BGH 19 February 2002, NJW 2002, 1489, 1490; BGH 18 January 1983, BGHZ 86, 240, 249).

96. As regards AUSTRIAN law it was decided in OGH 14 September 2006, JBl 2007, 171 that "the birth of a healthy, but unwanted child [is] not damage in the legal sense". Consequently a doctor is not liable either for maintenance of the child or to compensate for pain and suffering of childbirth if, despite a vasectomy, a pregnancy occurs and no warning of this risk was given. See also OGH 25 May 1999, SZ 72/91.

97. PORTUGUESE academic writing had adopted the umbrella term of "wrongful birth" to encapsulate the cases we have designated as "wrongful conception" (Pinto Monteiro, RLJ 134 [2001-2002], 378). It is assumped that every time that a medical error results in an unplanned pregnancy, the parents may bring an action in order to obtain compensation (Menezes Cordeiro, Tratado I, 282). This claim is either based on the violation of the mother's right to self-determination (autodeterminação) in family planning or on the breach of the doctor's duty to give serious, credible and responsible information under CC art. 485(2). In practical terms, cases of failed sterilisations or failed abortions primarily end up before the courts (Pinto Monteiro loc. cit.). Negligently rendering performance of contractual duties is deemed to obligate compensation of losses which stem from this. There is no abridgement of the claim on the basis of the perceived joy attendent upon the birth of a healthy child. If the contract was concluded with a hospital run by the State, the hospital is also obliged to compensate loss (Menezes Cordeiro loc. cit.; Trib. Conf. 19 March 1971 [quoted by Figueiredo Dias and Sinde Monteiro, BolMinJus 332 (1984) 22, notes 2 and 3]; Trib. Conf. 5 November 1981, BolMinJus 311 (1981) 195). The parents could also choose to pursue an action under tort law instead of basing their claim in contract. This follows from the general doctrine pertaining to concurrence of actions (see the Notes under VI.–1:103 (Scope of application), see further e.g. STJ 19 June 2001, RLJ 134 [2001-2002] 371). Naturally, the child cannot hope to base an action on the fact of its existence, even if its birth transpired due to clinical error. At the time of writing, there is a lack of case law on the issue, the same holds true for GREECE. Greek legal writing solely envisages a contractual liability to the parents derived from CC art. 690 (Androulidaki-Dimitriadi, I ipochreosi enimersosis tou asthenous, 415).

98. Under DUTCH Law, a claim for wrongful conception is generally recognised; it can be based in contract (HR 21 February 1997, NedJur 1999 no. 145 p. 837; HR 9 August 2002, RvdW 2002 no. 132 p. 1195), general tort law (CC art. 6:162: liability to the father) or, in the event of a faulty contraceptive product, an action may lie according to the rules on product liability (CC art. 6:185). It is averred that the child does not represent the damage, rather the hardship that results to its parents in respect of rearing and supporting the child. In addition, the deprivation of income of the mother owing to the fact that she must care for the child amounts to recoverable loss; however, according to previous case law, infringing upon the parents' life plans does not amount to non-material damage. Compensation for non-pecuniary loss is only awarded for pain and suffering of the mother arising from the pregnancy or birth, treatment of which was deemed medically necessary (HR loc. cit.).

99. At an early stage, the DANISH courts permitted a mother to recover material (maintenance costs) and non material loss (HD 19 November 1960, UfR 1961, 239). In the remainder of the Nordic Countries, the issue has not been resolved ;SWEDISH literature is not in favour of permitting the parents to recover the costs of maintaining the child (Andersson, Trepartsrelationer i skadeståndsrätten, 312); the mother alone should only be permitted to recover compemnsation for non-material loss in connection with the pain and suffering sustained during the course of the pregnancy (Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 383).

100. Conversely, the COMMON LAW does not regard wrongful conception as actionable McFarlane v. Tayside Health Board [2000] 2 AC 59 (HL). However, in Rees v. Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust [2003] 3 WLR 1091 (HL) added a gloss to the McFarlane decision and held that a parent of a healthy but unwanted child who was wrongly treated or advised in matters of reproductive medicine is entitled to claim conventional damages of 15.000 pounds for the loss of reproductive autonomy and an infringment of the right to plan their family.

(2) Wrongful birth

101. According to FRENCH Loi no. 2002-303 of 4 March 2002 relative aux droits des malades et à la qualité du système de santé art. 1(1) al. 3(?????? Code de L'Action Code de L'action Sociale et des Familles § L114-5.), the parents of a child who had they discovered its disability been in time would have induced its abortion, can assert a claim for material and non-material damage. Of course, the prerequiste for the success of this claim is the presence of a faute caractérisée (see further Lambert-Faivre, D. 2002 chron. 1217-1220 sowie Arnold, VersR 2004, 309-313). In addition, restrictions are placed on the extent of the claim. Parents may only assert a claim for the recovery of their own préjudice économique, they may not assert a claim for recovery of the costs arising in connection with the care of a disabled child; these costs should be borne by the solidarité nationale. However, precise lines of demarcation between the two heads of damages are conflated and therein difficulties arise. The transitional arrangements of the above mentioned Act which had the effect of dispossessing claimants of the possibility of recovering under an already established damages claim infringed upon the provisions pertaining to the protection of property under the European Convention of Human Rights (Draon v. France, ECHR [GC] 6 October 2005, App. no. 1513/03) and Maurice v. France, ECHR [GC] 6 October 2005, App. no. 11810/03).

102. In BELGIUM, cases of wrongful birth- are not subjected to the same analysis as the wrongful conception cases. In this regard, emphasis is solely placed on the fact that the damages recoverable under the first category, given the greater child rearing costs associated with disabled children, is higher than in the second (de Kezel, NjW 2004, p. 546 no. 7).

103. In SPANISH TS 6 June 1997, RAJ 1997 (3) no. 4610 p. 7083 found a gynaecologist (and the health service executive) was liable vis á vis the mother who was deprived of the choice of undergoing an abortion on the grounds of an error in examining the amniotic fluid. The birth of a child suffering from Downs-Syndrome constituted a daño gravísimo. In TS 4 February 1999, RAJ 1999 (1) no. 748 p. 1217 the principles ennuciated in this decision were affirmed, however the action was dismissed given that the doctor did not commit a medical error. According to case law, the recoverable material damage encompasses the entire basic costs associated with the child's upbringing. Conversely, it is submitted in academic literature (De Ángel Yágüez, Revista de Derecho y Genoma Humano 1996, V, 105, 151) that only the additional expenses arising in connection with the disability are recoverable. However, the extent of liability may be reduced on equitable grounds (at any rate according to the CA Cádiz 17 September 2002, AC 2002-III, no. 1929 p. 1117).

104. The ITALIAN courts awarded a mother who would have terminated the pregnancy if she had been informed of the child's impairment in time by her medical practitioner, compensation for danno biologico as well as damages for pecuniary loss. Furthermore, the father's claim for the recovery of danno biologico is also recognised (Cass. 1 December 1998, no. 12195, Giur.it. 1999, 2038; see. also Cass. 24 March 1999, no. 2793, Giur.it. 2000, 43 and on the father's entitlement to assert a claim– Cass. 10 May 2002, no. 6735, Foro it. 2002, I, 3115.

105. Today, the HUNGARIAN courts recognise that a claim for "wrongful birth" is actionable, insofar as there was a breach of the doctor's or hospital's duty to provide information or pre-natal exams were negligently carried out (BH 2004/10; BH 2004/112; see Köles, Orvosi műhiba perek, 203-208, 239-242). In the POLISH decision of the Supreme Court 13 October 2005, OSP 2006, no. 71 the view was taken that misleading medical advice on the risk of the child's disability and a refusal of a closer genetic examination which results in the parents being deprived of the possibility of legal abortion generate liability for non-economic and economic loss (costs of pregnancy and birth, loss of earning capacity of the mother and increased costs of maintenance of the child).

106. In GERMANY, a distinction is drawn between cases where there is negligence attendent upon birth control methods or prenatal screening for genetic defects and in respect of the termination of the pregnancy. In the latter case, it is averred that, at the most, special complications arising during the pregnancy or birth are caused by the doctor's negligence, not the pregnancy itself- (BGH 18 January 1983, BGHZ 86, 240, 248; BGH 27 November 1984, NJW 1985, 671, 673). The mother's emotional distress will only be compensated if it constitutes an illness of pathological significance (CC §§ 823, 253(2); BGH 18 January 1983 loc. cit.; BGH 30 May 1995, NJW 1995, 2412, 2413). The fact that the parents have "had" a disabled child is not sufficient in itself (BGH 18 January 1983 loc. cit.). Increased costs of maintenance and additional expenditure associated with the child's disability are actionable under contract law (BGH 4 March 1997, NJW 1997, 1638, 1640; BGH 16 November 1993, BGHZ 124, 128, 134; BGH 15 February 2000, BGHZ 143, 389, 393; BGH 4 December 2001, NJW 2002, 886; BGH 18 June 2002, NJW 2002, 2636, 2637). The parents' contractual claim for damages principally encompasses the entire basic expenses associated with rearing a disabled child. The compensation is not restricted to the recovery of only the special additional financial outlay associated with rearing a disabled child as this is regarded as incompatible with the protective scope of the contract and above all with the human dignity of the disabled child (BGH 22 November 1983, BGHZ 89, 95, 104; BGH 16 November 1993 loc. cit.). However, the duty to compensate does not extend to the parents's loss of income, in the event that they had to give up their careers in order to care for their child (BGH 2 December 1980, NJW 1981, 630; BGH 4 March 1997 loc. cit.).

107. AUSTRIAN OGH 25 May 1999, SZ 72/91 (see Rebhahn, JBl 2000, 265, 266; Kopetzki, RdM 1999, 177) awarded the additional costs associated with rearing a disabled child to a woman who gave birth to a boy without arms, with club feet and truncated leg and to her husband. The relief sought was confined to the recovery of these special expenses. However, minor fault on the part of the doctor whose duty it was to provide the correct information will recede into the background vis à vis the parents' contributory negligence during the communication of medical advice (OGH 23 October 2003, JBl 2004, 311, note Bernat). The issue whether basic child rearing expenses are recoverable was deliberately left unresolved by the OGH. Views expressed in legal literature submit that a corresponding entitlement should be awarded provided that the birth of the child constitutes an extraordinary burden on the basis that financial resources will be strained (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht I³, no. 2/29, Bernat, JBl 2004, 316). Since the judgment of OGH 11 December 2007, JBl 2008, 521, from henceforth, there can be no doubt that the entire maintenance costs associated with an unwanted disabled child represent recoverable damage. for For a treatise on the legal position in PORTUGAL see note 102 above.

108. For DUTCH Law, the HR 8 September 2000, RvdW 2000, 180C declined to endorse a claim for compensation of non-pecuniary damage of parents of a child who was injured in the womb owing to negligent medical treatment. The HR 22 February 2002, NedJur 2002 no. 240 p. 1704 adjudicated similarly in the case of a child who was not aborted owing to a diagnostic error. Both cases turned on the absence of psychiatric shock requiring medical treatment. HR 28 May 1999, NedJur 1999, no. 614 p. 3484 was of a divergent view and held every pecuniary loss arising from the additional costs invoved in rearing a disabled child resonated in damages.

109. At present, there is a dearth of case law on this issue in the NORDIC Countries. There are dissonant views in academic writing (see further Andersson, Trepartsrelationer i skadeståndsrätten, 312, 316). The predominant view ist hat recovery for the parents' emotional distress should be denied (Andersson loc. cit. 310).

110. For the COMMON LAW, the case of Parkinson v. St. James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2002] QB 266 held that the parents of disabled child who was conceived following a negligently performed sterialisation operation could claim the extra special upbringing costs associated with rearing a disabled child. Following the case of Rees v. Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust [2003] 3 WLR 1091 (HL) it is questionable whether this decision can continue unchallenged, cf. Pedain, [2004] CLJ 19-21.

(3) Wrongful life

111. The aforementioned Loi no. 2002-303 of 4 March 2002 relative aux droits des malades et à la qualité du système de santé was a reaction of the French legislature to the socalled Perruche-Entscheidung Cass.ass.plen. 17 November 2000, JCP 2000, 2309 (cf. also prior decision Cass.civ. 26 March 1996, D. 1997 Jur. 35, notes by Roche-Dahan and by v. Bar, ZEuP 2000, 119), where a doctor was held liable to both the parents and to the child for failing to correctly diagnose the state of health of the embryo. The Act rejects that that there is any liability owed to the child on the basis of the argument that a correct diagnosis would have induced its abortion (art. 1(1) al. 1: „Nul ne peut se prévaloir d´un préjudice du seul fait de sa naissance"). The Law does not preclude a right of action if the prenatal injuries are caused by medical error (al. 2 loc. cit.). It the child's injuries cannot be attributed to the negligence of the physician, then these costs are instead covered by the solidarité nationale (Malinvaud, Droit des obligations[8], no. 545 p. 391).

112. In BELGIUM, this problematic issue has only been a matter of adjudication in the lower courts. CFI Bruxelles 7 June 2002, TBBR 2002, 483 awarded a child born with congenital disability damages on the grounds that medical error had deprived its parents of the choice of terminating the pregnancy. In SPAIN, the majoritarian view leans against imputing liability to the doctor, provided that it is not asserted that fault on his or her part contributed to the child's abnormality (CA Cádiz 17 September 2002, AC 2002, III, no. 1929 p. 1117; Pantaleón Prieto, Procreación artificial y responsabilidad civil, 263; De Ángel Yágüez, Revista de Derecho y Genoma Humano 1996, V, 151; otherwise Ruiz Larrea, La Ley 1998, I, 2039, where it is mooted that the child may assert a claim against the parents).

113. ITALIAN (Cass. 29 July 2004, no. 14488, Foro it. 2004, I, 3327; Resp.civ. e prev. 2004, 1348; Cass 14 July 2006, no. 16123, Dir.fam. 2007, 137; cf. an early decision of CA Perugia 24 May 2000, Rass.Giur.Umbra, 2000, 636), GERMAN (BGH 18 January 1983, BGHZ 86, 240, 251; CA Munich 27 February 1981, NJW 1981, 2012; CA Düsseldorf 14 July 1994, VersR 1995, 1498) and AUSTRIAN Law (OGH 25 May 1999, SZ 72/91) rejects the notion that the damages claim of the child can be solely based on the assertion that had the disability been correctly diagnosed, it would not have been born. There is no right not to be born. Recent DUTCH case law reached a similar conclusion.(CA The Hague 26 March 2003, NedJur 2003, no. 249 p. 1964; however, for a discordant view CA Amsterdam 4 January 1996, NedJur 1997, no. 213 p. 1169; cf. for further analysis Lindenbergh, AA 52 [2003] no. 5 p. 365). In GREECE, there is a dearth of case law on this issue; in Greek legal literature, comparative legal resources have been drawn upon, based on this the claims of the child would be excluded (Androulidaki-Dimitriadi, I ipochreosi enimersosis tou asthenous, 427). In end effect, this appears to represent the lion's share of views among PORTUGUESE authors. It is postulated that if the child were permitted to recover on the basis of the argument that it would have been better had he not been born, this would infringe notions of human dignity (Menezes Cordeiro, Tratado I, 288; Álvaro Dias, Dano Corporal 500; of a divergent opinion Guilherme de Oliveira, O direito do diagnóstico pré-natal, 214 and Pinto Monteiro, RLJ 134 [2001-2002] 384, who contemplates that the child may have a claim deriving from a contract having protective effects for third parties). This correponds to the stance adopted by the courts. Moreover, the courts have clarified that the hypothetical damages claim can only be asserted by the child and not by its parents (STJ 19 June 2001, RLJ 134 [2001-2002] 371, 377).

114. In the first instance adjudications by HUNGARIAN courts, it was held that the child could not assert a claim for damages because life could not constitute damage. Consequently, claimants could not seek compensation based on the argument that one was not aborted (Citations in Dósa, Az orvos kártérítési felelőssége, 137; Köles, Orvosi műhiba perek, 239-242; CA Pécs, Pf.I.20.187/2004/5.). However, the Supreme Court (BH 2004/112, BH 2005/394) did not follow this line of jurisprudence and in November 2005- in opposition to the european main stream (Herpai, Magyar Jog 2005, 699; Lábady, Családi Jog, no. 3/2006, 15-25.) – in a decision laying down principles for this area (EBH 2005/1206 = BH 2005/394) – held that a child born with congenital disabilities could demand compensation if the responsible doctor, by his mistake, deprived the mother of the possbility of exercising her statutory guaranteed right of opting for a termination of her pregnancy. This decision was however revised by the uniform application of private law no. 1/2008 (Supreme Court 12 March 2008, Hungarian Gazette no. 2008/50, p. 2462). This judgment, which draws heavily from the law in other jurisdictions and which binds the other courts (Const. § 47(2)),, rejected the claim of a disabled child who would have been aborted, had its mother been informed of its condition in time.

115. For the NORDIC Countries Andersson, Trepartsrelationer i skadeståndsrätten, 307 die is a proponent of the view that the child is not entitled to assert a claim for damages.

XI. Interests worthy of legal protection

116. Similar to the concept of "legally relevant damage", the notion of "interests worthy of legal protection" constitutes a linguistic innovation given that the notion does not feature in any of the Civil Codes or Damage Liability Acts which are currently in force. However, this concept features in the jurisprudence of many countries. In the FRENCH legal order, this concept crops up together with the debate on the issue of whether the infringement of an illegimate interest can give rise to a damages claim.. Afterall the following provision can be encountered in CCP art. 31, which provides that persons with standing to sue are those having "a legitimate interest in the success … of a claim". A rule which is partly governed by administrative law is derived from this providing that only an action for dommage licite can be brought (Starck/Roland/Boyer, Obligations. 1. Responsabilité délictuelle[5], no. 111 p. 64 and Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], nos. 271-273 p. 59). In more recent times, a trend appears to be emerging which requires even for the substantive law proof that the damage concerned had a detrimental effect on a legally protected interest (Terré/Simler/Lequette, Les obligations[8], nos. 704-706 pp. 684-686; Malinvaud, Droit des obligations[8], no. 555 p. 398; Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[10], no. 145 p. 138 and Cass.civ. 24 January 2002, Bull.civ. 2002, II, no. 5 p. 4 [the loss of revenue which was derived from clandestine employment does not constitute damage]). All in all, the argument that the damage that ensues is "illegimate" has lost much of its practical importance (Viney and Jourdain loc. cit.).

117. Furthermore, in BELGIUM, the question is as yet unresolved whether a clai,m based on the infringement of a legally protected interest is to be classifed as issue pertaining to its admissibility under adminstrative law or whether it concerns the substantive merits of a claim. The majoritarian view in legal writing is to plump for the former (Ronse and others, Schade en schadeloosstelling I[2], no. 33 p. 39; Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 21 p. 42); However,Cass. 14 May 2003, RGAR 2003, 13767, concl. Spreutels) concluded that it should be interpreted in the sense of a qualification under the substantive law (it was also determined here that the loss of revenue from moonlighting jobs did not amount to a recoverable loss).

118. The SPANISH courts held that a legally protected interest was infringed and accordingly awarded a wife damages when her husband was rendered impotent either on physical or pschological grounds following an accident (TS 9 February 1988, RAJ 1988 (1) no. 771 p. 752). The ITALIAN courts deemed that the infringemenr of an interessi legittimi (cf. Cost. art. 24(1)) sufficed for recovery of the danno ingiusto (CC art. 2043), in particular concerning relations with the public adminstration (see in particular Cass.sez.un. 22 July 1999, no. 500, Foro it. 1999, I, 2487, 3201). HUNGARIAN CC § 2(1) expressly prescribes that the Code is designed to protect the property and personality rights as well as the "legally protected interests" of citizens.

POLISH doctrine usually defines damage as any detriment to the legally protected interests of another. This assumes practical significance, for example, in justifiying the award of reparation for damage resulting from a disturbance of possession and the denial of reparation for loss of profits from illegal activities (Dybowski, System prawa cywilnego III(1), 217, 235-236). The GERMAN courts have recourse to the concept of "interests worthy of legal protection" in diverse argumentative strategies, the doctrine of general risks of life connotes one example, according to which damages cannot be claimed for the realisation of one of life's general risks (BGH 6 June 1989, JZ 1989, 1069, note v. Bar; BGH 17 September 1991, NJW 1991, 3275) or, for example,in the context of decisions which have held that where the sole cause of damage lies in subjecting the defendant to court proceedings, this does not connote a legally protected interest on the grounds that the right of unrestricted access to the courts has greater weight (BGH 25 March 2003, BGHZ 154, 269, 272; the position in AUSTRIA is identical, see OGH 1 October 1986, SZ 59/159). In ENGLAND, this concept appears in judgments on the law of privacy (e.g. A v. B plc [2002] 3 WLR 542, 550, Woolf CJ) and in SWEDEN this concept was latched onto in order to pave the way for recovery for particular ecological damage (HD 19 April 1995, NJA 1995, 249 and HD 21 December 1993, NJA 1993, 753). See also for DENMARK the Supreme Court case from the 4 November 2005, UfR 2006, 446 (in the absence of a legally protected interest of the individual, the State was not liable to the proprietor of a supermarket on the grounds that the authorites (wrongfully) gave a competitor permission to open its doors on a Sunday).

XII. Insbesondere: Loss of chance

119. A special case of the concept of liability for the infringement of an "interest worthy of legal protection" is represented in a whole array of European legal orders by liability for the loss of chance. The approach adopted in the respective jursidictions varies considerably. At its root, it concerns whether the loss of the chance of an improvement which it is not certain will be obtained (for example the loss of a chance of recovery where medical care was wrongly terminated or withheld, or a loss, caused by personal injury, of the chance to take an exam in the current year, where a successful outcome in the exam is uncertain) can be qualified per se as compensatable damage

120. In the FRENCH legal system the problem of the perte d´une chance is discussed in context of the "certain" character of the damage (Malaurie and Aynès, Responsabilité délictuelle VI(1)[11], no. 241-242 pp. 138-139) (For LUXEMBOURG see on this Ravarani, La responsabilité civile, no. 700 p. 490). The perte d´une chance qualifies as compensatable damage if the chance was real. The extent of the damage depends upon the probability that the chance would have led to the desired result; compensation remains necessarily under the value of the advantage not realized (Cass.civ. 16 July 1998, Bull.civ. 1998, I, no. 260 p. 181; CA Lyon 2 February 2006, JCP 2006, IV, 2662; Malaurie and Aynès loc. cit.). In BELGIUM also, the perte d´une chance represents compensatable damage, whereby the extent of damage depends upon the value of the expected advantage and the probability of its occurrence. If necessary it is estimated ex aequo et bono (B.H.Verb. [-Hens] II-4, no. 1853; Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 26 pp. 54-55). In both countries a requisite is "la disparition certaine d´une éventualité favorable" (Flour/Aubert/Savaux, Le fait juridique[9], no. 138 p. 126).

121. Similarly, under SPANISH law, for damage to be actionable, it is necessary that it is "certain" (cierto). This requirement of certainity is not met if a chance is merely lost (Lacruz Berdejo, Elementos II(2)[4], 480). Support can be found for this approach in older court decisions (TS 29 September 1986, RAJ 1986 (3) no. 4922 p. 4849 and TS 20 April 1995, RAJ 1995 (3) no. 3487 p. 4637). However, in the context of the contractual liability of a lawyer for missing a deadline, inter alia decision of TS 26 January 1999, RAJ 1999 (1) no. 323 p. 464 and of TS 14 May 1999, RAJ 1999 (2) no. 3106 p. 4817, damages were awarded for the lost chance of winning the case and for the tort law sphere, TS 10 October 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 8371 p. 12306 affirmed liability for the lost chance of a successful cure.

122. ITALY also belongs to the legal systems in which a loss of chance qualifies as autonomous head of damage. The loss of a chance can represent a danno ingiusto in the sense of CC art. 2043 (Cass. 19 December 1985, no. 6506, Foro it. 1986, I, 383; see also Cass. 29 April 1993, no. 5026, Giur.it. 1994, I, 1, 234; contra aber Busnelli, Foro it. 1965, IV, 47, 50). The extent of compensation is assessed according to equitable principles and the courts inquire into the probability that the chance would have materialised (Gazzoni, Manuale di diritto privato[10], 697). The loss of chance of cure is regarded as connoting a lost chance. In the lost chance analysis, a clear disctinction is not always made between the existence of a danno ingiusto and the damaging consequences which result therefrom.

123. In GERMAN law (rejecting its place in tort law Mäsch, Chance und Schaden. Zur Dienstleisterhaftung bei unaufklärbaren Kausalverläufen, 2004) and in DUTCH Law (see further Brunner, AA 1995, 935) it is still a matter of controversy whether the loss of a chance per se can be characterised as damage. The position is similar in AUSTRIA (from the case law see in particular OGH 3 April 1962, SZ 35/42 and OGH 29 January 1992, SZ 65/13) and POLAND (rejecting the idea - Dybowski, System prawa cywilnego III(1), 280). The Dutch courts, above all in cases concerning the negligence of doctors (HR 24 October 1997, NedJur 1998, no. 257 p. 1359) and doctors (CA Amsterdam 4 January 1996, NedJur 1997, no. 213 p. 1169; CFI Middelburg 11 March 1998, NedJur 1999, no. 41 p. 136; CFI Amsterdam 28 October 1998, NedJur 1999, no. 406 p. 2205) have awarded a damages on a percentage basis according to the degree of likelihood that the lost chance would materialise.

124. SWEDISH HD 28 November 1964, NJA 1964, 431 held that a student who was injured six months before the exams that he would have in all liklihood sat, and whose entry into employment had to be deferred for a year as a result could recover damages for the loss of income for that year. DANISH ØLD 19 February 1974, UfR 1974, 625 reached the same conclusion in a comparable case. Likewise, henceforth, VLD 18 May 2005, UfR 2005, 2590 and Danish HD 24 May 1991, UfR 1991, 570.

125. The law in both ENGLAND and SCOTLAND does not recognise the possibility of a claim based on “loss of a chance” in the sense of a claim based on a delict or tort which gives rise only to worsened statistical prospects of the occurrence of harm. “Loss of a chance simpliciter” cannot form the basis of a claim (Gregg v. Scott [2002] EWCA Civ 1471 per Latham LJ at [39]; affirmed by Gregg v. Scott [2005] UKHL 2; [2005] 2 WLR 268). Academic writing (in particular Stapleton, (1988) 104 LQR 213 and 389), highlighting dangers that would stem from such a claim being recognised, has been expressly approved by the Court of Appeal.

126. In respect of the issues associated with the loss of a chance under contract law, see III.–3:701 (Right to damages) (exPECL art. 9:501) as well as v. Bar and Drobnig, The Interaction of Contract Law and Tort and Property Law in Europe, nos. 113-119.

Illustration 1 is taken from BGH 12 March 1990, NJW 1990, 2877; illustration 2 from BGH 24 April 1990, BGHZ 111, 168; illustration 3 from Trib. Superiore della Acque 16 January 1995, no. 3, Cons. Stato, 1995, II, 122 and Cass. 30 May 1981, no. 3541, Giust.civ.Mass.

1981, fasc. 5; illustration 4 from BGH 9 November 1993, BGHZ 124, 52; illustration 5 from BGH 18 September 1979, NJW 1980, 45, note Deutsch; illustration 8 from OGH 1 October 1986, SZ 59/159, and illustration 9 from TS 20 October 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 8844 p. 13069.

Section 2: Particular instances of legally relevant damage

VI.–2:201: Personal injury and consequential loss

(1) Loss caused to a natural person as a result of injury to his or her body or health and the injury as such are legally relevant damage.

(2) In this Book:

(a) such loss includes the costs of health care including expenses reasonably incurred for the care of the injured person by those close to him or her; and

(b) personal injury includes injury to mental health only if it amounts to a medical condition.

COMMENTS

A. Matters not regulated

Wrongful conception, wrongful birth and wrongful life. This provision deals with the most important aspects of the law governing liability for injury to body and health. Deliberately left unregulated, as indicated earlier (see Comments B under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage)), are the extraordinarily problematic questions arising in the context of the birth of children which their parents (or one of their parents) did not want to have, whether it be for reasons of family planning or because the infant would have been aborted if the affliction had been recognised in time (wrongful conception, wrongful birth, wrongful life, see Notes X89-115 under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage)). The proposition that a child can be injured in the womb, however, is beyond all doubt. It is not material whether the child has even been conceived at the time of the act causing injury (e.g. in the case where a woman becomes pregnant after she has received an infusion of blood contaminated with a pathogen). As soon as the child obtains legal capacity, he or she has a claim against the person causing the damage, subject to the further requirements of the basic norm. Where, however, a child in the womb is so severely injured that a miscarriage or stillbirth results, the injury is to the mother's physical integrity and it is she who is correspondingly entitled to claim damages.

Detrimental impact on the quality of life without personal injury. VI.–2:201 concerns only injury to body or health. Adverse disturbance of the quality of life which does not result from such injuries can only be asserted as legally relevant damage on the basis of other rules in this Chapter – in particular on the basis of VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy) and, in part, VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information).

Loss of chance. As already mentioned (see Comments D and E under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage)), no specific mention has been made of loss of a chance, in particular the loss of a chance of being cured. At present no special rule can be stipulated here. This area is therefore left to the judiciary for future development (see Notes XII119-125 under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage)). However, the general rule on legally relevant damage does leave room for characterising the loss of a chance as an independent form of damage for the purposes of the law on non-contractual liability (and not merely for the purposes of the law of contract: cf. III.–3:701 (Right to damages); that is to say, the rule permits a departure from the strict "all or nothing" principle.

Quantum of damages. Questions as to quantum of damages are the subject matter of Chapter 6. That is nothing peculiar to the law governing personal injury and needs no special mention here. It should be noted, however, that these rules do not determine the manner in which compensation for personal injury and non-economic loss is to be quantified (e.g. exact figures for a claim for damages in respect of defined injuries, or amounts for each day's stay in hospital, etc.). See VI.–6:203 (Capitalisation and quantification) paragraph (2).

Type and mode of reparation. Equally, particulars concerning the type and mode of reparation (e.g. lump sum or periodical payment) are provided for in Chapter 6. The fundamental principles governing the necessary assessment of an emergent loss – in particular the loss of a future or hypothetical income – are by contrast to be derived from the relevant national (procedural) laws.

B. Damage to a person's body or health

Body and health distinguished. VI.–2:201 regulates the questions of identifying damage given the occurrence in fact of an injury to a natural person's body or health. The distinction between injury to the body on the one side and injury to health on the other has no great significance. Where an injury to the body is present, an injury to health will also be involved except in exceptional cases (e.g. the cutting or shaving of hair). It may also be noted that injuries to health concern disturbance to the internal bodily processes, while injuries to the body as a rule look towards interference with the external bodily integrity. Harassment (e.g. sexual harassment or harassment by unsolicited photography) does not fall under VI.–2:201; it falls under VI.–2:203 (Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy) instead. By contrast, rape of course also constitutes a personal injury.

Injury to the person. With the exception of paragraph (2)(b) (Mental health), the provisions do not specify any answer to the question when in a particular case an injury to body or health is present. As a rule, the existence of bodily injuries will be ascertained without difficulty. Every infringement of a person's bodily integrity is conceived by these Rules to amount to a personal injury. In this context too, however, regard must be had to VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule) (for example, where an intramuscular injection is being given and as a result of the nurse's clumsiness a small and harmless haematoma occurs, but nothing more serious happens). If an expectant mother is injured with the result that her child is stillborn this constitutes personal injury to the mother (and only to her; cf. above Comment A).

Medical treatment; sports injuries. The question whether a person's body has been injured or not does not depend on the purpose of the interference with the bodily integrity. Medical operations and treatment constitute an infringement of bodily integrity even though they are for a beneficial purpose. Whether or not such treatment is allowed is decided by the patient on the basis of consent (see VI.–5:101 (Consent and acting on own risk)). The same is correspondingly true for sports injuries – in particular the injuries sustained in the course of participation in competitive sports (e.g. football, rugby) and more especially boxing and the martial arts, so long as these relate to the realisation of risks which are accepted simply on the basis of participation in the activity concerned.

Injury to health. In contrast, not entirely straightforward questions of demarcation may arise in the context of the concept of injury to health. One can consider, for example, noise nuisance resulting in a short-term headache and a multitude of other cases of diffuse departures from well-being. Here the decision in the particular case must be left to the judge. The impairment of health must not be of a banal nature. On the other hand, severe injuries to health may already be present at a point in time at which the injured person's subjective sense of well-being is not yet adversely affected.

Illustration 1
A person suffering from the common cold who in going about daily life passes the illness on to another does not cause an injury to health.

Illustration 2
An AIDS infection, on the other hand, constitutes an injury to health from the time of contracting the HIV virus; the injured person does not have to wait until the disease itself has broken out. The same holds for other illnesses or diseases whose manifestation develops only over the course of time. What is admittedly required, of course, is that there is at least some form of illness which can be diagnosed. Asbestosis, for example, has a long period of incubation and occasionally it is not detectable over many years. An injury to health will be acknowledged in such cases – not least for the practical reasons pertaining to the submission of proof – only at that point in time when the illness can be diagnosed by competent medically-trained persons.

Related interests worthy of legal protection. In other cases it must be recognised that the denial of an injury to (body and) health by no means necessarily implies that no protection under the law governing liability is granted to the affected party. In this context one must recall the example of the spouse who loses the capacity for sexual intercourse as a result of an accident. The other spouse suffers thereby no damage to health, but they are still adversely affected in respect of an interest worthy of legal protection: see above Comment E under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage). Further examples for VI.–2:101 are provided by the unauthorised extraction of organs from deceased persons (infringement of their post-mortem right of personality) or the improper use of bodily substances taken from living persons (blood, sperm taken for the purposes of insemination) which are not property and therefore not the subject of property law within the meaning of VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession).

Mental health. Paragraph (2)(b) merely stipulates a general basic rule for dealing with injuries to health taking the form of injuries to mental health. It is one of the provisions which in regard to the basic rule contain by way of exception a conclusive ("only") definition. The problem of so-called nervous shock cases is deliberately addressed only partially. The further particulars remain left to the courts which must clarify them on the basis of the general rule of causation. Not every disturbance to the balance of mental and psychological well-being constitutes legally relevant damage. Rather injury must assume a condition which, according to the rules of medical science, can be diagnosed as an illness or complaint and which therefore calls for treatment (whether or not, according to the current state of medical science, treatment is in fact possible). In other words, psychiatric injury to health must amount to a medically ascertainable injury or recognisable condition. Precisely how such an illness is caused generally plays no role. What is decisive is only that it has been caused by conduct or an occurrence for which the injuring person is accountable. Provided the requirements of VI.–4:101 (General rule [on causation]) are satisfied, the legally relevant damage might take the form of damage to mental or psychiatric health, within the meaning of paragraph (2), which has its cause in the (well-founded) suspicion that an injury to physical health has been sustained.

Injury as such constitutes legally relevant damage. Paragraph (1) treats the injury as such as an independent head of legally relevant damage. That takes account of the fact that the practical results of the concept of danno biologico have found increasing pervasive acceptance, albeit in various ways and with varied intensity. The physical injury is to be understood as damage in its own right, giving rise to its own entitlement to monetary compensation additional to and, as the case may be, independent of the existence of some economic or non-economic damage. According to the concept of the text, "injury as such" constitutes neither an economic damage nor a non-economic damage (the latter two being "losses" consequential to the injury), but rather falls into an independent category of its own. However, in quantifying monetary damages for some biological damage which has been suffered, it may well be necessary to put into the balance the other related heads of damage and weigh these up collectively. See also on this point VI.–6:204 (Compensation for injury as such), according to which "injury as such is to be compensated independently of compensation for economic or non-economic loss".

Illustration 3
The cerebral injuries of the victim after an accident are so severe that he permanently loses his sensory capacity and sense of awareness. He has a claim to reparation for the obliteration of his personality, i.e. because of the injury per se, independent of the fact that he suffers no pain.

C. Loss

Economic and non-economic loss. Paragraph (1) extends to the injury as such and to all consequential loss. The word "loss" is defined in VI.–2:101(4) (Meaning of legally relevant damage) and embraces economic loss as well as non-economic loss. The most important forms of economic loss are listed in VI.–2:101(4)(a); the most important forms of non-economic loss are listed in VI.–2:101(4)(b). These rules apply also to VI.–2:201. As their wording indicates ("… loss includes"), they are not, however, exhaustive definitions. Rather they purport to do no more than list mere examples of typical economic and non-economic loss. Obviously further injury to health which results from an initially rather limited injury to the body or health is also a consequential damage. Moreover, there might be other consequential economic losses besides loss of income because the injured person is unable to attend to his or her affairs. An example would be the inability of a man or woman to provide domestic services at home. The fact that this activity is not remunerated dictates that there is no reparable loss of earnings, but that does not mean that there is therefore also no reparable economic loss. Consequential loss embraces a multitude of other economic losses – for example, the loss sustained when the victim is compelled as a result of the injury to sell his or her business at an undervalue or is unable to work and has to fall back on more expensive outside labour.

Cost of health care. Especially important in the context of injury to body or health are the "costs of health care" referred to explicitly in paragraph (2)(a). They include an increase in basic needs (e.g. the need to make use of a wheelchair). The concomitant multiplication of necessities required to support daily life (such as the expenditure which someone confined to a wheelchair must make in order to re-structure accommodation) also belongs to this category.

Loss of income. Loss of income (VI.–2:101(4)(a) (Meaning of legally relevant damage)), moreover, includes both loss of actual income and loss of future income. Falling in the latter category is the loss of earning capacity – not least of persons who, at the time of injury, were not in fact in gainful employment but who in all probability would have been in due course (e.g. children or young persons). The judge is granted further room for discretion in the interpretation both of the concept of "consequential loss" and the notion of "loss of income". In dealing with these the judge must also take into account the fact that the text recognises a further distinct category of damage in the form of "injury as such".

D. Damage to the injured person and damage to third parties

Personal injury. As far as personal injury is concerned, the text does not draw any fundamental distinction between primary and secondary victims. This distinction is not helpful. That is because the decisive issue is always only whether the claimant has or has not suffered injury to his or her body or health. In the first case the claimant is a victim; in the second case not. Everything else is, within the framework of this article, immaterial.

> Illustration 4
> A is so severely injured in an accident that she temporarily loses consciousness. She is thus unable to arrange for someone to deputise for her in providing the care, incumbent on her, required by a bedridden lady, L, whose condition of health deteriorates as a result. Whether L has a claim is determined by the rules on accountability and causation; that she has suffered a legally relevant damage within the meaning of VI.–2:201, by contrast, is beyond question.

Economic or non-economic losses of third persons. However, it is inherent in the nature of the matter that as a result of the injury of one person other persons may come to suffer damage of a different nature. Their damage need not be to their health (as in the above illustration), but may take other forms (e.g. damage to property, in which case VI.–2:206 (Loss upon infringement of property or lawful possession) would become applicable), and in particular the form of loss of support or mental suffering not amounting to a medical condition within the meaning of paragraph (2)(b). Where that is the case, the problem that arises is one addressed by VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third parties as a result of another's personal injury or death) and not VI.–2:201. That is because VI.–2:201 only concerns damage suffered by the injured person, as indicated earlier.

Expenses of persons close to the injured person. There are, however, situations where it is difficult to say which losses qualify as damage suffered by the injured person and which are damage sustained by third parties. In respect of one problem which is important in practice paragraph (2)(a) ("including expenses reasonably incurred for the care of the injured person by those close to him or her") provides an answer. This provision regulates a case at the boundary of so-called transferred loss (Drittschadensliquidation) which is not so easy to construe as a matter of law. The solution consists of assigning the expenditures of the relatives to the damage sustained by the injured person. As between these parties, the injured person is liable in turn to the relatives from the standpoint of either benevolent intervention in another's affairs or unjustified enrichment.

Reasonable expenses of carers. The "expenses" of carers will not necessarily include the cost of sacrificing employment (e.g. foregone salary) in order to care for the injured person.

An exceptional case is where the carer provides care as a matter of his or her profession (e.g. as a nurse), in which case the loss incurred by giving up remunerated work would ordinarily equate to the cost of paying someone to provide the same care. In other cases, recovery will depend on whether the loss of earnings of the carer are less than or exceed the cost of contracting for care. The expenses are recovered as part of the loss suffered by the injured person and in the latter case recovery in excess of the costs of nursing care will be barred because the injured person might have obtained care more cheaply. It should be noted that it will only be possible to speak of "care" provided by the attendance of visiting relatives, supporting the emotional well-being of the injured person in recovering health or providing comfort in distress, when the injured person is conscious and thus able to reap the associated psychological benefit. The magnitude of the expenditure must be "reasonable". This qualification is necessary for the protection of the liable person (and, correspondingly, that person's insurer). An excessively frequent number of journeys to a remote special clinic where the injured person is being treated, for example, would not be reasonable.

Those close to the injured person. The injured person may only claim costs for those persons who are "close to him or her". Decisive here is not a formal or legal familial relationship, rather that an emotional and special relationship exists between the carer and the injured person. The litmus test should be whether the person concerned is one whose presence at the bedside of the injured person is necessary for the advancement of the injured person's convalescence or to stabilise his or her condition. This subgroup of people does not necessarily correspond to those people who under VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third parties as a result of another's personal injury or death) paragraph (1) have a claim to damages for their non-economic losses sustained as a repercussion. The latter subgroup is more confined; a "particularly close personal relationship to the injured person" is the prerequisite here. If, for example, someone lives alone and therefore has no one who falls within VI.–2:202(1), it might well be that the sole surviving brother or only sister is called to the injured person's bedside. Their travel expenses in getting to the hospital are recoverable, but, if the patient dies, the brother or sister in question has no claim to reparation for non-economic loss.

NOTES

I. General

1. It goes without saying that one's body and health are protected under every state's law of torts. The fact that they are seldom mentioned explicitly in basic legal norms of extra-contractual liability (see e.g., GERMAN CC § 823(1) and ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(1)(ii)) is of no practical consequence. One's body and health amount to "rights" under DUTCH CC art. 6:162 and PORTUGUESE CC art. 483(1) and are also considered manifestations of illegal conduct under GREEK CC art. 914 (?). Incidentally, without doubt injury to body and health constitutes "legally relevant damage" within the meaning of all relevant basic norms of CIVIL LAW. A new chapter 2 „Du respect du corps humain" (CC arts. 16 – 16-9) was even inserted (by Statute no. 94-653 of 29 July 1994) into Volume 1 of Title I of the FRENCH CC. The principe d´inviolabilité du corps humain is herein laid down. Third parties who do not respect this principle are subject to an action in damages under the rules of the law of obligations (Rép.Dr.Civ [-Penneau] IV, v° Corps humain [1995] no. 4). In SPAIN concrete protection of one's health beyond CC art. 1902 and certain specific statutes (e.g. ConsProtA art. 11 et seq. which replaced Ley 26/1984, General para la Defensa de los Consumidores y Usuarios from 19 July 1984]) is derived directly from the Constitution (arts. 15 and 43). HUNGARIAN CC § 76 explicitly enumerates the inviolability of body and health as being among personal rights. ROMANIA is considering the implementation of equivalent rules into its Civil Code (Draft CC arts. 45 and 193).

2. Injury to body and health are ultimate or "personal damages" under NORDIC compensation statutes and the subject of protection of countless torts of the COMMON Law, especially the torts of trespass to the person, negligence, professional negligence, occupiers' liability and product liability.

II. Injury to body and health

3. In GERMANY (CC § 823(1)), ESTONIA (LOA §1045(1)(ii)), HUNGARY (CC § 76), POLAND (CC arts. 444-447) and SLOVENIA (LOA art. 174) it is common practice to distinguish between injury to the body and that to health. Injury to body is usually understood as an (outwardly apparent) violation of bodily integrity. On the other hand, the term injury to health includes "any inducement of a state, which varies – in an adverse way - with that of the body's normal functioning; it is inconsequential whether a condition of pain comes about or a drastic change of one's existential orientation occurs" (BGH 14 June 2005, VersR 2005, 1238). There are, however, no practical consequences attaching to the distinction between injury to body or that to health.

4. This distinction is also uncommon in most legal systems, e.g. in BEGIUM, FRANCE, ITALY, LUXEMBURG and MALTA. In FRENCH legal doctrine, the expression dommage corporel has established itself as an overarching term for all material and incorporeal damage caused by harm to body or to health. BELGIAN legal theory speaks mostly of menselijke schade or persoonsschade. Whether and how further sub-categories are possible and indeed desirable is debatable (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 65 pp. 122-125). The daño corporal of SPANISH law is defined as "Non-property and Personal Damage", i.e. as the result of a violation of bodily or mental integrity (Vicente Domingo, El daño, 230). The terminology used in this area is, of course, inconsistent. Instead of daño corporal, often daño personal or daño en la persona is used; and recently daño a la salud is also increasingly being used (De Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de Responsabilidad Civil, 698; Vicente Domingo loc. cit. 138). DUTCH Law recognises as personal injury any injury which results from an adverse effect on the person (Schadevergoeding I [-Lindenbergh], art. 95, no. 7 pp. 25-26). The BW does not distinguish between injury to body and to health, but solely between non-property damage, personal damage and "fatal damage" (overlijdensschade) (Lindenbergh loc. cit. no. 27.2 pp. 196-205).

5. The compensation statutes of the NORDIC countries operate using the term personal injury (SWEDISH Damages Law chap. 2 § 1, chap. 3 §§ 1-2, chap. 5 §§ 1-2, chap. 6 § 1; FINNISH Damages Law, chap. 5 § 1 [chap. 5 § 2 speaks conversely of "physical injury or other personal injury"]; DANISH Damages Law §§ 1, 18). According to the Swedish and Finnish position, personal injury encompasses physical as well as mental adverse effects and indeed independent of whether they can be traced back to the ostensible effects of the use of force or not (Bengtsson/Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen, 134). In Denmark the situation is similar, however psychological damage is in principle only recoverable if suffered in the context of (actual or imminent) material damage (Hertz, UfR 2004, 180; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 293; Øe and Røn, Juristen 2004, 85, 89).

6. For cases of wrongful consultancy to pregnant women causing an unwanted birth ???see above, Notes X95 et seq. under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage). In relation to unwanted pregnancies, tortious liability of the natural father in relation to the mother only comes into play in cases of rape (for BELGIUM see CA Bruxelles 8 May 1985, JT 1986, 252, note Van Gysel).

7. It is generally accepted that prenatal injuries damage the health and/or the body of a child, as long as it is born alive (i.e. has not already died as a nasciturus; in such a case the mother, and in some jurisdictions [e.g. in SPAIN: TS 31 July 2002, RAJ 2002 (5) no. 7741 p. 14090], in addition the father has a valid cause of action), cf. e.g. for FRANCE Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 249-3 p. 13; for BELGIUM Dirix, Het begrip schade, no. 209 p. 132; for ITALY Cass. 22 November 1993, no. 11503, Giur.it. 1995, I, 1, 318 (contractual liability) and Cass. 9 May 2000, no. 5881, Giust.civ.Mass. 2000, 967 (tortious liability); for POLAND CC art. 446; for SPAIN TS 23 November 2004, RAJ 2004 (5) no. 7384 p. 14992; TS 27 May 2002, RAJ 2002 (4) no. 7159 p. 12951; TS 14 May 2001, RAJ 2001 (3) no. 6204 p. 9535; TS 10 December 1997, RAJ 1997 (5) no. 8775 p. 14041 and TS 13 October 1992, RAJ 1992 (4) no. 7547 p. 9915; for PORTUGAL Álvaro Dias, Dano corporal, 485; Capelo de Sousa, Direito de personalidade, 158); for SWEDEN Andersson, Trepartsrelationer i skadeståndsrätten, 306 and for the legal position in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND Thomson, SLT 2005, 121. The occurrence of damage can also take place before the procreation of the child (e.g. BGH 20 December 1952, BGHZ 8, 243 [infection of the mother by the transfusion of lues infected blood]). In contrast, the legal position where a nascent mother harms her child by imprudent conduct (alcohol, drug or nicotine abuse) is still largely unclear.

III. Harm to mental health

8. It is seldom expressly stated in the statute codes of CIVIL LAW jurisdictions that severe adverse effects on one's mental well-being - even when not constituting the sole consequence of physical injury to oneself or another (see further Notes under VI.–2:202 (Loss suffered by third parties as a result of another's personal injury or death)) - can constitute recoverable damage (for an exception see SLOVENIAN LOA art. 132 in conjunction with art. 179, whereby "damage comprises ... the infliction of physical or mental distress or fear on another person"). Nevertheless, this may be deemed to be generally accepted. Thus, substantial suffering caused by an adverse effect on the victim's senses is qualified in FRENCH Law as dommage moral resulting in compensation (Rép.Dr.Civ. [-Lapoyade Deschamps] IV, v° Dommages et intérets [1997], nos. 217-218). So too in the BELGIAN legal system, the victim's lost well-being constitutes legally relevant damage in the context of the law of obligations (Peeters, De indicatieve tabel, no. 22 p. 34). SPANISH Law classifies serious harm to one's mental health as daño corporal or daño a la salud (i.e. TS 31 October 1973, RAJ 1973 (2) no. 4060 p. 3200 and TS 31 May 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 4391 p. 8309 [though these decisions relate partially to consequential loss resulting from injuries suffered in an accident, partially to damage suffered by relatives).

9. In GERMAN Law it is stated that mental illness only constitutes an injury to health if it is medically ascertainable and exceeds what is endured in general everyday life (BGH 11 November 1997, BGHZ 137, 142, 145; BGH 30 April 1996, BGHZ 132, 341, 343; BGH 25 February 1997, NJW 1997, 1640, 1641). So-called "nervous shock" arising out of the witnessing of a fatal accident of a close relative is more restrictively formulated in that the harm to one's health must clearly exceed the nature and severity of the loss usually sustained by loved ones - in their capacity as parties indirectly concerned in such accidents - through the victim's injuries. This is gauged according to experience (BGH 11 May 1971, NJW 1971, 1883; BGH 4 April 1989, NJW 1989, 2317). As a general rule, particular mental instability on the part of the injured party does not exonerate the wrongdoer, however (BGH 29 February 1956, NJW 1956, 1108; BGH 30 April 1996 loc. cit.). Along with those persons classified as close relatives under family law (BGH 31 January 1984, NJW 1984, 1405), fiance(e)s and cohabitees are entitled to a claim for compensation (CFI Frankfurt/M. 28 March 1969, NJW 1969, 2286). Under AUSTRIAN Law any mental impairment inflicted on a person that is a recognisable illness, thereby requiring medical treatment (e.g. anorexia or severe depression) constitutes recoverable damage within the meaning of CC § 1325 (Karner, Ersatz ideeller Schäden bei Körperverletzung, 94). Mental impairment amounts to a recognisable illness if it requires medical treatment or at least if it is medically diagnosable and therefore medically comprehensible (OGH 14 October 2003, ZVR 2004/49, 164; OGH 30 October 2003, ZVR 2004/6, 19). Where "facial surgery becomes necessary following psychological shock of the severest degree to a women who has substantially and prematurely aged", its cost is thus recoverable (OGH 20 January 2005, ZVR 2005/47, 166).

10. HUNGARIAN law confines itself to the statement that responsibility for mental crises, psychological pain and psychopathy can in principle lead to liability for non-economic damage (Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 74-75; Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I[2], 202/3, 204). If, for other reasons, a personality problem is already present, then every substantial detrimental change to the victim's physical or mental quality of life establishes a correlative claim for compensation (see further BH 2001/12). An award of compensation for non-economic loss is, however, always a matter of judicial discretion (Gellért [-Bendedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1328-1334). In POLAND injury to health encompasses injury to mental health (Safjan, Kodeks cywilny I[4], 1273, 1284). In some older decisions there are indications that the injury must not be insignificant (SN 23 January 1947, OSN 1948, no. 7). If death results, the bereaved relatives in severe cases also have a claim to compensation for their pain (Szpunar, Odszkodowanie za szkodę majątkową, 140-141; Safjan, Kodeks cywilny I[4], 1273). In ROMANIA it is accepted that, at any rate, causing emotional trauma triggers a claim for reparation for non-material loss (Adam, Drept civil, 259-263 with further references to case law).

11. GREEK Law recognises as an injury to health any substantial (from a medical perspective) impairment to the physical, mental or psychological functioning of a person that necessitates treatment (cf. Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 929, no. 5; similarly Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[3], 110). Harm to mental health is thus recognised as an injury to health where it requires medical treatment. Nervous breakdowns or other severe psychological shock that follows from the death or injury of a close relative also fall under this category (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 6, Filios loc. cit. 111; Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 625 and CFI Athens 7246/1986, EllDik 29/1988, p. 134).

12. In PORTUGAL it is a bone of contention, whether or not impairment of one's "psyche" (danos biológicos de natureza psíquica) may be classified as a stand-alone category of legally relevant damage (see, on the one hand, Álvaro Dias, Dano corporal, 142 and, on the other, Costa Basto, Personal injury compensation, 410). This debate does not, however, seem to have effects in practice. Recoverable damage to mental health consists of psychopathological disorders which affect mental well-being (Álvaro Dias loc. cit. 151 note 331). In the case law, which mainly involves traffic accident litigation, the following examples have been deemed to be recoverable and have been compensated by the granting of non-economic damages: anxiety and fear for one's own life because of the violence of the collision (STJ 22 September 2005), irritability and humour changes in virtue of multiple excoriations and treatments (STJ 17 November 2005), grief and personality changes in virtue of internments and immobilisation with plastering (STJ 23 October 2003), post-traumatic neuroses (STJ 17 January 2002), epilepsy (STJ 20 November 2003), behaviour of auto and hetero-aggression, mental retardation and insanity (STJ 27 April 2004). Furthermore, the Supreme Court accepted the claim of an employee who was persecuted, mistreated and humiliated by his employer, for non-economic damages, on the basis of Portuguese Labour Code art. 24(1). Anxiety due to a potential risk to health resulting from an ecological accident may also constitute a recoverable non-economic loss (Costa Basto, Personal injury compensation, 410).

13. Harm to mental health can constitute recoverable damage under DUTCH CC 6:106(1)(b) (third alternative). In formulating this provision, what was contemplated was harm resulting from an "Offence against the Person" (Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 371, MvA II, Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 372), e.g. kidnapping, indiscriminate imprisonment or rape. However, serious disturbance of privacy is also categorised under this heading (Schadevergoeding II [-Lindenbergh], art. 106, no. 27.6). In the context of legally relevant damage to relatives, the Hoge Raad of course only recognised the existence of personal injury where the victim suffers from a psychiatrically definable illness (HR 22 February 2002, NedJur 2002, no. 240 p. 1704, referring to Bouma, VR 1995, 207, 209; Holzhauer, RM-Themis 1986, 4, 28; Verheij, NTBR 1998, 324, 329). Furthermore, reference must also be made to CC art. 7:658. According to this provision, an employer may be held liable for his employees' psychological damage suffered as a result of an excessively high degree of pressure at work or work that is too difficult for them (Vegter, NJB 2002, 1935-1942). Examples from case law relate to damage due to anxiety (CFI Middelburg, 30 May 2001, JAR 2001, 232), damage for post-traumatic stress (CFI The Hague 2 August 2001, TAR 2001, 118) and psychological damage resulting from sexual harassment (CFI Rotterdam 30 September 1999, JAR 1999, 230).

14. SWEDEN and FINLAND rank harm to mental health likewise as personal injury. Here it is also not a prerequisite that it is the result of an earlier physical injury (Swedish HD 30 March 1971, NJA 1971, 78; Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 398; Bengtsson/Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen, 134; Finnish HD 27 January 1982, HD 1982 II-6; HD 12 December 1980, HD 1980 II-133 and HD 25 June 1998, HD 1998:80). As a matter of principle, DANISH law, on the other hand, only compensates such losses where they are in connection with a physical injury or arise as a result of a situation of distress (Hertz, UfR 2004, 180; Vinding Kruse, Erstatningsretten[5], 293; Øe and Røn, Juristen 2004, 85, 89).

15. The legal position in England is similar to that in Ireland (no. 16 below). Employers are not liable for unforeseeable mental injuries that are suffered by an employee due to his fear of outbreak of disease, even where the risk that this disease could be actually contracted was foreseeable and is also attributable to the employer's negligence (Rothwell v. Chemical & Insulating Co. Ltd. [2006] EWCA Civ 27, [2006] 4 All ER 1161). The SCOTTISH Law Commission prepared an exhaustive 'Report on Damages for Psychiatric Injury (Scot.Law Com. no. 196) in August 2004 and a draft of a ‚Reparation for Mental Harm (Scotland) Bill' is therein published. S. 3(1) of this draft bill states: „A person is not liable for causing mental harm, whether intentional or otherwise, if the harm is of such a type that a person in the position of the victim could reasonably be expected to endure it without seeking reparation". And s. 4(1)(a) provides that the injured party shall only have a claim in damages for an unintentional act (along with other requirements), "if the harm amounts to a medically recognised mental disorder". Under current law damages for mental distress, anxiety or loss of enjoyment may be recovered under the rules of the common law along with damages for personal injuries or other losses (Reid v. Ski Independence 1999 SLT (Sh.Ct.) 62).

Thus a person pursuing a claim for physical injury will be entitled to compensation for mental distress etc. arising as a consequence of the injury (Anderson v. Secretary of State for Scotland 1999 SLT 515). A successful claim for pure psychiatric injury requires pursuers to establish that they suffered something beyond the normal emotional responses to an incident such as grief, distress or fear (Simpson v. Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd. 1983 SLT 601, 605; McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 AC 410, 431; Rorrison v. West Lothian Council 2000 SCLR 245, 250). Reparation is possible only where the injuries have been induced by shock or if there is a sudden realisation of danger within a continuing process. A secondary victim may claim damages for a psychiatric injury if it arose out of an incident for which the defender was responsible and the secondary victim satisfies the three criteria set out by Lord Oliver in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310 at 411, namely that: (i) there must be a close tie of love and affection between the secondary victim and the injured person; (ii) the secondary victim must have been present at the accident or at its aftermath; and (iii) the secondary victim's psychiatric injury must have been caused by direct perception (i.e. through his or her own unaided senses) of the accident or its immediate aftermath.

16. In IRELAND mental injury is divided into "grief and sorrow" - for which damages are not recoverable - and "nervous shock (i.e. post traumatic stress disorder) and psychiatric illness" - for which damages are recoverable without the necessity of showing direct impact or fear of immediate personal injuries for oneself (Kelly, [1998] 16 ILT 10, 11). A claim will lie in damages for nervous shock sustained by reason of actual or apprehended physical injury, not only to the plaintiff, but equally to a person other than the plaintiff (Kelly loc. cit. 39, 42). Where a physically injured plaintiff suffers an unforeseeable psychiatric response or a psychiatric response that is more severe than might reasonably have been anticipated, the "egg-shell skull" rule (McSweeney v. Cork Corporation (DPIJ: Hilary & Easter Terms 1994, p. 37) ensures that the defendant will have to compensate for the full extent of that response (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 44.176). In Kelly v. Hennessy [1995] 3 IR 253, Hamilton C.J. laid down five requirements for a successful nervous shock claim: (i) a recognisable psychiatric illness, which (ii) has been "shock induced", (iii) caused by the defendants' act or omission and (iv) occurred "by reason of actual or apprehended physical injury to the plaintiff or a person other than the plaintiff", and (v) the breach of a duty of care not to cause the plaintiff a reasonably foreseeable injury in the form of nervous shock. In Cuddy v. Mays & Ors [2003] IEHC 103, Kearns J. regarded Kelly v. Hennessy as determining the issue of damages for post-traumatic stress disorder suffered by the plaintiff, a hospital porter, when ambulances brought a number of traffic accident victims to the hospital where he worked, including his deceased brother and severely injured sister, as well as cousins and lifelong friends. Kearns J. applied a "close proximity test" (rather than the test of foreseeability, for which he expressly did not opt) to qualify the close family relationship between the plaintiff and his brother and sister. An employer who is or ought to be aware that an employee is working under such pressures that his or her mental health is likely to break down owes a duty to take reasonable steps to deal with the problem (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. 18.60). Equally, the careless failure by an employer to recognise and treat the obvious symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder in an employee may generate liability (McHugh v. Minister for Defence [1999] IEHC 91, [2001] 1 IR 424). The duty to protect an employee's mental health is contained in the Safety, Health and Welfare at Work Act 1989, s. 12. S. 2 defines injury as "any disease and any impairment of a person's physical or mental condition". Fletcher v. Commissioners of Public Works [2003] IESC 13, [2003] 1 IR 465 concerned a plaintiff employee who suffered no physical injuries as a result of his prolonged exposure to asbestos dust, but did suffer from a recognised mental illness because of his fear of contracting mesothelioma, though medical advice proved this fear was irrational. The claim was dismissed. The case suggests that psychiatric damage that is not accompanied by physical injury will only be allowed in nervous shock cases or where relatives have suffered mental stress in fatal injuries cases; see also Rafter v. A-G & Ors [2004] IEHC 28). However, damages for negligently inflicted psychiatric harm were allowed in a number of other cases arising out of similar circumstances, but where the defendants did not establish the unreasonableness of the psychological suffering. See, for example, Commissioners for Public Works v. Swaine [2003] IESC 30, [2003] 1 IR 521 and Commissioners of Public Works v. Brewer [2003] IESC 51, [2003] 3 IR 539. On the extent of the employer's duty of care to employees in the context of stress and bullying in the workplace see further McGrath v. Trintech Technologies Ltd. [2004] IEHC 342; Quigley v. Complex Tooling & Moulding [2005] IEHC 71 and Maher v. Jabil Global Services Ltd. [2005] IEHC 130.

IV. Injury as such and „danno biologico"

17. For the foundations of "biological harm" in ITALIAN Law, see above notes II18 and V40 under VI.–2:101 (Duties during intervention). In SPAIN - due to the influence of the Constitution of 1978 (especially of arts. 10, 15 and 43) - it is now likewise accepted that harm to physical or general health (daño corporal respectively daño a la salud) amounts to damage as such, i.e. independent of its effects on property or non-property rights (Vicente Domingo, El daño, 231).

18. Synonymous with the term "physical injury" (dano corporal), lately the use of the phrase dano biológico has also become customary in PORTUGAL (e.g. STJ 29 November 2005 and Álvaro Dias, Dano corporal, 99). According to the Civil Code, bodily injuries as such seem to be considered as non-economic losses (Sousa Dinis, CJ (ST) IX [2001-1] 5, 11 A baremização do dano corporal). Nevertheless, case law, which used to see it as a creature of non-economic damage (CA Porto 7 April 1997, CJ XXII [1997-2] 205; STJ 8 March 1979, BolMinJus 285 [1979] 290 and STJ 9 January 1979, BolMinJus 283 [1979], 266), has been recently considering it an economic damage (STJ 17 November 2005; STJ 22 September 2005). Grave physical injuries to the individual or his way of life are seen as forms of loss requiring independent compensation regardless of any loss of property or physical pain (Álvaro Dias loc. cit. 137; Sinde Monteiro, Estudos sobre a responsabilidade civil, 248; STJ 27 April 2004; STJ 17 November 2005; see also STJ 6 May 1999 and STJ 19 December 2001). Examples include limping (STJ 10 October 2002), prothesis and incapacity to stand for long periods of time (STJ 14 October 2004), grief, immobilisation and displacement depending upon calliper-crutches (STJ 29 April 2004), wounds, fractures, loss of labour capacity and disfigurement (STJ 6 May 2003), permanent dependence upon others to satisfy basic needs (STJ 22 September 2005), loss of vision and sense of smell (STJ 16 January 2003) and sexual dysfunctions (STJ 27 April 2004: loss of a testicle). In this respect the Portuguese case law quite consciously inclined towards Italian case law, which had for a long time qualified danno biologico as danno evento (its basis has already been evinced in STJ 5 February 1987, BolMinJus 364 [1987] 819 and STJ 17 May 1994, CJ (ST) II (1994-II), 101; see further Álvaro Dias, Dano corporal, 123 as well as Álvaro Dias, Consequências não patrimoniais, 754). See also the Notes under VI.–6:204 (Compensation for injury as such).

19. In AUSTRIA the rudiments of a similar approach are also apparent, insofar as the fact that the injured party suffers pain is not a prerequisite for compensation for immaterial damages caused by physical injury. So-called "damages for pain and suffering" are awarded e.g. for the cutting of hair against the will of the relevant party (Rummel [-Reischauer] ABGB II², § 1325 no. 1). More importantly even an injured party, for whom no pain results from the accident, has a claim to be compensated by "damages for pain and suffering" (OGH 26 July 2006, ecolex 2007, 4; Karner, Ersatz ideeller Schäden bei Körperverletzung, 125). This is referred to as damage per se (Karner loc. cit. 127). The OGH (Austrian Supreme Court) expresses that damages for pain and suffering are also afforded to any person, who „is disabled by a liability-inducing detrimental effect on his overall personality, experiences pain and suffering deemed to be detrimental to his well-being and contentment and is thereby robbed of the most fundamental of human feelings" (OGH 14 January 1993, ZVR 1993/150, p. 339).

20. The remaining countries' positions are evidenced above in Notes II15-21 under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage).

V. Recoverable consequential economic damage

21. In the context of material consequential loss flowing from dommage corporel, FRENCH commentators suggest differentiating between "functional" damage (préjudice fonctionnel) and economic damage (préjudice économique) (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats, 2004/2005, no. 1533). "Functional damage" refers to the adverse disturbance of one's psychiatric or physical health leading to a deterioration of one's functioning capacity. This "functional deficiency" is expressed in terms of percentages – the so-called taux d´invalidité. When assessing this loss in financial terms, it is not, however, within the court's jurisdiction to expressly found their judgment on this well-established table of damages (Bourrié-Quenillet, JCP éd. G 2004, I, 136, no. 24). "Economic damages" include the cost of medical care, including necessary transport costs. The cost of assistance of a third party after an accident and costs in connection with the renovation of one's house also fall under this category of damages. The same goes for lost income. In cases of permanent disability, loss of earnings is estimated (le Tourneau loc. cit. no. 1534).

22. Under Belgian Law, the aggrieved party is to be put in the position in which he or she would have been, had the injurious event not occurred. Consequently he or she has a claim to be compensated for loss of earnings caused by the accident. Moreover, additional strain, with which one must carry out one's normal duties, restriction of one's capacity in maintaining one's home, costs of aid from third parties and the availing of medical care, as well as necessary modifications to one's dwelling or one's car, are all subject to compensation (Lindenbergh, TPR 2002 no. 10 p. 1427). Under MALTESE CC art. 1045(1) actual and direct losses are subject to compensation, in addition to the expenses which the injured party may have been compelled to incur in consequence of the damage, his loss of actual wages or other earnings, and the loss of future earnings arising from any permanent incapacity, total or partial.

23. According to SPANISH law, along with the cost of medical treatment, loss of earnings is considered a recoverable financial loss. During the recuperation period, lost wages and the lost income of a freelance worker are equally recoverable (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 156, also in relation to the marginal importance of evidence by submission of tax returns). Though, as a matter of principle, evidence must be adduced for lost gains (TS 26 September 2000, RAJ 2000 (4) no. 7529 p. 11578), that still does not rule out the compensation of so-called "house-wife losses" (TS (3rd Senate) 20 October 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 8844 p. 13069) or the compensation of a minor's losses, who, as a consequence of his or her injury, must attend school for a longer period of time or under difficult circumstances (TS 11 March 2000, RAJ 2000 (1) no. 1520 p. 2368; Vicente Domingo, El daño, 233; CFI Granada 14 June 1985, La Ley 1985, IV, no. 5784 p. 462; this is different from the case of a third level student: Audiencia Nacional (Senate for Administrative Litigation Proceedings) 20 November 2002, RAJ (TSJ y AP) 2003 (1) no. 51 p. 1244). The Third Party Liability and Insurance (Motor Vehicle Traffic) Act (Texto Refundido de la Ley sobre Responsabilidad Civil y Seguro en la Circulación de Vehículos de Motor, brought into force by Real Decreto Legislativo no. 8/2004 of 29 Oktober 2004) expressly provides, in Table of Damages IV (Correction Factors for the Compensation of Permanent Physical Injury) of its appendix, that any injured party of employable age, even if he or she cannot prove any income, has a claim to the lowest bracket of compensation provided for in the table. Minors also benefit from this (Catalonian TSJ 20 February 2003, RAJ (TSJ y AP) 2003 (2) no. 304 p. 1296). As a general rule, ambulance, hospitalisation, domestic nursing, medication and physiotherapy costs are borne - in accordance with public law - by social insurance bodies, who only enjoy a right of recovery against the wrongdoer for these so-called health care expenses in the case of fault (intent or negligence) (Social Insurance Act [Texto Refundido de las Leyes sobre Seguridad Social, brought into force by Real Decreto Legislativo no. 1/1994 of the 20th June] art. 127(3); see further TS 21 October 1981, RAJ 1981 (2) no. 3948 p. 3175)). In contrast, the costs of making one's dwelling handicapped-accessible, of rehabilitation, and of psychotherapy fall to be met directly by the party held liable (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 156). He or she must also bear the expenses that are incurred by the injured party or by his or her family due to private hospitalisation that is not – under public law - covered by social insurance but is nevertheless reasonable in the circumstances (TS 19 November 1981, RAJ 1981 (2) no. 4536 p. 3627; TS 4 May 1984, RAJ 1984 (2) no. 2396 p. 1792; TS 13 September 1985, RAJ 1985 (2) no. 4259 p. 3591). Courts charged with establishing facts have a relatively wide discretion when assessing the amount of other damages e.g. with regard to violations of property rights caused by disfiguring physical injuries to models, actors or persons whose work requires face-to-face contact with customers (TS 20 November 2000, RAJ 2000 (5) no. 9310 p. 14424).

24. Under Italian Law, so-called "costs of health" (medical care, medication etc.) are considered recoverable pecuniary loss, i.e. expenditure that is necessary for the regeneration of psycho-physical integrity, incl. the costs of daily home care (Cass. 8 April 2003, no. 5504, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, fasc. 4) and of other costs of health care (Cass. 1 December 1999, no. 13358, Giust.civ.Mass. 1999, 2413). Loss of one's ablilty to earn one's specific livelihood (capacità lavorativa specifica) also constitutes pecuniary loss. The claimant must show proof of this damage. His point of reference is his actual or probable future occupation (Cass. 12 September 2000, no. 12022, Danno e resp. 2001, 949; Cass. 29 October 2001, no. 13409, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 1814; Cass. 18 April 2003, no. 6291, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, fasc. 4). Lost chance is also recoverable as future pecuniary loss (Cass. 27 October 2001, no. 10291, Giust.civ.Mass. 2001, 1489).

25. In HUNGARY costs of treatment and of lost profit (typically loss of salary) also fall under the category of recoverable prima facie pecuniary loss (Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 54-55). In the case of treatment and hospitalisation costs damages are mandatory, along with, for example, expenses for medication, physical therapy, physiotherapy, ambulance, domestic health care, assistance from third parties and for a special diet, in addition to increased expenditure for washing, cleaning, electricity, heating, telephone and transport and the cost of renovating one's dwelling in order to make it handicapped-accessible (Petrik [-Köles], Polgári jog Kommentár a gyakorlat számára II, 632; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1358-1363; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 188; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 230-236). CC §§ 356 and 357 regulate in a detailed manner, the compensation for loss of earnings.

26. CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC arts. 445-447a also feature a range of detailed regulations for the compensation of loss of earnings arising out of an accident. CC art. 449 adds that "compensation shall also include compensation of purposeful expenses connected with medical treatment". POLISH CC art. 444 § 1 states that damages resulting from injury to one's body and health "shall cover all the resulting costs". They include treatment, special care and rehabilitation costs (medication, medical advice and operation, transport, rehabilitation equipment, wheelchair), and lost earnings during the treatment and recovery period (Safjan, Kodeks cywilny I[4], 1274-1275). If the injured party so requests, the wrongdoer is obliged to make an advance payment. This is also true for the necessary costs of re-education. Partial or entire loss of earning capacity and the cost of additional basic needs are to be covered by ongoing payments (§ 2 loc. cit.). SLOVENIAN LOA art. 174(1) enumerates "the costs in connection with treatment, other necessary expenses thereto connected and the earnings lost because of incapacity to work during treatment". Moreover, compensation falls due for partial or entire loss of earning capacity, the costs of increased basic needs and for loss of, or detriment to prospects of occupational success.

27. In the context of personal injury, under GERMAN CC § 249, primarily the costs of medical treatment are recoverable (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[65], § 249, no. 8). Where these are borne by the social insurance carrier or a private insurance company, the relevant claim is vested, by law, in the insurer (Social Security Code [SGB] Book X § 116; Law on Insurance Contracts [VVG] § 67). Although expenses are sustained based on those of the reasonable person (BGH 23 September 1969, NJW 1969, 2281), the injured party may select such a standard of service as is customary for him or her (BGH 18 October 1988, NJW-RR 1989, 670). For panel patients, availing of private medical services that are not insured is justified where the services offered by statutory health insurance are inadequate for the eradication of the harm and either other reasonable alternatives are not available (BGH 6 July 2004, BGHZ 160, 126) or the suffered injuries are particularly severe (CA Munich 29 July 2004, DAR 2004, 651). The cost of an expensive cosmetic operation, for which there is no sufficient reason are not recoverable (BGH 3 December 1974, NJW 1975, 640). In contrast, costs of treatment and care are recoverable (RG 11 June 1936, RGZ 151, 298; BGH 8 November 1977, VersR 1978, 149), so too are expenses for occupational rehabilitation, especially re-education (BGH 4 May 1982, NJW 1982, 1638; BGH 26 February 1991, NJW-RR 1991, 854). Recovery of the cost of returning to education for a more highly qualified job is restricted to partial compensation (BGH 2 June 1987, NJW 1987, 2741). Where increased basic needs result from the injury, a distinction is drawn: where once-off measures are necessary (like, e.g. the acquisition of ancillary medical equipment, the overhauling of a vehicle to make it handicapped-accessible or the renovation of a dwelling to make it wheelchair-accessible) full particulars are provided for under CC § 249(2) (BGH 19 May 1981, NJW 1982, 757; BGH 20 January 2004, NJW-RR 2004, 671). However, if on-going special needs result, then the wrongdoer is liable for damages in the measure so provided for in the special regulations contained in CC § 843 (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[65], § 249, no. 10). Lost profit also falls under the category of "natural restitution" [whereby the wrongdoer must compensate the injured party in order to restore his or her circumstances to the state he or she would have been in, had the wrongful event not occurred] (CC § 249 with clarification in § 252 first sentence; BGH 9 July 1986, BGHZ 98, 212, 219).

28. Under AUSTRIAN CC § 1325 the tortfeasor must compensate for costs of recovery and for present and future loss of earnings. Costs of recovery include all appropriate expenses resulting from the physical injury, as long as they are with a view to eradicating or mitigating the medical after-effects of the accident (OGH 18 November 1982, ZVR 1983/281, p. 312; OGH 20 February 1963, ZVR 1963/144, p. 154). This does not depend on actual successful recovery (OGH 18 May 1971, ZVR 1972/56, p. 86). Counted among costs of recovery are, e.g. the costs of medical treatment, of hospitalisation or residence in a health resort, costs of transport, of operations, expense for medication and other aids to recovery, even the payment of gratuity to nursing staff (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 321; Rummel [-Reischauer] ABGB II², § 1325 no. 14). The costs of treatment by a private doctor or of being in the special class of a hospital are recoverable, if they appear to be necessary from a medical standpoint or at least where they facilitate the expectation of a more favourable result from treatment (OGH 24 May 1962, JBl 1963, 40) or where they are in keeping with the particular lifestyle of the injured party (OGH 5 February 1970, SZ 43/32; OGH 24 April 2003, ZVR 2004/38, p. 131). The injured party is not entitled to compensation if it is established that the treatment for recovery has ceased (no "fictitious treatment costs": OGH strengthened senate 23 October 1997, SZ 70/220). Along with actual costs of treatment, costs of an increase in basic needs are compensable (OGH 10 December 1964, ZVR 1965/225, p. 243). Belonging to this category are, e.g. a wheelchair, nursing services, the cost of a disabled-ready vehicle or the renovation of a dwelling in order to make it handicapped-accessible (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VII², § 1325 no. 8). Lost earnings within the meaning of CC § 1325 are everything the injured party loses as a result of the deterioration of his or her ability to earn his or her livelihood, i.e. the ability to earn one's livelihood in a position that corresponds with one's education, qualifications and hitherto pursued occupation (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II², 134). Loss of occupational promotion opportunities are also recoverable (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 322). In contrast to loss of earnings, which is qualified as "positive damage", compensation for lost profit only falls due where there is intention or gross negligence (Koziol loc. cit. 132). Where someone is not in gainful employment, he or she has no claim for compensation of loss of earnings until his or her probable point of entry into the working world (Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II², § 1325 no. 23); losses that result from delayed entry into gainful employment are, however, recoverable (OGH 24 April 1969, EvBl 1969/374, p. 374). Where there is permanent damage, which goes part and parcel with a probable future reduction in earning capacity, a so-called "abstract pension" may be granted (OGH 30 September 1965, SZ 38/153; OGH 12 November 2003, ZVR 2004/18, p. 67). Additionally, CC § 1326 provides for compensation where a disfigurement arising out of the injury hinders the improved progression of the injured party; a low probability suffices here (OGH 11 November 1991, ZVR 1992/79, p. 176). Primarily belonging to this category is the diminution of employment prospects, but also the loss of the opportunity to marry or of social contact (OGH 11 January 1983, ZVR 1984/90, p. 84).

29. GREEK CC art. 929 clarifies that compensation for damages encompasses suffered damage and „costs of the medical condition", along with that which the injured party must do without in future or which he must expend as a result of increased basic needs; this provision complements CC arts. 297 and 914, but does not, however, replace them (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 929, no. 2; Deliyannis and Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 625). Costs of the medical condition cover all expenses that are necessary for the rehabilitation of the injured party (treatment, medication, transport). Furthermore, loss of earnings during the period of treatment is recoverable (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 19) as well as the impairment of performing domestic activities (even if no home help is hired in order to take care of household activities: CA Athens 5163/1996, EllDik/38/1997, p. 650; CA Athens 2043/1986, EllDik 27/1986, p. 678). Primarily, pecuniary loss resulting from one's diminished capacity to earn one's livelihood falls under the category of liability to compensate for that, which the injured party must do without, while expenditure for a specialised diet or for the hiring of a home carer, for example, falls under the category of liability to compensate for necessary additional expenditure (Georgiades loc. cit. nos. 22 and 28). According to CC art. 931, mutilation or disfigurement of the injured party shall carry weight when assessing the compensation for damages (for a more detailed account, see A.P. 739/1996, EllDik 38/1997, p. 72 and A.P. 477/2001 [unpublished, here cited under Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko dikaio I, 634).

30. PORTUGUESE Law follows much the same principles. The obligation to compensate for damage relates as much to current pecuniary disadvantages (danos emergentes: CC art. 564(1)), as it does to lost pecuniary advantages, as long as their realisation were sufficiently probable, had the accident not occurred (CC art. 564(2)), see Costa Basto, Personal injury compensation, 400). Liability covers, inter alia, costs of all types of treatment (STJ 21 December 2005), travel costs, actual loss of income and lost pay increases (in the case of permanent incapacity to earn one's livelihood, see STJ 7 April 2005) as well as the cost of necessary hired help (STJ 8 March 2005; Álvaro Dias, Dano corporal, 210 and 228). In contrast to labour law, traffic accident law does not recognise any fixed sums of damages (STJ 8 March 1979, BolMinJus 285 [1979] 290). It is therefore assumed in cases of permanent incapacity to earn one's livelihood, that the injured party is to be paid such lump sum that accords with his or her probable future earnings until death (STJ 6 July 2000, CJ VIII [2000-2] 144; STJ 9 January 1979, BolMinJus 283 [1979] 260; Costa Basto, Personal injury compensation, 405). More precise mathematical methods were developed for the concretion of these methods of calculation (STJ 5 May 1994, CJ II [1994-1] 86; STJ 7 February 2002), which can in turn be adjusted to accommodate the facts of each individual case (STJ 8 March 1979, BolMinJus 285 [1979] 290; STJ 6 July 2005). A claim in damages for pecuniary loss does not require that the injured party actually drew an income (see STJ 3 June 2004 and STJ 13 November 2001: the claim of a child due to the foreseeable delay of his entry into the working world, as well as STJ 13 May 2004: the claim of a housewife; see further STJ 13 November 2003 for the claim of a pensioner). A model, who can no longer pursue his occupation because of physical disfigurement, suffers not merely non-pecuniary damage, but genuine pecuniary losses (STJ 26 July 1968, BolMinJus 179 [1968] 165).

31. Under DUTCH CC art. 6:96, loss suffered, lost profit and all expenses that appear reasonable for the prevention and mitigation of the damage are considered recoverable pecuniary losses, see above HR 2 November 1962, NedJur 1963, no. 61 p. 193). For physical injury, CC art. 6:107 specifies that, in particular medical treatment and nursing, whether the latter is provided by a professional or a family member, e.g. the parents (HR 28 May 1999, NedJur 1999, no. 564 p. 3109) are covered. Liability for a specific fixed amount (currently 23 Euro per day) is imposed for additional costs that are not specified further. Furthermore, expenses for medication, transport costs, costs of everyday and industrial rehabilitation are recoverable (for more on this issue and what follows, see the commentary of Lindenbergh, Schadevergoeding II, art. 6:107, nos. 9-17). As long as recovery is still expected, in principle lost income may be recovered until one completes one's 65th year, and under certain circumstances also after this date (CFI Assen 15 January 1963, VR 1967, 61). For permanent damage, the difference between presumed attained income and actually earned income is compensated (HR 15 May 1998, NedJur 1998, no. 624 p. 3562; CFI Leeuwarden 26. April 1973, VR 1974, 21). For employees the starting point is always the net income, to which expenses and emoluments may belong (CA ´s-Hertogenbosch 25 March 1970, VR 1973, 23). The percentage of one's incapacity to earn a livelihood offers indication when estimating this figure. Where illicit work is involved, it shall depend on the net income, with which the injured party would have been left after tax. In the case of the self-employed, the judge is vested with yet further reaching jurisdiction to assess this figure. Costs arising from a permanent disability (wheelchair and other aids, medical help and nursing, transport costs, costs for a home help and costs for higher health insurance premiums) are generally recoverable. Lump sums are awarded, e.g. for increased wear and tear of clothes and shoes (CFI Amsterdam 17 March and 15 December 1993, VR 1994, 206) or for the fact that the injured party must seek out a hotel for his or her holiday rather than camping like before, which was less expensive (CFI Amsterdam 20 November 1985, VR 1987, 48). The same is true for the inability to carry out smaller jobs and repairs oneself any longer (CA `s-Hertogensbosch 10 September 1968, VR 1970, 10). No compensation is granted for a decrease in one's chances of marriage (CFI Amsterdam 27 January 1961, VR 1964, 60).

32. ESTONIAN LOA § 130(1) formulates it thus: „In the case of an obligation to compensate for damage arising from harm to one's physical or general health caused to a person, the obligated person shall compensate the aggrieved person for expenses arising from such damage or injury, including expenses arising from the increased needs of the aggrieved person, and damage arising from total or partial incapacity to work, including damage arising from a decrease in income or deterioration of the future economic potential of the aggrieved person".

33. Under the SWEDISH Damages Law, chap. 5 § 1 no. 1 the „costs of recovery and other costs, including a reasonable allowance for the injured party's loved ones" are recoverable, so too is loss of earnings according to no. 2 loc. cit. and according to no. 3 loc. cit. "pain, affliction or other on-going disabilities, as well as particular (formerly: "other": Sandstedt, VersRAI 2002, 9, 11) adverse effects resulting from the harm" are also compensable. DANISH Damages Law § 1(1) enumerates the same heads of damages (loss of income, costs of recovery and other losses); reasonable remuneration of loved ones, however, goes unmentioned (for a more detailed account, see von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 257; Møller and Wiisbye, Erstatningsansvarsloven[6], 22). FINNISH Damages Law chap. 5 § 2 nos. 1-4 accord with the equivalent Swedish rule. SWEDISH Damages Law chap. 5 § 1 nos. 2 and 3 regulate the establishing of recoverable loss of income including damages of tradesmen and persons who maintain a household. The subject matter of no. 1 loc. cit. is, inter alia, the costs of health care. They must be reasonable and necessary. Only costs that are not covered by general insurance come into play here (see also chap. 5 § 3 loc. cit. and in connection with that Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen, 141). The same is true in DENMARK (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 257).Treatment in a private hospital is compensable when public hospitals are overcrowded (Swedish HD 27 November 1967, NJA 1967, 497). The same goes for medically necessary care in a private home (HD 9 January 1968, NJA 1968, 23; HD 23 March 1976, NJA 1976, 103). The term "other costs" in the SWEDISH Damages Law chap. 5 § 1 no. 1 encompasses costs that are otherwise not covered, e.g. transport and travel costs in connection with after-treatment or costs of training to enable industrial rehabilitation, in addition to increased costs of getting to and from work and the additional expense - which resulted from the injury - of having to hire help with the upkeep of private property (Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen, 145; HD 16 November 1992, NJA 1992, 642). In DENMARK removal costs as a result of the injury are compensated (ØLD 15 August 2000, UfR 2000, 2357; HD 3 July 2002, UfR 2002, 2407). The costs of renovating a dwelling for a disabled person as well as for other increased basic needs are recoverable (von Eyben and Isager loc. cit. 258; Møller and Wiisbye loc. cit. 35). Calculation of compensation for loss of income in SWEDEN is done according to the Damages Law, chap. 5 § 1 nos. 2-3, the calculation of compensation for loss of future earnings, according to chap. 5 § 4. The equivalent provisions of the FINNISH Damages Law are to be found in chap. 5 § 2a and chap. 5 § 2b. The DANISH Damages Law contains corresponding provisions in § 2 (Loss of income) and §§ 5-9 (diminished ability to earn one's livelihood).

34. Under SCOTTISH Law consequential economic damage will include: wages lost by the injured party (Doonan v. Scottish Motor Traction Co. Ltd. 1950 SC 136); loss of capital (Fox v. Caulfield & Co. Ltd. 1975 SLT (Notes) 71); loss of earning capacity (Whyte v. University of Dundee 1990 SLT 545; loss of employability (Robertson's Robertson's Curator Bonis v. Anderson 1996 SC 217); pension rights lost by the injured party (Mitchell v. Glenrothes Development Corp. 1991 SLT 284); all medical expenses reasonably incurred (Rubens v. Walker 1946 SC 215) and other necessary expenditure such as the costs of prostheses, nursing, special clothing and altered premises (White and Fletcher, Delictual Damages, 15; Tuttle v. Edinburgh University 1984 SLT 172). Future loss of income and damages for the future cost of caring for an injured party are usually calculated by computing an annual loss (the multiplicand) to which is applied a multiplier appropriate to the age of the party and other relevant circumstances. This produces a lump sum which, when invested, should provide an annual income equivalent to the loss (McNulty v. Marshall's Food Group Ltd. 1999 SC 195). Under Administration of Justice Act 1982 s. 9 the claimant may seek a "reasonable sum" for services which, by virtue of his injuries, the claimant himself is no longer able to render to his relatives (Brown v. Ferguson 1990 SLT 274; Ingham v. John G. Russell (Transport) Ltd. 1991 SC 201; Lynch v. W. Alexander & Sons (Midlands) Ltd. 1987 SCLR 780). Under s. 10(c) and (iii), in assessing the amount of damages payable in respect of personal injuries, there must be deducted any benefit payable from public funds, in respect of any period before the date of the award of damages, designed to secure to the injured person a minimum level of subsistence.

35. Under IRISH law loss of earnings is also one of the principle heads of damage. In assessing loss of future earning capacity, "[n]ot merely is the former earning capacity of the plaintiff relevant but so also is the present physical condition, his prospective physical condition, the state of the labour market, the particular trade or skill which he has and the prospects for exercising it in the future having regard to the diminution of his capacity to do so resulting from the injuries he has sustained" (Walsh J. in Long v. O'Brien & Cronin Ltd., SC 24 March 1972, unreported. In Reddy v. Bates [1983] IR 141 the Supreme Court stated that "where damages are to be assessed under several headings, where the jury has added the various sums awarded and arrived at a total for damages, they should then consider this total sum, as should this court on any appeal, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the total sum awarded is, in the circumstances of the case, fair compensation for the plaintiff for the injury suffered, or whether it is out of all proportion to such circumstances." The length of time by which the expectation of life has been reduced must also be taken into account (Walsh J. in Doherty v. Bowaters Irish Wallboard Mills Ltd. [1968] IR 277 at 285). Where there is probability of some disability or illness arising or developing in the future, the damages to be awarded "should be commensurate with, and proportionate to, the degree of that possibility or probability" (Dunlop v. Kenny, SC 29 July 1969, unreported, per Ó Dálaigh C.J. at p. 11). The plaintiff is also entitled to compensation "for the reduction in the spectrum of employment which would have been ope[n] to him if uninjured" (Feeney v. John Sisk & Sons Ltd., DPIJ: Hilary and Easter Terms 1993, p. 254 at p. 258 [HC]). An injured plaintiff is entitled to recover all expenses reasonably incurred (or to be incurred) in respect of his or her medical care, inclusive of hospital expenses (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 44.107). A plaintiff who is eligible to receive free treatment and care under the Health Act 1970 is not obliged to avail himself or herself of free services under pain of being held otherwise to have unreasonably failed to mitigate damages (Civil Liability Act 1961, s. 34(2)(b)). Where the spouse, parents, or other close relatives or friends take on the task of caring for the injured plaintiff on an ongoing basis, that is also recoverable loss to the plaintiff (Doherty v. Bowaters Irish Wallboard Mills Ltd. [1968] IR 277, 286). In Curley v. Dublin Corporation [2003] IEHC 28, Gilligan J. in awarding damages took into account "the risk of unemployment, redundancy, illness, accident or the like". In O'Sullivan v. Kiernan [2004] IEHC 78, O'Neill J. awarded general damages because the plaintiff's range of choice of career was significantly reduced (although the plaintiff had not suffered any actual loss of earning capacity).

VI. Expenses of close relations

36. Under French Law, close relatives who betake themselves to an immobile injured party can claim the reasonable costs of visiting (travel and overnight stay) as damages of their own - so-called préjudice économique par ricochet - (Cass.civ. 20 December 1960, s. 1961 jur. 178). In contrast, costs that are incurred by third parties (whether strangers or relatives: Cass.civ. 14 November 2002, Bull.civ. 2002, II, no. 260 p. 205) who provide assistance to the victim (so-called assistance d´une tierce personne) qualify as pecuniary losses of the victim (Viney and Jourdain, Les effets de la responsabilité[2], no. 110-2 p. 208; CA Paris 10 November 1983, D. 1984 jur. 214, note Chartier).

37. In BELGIUM close relatives also have their own claim to compensation of reasonable visiting costs, whereas the costs of third parties for actual assistance provided has been to date deemed as (recoverable) damage to the victim, and indeed even when the help is gratuitously provided (Cass. 30 November 1977, Pas. belge 1978, I, 351). Cass. 6 November 2001, Pas. belge 2001, 1790, concl. du Jardin) has, however, granted those who render assistance their own claim against the wrongdoer from now on; it seems that the resulting question of the relationship of the claim of the victim and that of those who provide assistance has yet to be clarified (see further Lindenbergh, TPR 2002, no. 27 pp. 1437-1438).

38. The SPANISH Tribunal Supremo has confirmed on numerous occasions that close relatives have a claim to compensation for their own material and incorporeal losses arising from the harm to the primary injured party. According to case law hitherto reported these damages can not only be claimed by the relatives themselves (see e.g. TS 23 April 1992, RAJ 1992 (2) no. 3323 p. 4388 and TS 9 February 1988, RAJ 1988 (1) no. 771 p. 752) but also by the primary injured party (in his or her own name) (see e.g. TS (5th Senate) 23 February 1988, RAJ 1988 (1) no. 1451 p. 1389). Parents often have successful claims in their own names, as well as in the name of their injured children (like e.g. in TS (3rd Senate) 25 April 1989, RAJ 1989 (3) no. 3471 p. 3921 and in TS 15 October 1996, RAJ 1996 (4) no. 7110 p. 9586). Where someone continually cares for a severely injured relative and must give up work as a result, he or she has a claim in damages for loss of earnings suffered (TS (5th Senate) 23 February 1988 loc. cit.).

39. ITALIAN case law also allows for care of the injured party by relatives in various aspects. Due to the impossibility of estimating a loss in financial terms, compensation for parents who care for a brain-damaged child - e.g. for the costs of renovating one's dwelling and its sanitary facilities, for the child's specialised diet and for his or her daily care and supervision - is granted according to equity (Cass. 31 May 2003, no. 8827, Giust.civ.Mass., fasc. 5). A wife who gave up work in order to take care of her seriously injured husband is also recognised as having her own claim in damages for compensation. This is treated as pecuniary loss to the wife in the form of lost gains (Cass. 2 February 2001, no. 1516, Resp.civ. e prev. 2001, 881). Independent of this, relatives may assert their own claim for incorporeal damages based on CC art. 2059 for the harm to the familial relationship (Cass. 31 May 2003, no. 8827, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, fasc. 5).

40. Under HUNGARIAN Law family members who nurse the victim may assert claims for their own loss of earnings as well as for costs incurred arising from the care provided. Care by a wife who was not gainfully employed before her husband's accident is also compensable (Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 177 f). No person should have to undertake additional gratuitous work to relieve the injuring party from his obligation (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1358 f; Petrik [-Köles], Polgári jog Kommentár a gyakorlat számára II, 631). Travel and visiting costs borne by family members are equally recoverable, not, however, by friends. The cost of gifts brought to the hospital are also incompensable (Gellért [-Benedek] loc. cit. 1362 f). BH 2001/15 granted the most severely injured victim of a car accident the costs for treatment (inter alia for physiotherapy, massage therapy, logopedic therapy), loss of salary and transport costs (including the costs of necessary treatment abroad), as well as the costs of a vehicle, the costs of increased basic needs (e.g. television set, books), increased costs in maintaining the household and nursing costs. His parents, who cared for their son, were granted damages for loss of salary, for the deterioration of the maintenance of the garden, travel and visiting costs, the cost of the supervision of their other child during their absence and the cost of renovating their dwelling in order to make it handicapped-accessible.

41. Under GERMAN law the visiting expenses of close relatives are counted among the costs that are recoverable by the injured party (BGH 22 November 1988, BGHZ 106, 28, 29; BGH 21 May 1985, NJW 1985, 2757; BGH 19 February 1991, NJW 1991, 2340). Compensability depends on whether the visits are medically beneficial and necessary to the recovery process and whether the costs were unavoidable. Therefore, compensation is only granted for the costs of e.g. the most economic mode of transport, loss of salary only for working hours that may not be made up, and lost profit of the self-employed only to the extent that it is directly assignable to the visitation time and can not be obtained by other means (BGH 19 February 1991, NJW 1991, 2340, 2341). Within the context of the case law here, "relative" is taken to mean cohabitees as well (CFI Münster 12 June 1997, NJW 1998, 1801). The relatives themselves have no claim against the injuring party, but can make a claim on the injured party to compensation (BGH 21 December 1978, NJW 1979, 598).

42. Within the meaning of AUSTRIAN CC § 1325, visting expenses of close relatives are regarded as recovery costs because their visit usually enhances recovery (Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II², § 1325 no. 16; OGH 11 November 2004, ÖJZ 2005, 390). Those who bear these visitation costs are entitled to claim (OGH 30 March 1967, ZVR 1968/83, p. 189). As a result, relatives can themselves be entitled to claim (OGH 20 June 1989, SZ 62/116: children of the injured party who were of full age; OGH 20 June 2002, ÖJZ 2002/190, p. 725: cohabitee). Though mere expenditure of time is indeed incompensable (OGH 1 March 1984, EFSlg 46.093), parents still enjoy a claim in damages when they take unpaid leave in order to look after their underage child in hospital (OGH 25 April 1985, EFSlg 48.648) or if they otherwise have to take on a particular extra burden (CA Innsbruck 20 September 2000, ZVR 2001/100, p. 363). Where a relative takes care of the injured party, this person can personally take a claim against the tortfeasor, no different than if the injured party would have had to admit himself to a nursing home. The wrongdoer is liable for the cost that would have fallen due for professional carers (OGH 26 May 1999, ZVR 1999/109, p. 375 and OGH 20 June 2002, ZVR 2003/47, p. 166; different approach OGH 10 September 1998, SZ 71/146).

43. In GREEK Law it is argued that the term "costs of illness" in CC art. 929 also encompasses expenses that close relatives take on in order to visit the injured party. This relates to e.g. costs for phone calls, travel costs, loss of earnings or hiring a third party in the business of the relative in question for the time that he spends with the injured party (Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)[3], 186). Others deem this to be an interpretation which is no longer true to the text of the law, they opine, however, that appropriate further legal education may be justified according to considerations of equity (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 929, no. 15).

44. PORTUGUESE CC art. 495 acknowledges some exceptions to the principle that tortious claims are only open to those whose right has been infringed (Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 620). According to this provision, along with hospitals and doctors, particularly those who have provided help to the injured party have their own claim in damages against the injuring party (for a more detailed account, see Abrantes Geraldes, Temas da responsabilidade civil I, 14). Though family members who suffer loss of salary because they are providing the victim with assistance are not expressly mentioned, they are, however, likewise considered entitled to compensation according to the case law (STJ 16 December 1993, CJ (ST) I (1993-3) 182; CA Porto 4 April 1991,), for instance the mother of a victim of a traffic accident who has given up her job to enable her to care for her daughter (STJ 8 March 2005). Naturally, a causal nexus between the injury of the primary victim arising from the accident and the pecuniary damage of the relative is required (STJ 26 February 2004).

45. DUTCH CC art. 6:107 entitles third parties (with the exception of insurance carriers), who have paid expenses for the benefit of the injured party, to a claim in damages against the wrongdoer, if the injured party were likewise entitled to claim damages for these expenses, had he paid them himself. Costs of treatment, nursing, rehabilitation and medication, in addition to reasonable costs of visitation come into play in this context (MvT, Parl. Gesch. Inv., 1283; Schadevergoeding II [-Lindenbergh], art. 107, no. 45). The loss of earnings of a close relative who temporarily gives up work in order to nurse the victim is recoverable, indeed to the amount that otherwise necessary professional assistance would have cost. Where an unscathed close family member hires home help, they shall have a claim to the costs of such expense (Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12,] no. 474); however, if the family themselves help, without being able to show an actual loss, a claim in damages does not arise (Lindenbergh loc. cit. no. 47).

46. The SWEDISH Damages Law, chap. 5 § 1 requires compensation for "costs of recovery and other costs, including reasonable compensation for the injured party's loved ones." This relates to expenses incurred for care and visiting. Where circumstances so allow, relatives who nurse the victim may even recover loss of revenue that exceeds the (hypothetical) costs of professional carers (Sandstedt, VersRAI 2002, 9, 10; HD 5 November 1996, NJA 1996, 639). It is unclear, who exactly can claim the damages. HD 23 March 1976, NJA 1976, 103 and HD 10 November 1982, NJA 1982, 668 granted the relatives their own claim. The explanatory notes on the newly formulated provision of chap. 5 § 1 loc. cit. indicate, however, that it is the claim of the injured party (Prop 2000/01:68 [Ersättning för ideell skada] 68). Loss of income and travel costs incurred by a relative who cares for an injured minor fall within the meaning of "other loss" in § 1(1) of the DANISH Damages Law (ØLD 14 September 1995, FED 1995.1020 and HD 10 October 2000, UfR 2001, 28). However, it is required that measures taken by the relative are necessary for the injured party's recovery (HD 3 July 2002, UfR 2002, 2407). Whoever is entitled to the claim (the injured party or the relative) seems not to have been conclusively cleared up. In FINLAND close relatives can in certain circumstances claim loss of income and necessary costs incurred as a result of their care (Damages Law, chap. 5 § 2d, first sentence), in addition to compensation for other measures that aid recovery (loc. cit., second sentence), not however after the point in time at which the damage subsided (loc. cit., third sentence).

47. In ENGLAND Administration of Justice Act 1982 ss. 7 to 10 provide that services rendered to an injured person by a relative, unless it is expressly agreed that no sum shall be payable, will be a head of loss allowing recovery of "reasonable remuneration" and repayment of reasonable expenses. In SCOTLAND, a wide range of "necessary services" have yielded compensation under s. 8 (services rendered to the injured party): the wife who assisted her husband with washing and dressing (Gripper v. British Railways Board 1991 SLT 659); the wife who walked her husband's dog and drove his car (Millar v. Fife Regional Council 1990 SLT 651); the husband who took over the running of the household (Smith v. Chief Constable, Central Scotland Police 1991 SLT 634); the cohabitee who "effectively performed the services of a nursing auxiliary" (Lynch v. W. Alexander & Sons (Midlands) Ltd. 1987 SCLR 780). 'Relative' for the purposes of s. 8 is defined in s. 13(1) of the 1982 Act – it is restricted to spouses; 'ascendants'; descendants'; siblings; and uncles and aunts. Divorced spouses, 'common law spouses', those treated as children of the family, illegitimate children, and stepchildren are included, and since 'any relationship of the half blood shall be treated as a relationship of the whole blood' and 'any relationship by affinity shall be treated as a relationship by consanguinity' (loc. cit. s.13(a)), a broad array of relationships is provided for, such as half-siblings, uncles and aunts by marriage, and even 'grandparents-in-law', and combinations of these categories. The loss is recovered in a claim made by the injured person, who is placed under an obligation to account to the person suffering the loss.

48. Under IRISH law the spouse or parents of an injured victim of a tort can claim compensation for loss of consortium (McKinley v. The Minister for Defence (No. 2) [1997] IEHC 93, [1997] 2 IR 176) or loss of services as the case may be, in respect of, inter alia, the medical expenses that they incur in relation to the victim (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 44.109). Where the spouse, parents or other close relations or friends have taken on the task of caring for the injured plaintiff on an ongoing basis, some judges in recent years (e.g. Smith v. Ireland, HC 16 August 1996, unreported [Flood J.]) have been willing to make an award directly in favour of the carer-spouse (or other caring relations or friends) rather than resorting to a trust (as has been done in England) of a restitutionary (Hughes v. O'Flaherty, HC 19 January 1996, unreported) characterisation.

VII. Recoverable consequential non-economic damage

49. The FRENCH legal system recognises a range of recoverable non-economic damage (see further le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats (2004/2005), nos. 1582 et seq.; Chartier, La réparation du préjudice dans la responsabilité civile, 221 et seq.). It is normally divided into four categories: (i) mental and physical pain (souffrances morales ou physiques), (ii) aesthetic damage (préjudice esthétique), (iii) damage to sex life and fertility (préjudice sexuel) and (iv)loss of well-being (préjudice d´agrément). Even victims who find themselves in a vegetative and thereby unconscious state are fully compensated; their damages are evaluated "in abstracto" (Bourrié-Quenillet, JCP éd. G 2004, I, 136 no. 20).

50. In BELGIUM the reference point is the same. Temporary or complete loss of the ability to earn one's livelihood is also compensated as immaterial damage - either as pretium doloris or as préjudice d´agrément (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, nos. 142-150 pp. 271-296).

51. SPANISH legal doctrine, much like its French counterpart, distinguishes between pretium (or pecunia) doloris (actual damages for pain and suffering), perjuicio estético (disfiguring physical damage), pérdida de agrado (loss of the pleasures or amenities of life) and perjuicio sexual; it also recognises, however, e.g. perjuicio juvenil (the "abstract" loss of the ability of a minor who has not yet entered the working world to earn a livelihood) (de Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 693; Vicente Domingo, Los daños corporales, 130). The question of the precise categorisation of a set of circumstances into any of these respective heads of damages is not, of course, answered consistently (see e.g. Vicente Domingo, El daño, 238 with Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 161). Compensability of valid disfiguring physical harm, which is easily proven (TS 26 January 1988, RAJ 1988 (1) no. 477 p. 487) neither depends on the relevant part of the body, nor the age, gender or occupation of the injured party; this is not so for the assessment of the amount of compensation (TS 15 November 1990, RAJ 1990 (7) no. 8919 p. 11365), for which the judge may use his full discretion (TS 2 December 1989, RAJ 1989 (7) no. 9671 p. 11248). Table of damages no. VI contained in the appendix of the Road Traffic Liability and Insurance Act (Texto Refundido de la Ley sobre Responsabilidad Civil y Seguro en la Circulación de Vehículos de Motor, brought into force by Real Decreto Legislativo no. 8/2004 of 29 October 2004) expressly provides for compensation for disfiguring physical harm. Loss of the pleasures or amenities of life relates to everyday events, such as shopping, taking walks, dressing oneself and the loss of zest and energy for life (TS 7 May 1987, RAJ 1987 (2) no. 3022 p. 2814).

52. After a long and volatile history (see Notes II16 and V36 under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) above), under ITALIAN law danno biologico now also numbers among the consequential non-economic losses of physical injury (CC art. 2059) (Cass. 12 December 2003, no. 19057, Danno e resp. 2004, 762; Cass. 10 August 2004, no. 15434, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 7-8). This has not changed the fact that damages falling due for causing danno biologico, as before, aim to compensate for the damage to a person's psycho-physical integrity (Cass. 20 February 2004, no. 3399, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 2; Cass. 27 April 2004, no. 7980, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 4). New here, however, is that damages resulting from a violation of a constitutionally relevant interest closely relating to the person are compensated, without the restrictive requirements of CC art. 2059 (violation of a criminal law provision or the existence of another provision which expressly declares a danno morale as recoverable) coming into play. This is true for danno morale in the narrow sense (i.e. for mental suffering) (Cass. 6 August 2004, no. 15179, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, fasc. 7-8) as well as for so-called – at least, until now - danno esistenziale (i.e. for harm to necessary elements of personal development worthy of protection) (Cass. 31 May 2003, nos. 8828 and 8827, Giur.it. 2004, 1129; Cass. 19 August 2003, no. 12124, Giur.it. 2004, 1129; Cass. 27 April 2004, no. 7980, Danno e resp. 2004, 962, note Ponzanelli; Cass. 15 January 2005, no. 729, Giust.civ.Mass. 2005, fasc. 1; Cass. 18 March 2005, no. 5677, D&G 2005, fasc. 19, 38). The claim to compensation of danno morale only remains subject to the limitations of CC art. 2059 if it does not relate to a violation of a constitutionally relevant right closely relating to the person.

53. Under HUNGARIAN Law the judge enjoys a wide case-by-case discretion in granting incorporeal damages (see in more detail Lábady, A nem vagyoni kártérítés újabb bírói gyakorlata, 51). Incorporeal damages are only granted in cases of reasonably significant interference with one's physical or mental well-being. Injury per se does not suffice to ground a claim for reparation; a non-material detriment must be proven (BH 2002/24; BH 2001/110; BH 2001/12; BH 1997/435), unless it is obvious (BH 2002/186), see Gellért (-Benedek), A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1328-1330). For example, mere worry over the recovery of a child is insufficient (Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I^2, 202). In contrast, compensation was awarded to a mentally indisposed mother who lost a child as a result of a doctor's error (BH 2005/105). The granting of incorporeal damages does not necessarily require fault on the part of the person liable (BH 2000/100 and BH 2005/250: objective liability of the state for a Hepatitis C infection). Even victims who are in a coma, do not feel the pain for other reasons or who have lost their comprehension capacity have a claim to compensation of their incorporeal losses (Petrik loc. cit. I^2, 165-166, 202/8-203; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1326-1327, 1346; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 261-262). On top of physical damage (amputation, deterioration of general health, humiliation, mental suffering, psychopathy), also adverse effects on social surroundings and the loss of particular options when planning one's life goals (Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 74-75; ibid., Polgári jog I^2 loc. cit.) are considered recoverable immaterial detriment.

54. CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC provide that in the case of harm to physical or mental health, "the injured party's pain and aggravation of his or her social assertion shall be compensated by lump sum". POLISH CC art. 445 § 2 comes to the same result. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 179 prescribes reasonable monetary compensation for "physical distress suffered, for mental distress suffered owing to a reduction in life activities", and for "disfigurement". ROMANIA distinguishes between physical pain (durerea fizică), asthetic damage (prejudiciu estetic), physiological damage (prejudiciu fiziologic) and the prejudiciu de agrement, i.e. the damage that emanates from the fact that it is impossible for the injured party to pursue a sporting, artistic or other activity (Adam, Drept civil, 277).

55. In the context of harm to physical or general health, GERMAN CC § 253(2) expressly provides for the compensation of incorporeal damage. According to the case law, so-called "damages for pain and suffering" serves a dual function. They should serve to compensate for pain and suffering sustained as well as to provide the injured party with a sense of atonement about the sanctioning of the wrongdoer (BGH [Grand Senate For Civil Matters] 6 July 1955, BGHZ 18, 149, 154; BGH 29 November 1994, BGHZ 128, 117, 120) (this atonement function of damages for pain and suffering is, however, the subject of debate, see further, inter alia, MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB^4, § 253 no. 11). The compensatory function is concerned with putting the injured party in such a position that he may avail of measures of alleviation and convenience (Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB^{65}, § 253 no. 11). The assessment of compensation is carried out according to equity and under CCP § 287, this is at the full discretion of the court. All relevant circumstances of each particular case are to be considered, particularly the form, intensity and length of the injury suffered to that, which is protected by the law. Furthermore, it is noted by the courts that as far as possible, comparable injuries should result in approximately the same compensation. In practice, the "table of damages for pain and suffering", which is based on an analysis of numerous decided cases, along with the court's own jurisprudence, are accorded significant weight.

56. So-called “damages for pain and suffering”, which fall due under AUSTRIAN CC § 1325 should be an atonement for all detriment experienced by the injured party’s sensory spectrum. They should compensate the entire complex of pain, the feelings of listlessness that thereby arise and put the injured party in the position to be able to provide monetary reparation for suffering undergone and loss of the pleasures or amenities of life (OGH 22 November 1988, ZVR 1989/90, p. 147). Such claims for damages for pain and suffering are transferable and capable of being bequeathed (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 323). Damages for pain and suffering are also granted to those who are in an anaesthetic state due to the accident. So-called “compensation for disfigurement” (CC § 1326) is qualified by case law as a special case of compensation for economic loss (see above, Note V19).

57. GREECE grants incorporeal damages resulting from harm to physical or general health in the context of CC art. 932. Non-economic damages are damages, which a person suffers due to a violation of his moral, mental or physical integrity (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Vossinakis], art. 932, no. 1). The injured party shall receive reparation for grief, pain, discomfort or depression suffered (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 647). Whether non-economic damages also fall due to victims who have lost their apperceptive and sensory capacity, is the subject of debate. In literature, the question is mostly answered in the affirmative (e.g. Paterakis, I chrimatiki ikanopoiisi gia ithiki vlavi, 277 and Kritikos, Aposimiosi apo troxaia avtokinitika atiximata, no. 891); in contrast, by granting a quite exceptionally low sum of compensation, CA Athens 2461/1991 (unpublished, cited here under Kritikos loc. cit. 308, fn. 13) basically answered it in the negative. It is recognised that loss of sex life amounts to recoverable non-economic loss (CA Athens 6055/1989 ArchN 41/1990, 776). Whether the so-called “compensation for disfigurement” (CC art. 931) provides reparation for economic or non-economic damages, is not consistently ruled upon. A.P. 739/1996, EllDik 38/1997, 72 opined, that both CC art. 931 and CC art. 932 sought to provide reparation for non-economic damages. Consequently, a unitary sum may be awarded for both.

58. Primarily enumerated in PORTUGAL as recoverable forms of non-economic damages are pain, so-called aesthetic damage, loss of amenities of life, harm to general health and longevity and “loss of youth” (STJ 17 June 2004). Pretium doloris comprises the physical and moral pain suffered during the disease and the temporary impairment (STJ 17 June 2004). Compensation for disfigurement is granted independently of whether the victim has to reckon with other concrete disadvantages (Álvaro Dias, FS Almeida Costa, 764). Its quantum is influenced by, among other elements, the victim’s job, the intensity and place of the injury, its static or dynamic character and the victim’s age and sex. The loss of amenities of life (dano de afirmação pessoal or dano à vida de relação), consists of the injury to social and relational capacity, to the possibility of living a life to enjoy moments of physical, social and familiar pleasure. The loss of the capacity to play football with friends (STJ 22 September 2005) or to lop off grape-vines and breed cattle (STJ 9 December 2004) and the isolation from family during hospitalisation (STJ 9 December 2004) are non-economic losses worthy of compensation. This category also includes the loss of sexual enjoyment (dano sexual), as it implies the limitation or suppression of the sexual function and other handicaps, such as the deterioration of one’s self-image and loss of attractiveness. Also, the abandonment by the spouse, of a man who became impotent after a road traffic accident, yields a cause of action for non-economic damages to the victim (STJ 27 January 2005). The loss of general health and longevity of life involves irreversible damage to health and well-being of the victim and the decrease in life expectancy (STJ 17 June 2004). Finally, pretium juventutis relates to the impairment of the ability to live out one's youth (STJ 29 May 2003).

59. DUTCH CC art. 6:106(1)(a-c) lists the circumstances under which a party has a claim in non-economic damages. Hereunder falls - in cases of physical injury and harm to general health - physical and mental pain, emotional distress, insomnia, aggravation, anxiety, feelings of inferiority, disfigurement of the body and decreased life expectancy (Schadevergoeding II [-Lindenbergh], art. 6:106, no. 5). It is still the subject of debate, whether victims who are unable to realise their situation (because they lie in a coma, for example, or are incapable of comprehension) also have a claim to damages for pain and suffering (see further Lindenbergh loc. cit. no. 10 and Stolker, RM-Themis 1998, 3-29). HR 20 September 2002, NedJur 2002, no. 112 p. 871 refused a cause of action for compensation of non-economic damages for a victim who never wakes from his state of unconsciousness; on the other hand, a short period of consciousness between injury and death is sufficient to found a cause of action and where a victim, who lies in a coma for a long time, later regains consciousness, his or her compensation is back-dated for that time (HR 20 September 2002 loc. cit.; Vranken, NedJur 2004, no. 112 p. 891).

60. ESTONIAN LOA § 130(2) avoids an exact classification of individual non-economic damages: "In the case of an obligation to compensate for damage arising from harm to one's physical or general health, the obligated person shall pay the aggrieved person a reasonable amount of money as compensation for incorporeal damage caused to the person by such damage or injury." LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.250(2) safeguards the compensability of non-pecuniary damages in the case of harm to one's physical or general health. CC art. 6.250(1) specifies that „non-pecuniary damage shall be deemed to be a person's suffering, emotional experiences, inconveniences, mental shock, emotional depression, humiliation, deterioration of reputation, diminution of possibilities to associate with others, etc., evaluated by a court in monetary terms".

61. According to the SWEDISH Damages Law, chap. 5 § 1 no. 3 a cause of action exists for reparation of (temporary) pain and affliction (sveda och värk), for permanent disabilities (lyte eller annat stadigvarande men) and also as an exception for other particular impediments of a non-pecuniary nature (särskilda olägenheter) (Sandstedt, VersRAI 2002, 9, 11). DANISH § 3 Damages Law regulates the compensation for pain and affliction in the case of illness (svie og smerte), and § 4 the non-economic compensation for permanent disabilities (varigt mén). FINNISH Damages Law, chap. 5 § 2 no. 3-4 in conjunction with chap. 5 § 2c deals again with the compensation for pain and affliction as well as for permanent disabilities (see further Sisula-Tulokas, JFT 2000, 634-651).

62. In SCOTLAND the injured person can recover for solatium (described by Lord President Clyde in Duffy v. Kinneil Cannel & Coking Co. Ltd. 1930 SC 596, 597 as "properly mean[ing] reparation for the pain and suffering inflicted on anyone in consequence of the commission of a delict against him"). Solatium may be divided up into three main segments: (i) pain and suffering; (ii) loss of faculties and amenities; and (iii) shortened expectation of life (Dalgleish v. Glasgow Corp. 1976 SC 32, 53; Scottish Law Commission Report on the Effect of Death on Damages (Scot.Law Com. no. 134) (Cm 1848 [1992] para. 2.3). A person in a coma or persistent vegetative state presumably suffers no pain, so no award under this head is appropriate (Dalgleish v. Glasgow Corporation loc. cit.). Damages (Scotland) Act 1976 s. 9A allows loss of expectation of life to be taken into account in awarding solatium. The claimant's right to damages by way of solatium for a shortened expectation of life depends on whether or not he is aware that his expectation of life has been reduced (Gloag and Henderson,

The Law of Scotland[11], para. 34.15). The courts will generally take a broad brush approach to questions of quantification (Stewart, Delict[3], para. 12.15). Courts are assisted by awards in clearly similar cases but obviously every case has its own peculiarities (Barker v. Murdoch 1979 SLT 145; Bowers v. Strathclyde Regional Council 1981 SLT 122). Jury cases are becoming more common, which inevitably results in increased awards.

63. In IRELAND there are two main heads of non-pecuniary loss: (i) pain and suffering; and (ii) loss of expectation of life. A plaintiff may recover damages (for future as well as for present and past) suffering not only as a direct result of the injury but also for the pain and suffering that may accompany or result from a reasonably necessary medical operation (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 44.144). In Lee v. Joyce, SC 3 December 1964, unreported, Lavery J. concluded that it was impossible to explain "on any logical or mathematical basis", the translation of suffering into terms of money – the judge or a jury could only express a personal (and thereby subjective) view as to what was fair compensation. In Sinnott v. Quinnsworth Ltd. [1984] ILRM 523), the Supreme Court introduced a rough tariff in relation to damages for pain and suffering. O'Higgins C.J. noted that "unless there are particular circumstances which suggest otherwise, general damages … should not exceed a sum in the region of contemporary standards and money value". In other decisions, the court has regarded damages under this limb as another piece of the broader jigsaw that represents the total sum of damages to be awarded to the plaintiff in light of an intuitive "feel" for what is fair and proportionate compensation for the plaintiff (Reddy v. Bates [1983] IR 141, Burke v. Blanch, HC 28 July 1989, unreported; Kealy v. Minister for Health, HC 19 April 1999, unreported [Morris P]). The apparent cap of IR£ 150,000 [EUR 190,500] that was placed on damages in the Sinnott case has since been overhauled, in order to maintain comparability with the status quo (Connolly v. Bus Éireann, HC 29 January 1996, unreported (Barr J.); Coppinger v. Waterford County Council, DPIJ: Hilary & Easter Terms 1996, p. 1; Kealy v. Minister for Health, HC 19 April 1999, unreported [Morris P]; McEneaney McEneaney v. Monaghan County Council [2001] IEHC 114). Where a plaintiff accommodates himself particularly well to his plight, he will have his damages reduced (Prendergast v. Joe Malone Self Drive Ltd., SC 21 June 1967, unreported; O'Toole v. Kearns, SC 31 July 1957, unreported). The Courts have tended to regard facial injuries as being of more importance for women than for men (Prendergast v. Joe Malone Self Drive Ltd., SC 21 June 1967, unreported; Foley v. Thermocement Products Ltd. (1954) 90 ILTR 92 at 94 [SC]; Ronayne v. Ronayne [1970] IR 15 at 22 [SC]). The social standing of the plaintiff has also been considered relevant (Ronayne v. Ronayne [1970] IR 15 at 22 [SC]). In Cooke v. Walsh [1984] ILRM 208 [SC], the majority of the Supreme Court agreed that the amount to be awarded for general damages should be "moderate" on account of the plaintiff's lack of awareness or appreciation of his condition because he had been "spared the considerable mental suffering which would follow from knowledge or appreciation of the virtual destruction of his life." See also Dunne v. National Maternity Hospital [1989] IR 91. Where a cause of action survives for the benefit of the estate of a deceased person, the damages recoverable for the benefit of his estate are not to include damages "for loss or diminution of expectation of life or happiness" (Civil Liability Act 1961, s. 7(2)). Thus, recovery here is limited to cases where the victim is still alive but his or her expectation of life has been reduced. It seems that the position today is that damages may be recovered under this head, but that they should be moderate (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 44.197).

64. For an analysis of the wide discrepancies in the sums of compensation awarded by courts for non-economic damages see v. Bar, FS Deutsch (1999), 27-43.

Illustration 2 is taken from BGH 14 June 2005, BGHZ 163, 209; illustration 3 from STJ 5 March 1969, BolMinJus 185 (1969) 171.

VI.–2:202: Loss suffered by third persons as a result of another's personal injury or death

(1) Non-economic loss caused to a natural person as a result of another's personal injury or death is legally relevant damage if at the time of injury that person is in a particularly close personal relationship to the injured person.

(2) Where a person has been fatally injured:

(a) legally relevant damage caused to the deceased on account of the injury to the time of death becomes legally relevant damage to the deceased's successors;

(b) reasonable funeral expenses are legally relevant damage to the person incurring them; and

(c) loss of maintenance is legally relevant damage to a natural person whom the deceased maintained or, had death not occurred, would have maintained under statutory provisions or to whom the deceased provided care and financial support.

COMMENTS

A. General

Overview. This Article concerns a segment of the question which losses suffered by third parties as a result of the injury or death of another constitute for them legally relevant damage. The Article is concerned with the claims of close relatives and other persons who were particularly close to the injured person or, as the case may be, the deceased.

Persons not covered. Others having a relationship to the deceased (e.g. employers or employees, partners in a firm, etc.) may also be adversely affected by the death of the injured person and likewise suffer consequential damage. Whether or not such persons, in given circumstances, can have any claim against the injuring person will depend on the application of the residual rule on damage under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1)(b) and (c). It follows, however, by inference from the text of this provision that persons who were connected with the injured person only in a business sense and not in a personal sense will only suffer a legally relevant damage in highly exceptionally circumstances. It is conceivable that they might be given a claim in cases of intentional killing with the aim of causing loss to the third party. The claim for labour or services which the employer had in relation to the party killed who was obliged to provide that service or those services does not amount to a "right" within the meaning of VI.–2:101(1)(b). It therefore depends on the circumstances listed in VI.–2:101(1)(c) whether or not the employer or business partner is injured in respect of an "interest worthy of legal protection".

Illustration 1

A, one half of a couple of professional figure skaters, is injured in a road accident caused by C's negligence. Because of the severity of his injuries, A is unable to skate for a while and consequently his skating partner B is unable to pursue her profession too. B has no claim under paragraph (1) to compensation for non-economic loss unless she was tied to B in a more than merely professional capacity on the basis of a particularly close personal relationship (as his spouse or cohabiting partner). Although it can be accepted that A and B are jointly exercising a profession or pursuing a trade within the meaning of VI.–2:208 (Loss upon unlawful impairment of business), a deliberate interference in the profession or trade is missing. A legally relevant damage can therefore only be made out within the scope of VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage). However, after consideration of all the circumstances, such an application of that provision to that effect must be rejected.

Non-economic losses. It follows ultimately from VI.–2:202(1) that third parties who are not referred to here do not have a claim to compensation for possible non-economic losses. Their opportunities to recover compensation are confined to economic losses (if any).

Structure and organisation of the rules. Paragraph (1) relates to non-economic losses of dependents arising out of the injury or death of a closely connected person. Looked at from a systematic point of view, this is an exception to paragraph (2)(b) of VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss): paragraph (1) in substance states that in the cases which it addresses nothing turns on the fact that the affected persons have not in fact suffered a damage to their psychological health which "amounts to a medical condition". Paragraph (2) in contrast relates only to those cases in which someone has been killed. The provision makes clear that (a) a legally relevant damage which the deceased suffered continues after the death to be one for which compensation is due, the entitlement to compensation passing to the heirs or representatives, (b) the reasonable costs of a funeral are a damage for which compensation is due, and (c) the survivors left behind by the deceased have a claim to reparation in respect of the maintenance foregone by them as a result of the death of their maintenance provider. Paragraph (1) concerns non-economic loss; paragraph (2)(a) relates to both economic and non-economic loss; and paragraphs (2)(b) and (c) are concerned only with economic loss.

B. Non-economic loss of close relations in cases of personal injury and death (paragraph (1))

Relation to VI.–2:201(2)(b) (Personal injury and consequential loss). As already stated, paragraph (1) provides persons who are particularly close to the injured or deceased person with a claim for compensation for their non-economic damage. This claim will exist even though the conditions of paragraph (2)(b) of VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss) are not satisfied: Persons who are particularly close to the severely or fatally injured victim are also to be compensated for their mental suffering, even though their suffering may not amount to a medical condition.

Policy consideration. Paragraph (1) consciously exceeds the present legal position in certain European jurisdictions. It would be a value judgement which nowadays is no longer acceptable if a damage of the significance described in paragraph (1) were not to qualify as legally relevant damage. The emptiness which a person feels when a life partner, a child or a parent is killed or severely injured need not be suffered without reparation, though the parties concerned do not suffer injury to their health. Should they in fact suffer such damage, then two bases of claim are available to them. The judge must express the entire damage in terms of one sum – as a rule a lump sum (see further VI.–6:203 (Capitalisation and quantification) paragraph (1)). The rule in paragraph (1) reflects the legal position in what is by far the predominant majority of the Member States. However, this rule would be misunderstood if it were interpreted as (and criticised for) "commercialising death". That is certainly not the case. The reason is that this rule is concerned not with enriching the relatives, but with recognising that the severest of detrimental impacts on one's enjoyment of life is worthy of reparation.

The circle of persons affected. Included are persons who stand in a particularly close personal relationship either formally in law (spouse, children, parents) or de facto (cohabiting partner, step-parents). A mere friendship or a close professional or business relationship, on the other hand, is not sufficient. Such persons might exceptionally have a claim for reparation of their economic loss if the conditions of VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) are met, but they do not acquire a claim to reparation of their non-economic loss.

Claim by third parties for loss of maintenance in case of death only. In contrast to the rule applicable when the injured person dies (cf. VI.–2:202(2)(c)), a person who was being maintained by the injured person, before the latter sustained the injury, will have no claim against the injuring person for any consequential loss of maintenance during the life of the injured person. A third party might suffer a loss of maintenance because, for example, incapacity to work has deprived the injured person of the means to earn the income out of which the injured person would otherwise have paid maintenance to the third party. However, until the death of the injured person, this expectation loss does not constitute legally relevant damage to the third party. The injured person will have a claim for loss of income (or consequential loss in general) under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (4)(a), so that, even though not put in funds for some time to come, the injured person nonetheless has a legal entitlement to income out of which maintenance might be paid. That right might be either enforced or else partially disposed of in favour of the third party in lieu of maintenance. Any loss of maintenance during the life of the injured person is thus to be attributed to the decision of the injured person. This result – which emerges directly from a comparison of the various provisions on injury to body or health on the one hand and those applicable in case of death on the other – may not and cannot be circumvented by invoking the assistance of VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage).

C. Loss suffered as a result of another's death (paragraph (2))

Death as such not legally relevant damage. Paragraph (2) introduces additional rules for the case where a personal injury has led to the death of the victim (whether immediately or only after the lapse of some period of time). The rules of VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss) and potentially also VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1)(b) and (c) remain applicable. The provision proceeds from the principle that death as such does not constitute legally relevant damage within the meaning of non-contractual liability law. The deceased has no claim which can be asserted on account of the death as such, and the loss of life as such has no value quantifiable in monetary terms which can be assigned by the system of private law to heirs or successors.

D. The claim of the deceased's successors (paragraph (2)(a))

Succession to subsisting claims of the deceased to reparation. Sub-paragraph (a) of paragraph (2) makes it clear that the deceased's successors (by which is to be understood the heirs or personal representatives, depending on what is determined by the law of succession) inherit all the rights (but only those rights) which the deceased would have been able to exercise while alive. Rights to compensation for economic damage belong in this category as much as rights to compensation for non-economic damage. Moreover, claims for compensation for non-economic damage or for anatomical damage are also generally capable of transmitting on death (a question which must be answered in the law on non-contractual liability) and that is so independently of whether the deceased while alive asserted these claims in or outside of the courts. However, had the deceased made it known that no claim would be made for compensation for non-economic damage, the deceased would in that case have waived this claim. Consequently the claim will not pass as part of the estate. The situation would be the same in a case of economic loss.

The limits of the claim. Sub-paragraph (a), however, contains a further limitation. Only those rights which the deceased had acquired during life pass to the successors. If death occurs instantaneously (without an intermediate period of suffering), then neither a claim for compensation for non-economic damage nor a claim for compensation for anatomical damage existed. The same holds for patrimonial losses.

Illustration 2
If the injured person while alive had received a complete settlement (as a lump sum) for future loss of income, this sum remains part of the inherited estate. (The situation is the same if, in the lifetime of the deceased, a lump sum settlement was reached but not paid or judgment was given.) In contrast, if the claim has been settled on the basis of monthly compensatory payments during the lifetime of the deceased, the claim will expire at the end of the month in which the deceased dies.

Illustration 3
If the deceased took to the grave some secret (such as a code word for a computer program which was only known to the deceased), the successors will receive no compensation at all. Only exceptionally will the result be different under the rule in VI.–2:101(1)(b)-(c) – in particular in the case of an intentional killing.

E. Funeral expenses (paragraph (2)(b))

Funeral costs constitute legally relevant damage. In some countries there exists a dispute of legal theory about whether funeral costs can be compensated (because they would have to be incurred anyway at some time), but the legal position today is unequivocal: funeral costs must be compensated everywhere. Sub-paragraph (b) sticks to this principle. The only problem is to determine the amount of compensation and the person entitled to claim it.

Reasonable funeral expenses. As regards the amount, the text states only that the costs must be "reasonable"; an express reference to the living standards of the deceased seemed not to be appropriate. The expression "funeral costs" is broader than the expression 'burial costs'. The former includes, for example, the costs of transporting the body from the place of death to the place of burial. The costs of caring for a grave, however, do not come within funeral costs.

Persons entitled to claim funeral expenses. Sub-paragraph (b) only states that a person is entitled to compensation if that person has paid for the costs of the funeral. A more detailed regulation is excluded for a number of reasons. One of these is the fact that the national laws of succession are not harmonised and therefore it cannot be said for the purposes of the law on non-contractual liability who is obliged under those laws to arrange the funeral. On the other hand, of course, the person who is obliged under the law of succession or by other legal provisions to organise the burial had "reasonable funeral costs". It is even possible, depending on the particular circumstances of a country, that a moral obligation to organise the burial may suffice. However, an insurer who takes care of the funeral "in natura" will not be able to claim on the basis of this Article. Ultimately it is the criterion of "reasonableness" which determines who can assert a claim to compensation for funeral costs.

F. Loss of maintenance (paragraph (2)(c))

Loss of breadwinner. Unlike the case where the injured person does not die (or has not yet died) as a result of the injury, VI.–2:202(2)(c) gives a direct claim against the injuring person to certain classes of persons who suffer a consequential loss of maintenance. As already explained in Comment B, such a claim is inappropriate if the injured person has not died. Moreover, even if the injured person subsequently dies, a third party whom the injured person had previously maintained will not acquire a claim for loss of maintenance in the period between the victim's incapacity through injury and his or her later death. The injured person's right to reparation for loss of earnings (out of which maintenance might have been paid, if damages had been recovered) is not extinguished by death and will pass to the successors. However, the death of the injured person does create a material difference in the legal position of the injured person and alimentary creditors in respect of maintenance foregone after death. The deceased's successors have no claim to the loss of income which the deceased might have earned after the time of death, had there been no injury. Consequently, there is no person entitled as against the injuring person to the income out of which maintenance might have been paid after the injured person's death. The loss of maintenance suffered by certain classes of affected persons therefore becomes a legally relevant damage.

Persons entitled to compensation. Entitled to compensation are primarily those to whom the deceased according to legal rules (in family law) was obliged to pay maintenance. Additionally the proposed text provides for an extension of the entitlement to compensation to those who were dependent on the deceased as their Versorger (provider). The expression Versorger is easily understood in, for example, German and Swedish legal discourse. An example of a Versorger is the breadwinner who provides for a life partner within a stable relationship, but the term also includes, for example, a step-father in relation to a step-child within the family. The English circumlocution "provided care and financial support" is intended to express the requirement of just such a personal Versorger relationship.

"Statutory provisions". These rules do not determine what is to be understood as coming within the notion of "statutory provisions". This question must instead be decided on the basis of the applicable national law concerned. See VI.–7:102 (Statutory provisions).

Time limits. The right to reparation for lost maintenance is not of course without any kind of restriction in time. It is limited to the extent that the loss of maintenance was in fact caused by the injuring person. The relevant period of time is thus that in which the deceased would probably have maintained the surviving claimants. That period of time must be estimated, based on the probable life expectancy of the deceased had the fatal accident not occurred and, in respect of children, by considering the period during which they would have had a right to maintenance from the deceased.

NOTES

I. No civil liability for death as such

1. A person cannot mount a personal cause of action for loss of his or her own life. While GERMAN CC § 823(1) and ESTONIAN LOA § 1045(1)(i) seem to be formulated otherwise, they cannot alter the fact that the "right to life" extinguishes when it is violated (see further v. Bar, FS Sturm, 1151-1163). The consequences affect third parties, not the bearer of the right him/herself.
2. On the most part, the death of a person as such does not trigger a corresponding obligation to pay damages. In this way, as far as the deceased is concerned, death as such does not constitute legally relevant damage (see for BELGIUM Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 107 p. 205 and for HUNGARY Petrik (-Petrik), Polgári jog

I[2], 178, 204, 213). In the context of ITALIAN Law, death as such does not amount to danno biologico either (Cass. 23 May 2003, no. 8204, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, f. 5). Separate from one's health, one's life is a stand-alone interest worthy of legal protection, protected only by the criminal law (Cass.sez.pen. 30 January 2003, no. 7632, Riv.it.med.leg. 2003, 694; Cass. 16 May 2003, no. 7632, Foro it. 2003, I, 2681). In this regard it is also stated in AUSTRIA that claims arising out of CC § 1327 (lost maintenance) constitute original and personal claims of the surviving parties, and not of the deceased him/herself (OGH 17 October 1963, SZ 36/133). Other than for funeral expenses, no liability accrues de lege lata for the death of a person who was not obliged to support another (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VII², § 1327 no. 1), not even for non-pecuniary loss due to the untimely death of the deceased (OGH 1 March 2005, RdW 2005, 289). The same view is taken in the Netherlands (Schadevergoeding II [-Lindenberg], art. 108, no. 17) and in SPAIN. Despite scholarly criticism, which is not to be completely disregarded (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 377; Lacruz Berdejo, Elementos II(2)[4], 485; Vicente Domingo, Los daños corporales, 241) the case law in this jurisdiction likewise denies that loss of life constitutes damage for the victim, which might generate a claim transferable mortis causa and actionable iuris hereditatis by the survivors (TS 20 December 1930, RAJ 1930-31 (1) no. 1365 p. 538; TS 25 February 1963, RAJ 1963 (1) no. 1187 p. 734; TS 9 June 1969, RAJ 1969 (2) no. 3353 p. 2275; TS 24 November 1970, RAJ 1970 (2) no. 4889 p. 3345; TS 1 July 1981, RAJ 1981 (2) no. 3037 p. 2495; TS 18 May 1999, RAJ 1999 (2) no. 4112 p. 6346 and often recurs). The criminal division of the Tribunal Supremo, which had originally taken a different view (TS 30 November 1932, RAJ 1932-33 (2) no. 2178 p. 857; TS 12 November 1957, RAJ 1957 no. 2969 p. 1987) has for some time now followed suit from the case law of the civil division (e.g. TS 20 October 1986, RAJ 1986 (4) no. 5702 p. 5579).

3. However, in PORTUGAL the case law maintains that indeed loss of life itself amounts to damage capable of monetary valuation payable to the survivors. The claim is treated as the deceased's claim for pain and suffering, which then passes under the law of succession and is included in the personal economic and non-economic claims of the surviving parties (CA Oporto 13 April 1989, CJ XIV (1989-2) 221). The loss of life has been recently evaluated at approx. €40,000 (STJ 16 June 2005; the older methods of calculating damages are seen in CA Lisbon 25 January 1994, CJ XIX (1994-1) 151). The Portuguese Ombudsman, however, has recommended that compensation should always be 10,000,000 escudos (approximately €50,000) (Critérios apresentados pelo Provedor de Justiça para indemnização dos danos causados pela derrocada da ponte de Entre-os-Rios, http://www.provedor-jus.pt/restrito/rec_ficheiros/Ponte_Entre-Rios.pdf, p. 14), with the non-economic damage suffered by the victim also included in this amount. If a foetus is killed in utero, the mother is entitled to a claim due to her own losses; the loss of life of the foetus is not, however, compensated because it is not yet afforded the enititlements of a human person (STJ 23 May 1985, BolMinJus 347 (1985) 398).

II. Recoverability of non-economic damage to relatives in the case of death or injury to the primary victim

4. Where a person is severely injured or killed, the question of whether and under what circumstances his or her relatives are entitled to the reparation of their non-economic loss still yields quite different answers in the various European legal systems (for up-to-date comparisons see also Janssen, ZRP 2003, 156-159 and Wagner, JZ 2004, 319-331). In Resolution (75)7 of 14 March 1975, the Council of Europe expressed the opinion that in cases of injury to the body, damages for pain and suffering endured by relatives should only be considered for parents or spouses, and even then only "if the suffering is of an exceptional nature" (no. 2.10). It seems that more generous practices of compensation - even for the benefit of fiancé(e)s - have been supported in the case of death; however, damages will only be granted where the surviving parties in question "have maintained close bonds of affection with the victim at the time of his death" (no. 3.6).

5. FRENCH law recognises that as a result of the victim's injury, persons who are closely connected to the victim may suffer their own préjudice moral within the scope of recoverable non-economic damages. The sole prerequisite is that personal, proximate and fixed damages are incurred (the seminal decision of Cass.civ. 23 May 1977, Bull.civ. 1977, II, no. 139 p. 96). It is not necessary that the primary victim has suffered particularly severe injuries (Cass.civ. 23 May 1977 loc. cit.); neither does it depend on proof of any particular family relationship - purely "the genuineness of the suffering counts" (Bourrié-Quenillet, JCP éd. G 1998, I, 186, no. 14). The decision as to who is entitled to claim under this criterion is made by the courts charged with establishing the facts. Individual cases may not only concern surviving spouses, non-marital life partners, parents, children, grandparents and siblings, but also parents-in-law, nephews, nieces, uncles and aunts, e.g. where the latter have brought up the child who has been killed or an otherwise significant emotional relationship with the primary victim exists. According to statistics, on average, 2.6 close relatives are compensated in cases of injury to body and even 5.0 in cases of death (Bourrié-Quenillet, JCP éd. G. 2004, I, 136, no. 35). Also, where the parents raise a child who is born disabled owing to an accident during the pregnancy, non-economic damage suffered by the parents is recognised (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 249-3 p. 13).

6. So too under BELGIAN law, loss sustained due to the sight of a loved one's suffering or owing to a fear of their condition deteriorating, is recoverable. The case law is more conservative than in France, however, and a claim will only usually be granted where the primary victim suffers serious and permanent injuries (Schuermans et al., TPR 1994, 851-1430 [no. 35]). Proof of strong mutual affection between the primary victim and the injured third party is decisive here. Where a death occurs, such persons, who did not live with the deceased, may be entitled to a claim for the recovery of their non-economic harm; however, the level of their claim is normally lower than that of someone who lived with the primary victim in the one household (e.g. Indicatieve Tabel 1 May 2004, NjW 2004, annex to issue no. 72, no. 53: €7,500 where the parents lived with the deceased child, otherwise €3,750). In cases where death has occurred, MALTESE CC art. 1046 leaves it to the discretion of the court to grant compensation for the non-economic losses of the deceased's heirs.

7. SPANISH case law recognises the recoverability of non-economic damage to relatives in the case of death or serious injury to the primary victim, as long as the relatives' losses are certain and have been evidenced. A fiancé(e) (TS 12 February 2003, RAJ 2003 (2) no. 2491 p. 4590 [posttraumatic stress disorder of a fiancée who had to witness the accidental death of her fiancé]) or the deceased's homosexual partner (CA Sevilla (Criminal Division) 6 September 2004, RAJ (TSJ y AP) 2004 (3) no. 480 p. 776) may also qualify as a "relative" in this sense. The basis for the claim is either CC art. 1902 or, in the case of a criminal offence, CP art. 113 ("Compensation for economic and non-economic detriment not only encompasses that incurred by the injured party, but also that inflicted upon his or her family members or upon third parties"). What is at stake here, is the survivors' own personal claim, not a right reserved to them by virtue of its transmission from the deceased (TS 20 December 1930, RAJ 1930-31 no. 1365 p. 538; TS 1 July 1981, RAJ 1981 (2) no. 3037 p. 2495;

TS 4 May 1983, RAJ 1983 (2) no. 2622 p. 1975; TS 19 December 1986, RAJ 1986 (5) no. 7682 p. 7462; TS 31 December 1986, RAJ 1986 (5) no. 7881 p. 7682; TS 14 December 1996, RAJ 1996 (5) no. 8970 p. 12478; TS 24 November 1998, RAJ 1998 (5) no. 9694 p. 14172). For its part, the survivors' claim may be inherited (TS 19 June 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 4244 p. 7941). Table of Damages I and II of the Law on Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic (Texto Refundido de la Ley sobre Responsabilidad Civil y Seguro en la Circulación de Vehículos de Motor, brought into force by Real Decreto Legislativo no. 8/2004 of 29 October 2004) expressly provide for the reparation of consequential damages sustained by close relatives of the deceased or injured victim of a traffic accident. Likewise, the Tribunal Supremo has confirmed on numerous occasions that such a claim also arises in the case of severe injuries to the primary victim's body and health, e.g. in favour of his or her parents (TS 23 February 1988, RAJ 1988 (1) no. 1451 p. 1389; TS 25 April 1989, RAJ 1989 (3) no. 3471 p. 3921; TS 23 April 1992, RAJ 1992 (2) no. 3323 p. 4388; TS 15 October 1996, RAJ 1996 (4) no. 7110 p. 9586) or his or her spouse (TS 9 February 1988, RAJ 1988 (1) no. 771 p. 752). CA Ciudad Real 14 September 2000 (cited under Vicente Domingo, El daño, 258) opines, however, that the consequential damages of third parties resulting solely from the injury of the primary victim must be extraordinarily severe and must exceed what one must normally endure when a loved one is injured.

8. Cass. 31 May 2003, no. 8828, Foro it. 2003, I, 2272 has clarified the position in ITALIAN law, stating that close relatives of a deceased party have a claim to reparation of their non-economic losses under CC art. 2059, even where the requirements of CP art. 185 (criminal offence) are not fulfilled. Interpreting CC art. 2059 in conformance with the Constitution, relatives have a claim to the recovery of their danno biologico (see above Corte Cost. 27 October 1994, no. 372, Foro it. 1994, I, 3297; Cass. 25 February 2000, no. 2134, Riv.it.med.leg. 2001, 1135; Cass. 25 January 2002, no. 881, Danno e resp. 2002, 747 and Cass. 13 February 2002, no. 2082, Giust.civ.Mass. 2002, 235), their danno morale and their danno da lesione del rapporto parentale, i.e. damages arising from the harm to their family relationship. Cass. 31 May 2003, no. 8827, Foro it. 2003, I, 2273 extended this principle in favour of a mother who had born a severely impaired child due to a medical error. Corte Cost. 11 July 2003, no. 233, Giur.it. 2004, 1129 approved this decision in obiter dictum. Already there seems to be a wealth of case law for the compensation of non-economic losses suffered by relatives, certainly in the case of death (Cass. 19 August 2003, no. 12124, Giur.it. 2004, 1129) and also in the case of the birth of a severely impaired child (Cass. 22 July 2004, no. 13634, Giust.civ.Mass. 2004, 7-8). Where the primary injured party dies as a result of his or her injuries, but lives for a short period after the injury (a few hours suffice: Cass. 2 April 2001, no. 4783, Danno e resp. 2001, 820; Cass. 16 June 2003, no. 9620, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, f. 6), his or her biological damages may be claimed iure hereditatis by his or her survivors.

9. Under HUNGARIAN Law also, the claim to recovery of non-economic damages is not restricted to the primary victim (BH 2006/15; see in more detail Lábady, A nem vagyoni kártérítés újabb bírói gyakorlata, 68-70, 213, 247). So, for example, in the case of a severely injured son, BH 2001/15 granted the parents damages for their non-economic loss, justified on the grounds that they had to give up their normal lives and jobs in order to care for their son. Where the primary victim dies, a distinction is to be drawn. The mere fact that someone becomes a widow(er) or orphan or otherwise loses a relative, is not yet accepted as sufficient grounds for non-economic damages; pain and suffering alone does not suffice (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1330; Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I^2, 207-208; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 260-265). In fact, proof of actual adverse effects and aggravation to the secondary victim's life is necessary. This is so, e.g. where a widow suffers a mental illness requiring medical treatment as a consequence of the accidental death of her husband (Gellért [-Benedek] loc. cit. 1336-1338) or where the parents of a child who has been killed (BH 2001/14) or a child whose parents have been killed (BH 1992/529) sustain particular detriment by other means. The courts draw on the intensity of the pain or dolour for the detriment actually suffered. Sometimes the right to family life is also qualified as the infringed interest worthy of legal protection in question, which can be of heightened importance if, for example, the case concerns an infant who is incapable of feeling sorrow for the loss of his or her parents (see further Petrik loc.cit. 208/1-208/5).

10. For cases involving death POLISH CC art. 446 § 3 merely provides that the court may award an appropriate indemnity to the closest members of the family of the deceased person if his death resulted in a considerable deterioriation of their standard of living. Traditionally, the provision is interpreted quite narrowly; it is regarded as an exception to the general rule that parties who are harmed indirectly are not entitled to claim compensation (Supreme Court 17 April 2001, Orzecznictwo Sądu Najwyższego, Izba Cywilna 2001, no 11 p. 161). CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC do not provide for the recovery of non-economic damage to relatives. In contrast, the detailed rules of SLOVENIAN LOA arts. 179 and 180 follow the modern European trend. Married couples, children and parents have a claim to the compensation of their mental suffering as a result of the death or serious injury of their family members (LOA art. 180(1) and (2)). In addition, partners of a long-term non-marital cohabiting relationship are entitled to claim (LOA art. 180(3)). ROMANIAN law recognises a claim on behalf of close relatives to recover for compensation for grief (Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 262-263; Adam, Drept civil, 260; Dogaru and Drăghici, Drept civil, 213). It is intended to codify this approach in the proposed Draft CC art. 1131 kodifizieren (Proiectul Noului Cod civil, 222).

11. GERMAN law is markedly more restrictive. Damages for relatives' pain and suffering only comes into play here under the requirement that the relevant party suffered personal damage to his or her health as a result of being informed of the death or serious physical injury of someone close to him or her (CC §§ 253(2), 823(1); see Palandt [-Heinrichs], BGB[65], § 253, no. 12; Staudinger [-Schiemann], BGB [Revised edition, 2005], § 249, no. 44). For example, compensation was granted to children whose mother had been killed in front of them (CA Nürnberg 27 February 1998, NJW 1998, 2293), children whose mother died due to an error in medical treatment (CA Frankfurt/M. 15 December 1998, FamRZ 1999, 1064), parents and siblings of an infant who drowned in a public swimming pool (CA Koblenz 22 November 2000, NJW-RR 2001, 318) and to a father who suffered nervous shock as a consequence of the death of his daughter (CA Oldenburg 1 December 1998, NJW-RR 1999, 820). The constant prerequisite is that the surviving family member's impairment of health is medically ascertainable, as well as clearly exceeding the type and severity of adverse effects ordinarily sustained by loved ones in their capacity as indirectly affected parties in these types of cases (judged on empirical evidence) (BGH 11 May 1971, NJW 1971, 1883; BGH 4 April 1989, NJW 1989, 2317). CA Naumburg 7 March 2005, NJW-RR 2005, 900 accordingly held as insufficient the claim in damages for pain and suffering of a mother who, after experiencing the serious injuries of her brutally abused son – the son having died in the hospital 36 hours later - was rendered helpless as against them and had not yet mentally come to terms with his senseless killing. In addition, the shock must be understandable, taking into account its cause. This applies to death and serious injury, if the relative has not personally witnessed the incident but 'only' been informed of it (BGH 5 February 1985, NJW 1985, 1390). Along with the close relatives defined under family law (BGH 31 January 1984, NJW 1984, 1405) fiance(e)s and cohabitees are also protected (CFI Frankfurt/M. 28 March 1969, NJW 1969, 2286; MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[4], § 249, no. 147).

12. According to recent AUSTRIAN case law, so-called "damages for pain and suffering caused to relatives" are granted, where as a consequence of the death or serious injury of the primary victim, close relatives suffer adverse psychological effects of a medically diagnosable character (CC § 1325, s. dazu OGH 16 June 1994, ZVR 1995/46; OGH 29 August 2002, JBl 2003, 118 = ZVR 2002, 388, note Karner; OGH 12 June 2003, JBl 2004, 111). If "only" mental suffering in involved, which does not amount to a medically diagnosable illness, since OGH 16 May 2001, SZ 74/90, the granting of non-pecuniary damages has three requirements: (i) the primary victim's injury must have been caused by the gross fault of the defendant (intention or gross negligence, see Schobel, RdW 2002, 206-209), (ii) the person affected must be a close relative of the primary victim and (iii) there must have been a close personal relationship between the parties in question. These are rebuttably presumed in the case of parents and children, and spouses and partners, but in all other cases they must be proven (OGH 1 July 2004, ZVR 2004, 294; OGH 21 April 2005, ZVR 2005/73). Damages for the pain of bereavement were denied in the case of a seven month old infant following the death of its grandfather (OGH 12 May 2005, ZVR 2005/88). In contrast, such damages were granted to siblings, who had had a particular close emotional bond with the victim (OGH 21 April 2005 loc. cit.; OGH 23 May 2005, ZVR 2005/89). In addition, damages for pain and suffering occasioned to relatives may be awarded even where the case is not one of death, but of a particularly severe injury to the body or health of the primary victim (OGH 12 June 2006, ZVR 2006/178 p. 458 [where, however, the claim in that particular case was dismissed]; Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II/2b[3] § 1324 no. 1/5b). A similar approach is adopted by the draft new law on damages (Draft CC § 1316(3); Griss, JBl 2005, 273, 282).

13. According to GREEK CC art. 932 third sentence, in cases of death (not of mere injury to body, however) the party's "family members" have a claim in compensation for adverse psychological effects suffered. The term "family" is broadly interpreted in Greek case law. Non-pecuniary damages have been granted to parents (A.P. 404/1964, NoB 12 [1964] 1000), parents-in-law (CA Athens 4287/1988, EllDik 30 [1988] 1464) and spouses living apart (CA Athens 5805/1991, EllDik 33 [1992] 1495). According to more recent case law, the family extends principally to the parents, children, siblings and half-siblings, spouse, relations in the direct line, and parents-in-law and children-in-law (A.P. 795/2004, NoB 53 [2005] 1414; A.P. 924/2004, EEN 2005, 34), not, however, unmarried co-habiting partners (A.P. 434/2005, EEN 2005, 676). For a more detailed account of this issue, see Karakostas, ZEuP 2005, 107.

14. PORTUGAL distinguishes between non-economic damage caused to relatives consequent upon death and consequent upon injury to body. CC art. 496(2) grants compensation for non-economic damage to surviving spouses, children and other descendants, parents and other ascendants, siblings as well as nephews and nieces of the deceased, whereby preferential beneficiaries exclude those lower ranked (Abrantes Geraldes, Temas da responsabilidade civil II, 22). Children not yet born at the time of their father's death are also entitled to claim; they are likewise entitled to a share of the damages granted for the death per se (dano-morte; see above Note I3). Whether non-marital cohabitees may be included in the list of claimaints entitled to reparation is still contentious (affirmatively answered by CA Coimbra 21 February 2003 and – but only where death was intended – Const. Court TC 19 June 2002, Diário Rep. II Serie de 24 July 2002; answered in the negative by STJ 4 November 2003, CJ (ST) XI (1993) 133). The amount of damages is assessed by the courts according to principles of fairness (Abrantes Geraldes loc. cit. 23). In cases where the primary victim has been "only" injured, and not killed, the CC offers no clear solution. In the case law (STJ 30 April 2003) and scholarly legal writing (for a more detailed discussion see, inter alia, Abrantes Geraldes loc. cit. 36 and 50; Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 621) the existence of a claim in principle has mostly been denied. However, the victim of a traffic accident's widow (STJ 27 April 2004) and son (STJ 27 February 2003) have been granted non-pecuniary damages for the injury to their mental health. The courts have even gone so far as to recognise a right of compensation for non-economic loss incurred by virtue of a son's pain and suffering which resulted from having to witness his mother's depression (STJ 13 May 2004). Furthermore, damages were granted to a spouse because the primary victim could no longer engage in sexual intercourse due to the accident (STJ 8 March 2005; CA Porto 23 March 2006; but decided otherwise in STJ 26 February 2004). More recent case law also seems to be moving in the direction of basing the claims of a secondary victim on an infringement of the right to protection of the family (STJ 3 June 2004). The result is the extensive erosion of CC art. 496(2), insofar as this provision provides for the award of damages to relatives for pain and suffering only in the case of the primary victim's death (CA Porto 23 March 2006).

15. Under DUTCH law it was decided by HR 22 February 2002, NedJur 2002 no. 240 p. 1704 (=ERPL 2003, 412 with comparative notes by Zinnen, Pretto, Janssen, Meilhac-Redon, Pasa, Ebers, Arroyo i Amayuelas and Michalowska) that while medically diagnosable harm to mental health inflicted on a mother, which was suffered following the death of her child, was recoverable, damages purely for injured emotions were not. The case law is very restrictive. It requires that the secondary victim: (i) was a witness to the accident or its consequences; (ii) that he had a close affectionate relationship with the primary victim; (iii) that the accident was attributable to the defendant's wrongdoing; and (iv) that the accident caused the secondary victim to suffer from a disease pattern recognised by psychiatric science (Jansen [-van Dam], Smartengeld[15], Verkeersrecht/ANWB, 2003, 8-12). Additionally, damages for pain and suffering caused to relatives have only thus far been granted in cases where the primary victim has died. If an injury to emotions is intentionally caused, it is recoverable regardless of the presence of an injury to mental health (CC art. 6:106(1)(a); HR 26 October 2001, NedJur 2002 no. 216 p. 1500: Death of a child because of revenge against the mother). Whether this (on the whole conservative) attitude to the recoverability of harm to emotions will remain is open, given the current discussion for reform (see the following, taken from parliamentary debates, Kamerstukken II, 2002-2003, 28 781, no. 3 [Memorie van Toelichting] and Tweede Kamer, vergaderjaar 2003–2004, 28 781, no. 6).

16. ESTONIAN LOA § 134(3) rules that "in the case of an obligation to compensate for damage arising from the death of a person or a serious bodily injury or health damage caused to the person, the persons close to the deceased or the aggrieved person may also claim compensation for non-economic damage if payment of such compensation is justified by exceptional circumstances". LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.284(1), second sentence, contains a comparable rule for the benefit of "minor children, spouses, parents incapable of work, or other factual dependants incapable of work". In contrast, the LATVIAN CC has no analogous provision.

17. Since 1 January 2002, SWEDISH Damages Law chap. 5 § 2 no. 3 provides that damages also fall due for personal injuries that result from the death of someone to whom the applicant was particularly close (for a discussion of the term "close relatives" within the meaning of this provision, see HD 21 April 2005, NJA 2005, 237; see also HD 29 December 2006, NJA 2006, 738 and Sandstedt, VersRAI 2002, 11). In the case law, such "damages for pain and suffering caused to relatives" are granted according to the circumstances of each individual case, even where the primary injured party has not been killed (HD 5 April 2006, NJA 2006, 181; for older case law of the lower courts, see Sandstedt, VersRAI 2003, 43 and 2004, 23). The primary significance of this statutory amendment would lie in the fact that the granting of damages for pain and suffering caused to relatives no longer hinges on the tortfeasor acting intentionally (as in HD 24 February 1993, NJA 1993, 41 I and II) or with gross negligence (as in HD 13 June 1996, NJA 1996, 377) (mere negligence did not suffice: HD 18 October 1999, NJA 1999, 632, note Sandstedt, VersRAI 2002, 11, 14). Under the new law, even strict liability suffices (Sandstedt loc. cit.). However, higher sums are awarded in cases of intentionally caused death or injury than in the context of liability in negligence or absolute liability (HD 4 February 2004, NJA 2004, 26; Sandstedt, VersRAI 2004, 28, 29). HD 17 October 2000, NJA 2000, 521 enunciated a presumption of the presence of non-pecuniary damage caused to relatives (for a critique, see Andersson, JT 2000-01, 897, 902), which expressly endorses the legislature's motives for the statutory amendment (Prop 2000/01:68 [Ersättning för ideell skada], 35).

18. Following the situation whereby the FINNISH courts were not willing to grant damages for pain and suffering caused to relatives, without first having an express statutory basis (HD 21 October 1991, 1991:146; for a more detailed account, see Sisula-Tulokas, JFT 2000, 634, 641), this basis is now provided by Damages Law chap. 5 § 4a. The provision requires intention or gross negligence, however, (in contrast to its Swedish counterpart) and is not satisfied with a presumption of non-pecuniary damage, in fact requiring proof of actual suffering from the relatives. DANISH Damages Law has been supplemented by Law no. 35 of 21 January 2003 on § 26a. Here also, intention and gross negligence have been elevated to the status of being prerequisites of a claim (para. (1) loc. cit.); recoverable suffering is, however, presumed (para. (2); see further Øe and Røn, Juristen 2004, 85). The object of the rule is to compensate for the relatives' grievance caused by the death, not the compensation of their personal injuries (Øe and Røn loc. cit. 88).

19. The ENGLISH Common Law is quite restrictive. In cases of psychiatric injury where the claim is based on negligence but takes the form that it is alleged to have arisen as a result of becoming aware of injuries caused or about to be caused to a third party there will be no liability at all unless there is in the light of the relationship to the victim of the person suffering the psychiatric injury and the spatial and temporal closeness to the event, and the general nature of it, seen to be a relationship of proximity, such that it is fair and reasonable for a duty of care to be capable of arising (Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310). The same is probably true of cases of psychiatric injury based on such facts where liability is strict, as in a products liability case (The question has never been considered, but arguably follows from the meaning of the word „caused" in Consumer Protections Act 1987 s. 2(1)). In death cases in SCOTLAND awards for non-pecuniary loss by the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976 were reclassified by abandoning the traditional general term solatium in favour of a head of „loss of society and guidance" (Damages (Scotland) Act 1976 s. 1(4)), but in the event, other than the amounts becoming somewhat larger, no substantive change in the factors taken into account occurred. The award is available to a range of close relatives and is assessed by the court looking at the matter generally. A reform of the law is under discussion (see above at Note III15 under VI.–2:201 (Personal injury and consequential loss)). In England the equivalent awards, introduced originally to the law by statute in the nineteenth century, are described as „bereavement" awards and are of amounts fixed artificially by the current legislation, which have been changed from time to time (Fatal Accidents Act 1976 s. 1A(3) as amended by The Damages for Bereavement (Variation of Sum) (England and Wales) Order 2002 S.I. 2002 no. 644). They are slightly lower sums than those awarded in Scotland under the broad approach there.

III. Survival of the deceased person's claims

20. Claims for the reparation of pecuniary damage suffered by the deceased during his lifetime are inheritable in all member states (see, e.g. for FRANCE Lapoyade Deschamps, Rép.Dr.Civ. IV, v° Dommages et intérets, no. 224; for BELGIUM Dirix, Het begrip schade, no. 138 p. 94; for HUNGARY Gellért [-Sőthné], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 2134-2135; for PORTUGAL Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 622 note 3 and for the NORDIC Countries Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen, 329 as well as von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 382). In SPAIN it is substatiated that in cases where the death of the victim did not occur instantly on being injured, making the deceased himself (in the time between his injury and death) personally in arrears for the cost of attempting to save his life, his successors acquire the relevant claim in damages against the tortfeasor. Conversely, where the primary injured party has already personally brought a claim for the reparation of his damages, his successors are entitled to the sum awarded after his death, as long as they carried on the proceedings (De Ángel Yágüez, Tratado de responsabilidad civil[3], 896; TS 20 November 1990, RAJ 1990 (7) no. 9174 p. 11680; TS 24 June 1997, RAJ 1997 (3) no. 5208 p. 7978; TS 3 December 1999, RAJ 1999 (5) no. 8532 p. 13363).

21. A predominant body of legal opinion in Europe also favours the survival of claims to compensation for non-pecuniary damage suffered. Their survival is recognised today in FRANCE (in the seminal judgments of Cass.ch.mixte 30 April 1976, Bull.ch.mixte 1976 p. 1 no. 2 and Cass.ch.mixte 30 April 1976, Bull.ch.mixte 1976 p. 2 no. 3); in BELGIUM (in the seminal judgment of Cass. 30 June 1930, Pas. belge 1930, I, 281; however, non-pecuniary damages on the part of the victim, which may transfer to the heirs, shall not exist where the victim was instantly rendered unconscious and died without regaining consciousness: Indicatieve Tabel 1 May 2004, NjW 2004, bijlage bij no. 72, no. 51 p. 9); in GERMANY (where CC § 847 (old version) was repealed in 2002); in AUSTRIA (where the words "by request" ("auf Verlangen") in CC § 1325 are no longer attributed any independent sifnificance: Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II[12], 323; OGH 30 September 1996, SZ 69/217; OGH 11 July 2002, ZVR 2004/26, p. 95); in the BALTIC States and in DENMARK (statutory amendment by Law no. 35 of 21 January 2003; see further von Eyben and Isager, Lærebog i erstatningsret[5], 382; Øe and Røn, Juristen 2004, 85, 91).

22. In ITALY also, the deceased's claims in damages do not extinguish on his death. They are transferred to the survivors, regardless of whether economic or non-economic losses are involved (as indicative of the situation in many cases, see Cass. 7 March 2003, no. 3414, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, 485). The same is true for a claim for compensation of danno biologico suffered. In this respect, the only prerequisite is that the deceased survived the injury for an (albeit short) period of "cognizance" (Cass.sez.pen. 30 January 2003, no. 7632, Riv.it.med.leg. 2003, 694; Cass. 16 May 2003, no. 7632, Foro it. 2003, I, 2681); any schematical examination of the length of this period and the amount of compensation is to be avoided (Cass. 14 July 2003, no. 11003, Resp.civ. e prev. 2003, 1049).

23. Today, there are still notable exceptions to the general rule of the survival of non-pecuniary claims. Under GREEK CC art. 933, such a claim is only transferable and only passes to the survivors where it had been recognised in a contract or already asserted before a court. This is also the situation in POLAND (CC art. 449). HUNGARY also follows the older school of thought, under which the compensation of non-economic damages are of a highly personal nature and therefore do not pass to the deceased's survivors. This only changes if the deceased asserted his claim before a court while still alive; in this case, the survivors are allowed to join the lawsuit. The same is true if the party causing the damage acknowledged his duty without litigation (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1332, 1340-1341). SLOVENIAN LOA art. 176 additionally even rules out the inter vivos transfer of non-pecuniary claims in damages.

24. To date, in SPAIN it has been always inferred that it follows from the nature of non-pecuniary damages that they may only be claimed by the person who has suffered them (Gómez Calle, Los sujetos de la responsabilidad civil, 395, 404; Roca i Trias, Derecho de daños[3], 175). Only when the injured party personally brings an action before his death, could the survivors carry on the action (TS 20 November 1990, RAJ 1990 (7) no. 9174 p. 11680; TS 24 June 1997, RAJ 1997 (3) no. 5208 p. 7978; TS 3 December 1999, RAJ 1999 (5) no. 8532 p. 13363). TS 19 June 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 4244 p. 7941 has, however, acknowledged the survival of all claims in damages suffered by third parties where a person has been killed. In its judgement, the court did not distinguish between pecuniary and non-pecuniary damages. Whether this signifies a fundamental change in the case law may not yet be said with any certainty.

25. PORTUGUESE CC art. 496(2) contains a special regulation to the extent that "in the case of death to the victim … a spouse who is not judicially separated (i.e. separation of the person and of assets) and children or other progeny [are] together [entitled to] the claim in non-economic damages" (see Note II14 above). In successive order, the parents, grandparents, siblings and where these do not exist, the nephews and nieces of the deceased are entitled to claim in all other cases. These relatives also have the right to be compensated for the non-economic losses that the injured person suffered from the moment he or she was injured until the time he or she died (Menezes Cordeiro, Tratado III, 139). The claims in damages for pain and suffering are thus accumulated. From a systematic perpective, CC art. 496(2) is a special succession law rule for non-pecuniary claims (Leite de Campos, BFD V [1974] 247, 270). Their survival as such is not disputed (STJ 16 June 2005; Pires de Lima and Antunes Varela, Código Civil Anotado I[4], 500). Under CC art. 496(2) a child not yet born at the time of the killing is entitled to claim; he is not, however, entitled to the reparation of his own personal non-pecuniary losses (Abrantes Geraldes, Temas da responsabilidade civil II, 24).

26. Under DUTCH Law, while claims for compensation of non-pecuniary damages are transferable in principle, CC art. 6:106(2) also restricts their survival. A claim to non-economic damages is a personal right. It is also assumed that it would run contrary to the legal system as a whole to block survivors from recovering for their own personal non-economic damages with one hand (CC arts. 6:107 and 108, see Note II15 above) and then to compensate them in a roundabout way through the law of succession, with the other. Therefore, in the Netherlands a claim to recovery of non-economic damages only forms part of the decendents' legal estate where it has been acknowledged to the primary victim or had already been asserted before a court. Contractual recognition leads to a claim under the law of property, which is inheritable, like any other claim under property law. According to the ESTONIAN Succession Act § 2, an estate does not include the rights and obligations of the deceased which pursuant to law or by their nature are inseparably bound to the person of the deceased. The transfer of a deceased person's claim of compensation for non-economic loss to the heir is therefore problematic. There seems to be no case law on this point.

27. SWEDISH Damages Law chap. 6 § 3 and FINNISH Damages Law chap. 7 § 3 also provide that claims in damages for pain and suffering, for particular adverse effects and for grievances extinguish on the death of the injured party, as long as he did not assert them as against the injuring party or his insurance carrier in his lifetime. A judicial determination of these claims is no longer required in order to ensure their survival, see Sandstedt, VersRAI 2002, 9, 11. It is also not necessary for the deceased to have expressly stated that he wished to assert his claim in non-economic damages (Prop 2000/01:68 [Ersättning för ideell skada] 77).

28. In IRELAND, the previous common law rule encapsulated by the Latin maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona was replaced wholesale with Civil Liability Act 1961 ss. 6-10. The general rule now is that all causes of action (other than "excepted causes of action" within the meaning of loc. cit. s. 6, i.e. one for defamation or seduction or any claim for compensation under the Workman's Compensation Act 1934) vested in a deceased person or subsisting against him or her, survive for the benefit of, or against, the deceased person's estate as the case may be (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 41.04). However, damages for purely "personal" loss are excluded from the damages recoverable in an action previously vested in the deceased person. Thus, exemplary damages, damages for any pain and suffering, for personal injury or for loss or diminution of expectation of life or happiness are not recoverable (loc. cit. s. 7(2)). This is because the law does not allow recovery in respect of those items of damage intimately connected with the deceased person. Where the circumstances that caused the death of the deceased also vested in him or her a cause of action against the defendant, such cause of action survives and may be asserted for the benefit of his or her estate. The damages recoverable in any such action must be assessed regardless of any loss (e.g. the termination of a life interest in property) or gain (e.g. insurance policies) consequent on the death of the plaintiff. It is also reasonable to assume that the position enunciated in the UK decision of Gammell v. Wilson [1982] AC 27 will be followed in Ireland, thereby allowing damages to the estate for the "lost years" to be recovered (see, although on a narrower issue, McMahon v. Burke and Midwestern health Board [1991] ILRM 59 [HC] and White, Irish Law of Damages for Personal Injuries and Death, paras. 14.3.03 – 14.03.04). In SCOTLAND, the right to sue passes, on the death of the injured party, to his executor (Gloag and Henderson, The Law of Scotland[11], para. 34.12; Smith v. Duncan Stewart & Co. Ltd. (No. 2) 1961 SC 91; Russell's Executix v. British Railways Board 1965 SC 422) who sues in a representative capacity, thereby not precluding claims by relatives (e.g. by immediate family for loss of support) arising out of the same events (White and Fletcher, Delictual Damages, 52 and 55; citing Dick v. Burgh of Falkirk 1976 SC (HL) 1 and the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976, s. 4). The 1976 Act (which replaced the previous common law rule) currently regulates the entitlement of an executor to claim. Thus, according to loc. cit. s. 2, the "like rights to damages in relation to personal injury… as were vested in the deceased immediately before his death" are transmitted to the executor. This includes the right of solatium (awards of damages for suffering lasting only minutes will be modest: Beggs v. Motherwell Bridge Fabricators Ltd. 1998 SLT 1215); however damages by way of solatium or by way of compensation for patrimonial loss attributable to any period after the deceased's death are excluded (1976 Act, s. 2(1)-(3), as substituted by the Damages (Scotland) Act 1993). The fact of whether or not the deceased had brought an action in his lifetime has no practical effect on the executor's title to claim (loc cit. s. 2A, as inserted by the Damages (Scotland) Act 1993). However, in relation to "defamation, or any other verbal injury, or other injury to reputation", s. 2(4) provides that this principle does not apply to non-patrimonial claims (all solatium claims which are not "real" personal injury ones); these may be continued by executors, but not initiated by them (White and Fletcher, loc. cit., 55). Any right the deceased had to damages in respect of the death of another (e.g. loss of society claims) will transmit to his executor, but in assessing damages the court will have regard only to the period ending immediately before the relative's death (loc. cit. s. 1A, as inserted by the Damages (Scotland) Act 1993, which also repealed the 1976 Act, s. 3).

IV. Funeral costs

29. Today, funeral costs are also recognised everywhere as recoverable economic loss. The various European legal systems differ only on peripheral issues, which mostly relate to the claimants and the level of claim.

30. FRENCH Law grants a claim in compensation to the surviving family members who have actually paid for the funeral (Cass.soc. 8 January 1981, Bull.civ. 1981, V, no. 22 p. 16; Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 110-2 p. 209). BELGIAN doctrine also infers that funeral costs constitute recoverable damage for the person who actually bears them, and indeed regardless of whether he is an heir or not. However, in the case of the death of (e.g.) a parent, a significant reduction is supported by the argument that the younger generation would have one day had to pay for the older's funeral costs anyway; the killing only caused such damage as results from the untimeliness of the funeral. Within the boundaries of reasonableness, therefore, as a general rule only the funeral costs that are incurred by someone from the older generation (parents) for the burial of someone from the younger generation (children) are fully recoverable (Simoens, Schade en schadeloosstelling, no. 132 pp. 250-252).

31. In SPAIN funeral costs form part of the deceased's legal estate (CC arts. 902(1) and 903). Where they have actually been denied as forming part of the estate, the successors have a relevant claim in damages against the tortfeasor (TS 17 February 1956, RAJ 1956 (1) no. 1103 p. 691). If the funeral is financed not from the estate but by a relative personally (e.g. the widow), this relative can take action iure propio against the tortfeasor (Vicente Domingo, Los daños corporales, 232, fn. 735). In its appendix in s. 1 no. 6, the Law on Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic (Texto Refundido de la Ley sobre Responsabilidad Civil y Seguro en la Circulación de Vehículos de Motor, brought into force by Real Decreto Legislativo no. 8/2004 of 29 October 2004) confirms the recoverability of funeral costs for a traffic accident which has fatal effects. Where there is contributory fault, the claim is proportionately reduced (no. 7 loc. cit.). As regards the level of claim, it is stated that "average funeral costs" are recoverable; anything seen as luxurious or extraordinary would have to be paid for by the survivors themselves (Gázquez Serrano, La indemnización por causa de muerte, 100). According to TS 10 March 1973, RAJ 1973 (1) no. 1235 p. 984, the cost of flying the body over from a foreign country is also counted as reasonable costs.

32. Under ITALIAN law, the successors are entitled to claim for compensation of funeral costs (Cass. 12 May 1993, no. 5416, Giust.civ.Mass. 1993, 850). In HUNGARY funeral costs are awarded to the ascending and descending relatives, the spouse and siblings of the deceased. Only expenses actually executed and even then only to an economically acceptable extent, are recoverable. The cost of the gravestone, the wreath, the church service, the transport of the body and even proportionate costs of mourning have been enumerated (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1360-1361; Eörsi, Kártérítés jogellenes magatartásért, 169-170; Petrik [-Köles], Polgári jog II, 634). That corresponds to the legal situation in ROMANIA (Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 256; Adam, Drept civil, 279).

33. CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC art. 449(2) express that "in case of death, the compensation shall also include compensation of adequate expenses connected with the burial". Of course that does not apply, if and so far as these costs are covered by health insurance. Incidentally, paragraph (3) loc. cit. adds that the claim in damages falls due to the person who has actually borne the cost. This corresponds to the position in POLAND (CC art. 446 § 1).

34. On the other hand, under GERMAN CC § 844(1) "in the case of death … the party liable in damages [has] to compensate for the funeral costs of the person(s) on whom the obligation to bear the costs lies". Normally this is the heirs (CC § 1968). Thus, someone who de facto takes on the funeral costs without any de jure obligation to do so, has no claim in tort (BGH 5 February 1962, NJW 1962, 791, 792; CA Oldenburg 27 July 1979, VersR 1979, 1135); however, in such cases a claim against the tortfeasor under agency of necessity comes into play (CA Berlin 12 February 1979, VersR 1979, 379). Funeral costs that are reasonable in view of the social and economic status of the deceased are recoverable. The cost of transporting the body also fall within the scope of application of CC § 844(1) (CA Berlin 10 November 1997, VersR 1999, 504, 508).

35. The position in AUSTRIA corresponds to this in all essential respects. Funeral costs constitute recoverable economic loss (e.g. OGH 18 December 1957, ZVR 1958/144, p. 153; OGH 26 November 1998, ZVR 1999/126, p. 417). It covers all costs that are in keeping with local traditions, the status and the economic circumsatnces of the deceased (OGH 4 November 1971, SZ 44/168; see further Rummel [-Reischauer], ABGB II², § 1327 no. 7). Who exactly is liable to compensate for the costs, is not expressly mentioned in the ABGB (Koziol, Haftpflichtrecht II², 147). It is inferred that such person(s) may claim who have to bear the costs under law. This is normally the heirs who have acquired seisin (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VII², § 1327 no. 4).

36. GREEK CC art. 928 expressly provides for the recoverability of funeral costs. Funeral costs befitting the economic status of the deceased are recoverable to a reasonable extent; the cost of taking care of the grave are not covered here, however (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 928 no. 17). Any person required, by operation of the law, to arrange the funeral has title to claim for reparation. A contenious point, however, is whether this is the person who had to pay for the maintenace of the deceased (the opinion of Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 614-615), or the heir(s) (the view of Filios, Enochiko Dikaio II(2)^3, 105). Where a third party, without being obliged to do so, takes on the funeral costs, he shall also have a direct claim against the injuring party (see in any case Georgiades loc. cit. no. 15).

37. PORTUGUESE CC art. 495(1) also expressly requires the party tortiously responsible to compensate for funeral costs. Whoever aided the deceased is entitled to claim, namely (and accordingly, whoever organised the funeral) the hospital, the doctors or other persons and institutions who had contributed to the treatment (CC art. 495(2)). Further, thoe who had drawn maintenance from the deceased are entitled to claim (CC art. 495(3)). The funeral costs must be reasonable and are determined by, inter alia, the deceased's standard of living. They include the cost of transporting the body home from abroad (STJ 5 May 2005), costs of calling in a funeral home, as well as a priest to celebrate the funeral mass (STJ 11 December 2003), further, the cost of a gravestone and for the grave-diggers (STJ 11 December 2003; Abrantes Geraldes, Temas da responsabilidade civil I, 15). In the case of fatal accidents in the workplace, there is a special regime.

38. Under DUTCH CC art. 6:108(2) reparation for funeral costs is payable to the person who actually bore them; that can be e.g. an employer. In relation to the level of recoverable costs, along with the expectations of the deceased it depends on his social status and on his financial circumsances (Schadevergoeding II [-Lindenbergh], art. 108, no. 18).

39. ESTONIAN LOA § 129(1) and (2) restrict compensation to "reasonable" funeral expenses. In principle, anyone who has to de jure bear the funeral costs may claim. However, „if funeral expenses are borne by another person, compensation for the expenses shall be paid to that person". LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.291 requires the person responsible for the death "to compensate the person who incurred the funeral expenses for those expenses. Only such funeral expenses that conform to the criterion of reasonableness shall be subject to compensation." LATVIAN CC art. 2350 requires anyone who is at fault for the death of another to compensate the heirs for the funeral costs. This bears correlation to the position in the NORDIC Countries, who restrict the level of any damages to "reasonable" costs (SWEDISH Damages Law chap. 5 § 2 no. 1 and Bengtsson and Strömbäck, Skadeståndslagen, 215; FINNISH Damages Law chap. 5 § 3; DANISH Damages Law § 12).

40. IRISH Civil Liability Act 1961 s. 49(2) provides for damages in respect of funeral and other expenses actually incurred by the deceased's dependants. Funeral costs include the costs of a normal tombstone and of embalming, but not the cost of an elaborate monument (O'Brien v. Higgins, SC 13 March 1967, unreported). Funeral expenses would also include expenses connected with the burial operation (or with cremation), and also with religious services for the deceased (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 42.20). Coupled with having to be reasonably necessary, the "other expenses" that can be claimed here must also be immediately related to the obsequies, or perhaps medical expenses caused by the wrongful act (Byrne v. Houlihan & De Courcy [1966] IR 274). Other than the aforementioned expenses, primarily travelling costs incurred by the dependants visiting the deceased before he died and attending the funeral, also acknowledgement cards to sympathisers, a wake and the cost of mourning clothes may be inferred here (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit.). The phrase does not include expenses incurred by a widower for extra domestic help or for the tuition of his children (Byrne v. Houlihan & De Courcy [1966] IR 274). In SCOTLAND, in fatal accident cases the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976, s. 1(3) permits the claim for expenses in connection with the deceased's funeral, incurred by a "relative" as defined. The claim is on their own behalf, viz. not on behalf of the deceased. The definition of relatives, in loc. cit. Schedule 1, is the same as for "loss of support" claims, see below, Note V53. S. 1(3) of the Act limits funeral costs to "any reasonable expense". There is a paucity of case law in this area, where in this small body of decisions, the primary concern was whether a headstone is a funeral expense at all; in the Inner House in Prentice v. Chalmers 1985 SLT 168 at 171), Lord Hunter observed that it was not argued that the cost of the headstone "was unreasonable in amount having regard to the station in life of the deceased and his family". Thus, "reasonableness" may vary according to the circumstances.

V. Loss of Maintenance

41. The tortious obligation to assume the role of maintaining those who had been economically dependant on the deceased in a special way is of common ground in Europe. Differences in legal systems are encountered, however, in determining precisely who is entitled to damages and occasionally in the level and legal construction of the claim in damages.

42. Under FRENCH law, anyone to whom the deceased had provided maintenance is, in principle, entitled to claim; it does not depend on an existing legal relationship inter partes (Cass.ch.mixte 27 February 1970, Bull.ch.mixte 1970 no. 1; RTD civ. 1970, 353, note Durry; D. 1970 jur. 201, note Combaldieu; JCP 1970 II 16305, concl.

Lindon, note Parlange; see also Beysen, VersRAI 2004, 41, 44). As a result, not only family members and non-marital cohabitees may be entitled to claim, but also any other person whom the victim had supported, provided only that the discontinuation of the advantage is a definite consequence of the primary victim's death (le Tourneau, Droit de la responsabilité et des contrats, no. 1456). This mirrors the position in BELGIUM (e.g. Cass. 24 March 1969, Pas. belge 1969, I, 655: the claim of a cloistral community for reparation of monies paid by a deceased nun to the community fund).

43. Under SPANISH law, anyone who was financially dependent on the deceased is entitled to claim for damages, as long as the lost maintenance can be proven. The law provides no precise criteria for the calculation of the level of this claim. However, in traffic accident cases the courts apply the table of damages in the appendix to the Law on Liability and Insurance for Motor Vehicle Traffic (Texto Refundido de la Ley sobre Responsabilidad Civil y Seguro en la Circulación de Vehículos de Motor, brought into force by Real Decreto Legislativo no. 8/2004 of 29 October 2004). The assessment of damages is incumbent upon the courts charged with jurisdiction to establish facts; the Tribunal Supremo does not review it in cassation proceedings (see e.g. TS 26 March 1997, RAJ 1997 (1) no. 1864 p. 2856). Normally, an all-inclusive sum is awarded for all damages, without differentiating between the details of the various positions.

44. So too, the ITALIAN CC does not expressly regulate the liability for lost maintenance after death. The older case law had considered whether secondary injured parties had a statutory claim to maintenance (CC art. 433) against the deceased. However, for some time now, economic disadvantages of others are compensated, to the extent that they can prove that they have been continuously supported by the deceased (Cass. 10 April 1979, no. 2076, Giust.civ.Mass. 1979, fasc. 4; Cass. 1 August 1987, no. 6672, Riv.giur.circ.trasp. 1988, 102). Even persons who have not yet been supported by the deceased, but would have been supported by him in the future, shall be entitled to claim, even where no statutory claim to maintenance would have accrued to them (Cass. 12 October 1998, no. 10085, Resp.civ. e prev. 1999, 752; Cass. 10 October 1992, no. 11097, Giust.civ.Mass. 1992, 10). The only prerequisite is that they would have been supported in the normal course of events (Cass 14 February 2000, no. 1637, Resp.civ. e prev. 2000, 609). As regards the quantum of the claim for lost maintenance and other economic loss caused to children following the death of their wage-earning mother, see the detailed judgment of Cass. 12 September 2005, no. 18092, Danno e resp. 2006, 753.

45. HUNGARIAN CC § 358(1) states that "dependents of a person who has died in an accident shall be entitled to claim an annuity that will supplement any support and ensure the satisfaction of their needs in accordance with the standard of living to which they were accustomed before the accident (by considering their actual or expected earnings)". When calculating the pension, consideration is to be given to whether the surviving dependents also had a claim against another party who had an obligation to provide maintenance, which made this party liable to an equal degree to that of the deceased (CC § 358(3)). According to case law, only those who had a statutory claim for maintenance against the deceased are entitled to claim. Maintenance provided out of genorosity may be given as little consideration as that which goes over and above the level required by statute. Thus, non-marital cohabitees do not form part of the circle of possible claimants (Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 1374-1375.; Petrik [-Köles], Polgári jog II, 641-643; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 251-255; Ujváriné, Felelősségtan[7], 200-204).

46. POLISH CC art. 446 § 2 provides a claim to those surviving dependents who had a statutory claim to maintenance against the deceased. However, "the same pension may be claimed by other persons related to the deceased whom the latter voluntarily and permanently supplied with means of maintenance if it follows from the circumstances that this is required by the principles of community life". Likewise, CZECH and SLOVAKIAN CC § 448(1) considers as entitled to claim, not only those who had a statutory claim to maintenance, but also those to whom the deceased actually provided maintenance. However, a claim does not exist to the extent that sums accrued to the relevant parties out of (social) insurance. In the same way, SLOVENIAN LOA art. 173(1) considers those "who were maintained or regularly supported by the deceased", just as much entitled to claim as those who had a statutory claim against the deceased. That is also the position in ROMANIA (Lupan, Răspunderea civilă, 258-262; Adam, Drept civil, 279-281). Draft CC art. 1133 provides fro an express statutory provision.

47. GERMAN CC § 844(2) only affords a claim to persons to whom the deceased was (or could become) required under statute to provide maintenance, and indeed in the amount and for a time period that the deceased would have had to provide maintenance in the likely duration of his life. Contributory fault of the deceased leads to a reduction of the claim (CC § 846). The position is the same in AUSTRIA (CC § 1327); damages are only afforded to those entitled to maintenance under statute (OGH 14 November 1934, SZ 16/223); a contractual claim to maintenance does not suffice (OGH 26 April 1991, JBl 1992, 44). Monetary compensation also falls due for maintenance the deceased had provided by nature (OGH 30 August 1988, ZVR 1989/106, p. 178). Where the de facto maintenance provided exceeds the de jure obligation - without being disproportionate - it is to be fully compensated. On the other hand, the statutory level of maintenance is to be paid, even where the maintenance previously provided by the deceased had fallen short of this level (OGH 2 September 1999, SZ 72/135). In Austria, contributory fault on the part of the deceased has to be considered also (OGH 19 November 1957, JBl 1957, 645).

48. GREEK CC art. 928 (second sentence) affords a claim in damages to those (and only those) to whom the deceased provided maintenance or services under a statutory obligation; solely contractual obligations to provide maintenance and services do not suffice. The precise determination of the list of entitled claimants takes its cue from the relevant family law provisions (Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 928, no. 26). The point in time at which the tortious act was committed is key here, not the time of death. Therefore, a widow who married the already injured party is not entitled to claim (Georgiades loc. cit. no. 9). If, and so far as the maintenance obligation passes to the deceased's survivors and they in turn are able to economically meet the claim to maintenance, no damages shall exist (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 615). On the other hand, it is sufficient that the deceased would have had an obligation to provide maintenance to the claimant in the near future (A.P. 359/1957, NoB 5/1957, 1012: the death of a 15-year-old male who would have completed his apprenticeship as a watchmaker in one year and then would have earned enough to provide his mother with maintenance). Spouses are also obliged to support each other and their children generally; the previous obligation of a wife for the provision of services has fallen away (CC arts. 1389 and 1390). The widower or the widow is thus likewise afforded a claim under CC art. 928 (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 621; Kounougeri-Manoledaki, FS Vavouskos II, 221). The material factor is the economic value of the contribution, which the deceased was obliged to make towards family maintenance according to provisions of family law (A.P. 84/2005, NoB 53 [2005] 1418). It is doubtful whether this also applies in relation to the lost services on the part of the deceased in the spouses' joint enterprise (answered in the negative by CA Athens 7212/1984, NoB 32/1984, 1561; answered in the affirmative by Doris in the note on this decision (loc. cit. 1562)).

49. PORTUGUESE CC art. 495(3) also provides a right to be compensated to those who could claim alimony (under CC art. 2009) from the victim or to those to whom the latter rendered support under a 'natural obligation' (see further Antunes Varela, Obrigações em geral I[10], 622; Abrantes Geraldes, Temas da responsabilidade civil I, 16-17). CC art. 495(3) throws up an exception to the general principle, whereby only those directly injured have a claim to compensation (Almeida Costa, Obrigações[8], 546-547). According to case law, non-marital life partners are also entitled to claim (CA Lisbon 20 February 1974, BolMinJus 234 [1974] 336) as are children, who have been already been conceived at the time of death, but not yet born (Vaz Serra, BolMinJus 86 [1959] 103, 123). The claim requires actual loss of maintenance. In contrast, it is not invariably necessary that the deceased provided maintenance in pursuance of a statutory obligation on him to do so; it suffices that maintenance had been rendered under a moral duty. Evidence that the injured third party was "needy" within the meaning of maintenance law is also not necessary (STJ 16 April 1974, RLJ 108 [1975-76] no. 3549 p. 182).

50. The equivalent rule in DUTCH law is to be found in CC art. 6:108(1). Lost maintenance does not only cover pecuniary support, but also extends to the provision of physical care, sustenance, accommodation, clothing and other support in kind. Primarily, spouses, registered partners and children are entitled to claim. They are entitled to a claim to the level of statutory maintenance at the very least; however, where the deceased has provided maintenance over and above what is necessary this is also recoverable (lit. (a) loc. cit.; on this issue and what follows, see in particular Schadevergoeding II [-Lindenbergh], art. 108, nos. 19 et seq.). Other relatives or in-laws only have a claim in damages if the deceased contributed to their maintenance at the time of his death or would have been compelled by a court order to do so (lit. (b)). Further, belonging to the circle of claimants entitled to damages is - according to lit. (c) loc. cit. - anyone, who lived together with the deceased as part of a family unit, if and so far as the deceased had actually covered their maintenance and it may be inferred that this would have continued, had his death not occurred and that the relevant parties cannot fairly provide for their own maintenance. Finally, those persons are entitled to claim who lived with the deceased as part of a family unit, in which the deceased kept house; they essentially have a claim to reparation of the costs for a home help (lit. (d)). In all cases, contributory fault on the deceased's part results in a corresponding reduction of the claim (CC art. 6:108(3)).

51. ESTONIAN LOA § 129(3)-(6) contains just as detailed a regulation: persons, who had a statutory claim to maintenance against the deceased, may claim the amount of lost maintenance actually incurred (para. (3)). The same goes for persons, for whom the deceased would have had a maintenance obligation under statute (para. (4)). This applies particularly in relation to children who were in fact already conceived at the time of death but had not yet been born (para. (5)). Finally, anyone who had permanently lived with the deceased as part of a family unit or had been otherwise provided maintenance by him due to a moral duty, is also entitled to damages, as long as they are dependant on this maintenace, they cannot obtain maintenance through other means and the deceased would have also provided them maintenance in the future (para. (6)). LITHUANIAN CC art. 6.284(1) lists "minor children, spouses, parents incapable of work, or other factual dependants incapable of work" as entitled to claim. LATVIAN CC art. 2351 is to the same effect. However, the provision only benefits those persons, for whose maintenance the deceased was obliged to provide. The death must have been caused through fault. The obligation to provide maintenance ends as soon as the beneficiary can provide for himself.

52. The Damages Laws of the NORDIC Countries coincide with these Principles in that reparation for lost maintenance only comes into play in cases of death (DANISH Damages Law §§ 12-14a; FINNISH Damages Law chap. 5 § 4 [in force since 1 January 2006]; SWEDISH Damages Law chap. 5 § 2 no. 2). Anyone who had - or would have shortly acquired - a statutory claim to maintenance against the deceased is entitled to reparation under the Swedish regulation; additionally, anyone who was dependant on the deceased. This involves primarily family members and non-marital cohabitees (Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 413-414). When assessing the level of damages, the economic circumstances of the surviving family members comes into consideration, taking into account possible insurance benefits (Swedish Damages Law chap. 5 § 3). Danish Damages Law § 12 states that damages fall due to anyone, who has lost his or her breadwinner. §§ 13-14a loc. cit. regulate the details of the level of reparation. Under FINNISH Damages Law chap. § 4(1) anyone is entitled to claim, who had a claim against the deceased for maintenance or received maintenance from him de facto. Work in the home only equates to maintenance under special circumstances (chap. 5 § 4(3)).

53. In SCOTLAND, liability under this heading is imposed under the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976, s. 1(3), read in conjunction with s. 1(1). It is necessary that the deceased died "in consequence of personal injuries sustained by him as a result of an act or omission of another person … giving rise to liability to pay damages". The injuring party is required to pay to any defined relatives damages "such as will compensate the relative for any loss of support suffered by him since the date of the deceased's death or likely to be suffered by him". Support is a factual matter, which must be established (White and Fletcher, Delictual Damages, 34). Under loc. cit. s. 1(6) it is not essential in such a claim that the deceased had a legal obligation to support, but if that is so, it is to be taken into account in establishing a claim to support. The loss of support claim is based on the actual amount of support that was usually received (Hatherley v. Smith 1989 SLT 316). It is appropriate to take account of likely increases in support which would have followed (Smith v. Comrie's Executrix 1944 SC 499) but not speculative matters (Daniell v. Aviemore Station Hotel Co. Ltd. 1951 SLT (Notes) 75). In assessing loss of support, the court will not take account of remarriage prospects (Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971, s. 4), nor will the court deduct any social security benefits paid or money that will accrue from the deceased's estate, such as insurance policies (Stewart, Delict and Related Obligations[3], para. 11.29). As far as liability goes, the claim is not independent because liability to the relatives depends upon liability to the deceased; however, as was noted above in note III28, it does not rely on an action by the deceased's executor. Relatives in this context are defined in the 1976 Act, Schedule 1 and include: spouses; a parent or child; "ascendant or descendant (other than a parent or child)"; siblings; uncles and aunts; nephews and nieces; and first cousins. "Common law" spouses, but not divorced spouses (1976 Act, Schedule 1, para. 1(aa)), those treated as children of the family (loc. cit. para. 1(c)) and illegitimate children (loc. cit. para. 2(b)) are included as well. Also, stepchildren and since "any relationship of the half blood shall be treated as a relationship of the whole blood" and "any relationship of affinity shall be treated as a relationship of consanguinity" (loc. cit., para. 2(a)), presumably again, a variety of relationships such as half-siblings, uncles and aunts by marriage, "grandparents-in-law" and even "half-nephews" and cousins by marriage would fall under this category (White and Fletcher, loc. cit. 35). The inclusion of daughters-in-law and mothers-in-law has also been affirmed (McAllister v. Imperial Chemical Industries plc. 1997 SLT 351; Monteith v. Cape Insulation Ltd. 1998 SC 903). It must, however, be remembered that the abovementioned possible claimants may only claim if they were in fact dependent on the deceased. In the usual case, where there will be more than one dependent relative, the sum awarded requires to be apportioned between them.

54. In IRELAND, loss of pecuniary benefits that could have reasonably been expected, but for the wrongful act of the defendant, represents the principal heading under which dependants (defined according to Civil Liability Act 1961, Part IV) may claim damages under the fatal injuries provisions of the Act. To ascertain the value of dependency, the dependants' annual average loss is first calculated, which is then multiplied by the number of years during which the loss is likely to continue and is discounted to give the present value of the dependency. Finally, benefits as a consequence of the death are deducted in order to reach the amount recoverable (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 42.26). The courts take into account the deceased's actual income, his prospects for advancement in his job or profession, the fringe benefits to which he was entitled (e.g. company car, free heat and light, bonuses, pension rights, etc.) and the proportion of his income that was directed at his dependants (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. para. 42.27). Along with direct financial contributions made by the deceased and likely to have continued but for his death, the loss of services, or acts in kind that can be reduced to financial terms is also recoverable; this includes the compensation of expenses incurred where a tutor must be employed to replace the deceased's contributions in the instruction of his children, a gardener must be taken on in the management of the family garden or a carpenter or a painter has to be engaged to do routine maintenance work in the home that the deceased did before his death (O'Sullivan v. Córas Iompair Éireann [1978] IR 407; Waters v. Cruikshank [1967] IR 378; Berry v. Humm & Co. [1915] 1 KB 627). The primary victim's dependants can only recover damages for pecuniary benefits that could be reasonably expected to be made by the deceased in the future; therefore, damages may be awarded to the dependants in the case of the death of a minor son or daughter if a future pecuniary benefit could be reasonably expected (Hamilton v. O'Reilly [1951] IR 200; Malynn v. Farrell (1956) 90 ILTR 137). The inferences made in the dependants' claim must be substantiated by facts in order to enable the Court to reasonably conclude that a benefit would have accrued; otherwise their claim will fail as being predicated on mere speculation (Horgan v. Buckley [1938] IR 115; Good v. Callaghan, Supreme Court, 25 April 1967). The Court considers the working life expectancy of the deceased and the life expectancy of the relevant dependants in assessing the period of loss. In the case of minor dependants, the extent of the child's education and whether the child was likely to move away after taking up employment are relevant factors. Taxation (of the deceased's income), inflation and the likely increase of the deceased's income, had he continued to earn, also come into play when assessing the value of the claim (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. 42.32). As a general rule, pecuniary benefits to the deceased's dependants are also taken into account (Byrne v. Houlihan & De Courcy [1966] IR 274; Murphy v. Cronin [1966] IR 699, 708). This includes the accelerated nature of the inheritance (Tubridy v. White, High Court, 31 January 1974; O'Sullivan v. Córas Iompair Éireann [1978] IR 407). Any possible increase of savings that would have accumulated during the deceased's lifetime, had he lived, is also relevant (Murphy v. Cronin [1966] IR 699 at 710; v. Córas Iompair Éireann loc. cit.). There are two exceptions to the general rule that benefits will be taken into account: (i) property of which the widowed claimant had the shared use during the deceased's lifetime (v. Córas Iompair Éireann loc. cit.; Murphy v. Cronin loc. cit.) shall not be a relevant factor in the assessment; and (ii) Civil Liability Act 1961 s. 50 states that in a fatal injuries action, no account is to be taken of (a) any sum payable on the death of the deceased under any contract of insurance, or (b) any pension, gratuity or other like benefit payable under statute or otherwise in consequence of the death of the deceased. Civl Liablity Act s. 49(5) provides that where a cohabitant of three years standing had no enforceable right to financial maintenance by the deceased, the court shall take that fact into the account, together with any other relevant matter, in determining the damages to be awarded. It must be noted, however, that merely the absence of a legal claim is to be taken into account by the Court, with no further direction as to apportionment of damages.

VI. Pecuniary and non-pecuniary claims of other third parties harmed

55. Death or injury to a person can also cause sustained harm to other third parties, for instance employers or business partners, and inflict disadvantages on them that do not fit within the framework of lost maintenance. There is no uniform yardstick in the various European legal systems for measuring whether such damages are entitled to be recovered (and if so, by whom). However, it may be stated in general that great reluctance as to the recoverability of such consequential damages prevails. In most legal systems a claim in damages would only be affirmed in such cases as the harm was intentionally inflicted on the third party.

56. The FRENCH courts usually deny claims in damages of third parties, whose interests are infringed or compromised by the death or injury of the primary injured party, but who are only linked to him by a relationship under the law of obligations (Viney and Jourdain, Les conditions de la responsabilité[2], no. 312 pp. 135-136). While there are, indeed, exceptions (e.g. CA Colmar 20 April 1955, D. 1966 jur. 723, note Savatier: Reparation of the harm suffered by a football club as a result of the accident-caused death of one of its players), they do not correspond with the main line of reasoning of the court of cassation (see, in particular, Cass.civ. 14 November 1958, GazPal 1959, I, 31: no claim for an Opera against the originator of an accident, which had the effect of rendering a singer unable to perform).

57. This is also how the issue is dealt with in BELGIUM. At most a claim arises where the contractual relationship between the primary injured party and the claimant is of a nature that the promised performance of the injured party may only be carried out exclusively by him personally and no-one else (Dirix, Het begrip schade, no. 225 pp. 140-141).

58. So too, the SPANISH Tribunal Supremo only apparently considers the compensation of third parties if they had a particularly close personal relationship with the deceased. TS 17 May 1973, RAJ 1973 (1) no. 2087 p. 1664 provides an example of this (a “wet nurse” who had taken care of the deceased for a significant part of her life, was now left without a job and had no prospect of getting another one or of gaining income by other means). In a decision that was met to some extent with sharp criticism by academic commentators (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 381) the Supreme Court granted a claim to an order of nuns who ran the nursing home in which the deceased had lived (TS 31 May 1972, RAJ 1972 (1) no. 2787 p. 2121), and in TS 30 June 1965, RAJ 1965 (2) no. 3425 p. 2080 it even suggested the possibility that the Church could be entitled to damages for the death of a bishop or capitular. On the other hand, it denied the claim in compensation of a congregation for the death of one of its members (TS 12 June 1970, RAJ 1970 (2) no. 3500 p. 2388). Conversely, the state has been compensated for the pecuniary damages (continuation of wage payments) occasioned to them due to the intentional injury of a member of the Guardia Civil (TS 24 April 1979, RAJ 1979 (1) no. 1430, p. 1178; for similar cases see also TS 13 December 1983, RAJ 1983 (3) no. 6522 p. 5022; TS 20 September 1982, RAJ 1982 (2) no. 4948 p. 3215; TS 12 June 1989, RAJ 1989 (4) no. 5094 p. 5892 and TS 11 December 1989, RAJ 1989 (7) no. 9527 p. 11090). The case law is of course inconsistent, as in a number of cases whose facts were identical to these, pecuniary damages were denied (TS 14 February 1980, RAJ 1980 (1) no. 516 p. 396; TS 14 April 1981, RAJ 1981 (1) no. 1539 p. 1282 and TS 29 December 1986, RAJ 1986 (3) no. 4922 p. 4849; see Santos Briz, La responsabilidad civil I[7], 238).

59. In certain instances, ITALIAN case law has also extended the protection of relative rights of claim beyond maintenance obligees. In the co-called Meroni-decision (Cass.sez.un. 26 January 1971, no. 174, Giur.it. 1971, I, 1, 680, note Visintini = Foro it. 1971, I, 342, notes Jemolo and Busnelli 1284) the Court granted damages to an obligee who, due to the obligor's death, had lost his claim against the obligor for the provision of nondelegable services. Likewise, an employer, who has to continue to pay the wages of an employee injured by a third party receives relief (settled case law, see Cass. 12 November 1988, no. 6132, Giur.it. 1990, I, 1, 280). As a matter of principle, HUNGARIAN Law grants no damages to third parties, and so does not compensate non-economic loss, like e.g. in the case of friends, neighbours or carers (Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I, 208/2; Petrik, Kártérítési jog, 260-261).

60. In principle, GERMAN Law in no way grants persons indirectly harmed (apart from cases of intentional harm: CC § 826) a claim in damages, not even for the reparation of their economic losses suffered. According to BGH 21 Novemer 2000, NJW 2001, 971, this even applies where the beneficiary's claim (in this case the original owner of agricultural property) against the deceased (the adult son and heir to the farm) to pension benefits in old age was backed up by its entry in the land register. Additionally, in a case where a man who represented one half of a well-known and successful figure skating duo was injured in a traffic accident, BGH 10 December 2002, NJW 2003, 1040 decided that his female partner could not claim any damages from the injuring party for loss occasioned to her due to the temporary accident-caused absence of her partner. However, if an employee is injured and his employer has to continue to pay his wages, the employee's claim against the injuring third party is transferred to the employer by operation of statute (Law on the Payment of Remuneration on Public Holidays and in the Case of Illness [EntgFG] § 6).

61. In AUSTRIA, despite the broad formulation of CC § 1295(1), in principle the pure economic losses of third parties still go without reparation (Schwimann [-Harrer], ABGB VII², § 1295 no. 3). CC § 1327 (loss of maintenance) is interpreted as an exhaustive exception; apart from the circumstances enumerated here, in no case will a claim be entertained if no intention is present (OGH 19 November 1956, ZVR 1957/37, p. 51; OGH 5 April 1979, ZVR 1980/240, p. 226; OGH 8 July 1993, ZVR 1994/129, p. 311). However, an employer who continues to pay the wages of an injured worker during his illness acquires the employee's claim in damages against the injuring third party by operation of statute (General Social Insurance Law [ASVG] § 332(1)).

62. GREECE also grants no reparation to persons who suffer economic damages as a result of the death or injury of another but are not mentioned in CC arts. 928 and 929 (loss of maintenance). Only "indirectly injured parties" are concerned here (Kornilakis, Eidiko Enochiko Dikaio I, 596; Georgiades, Enochiko Dikaio, Geniko meros, 608; Georgiades and Stathopoulos [-Georgiades], art. 914, no. 70, and art. 928, no. 1). Examples offered by these commentators include a football club, which loses a famous player, an opera house, in which a famous singer cannot perform and obligees of a building contractor, to whom he cannot fulfill his contractual obligations in due time because of his injury.

63. The position in PORTUGAL is the same. Third parties, who are merely 'indirectly' harmed and not mentioned in CC art. 495 (???supra, Note *V49), have no personal claim of their own (Sinde Monteiro, Responsabilidade por conselhos, 190). Exceptions to this basic rule require a specific statutory basis. Among them, is Decree-Law no. 218/99 of 15 June 1999, which grants the national health services the right to reimbursement in regard to hospitalisation costs caused by criminal acts, road traffic accidents and accidents at work (Abrantes Geraldes, Temas da responsabilidade civil I, 14; see STJ 13 February 2003). Likewise, Decree Law no. 59/89 of 22 February 1989 grants Social Security institutions the right to claim reimbursement for expenditure caused by an injured party's personal injury or death in civil or criminal proceedings (Abrantes Geraldes loc. cit. 19). Similar regimes operate in favour of the employer and the insurer in regard to accidents at work attributable to a third party (Act no. 100/97 of 13 September 1997, art. 31; see now Labour Code art. 294), and to the State (by means of subrogation into the injured civil servant's claim, see the acórdão uniformizador de jurisprudência no. 5/97 Diário Rep. no.73, Series I-A, 27 March 1997).

64. So too in DUTCH Law pure economic losses of third parties in principle still go without compensation. However, according to CC art. 6:107(1) an employer is entitled – through a right of his own (and not only an assigned right) – to damages for medical costs and costs of other treatment, which he incurred for the benefit of his employee. The claim to compensation of wages continuously paid during the period of illness results from CC art. 6:107a. This does not encompass the cost of hiring a substitute or damages attributable to a disruption of operations. Damages suffered by a company because of injury to one of its members are also unrecoverable; only the personal losses of the member are recoverable (CA Amsterdam 9 July 1998, VR 1999, 64).

65. The claims of third parties in SWEDEN are likewise rejected (Hellner, SvJT 1969, 332; Hellner and Johansson, Skadeståndsrätt[6], 364, 411; Kleineman, Ren förmögenhetsskada, 180; Andersson, Skyddsändamål och adekvans, 560; Andersson, Trepartsrelationer i skadeståndsrätten, 38; Radetzki, Skadeståndsberäkning vid sakskada, 56). Also, HD 5 May 1995, NJA 1995, 269 would not represent an exception to this rule (damages to the mother of a child abducted by the father and brought to Tunisia).

66. At COMMON LAW the general principle is that "the loss of A arising out of an injury whereby B is unable to perform his contract [with A] is not actionable": Admiralty Commissioners v. Owners of Steamsship Amerika [1917] AC 38, 45 per Lord Parker. Consequently a company or a partnership has no claim for loss of services where a director or employee of the company or a partner of the firm is injured and equally an employee has no claim if injury to his employer ends his employment: Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Hambrook [1956] 2 QB 641, 660 (Denning LJ). In ENGLAND, before the Administration of Justice Act, 1982 s. 2(c) abolished the anomalous common law action per quod servitium amisit for the loss of domestic services rendered by a servant within the employer's household (Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Hambrook [1956] 2 QB 641, 666 [Denning LJ]), this action had been subject to judicial scepticism. Due to the lack of statutory reform in this area in IRELAND, this anomalous action survives to this day. It is founded on the now out-dated concept of the servant falling within the proprietorship of his master. Similar to the position before the aforementioned abolition in England, in Ireland too, the courts have little sympathy with this concept today and have tended to regard the action as anomalous and restrict its scope as much as possible (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 32.03). The action does not depend on any contract of service (A-G for New South Wales v. Perpetual Trustee Co. (Ltd) [1955] AC 457 at 483 [PC]) but rather on the fact (or even right) of service. Mirroring the position of the Court of Appeal in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Hambrook (loc. cit.), in A-G v. Ryan's Car Hire Ltd. [1965] IR 642), the Irish Supreme Court (in emphasising the restricted scope of this anomaly) concluded that public servants (e.g. in the armed forces, police or civil service) did not fall under this exception. It is also unclear in Ireland, whether the action should be limited to deny the right to sue to all masters apart from those of "menial" servants (i.e. living as part of their master's household). In Ryan v. Ireland [1989] IR 177), Finlay CJ (although only obiter) expressed the view that the action should in fact be limited in this way. Some damage must be shown to ground the action (Hall v. Hollander (1825) 4 B & C 660, 107 ER 1206). Recovery may be allowed for the actual pecuniary loss because of the loss of services and other expenses necessarily sustained in consequence of the servant's injury (Chapman v. McDonald [1969] IR 188). Thus, the master may recover for the extra cost of obtaining and training a substitute for the servant or in paying overtime rates to existing staff (McMahon and Binchy, loc. cit., para. 32.11). Whether the foreseeability limitation applicable to negligence actions applies to actions per quod servitium amisit has not been decided upon (see, however, Jones v. Fabbi (1973) 37 DLR (3d) 27).

67. In SCOTLAND, it is not an actionable wrong to cause a person indirect economic loss by injuring, or causing death of, another person with whom the loser has contractual ties (Walker, Law of Delict[2], 916). In this way, an employer has no claim where his employee is injured or killed by the fault of a third party (Allan v. Barclay (1864) 2 M 873; Reavis v. Clan Line Steamers, 1925 SC 725), nor has one business partner where another partner has been injured or killed (Gibson v. Glasgow Corp. 1963 SLT (Notes) 16), nor has a company for loss of services of a director (cf. Young v. Ormiston, 1936 SLT 79, though its authority was doubted in Vaughan v. Greater Glasgow Passenger Transport Executive 1984 SC 32), nor the owner of a business for the death of the manager (Quin v. Greenock & Port-Glasgow Tramways Co. 1926 SC 544), nor a professional dancer for the death of his dancing partner (though because they were also married, he could claim for damages in his capacity as a widower who had lost his wife under other heads of damages) (Burgess v. Florence Nightingale Hospital [1955] 1 QB 349). The principle has been stated to be that the foresight of harmful consequences attributed to a wrongdoer does not extend to include the victim's contractual relationships (Walker, loc. cit. 917).

Illustration 1 is taken from BGH 10 December 2002, NJW 2003, 1040.

VI.–2:203: Infringement of dignity, liberty and privacy

(1) Loss caused to a natural person as a result of infringement of his or her right to respect for his or her dignity, such as the rights to liberty and privacy, and the injury as such are legally relevant damage.

(2) Loss caused to a person as a result of injury to that person's reputation and the injury as such are also legally relevant damage if national law so provides.

COMMENTS

A. General

1. Purpose of the provision. The purpose of this provision is to clarify that loss and injury caused by the infringement of human dignity constitutes legally relevant damage which leads to an obligation to make reparation according to the basic rule on non-contractual liability. One important aspect of human dignity is the protection of a person's right to liberty; another is the protection of a person's private sphere. Of course consequential losses also constitute damage relevant to the law on non-contractual liability, whether they be economic or non-economic losses.

Horizontal effects of human rights. I.–1:102 (Interpretation and development) paragraph (2) states that these model rules "are to be read in the light of any applicable instruments guaranteeing human rights and fundamental freedoms". The very position of this provision indicates its status as a general provision, whose significance goes far beyond the law on non-contractual liability. It is also necessary for the law of contract – for example in the law of credit securities. It seems to be certain, however, that such a general norm on the so-called 'horizontal effects' of human rights and fundamental freedoms cannot render a specific non-contractual liability law protection of rights of personality superfluous. Furthermore, it goes without saying that holders of rights in private law in relation to others are not subject to the same duties as the state in its dealings with citizens. Persons subject to private law who offer their goods or services to the public must, however, comply with more stringent rules than individuals conducting their private lives.

Illustration 1
For example, an infringement of dignity is made out when a business which is open to the public (e.g. a bank, restaurant or hotel) turns someone away on account of their skin colour or creed. A private person by contrast may generally adopt entirely arbitrary criteria in deciding when to let someone into his or her house.

B. Infringement of human dignity (paragraph (1))

Infringement. Technically speaking, there can be an "infringement" of the incorporeal rights of personality in VI.–2:203 within the meaning of these rules even where the injuring person can invoke a ground of defence set out in Chapter 5, e.g. VI.–5:203 (Protection of public interest). The distinction is important because the allocation of the burden of proof turns on it.

Injury and loss. The infringement of human dignity, like injury to body or health, constitutes a damage per se. However, a legally relevant damage is also constituted by the losses which result from that infringement. Infringements of human dignity can entail economic as well as non-economic damage.

Trivial injury. In every case the injury must not be merely trivial (VI.–6:102 (De minimis rule)). In establishing whether the case is one of trivial damage it will be material whether the injuring person has acted intentionally or merely negligently and, moreover, whether a violation of a private sphere or an infringement of freedom is at stake. For infringements of rights of personality or interferences in the private sphere which result from mere negligence there is sometimes no scope for a claim to damages. With infringements of the right to liberty, however, the position is usually different. Here negligence is often sufficient, provided that the circumstances are such that the infringement of the right to liberty equates to an infringement of human dignity. Everything depends on assessing the circumstances of the individual case. The regulation of the corresponding details must therefore be left to the courts. Furthermore, the generally applicable principle of Chapter 6 that reparation is to be awarded in a way which best corresponds to the injury suffered (VI.–6:101(2) (Aim and forms of reparation)), which necessarily involves a consideration of commensurability between the award and the damage, may have particular significance here. Compensation, for example, will not be due where the infringement of a right to respect for personal dignity is trivial.

> Illustration 2
> A sensationalist news gatherer forces a way into a hotel room in order to catch a famous person "in flagranti". Protection against such conduct obviously calls for liability to make monetary reparation. Where, however, a hotel guest enters the wrong room by mistake, that is not normally such a serious infringement of the private life of the other guest concerned as to give rise to a claim to compensation. However, the hotel guest is of course obliged to leave the room immediately (i.e., there is a right against further intrusion) and in the event of a stubborn refusal to do that, the invasion of the private sphere ceases to be trivial.

Groups of cases. Furthermore, there exists today a whole spectrum of relatively firmly settled groups of cases in which the laws on non-contractual liability affirm an infringement of human dignity or, as is often said, an infringement of personality. Particular mention may be made of degrading and marginalising the social profile of a person, cases of unlawful exposure to publicity and infringements of family-related rights of personality. However, these groups of cases are not particularly stressed in the text of the provision in order not to hinder further developments and its application to specific cases. An example of unlawful exposure to publicity is to be found in the following illustration:

> Illustration 3
> While in hospital recovering from severe head surgery, a famous actor is illicitly tracked down to his hospital room, and interviewed and photographed there by sensationalist journalists. This occurs while he is neither capable of answering questions rationally, nor even consenting to the "interview". This amounts to a case of an infringement of his right to the protection of his personal dignity.

Sexual harassment; Community law; II.–2:101 (Right not to be discriminated against). An infringement of human dignity is of course also made out in a case of sexual harassment. European Community law defines "harassment" in Council Directive 2004/113/EC of 13 December 2004 implementing the principle of equal treatment between men and women in the access to and supply of goods (OJ L 373/37 of 21 December 2004) art. 2(c) as "an unwanted conduct related to the sex of a person … with the purpose or effect of violating the dignity of a person and of creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment". Art. 8(2) loc. cit. provides: "Member States shall introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to ensure real and effective compensation or reparation … for the loss and damage sustained by a person injured as a result of discrimination within the meaning of this Directive, in a way which is dissuasive and proportionate to the damage suffered. The fixing of a prior upper limit shall not restrict such compensation or reparation." VI.–2:203 does not provide merely for protection against sexual harassment. The rule also guarantees that in cases regulated by II.–2:101 an appropriate remedy under the law on non-contractual liability is available: see II.–2:104 (Remedies).

Protection of minors. Minors require special protection from sexual assault.

Illustration 4
Father F coerces his underage daughter to have sexual intercourse with the threat of killing himself otherwise. This constitutes a violation of the child's personality; and in addition, depending on the other circumstances of the case, also an infringement of the mother and wife's right of personality.

Illustration 5
An infringement of a person's sexual sphere through omission is also conceivable, e.g. where the administration of a home for mentally disabled minors fails to prevent young girls from engaging in sexual intercourse for which they are not emotionally and socially prepared. To deal with the specific problem area of electronic media, a Council Recommendation on the protection of minors and human dignity in audiovisual and information services has been in place since 24 September 1998, and has been expeditiously incorporated in a number of national legal systems (Evaluation Report COM (2001) 106 final).

The right to liberty. VI.–2:203 does not attempt to enumerate all manifestations of the infringement of another's dignity that are relevant to the law on non-contractual liability. In light of the multifaceted nature of life, this would be impossible. However, particular mention is given to the invasion of a person's private or indeed intimate sphere, and the infringement of another person's liberty. By 'liberty' the text comprehends freedom of physical movement, i.e. the right to leave the place in which one currently finds oneself and the right not to be compelled to go to a specified place. On the other hand there is no infringement of liberty in being prevented from entering a given space or in being merely adversely affected in the freedom to resolve upon some action.

Illustration 6
Without good reason an association prohibits one of its members access to the club rooms. There is no infringement of liberty to the detriment of the member of the association.

Illustration 7
The position is the same if somebody parks a car so as to block another parked vehicle and prevent its owner, returning from a shopping trip, from driving away. This case may well be relevant from the viewpoint of the violation of a property right. It does not involve an infringement of liberty, however, for the simple reason that the driver of the car can leave the parking space at any time by other means.

Illustration 8
On the other hand, liberty is infringed if someone is locked in a room – even if the occupant is lying inside with a broken leg and could not possibly have ventured from the spot. Critical is the fact that the right is infringed and not whether the right could actually have been utilised.

Arrest and imprisonment of innocent persons. The problem of the state's liability in cases where innocent persons are arrested and imprisoned remains outside the scope of application of VI.–2:203. This follows from VI.–7:103 (Public law functions and court proceedings).

The right to privacy. The Article also gives express mention to the right to protection of the private sphere which is conceived as a manifestation of the right to protection of personal dignity. The right to protection of the private sphere assures every person an untouchable personal living space which everyone must respect. The ways in which the private sphere may be violated are for their part so numerous that they elude capture within an exhaustive group of cases. They include, for example, harassment and, more remotely, deliberately spying on others in their personal life. On the other hand, there is no violation of the private sphere when a photograph is taken of a private estate, albeit without permission. Such conduct may, however, amount to a violation of a property right or a violation of a legally protected interest.

Persons of contemporary celebrity. It must be stressed that the right to a private sphere is enjoyed by everyone and therefore also by celebrities. "Private sphere" must be understood not merely spatially, in the sense of a private dwelling (flat, house, etc). Rather it also subsists where, for example, someone wishes to eat in a restaurant alone or with friends and the existence there of a private sphere is quite independent of whether the person is or is not of current notoriety.

Illustration 9
The right to a private sphere is thus infringed by someone who covertly photographs a world famous princess during her stay in a fitness studio with a hidden camera and without her knowledge while she is exercising in a separate room, or by someone who photographs her in a café in which she is chatting with friends in private company.

Protecting a public interest. The defence of protection of the public interest (see VI.–5:203 (Protection of public interest)) is not fundamentally set against infringements of human dignity because the protection of human dignity is itself (also) in the public interest. However, that does not remove the need to consider all the circumstances of the individual case when determining whether there is in fact an infringement of dignity. The defence of acting in the public interest can also assume significance in the context of VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another) where defamation takes the form of disseminating false information about another person to that person's prejudice.

C. Legal persons

Application of the general rule on legally relevant damage. The text specifically addresses only the infringements of incorporeal 'personality rights' (Persönlichkeitsrechte) of natural persons. The particular problem whether legal persons too are endowed with a "right of dignity" is not expressly addressed in the provision. The matter therefore falls to be resolved by judicial consideration under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage) paragraph (1)(b). See Comments on VI.–1:103 (Scope of application). Depending on the current rules on fundamental rights in a given country, it is conceivable that this issue will result in diverse solutions. On the other hand, there is no doubt that legal persons can commit a violation of a right of personality. In other words, within the framework of VI.–2:203, they do not come into consideration as claimants and injured persons, but they certainly do as opponents of claims and injuring persons. That holds true also for businesses in the media. Such undertakings enjoy no constitutional protection of their existence in the sense that they cannot be called on to make reparation, even though the quantum of the claim may be such as to endanger the financial basis of the undertaking.

D. Posthumous protection of personality rights

Post-mortem protection of personality and protection of one's own rights. As already mentioned (see above, VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage), Comment B), the problem of posthumous protection of personality rights is likewise not expressly regulated. Here too substantial reference is made to the relevant national conception of fundamental rights (see Notes VIII66-721-77 under VI.–2:101 (Meaning of legally relevant damage)). The courts consequently must resolve the questions relating to posthumous protection of personality rights on the basis of VI.–2:101(1)(b). Often the matter will only revolve around claims to a prohibitory order made by near relatives who are contesting a particular account of the deceased's life. A claim to damages in such cases would only rarely come under consideration, but it is not excluded if it concerns an economic loss – for example, where unfair use is made of the deceased's name or image for advertising purposes. However, it will not infrequently be the case that the relatives themselves can proceed on the basis of an infringement of their own rights because they are affected in their own dignity. Where a posthumous right of personality is accepted, it is also beyond question that such a right cannot be protected in perpetuity. A solution which commends itself, by analogy to the EU Directive 93/98/EEC harmonising the term of protection of copyright art. 1(1), is to adopt at the uppermost a maximum period of 70 years from death.

E. Defamation (paragraph (2))

Defamation not specifically addressed in the Chapter 2, Section 2. Section 2 of Chapter 2 does not contain any specific provisions on defamation. That is because it appears to be extraordinarily difficult to formulate in a way which is politically acceptable some regulation in non-contractual liability law of the complex issue of protection of 'honour'. The extent to which honour, reputation, good standing or status in society, or similar attributes of a person should be protected by the legal system is a matter of controversy among the various European jurisdictions, not least because of the correlative limitation of freedom of expression which such protection necessarily entails. Consequently, no attempt has been made directly to protect such attributes of the person in any general way. The text confines itself to providing that an injury to reputation is a legally relevant damage if this is envisaged by the applicable national law. However, where national law does not impose liability, a claim may nonetheless succeed if it involves communication of false information for which the responsible person is accountable: see VI.–2:204 (Loss upon communication of incorrect information about another).

Criminal defamation. It has also emerged as impossible to base the rule on the minimum proposition that a legally relevant damage is at least present if the claimant is made the victim of a criminal defamation. That approach would have led to diverse legal results (since the criminal laws are not coordinated). For example, a defamatory statement which is communicated only to the individual defamed constitutes a criminal defamation in some criminal jurisdictions only (e.g. in Germany, England and Wales, but not in Austria and in Spain). Admittedly, such variations in the applicable criminal law would not have been a peculiarity of this area. The same inherent diversity is also true, for example, of liability for breach of statutory obligation (because such obligations differ from place to place) and even for liability for negligence because the way in which this concept is made concrete is and will remain dependent on local particularities. Nonetheless the problem of diversity is particularly acute here. There are some national legal systems (e.g. the Common Law ones) for which certain criminal defamations do not give rise to liability in private law. This problem of a criminal law which runs into overkill for private law purposes would necessitate an express limitation. For the purposes of liability in private law only those crimes could be regarded which serve to protect the honour and good reputation of the individual; one would have to disregard those crimes which seek to protect the public interest (e.g. preventing a disturbance of the peace or an affray) and where the making of a defamatory statement which is true is therefore criminalised. The necessity for such a limitation, however, would serve only to show that the fundamental question of when an individual should be entitled to redress for defamation would not be solved by appeal to the criminal law. For while the existence of a crime shows, by definition, that in relation to society a person has overstepped the bounds of freedom of expression, this does not automatically resolve the further question whether in relation to the claimant that act warrants a right to redress in private law. Conversely there are also cases in which a private law liability is affirmed but the criminal law takes no cognisance of a crime. That is again particularly problematic for English law, where libel but not slander may constitute a crime and where the arguably required element of seriousness for punishment by the state excludes many non-trivial cases where non-contractual liability is recognised. The position is even starker in Scotland, which no longer recognises a criminal act of defamation. In that regard, as regards Scottish law, a provision on non-contractual liability for criminal defamation would have achieved nothing. It is in the light of such difficulties and complexities that the attempt to couple non-contractual liability for defamation at a European level with infraction of national criminal law was abandoned.

Freedom of expression. Obviously all European societies respect and nurture a domain for freedom of expression, quite irrespective of considerations of public interest protecting the making of statements which would otherwise be regarded as having overstepped the bounds of that freedom. However, in given circumstances, an attack on a person's status in society may be so wanton or so severe in its means or depth, for example, that it can properly be said to have infringed a person's right to respect for personal dignity. There may be no right to any particular level of standing in society (since society will make its own mind up about the merits of one's character and achievements); but an individual's right to respect for personal dignity includes the right not to have to tolerate a vicious and unjustified rubbishing of reputation.

F. Relation to other provisions in chapter 2, section 2

Overlaps. It is conceivable that the scope of application of VI.–2:203 overlaps in several cases with the scope of application of other provisions, but that does not represent a problem. The injured person in such a case would have two or even more grounds of action but naturally only one claim to compensation or other remedy. However, it may well be that in a single event a cumulative set of wrongs emerges which, in ascertaining and making good the damage done, are to be treated separately. An example would be where personal injury to a foreigner is caused by right-wing thugs simply on account of the victim's different appearance.

NOTES

I. Infringement of liberty

1. Infringements of liberty are criminally punishable in FRANCE (NCP art. 224-1) and in BELGIUM (CP art. 434). In both countries the violation of a criminal law provision constitutes ipso facto a tortious faute civile (Carbonnier, Droit civil IV[21], no. 231 p. 398); freedom of physical movement is thus an independent interest protected by the law of extra-contractual liability. The position is exactly the same in SPAIN (CP arts. 163 et seq. in conjunction with art. 109) and in ITALY. Economic loss and non-economic loss are equally recoverable; in this respect the limits in CC art. 2059 are no longer a source of dependence and the same goes for unjust imprisonment suffered (Cass.pén. 25 November 2003-22 January 2004, no. 2050, Nouva giur. civ. comm. 2004, I, 56).

2. In all other member states of the EU infringements of the right to freedom of physical movement are of course also counted among the independent legal interests protected by the law of tort, see e.g. for GERMANY CC §§ 823(1) in conjunction with 253(2); for PORTUGAL CC art. 483; for GREECE CC arts. 914 in conjunction with 932; for HUNGARY Const. § 55(1) and CC § 76 in conjunction with § 84(1)(e); for POLAND CC art. 445(2); for SLOVENIA LOA arts. 134 and 179; for AUSTRIA CC § 1329; for DUTCH Law CC art. 6:106(1)(b) ("infringement of another right of personality"; Asser [-Hartkamp], Verbintenissenrecht I[12], nos. 465-467 pp. 425-430); for SWEDEN, Law on Damages chap. 2 § 3 (infringement of liberty by a criminal offence); for FINLAND, Law on Damages chap. 5 § 6(1) (same); for DENMARK, Law on Damages § 26(1) and for ESTONIA LOA § 1045(3). Of the aforementioned provisions, some confine themselves to clarifying that in the case of an infringement of liberty, a cause of action will also lie for the reparation of non-pecuniary losses. In SWEDEN these damages are termed "reparation for indignation"; in FINLAND one speaks of reparation for pain endured through indignation. Special rules are in place almost everywhere to govern the state's liability in damages in the case of the unjust imprisonment of those wrongly presumed to be offenders.

3. Among the torts of the COMMON LAW that compensate for the detrimental consequences of an infringement of liberty, the tort of false imprisonment is to be mentioned first and foremost. "False imprisonment" was defined in the IRISH case of Dullaghan v. Hillen [1957] Ir Jur 10, 15 as "unlawful and total restraint of the personal liberty of another whether by constraining him or compelling him to go to a particular place". Surveillance is not considered false imprisonment (Finlay CJ in Kane v. Governor of Mountjoy Prison [1988] ILRM 724, 735), however false imprisonment may be psychological (Phillips v. GN Ry Co Ltd (1903) 4 NIJR 154).

4. In some legal systems the tort law concept of the protection of liberty goes over and above the protection of freedom of physical movement. Under GREEK Law it has been decided, for example, that an infringement of liberty is suffered where someone is refused access by unauthorised means to a particular room (CA Athens 807/1956, NoB 4 [1956] 624) or to a place of general use (e.g. to the beach, cf. A.P. 244/1959, NoB 8 [1960] 162). In ITALY it is recognised that some rights of liberty specifically protected under constitutional law (e.g. Const. art. 16 [freedom of movement and freedom to choose one's place of dwelling]) assume third-party effect even between private legal persons (Bianca, Diritto civile I[2], 146). In SPAIN the right to the free development of personality (libre desarollo de la personalidad) is based on the concept of the protection of liberty, which has become practical, for example, in the context of excessive noise pollution (TS 29 April 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 3041 p.

5721). Additionally, liability for insufficient disclosure of information to a patient before surgical operation has been grounded on the basis of, inter alia, the concept of the infringement of personal liberty (TS 12 January 2001, RAJ 2001 (1) no. 3 p. 18), and the same applies to doctors' liability in cases of so-called wrongful conception (infringement of an individual's freedom to decide upon parenthood him/herself: TS 3 October 2000, RAJ 2000 (4) no. 7799 p. 12036).

II. The protection of incorporeal rights of personality

5. General. It is generally accepted today, that not only are an individual's bodily integrity and his freedom of physical movement protected by the law of tort, but also his incorporeal rights of personality. There exists, however, no prevailing uniformity on the extent of this tort law protection or on its underlying legal basis. Legal systems like the COMMON LAW work with individual, quite specific claims; further, there are other legal systems that have developed a comparatively large number of "specific" rights of personality; and then there are other legal systems that, because they only recognise a lesser amount of such "specific" rights of personality, developed in addition to these the concept of an all-encompassing "general right of personality". The "specific" incorporeal rights of personality are of course ultimately only distinct from the "general" ones to the extent that they have been independently elaborated upon in the relevant laws, while the so-called "general" right of personality takes the form of a general clause, regardless of whether it has been expounded in statute, or amounts solely to the result of the judicial development of the law.

6. FRENCH Law belongs to the category of legal systems that guarantee the necessary tort law protection via a multitude of specific incorporeal rights of personality. The most extensive rule relates to the right to the protection of one's private sphere (CC art. 9). Further, tort law protection is afforded to e.g. the right to control over the use of one's name (Cass.civ. 5 Febraury 1968, JCP 1968, II, 15670), the right to control over the reproduction of one's image (CA Versailles 30 June 1994, D. 1995 jur. 645, note Ravanas) and the right to control over the reproduction of one's voice (CFI Paris 3 December 1975, JCP 1978, II, 19002, note Bécourt), the infringement of which can, however, also constitute an infringement of CC art. 9. Whether evidence of actual loss is necessary in the latter cases or whether the infringement as such already justifies a claim, does not seem to be well and truly clear; in any event non-economic damage suffices (Rép.Dr.Civ. [-Tallon] VIII, v° Personnalité, no. 148; see further CFI Nanterre 6 April 1995, GazPal 1995 jur. 285). The starting point in BELGIUM and LUXEMBURG is the same, with the only deviation being the lack of a specific statutory regulation for the protection of one's private sphere (for a more detailed account see Guldix and Wylleman, TPR 1999, pp. 1624-1631 nos. 21-23). Here also indeed the predominant opinion is that an infringement of a right of personality is not yet sufficient per se for proving a faute and damage (see e.g. CA Brussels 8 November 1989, RGAR 1992, 11906), of course others believe that the case law to date has to be interpreted in the opposite sense (Guldix and Wylleman loc. cit. pp. 1632-1639 nos. 25-26).

7. SPANISH Law also does not recognise a "general personality right". Nevertheless it does protect a large number of "specific" incorporeal rights of personality and indeed mostly with recourse to the correlative fundamental constitutional rights. Those cited are e.g. the prohibition of discrimination (Const. art. 14), the right to life and to bodily as well as moral integrity (Const. art. 15), the right to honour, to a personal and familial sphere of intimacy and to control over the reproduction of one's image (Const. art. 18(1); specifically laid out and regulated for the purposes of civil law in Law 1/82 of 5 May 1982 on the Civil Protection of the Right to Honour, to a Sphere of Intimacy and to Control over the Reproduction of one's own Image [Ley Orgánica 1/1982, de 5 de mayo, de Protección Civil de los Derechos al Honor, a la Intimidad Personal y Familiar, y a la Propia Imagen]), the right to inviolability of the dwelling (Const. art. 18(2)) and the right to the safeguarding of communicative secrecy (Const. art. 18(3)). A further incorporeal personality right is the right to control over the use of one's name (Law on Civil Status [Ley del Registro Civil] of 8 July 1957 art. 53: protection of the right to control over the use of one's fore- and surname "against everyone").

8. There is debate in ITALIAN doctrine as to whether there are solely "specific" personality rights or whether these are the collective manifestation of a comprehensive "general" personality right, which lies at the root of them all (references in Cendon, Commentario al codice civile IV(2), art. 2043, no. 11.2. p. 1993). The Italian CC only expressly recognises "specific" personality rights (e.g. CC arts. 6-10: name and image). However, the case law has for some time departed from this catalogue and accepted the existence of further subjective personality rights (like, for example, the right to the observance of one's private sphere [Cass. 25 March 2003, no. 4366, Giust.civ. 2004, I, 2417; Cass. 10 May 2001, no. 6507, Nouva giur. civ. comm. 2002, I, 529] and the right to one's own identity [Cass. 7 February 1996, no. 978, Foro it. 1996, I, 1253 (relating to a body corporate); CFI Modena 23 October 1996, Riv.dir.ind. 1997, II, 177; CFI Rome 10 February 1993, Foro it. 1994, I, 1237; CFI Rome 27 March 1984, Foro it. 1984, I, 1687]). Since the aforementioned incorporeal personality rights are clothed with constitutional protection, the earlier difficulties in the context of the recoverability of non-patrimonial losses have been surmounted by the recent developments in the interpretation of CC art. 2059; these losses are now also recoverable (Cass. 18 March 2005, no. 5677, Dir. e Giust. 2005, fasc. 19, 38: non-patromonial loss caused by affronts to dignity or reputation even falls to be compensated where no criminal offence has been thereby committed; the limits of CC art. 2059 are not determinative, where personality rights of a constitutional degree are involved).

9. HUNGARY is one of the countries in which, along with the classic specific rights of personality (name, image, voice, honour and good name and reputation, secrecy of postal correspondence, protection of personal intellectual creations etc.), the concept of a general right of personality is also recognised (CC §§ 75 and 84; Gellért [-Benedek], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6], 1343; Gellért [-Zoltán], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata[6,] 267-272; Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I[2], 160/26-171; AB határozat 8/1990. (IV. 23.)). Violations of human dignity and freedom of belief are, inter alia, qualified as infringements of the general right of personality (CC § 76). A personality right to education would also exist, for the violation of which (e.g. by a college that does not refer to the nullity of a concluded training contract in a timely fashion: BH 2004/235) non-economic damages have also been provided in case law. SLOVENIAN LOA art. 181 under the heading "violation of dignity" provides a claim to reparation of non-patrimonial losses to those persons who are made the victim of an infringement of their right to sexual self-determination or the victim of a criminal offence against their dignity. POLISH CC arts. 23 and 24 protect the individual's rights of personality by means of numerous legal remedies (prohibitive injunction, retraction, damages). It is expressly stated that these rights of personality include "freedom, dignity, [and] freedom of conscience".

10. Among the legal systems that invoke the construct of a "general right of personality" even in their civil codes, are GREECE (CC art. 57) and PORTUGAL (CC art. 70(1)). Both codes additionally outline a range of "specific" rights of personality; PORTUGUESE CC e.g. the post-mortem personality right (art. 71), the right to control over the use of one's name (arts. 72 and 73), the right to control over the use of one's pseudonym (art. 74), rights to confidential postal correspondence (arts. 75 and 76), family memoirs and other confidential manuscripts (art. 77), to non-confidential postal correspondence (art. 78), to control over the reproduction of one's image (art. 79) and the right to the protection of the intimacy of one's private life (art. 80).

11. GERMANY and AUSTRIA also operate with the concept of a general right of personality. In GERMANY it was exclusively developed by case law, which based itself directly on the provisions of the Constitution on the protection of human dignity (Const. art. 1) and the right to the free development of one's personality (Const. art. 2(1)) (the seminal case of BGH 25 May 1954, BGHZ 13, 334, 338; see further, inter alia, BGH 2 April 1957, BGHZ 24, 72, 76; BGH 20 March 1968, BGHZ 50, 133, 143; BGH 5 December 1995, NJW 1996, 984; BGH 1 December 1999, NJW 2000, 2195, 2197). Damages for non-patrimonial losses awarded for significant infringements of this general right of personality assume an exemplary or deterrent character, primarily as against the mass media, which in turn is the reason for the comparatively high sums of compensation (BGH 15 November 1994, BGHZ 128, 1, 15; BGH 5 December 1995, NJW 1996, 984). The claim in non-patrimonial damages is based directly on Const. arts. 2(1) in conjunction with 1 (BVerfG 8 March 2000, NJW 2000, 2187, 2188; MünchKomm [-Oetker], BGB[4], § 253, no. 14).

12. In AUSTRIA, CC § 16 was previously (i.e. before CC § 1328a [right to protection of one's private sphere] came into force on 1 January 2004) relied upon. Today, inter alia, the right to bodily integrity, honour, protection of commercial reputation, to control over the reproduction of one's image, to the observance of one's private sphere, to the restraint of telephone calls, tape and picture recording and to the post mortem protection of one's personality rights, fall under this provision (see particularly OGH 27 February 1990, SZ 63/32, according to which CC § 16 essentially protects human dignity, and OGH 18 December 1992, SZ 65/166, which states that the general moral concepts of the fundamental rights guaranteed in the constitution permeate the system of private law through CC § 16). Whether there is also a "general" right of personality in addition to these specific situations, has in effect, however, not yet been conclusively clarified (for an overview of the differing approaches see Rummel [-Aicher], ABGB I[3], § 16 nos. 12 et seq.).

13. DUTCH CC art. 6:162(2) protects "rights" of every kind. CC art. 6:106(1)(b) grants a claim to reparation of non-patrimonial losses, "where the victim has suffered bodily injuries, his honour or good name and reputation have been tarnished or his state of personality has been harmed by other means". Among these latterly named harmful acts are invasions of one's private sphere (HR 9 January 1987, NedJur 1987 no. 928 p. 3139); infringements of dignity (damage to one's feeling of self worth and to one's estimation in the eyes of third parties as a consequence of media torts) are litigated in the context of infringements of honour and reputation (Schadevergoeding [-Lindenbergh] II, art. 6:106, no. 27.1 pp. 195-204). Incorporeal rights of personality, so it is stated, have their source typically in the constitution and international treaties on the protection of human rights referred to thereunder (in art. 93). It is even debated, whether such rights of personality are to be understood as the fallout from a general and unenumerated basic norm located on the periphery of the four corners of the CC, so that reliance on the rights listed in CC art. 6:162(2) is "in fact" not at all necessary and that one should in fact rely on the infringement of the "unwritten norms of social interaction" mentioned in CC art. 6:162(3). The case law has taken both paths, without it actually having a practical effect on the outcome (for a more detailed account, with references, see Jansen, Onrechtmatige Daad: algemene bepalingen[2], art. 6:162(2) nos. 7-8, pp. 75-95 and no. 32 p. 262).

14. ESTONIAN LOA § 1046 states that "the defamation of a person, inter alia, by passing undue judgement, by the unjustified use of the name or image of the person, or by breaching the inviolability of the private life or another personality right of the person is unlawful unless otherwise provided by law."

15. In the NORDIC countries the term "right of personality" is to a great extent unknown and in any event unusual. It has been deemed too difficult to define the scope of a general right of privacy or personality, both under the constitutional and private law (Strömholm, SvJT 1971, 695; Strömholm, Right to Privacy and Rights of Personality, 59; Stenvik, TfR 2003, 601). The protection of privacy and personality is thus based on a series of specific statutes; 'horizontal' effects of Eur.Conv.Hum.Rights art. 8 are denied (Swedish HD 29 October 2007, NJA 2007,747). The national laws on damages operate predominantly with the concept of the reparation for "affronts", and compensation sometimes requires the existence of a crime (SWEDISH Damages Liability Act chap. 2 § 3). Some specially drafted statutory regulations supplement these general laws, see e.g. for Sweden: Law on the Prohibition of Discrimination (lagen [2003:307] om förbud mot diskriminering) § 16 and § 21 (reversal of the burden of proof – on which see HD 28 March 2006, NJA 2006, 170 [damages for injured feelings awarded to a lesbian couple who were ejected from a restaurant after kissing there), Law on Credit Information (kreditupplysningslag) § 21, Law on Personal Data (personuppgiftslag [1998:204]) § 48, further the system of liability under the Law on Names and Pictures in Advertising (lag [1978:800] om namn och bild i reklam) and the definitively and fully independently regulated system of liability of the press in the Freedom of the Press Act (tryckfrihetsförordningen [1949:105]) as well as in the Fundamental Law on Freedom of Expression (yttrandefrihetsgrundlag [1991:1469]) (DENMARK, which likewise has a Law on Media at its disposal, conversely subjects the liability of the press to the general law of tort, and indeed even in the case of the unauthorised publication of images taken from the private life of the person concerned, cf. e.g. Eastern CA 16 April 1985, UfR 1986, 405 and Eastern CA 23 October 1990, UfR 1991, 194). Of particular note in FINNISH case law are Supreme Court 1 April 1982, HD 1982, II, 36 (publication of a photo of an officer in a tourism brochure; liability affirmed because no person may be represented in such a brochure without his or her permission, but no infringement of privacy arose solely from the mere fact that the officer had worn his uniform without the complete consent of the Garnisonsordre) and Supreme Court 15 October 1986, HD 1986, II, 131 (advertisement for a newspaper on television; no infringement of the rights of the celebrity legitimately represented in the newspaper arose solely out of the mere fact that he had not consented to the newspaper's advertisement).

16. In the meantime, however, FINNISH Law on Damages chap. 5 § 6(1) nos. 2-4 have advanced towards the concept of the general protection of one's personality. According to these provisions, "2) any person who through a criminally punishable offence is discriminated against, 3) any person whose personal integrity is seriously affronted, either intentionally or through gross negligence", as well as "4) any person, whose human merit is affronted intentionally or through gross negligence and in such a way that is comparable to No. 1-3" has a claim in damages. Similar provisions are indeed to be found in SWEDEN and in DENMARK, but they are more narrowly formulated.

17. ENGLISH law does not recognise a "general right of personality"; it does not even recognise an "overarching, all-embracing cause of action for 'invasion of privacy'" (Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead in Campbell v. Mirror Group Newspapers [2004] UKHL 22; [2004] 2 AC 457; [2004] 2 WLR 1232, 1236 at 11). Essential aspects of the protection of incorporeal rights of personality do, however, fall within the scope of the new interpretation of the tort of breach of confidence (for more detail, see below Note III28).

18. In IRELAND there prevails the concept of acknowledging a civil wrong where an individual's constitutional right has been interfered with – so-called "constitutional torts", see Meskell v. Córas Iompair Éireann [1973] IR 121, 133 (Walsh J). The protection of expressly enumerated fundamental rights is drawn from Const. arts. 40–44 (e.g. personal liberty, inviolability of the dwelling, freedom of expression and freedom of conscience and the free profession and practice of religion. Moreover, certain unenumerated rights are derived from Const. art. 40.3.1°, the existence of which was first recognised by Kenny J in Ryan v. A-G [1965] IR 294, who extended the recognition of unspecified "personal rights" founded upon the "Christian and democratic nature of the State". Among the list of rights that do not enjoy express reference in the Constitution but have yet been deemed by the judiciary as warranting protection are, inter alia, the right of bodily integrity and the right to (marital) privacy. However, in the context of private law, the abovementioned (see note II5) age-old common law practice of having to crowbar one's cause of action within specific cases in which a tort has been affirmed results in the prevailing idea that there is no need for a clearly defined notion of a "general" incorporeal right of personality and hence the lack of any reference to the notion of specific personality rights where private law comes into play. The unfolding of this judicial predilection for clinging to previously acknowledged torts instead of delving into the realms of constitutional law in order to found a cause of action in a private law context (thus hampering the advancement of "constitutional torts") begins with the statement of Henchy J in Hanrahan v. Merck, Sharpe & Dohme (Ireland) Ltd. [1988] ILRM 629 that "[a] person may of course in the absence of a common law or statutory cause of action, sue directly for breach of a constitutional right … but when he founds his action on an existing tort he is normally confined to the limitations of that tort". In W. v. Ireland (No. 2) [1997] IEHC 212, [1997] 2 IR 141 Costello P considered obiter that constitutionally guaranteed rights might be split into two categories: first those which, independently of the Constitution, were regulated and protected by law (common law and statutory law) and secondly, those that were not so regulated and protected. Costello P concluded (in compliance with Meskell and Hanrahan) that it was well established that for the latter class of rights the Constitution was to be construed as providing a separate cause of action for damages for breach of a constitutional right. Barrington J then stated in McDonnell v. Ireland [1998] 1 IR 134, 148 that "[i]f the general law provides an adequate cause of action to vindicate a constitutional right it appears to me that the injured party cannot ask the Court to devise a new and different cause of action". Indeed it has been succinctly noted in commentary that "the courts, having established the principle that the infringement of constitutional rights, by the State or by private individuals, warrants a remedy in the form of damages or an injunction, have baulked at the prospect of replacing the pre-existing statutory and common law remedies by a new constitutional remedial regime but they have not repudiated the principle. Instead they have sought to mitigate its practical effects by looking to the pre-existing law as the medium through which the constitutional remedy should be channelled in most cases" (McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], para. 1.60). In a private law context, one's right to a good name (art. 40.3.1°) is traditionally protected under the tort of defamation, without direct recourse to the Constitution. However, this preference for pre-existing torts is most vividly seen where in spite of a right to privacy being recognised as an unenumerated constitutional right, its existence under private law is nevertheless catered for by a range of different torts (shaped for different circumstances in which it has been infringed), leading to such an unsatisfactory state that reform in this area has been mooted and indeed a Privacy Bill published (see below Note III29). It may be argued, however, that in the case of Norris v. A-G [1984] IR 36, 71, in stating that "[a]mongst those basic personal rights is a complex of rights which vary in nature, purpose and range (each necessarily being a facet of the citizen's core of individuality within the constitutional order) and which may be compendiously referred to as the right of privacy", Henchy J (dissenting) was acknowledging the existence of such a general right of personality (albeit clothing it in the language of a right of privacy) and using privacy as the linchpin for all rights of personality. However, it is to be mentioned that although this dicta has been since cited (in A Ward of Court, Re [1996] 2 IR 73), nothing has come of the opportunity herein presented to use this statement as a conceptual hook upon which to place a group of such rights and to hence develop Henchy J's exposition in order to forge either a "general", catch-all right of personality or to derive other specific rights of personality therefrom. The right over the use of one's actual name (dealt with under the tort of passing off) is seen in a commercial and above all proprietary sense, which is difficult to reconcile with the ideology that such a right falls under the heading of an incorporeal right of personality requiring of protection by the fact of being an inherent feature of one's personality, inextricably linked to human dignity. The conceptual understanding of the equitable realm of breach of confidence has also been connected to this proprietary idea (the dicta of Lord Denning MR and Winn LJ in Seager v. Copydex Ltd. (No. 2) [1969] 1 WLR 809 give some support for the argument that an analogy can be drawn with the tort of conversion of a property interest). As has been noted, however, whereas confidential information of a commercial kind might be regarded as property, this is hardly the case with most personal intimate confidences (McMahon and Binchy, loc. cit. para. 37.22). On the issue of whether constitutional infringements constitute a case of injuria sine damno, viz. whether they are actionable per se, although in the case of Kearney Kearney v. Minister for Justice, Ireland and the A-G [1986] IR 116, Costello J regarded the infringement of a prisoner's constitutional right to communicate as actionable without proof of damage, one cannot conclude that this is so in all cases (McMahon and Binchy, loc. cit. para. 1.63).

19. In SCOTLAND, the 1998 Human Rights Act entered into force on 2 October 2000 (in order to "give further effect" to the European Convention on Human Rights). The horizontality of this act has not yet been definitively clarified in case law (MacQueen, [2003] 78 TulLRev 363), with the practice also being to use established protected legal interests under the law of delict, rather than developing or indeed recognising any incorporeal rights of personality as such. The position in Scotland is, however, a little closer to that in civil law jurisdictions here, as can be seen from a look at the general context of liability for an actio injuriarum. Here it has been stated that injuria is actionable at least for solatium if the injuria, referred to as "the insult or affront to personality", and animus injuriandi are proved, without proof of any actual or patrimonial loss (Walker, Delict[2], 40). Self-esteem and honour are protected from unjustifiable attack, as are public reputation and good name in the eyes of others (Walker loc. cit. 729; see below Note IV42). Publicity with respect to private matters of purely personal concern is an injury to personality which is protected in "pockets of liability" rather than by a general right (MacQueen, (2002) 8 Edinburgh LRev 248, 251). The kind of cases in which the issue of the recognition of the right to privacy has traditionally arisen include the publication of a photograph taken surreptitiously and without consent (Pollard v. Photographic Co. (1889) 40 Ch. D 345, arguendo), the use of a person's name or title or photograph or other reference to or representation of him in an advertisement without his consent (cf. Tolley v. J. S. Fry & Sons Ltd. [1931] AC 333), the unauthorised use of a person's name in bogus testimonials published in advertisements (cf. Mazatti v. Acme Products Ltd. [1930] 4 DLR 601), and the publication of a biography of a distinguished person without that person's permission, knowledge or co-operation, and against his wishes (Walker, loc. cit.). It is evident from this list that here privacy is seen as a wider source of various rights of personality, including the right to control over the use of one's name and image, although in recent decisions, it has in fact been the tort of breach of confidence that has been extended and applied to cover the wider area of personality rights (see Campbell v. Mirror Group Newspapers [2004] UKHL 22; [2004] 2 AC 457; Douglas v. Hello! Ltd. (No. 3) [2003] EWHC 786 (Ch), 3 All ER 996 (Lindsay J); and A v. B plc. [2002] EWCA Civ 337, [2003] QB 195).

III. The right to privacy

20. The right to privacy (under these Principles) has gained particular distinction in certain jurisdictions. Thus, under FRENCH CC art. 9 "everyone has the right to respect for his private life" and when this right is infringed, the courts have opened up the law to a broad range of possible remedies. The exact meaning of the term vie privée has not been defined by statute. Further developments shall continue to be left to the courts. Primarily what is meant is family and private life, everyday domestic events, a person's state of health, his or her love-life and emotional life, his or her friendships and holidays, private aspects of his or her working life and also the place and type of his or her funeral (Cornu, Droit civil. Introduction. Les personnes. Les biens[10], no. 516 pp. 234-235). Overlap with other personal rights is also conceivable (e.g. Cass.civ. 10 June 1987, Bull.civ. 1987, I, no. 191 p. 141: the infringement of vie privée as well as of droit à l´image if an actress is photographed against her will leaving the hospital in a wheelchair). CC art. 9 is even brought into play as the basis for the recognition of a change of sex after an operation (Cass.ass.plén. 11 December 1992, Bull.civ. [ass.plén.] 1992 no. 13 p. 27). The legitimate interests of others remain, however, unaffected by CC art. 9 (e.g. Cass.civ. 6 May 1999, Bull.civ. 1999, II, no. 85 p. 63: the use of diary entries as evidence of infidelity in divorce proceedings permitted). Infringements of CC art. 9 lead to a claim in damages even when proof of actual damage or a faute is absent (Cass.civ. 5 November 1996, Bull.civ. 1996, I, no. 378 p. 265).

21. In BELGIAN Law the starting point for the law of obligations in this area is also Const. art. 22, which guarantees to every person the right to a private and family life. To date, a generally accepted definition of these terms does not exist. Generally what is meant is the freedom of an individual to shape his own life and the protection of the confidentiality of his personal living space (de Theux, Ann. Louv. 2002, 287, 293-297). Claims in damages are subject to the general prerequisites of CC arts. 1382 and 1383 (e.g. CA Gent 12 June 2001, TBBR 2003, 305, note Sottiaux: the liability of a newspaper that – truthfully – had reported on the homosexual disposition of a member of a music band).

22. In SPANISH Law the right to privacy has its foundations in Const. art. 18 as well as in the aforementioned Statute 1/1982 of 5 May 1982 on the civil protection of the right to honour, to privacy and to control over the reproduction of one's own image. The Spanish jurisprudence extends the right to privacy quite broadly. It covers e.g. the right to peace and relaxation (TS 29 April 2003, RAJ 2003 (3) no. 3041 p. 5721; see also Martín Vida, VersRAI 2004, 20-23; Vida, VersRAI 2005, 57-63 and 2006, 5-8) (not however a claim in damages or an injunction where the marital obligation of fidelity is infringed: TS 22 July 1999, RAJ 1999 (3) no. 5721 p. 8928 and TS 30 July 1999, RAJ 1999 (3) no. 5726 p. 8933). The right to privacy encompasses the right to personal information; no one is permitted to interfere with the confidential documents concerning another's private life (Balaguer Callejón, Los derechos fundamentales, 102). Law 1/1982 art. 7 lists as impermissible injurious behaviour, inter alia, the installation of bugging devices and photographic equipment, and further, methods of spying on private communication and the publishing of confidential information relating to the person. Moreover, the law expressly protects one's private family life (intimidad familiar).

23. The ITALIAN jurisprudence has also recognised the right to privacy. It aims to protect the confidentiality of personal and familial affairs and information from the curiosity of others; infringing this right constitutes a danno ingiusto in the sense of CC art. 2043 (Cass. 25 March 2003, no. 4366, Giust.civ.Mass. 2003, 594). During the development of the right to privacy, originally a claim was based on a correlative application of the rules on certain "specific" personal rights (right to control over the reproduction of one's own image [CC art. 10], right to correspondence [Copyright Act arts. 93-97], right to restrain publication of a manuscript [Copyright Act arts. 21-24] etc.), on Europ.Conv. Human Rights art. 8 and, as far as the existence of an all-encompassing "general" personal right was granted, on Const. art. 2. Later, Statute 675/96 on the protection of private data brought express statutory recognition to the right to privacy, if only for a specified area. The limits of the right to privacy are established through a balancing of interests on a case-by-case basis (Cian and Trabucchi, Commentario breve al codice civile, arts. 1-10, § IV, nos. 1-3).

24. The HUNGARIAN Constitutional Court (AB határozat 8/1990 [IV. 23.]) stresses that the general right of personality is a subsidiary basic right, to which the civil courts may refer, if a more concrete basis for a claim is absent. Violations of privacy often fall under this category (Gellért [-Zoltán], A Polgári Törvénykönyv Magyarázata, 274-279) unless in specially regulated cases like the invasion into private secrets or the right to a private dwelling. The protection afforded to an individual's private sphere is based on the protection of human dignity (AB határozat 46/1991 [IX. 10.]). Examples relate, for instance, to truthful press reports about the sexual behaviour of private persons (BH 2004/103), the right to know one's own descent and the right that no outsider negates an existing relationship between relatives (AB határozat 57/1991 [XI. 8.]; Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog, Kommentár a gyakorlat számára I 168-171). SLOVENIAN LOA art. 134 provides the courts with a broad spectrum of remedies in the case of contravention of the "inviolability of the person, personal and family life or any other personal right".

25. In GERMANY the right to privacy is a component of the judicially developed general personality right (e.g. BVerfG 19 December 1995, BVerfGE 101, 361, 382 and BGH 15 December 1999, BGHZ 131, 332, 338). One's sphere of privacy, so it is stated, "does not end at the front door … if in the first instance it encompasses the inner area between the four walls of one's house in a spatial sense. Privacy worthy of protection exists equally outside the house ... when one places one's self in a secluded area in which it is objectively evident that there exists the wish to be by one's self" (BGH 9 December 2003, JZ 2004, 622, note v. Gerlach). Therefore, an intrusion into one's privacy also occurs if someone "by surmounting existing obstacles or with suitable aids (e.g. telephoto lens, ladder or aeroplane), spies on the living space of another" (BGH 9 December 2003 loc. cit.).

26. In contrast, the right to privacy is again the subject of an express statutory regulation in AUSTRIA (CC § 1328a; in force since 1 January 2004) and in Portugal (CC art. 80). Under Austrian CC § 1328a illegal and culpable intrusion into one's privacy and actions, through which a person's private affairs are revealed or exploited, leads to liability for the compensation of pecuniary and, in cases of considerable infringements, also for non-pecuniary damage (see Helmich, ecolex 2003, 888). According to PORTUGUESE CC art. 80 everyone must "respect the intimate private life of another. The scope of this protection is defined based on the facts of each case and the living conditions of the person in question". Similar protective measures are to be found in GREEK CC art. 57. In DUTCH Law violations of privacy fall under CC art. 6:106(1)(b) and justify a claim to compensation of non-pecuniary damage (Memorie van Antwoord II, Parlementaire Geschiedenis VI, 380; HR 30 October 1987, NedJur 1988 no. 277 pp. 1097-1107; HR 1 November 1991, NedJur 1992 no. 58 pp. 177-180; Asser [-Hartkamp] Verbintenissenrecht I[12], nos. 465 and 467, pp. 425-430). The ESTONIAN LOA § 1046(1) expressly classifies contraventions of "the inviolability of the private life or another personal right" as illegal acts. On this aspect, see Supreme Court 3-2-1-161-06, RT III 2006, 23, 209.

27. In the NORDIC countries numerous statutory instruments for the protection of individual aspects of privacy are in place, among them is also the right against unauthorised publications of one's portrait; see Notes II15-16 above. Incidentally, the right to compensation for indignation does the necessary here (loc. cit.). Here the natural starting point is the Law on Damages chap. 2 § 3 ("Any person who offends another through wrongdoing, which includes an attack on the person, on his/her freedom, on his/her ability to live peaceably, or on his/her honour, has to compensate the injured party for damage suffered." The protection of someone's ability to live peaceably includes the right to be left in peace and consequently not to be obliged to extend one's private life to others (Sandstedt, VersRAI 2002, 9, 10). This is also the law under the relevant formulation of the DANISH Law on Damages § 26 (see also, inter alia, Eastern CA 24 September 2004, UfR 2005, 123). The FINNISH Law on Damages chap. 5 § 6(1) no. 1 expressly states that privacy enjoys protection under the law of torts (for a more detailed account see Supreme Court 19 December 2005, HD 2005 no. 136; Supreme Court 25 August 2000, HD 2000 no. 83 and Sisula-Tulokas, JFT 2000, 634).

28. In ENGLAND it has been again recently stressed that "[i]n this country… there is no overarching, all-embracing cause of action for 'invasion of privacy'" (Campbell v. Mirror Group Newspapers [2004] UKHL 22; [2004] 2 AC 457, 464 per Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead). Notwithstanding this, it is also valid law "that the values enshrined in articles 8 and 10 (of the European Convention of Human Rights) are now part of the cause of action for breach of confidence" (loc.cit. 1238 (at 17); see also Phillipson, 2003 ModLRev 726-758).

29. Although the law in IRELAND had been slow to recognise a general "right to privacy", interference with which causes a tort, such a right has been recognised as a constitutional right since 1987 (Kennedy & Arnold v. Ireland [1987] 1 IR 587, a case involving telephone-tapping). Rather than delving into the realm of the law of torts the courts have developed this right under Const. art. 40.3.1 (see also, in relation to a marital couple's access to contraceptive facilities, McGee v. A-G [1974] IR 284). Privacy interests are however still subject to tort law actions (see in more detail McMahon and Binchy, Torts[3], 994), particularly to: (i) Trespass to land (e.g. Whelan v. Madigan [1978] ILRM 136 (HC); see, however, the Law Reform Commission's Consultation Paper on Privacy: Surveillance and the Interception of Communications (1996), para. 4.4: this tort does not extend to surveillance activities which are conducted outside the boundaries of the property); (ii) torts affecting interests in goods, e.g. trespass to goods (The People (D. P. P.) v. Morgan (1980) 114 ILTR 60, 62 [a person takes another's diary and reads it]); (iii) trespass to the person (which however requires physical contact or threat of such contact); (iv) intentional infliction of mental suffering (improper techniques of investigations, intimidatory debt collection, harassment of tenants by landlords); (v) private nuisance (intrusions on the ability of a person to live peaceably in his or her home); (vi) injurious falsehood (see Law Reform Commission loc. cit. paras. 4.22 – 4.24); (vii) negligence (McMahon and Binchy loc. cit. 997); and (viii) breach of statutory duty (disclosure of confidential information by semi-state agencies, see House of Spring Gardens Ltd. v. Point Blank Ltd. [1984] IR 611 (Sup.Ct.); Private Research Ltd. v. Brosnan [1996] 1 ILRM 27, 31 (HC) and Cogley v. Radio Telifis Éireann [2005] IEHC 180, [2005] 4 IR 79). The publication of a new privacy bill (Privacy Bill 2006) based on recommendations put forward by the Working Group on Privacy has recently been approved by the Government in order to adapt to recent court decisions in Ireland and Europe in the area of privacy. The main purpose of this Bill is to introduce a modern statutory framework to protect all citizens from the invasion of their privacy. The Bill creates a specific tort to violate the privacy of an individual, which is actionable without proof of special damages. In deciding whether or not a breach of privacy has taken place and in assessing the extent to which a defendant may be liable for damages for any such breach, a court may have regard to factors such as the extent to which an individual has engaged in surveillance of another, the means used and the extent to which the individual has engaged in the harassment of another or has trespassed upon the property of another.

30. In SCOTLAND, notwithstanding the entry into force of the 1998 Human Rights Act on 2 October 2000, the statement still holds true that the law has "not yet fully recognised the interest which an individual has that his private and personal affairs shall not be unjustifiably pried into and disclosed to outsiders" (Walker, Delict[2], 703). In seeking a definition of privacy, it has been pointed out that "access, attention, and information are all necessary components of privacy" (Hogg, (1992) SLT 349). It has been submitted that the principle of actio injuriarum would justify a Scottish court in giving a remedy for unjustifiable infringement of privacy (Walker loc. cit. 704; Hogg, loc. cit. 351). That a privacy right might develop in Scotland was noted by the Calcutt Report, in recognising that "a common law right to privacy could possibly develop in Scotland, where there is a more general concept of culpa … compared with the more narrowly-drawn English torts" (Committee on Privacy and Related Matters, Cm 1102, July 1992, para. 12.2). However, in Martin v. Mcguiness 2003 SLT 1424 arguments based on actio injuriarum were submitted by counsel for the pursuer, essentially asserting that the court had a duty to develop the existing law to be compatible with the ECHR, and that the actio injuriarum provided a basis for the protection of privacy in Scots law. Lord Bonomy merely noted the submissions made on this point, deciding the case on other grounds, "giving little support to any development of the law in this particular way" (MacQueen, (2004) 8 Edinburgh LRev 249, 253). The difficulty with any possible attempt to develop the common law to create a general obligation to respect individual privacy is the fact that "privacy is so multi-faceted that generalisation by judges arising from particular cases is dangerous, and that the responsibility for the creation of a general right, if that is needed or desirable, should fall on the legislature". Instead of having an express privacy right, "[p]rivacy, as with other interests, is protected, but in pockets of liability, rather than in general" (MacQueen loc. cit., 251). Such cases in which the claim over a right to privacy has been incidentally grafted onto other causes of action include causes of action primarily in libel (Monson v. Tussaud [1894] 1 QB 671; Tolley v. J. S. Fry & Sons Ltd. [1931] AC 333), infringement of copyright (Williams v. Settle [1960] 1 WLR 1072) and breach of confidence (Pollard v. Photographic Co. (1889) 40 Ch. D 345). The essence of the wrong consists in bringing the name, characteristics, appearance or facts relating to the pursuer into the public notice without the consent of the pursuer or legal justification (Walker loc. cit.). Telephone tapping and intercepting information being communicated also falls under an infringement of privacy (Walker loc. cit. 706). Where a person has been charged with crime and liberalised on bail, photographs and finger-prints may not be taken without consent, and to do so is illegal and actionable (Adamson v. Martin 1916 SC 319). Nor in such a case may a person be searched, or have his finger-prints taken or scrapings taken from under his fingernails (McGovern v. H. M. Advocate 1950 JC 33). A person who is merely charged cannot be subjected to medical examination without his consent, though he may be observed medically (Reid v. Nixon 1948 JC 68; Forrester v. H. M. Advocate 1952 JC 28; Farrell v. Concannon 1957 JC 12; McKie v. H. M. Advocate 1958 JC 24). The clearest case of infringement of privacy is where a wrongful or unwarranted search is made of the pursuer's premises, and such facts are recognised as wrongful (Walker loc. cit. 707). In a civil action, Lord Jauncey described the act of asking a woman in police custody to remove her brassiere as "not justified in law" and an "invasion of privacy" as well as of liberty (Henderson v. Chief Constable of Fife Police 1988 SLT 361). Based on this decision, it has been submitted in scholarly writing that this case supports the award of damages for the invasion of the right to privacy (Hogg loc. cit. 351). In considering a claim for infringement of privacy, countervailing social interests (freedom of speech and of the press, the reasonable interest of individuals in the lives and deeds of persons prominent in the community and the public interest in government and the administration of justice) have to be weighed (Walker loc. cit. 708). Although the notion of public interest (as a counterbalancing factor against one's privacy) is normally seen from the vantage point of freedom of speech and of press (as indispensable elements of a democratic society), it has also been noted in case law that "the interest of an individual in his own privacy is itself a public interest" (Parks v. Tayside Regional Council 1989 SC 38, 42). In spite of the abovementioned lack of a general right of privacy, it has been argued that over the last two decades the law of confidence has been continually evolving to fill the gaps left by the lack of a statute based privacy law (Mackenzie, "Privacy – A New Right in UK law?" (2002) SLT 98, 99). In light of the constantly adapting interpretation of breach of confidence in order to cater for this area, the practical effects of the denial of a general right to privacy in Campbell v. Mirror Group Newspapers [2004] UKHL 22; [2004] 2 AC 457 are not as major as it would seem at first blush.

IV. Defamation

31. Under the law governing liability for affronts to honour, some not-so-insignificant distinctions once again crop up, especially between the common law and the civil law; in this branch of the law, even among the civil law countries, some very different regulatory techniques have developed. It is the settled case law of the FRENCH Courts to rule that an affront to another person's honour (atteinte à l´honneur et à la considération) constitutes a tortious faute (see solely CA Paris 8 October 1985, D. 1986 I.R. 190, note Lindon); furthermore, affronts to honour are normally liable to criminal prosecution. CC art. 9-1 provides protection from the publication of the name of an accused party, who has not yet been convicted and can therefore rely on the presumption of innocence "the respect for which is the right of all". In BELGIUM varying standpoints subsist on the question of whether the protection of honour is to be understood as an independent category of tort law or simply as a case encompassed by the application of the protection of one's private sphere (see in detail de Theux, Ann. Louv. 2002, 287, 300); it is indisputable, however, that affronts to honour fall under the normal requirements of CC arts. 1382 and 1383, amounting to a claim in damages (e.g. CA Gent 28 March 2002, RW 2003-2004, 507).

32. SPANISH Act 1/1982 art. 7(7) defines difamación as a statement of fact or value judgement, through which an individual's dignity is violated by means of injury to their good name and reputation or detriment to their self-estimation; this extensively overlaps with the definition of injuria (affront) in CP art. 208 (Yzquierdo Tolsada, Sistema de responsabilidad civil, 51) ("defamation/affront is an act or expression, which violates a person's dignity through the injury to their reputation or detriment to their self-estimation. Only those affronts that - due to their form, consequences and circumstances - are deemed to be severe by public opinion, amount to a criminal offence. Affronts implicit in the imputation of having committed a criminal offence are not to be deemed severe, unless they are carried out with knowledge or their falsity or with reckless disregard for their truth".

33. In ITALIAN Law a distinction is drawn between honour (onore), decorum (decoro) and reputation (reputazione). Onore relates to the sum of a person's moral qualities, decoro to their remaining qualities and reputazione to their estimation in society, whereby in turn personal reputation is distinguished from professional reputation. Legal entities, political parties and religious communities can bring a claim based on an injury to reputation. The civil law protection of honour and reputation goes over and above that under criminal law (CP arts. 594 et seq.). This is due to the fact that negligence suffices for civil liability (Cass. 13 May 1958, no. 1563, RGI 1959, Resp. uso mezzi diffusione, no. 9; Cass. 18 October 1984, no. 5259, Giur.it. 1985, I, 1, 1100; Visintini, I fatti illeciti I^2, 334); moreover, civil law protection steps in even where the defamatory statement is made to one single third party (Cass. 13 October 1972, no. 3045, Giur.it. 1973, I, 1, 36). Furthermore, liability for justifiably catering to the public's interest in important information can yet be excluded even where the complete criminal law defence of exceptio veritatis was not available to the defendant (Cass. 12 December 1955, Giur.it. 1956, I, 326; Cass. 24 April 1962, no. 816, Foro it. 1962, I, 1722; Cass. 28 March 1974, no. 868, Foro it. 1974, I, 1358; Cass. 24 May 2002, no. 7628, Foro it. 2002, I, 2322).

34. HUNGARIAN CC § 76 expressly counts "honour", along with human dignity, as an interest worthy of tort law protection; CC § 78(1) additionally enumerates one's good reputation/name. Honour, as is stated, concerns a value judgement that has formed in society about a human being (whether bodies corporate can suffer an injury to their "honour" is controversial). Unreasonable and unjustifiably injurious, abasing or degrading statements or behaviour can even lead to liability for an affront to honour, where their core fact assertion is true; in each individual case it always depends on the result of balancing the injury with the fundamental right to the free expression of one's opinions (Petrik [-Petrik], Polgári jog I^2, 178/2).

35. In cases of a "disparagement of honour", AUSTRIAN CC § 1330(1) in conjunction with § 1295 provides a claim in patrimonial damages and lost gains, not however in non-economic damages. The latter are only recoverable where statute expressly provides for such (CC § 1340), and that is precisely not the case with CC § 1330(1) (Koziol and Welser, Bürgerliches Recht II^{12}, 327; Bydlinski, JBl 1965, 237, 252; OGH 26 September 1951, EvBl 1951/487 p 618). Conversely, GERMAN CC § 823(1) does not list honour as among the absolute rights protected by this provision. According to the original spirit of this law, civil liability for affronts to honour should be dependant on the existence of a criminal offence in the case in question (CC § 823(2)). Today liability for affronts to honour fall however within the scope of the "general right of personality" afforded under § 823(1) (e.g. BGH 5 March 1963, BGHZ 39, 124, 129).

36. In GREECE "honour" is undoubtedly counted among the interests protected under CC arts. 57 et seq.; a culpable affront to honour results in liability under CC art. 914,

